DILUTING CHRISTIAN VIRTUES

A New Year Self Inspection

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

THIS is a religious organ, representing religious people. It is difficult for a paper having this background to refrain from criticising non-religious people and secular institutions.

That is apt to be the stock in trade of religious journalism and as we review the files of THE WITNESS, we plead guilty to the charge.

Let us start the New Year from another angle, and accept the world's criticism of our witness to Christ.

To the South of us, the great State of Mexico has so repudiated religion that it cannot abide the clerical uniform and forbids the wearing of ecclesiastical symbols in the street.

Is this attitude due solely to the hatred of the Church's virtues, or largely to impatience with her vices?

A large share of the laboring people in all countries have turned against the Church and are rather violent in their accusation of her failure to sympathize with the poor.

In our own land, it is quite the thing for college professors to hint, and their pupils to broadcast, an attitude of cultural superiority to religious obligations.

Probably forty per cent of an adult population never enter a church and resent any and every appeal to identify themselves, charm the Church never so wisely.

At least a third of the children in the United States receive no religious instruction whatsoever, and another third a negligible amount.

Again I ask, is it all due to the hostility of the sinner against the virtues of religion, or it is equally due to the fact that the saints in the Church are not impressive?

Unquestionably people whose chief motive in life is the indulgence of their lusts, the satisfying of their greed, or the exaltation of their ego will not only despise the Church, but they will hate it all the more for the virtues that it manifests.

The Christian may ignore such criticism as negligible, and even rejoice that it exists.

But one may not assume that the evidence is so one-sided. I am inclined to think that the people who are perplexed by the failure of Christians to have any real light is as great as the number who are vexed at virtue itself.

Of course, a Christian may fall back upon the perfectly reasonable assumption that he is no more responsible for the failure of other Christians than a musician is responsible for the discordant notes of other musicians. People do not give up musical aspirations because multitudes are out of tune.

And I really believe that moral censors, whether Christian or anti-Christian, will get cold comfort in the Day of Judgment.

The Judge will scarcely accept the plea of the evader that he refused to fight because so many soldiers were cowards. One scarcely establishes his own courage by such a puerile plea.

The Christian morale has never been established by its critics, but rather by that small remnant who have served sincerely in spite of slackers within and scorners without.

Yet, there is something to be said of our failure as witnesses of Christ to send out our light in a more effective way.

It is not merely that Christians en masse fail to be luminous; it is that certain qualities which pass muster in a pagan setting are rather intolerable in a Christian background.

One cannot be indifferent to the fact that to be a soldier of Christ demands certain militant qualities that are not expected of non-combatants.

There is no question in my mind that the average morality of Christians in America is much higher than that of non-Christians.

It makes more noise for one Christian to enter the penitentiary than it does for ten non-Christians to be enrolled there and the percentage of active Church members in our prisons is not large.

If one were to divide the nation into two groups of fifty millions each, Christians would not need to be ashamed of their average in ordinary morality. Its superiority would be overwhelming. But there are offenses in a military corps which are noticeable there, which would not be conspicuous in a mob, but are inexcusable in an army.

It is not in the ethics of the world that Christians fail, but in the ethics of Christ. There are certain peculiar virtues which Christ requires in His disciples, the absence of which are at once noted, and the contrast between realization and expectation are immediately broadcasted.

And this peculiarly Christian emphasis is not, I believe, that which is popularly assumed.

When a man's Christian devotion is measured by the absence of certain petty vices, the gospel of Christ is caricatured, and belittled, for the Christian emphasis is on certain magnanimous virtues, without which the mere absence of petty vices leaves a vacuum to be admired.

It is this mistaken emphasis which the public assumes to be the official mark of Christian virtues which seriously handicaps the seeker after righteousness. He is repelled rather than attracted by this highly advertised dilution of Christian character. He is like the man who has been buncoed with phoney mining stock, and afterwards is suspicious of liberty bonds.

Religion, like bonds, must have something more behind it than oratorical assurances, and it has depended too much upon this kind of advertising, which has not discriminated between nice looking and negotiable paper.

Let us note certain large virtues which the Church should derive from her Master without question, and in my judgment the absence of these virtues is that which gives occasion for the ungodly to blaspheme.

1. The Church may not be pro-labor or pro-capital, but it must be no respecter of persons, for that was the peculiar characteristic of her Master. The Church suffers incalculably from those who feel that Christ is the great apostle of culture. He is not. With Him the rich and poor meet together and the Lord gives to both the same measure of His grace. Those who represent Him in the ministry have no right to minister to a class, however delightful that class may be.

2. The Church may not be mercenary in its attitude toward society.

No amount of Apostolic jurisdiction will absolve any branch of the Church which thinks that the sacramental gifts of God can be distributed for money. The same hand that drove the money changers from the temple will repudiate commercialism in the Holy Catholic Church. He always has.

This mercenary proclivity may be the same kind of a thing in a Church bazaar as it is in an arrogant heirarchy.

It is as hateful to God as a covetous Christian has always been.

3. The Church may not function merely as a group of academic theologians, or executive secretaries. It must relate itself to real life and not merely to theoretical problems.

It must have other contacts than ecclesiastical puzzles, and the U. S. mail. There is no system, however valuable it may be (and is for other purposes) which can take the place of the human voice and the human hand in the ministering to human need.

The Church must have a ministry which is verbally articulate to the perplexed, and has an intimate contact with the poor.

4. The Church must not be ecclesiastically hide-bound and humanly unsympathetic. When St. Paul speaks of building upon one foundation and no other, he justifies us in our conviction that the Church is a divine institution, entirely different from a lodge, or a club or a cult. Therefore, we may be intensely loyal to what we believe Christ established.

One is suspicious of the loyalty of those who say that one wife, or one home, or one Church is as good as another.

The anaemic absence of loyalty to the institution is no virtue but a vice. But on the other hand bigotry is the perversion of loyalty and is equally pernicious.

St. Paul discriminates between the things God's children think and do, and the persons of those children.

We may build with gold and silver, or we may build with hay and stubble.

The fire may intensify or destroy the value of our little efforts, but the children themselves are different. They shall be saved, though the things they admire are burned.

Opinions are the furniture of life; and in the great conflagration they may not be fire-proof, but the persons of God's children are sacred, and Christ expects us to make the same distinction between fallacious opinions and misguided children.

The bigot never senses this distinction which Christ emphasized in His attitude toward Samaritans—in distinction from the zeal of the Apostles who wanted fire sent down from Heaven to destroy those who held erroneous opinions.

Force is never effective in the bestowel of the grace of Him Who always scorned to use it.

The Church has it own atmosphere.

Evil men will always hate it as they hate Christ; but men who are perplexed are looking for the Church to be kindly, generous, impartial and magnanimous.

It is our failure in these qualities which prevents the Church from being more attractive to those who hunger and thirst after righteousness.

And the failure is ours, not His. He has honored us by calling us to be His witnesses. We are in the witness stand. We are there to reflect His Gospel in His way; and we may not lay our failure to any ecclesiastical system but to our own perverseness, for whether we are Papist or Puritan, Catholic or Protestant, Atheist or Agnostic, we are prone to manifest the same vices of intolerance, covetousness, and self-assurance, unless we are willing to reflect His wonderful tenderness in our ministrations to all the sons of men.

It is one thing to be orthodox; it is quite another thing to translate our dogmas into life.

And we fail just in proportion as we substitute our own little candles for the light of the world. And we wonder why the light we give is not more luminous to those who walk in darkness.

It is His light and not our own that He has bidden us to send forth.

One is not surprised that men resent the audacity of our attempt, because they do not share with us in the confidence of our belief, that where we fail, His grace will suffice.

THE ADVENTURE OF LIFE

Materialism and Happiness

BY REV. G. A. STUDDERT KENNEDY

"I BELIEVE in materialism. I believe in all the proceeds of a healthy materialism—good cooking, dry houses, dry feet, sewers, drain-pipes, hot water, baths, electric lights, automobiles, good roads, bright streets, long vacations away from the village pump, new ideas, fast horses, swift conservation, theatres, operas, orchestras, bands. I believe in them all for everybody. The man who dies without knowing these things may be as exquisite as a saint and as rich as a poet, but it is in spite of, and not because of, his deprivation."

This frank confession of faith comes, I believe, from America. I am a Christian, and yet I think I could say that creed.

I believe in these things; some of them appeal to me more than others, but take it all round, I believe in them all for everybody. And yet I believe, too, with all my heart, that "man's life consisteth not in the multitude of things that he possesses."

All these things are good things to have if you have something more, but without that something more they are always a danger, and may be the very devil.

Christ never said it was impossible for a rich man to enter into the Kingdom of God; He said it was difficult, but that all things were possible with God. And that's just it. For a rich man or a rich people there are many more ways of going to the dogs or the devil than there are for poor men and for poor people, and, therefore, their need for God is more desperate.

THE SUPREME TEST

That is why, if we only knew it, we modern men need even more than our fathers to lay firm hold on God, that loving Him in and above all things we may obtain His promises, which exceed all that we can desire.

For all of us the standard of life has gone up. It is not true to say that since the industrial revolution and the coming of machinery the rich have grown richer and the poor have grown poorer; both rich and poor are better off in the material sense than they have ever been at any period in the history of the world. The poorest amongst us can command things which our forefathers would have looked upon as luxuries. And therein lies the great adventure of modern life.

Our fathers stood the test of poverty; we are called upon to stand the test of wealth, and Christ was right when He regarded that as the supreme test of all. Christianity all down the ages has set its face against the teaching that material things are an evil in themselves, and that the only way to get to heaven is to despise the earth and all that earth affords.

When Possessions Become Curses

For special people and for special reasons it may be a good thing to sell all that you have, give to the poor, and set forth in the strength of your naked personality to follow the ascetic way.

There have always been heroes who did this, and the world owes them much; but it is not, and it is not meant to be, the ordinary way of life. It is not even of necessity the highest way of life, though it may very well be the way that individual men and women are called upon to take.

It certainly is not in every case the hardest way of life. Christ saw that clearly, and warned men that to accept gifts at God's hands made it absolutely necessary, if they were not to prove a curse rather than a blessing, that they should be received on bended knee and with heartfelt gratitude.

The command of material things opens up a wider range of choice 'twixt good and evil, and reveals to man a higher heaven and a deeper hell, and the awful choice between them. It remains true, deadly true, that no amount of material possessions, however great, can ever satisfy the ultimate needs of the human soul.

Can Wealth Lead to Happiness?

The reasons for this are not really far to seek. The possession of material power and wealth only opens out for man the road to gratify his natural desires, and if, like the animal, his nature was such that his natural desires were in harmony and did not conflict with one another, he could thereby attain happiness.

But man's natural desires are not in harmony with one another, and if he seeks to gratify them all to the full, they lead not to that inward peace which is the essence of happiness, but to a perfectly appalling conflict which tears his personality to pieces.

This is just an inevitable fact, and there is no possible way of getting out of it. Both soul and body are tough, and will stand a lot of misuse before the inevitable penalty falls, but sooner or later it must fall by a law as immutable as the law of gravity.

The crash may be long postponed, but it is bound to come at last, both for the individual and for society; the conflicts which rend society are merely the conflicts which rage in the individual soul, writ large.

That wise old man, St. James, saw that as clear as crystal:—

"From whence come wars and fighting among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members? Ye lust, and have not; ye kill, and desire to have, and cannot obtain; ye fight and war, yet ye have not, because ye ask not. Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts."

That is old-fashioned language, but it is a psychological truth that modern knowledge shouts at us from a thousand bloody battlefields, from every doctor's consulting room, from the modern palaces of pain, our great hospitals and infirmaries, and from every simple shrine where sinners come to lay their burden down and find the only peace.

Wealth — not only money — must either be a stern disciple or it becomes a deadly disease. Moreover, if I believe in these things and believe in them all for everybody, I know beyond all possibility of doubt that I cannot get them for everybody unless I get the something more, which is the love of God.

So long as the majority of men and women are without that something more, and live not in the Father's home where all wealth is a family possession and the sign of the Father's love, life remains a struggle of swine round a trough until man finds the higher wealth that alone can satisfy the raging hunger of his heart.

I am not bound by my Christian creed to give up all I have and follow Christ, but I am bound to recognise and acknowledge in the depths of the inmost me that everything I possess I owe to God and to my fellowmen, and therefore that material things are to be used with reverence which is the only source of true refinement.

Blessed Are the Poor in Spirit

The attainment of that refinement which is based upon gratitude and reverence is the only way to peace and righteousness. Only the poor in spirit who clearly see themselves as they are — beggars standing naked and with empty hands before the God Who made them and the vast family of humanity that keeps them —can hope to see the Kingdom of God.

All those who stand upon their pride, believing that by their own merit and their own power they have and mean to hold their material, earthly possessions, are standing on a rotten lie, and underneath them are the depths of hell. These are strong words, but true.

BISHOP INGLEY, coadjutor of Colorado, recently dedicated three stained glass windows which have been installed in the sanctuary of St. Matthew's, Kenosha, Wisconsin, the Rev. Malcolm J. Van Zandt, rector. They portray our Blessed Lord breaking the Bread of Life and offering it to humanity. The side character windows are representative of humanity accepting and receiving this gift. The artist was Mr. William Glasby of London, and the donor was Dr. N. A. Pennoyer, who gave them as a memorial to Mrs. Pennoyer and his sister, Miss Alice.

Let's Know

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

EASTWARD

THE CUSTOM of praying toward the east is one of the very old customs coming from various religious origin. In early times, before the introduction of electric lights and "great white ways," it had something to do with the rising of the sun, which in those days was an event of no little importance. Like many other habits of general religious acceptance, it was taken over by the Christians and invested with its own Christian significance.

The "Apostolical Constitutions," a very early treatise on Christian customs of worship, directs that the whole congregation "rise up with one consent, and looking to the east, pray to God eastward." St. Clement of Alexandria indicates the prevalence of the custom when he says that "prayers are made looking towards the sunrise in the east." And other ancient writers bear him out.

St. Clement says that "the east is the image of the day of birth—the day of the knowledge of truth has dawned on those immersed in darkness." The early Christians loved to speculate on the inferences to be drawn from the description of our Lord as the "day-spring from on high" and the "light of the world." The Old Testament reference to the "Sun of Righteousness" was considered to be prophetic of the Messiah. It was also understood that our Lord on His cross faced the west, so that Christians turning to the east offered their prayers to Him face to face. Candidates for baptism used to turn from the west, which was the place of darkness, and face the east as the source of light—to symbolize the truth of their spiritual illumination received in the sacrament.

All of this symbolism is back of the turning toward the altar by choir and clergy when the "glorias" (special hymns of praise) are sung in Church or when the creed is recited as a special proclamation of the faith of the Church. For the same reason the priest faces the altar when the elements are consecrated in the Holy Communion. For the altar is traditionally supposed to stand in the east end of the Church. As a matter of fact, due to sundry problems of real estate, it is not always possible to build modern churches east and west, with the altar in the east end. Therefore, irrespective of the actual geography, the altar and sanctuary are spoken of as the ecclesiastical east of the Church building. So the symbolism is retained even tho the Church may be at some variance with the points of the compass.

It is, of course, a matter of secondary moment. Nevertheless attitudes and postures in Church do have a reflex upon the spiritual state of the worshipper. A change of position emphasizes certain parts of the services. To sit stolidly thru prayer, praise, and instruction is not conducive to the best spiritual results with human beings who are made of body, mind and soul. Worship is not merely an intellectual exercise; it is the offering of the whole of us. "And here we offer and present unto Thee, O Lord, ourselves, our souls and bodies." The eastward position is one way of telling the story.

Ten Years Ago

TEN YEARS ago the following news item appeared in THE WITNESS: The Rev. Irving Peake Johnson, rector of Gethsamane Church, Minneapolis, Minnesota, was consecrated Bishop Coadjutor of Colorado on the Feast of the Circumcision, January 1, 1917. The consecration took place in St. John's Cathedral, Denver. The sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Arthur L. Williams, Bishop of Nebraska.

THE MARRIAGE CANON OF 1868

An Indictment

BY THE REV. WALKER GWYNNE

General Secretary Sanctity of Marriage Association

BY FAR the most important matter for consideration by the General Convention, to assemble in Washington in 1928, will be the report of the Joint Commission on Canon 43 as appointed last year. The fundamental question to be settled is that of the revolutionary "Exception and Proviso" concerning the "innocent party," which was introduced into the canon in 1868 for the first time in more than a thousand years of Anglican Church history. Most providentially, a verbatim report of the debates of the House of Deputies was ordered by that body, which shows conclusively the inadequate consideration, the haste, and the almost total absence of scholarship which this vital question received.

This was the first canon on marriage which the American Church adopted as its own. For 261 years she had been under the canon law of the Church of England, which always had, and still has, no canonical allowance for remarriage after divorce for innocent or guilty, and recognizes no possible divorce from the bond, a vinculo. Strange to say, the proviso was looked upon as a very minor matter in the Convention, and received no attention until the sixteenth day of the session.

Only two men of learning made brief objections to the novel proposal. These were Dr. Christopher Wyatt of California, and that robust Evangelical, the venerable Dr. Daniel R. Goodwin of Pennsylvania, who made the most strenuous protest against it, the prophetic voice of a seer who foresaw the present outcome from this seemingly small beginning. Without further consideration the novel and false exception was adopted by both Houses, and so it remains to this day.

Our indictment is based on the following facts: The action was (1) Contrary to the spirit and plain intent of Article X of the Constitution, which requires the joint approval of two successive General Conventions for "alteration" of the Prayer Book, with whose doctrine and discipline this "exception" is in direct conflict; (2) Contrary to the solemn promise and declaration of the Preface to our Prayer Book, that "This Church is far from intending to depart from the Church of England in any essential point of doctrine or discipline" (p. vi); (3) Contrary to the doctrine and discipline, not only of our own Prayer Book but of every other Prayer Book in the Anglican communion; (4) Contrary to the doctrine and discipline of the whole Western Church from the beginning; (5) Contrary also to the doctrine and discipline of the un-divided Church of the first three centuries, to which the English reformers always appealed for the final interpretation of any disputed question in the New Testament as to "the mind of Christ." It was of this "exception" to a moral law of the first magnitude that the learned Old Catholic historian and theologian, Dr. Dollinger, wrote that it goes against language, history, and logic.

To continue to reject such cumulative testimony involves tremendous responsibility. The historical and logical result of the blunder is seen today in the action of our forty-eight legislatures in permitting, besides our single exception of adultery (which is the easiest of all causes to commit, or, as our courts show, to prove), fifty-one other causes; many of them perhaps of even greater gravity, and possessing greater justification, than a sin of passion such as adultery. And the verdict of this American experiment is simply the verdict of all previous history, namely, the eventual destruction of the unit of civilized society, the family.

The story of the adoption of this canon in 1868 by a Convention (at which I was present as a youthful student) is an amazing one. It would be incredible but that the House itself provided the verbatim indictment of its own shame. For in spite of the utter lack of a realization of the importance of the question, of the total absence of critical and historical preparation by the speakers (thirteen clerical and eight lay), and of the refusal to appoint a commission to study and report to the next Convention, or even to refer to any committee of the House other than the crowded and technical Committee on Canons; nevertheless, this radical error was inflicted on the American Church with all its poisonous result to both Church and Nation, after only a brief discussion on the sixteenth and seventeenth days of the session. Out of 208 pages of the whole report less than seven are all that are required to tell this tale.

The story, moreover, is all the more astonishing when it is remembered that within twelve years the whole question had been thoroughly threshed out in England by theologians, scholars, and statesmen, notably by Mr. Gladstone, in relation to the movement in Parliament for a new court for matrimonial causes, set up in 1857, in which the Christian law of marriage was abandoned, though it had been the law of the state for 850 years.

Divorce with remarriage 250 years ago was practically unknown in America, but the census showed there was one divorce to every 17.30 marriages in 1887. In 1924 this had risen to the enormous proportion of one divorce to 6.89 marriages; or, if we leave out the twenty million Roman Catholics among whom (though very questionable cases of nullification are not uncommon) there is only a negligible number of divorces with remarriage, the proportion is as high as one divorce to every 5.50 marriages. The incomplete record for 1925 points to a proportion of even one divorce to every 5 marriages for the non-Roman population. In several of our greatest states in 1924 the record was as high as one to 4.21 and even to a still lower number. Yet the official report for Canada in this same year showed only one to every 121 marriages! At this rate of degradation in the United States it is easy to calculate what it will be in the days of our children and our children's children.

These are some of the stern facts that the Joint Commission must face and weigh, and which the Church in General Convention must act upon, before the storm breaks, or the cancer kills. There are also other matters demanding settlement, as concerning the merciful discipline to be accorded to persons married in ignorance of the law of Christ, or whose marriage is null from the beginning, yet whose only relief is by divorce. But this "exception" with its dread inevitable consequences to the nation is fatal. There are only two alternatives. As a natural state "from the beginning of the creation," and also a "holy estate" restored by Christ, marriage is either (1) a permanent relation, or else (2) it is a mere contract subject to change at will. It cannot be both at once.

Cheerful Confidences

COME ACROSS

YOU are planning your trip to New York. Good! It is one of the greatest cities of the world. You know what plays you want to see, and what streets and what buildings. You know the hotel which you prefer, and you have an idea that you may drop in at the Five-and-Ten-Cent Store, or perhaps some where else, and do a little shopping. Excellent. And you are to spend Sunday in New York. And of course you will want to attend the afternoon services at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine.

But what about Sunday morning? Of course there are many churches in New York, some of them famous. And if you go you will find them filled with fellow travellers, for New York has a constant hotel population of several hundred thousand people, and the near-by churches get their quota on Sunday morning.

But may I whisper a word to the wise. New York is not bounded by Twenty-third Street on the south, and Central Park on the north, with Fifth Avenue and adjacent territory as the central domain. Honest, it isn't. There are some things worth seeing and knowing about elsewhere.

A traveller who discovers something pleasant likes to tell his friends about it, and I am seriously asking you to consider a trip to Brooklyn on Sunday morning. You have heard that Brooklyn lies across East River, and that the famous Brooklyn Bridge connects the two cities. There possibly your information ends.

But will you believe me when I tell you that directly across the East River, from the southern tip of Manhattan Island lies a little strip of the city that is unique in all Greater New York. It is known as Brooklyn Heights. It is about ten blocks long and five blocks wide, and lies along the water front. Here you may see a section of New York that gives one a notion of the city as it was. It is old-fashioned and quaint. Its streets are quiet and interesting. In this section lies the church made famous by Henry Ward Beecher. Here are the homes of the early settlers. Here is the place that is like a bit of old London in a new world. As one New Yorker said, "Brooklyn Heights has the gentle charm of Baltimore, the spruce fastidiousness of Philadelphia, the crisp flavor of Boston and the settled atmosphere of London."

From Brooklyn Heights you may see a panorama of Manhattan Island, and of the harbor, that is unparalled in the world for grandeur. Even as from Murren in the Alps you may see Nature's gigantic works, so from Brooklyn you may see man's mountainous creations. When in New York you fail to see this great sight. Even from New York's high buildings you fail to get this view. But the skyline of New York, the harbor with its vessels, and the great bridges are all visible from Brooklyn. It is worth the trip.

So on Sunday morning take a downtown subway, and in a few minutes you will go under the East River and arrive at Borough Hall, Brooklyn. The express trains from the Grand Central Station make the trip in fifteen minutes.

Then to Church at 11 A. M. After alighting at Borough Hall you go to church. Go to Holy Trinity, about a minute's walk. See this massive old church. Hear Dr. Melish, a brilliant speaker and a charming man. Tell him I sent you.

Or go to St. Ann's, a block or two from Borough Hall. You will enjoy the new rector, Dr. Dorrance.

Or come to Grace Church, about five minutes' walk. Come along Remsen Street to the Hotel Bossert, and Grace Church is half a block to the south. I shall be glad to greet you there.

Or you may easily find many other attractive Episcopal Churches near at hand.

Why go with the crowd when you

Do You Know What Your Children Read?

Questionnaire Discloses That Students In Southern High School Are Poorly Informed

GIRLS LIKE SCANDAL

There is human interest in the following story even if it is not religious news. Someday we must prepare a set of questions for a Church group . . . say for a picked group of informed Church people such as attend a Church Summer Conference. It is quite possible that we would be able to draw the conclusion from the answer that the Church papers should be more generally read. Anyway here is the story:

The importance of reading the newspapers was proved conclusively in an information test conducted in Tennessee. That the present-day newspaper is indispensable to assure a well-rounded and complete education that will enable a young man or woman to cope properly with the problems of life and that a course in newspaper reading, if added to the curriculum of the schools today, would produce a better informed and more efficient group of young people, is demonstrated by the results of the test held at the Knoxville High School. The outstanding features of the test show that:

Out of a questionnaire of twenty-five simple, everyday questions, the answers of which are immediately known to any consistent reader of the newspapers, not a perfect list of answers was received.

Of the 1,407 students who turned in answers to the questionnaires, at least 97 per cent read crime news and the more sensational stories.

At least 50 per cent of the students were unable to tell the location of the District of Columbia. Among answers to that question were: "A small portion of land between Delaware and West Virginia"—"Off coast of West Virginia"—"Northwest part of United States" — "Between Maryland and New Jersey"—"A part of Canada."

The test shows that girls are prone to read the scandal stories. This was evidenced in replies received as to the identity of Mary Roberts Rinehart. Dozens of students, especially girls, confused the author with Mrs. Alice Rhinelander in the sensational Rhinelander divorce case.

The sophomore class rolled up an average of approximately 70 per cent, making the highest average of all of the four one-year groups. The seniors' answers ran only about 50 per cent correct.

The test was conducted by the Knoxville Sentinel, daily newspaper, and among the questions and some of the replies, were:

"Who is Billy Mitchell?" — "Labor leader," "football star," "aviator who flew to north pole," "baseball player."

"Who wrote the 'Star-Spangled Banner?'"—"Scott Frances," "Keys," "Keith," "Sir Walter Scott," "Edward Scott." Two said "Poe."

"What is an electoral college?"—"A college where electricity is taught," "Take what you want," "Take all different kinds of work," "It's a college where you elect what you take." The question baffled at least 95 per cent of the students in the senior group. Scores declined to answer that question.

"Where is the Golden Gate?"—"Heaven," "Florida," Statue of Liberty," "Graystone National Park," "Colorado River," "In New York City," "In Washington."

"What is the Fourth Estate'?"—"Peasants," "An estate given a fourth heir," "The poorer class," "The lower class," "Poorest class of people in Europe," "Law."

"Who is Miriam Ferguson?"—"Governor of Kansas," "Governor of Oklahoma," "Singer recently admitted to grand opera," "Football player," "Baseball player," "Author," 'Writer," "Movie star," "A Senator," "Husband of Governor of Texas," "Author of some story."

"Who is vice president to President Coolidge?"—"Davis," "Secretary of Treasury," "Hughes," "None."

"Who was Floyd Collins?"—"Character in music," "Murderer," "Mine explorer," "Cave man."

"What member of royalty is noted for his inability to ride his horse?"—"Roosevelt," "Paul Revere," "Gen. Spence." Five said "Prince of Wales."

"Who is Henry L. Mencken?"—"Prominent political figure," "Senator," "A German excavating in S. A.," "Steel magnate."

"Who is Mary Roberts Rinehart?"—"Opera singer," "A woman getting a divorce," "On trial with husband." Nine said "Noted actress."

"Who wrote 'Main Street'?"—"Gerald Chapman," "O'Henry," "A. S. M. Hutchinson," "Churchill," "Mary Roberts Rinehart." Another says "I saw the picture but don't know who wrote it."

"What is a county court?"—"Court for country people," "The court that handles marriage licenses."

Bishop Paddock, former Bishop of Eastern Oregon, is still too ill to take up work after his breakdown of five years ago. He is making such progress toward full recovery that he hopes to be able to engage in active work in another year, and to that end is spending this winter in India.

A Reorganization At St. Stephen's College

Plan To So Equip the College That Twice as Many Students May Be Enrolled

SEEK FUNDS

A public statement has been issued by the Trustees of St. Stephen's College announcing certain changes in the policy of the institution. First, from now on students will be selected with no denominational or racial preferences, but primarily on the ground of intellectual ability and character. Heretofore Episcopalians have been given preference. Second, only those students will be retained in the junior and senior years who have shown in the first two years definite intellectual ability and enthusiasm for learning. Third, to enlarge its facilities and endowment so that it may accept 250 students. The present enrollment is about half that number.

Accompanying the statement is a letter signed by a committee of the trustees, Mr. Haley Fiske, Mrs. Edward F. Albee and the Rev. Bernard I. Bell, president of the college, which contains the following paragraph: "We would call your attention to the fact that in making these changes, the college is in no sense secularizing itself. It will still remain, as nearly in its organization and probably much more in its religious connection, a Church college than any of the other Church colleges, except the University of the South and possibly Kenyon. The college has no desire to go back upon its belief that religion and education go together and no desire to repudiate its connection with the Episcopal Church. By this new organization the Church is able to make a much larger contribution to education than has hitherto been the case; and that is the purpose of the reorganization."

The Rev. H. P. J. Selinger, rector of Grace Church, Chadron, Nebraska, is having a series of Dramatic evenings on the Sundays of January and February. Among the plays to be discussed are Ibsen's "The Master Builder" and "The Enemy of the People"; Channing Pollock's "The Fool"; Bernard Shaw's "Joan"; Maeterlinck's, "St. Anthony"; Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln."

Dean Inge Says That Conversion Is Slow

The Red Priest of Delabole Gets Himself in Bad With English Churchmen

DEATH OF DR. LOWNDES

By Rev. A. Manby Lloyd

"I consider it a slanderous and libelous document."

This is the reply of the Bishop of Truro to a memorial, signed by 1,929 churchmen of his diocese and 116 from the Devon border, drawing attention to the teaching of the Rev. J. C. Bucknall, curate-in-charge of St. John's, Delabole (Cornwall), known as the "Red Priest of Delabole."

The Bishop adds: "The petition is full of misrepresentation, and contains statements that are demonstrably false. I am forwarding a copy to Mr. Bucknall in order that he may consider whether or not he will take legal action in the matter."

Mr. Bucknall's political views and his denunciation of the Union Jack threw his parish into a ferment, and some parishioners set up a rival church of their own in a local hall.

Members of the Glass Sellers' Company and of the Painter-Stainers' Company attended service at St. James' Church, Garlick-hill, last Sunday, when Dean Inge preached. Taking as his text the words, "Behold, the Kingdom of God does not come with observation, but the Kingdom of God is within you," he said that in the inner life of individuals the Kingdom of God came quietly. It was too genuine to be rabid, too deep to be noisy, too natural to be startling. In saying that he knew he ran counter to a considerable body of Christian experience in which conversion was sudden, palpable, and startling. It was important to know whether those experiences were normal or not. Certainly among his own family and friends he had never met a case even remotely resembling sudden conversion. That was different from John Wesley's experience, and a great deal seemed to depend upon what people were led to expect.

We can thank God that Christmas 1926, will not find us sitting by empty grates, for the miners are rushing back to work to save their jobs. It is reckoned that 20 per cent will not be taken back and will be thrown on the dole. In the old days we told ghost stories over the glowing embers; today too many ghosts already stalk the land—the ghosts of revolution, Bolshevism, class-war, etc. Perhaps they are only white sheets over broom-sticks; a pumpkin with a lighted candle inside. Let us get back to the Faith of our Fathers, for bogeys could not frighten them.

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea
With a glory in His bosom that transfigures you and me;
As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free!
While God is marching on.

Under that banner your English Church correspondent wishes all his patient readers a most Happy New Year.

Churches Throughout the Country Were Crowded with Worshippers at Christmas Services

THE CRUSADE

By Rev. William B. Spofford

Here is a message to you from the Presiding Bishop of the Church, the Rt. Rev. J. Gardner Murray: "On Jan. 9th the Bishops' Crusade begins. Three hundred bishops, priests, laymen and women of the Church are to carry to the people throughout the land, a call to rededication to Christ and renewal of allegiance to His Cause.

The Crusade is a spiritual movement. It unites the whole Church in pursuit of a single aim: that our own people may put Christ first in their lives and come to 'know the love of Christ which passeth all knowledge,' and 'be filled with all the fullness of God.'

"The General convention conceived and authorized the Crusade; the National Commission on Evangelism planned it; diocesan commissions have organized it locally; Crusaders are going forth to carry its message; results now depend upon all the people of the Church.

"The Crusade will succeed if the people will prayerfully seek, not only that it may do something for them, but that through them 'the work of God should be made manifest' to others.

"May the whole Church rally to the

New York papers are ballyhooing right now about Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick's four million dollar church to be built on Riverside Drive, the New York thoroughfare for one room elevator apartments that house the successful folks of the city at $250 a month up. The writers are comparing it to the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. One notable difference to the discerning; one is Dr. Fosdick's Church, the other is the Cathedral of St. John the Divine.

This by the Rt. Rev. William T. Manning, Bishop of New York, from the pulpit of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on Christmas:

"A power greater than any other that this earth has known came into the world at Christmas; but why has it not changed the world more completely than it has?" he said. "That new power which came into this world at Christmas did completely change the men and women of the New Testament. It changed absolutely the lives of St. Peter and St. John and the others. It made an almost incredible change in the life of St. Stephen, whose feast we are keeping today. Read that short account of Stephen's life and death in the Acts of the Apostles and you will see how this new power of the Christian Gospel had transformed him. Why is it that this power which Christmas brought into the world, which seems to lay so little hold on the lives of many of us, was able to work that amazing change in the life of St. Stephen?

"I will give you two reasons for this: The first reason is that St. Stephen really believed in our Lord Jesus Christ. If all of us who profess to believe in Christ did really believe in Him, as Stephen did, our faith would change the world. Think what the effect would be in New York tomorrow if all the people in this city who call themselves Christians were to show the same faith in Christ that we see in St. Stephen!

"Second, St. Stephen's faith was not merely in the teachings of Christ nor in the abstract principles and ideals of Christ. It was something far more wonderful and far more simple which made that marvelous change that we see in him. St. Stephen believed in Christ Himself. He believed in the Christ of whom Christmas tells us; Christ who has power to bless and save and uphold because He reigns on the throne of God.

"It was this faith which changed and glorified Stephen's life and gave him a strength which nothing could overcome. Dear friends, let us never think that we shall help the world or ourselves by bringing the Gospel down to merely human levels. When we do that we lose the very life and power out of it. The very meaning of the Gospel is that it was God Himself who came to Bethlehem to seek and save us."

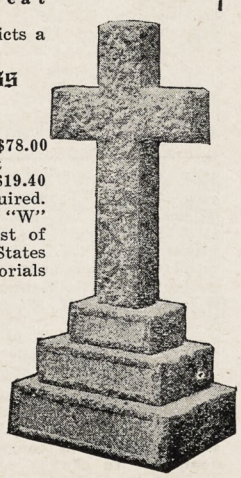
Times change. This item is printed as it was received at this office:



"When the Y. P. S. L. of the Church of the Redeemer was told by Mrs. C. E. Peters, founder of the Peter's Mission, Houston, Texas, that one of the principles she is trying to inculcate in the girls of the Mission is modesty, the boys in the League sat up and took notice. Mrs Peters continued, saying that it was understood in the Mission that a girl's knees should never be shown. Also that if they should be in evidence some other girl was to tell her or quietly to cover them for her. 'I feel,' said Mrs. Peters, 'that if I can teach my girls to be modest that I will have taught them a lesson that will mean more to them in life than almost any other virtue.' Whereupon the boys applauded."

The building of the Fairwold Industrial School for delinquent Negro girls was destroyed by fire on the morning of December 20th. They will remain there until provision can be made for them.

Fairwold was established and is supported largely through the activities of the State Federation of Negro Women's Clubs. It serves in a public capacity, taking girls committed by the courts. No state appropriation has ever been made for its

We have received about fifty-seven reports of Christmas services from all over the country. Here they are: "St. (fill in the name of your church), beautifully decorated with evergreen, was filled with worshippers on Christmas at the eleven o'clock service (Catholic parishes substitute the world 'mass' for 'service'). The music was beautifully rendered by a choir of —— voices; the rector preached an inspiring Christmas sermon, and the offering, for parish support, was the largest in the history of the parish."

Bishop Darst, head of the Bishops' Crusade, received an anonymous postal card the other day on which was written, "You are not fooling anybody, the object is $ $ $ $." The Bishop's comment is as follows: "One anonymous postal card is a thing of little importance, but it does emphasize the necessity of getting to all the people of the Church the truth that the Bishops' Crusade is a spiritual movement, an effort for the rededication of Church people to Christ and His service. If the gentleman (but why pick on the man, Bishop) who lacked the courage to sign his name to his communication aids the National Commission in impressing upon clergy and people everywhere that this is the vital theme to be stressed, he will merit the hearty

Good idea paragraph. Or it might be if someone would try it. It comes from the Rev. Thomas R. Alleeson, rector of St. Andrew's, Tacoma, Washington:

"Let some reliable publishing house print on separate leaflets the Order of Morning and Evening Prayer with a dozen or so carefully selected psalms, also the Order of the Holy Communion. In a ministry of eighteen years spent entirely in Western work I am convinced that the Prayer Book, as it is commonly used, is a hindrance in our work. The stranger usually gives up after a first attempt, and while some interested churchman or woman may assist in finding places they do not usually do so; and I doubt if that is the best way to solve the problem. Then there is the question of expense. The prayer books in the pews soon get into a state of disrepair and a missing leaf destroys the value of the book for the stranger and how many prayer books in the pews have missing leaves! Furthermore, it would be very much better for the communicants of the church to own and bring to church their own prayer books, and they might be encouraged to do this if the parish did not provide books. Then a supply of such leaflets might be kept on hand for use of strangers. Inasmuch as the work of revising these offices has been completed this would seem to be an opportune time to issue such leaflets. Why should a small parish or mission go to the expense of furnishing its church with prayer books which contain all the offices of worship, sacraments, rites, ordination services and a complete psalter when rarely more than two or three of these are used? When the stranger enters the church let us give him a leaflet with the service printed thereon—not a complicated book of various offices—and a hymnal with music score, then there will be some hope of his trying it again."

The Pawling School of Pawling, N. Y., for boys, which was founded in 1907 by Dr. Frederick L. Gamage, has recently completed a new chapel to be known as the Depew Memorial Chapel. The building was designed by Alfred Hopkins, architect. The interior furnishings are from the studios of Irving & Casson-A. H. Davenport Co., of New York. These are of dark oak with polychrome ornaments. The rood beam is particularly interesting with its beautiful figures. The sanctuary walls are hung in red velvet, giving to this section a restful and harmonious setting.

The Rev. W. S. Slack, rector at Alexandria, La., had a visitor last Sunday. After the service the stranger followed him back into the church to the chancel, his overcoat over his arm, and his cap stuck tightly on his head.

"I'm a stranger here and have no claim on you except that I am a member of this Church. I am on my way to Arizona and need help."

"You are an Episcopalian," asked Mr. Slack.

"Yes, I am a member of this Church."

"And you walk all the way down the central aisle with your hat on your head. You certainly were not properly trained."

"Oh! I forgot where I was for a moment. I haven't been in Church much of late."

"No, I thought not. Where are you from?"

"Louisville," replied the stranger, as he took from his pocket a note book containing names. But being without his glasses he could not read them.

"What church did you attend in Louisville?" asked Mr. Slack.

This was a poser. For a moment the stranger scratched his head, and then with inspiration written on his face came the answer; "I have not been going much of late, but I used to go to The First Church."

"Oh, no you didn't. There is no First Church, Episcopal, in Louisville, or in any other place in the world. I have nothing for you."

And out he walked, the sole mem-

Many notables have visited the Chapel of St. John the Divine at the University of Illinois, reports the chaplain, the Rev. John Mitchell Page. Early in the college year came the Lord Bishop of London, who filled the entire university with the spirit of Christ. A few days later the Rev. Jerry Wallace, of Springfield, Illinois, was the preacher, and before October was over Bishop White made his annual visitation. During November Bishops Anderson and Griswold of Chicago preached in the chapel, the former also meeting with a large number of students for a conference on religion. All of the visitors have been much impressed with the beauty of the new chapel, being built, but still far from completed.

The little French church of St. Sauveur, Philadelphia, for many years a gathering place for the French speaking people of Philadelphia, is to be torn down to make room for a modern office building. The church was founded by the Rev. Charles F. B. Miel, who served his novitiate in the Jesuit order of the Roman Church and later took Anglican orders. For many years the church had a very large membership, but the number of communicants dwindled in recent years due to changing conditions in the neighborhood.

The Revs. William H. Dunphy, Arthur F. Gibson and William R. McKean were ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Garland in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Rosemont, Pa., on December 21st. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Father Burton, superior of the Society of St. John the Evangelist (Cowley Fathers), while the rector of the parish, the Rev. Charles Townsend assisted the Bishop with the service. Mr. Dunphy is curate at the Good Shepherd; Mr. Gibson is assistant at St. Simeon's, Philadelphia, and was presented by the rector, the Rev. George H. Toop; and Mr. McKean, presented by the Rev. Frederick D. Ward, is an assistant at Old Christ Church, Philadelphia.

can come to beautiful churches where you will receive an individual welcome. Perhaps some one from your home town will be there.

After church take dinner at the Bossert, or the Hotel Margaret, or the Standish Arms, and go to the roof of these hotels, and see New York as you have never seen it before. Then stroll about the streets. You can reach the Brooklyn Bridge, and in a few minutes walk across to the City Hall, where a subway will take you to your hotel, or to the Cathedral, where you may want to attend the afternoon service.

Welcome to Brooklyn in the name of its churches.

THE BOY AND HIS CHURCH

The Appeal of the Ministry

BY BISHOP SLATTERY

PEOPLE are apt to say that the ministry has not its former prestige. By this is meant that no cast-iron public opinion forces a man to go to Church. There was a time, in Spain for example, if a man did not go to Church once in so often, thumb-screws were applied, his joints were pulled from their sockets, he was pierced, beaten, scalded, burned. Even in our Puritan New England the man who absented himself from the meeting house for several Sundays had a bitter time of it. Of course, the clergy in such conditions were, in a sense, masters of the situation. They could dictate foolishly, perhaps even basely, and people were obliged to listen. Now it is all changed. Men come to Church or not, as they are inwardly moved to do so. The prestige of that old time is gone.

And who is not glad that it is gone? The ministry of today cannot be inefficient and still look for followers. The ministry of today is the most exacting of vocations. It demands of a man that he be his best in every direction—in training of mind, in soundness of body, in cleanness of character. We who are in the ministry must expect to fail just in so far as we are not our best. Every year the man who is not willing to submit to long and strenuous education, who is not willing to cultivate his physical strength, who is not willing to refine and ennoble his character, is of less and less use in the ministry. He may float from parish to parish, he may even be a bishop; but his use to himself or to the world must be trifling. I do not for a moment wish to intimate that a man must be a Solomon, Hercules, and Galahad all in one; no superhuman brilliance or strength is demanded. But a man must strive most tremendously to be his best, or go to the wall, a criminal failure.

EXACTING

You will say at once: "This is strange encouragement to give in urging men to come into the ministry. You begin by telling its exactions." Yes, I do. First, because I am sure that I speak the truth. And, secondly, because I think our young men of today have enough fibre and fire to be undismayed before such a prospect. I do not invite you to a life that is easy; I do not invite you to a haphazard sort of life, intellectually, morally, spiritually, physically—in the expectation that, by hook or by crook, you will get on in this supposedly easy vocation called the ministry. This is not the age of the eighteenth century English parson; it is the age when to get on at all in the ministry you must live with all your might. Every year you will feel the demand more bewildering, more enticing. Every atom of your nature will be called upon to yield its highest excellence. The Ministry, in a word, calls on you to be your strongest, wisest, best. That to my mind, is grave cause for desiring a place in its ranks. It calls for everything you have—and everything at its best.

BISHOP SLATTERY

SERVE ALL

"But," you question, "does the ministry of today do any especial good in the world?" I shall pass over certain greatest benefits which the ministry holds in trust for all ages, not because I esteem them lightly but because you are quite familiar with them. By such greatest benefits I mean the preaching of the Gospel of Christ, the administration of the Sacraments, the strengthening of feeble wills, the formation of sturdy Christlike characters in the lives of the young. What I wish to do is to point out the peculiar uses which the ministry has for our own day.

In the first place, the minister belongs to every class. Being a member of every class, he has the opportunity to keep the classes of society together, in mutual understanding and love.

It takes no large gift of insight to tell that the most serious menace to the stability of modern civilization is the bitterness and suspicion that lie between class and class. The rich distrust the poor, and the poor envy the rich and wonder how they got their money. The learned despise the ignorant, and the ignorant are afraid of the wiles of the learned. The governing forces first cajole and then hoodwink the people; and the mob cries out for anarchy rather than submit to what it believes to be despotism. One does not need to say that there is no cause for distrust; yet one may rightly be alarmed when some demagogue tries to kindle the flames of discontent. He is the most dangerous man in the nation who, appealing to bitterness and prejudice, attempts to array class against class. No true reform can be won by invective, calumny, fury.

BOND BETWEEN CLASSES

Now the minister of Jesus Christ is of necessity a bond between classes in the community. He is a servant of that Christ who was at one time so poor that He had not where to lay His head. Still, the power and riches of the universe were at His command. When a minister of Christ says that he cares just as much for the ignorant parishioner as for the learned, as much for the poor as for the rich, he is not schooling himself to say it. It is part of his very life to feel it, as well as to say it. These people are all in some way his. Other persons may divide people into classes and draw distinctions. He cannot. He not only does not wish to do so; it is impossible for him. For remember whose minister he is—not man's, not the world's—but Christ's. How did Christ treat men?—that is his measure. A man is a man, no more, no less. If you fall to serving Christ in earnest, the outer distinctions drop away with startling rapidity. Perhaps the man to whom your heart goes out with truest affection has a million dollars, perhaps he has nothing but his daily wage. You don't think about that. It's the man you think about—what he is and is to be.

PEOPLE COUNT

If sometime, in loneliness or distress, people think the particular minister they happen to know best is more interested in one class of men than in another, I wish they might know what experience teaches me to be an assured fact; namely, that in a round of afternoon calls, for example, the minister has as keen pleasure in meeting his friends in one place as another; the outward trappings make singularly little difference. God's sunshine and the friendly heart of a man are the same in the king's palace and in the most remote cottage of the little village.

I hate to talk of classes. I wish the word and the idea could be abolished. Both are foreign to Christianity and to a free republic. But it is something that there is one vocation, the Christian ministry, pledged by the life of the Galilean King—at once the poorest and the richest of mankind—to break down all artificial barriers and to look at men and to value men for what they really are in themselves. Men pledged to war against such distinctions in any and every direction, can, if they will be true, do vast service in this age of envy and contempt.

TEACHING OFFICE

Let me now pass to a second reason why the ministry has peculiar use today. It has the opportunity to answer questions, in a convincing way, upon vital subjects. One high function of the ministry is to teach. You sometimes hear this is not an age of faith. People do not listen so calmly as once they listened to the voice of authority. They insist on knowing why, and how, and wherefore. The questions they ask are frightfully difficult. The weakling in the ministry cries out that it is all too bad; these incredulous people are, to his thinking, an insufferable nuisance—O, that the age of so-called faith would return! I suppose no vigorous minister would wish to have that age of unquestioning faith (if it ever existed) back again. For it is not the highest sort of faith. A real faith is so serious that it puts itself to infinite trouble to know what it undertakes to believe. Sometimes this confidence comes as naturally and easily as it seems to have come to St. John; sometimes it comes with as hot a conflict as it came to St. Paul. In any case it is no cause for complaint or regret that our age throws out question after question, asking persistently why it is that we dare to put our faith in so sublime a master as Christ.

BE A STUDENT

The Christian minister of today, to be efficient, must, however modestly, be a student. I have no patience with the man who says that we need a ministry of trained intelligence in Massachusetts or New York, but a ministry of little or no education will do for the village in Idaho or Montana. I feel sure that the schoolmistress who sits in the last pew of some mission school in Idaho can ask as keen and perplexing questions as any parishioner of Trinity Church, Boston, or Grace Church, New York; and I am surer still that it is much more important for her to get a sane and satisfactory answer from her minister. The minister is not expected to know more than his parishioner about business, or medicine, or geology, or law, or engineering—he ought to be excelled in all these departments by many in his congregation. But he ought to know more than they know of the present stage of knowledge about the Bible and about evidences for the truth of Christianity; and he ought to know the modern way of meeting difficult questions. I may be wrong, but I cannot see how a man can meet these questions satisfactorily till he has had the intellectual contact and training of a great university or college. A man of rare power may get the training some other way, but most of us need the drill and the intellectual incentive which comes from facing pitiless critics who make us fight for our faith, and so fortify us with impregnable conviction—not with a few glib shibboleths, which are apt to come tumbling down about our ears the very day we try to build them into a real and solid faith.

The minister need not be what we technically call a scholar. Indeed, he rarely can become a scholar. But he must know the current though of his day. He must read. He must know. Then his faith will be a bulwark for those who count upon his integrity and honesty. People will know that to the authority which he has from the Church he adds a reasonable conviction. If someone has told them a startling modern theory, and the news makes them pale and trembling, it is wonderful relief to find that the minister knows all about it, is able to unwrap the truth from the falsehood, and is able to give that truth its place in the noble house of unshaken faith.

It is one of the glories of the ministry today that it dares to obey the old command, and, with all the modern implements and weapons, stands ready to give a reason for the faith which is in it, and which it has received from the past. Is it not then a high function for any class of men in the community to aim at least to be an authority on the vital facts of life and eternity—just as the physician aims to be an authority on the vital laws of health—and to try to bring assurance and conviction to men, whether they find faith easy or difficult? Tell me, does not the world very much need men who will make themselves sure of these supreme realities, and who will interpret them in the language of this generation?

FIELD FOR HEROISM

I have only one other reason to give why the ministry has peculiar

Our Cover

The photograph on the cover this week is of a shrine in the St. Vincent's Home for Boys in Brooklyn, New York. The wrought iron lectern is designed after the old Spanish motif, incorporating new and practical ideas, such as a small clock at the top of the book rest and a small wrought iron holder for books and notices. The lantern is of iron and mica. Lectern and railing is of wrought iron, finished in half polished steel, which with the twisted brass top rail, gives both a pleasing and artistic effect. The work was done by Mr. B. J. Hasselman, a New York artist, who has devoted his life to a study of this class of work.

use today. That is because it offers a field for heroism. The crusades are over. Perhaps, among civilized nations, wars are over; certainly war is no longer the only way to settle a dispute. True, in order to get rich quickly, men brave the Arctic cold and the tropic heat; but some way the sane old world refuses to attach the name of heroism to such selfish hazard. Heroism, by its nature, must be unselfish, as well as adventurous. Now, strange to say, the ministry which often seems tame, offers today the one pre-eminent crusade of the hour. It sounds just as ringing an appeal as ever Peter the Hermit made—and it is a thousand times more rational. It cries: "Young and strong men, would you do hard things, great things? Then off, to the corners of the earth, and tell men of Christ! The climate is dangerous, the loneliness is unspeakable, the distance from home will seem unbearable, the obstacles to success are almost insuperable. You must learn a language of amazing intricacy, you must learn to think as if you were of another race of men, your whole life must be turned upside down. It is heroism to the last degree—it is hard, hard, very hard! But the battle-cry is 'The world for Christ'—will you enlist?" The men who say "Yes" to such an invitation must be of finer stuff than the anxious people who trudge through bitter cold to get the gold of Alaska. They must even be of finer stuff than the best soldiers who go off to fight their country's war. No ancient crusade had ever had half the splendor of this modern appeal. And it is rational, practical, sensible, real.

EQUIPMENT NEEDED

The men who are going, one by one, to India and China and Japan have better minds, stronger bodies, whiter souls than most of the best of us at home—and they are not fanatics. Their eyes shine with the clear-seen purpose. They are building so carefully, so strongly, that empires yet unborn shall bless their work, though these empires may never know their names. You should read of their schools, their colleges, their orphanages, their hospitals, their churches. You should read of their patience as they wait for prejudice to turn to trust, and trust at last, to love. We say — through smiles, through tears, our hearts swelling with pride—"It seems as if it were going to be dawn in a little while." They shout, "The day has come — the Kingdom of Christ is to be everywhere—every heart shall own him!"

I am only a prosaic parson in a pleasant Massachusetts city, but I can tell you that my heart beats fast when I think that the most heroic heroes of this generation are my brothers in the Christian ministry who have sought out the hardest places in the world, to give all they have, without count of cost, to bring in the beautiful Kingdom of Christ. Other vocations can boast their heroes, too; but, I make bold to say, no other can show so many who by a fixed purpose make a business of heroism—though, with the perfection of devotion, they do not know it.

FOR THE BEST ONLY

So it is that I have no apologies to make for the ministry. The Church is not begging people to come into the ministry, because, as people sometimes suppose, anybody will do. Anybody will not do. The Church wants only such men—not geniuses, mark you—as are willing to be their best. Any straight, intelligent man who honestly will be his best, and will submit to long scholastic training, will find that this particular time has use for him. He may help the world by breaking down class-spirit; he may help the perplexed by giving them a reasonable faith; he may help himself by giving his life to a complete heroism.

The ministry was never so attractive as it is today. May God keep out of it those who think that it is easy—for they will fail. May God bring into it those who know that it is hard—for they will be the happiest of mortals, and they will help the world to be glad, in the light of Jesus Christ.

THE MILWAUKEE CONFERENCE

The Resourses of Jesus

BY WILFORD O. CROSS

THREE thousand undergraduates, representing the religious groups of two hundred colleges, met in conference the week after Christmas in Milwaukee. Giving up the gaieties of vacation time, they came from the farthest corners of the nation; on one hand could be heard the careful intonation of Harvard, on the other the twang and burr of Texas. Registration was reminiscent of a football game; the auditorium steps were crowded with fur-clad coeds and blue-coated collegians. The streets were teeming rivers of youth.

But these people had not come for a football frolic. They had come to talk. Furthermore, they had come to talk about a man who had died very shamefully two thousand years ago. They were to discuss, "The resources of Jesus for life today."

SPEAKERS

First among those who were to help them thresh out the relationship between Our Lord's religion and life, was the Rev. G. A. Studdert-Kennedy. He was, in a very literal sense, the heart and soul, and mind, of the conference. His humor, his wisdom, his faith, drew young men to his feet as though to an oracle. Studdert-Kennedy is surprisingly abreast of our chaotic intellectual world, for he has read the texts and knows the academic shop-patter of our day, and yet teaches, very straightforwardly, the substance of our ancient faith.

By the way, the newspapers grossly misrepresented Mr. Studdert-Kennedy. He did not, as was stated, defend capitalism, but he did say that the Church stood neither on the side of the proletariat or the capitalist, but is the Church of both.

Among other speakers was the Rev. Dr. Niebuhr, of the late Detroit Labor melee, who insisted that before we can have genuine Christianity, nationalism and economic imperialism must be overthrown. And also Mr. Gilky, of Hyde Park Baptist, Chicago, who said, in substance, that evaluating religion as a social force was putting the cart before the horse, since religion is not a means but an end in itself.

Mr. Lew, Dean of Shanghai University, China, tells us, with the habitual Chinese emphasis on the ethic, that, "The world had failed to accept Jesus because of the failure of Christians to live up to his teachings. Christianity is talkative, not active."

Mr. Mordecai Johnson, of Howard University, thundered against economic-imperialism. He suggested, what, I take it, the Federal Council of Churches is already lobbying for, the seizure of the helm of government by Christian statesmen.

Mr. Kirby Page, of New York, told us America is drifting into war. He pointed as evidence to our increasing economic dominance of markets, manufacturers, and exchange; to the hatred abroad, particularly in France, Mexico, and Japan; to the rapid gain of militarism at home by way of additional armaments, R. O. T. C., and citizen's camps preparations. "All but the blind," he said, "may read the sign of the times." Mr. Page seemed to have two remedies: first, getting public opinion to do away with militarism; but later he said, "The causes of war are economic, the profit motivated system of capitalism must go!"

The Discussion Groups

To anyone who accepts the psychology of that very valuable little book, Follett's Creative Experience, discussion becomes at once the critical feature of the conference method of education. Professional platform spell-binders cease to matter. Half-baked resolutions, put through by forum machinery, can be disregarded. The important thing is that each conferee should meet face to face with his fellows and learn from them and contribute for them, and that the group, as a whole, by the integration of the individual thought and experience of its members, may rise above bias and prejudice to well-founded opinions, based on collective experience.

And yet, as the Milwaukee Conference demonstrated, keeping a score of half-trained and very zealous youngsters hammering away until they reach bedrock on a problem is a difficult art. Many groups at Milwaukee were disastrous failures. A lot of them discussed every topic save the one these fellows had paid good carfare to talk about. One discussion leader was so dishonest as to spend time selling a book he had written. Other groups ceased to discuss and futilely argued.

Over against these stupid failures, a group led by Mr. McClusky, of the University of Michigan, stood out, and, under his wise leadership, its members learned to function in creative discussion. It was encouraging to see these young chaps, free from embarrassment and anger, and yet with fervor and enthusiasm, putting their intellectual cards on a common table.

The Students

Many were underclassmen, many were foreign students, a great number were graduates, but few at the Conference were typical collegians. And the typical collegians who were there said very little. Most of these were officers in campus societies, holding jobs which they treated as activities; they were glib talkers, at ease on their feet, knowing well the facile lingo of Y. M. C. A. religion, but in deep water they showed their weak side at once, for they were quite unconversant with philosophy, or history, or science, or psychology, or New Testament criticism. The campus intellectuals were not present.

Generalizing about what three thousand students believe is a dangerous practice; it is much easier to attempt a rough classification. First, there were those who were rather keen on social readjustment, but who tended to be agnostic in regard to God. It was one of these who called Him "That silly old figment whom we imagine because we must have a boss!" Then there is the traditionalist, not a deep thinker, usually, who says in a vague, troubled manner, "There must be something back of everything, some power greater than ourselves." And there is the neo-pantheist, a beginner in science, generally, who says, "God is the unity of nature's laws." And, finally, there is the mystic. And there are two kinds of mystics; first, there is the emotional kind, the Protestant, converted suddenly on his road to Damascus, usually the roadbed of some sawdust trail; there is the contemplative mystic, to whom God has become, as Studdert-Kennedy puts it, "The beloved to the lover."

Rev. G. A. Studdert-Kennedy
Tells 'Em at Milwaukee

Student Ideas of Jesus

For two thousand years, Christology has been a ringing battlefield, where many an Arius has arisen only to fall. These collegians entered the field very innocently. They lacked any acquaintance with the history of theology. To most of them, Jesus was either a prophet, or a very good man, or a Messiah, striving by fighting evil with good, to make the reign of benign justice implicit on earth.

Most of these collegians were very ready to accept Our Lord as the Lord of their lives, but they did not know just why; to some, his personality appealed, to others, the tone of his message carried conviction, and still others saw behind his words a deep, mystical experience, which they believed to be valid.

Economic Opinions

In a world that lives by turning stones into bread, one is surprised to find so many who are ignorant of the processes. In an age troubled with bitter social welfare, I am amazed to discover in youth so little sensitiveness to economic conditions. In all the thousands of words that poured from undergraduate lips, I never once heard the words "worker" or "economic determinism" or "industrial revolution." These young fellows were accepting our ghastly industrial mess without even a whimper of complaint. Had they really and truly been interested in the gospel of Our Lord, I wonder if they would have passed industrialism over quite so easily?

Opinion on War

Years of the R. O. T. C. controversy had enlightened the conference in regard to war. On Thursday morning, two windjammers were put on the platform. Both used the flareup technique of professional agitators. Both struck at war. An anti-war resolution was immediately called for. The conference, however, proved at this critical time, to be essentially sane, and refused to turn itself into a resolution machine. I am under the impression that the conference was anti-war, that it even tended to be pro-pacifist, that it wanted to scrap the R. O. T. C., but that it would not burden itself with resolutions that it could not carry into action.

The Value of the Conference

The value of a conference like this is its worth as a stimulant to further thought. Beyond Milwaukee, beyond the various campuses represented, the ideological influence of this conference will go out, motivating a great number of people to face, clearly and honestly, as so many of these collegians did, the problems of Christian applications and implications in our world today. We need more discussion of religion, discussion that is not mere talk. We need discussion that will serve as the basis and stimulant for collective action in making the principals of Our Lord concrete realizations.

The Diocese of Alabama has notified the National Council: (a) It will pay its Budget quota in full for 1926; (b) It requests the Council to increase its Budget quota for 1927 from $19,800 to $20,500, and guarantees the payment of the latter amount.

The Book Editor Goes to Milwaukee

By Rev. Charles L. Street, Ph.D.

The book editor of this sheet having used up all the book reviews in the editorial barrel and having let one issue of THE WITNESS go out into the world unredeemed by any literary column whatever, takes his pen in hand to see what he can do. The real reason for the absence of book reviews last week was the fact that the book editor was spending his time at the Student Christian Association conference at Milwaukee. There is another account of this conference, in this issue, but it may not be taken amiss if the book editor records a few impressions, too.

In the first place, though the students who were at Milwaukee were a picked group of those most interested in religion from the colleges and universities from Maine to California and Montana to Florida, to say nothing of many from other lands, there was nothing goody-goody or objectionably pious about them. They were as live a looking lot of young people as one could wish to see.

In the second place, I was struck by the fact that though the theme of the Conference was the relation of the individual to God, and the ways in which that relationship should work out in present day life, the students seemed to be a lot more interested in the applications of Christianity than in the personal relationship to God part of the program.

The third point of interest was the impression that our own Studdert-Kennedy made on the Conference. In his address on Science and Religion, his conduct of the opening devotions of the Conference each morning, and the "retreat" he gave for the Christian Association secretaries on the Sunday after the Conference closed he made a contribution to the spiritual life of the Conference that can not be overestimated. What he did is an indication of what the Church and Churchmen might do more of in gatherings such as this.

Finally, the emphasis on problems of student morals like petting, drinking and women's smoking did not get anything like the attention that the headlines in the papers—at least the Milwaukee and Chicago papers—would seem to indicate. These matters were taken up in discussion groups and individual conferences, but they were kept very much in their proper perspective. The newspaper man's talent for making lurid headlines out of nothing is a continual source of wonder to me.

One of the important figures in the Conference was Kirby Page, whose little book on the Philippine situation I hope to review in the near future. Kirby Page is one of the prophets of the Christian religion as applied to present day problems of inter-racial and international relations. He is one of the leaders of the peace movement in this country. His pamphlets on "War, Its Causes, Consequences and Cure," on "Imperialism" and on "A National Department of Peace" should be read by everybody, be they peacemakers or war-makers, who want to be intelligent on this subject. The growing sentiment in our universities against imperialism and national selfishness and the cruelty and hate to which these things lead is one of the hopeful signs in our day and generation.

A recent book on church work among students by the Presbyterian student pastor at Ohio State University is of interest in this connection.* Mr. Houston gives in some detail an account of the program of the religious forces at Ohio State, but the book is full of valuable suggestions for student workers in other universities and other types of universities. It gives detailed material on programs for churches in college communities, on programs for looking after freshmen and on the different types of schools of religion in state universities.

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

RINGS

SOME "advanced" ladies cherish a prejudice against wedding rings. They say that the rings are symbols of subjection originating in the misty past when wife-catching was a violent diversion for the male of the species.

Maybe they are—though no one can say so with real certainty. We can speak with more authority when we say that in ancient times the bridal ring was really a betrothal ring. Gentlemen, in those days, were required to show tangible proof of their ability to support a wife by paying something for her. Some literal people might call it a purchase price. At any rate, when money was less convenient that it is today, the ring took its place. The maiden wore a ring as an indication that her man had laid down a certain amount of his wealth as earnest-money, to show that he meant business and to tell the world that the maiden in question was no longer open to proposals. After a while they would be married.

Christians found the use of the betrothal ring an accepted custom when the Church entered upon her career. It was not a Jewish but a Roman custom. As with many other pagan things, the Christians spiritualized it and gave it a significance of their own. They made it the symbol of the indissoluble union of Christian marriage. It was worn on the fourth finger of the left hand because they had a notion that there was a vein in that finger directly connected with the heart and the heart was supposed to have something to do with conjugal selection.

Writing was not as common fifteen hundred years ago as it is today and in the absence of documents the giving of a betrothal ring itself constituted an enforceable marriage contract. The old Lombard law was quite specific about it. When a man betrothed himself to a woman "with a ring only, he gives earnest for her and makes her his and if afterwards he marry another, he is found guilty to the amount of 500 solidi." Apparently if the woman could produce the engagement ring, her breach of promise suit was won without recourse to witnesses or jury. Gentlemen had to be careful in those days as to how they scattered about their jewelry.

Bishops in the olden days were invested with rings at the time of consecration as a sign of their marriage to the Church. In the Middle Ages we first read of the pope's ring as the "Ring of the Fisherman," with which he sealed his private letters, while leaden "bulls" were attached to official documents; hence the "papal bull" as certain official papers from the vatican are still denominated. I once heard of an effervescent woman who bubbled forth her delight at the elevation of a very rotund cardinal, saying that it was a peculiarly appropriate promotion because "he looks so much like a papal bull."

The ladies who protest might do better to adopt the policy of the early Christians and to make the ring mean something more than servitude by contributing greater dignity to marriage itself. But I am afraid most of them belong to that much-married element who would look like so many jewelers' exhibits if they were to wear all the rings accumulated in a life-time of divorces. Perhaps they might string them into necklaces, being careful to mark them so that the public might know which one meant a divorce and which one an annulment.

Bishop Murray Sends Greetings to All English Churchmen as They Arrive Here

CHRISTMAS

By Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott

I am interested to learn that five hundred English immigrants, with Anglican Church affiliations, have arrived in the United States during the year 1926. The Presiding Bishop has sent to each and every one of them a letter of Christmas greeting. Through a follow-up card system of the foreign-born American division of the Church, the names of these immigrants have been passed on to the clergy in the various parts of the country to which they have gone and have been visited by these clergymen and definitely attached to their parishes. This system of insuring close contact with incoming immigrants with Church affiliations is a new idea in Church promotion, and it has been brought about through the work of Raymond M. Cole of the New York City Mission Society. Bishop Murray sent out, as well, Christmas greetings to the chief bishops of the ancient Eastern Orthodox Churches of Europe and the Near-East, the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem, and to the Primates of the Armenian, Syrian-Jacobite and Nestorian Churches, and the various National Churches, Greek, Roumanian and otherwise. Surely this is Christian courtesy in action, and well worthwhile.

What do you think of a Universal Christmas? Dr. S. Edward Young is one of its strongest advocates. "Has not the era come for Roman Catholic, Protestant and Greek Catholic—yes, and for Hebrews—to arrange a universal Christmas to come on Sunday always, as Easter does?" Dr. Young goes on to say "A Sunday Christmas would mean more for the spiritual idea, for sanctuary attendance and worship. Nobody has the slightest evidence as to the exact day our Lord was born, so this plan would not involve any inaccuracy of date. Our present sprawled-out observance, about one half of the Churches using one Sunday and the other half the next and the various Sunday school celebrations straggling over a period of nearly two weeks, leaves much to be desired in the mass psychology of this great Anniversary. A united, simultaneous, spiritual getting-together in memory of the Saviour's birth and, some three months afterward, an equal unison in commemorating His Resurrection would be an added strength of religious forces against ever-increasing seductiveness of material distraction." It sounds feasable, even advisable; but the present date and system is deeply imbedded in habit and tradition. I rather imagine that the agitation to be at all successful will have to stretch itself over many years.

I have always believed that "plain speaking" from the pulpit tells in the long run—that laymen like a parson who "hits out from the shoulder." The fifty militant years of the Rev. Dr. Gustav Arnold Carstensen, of Holy Rood Church, New York, recently resigned at the age of seventy-six, are an abundant testimony to that effect. It is safe to say that the Church Militant in this country has had no more militant figure in the past quarter of a century than Dr. Carstensen. This distinguished cleric has always said what he meant and meant what he said, and his hearers have never been in doubt as to his meaning! He once denounced a well known critic of the Apostles' Creed as "a pompous Pantaloon," and accused another rector of "debasing his priesthood with weekly shows." His words have never been weasel words, and the possibility of misunderstanding has ever been rendered impossible. People have always known, and beyond the shadow of misapprehension, just exactly where the rector of Holy Rood stood. There is something refreshing, something exhilirating, about such a man; is there not? Only last February Dr. Carstensen, in rejecting the presidency of the Church Temperance Society, said: "I believe Prohibition is wrong ethically, unsound economically and impossible psychologically." When a man speaks like that you may differ with him; but you cannot help respecting him. May God raise up similar "Forthrighters" for the ministry of the Church in this and in all succeeding generations!

The Roman Church always true to form! The Right Rev. Mons. John L. Belford in conducting a forum recently in Brooklyn, New York, was asked the question: "Is there the slightest possibility of our Church becoming a member of a union of Churches, as is suggested by some leading Protestant Ministers?" Answer, "There is a possibility, but it is very remote. The only way is for them to come into the Catholic Church, and you know how possible that is." Surely, the questioner must have been of a simple mind! What a silly question to ask. Just as though there were any chance of a different reply!

Seminary Students Have Own Meetings

Two Hundred Theological Students Have Conference of Their Own at Milwaukee

DR. COFFIN LEADER

By Wilford O. Cross

Two hundred theologs from twenty seminaries met in conference in Milwaukee, December 27th and 28th, to discuss the qualifications of a minister in the modern community. Henry Sloan Coffin, new president of Union Seminary, New York, started off with a clear presentation of the problem. A modern minister should be a man of moral and intellectual integrity, always at the service of the community; be convinced of the urgent need for spiritual values in our material civilization; be loyal to his Church; have a direct personal experience of God.

The conference was of the group variety, the 200 men dividing themselves into 20 groups, each discussing a different matter. None were particularly successful in sticking to their subjects; one got off onto Buchmanism, with much being said, pro and con; at another the group was being amused while a new-fledged mystic from North Dakota related how he had raised a girl from the dead by the power of his "gift of faith"; in another visited, a Baptist was informing those who were listening of the menace of Rome, while an Anglo-Catholic was advocating the use of the rosary.

The conference was brought to a close with an address by the Rev. G. A. Studdert-Kennedy, who brought the men back from futile wanderings in the forest of their own bigoted growth to the question at hand. His answer was brief: "To love and to serve, and to be wise."

First, said Kennedy, clergymen must be humble men, forgetting self and remembering only their Master; then they should love, and by love he did not mean passion or benevolence or self-expression or any tommy-rot like that, but something practical and sound. Love meant creating life.

Then we must study to be wise. It is no good calling capitalism names until we have studied it and know what it is. Emotional waving of the red flag is vain—what we want is study—study, study, study, and the love and the wisdom of Our Lord.

The theological students later joined the larger undergraduate conference, reported elsewhere in this issue.

English Parson Won't Marry On Christmas

Have the Clergy the Right to Refuse to Marry People On Christmas Day?

CLERGY SHORTAGE

By Rev. A. Manby Lloyd

A controversy on the subject of weddings on Christmas has arisen following the publication in the Daily Sketch of criticisms of the Vicar of Mansfield's action in refusing to marry couples on Christmas Day.

"The effect of the ban," the Rev. J. M. F. Dumphreys, vicar of St. Philip's Old Kent-road, told the Daily Sketch, "is to make people search for a church where they can have their wedding, and very often they tell lies when giving the name of the parishes in which they say they live.

"I am having seven weddings on Christmas Day in my church, in addition to three celebrations of Holy Communion and two other services, and I have no curate.

"I mention this because Canon Marsh (the vicar of Mansfield) says that his Christmas Day services make it impossible for him to officiate at weddings.

"This custom, which is not confined to Mansfield, turns people away from church in disgust and sends them to the register offices.

"Sometimes, having found that they cannot be married in one parish, couples look for another where they can, and qualify as residents by residing there for 15 days.

"The vicar of Mansfield is illogical in saying that he cannot officiate at weddings because of the church services, and adding that the weddings can be solemnized if other clergy attend to officiate.

"At a time when churches are appealing for funds some vicars are turning money away by refusing to celebrate weddings on Christmas Day.

"They might also remember that Christmas Day, which should be a day of goodwill, in the church of all places, is not a day on which to quarrel with parishioners. I should like to have a ruling on the matter from the bishops."

Several clergymen expressed the view that there is a legal obligation on the clergy to celebrate weddings on any day except during Holy Week.

The Rev. G. Branson, vicar of St. Bartholomew's, Camberwell, said: "We don't prohibit weddings on Christmas Day, but we don't encourage them. I would rather have to officiate at a wedding on Christmas Day than on a Sunday, but in exceptional cases I marry people on Sundays.

"There was the case of a baker who had only Sunday free for his wedding, and so I obliged him. We try to meet people's convenience where it is possible."

Owing to the great shortage of clergy, Mr. A. C. Northon, a prominent farmer of Pinchbeck, Lincs., has taken and passed all the required examinations, and will be ordained at Lincoln next Sunday, and proceed to a curacy in his own village. Mr. Northon has been a lay reader for twenty years, lay representative to the diocesan conference, and lay secretary to the ruri-decanal conference. Such an event is without parallel in the history of the district.

Ten Years Ago

TEN years ago the following item appeared in this paper: Rt. Rev. Sheldon M. Griswold D. D., Bishop of the Missionary District of Salina has been transferred from that District to become the Suffragan Bishop of the diocese of Chicago. The installation service was held in the Cathedral of SS. Peter and Paul on Monday, January 8. The Bishop of Chicago made an address of welcome in his usual strong, clear language and Bishop Griswold responded in an address that will long be remembered.

A Little Pamphlet That May Be Had For a Nickle Gives Much Information

ADVICE TO CANDIDATES

By Rev. W. B. Spofford

The editor of this paper gave the Rev. Charles L. Street, Ph. D. the job of handling book reviews, but I am sure he will not accuse me of poaching in his domain if I here refer to a little leaflet that one may secure for a nickle by addressing The League for Industrial Democracy, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City. It is written by Mr. Stuart Chase, who used to be Professor Chase until he quit the university in order to give the benefits of his knowledge to a wider audience. Mr. Chase has the ability of rewriting other men's books in a few paragraphs, and doing it so well that you leave his review convinced that it is a useless squandering of dollars and hours to bother with the book. Why read a book at two dollars when a leaflet for a nickle does the job. Mr. Chase even pulls off this stunt with his own books. He wrote a pamphlet, The Challenge of Waste. Folks in the know apparently told Mr. Chase that it was a job well done, so he elaborated it into a book. I have read both and feel sure that the pamphlet selling for a dime is better than the book selling for one and a half. This latest leaflet is called Are Radicals Crazy, and it is in effect a review of Dr. George A. Dorsey's important work, Why We Behave Like Human Beings. I gave hours to Dr. Dorsey's book. I am sorry, for Mr. Chase gives me all of it in half an hour. To my way of thinking it is a very Christian leaflet which should be made compulsory reading in our seminaries. I may be wrong; you may judge the matter for yourself by spending three two penny stamps. The extra penny is for the mailing.

Add to the list of those clerygmen who are through with war the name of Dr. Karl Reiland, rector of St. George's, New York City. Last Sunday afternoon, in a sermon that was widely broadcasted, he said that the time was not far distant when it would be treasonable to be a nationalist, that war was a silly and futile business, and that he would never allow himself again to be turned into a recruiting agent, for this or any other country.

Beautiful altar has been placed in St. Chrysostom's, Chicago, Rev. Norman Hutton, rector. It is entirely hand carved. The reredos is a triptych, the central panel of which has for its subject the Crucifixion, the left panel the Nativity and the right the Ascension. The work was done by Irving & Casson-A. H. Davenport Company of New York and Boston.

Advice to Candidates, old advice but still good. It is fifty years old and comes from Bishop Elliott, first missionary bishop of West Texas. In a letter to the Board of Missions he says: "It was a sewing machine which, upon my last visitation, gave me great searchings of heart." He then relates the details of a trip to the farthest point in his district; a six day march, which brought him to the very last house before going into the territory of outlaws and savages. Then he says: "The sewing-machine agent has been before us . . . for the percentage upon the sale of machines, these men in their little wagons scour the country, enduring every hardship and sometimes even death. What activity! How eagerly they hear of and set off to visit distant settlers, how they hang upon the borders and range up and down the Rio Grande. Indians, outlaws, Mexicans do not deter them; they have machines at so much per cent to sell!

"I do not think we need propose to ourselves such examples as Patteson sleeping beneath 'the long wash of Australasian seas,' or Mac Kenzie in his humble grave beside the pestilen-is now looked upon in the same light as fire insurance, — as a protection that we cannot afford to neglect. There are always a few persons who take a chance, but by and large the consensus of opinion is that the risks involved are too heavy for the individual to carry. They can safely be turned over, at a surprisingly low cost, to a company organized for that purpose which has a sufficient number of such risks so as to be able to strike an average.

The library at the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, Boston, which was begun only a few years ago as an experiment, has outgrown the little room overlooking the Common and has been enlarged this week by the addition of part of one of the adjoining rooms over the corridor leading to the Shepard Stores. For the use of all people whether members of the congregation or not, the library has filled a need. Its convenient location, just off the vestibule, enables many people who have an hour or so leisure to have a pleasant quiet nook in which to read and meditate. Books may be taken out for a period of two weeks or a month—the popularity of this privilege being attested by the fact that the circulation for the year totals well over twenty-six hundred. The new nook is said to be only a temporary addition to relieve the overcrowded shelves until the library can be enlarged permanently.

Trinity Church, Galveston, Texas, has a Men's Club that is setting a pretty fast pace for others to follow. Had twenty meetings last year, with speakers of prominence at each, as well as entertainment. Average attendance was forty men. But that is but a part of it; here is a Men's Club that really does something besides allow the women to get up suppers for them. They fitted out the parish house with tables, silver, table cloths and that sort of stuff; also equipped the church with a fine cabinet for the care of altar linens and vestments, and a housed-in safe for the communion silver.

The Crusade

THE Bishops' Crusade is an effort to arouse the members of the Church to a finer loyalty to Christ and His Church. Our people will be thrilled by the speeches of prominent men and women who are giving their time as Crusaders. But the enthusiasm thus aroused can be maintained only by careful follow-up work. We suggest as a part of this work that an effort be made to get at least one of the Church weeklies into every home. THE WITNESS will gladly co-operate in every possible way, with sample copies, and by allowing a commission of 50 cents on each yearly subscription sent in to us between now and Easter. We also again suggest the BUNDLE PLAN as an effective means of introducing the paper to your parishioners.

The first "Ainu" has been ordained to the priesthood. The Ainus are the original inhabitants of Japan, a diminishing people now possibly some 15,000 in number. Their destiny seems to be absorption into the Japanese race, but it is greatly to be hoped that it may be as a Christian element. The ordination took place in Chiba in the (English) Diocese of South Tokyo.

They wish to help deserving students of limited means to obtain a college education, and to express their appreciation of the benefits they received when they were students at St. John's.

Witness Fund

The following letter is typical of many received from clergymen and other readers of THE WITNESS; this is from a missionary who has charge of several missions in an eastern diocese: "I enclose herewith the blank indicating that I wish THE WITNESS to be discontinued; or to put it exactly the paper must be discontinued because I haven't the money to pay for it. I enjoy the paper and think it by far the most interesting and most Christian of the general Church publications. But, having a family that must eat I forego the pleasure of having it."

The Bishops' Crusade

A STATEMENT

By

BISHOP DARST

Chairman, Commission on Evangelism.

THE BISHOPS' CRUSADE is preeminently a call to rededication to Jesus Christ in life and service. Men and women cannot know Christ without seeking to do His will. Transformed lives must result in transformed communities. The Bishops' Crusade may lead us to some new high mount of Transfiguration, but it will have failed of its purpose if it does not lead us from that mount down into the valleys of common life, where men suffer and toil and sin. A weary, disillusioned world is asking, "Is it simply another gesture?" God grant that we may so catch the spirit and the purpose of Jesus that we may with convincing power show the world, by our consecrated devotion to the teachings of the Master, that it means an honest effort, a continuing effort to make the Kingdom of God actually come on earth. If we are willing to pay the price, the prayer will come true.

THE BISHOPS' CRUSADE

To Stir Our Wills to Action

By VIDA D. SCUDDER

Chairman, Church League for Industrial Democracy

WE OWE deep gratitude to the Bishops. Sometimes it has seemed as if our spiritual fathers hardly realized the longing of us would-be Christians of the laity to be aroused, challenged, disciplined, illumined, summoned to the high and arduous path of perfect discipleship. We want the Church to make sterner demands! It must help us against ourselves. For our Master said that it would be woe to us when men spoke well of us,— but we love to be well-spoken-of, and we shrink from being reviled as if it were being improper.

Yet we do really want to be Christians. There is no call so hard that men will not respond to it if it echoes in their ears the Voice of Christ. But we need the authentic tone. And we must have a lot of guidance if we are to take our great Adventure of being Christians seriously. For it is obvious that what the world names success demands very different qualities, especially in business or professional life, from the qualities commended by Christ. We have a dim recognition of this fact. Most of us fear that we can not live on serenely in the way the world approves, and win the approval of our Master.

Christianity has always been a disturbing force. We know that if we are in earnest about it, it will affect not only our personal lives, but also the forms and institutions and the political and industrial methods for which, if democracy means anything, we are responsible. Modern preaching has not often helped us to see how, any more than it has succeeded in making the intimate appeal to the love of Jesus for which our souls hunger. It has often been sadly vague, has not hit out from the shoulder, has not said, "Thou art the man!" We need, how desperately, that God shall take away the stony heart out of our breast and shall give us a heart of flesh. A change of heart! Gratitude to those who are to proclaim that necessity!

A modern philosophy is helping us to see that you can't change your heart, as it were, in the void. You have to change it by changing your behaviour. We hope eagerly that the Bishops will show us how our behaviour is to be changed.

Therefore many of us welcome what Bishop Brent, Bishop Darst, and others are saying. We know that to be Christian in the twentieth century implies special demands. We wish that the renewed devotion to Our Lord to which we are called, may lead to searching scrutiny of our social action,— our business dealings, as employers or employees, our conduct toward investments, toward profit-making, toward the use of luxuries, our attitude toward war. Christian behaviour in so many of these matters lies—cross-wise—to the behaviour accredited in the world. We remember Zaccheus, hurrying to give half his goods to the poor—though that was his own application. Christ never told him to. We remember Matthew, calmly leaving the receipt of custom apparently to run itself,— remember all those who could say, "We have left all to follow Thee." We know what a mere glance from the eyes of Jesus could do in the old days. What shall it do for us?

So many troubled hearts wait the intimate, the personal appeal! I am tempted to quote from a letter I have been answering this morning; now and then such come my way. The writer is an honored and active worker in the Church, one of whom our Communion is justly proud. The letter says:

"I am no longer a very loyal Churchman. I used to be. I used to attend Church three times every Sunday, run many weekday activities, and attend a daily service. I accepted all I was taught and never did—much thinking. Then came the war. I found myself beginning to think and question. I found I couldn't support any war, and then I found I was a socialist and couldn't willingly support our modern capitalistic society. My feeling toward the Church is one big heart ache. I still attend the Episcopal Church, but come home very unhappy, instead of inspired. With this experience," the writer goes on to say, "has come a great emptiness in my life."

Can not the Bishops' Crusade show how this emptiness can be filled? Allegiance to the Living Lord, to the Radiant Cross! And recognition that only as the Church is crucified with Christ can it hold men to that allegiance! Many suffer like the writer of this letter. Most of them are silent. Some, like the writer, are outwardly loyal still. But they are waiting.

This is to be an evangelical Crusade. Yes, that is what we need. To the Christian mind, all social reform which is permanent must spring from the passionate love of Christ. But of old, men and women possessed by that love did not go on living just like other people. While He was on earth they left all and followed Him. Later they tried to hold all things in common. When that premature experiment failed, they at least developed an ethic quite different from that of the Pagan world around them. It is a shame if Christian behaviour two thousand years after Christ died to save, does not separate itself more sharply than at the beginning, from the behaviour of the non-Christian world—which is pretty Pagan still.

So many hearts wait the life-giving word! We pray that the Bishops' Crusade may summon us all in our dear Church to such intense devotion to our Saviour Jesus that we may follow Him along the way He trod. It was not an easy way. He had to tread it to Calvary because His was a type of conduct and teaching which the secular and religious authorities of his day rightly considered dangerous and revolutionary. It was the Way of the Cross. It was also the Way of Life.

God bless this Crusade!

INDUSTRY AND THE CHURCH

Need of Scientific Attitude

By JOHN A. FITCH
Of the New York School of Social Work

IF THE Church is to understand labor it must bring to bear on that question the same quality that must be had by anyone if he is to understand anything, a scientific spirit. I do not think this is a more difficult task for a Churchman than for anyone else; it is difficult for anyone so to approach the labor movement, for the subject is one about which difference of opinion runs riot and emotional feeling plays a part. So it is exceptionally difficult to approach this subject in a truly scientific spirit. Nevertheless, if one is to get understanding in this field he must do two things: first, search for facts—decide what to do about them later; second, during this process he must divest himself of moral (or conventional) judgments—that, too, must come later.

In other words, he must be concerned altogether with finding out what it is that men do and why they do them. If during this task he allows moral indignation to take possession of him, it will be almost certain that he will be unable to get all the pertinent facts, and altogether certain that he will be unable to interpret what he does get. There is no more room for making moral judgments during the process of studying a strike, for example, than there is for making such judgments while observing the activities of an amoeba through a microscope. Afterward, when one has arranged his facts and understood them, he may denounce or approve, whether they apply to the activity of a man or an amoeba, but he cannot do so before.

Muddled Thinking

The tendency to do otherwise, or the muddled thinking that results, is probably the greatest obstacle to social progress in existence. It is not characteristic of a single group but is to be found everywhere. Indeed, there is probably not a person alive who is not to some degree a victim of the tendency to examine both individual and social phenomena through the colored glasses of his personal conception of what constitutes desirable behaviour. It is so important that I may be permitted to cite an example of the kind of false reasoning to which this tendency leads.

A minister, not long ago, in a sermon denounced non-church goers with some heat as morally deficient or culpable persons. Now he may be right and he may be wrong, but the scientific attitude would be to say, "Here are people who do not attend church. Why do they not attend? They would if they wanted to. It must be that either they are not conscious of a need that is met by church attendance, or they have other prior needs that find satisfaction in other activities. Or, it may be that they are not capable of judging priority of needs. It would seem, therefore, that the task of the Church is (a) to convince itself as to the exact nature of the need that it can meet better than any other agency; (b) equip itself to meet this need; (c) convince the non-church goer both of the existence of his need and the ability of the Church to meet it." Of course, this may not bring the people back to the Church. The Church may fail to equip itself. The individual may fail to be convinced. But it puts the shoe on the right foot. Indignation will not bring them back. Understanding the problem in all of its angles makes it possible to take the steps necessary to that end.

It must be perfectly evident that the frame of mind that has been suggested in the illustration given is not calculated to contribute toward careful and scientific analysis. It is a frame of mind that is inimical to the collection of facts and, therefore, inimical to true understanding. It is a frame of mind that must be sedulously avoided by all who desire to be clear-minded observers and must, therefore, be avoided by the Church, if the Church is to develop an understanding of the problems of labor. In its task of attaining the facts concerning labor, I would say then, that the first essential is the right frame of mind. There must be a development of the scientific attitude which is willing to look facts in the face regardless of whether one approves of them or not, and then endeavors to look behind the facts and discover, if possible, what has brought them into being. At the same time, there must be a certain healthy skepticism to accompany such a frame of mind. One must not too readily believe everything that is told him nor even everything that for the moment he thinks he sees. Honest men frequently mislead by telling only part of the facts. Honest men also, when involved in controversy, as an employer who has a strike on his hands, or a labor leader who is directing such a strike, are almost certain to be influenced by an unconscious bias. Hence, it is often practically impossible for such a man to give a complete and accurate account of what has occurred.

Obtaining Facts

Nevertheless, the religious leader may do much in obtaining facts for himself. There is a vast amount of material concerning the locality in which one lives and the industries of that locality that may be obtained from the United States Census. There is not time here to elaborate this point but census reports are to be found in every public library and the librarian will be only too glad to assist the investigator in discovering what is in them. Having secured this information, the Churchman may then acquaint himself with the organizations in his community both of labor and of employers. In every city of any importance there is a central labor body holding regular meetings most of which are open to the public. One may learn much of the point of view of the organized labor movement by attending some of these meetings. There are other associations, such as chambers of commerce, manufacturers' associations, and so on, where information from the employers' point of view may be obtained. In the third place, visits to industrial plants will enable the clergyman to understand the working life of the community and it will give him some technical knowledge and the beginnings of a technical vocabulary that will go a long way in helping him to command respect when discussing matters involving industry with employers or employees. Then with respect to the specific local industries, information may be obtained from the publications of the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics and in many states from the State Department of Labor. The "Monthly Labor Review" of the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, which may be obtained at the subscription price of $1.50 from the Superintendent of Documents, Washington, D. C., contains a vast amount of important information concerning developments in the industrial and labor field. Articles, in the main excellently written, and statistical material in great detail are available in these monthly reviews.

An Organization

However, it must be admitted that for the individual clergyman with a parish on his hands there is a limit to what may be accomplished in the way of industrial research. His studies must necessarily be superficial. He cannot carry on research either intensively or extensively and will have to depend upon other sources for much of the knowledge which it is desirable for him to have. For some of this, as I suggested before, he may depend upon the reports of the various government agencies. But much more than this is desirable. I would suggest, therefore, that there should be in every church an organization affiliated with the national body equipped to carry on continuous studies in the field of industrial relations. I would like to see the work of the Federal Council of Churches in this field greatly extended and I would like to see it supplemented by an industrial research department in every denomination in the land.

What to Do

The question now arises, "What will the clergyman do with these facts concerning industrial relations which by any of the means suggested or by any others he has obtained?" My general answer to that question would be, that he will have to decide for himself in the light of all attendant circumstances. No formula could possibly be proposed that could be relied upon to fit all situations. It must be obvious, however, that from time to time situations will arise that call for the clergyman's making a decision as to the position he is going to take. That responsibility will come to him whether he is in possession of facts or not. It requires no argument, therefore, that a thorough understanding of the factors involved in industrial relations is essential to the meeting of these problems that are bound in any case to arise. However, I am willing to suggest, somewhat more specifically, certain courses of action that may be open to the clergyman who has to make decisions in this field and who prepares himself for these decisions by patient inquiry.

Bishop Roots
"Missionaries Will Stay"

Ethical Principles

In the first place, he may do what every other clergyman does anyway, that is, lay down for the guidance of the community certain broad ethical principles and leave it to the layman who comes under the influence of his teaching to apply these principles to specific situations. No matter how well acquainted with the facts the clergyman may be nor how positive he may be as to the remedial action that may be needed, it seems to me definitely true that there are times when it is better to refrain from making specific suggestions. After all, right relations in industry, as well as in any other aspect of human affairs, depends, in the long run, upon the development of a sound ethical code acceptable to the whole community. The development of such a code is a matter that involves time, patience, and constant endeavor. Its development is more important than the establishment of any single specific reform, because without it such reforms rest upon an uncertain and possibly ephemeral basis. Nevertheless, I would point out that the achievement of specific reforms are often, perhaps generally, necessary steps in the development of an established code of ethics.

Mediate

In the second place, a clergyman who is familiar with the local industrial situation and by his intelligent interest in it has been able to command the respect of the leaders among both the employers and the workers may be in a position, when a controversy threatens, to mediate either informally or formally. It is possible for a man situated as the clergyman is, against whom ordinarily no charge of desire to promote personal advantage can be made, sometimes to enter a situation at a strategic moment and assist materially in promoting both peace and justice.

In the third place, it may be wise for the clergyman to advocate specific action in a given situation. He will have to give very careful consideration to all the factors involved before deciding to follow this course. If there is controversy over the matter a public statement in favor of any particular course of action is apt to disqualify him at once for service in a mediatory capacity. If, however, he is convinced that his services as mediator are not likely to result in the accomplishment of a desirable end, or if he has failed in his efforts in this field, he should, I think, consider very carefully whether he may not contribute to social progress by coming out openly and fearlessly in favor of some desirable change. For example, there is no question but that the Church as a whole rendered valiant service in the direction of abolishing the twelve-hour day in the steel industry. Its activity in this field followed attempts at mediation which had failed. The appeal that was then made to public opinion was direct and outspoken. The activities of the various Church organizations in calling the attention of the public and of all of the ethical forces therein to the evils of the twelve hour day constituted probably the greatest single force that led to the decision of the steel industry to abandon that practice.

Better Social Order

In the fourth place, the Church as a whole, in my opinion, and the clergy as the leaders of the Church, should be constant in their efforts in the direction of the establishment of a better social order. By this I do not mean that the Church should advocate a revolution, though some clergymen of my acquaintance apparently feel that this is the mission of the Church. I confess, that I have little sympathy with the point of view which sees no good in the existing order and no way toward the achievement of social good except by altogether and immediately changing it. The fact that the existing order is the growth of centuries and that it represents to date the consummation of the efforts of human beings to find a tolerable method of living together seems to suggest that it has elements of strength based upon actual services to the common good. When I say that the Church should work for a better social order, I mean that the Church should recognize that there are elements in our existing social institutions which make for relationships that are essentially unchristian. Specifically, I might suggest that the existing relationships between employer and employee are such as to promote conflict between them instead of co-operation. Their interests are at certain points opposed, and the constant struggle between the wage interest and the profit interest is a dominant characteristic of industrial relations. I recognize that in many instances long strides have been taken in the direction of increased co-operation, and in many establishments co-operation, rather than conflict, is coming to be the rule. These arrangements, however, have ordinarily been worked out between individuals of both groups who are singularly men of good will. They are not developments which have as a matter of course arisen out of essential relationships in industry; rather, they are variations which have as their basis nothing that can be depended on as having elements of permanence.

Fundamental Change

In my opinion, the basic relationship between employer and employee in industry at the present time—being one that inevitably, in most cases, precipitates conflict—is an essentially unchristian relationship and requires fundamental change. I would make clear, however, that I regard these experiments in good will, of which I have just spoken, as steps, and necessary steps, in the direction of the establishment of this better social order, for which I believe the Church should be working. I do not visualize a sudden change from the existing order to an ideal order. It exceeds the limit of my imagination to suggest any change from one situation to another without passing through all of the steps that necessarily lie between. I do not expect to proceed from one point on the earth's surface to another without traversing all of the territory that lies between those two points, and I do not expect that a social order containing elements essentially unchristian can possibly be changed into a thoroughly Christian society without undergoing a process of gradual transformation.

The essential thing behind all efforts in the direction of progress is the development of a sound ethical code in the community, of which I have spoken above. Again, let me emphasize, however, that if the Church is to contribute substantially to development in this field, it must acquaint itself with the facts and make its decision and offer its programs only in the light of these facts. Therefore, it must strive more than ever to understand not only the things men do but why they do them. The great thing in the process of coming to understand the labor movement is that as we come closer to it we come to know men as well as things. When we come to know men, we cannot any more be superior, for we shall find how much all men are like ourselves, and we cannot any more be either coldly critical or hotly denunciatory, for we shall see the reasons for what men do and realize how closely those reasons resemble the ones that animate our own activities. When we have thus understood, we shall be enabled to help a little toward the development of that willingness to understand, which must be the basis for a better social order.

Am I My Brother's Brother

A Deeper Type of Religion

BY BISHOP PAUL JONES

ABOVE all else this country needs a new and deeper type of religion—

A religion that does not deal in bribes or threats but makes appeal to that sense of dignity in every man which will not let him be false to himself or his fellows—

A religion that makes men realize that conscience must be educated to respond to new situations and relationships—

A religion that makes an employer ask whether the "master and man" relationship is an expression of brotherhood and realize that when he has been just he has only reached the threshold of Christianity—

A religion that makes an employee know that he does not live for himself alone but must stand by his group in order that their contribution to the partnership of industry may not be lost—

A religion that makes a merchant who encourages people to buy what they don't need and can't afford realize that he is in a class with a bartender serving a drunken man—

A religion that makes a man who sells watered stock to the public know that he robs himself of all right to feel that he is an honest man—

A religion that makes a man realize that by treating any man as a servant he does violence to the whole idea of brotherhood—

A religion that will inspire church members to forget calculations and percentages in their giving and share fully of their time, their talents and their money wherever they may be needed—

A religion that will make the employer who tries to prevent his employes from organizing and justifies it on the ground that he is protecting their rights realize that he is guilty of hypocrisy—

A religion that will make a citizen who uses the government through the political party to which he belongs for the furtherance of the economic interests of his own class realize that he is lower than a political grafter—

In short we need the development of a religion that is so much more than a personal police system that it is a way of life expressive of the principle of love, and brotherhood in every relationship.

When the people of this nation begin to find this religion they will find that questions of rights, security and punishment have faded into a secondary place, for they will then be interested in building relationships, industrial, racial, international, which are an integral part of the Kingdom of God.

In the atmosphere created by even the partial practice of such a religion there would be released a spirit that would so transform the present competitive basis of life that the ordinary productive work of the world might be a field for the practice of a real brotherhood.

Religion of this kind is not measured in terms of efficiency or law and order but in the quality of life it produces.

It is not by adding members to the churches or the adoption of ethical codes, but it is in the adoption of a spirit of humility in ourselves and of forgiveness toward others that we shall lay the foundation for a Kingdom of righteousness that shall be a way of peace.

A nationwide acceptance of this, the only true religion in action, would mark a real choice of God before mammon and would release such sources of spiritual power that social problems which now appear almost insoluble would soon yield to its transforming influence and we would have made a real step toward the redemption of the world.

About Books

BUSINESS AND THE CHURCH, edited by Jerome Davis. The Century Company. $1.50.

Review by Rev. James Myers

After thirty-five or forty years of increasing emphasis by religious leaders on the social gospel it is interesting to note some signs of progress in the application of Jesus' principles to industrial relations. "Business and the Church" (Century), a symposium by twenty-one industrialists, business men and labor leaders, edited and with an introduction by Professor Jerome Davis of Yale, presents a fascinating study of the extent to which Jesus' gospel of brotherhood and human worth has permeated certain leading minds in industry. It also presents briefly concrete forms of new industrial relationships in which the new urge has found expression, a majority of the chapters being brief expositions by active business men themselves of the various significant experiments in better industrial relations in their own concerns.

Among the contributors are John Calder, Henry Ford, Roger Babson, William Green, Whiting Williams, A. H. Young, Albert F. Coyle, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Sam A. Lewisohn, Henry Dennison, L. K. Comstock, Edward A. Filene, William Hapgood, Arthur Nash and Earl Dean Howard.

The book is valuable as containing such a range of contributions and should prove a valuable source book for the preacher who can draw from its pages important evidence to lay before the business men of his church in regard to the possibilities of applying certain Christian principles to business and industry.

Here is a new one; folks of Christ Church, Hyde Park, Mass., are selling goldfish for the benefit of the parish.

Crusade Follow-Up

DESIGNED as follow-up material to the Bishops' Crusade, Bishop Johnson is now writing a series of six articles on Spiritual Values and Religious Standards. The articles are written with lay members of the Church particularly in mind, and it is hoped that they will serve as useful material for Lenten Adult Study Groups. The articles will run during Lent together with other Lenten features. Plan now to take a WITNESS Bundle; a number of copies to one address at three cents a copy.

Cheerful Confidences

BUILDING A CONGREGATION

By Rev. George Parkin Atwater

THERE are three theories about building up a congregation. Every rector follows them. Some men may emphasize two of them. But they lie behind our efforts.

The first theory is that accepted by the parson who says, "Going to Church is a duty. I am holding services for the people and anyone in the congregation or in the community is privileged to attend. I shall do my part,—and if the people do not care to do their part, the fault is theirs. I shall not run after them, nor coax them."

And he does not. He sometimes lets off steam by scolding the faithful for the neglects of the others.

The second theory is that of the group that run about furiously trying to persuade people to go to church. He "gets after" them. He calls, advertises, sends out visitors, makes a canvass and rounds them up.

The weakness of this effort lies not in the perseverance of the parson, but in the fact that a congregation built up in this way must often be maintained in this way. And the parson wears himself out. He must keep on in a state of perpetual and vigorous activity.

The third theory about building up a congregation is that followed by men who try to make the parish and the fellowship so valuable and so interesting that people are naturally attracted to it. They come because they find real values in coming.

This group of parsons endeavors to keep the services of reasonable length and to have the music of satisfactory quality. The service is a living experience, not a dull and perfunctory office. They work on their sermons. Preaching the faith in a fresh manner, with alertness and conviction, will always interest people. One does not have to be sensational, or to belittle the fundamental teachings, in the guise of a false liberality, in order to attract people. Most people want to hear a strong presentation of the Church's faith. They are a little weary of platitudes, sonorous dogmatism, and trite complacency in presentation of truth.

But together with this must come some recognition of the fact that people like to be on friendly terms with one another. And the Church service must have some friendly appeal in it, and some recognition of the primary desire for fellowship.

There is no particular gain in rounding up a congregation by hard work, only to chill them with a dull and perfunctory service after you get them to church.

If the Sunday services can be so warmed with the cheerful glow of human love, and the bright encouragement of human friendliness, people will be attracted. And that sort of a congregation is easier to hold.

The last two theories may be the basis of a strong parish. Make the center attractive, and then the journey of visits about the parish will bear fruit.

Preacher, Pulpit and Pew

By E. P. Jots

A class of boys in an elementary school had an essay set, the subject being "Clergymen."

This is what one boy wrote:

"There are three kinds of clergymen, Bishups, recters and curats, the bishups tell the recters to work, and the curats have to do it. A curat is a thin married man, but when he is a recter he gets fuller and can preach longer sermons and becums a good man."

"Why," asked the teacher, "did David say he would rather be a doorkeeper in the house of the Lord?"

"Maybe," answered a boy, "it was because he could walk outside while the sermon was being preached."

After the church service little Jackie was introduced to the minister and said politely: "Mr. Longwind, I sure am thankful to you for that sermon."

"And how is that, my boy?" asked the gratified pastor, while mamma beamed.

"Cause brother Jimmie bet your sermon wouldn't last more'n three-quarters of an hour, an' you let it last 48 minutes. So I won his knife and I'm awful grateful."

Effort Made to Place Students in Industry

National Organizations Joint Forces to Promote the Student in Industry Movement

C. L. I. D. TAKES PART

A number of national organizations have been holding conferences during the Fall to work out a plan which it is hoped will enable a large number of seminary and college students to take jobs in various industries this coming summer, with conferences in different parts of the country at the end of the experiment where the students can swap experiences. The organizations sponsoring the movement are as follows: the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches; the Y. M. C. A.; the Y. W. C. A.; The Church League for Industrial Democracy; The Fellowship of Reconciliation; The Fellowship for a Christian Social Order; the League for Industrial Democracy; the Continuation Committee of the Evanston Conference and the American Friends Service Committee. A leaflet just called Students in Industry, and which contains the endorsements of the plan by several noted educators, is in part as follows:

"The men and women of our colleges are becoming more and more keenly aware of the intellectual and moral challenge of industrial problems. Because so many of the issues are controversial in nature, and because so many human values as well as economic facts are involved, it is difficult so to weigh class room and text book data as to obtain a true understanding of the problems involved, or to come to any moral judgment of the rights or wrongs of our present industrial system. An increasing number of college students have therefore determined 'to find out for themselves' by entering industry as manual workers, hunting their own jobs, living on their wages and working day by day under the same conditions as their fellow workers. A number of college students are spending a period of years in the venture, some are setting aside one whole year, but the majority are devoting six weeks or two months of the summer vacation to this project. It is usual for students to clear expenses, but not to save any appreciable amount of money, as a result of their summer's work.

"To meet the need of students desiring to obtain such first-hand contacts with industry, the Y. W. C. A. and the Y. M. C. A. have for some years sponsored 'students in Industry' or 'Industrial Research' groups in various industrial centers. Each group comes together once or twice a week to exchange and evaluate experiences, and to discuss the wider issues which may be found to be involved. A competent leader is provided who is able to secure interesting speakers to address the group and to be questioned by them. These speakers include employers, labor leaders, economists, ministers and social workers. An endeavor is made to have the principal types of progressive experiments in industrial relations described to the group by employers and labor leaders actually participating in such experiments.

"A large number of students go into industry as 'free lances' without attaching themselves to organized groups. Such students, while often unable because of geographical location to join a regular seminar, still feel the need of 'comparing notes' with other students who have worked in industry, and of questioning employers, labor leaders and special students of industrial problems. To meet this need the Continuation Committee of the Interdenominational Student Conference ('Evanston' Conference) set up last year a 'Students in Industry Conference' at Earlham College, Richmond, Indiana (Sept. 5-8, 1926). Forty-one students and specialists attended and were enthusiastic over the helpfulness of interchange of experience and of the frank discussion of personal and religious issues involved as they faced their own futures in the light of the challenge of the industrial problem.

"The future of the Student in Industry Movement lies with the students of our colleges. The Y. W. C. A., the Y. M. C. A., the Church League for Industrial Democracy, the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches, the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the Fellowship for a Christian Social Order, the League for Industrial Democracy, American Friends Service Committee, and the Continuation Committee of the Evanston Conference are ready to organize groups and to set up one or more fall conferences, provided student demand is sufficient to warrant it. Everything depends upon the number of students desiring to participate. The Y. W. C. A. definitely plans another group in Chicago for 1927; the Y. M. C. A. will conduct groups in New York City and Detroit; and the Friends will sponsor a group in Philadelphia. Other groups may be started in St. Louis, Chicago and Denver if enrollment justifies it. Fall conferences will be arranged at Richmond, Indiana, by the Evanston Conference Continuation Committee, and at Philadelphia by the American Friends Service Committee if sufficient interest is manifested early in the year."

Chicago Federation of Churches Round Up Notable Leaders For a Conference

MARGARET BONDFIELD SPEAKS

"Has the Church a Message for Industry" is the general theme of a great industrial conference being held this week in Chicago under the auspices of the Chicago Federation of Churches, with the co-operation of the Federal Council of Churches and other national Church organizations. The first meeting was held last Sunday afternoon in the Erlanger Theatre when the speaker was Miss Margaret Bondfield, an English Socialist, a member of Parliament, who held an important position with the Labor government under Ramsay MacDonald. Two other important addresses were made Sunday afternoon, one at the Chicago Federation of Labor meeting by the Rev. George Lackland, former pastor of Grace Methodist Church, Denver, and a broadcasted speech by the Rev. James Myers, industrial secretary of the Federal Council of Churches. Sunday evening addresses were given in churches by the Rev. Hubert C. Herring, social service secretary of the Congregational Church who has just returned from a study of the Mexican situation, and by the Rev. Worth M. Tippy, secretary of the social service commission of the Federal Council of Churches.

During the entire week meetings were held all over the city, in churches, clubs, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. groups, labor unions, and schools and colleges. Among those taking leading parts in the conferences were Miss Jane Addams of Hull House; Otto S. Beyer, Jr., the originator of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad plan of co-operation between owners, management and workers; John Calder, industrial engineer, Rev. E. B. Chaffee, pastor of the Labor Temple, New York; R.A.Cowles, officer of Illinois Agricultural Assn.; Rev. Jerome Davis of the Yale Divinity School; Professor Paul Douglass of the University of Chicago; Professor J. W. Elliott, social service secretary of the Baptist church; Bert M. Jewell, labor leader; Anton Johannsen, labor leader; Fred W. Sargent, president of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad; Dr. Graham Taylor, head of Chicago Commons; Tom Tippett, United Mine Workers educational secretary and several others of prominence in the industrial field.

Young Man of California Defeated For a Seat in Congress Turns To Verse for Comfort

MEXICO

By Bishop Stevens

The disillusionment that often follows an attempt to enter the political field is one of the factors that keep some of our best young men out of the field of statecraft. The machinery of a political campaign is irksome and trying. A fine young lawyer of Southern California ran for Congress. He lost. After the smoke of battle had cleared he burst into verse, a la Kipling—

Walk—walk—walk—walk — stopping people on the street,

The students at St. Helen's Hall, Portland, Oregon, have planted trees in honor of women who served in the Great War. One of the daily papers says "There is no memorial which speaks a finer sentiment or is itself more beautiful and lasting than a growing tree. Sculptured stone is rigid, inflexible. It is complete, finished, a symbol of a fact accomplished, an incident closed. A tree is a vibrant, ambitious, spreading thing which lives in the present and will live in the future, to the far-reaching undying influence of a great life or a worthy deed."

Seven acre site has been purchased for a new orphanage of the diocese of Rhode Island.

Ten Years Ago

TEN years ago the following item appeared in this paper: It is with deep regret that THE WITNESS notes the retirement of Miss Julia C. Emery from the office of General Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary. In this sphere Miss Emery has labored for forty years. The Church will be pleased to know that she has consented to continue that portion of her former work with which she has generally been most closely associated, namely, as editor of the Auxiliary pages of the Spirit of Missions.

Bishops' Crusade Gets Under Way With Great Mass Meeting Held In New York City

A STRIKE

By Rev. William B. Spofford

The Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, executive secretary of the department of Christian Social Service of the National Council on December 27th, sent to each of the more than 300 men and women who are at the present moment serving as Crusaders, a letter in which he urged them to give the Social Gospel a place in their addresses. He enclosed a copy of the statement which was prepared by a number of representatives of Church social service organizations, which was printed in THE WITNESS for December 9th, and which I hope you will read if your copy is still at hand. He also sent to each one a copy of Bishop Temple's book, "Personal Religion and the Life of Fellowship" which forcefully stresses the Social Gospel.

may be. We are hedged about with social, economic and political forces that would subvert the teachings of the Christian Church and render it quiescent and obedient to their selfish designs and purposes.

"There is a call, a tragic and persistent call, for that which the Master alone has the power to give. The present age is characterized by strife and confusion. Materialism arrogantly claims the place of supremacy and the siren call of worldly pursuits and pleasures that disclose no consciousness either of propriety or reasonable limitations is rendering the appeal of Christian faith that imposes restraints and discipline futile and impotent.

"The shadow of distrust and disbelief falls across the very threshold of the Church itself, and halts those who seek it for sanctuary and repose. The oracles of the faith are questioned and challenged by an age of speculation, bewitched by new and strange doctrines that rob it of balanced judgment and the sense of repose.

"We believe that religion, the religion of Jesus Christ, is indispensable to our security, our peace and our permanence in this world, and the only guaranty of happiness and peace in the world that is to be."

Bishop Manning said: "If all of us who profess to believe in Christ would awake to a real faith in Him our faith would change the world. We do not need any proof of this. We know that it is so.

"Think what the effect would be in New York tomorrow if all the people in this city who call themselves Christians should show the same faith in Christ that we see in St. John and St. Peter and the others! A power would go out from this city that would be felt throughout the world.

"We should not see obscene magazines sold on our newstands. The vile and loathsome plays in our theaters would disappear. There would be an end of the disgraceful Paris divorces and other divorces which are destroying the sacredness and the very meaning of marriage among us.

"The writers who for profit are degrading our literature and breaking down our standards of morality and decency by their shameless dwelling upon matters of sex would use their gifts along other and better lines.

"We should not regard our appetites, or our preferences, or our so-called personal liberty as a justification for evading or breaking the law of the land and thus help to weaken and break down respect for all law. We should awake to the meaning and the claim of our common brotherhood.

"We should find the way at once to meet the housing problem and put an end to the crowding of people together under conditions which make not only comfort but cleanliness and decency and morality almost impossible."

Dr. Morehouse and Mrs. Robins also stressed the social note. Dr. Morehouse, for example, saw two "stages of degeneracy which always marked irreligious ages, divorce and suicide." Mrs. Robins described a "barrenness in the home life, in the social life, in the business and economic life, in the Church life and in our own individual lives."

So, if this New York meeting sounded the keynote for the Bishops' Crusade, our folks are going to be challenged during the next month where it hurts.

hops' Crusade. Over 2,000 workers of the paper box industry have been out on strike since October 6, 1926.. entering their fifteenth week. Through their union they are asking for a week of 44 hours, a $5 increase a week, five holidays with pay, minimum wage, time and a half for overtime. Unreasonable? At present according to the New York State Department of Labor, 30 per cent of the women, and most of them are women and girls (I heard them decribed as flappers the other day by one of their leaders) are doing their flapping on less than $12 a week. Girls of the Young Peoples' Fellowships and Service Leagues, how would you like to pay room rent, buy your meals, your clothes, pay your laundry bill on $12 a week, doing your flapping on the balance. Bet you'd run to papa for help. Anyhow 30 per cent of these 2,000 workers are doing it; 64 per cent get less than $16 a week. They work in dirty grimy holes on the lower east side in New York. Right now they spend their days marching up and down in front of shops on a "picket line" with the temperature below freezing. Why? In order to save their union which they are convinced is the only thing that prevents them from getting less than $12 a week, and working longer hours for it. The "bosses" are trying to smash the union, and to do it, according to the tales I hear, are hiring gentlemen called by the elegant title of "guerrilas" to smash the strikers over their heads and thus break their heads and thus break their morale and drive them back to work. This may all be distorted but it is the closest to the facts that a number of us can get, for the organization of the manufacturers have steadfastly refused to present their side of the story.

I do not mean to infer that the Church has not shown an active interest in this situation. That is not true; fact is Church groups have been the only ones to care a hang apparently. The Rev. James Myers of the Federal Council of Churches has been working on this strike for weeks; so has the Rev. Charles K. Gilbert, secretary of social service of the diocese of New York; so has the Rev. George Collins of the Fellowship of Reconciliation; so have a lot of clergymen of various denominations. And right now a committee of one hundred members are trying to bring some reason into a mess, a committee composed for the most part of active Churchmen and Churchwomen, including Bishop Manning and a number of our own clergy in New York. So don't let anyone tell you that the Church is afraid to tackle such a situation; that's a lie a lot of folks like to repeat. At the same time I can't help wondering just what three or four Crusaders would say if they had to address a meeting of 2,500 such strikers instead of a meeting of 2,500 well-fed Episcopalians, including myself. Yell "Bolshevik" if you

Been doing a lot of work on the Bishops' Crusade in Macon, Georgia. The Rev. "Cy" Bentley tells me that the town is pretty well covered with posters, newspapers are being used effectively, and everything is being done to get the folks out. The Crusaders are the Rev. Z. Barney T. Phillips, rector of the Epiphany, Washington, and the Rev. James D. Gibson of Covington, Kentucky.

Leadville, Colorado, used to be a thriving boom town in the old gold days. During that time St. George's church was built, a beautiful, great structure. Only have services occasionally now; but there is one service the people are always sure of, the Christmas midnight service, when Bishop Ingley goes up there. Practically the entire community turns out for the service.

All right, children, now someone tell me what is the matter with this: "St. Peter's Church, the Rev. Dr. Blank, rector, has just closed one of the most successful years in its history. Besides raising in cash and pledges $2500 for a new parish house it has paid its quota in full and presented a Christmas offering of $250, and closed the year with a substantial balance in the treasury." That item is before me now. Sometime, maybe, we can get the General Convention to give a Christian definition of the word "success."

Nothing said recently about parish and diocesan papers; will get at that in another week. Some wide-awake chairman of a summer conference should add a little course on the subject of publicity. Get a real newspaper man and let him tell the folks a few of the simple rules. There are rectors and parish secretaries who know how to write copy that an editor can hand to a linotype operator, but most of the stuff we get is written longhand, or, if typed, is single-spaced, and written on both sides of the paper. Also, most of it comes thoroughly padded with unimportant details that can be of no interest to anyone outside that particular parish. Don't get me wrong; I am very grateful for all the news that comes, regardless of the way it is presented, but it would be nice to have it right. Why not get Mr. Hobbs, executive secretary of the publicity department, to get out a leaflet on the subject?

STUDENT BODY, AUTUMN 1926

St. Margaret's School, Waterbury, Conn.

$300,000 for a New Building

Subscribed by citizens of Waterbury in one week ending December 2, 1926, under the direction of Ward, Wells, Dreshman & Gates.

Ex-Governor Charles A. Templeton, the Campaign Chairman, writes:—

"When a few of the older graduates of St. Margaret's School began agitating for a new building the Board of Trustees, composed of the conservative business men of Waterbury, were fearful of attempting such a prodigious undertaking, both from the standpoint of local apathy toward drives and the fact that St. Margaret's for more than half a century had been accepted as a matter of course.

It was only after conferring with your representative, Wayne A. Sarcka, that some of us began to believe that the thing could be done. His belief in the cause, enthusiasm, and all-round generalship convinced us that considerable money could be secured, but scarcely any of us were confident that $300,000 could be raised.

To the amazement of the Waterbury public and the gratification of those instrumental in starting the project, $302,306 was subscribed. The organization was unquestionably the strongest ever brought together in Waterbury.

Mr. Sarcka's management revealed to us a perfection in organization never before realized, and I have no hesitancy in saying that the campaign was a tremendous victory for the school, for Waterbury, and for the firm of Ward, Wells, Dreshman & Gates."

We shall be glad to confer with you concerning your Financial Problems. A conference costs you nothing.

Our Quarterly Bulletin "Financing Social Progress" gives further details and will be sent upon request.

PLAYING THE GAME

What God Do You Worship?

BY REV. G. A. STUDDERT-KENNEDY

A PARSON'S postbag brings him mixed samples of human nature —very mixed. I often wonder who invented the idea that it is easy to shock a parson; you might as well try to shock a policeman.

Anyone who had my postbag to deal with for a year would be past being shocked at anything at the end of six months. He would find there food for laughter—I have laughed until the tears rolled down my cheeks. He would find there food for tears, plenty of it. Sometimes he would find food for thought; he would have to put on his best thinking cap, pull up his socks, and get down to it hard.

An ex-sergeant of the Army wrote to me the other day saying that I was wasting my time and energy attempting an impossible task. I was trying to make the British people into a nation of saints, and they never would be saints, either in this world or in any other, for the very good and sufficient reason that they did not want to be saints, they wanted to be sportsmen.

As long as I worked on the saintly tack I might as well keep my breath to cool my porridge for all the good I was likely to do. He urged me to "come off it" altogether and start to preach "sportsmanship" instead of "sanctity."

"Get 'em to play the game," he said. "That's the stuff to give 'em, and cut all the saints right out."

JUST CANT!

Now that set me thinking. At first sight there seems to be a lot in it. To play the game is the ideal of every white man. But what game? What is the game of life, and what are the rules? To tell a man to play the game when he doesn't know from Adam what the goal is, what the teams are, or who's got the ball, is just cant. A lot of this sporting talk is cant, wind, and words without sense. Life is a great game, but no game is great enough to be life.

Golf is a great game, but the man who mistakes it for life, and thinks golf, talks golf, eats, drinks and dreams golf, sees bunkers in brooks, tees on tennis-courts, and hazards everywhere, is not a man but a maniac. Golf is his god, and it is not a big enough god to keep him sane.

THE GAME OF SELF

That is the trouble—little gods. You see, no man knows what game to play until he makes up his mind what god to worship. It all hangs on that. There are lots of little games and lots of little gods, and men try them one after another until they get sick of the lot, and then they are ready to die. None of the games are worth playing because none of the gods are worth serving; they sicken the soul in the end.

Some men worship themselves, and their game is beggar-my-neighbor, with no rules but the eleventh commandment: "Thou shalt not be found out." Sam Weller put their motto into immortal words: "Every man for himself and God for us all, as the elephant said when it danced among the chickens."

It is a popular game. Millions are playing it in commerce, in politics, in industry. They are sportsmen on the lowest level; they play their game, and play the devil with the world.

But most men, thank God, are a peg above that, they want to play for a team of some sort. But what team? Well, there are plenty to choose from.

THE COMMUNISTS

There are the Communists, for instance. Their team is their class, and their game is class war. It is a great game. There is plenty of excitement, and even a spice of real danger, if you play it hard enough. You can get into trouble with the police and get locked up. What more could any man want?

It calls for sacrifice, and deep down in his heart a man wants to give himself for something or somebody. It offers great rewards, a world where justice is the law and no man begs for bread. Of course, the rewards may not come off, but that is true of every game, it is no fun to bet on certainties. It is a popular game in Europe just now, and it is played in the East, and even in America.

Many of those who play it are sportsmen, but they play a rotten game, and if it became universal it would make an utter muddle of the world. It has played the deuce with Russia already, and we have not seen the end of that game yet. Class war is a bad game because the team is not big enough and the goal not high enough.

THE WAR GAME

Then there are the Jingo patriots. Their god is power, and their game is war. It is a great game this. I have seen some of it. Their team is the nation. That makes a powerful appeal. It is a poor man who would not die for his country. The call of country goes deep, deeper than reason. It strikes through the intellect and finds the instinct underneath. It is like the love of wife or child. There is much in it that is sublime.

The power of the call to war lies in the fact that it appeals to all that is good and much that is bad in human nature. But patriotism is not enough. War is a bad game. If we can't get rid of it, it will get rid of us. It is a bloody, barbarous, futile business. It is a bad game because once more the team is not big enough, and the goal is still too low.

There is only one team big enough to play for, and that is humanity; only one goal high enough to aim at, and that is the Kingdom of God on earth; and there is only one Captain fine enough to follow to the death, and He is the Nazarene.

That is where the saint and the sportsman meet. A true saint is one who not only knows how to play the game, but knows what game to play. Such as he are sportsmen on the highest level. We need them. We must have them. Nothing less will do. We need them in business, we need them in politics, we need them in the streets and in the council chambers of the world. Unless our educational system can give us saints they cannot save mankind.

We have plenty of clever men who play a clever game, but if it is a bad game the better they play it the worse it is for the world.

No, sergeant, it won't do. I am going to stick to my job. It is not only the man that matters, it is the game he plays; and the game he plays depends upon the god he worships. That is as plain as the nose on your face. There is no getting away from it.

The more intelligent men become, the more desperate is their need of God. Intelligence means power, and power can be misused, and will be misused unless men learn, not only to play the game, but to play the right game, under the right Captain, and for the right team—unless, that is, they become more and more not only sportsmen, but sportsmen on the highest level, who play God's game of life according to the everlasting rules.

WHAT THE BIBLE MEANS

An Article For Young People

BY BISHOP EDWARD L. PARSONS

THE Bible is an open air book. It belongs to the mountains and the seas and the fields. It is generous and big like these outdoor things. It begins with a great poem about the creation of God's world. It ends with what is really another poem which pictures this old world made over into a new heaven and a new earth, holy and glorious because God is the light of it and Christ its King. People who read and study the Bible aright ought to be big and brave and strong and generous people who love freedom and clean and fine things.

Let me try to tell you a little about it to show how and why that is so.

WHAT THE BIBLE IS

We always speak of the Bible as if it were one book but everyone knows that it is not. It is a library of sixty-six books or separate writings arranged on two shelves which we call the Old and the New Testaments. They are of all kinds: Collection of folk stories and traditions like Genesis, histories like Kings and Chronicles, poetry, sermons, codes of law, wonderful collections of wise sayings, letters and even love songs. In the book of Job we have one of the greatest dramas in the world. Ruth and Esther are what we would call today short stories with a purpose. In the four Gospels we have the account of the Supreme Life of human history. In fact no school course in literature would bring us to the reading of a greater variety of books.

Naturally we ask why they are all bound up together. The answer is that they tell us about God and the way in which He has made himself known to men through the Hebrew people and in Jesus Christ. Each book tells a part of that story. Together they give to Christians the knowledge of their faith and of the Christian way of life. The Bible contains the message which the Church has to bring to the world.

THE OLD TESTAMENT

It is a message which comes to us partly through the history and tradition of the Hebrews and partly through great men. It is completed in the Life of Our Lord. When the history of the Hebrews really begins, in the time of Moses about a dozen centuries before Christ, they were a wandering desert tribe, escaping from Egypt to find their freedom. They did not know much about God. They called him Jehovah. They believed he lived in the mountains and that in the wilds of Mt. Sinai he had given them the law. He was their God and the best God but he was not the only God. Other peoples and nations had theirs. All that is very clear if we read the stories in Exodus and Numbers and the book of Judges. The Old Testament tells us how God, like a great teacher, took this people, and gradually brought them to know that He is one God, the only God, and righteous and holy. It would be easier for us if the books of the Bible were arranged in the order in which they were written or something like that. We need some help to understand the right order. In general what we can do is to read the historical books and then as we read the others fit them in along the way at the dates given us in the helps found in the back of so many Bibles, or in the books written for just that purpose. We can then follow the story of these people and see how through all this time God was teaching them. The old traditions which we have in Genesis helped them to understand that God was the source of men's life, and was guiding their work. Their experience as a people with their enemies He used, to make them see that a nation must be righteous and faithful if it is to live. He guided the priest and kings to build up the law. He sent prophets or preachers like Elijah and Elisha and later their wonderful successors Amos, Hosea, Isaiah and the rest whose sermons we read in the books called by their names. He inspired poets who wrote the Psalms and wise men who gathered the popular proverbs together and added to them. God was always teaching, teaching until by the time of Our Lord there was no Jewish boy who did not know about the One righteous God and His purpose for men.

THE NEW TESTAMENT

Then came Our Lord and through Him men learned that God is more than a righteous God. He is our heavenly Father who cares for each one of us individually. The Gospels tell us that story; the Book of the Acts tells us how the Church began its work of teaching men about Christ and bringing Him into their lives to save them from sin and strengthen them to do good. The letters which follow tell us what the early disciples thought of Christ and the Christian life; and the Book of the Revelation at the end is a great vision, painted in oriental magnificence, of the conflict of good and evil and of the world made over under Christ's rule.

HERO STORIES

That gives some idea of what the Bible has within its covers for the world in general. But it has also much to help each one of us personally. It has a remarkable way of speaking to all kinds of people, old and young, men and women, boys and girls, rich and poor, learned and ignorant. Teachers, preachers, doctors, lawyers, bankers, mechanics, laborers have found in it the things they have needed. It reaches for example, close to the things which bulk large in our lives when we are boys. It is full of heroes and the stories of brave deeds. Joseph sold into slavery by his brothers is taken to Egypt and becomes the chief ruler under Pharoah. Gideon and his three hundred rout the armies of Midian. David, young and ruddy, goes single handed to meet the giant of the Philistines and slays him. Each one finds his strength and courage in God. It is for God and Christ that the heroes of the New Testament give their lives not in warfare but in what we today call missionary work. "We ought to obey God rather than men," says St. Peter to his judges when arrested and ordered to stop speaking. St. Paul's story is full of the highest and finest courage. In a little Church I know, some one has put up a bronze tablet which reads, "A tribute to Saul of Tarsus, St. Paul, the Knightliest and most splendid merely human character in history." I like that and when I read of his journeys and his hardships and persecutions and feel the power of his courage I come to think that it is probably true. That "merely human character" leads us to the chief of all heroes, Our Lord Jesus Christ himself. For 1900 years weak men have found strength through him to live and die with unflinching courage. Thus you will find in the Bible the inspiration and courage that come from those who have nobly lived and died.

Great Sayings

You will find too, a multitude of great sayings and noble passages which are good to learn and store one's memory with. "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." Could anything help us to value self control more than that. "I have fought a good fight," said St. Paul; and only the other day I read an article by a school boy of eighteen in which he said that a right minded boy wanted to feel that he was "fighting a good fight." That boy could certainly fight better because these words had sunk into his heart. "Blessed are the peacemakers for they shall be called the children of God." Every boy who intends to help in the great war against war wants those words of our Lord as his summons to duty. And so I might go on filling page after page with quotations but it is far better for each of us to make his own list, choosing those which help him most.

The Ideal

Or, again, the Bible brings us always face to face with that which takes so large a place in youth, the ideal. We sometimes think we are satisfied with things as they are, either the world or ourselves. But we are not. If we are any good at all we do want a better world. The Bible helps us to see it. All through the Old Testament men are looking forward. They are seeking something better. They are looking for God's Kingdom and God's King. They are seeking the greater freedom, bigger outlooks, lives built upon truths as eternal as "the mountains round about Jerusalem." Some people read the Old Testament and look backward. But the men who live in it or who wrote it never did. If we find their spirit we must always be forward looking men. In the New Testament the whole world of the best is ever before our eyes. All through his teaching Christ speaks of the Kingdom. All the early Christians are looking for the Kingdom. The last book in the Bible pictures the new heaven and the new earth. No one can understand the Gospels and not feel that he wants to be a crusader to go out and transform the world so that war and suffering and poverty and hatred and vice and greed may be done away.

Finally above all these ideals towers the great figure of the Christ, the Perfect Man. He is the goal of our life. His courage, faith, love and purity get hold of us as we read and study and we are never satisfied unless we are moving on towards that ideal.

Read and Study

Thus I have tried to tell you some of the things which the Bible may mean to us. There are many others. We can find them for ourselves and like them better because we do. But one thing we must always remember and that I speak of in conclusion. The Bible cannot really mean anything to us unless we read and study it ourselves.

We can find plenty of books to guide us to chose the best way to read it. We can get help from the clergy and teachers; but nothing will come of the help unless we ourselves do the work. If we do we shall find these high and helpful things. We shall find ourselves growing stronger and cleaner, more ready to serve others, greater lovers of freedom and all the beautiful things in God's world, more satisfied that we have found the best things in life.

We shall then discover the most important part of what the Church means when it calls the Bible the Sacred Scriptures and says it is inspired. It becomes really sacred to us because it helps us to find God and Jesus Christ. It is inspired because it brings to us power and strength and vision; that is, as has often been said, it is inspired because it inspires us.

TABOR COLLEGE

An Urgent Appeal

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

IT IS with much hesitation and some humiliation that I address the readers of THE WITNESS upon the situation at Tabor College, which is so dependent upon your good will and generosity. May I rehearse certain facts which I cannot forbear presenting to your notice.

I.

I have never seen a finer place of Christian fellowship than that which President Clayton has carried on in Tabor College in his efforts to cooperate with the Congregationalists in saving that institution, which was built up by the devotion of certain graduates of Oberlin in the early days. Situated in a part of Iowa where the Church has been known only with suspicion he has gained the affection and confidence of all the religious forces in the neighborhood.

II.

In an administrative way Dr. Clayton has carried the institution up to January 1st, meeting all of the obligations as they arose and assembling a devoted faculty which has done excellent work. On my occasional visits to Tabor I have been impressed with the earnestness and spirit of the student body in striving to reach a high ideal of education and religion. There is no group anywhere to whom it is a greater joy to preach.

III.

The situation is critical at this time because of the financial calamities which have come to the community which surrounds Tabor. In the past two years over three hundred banks have closed in Iowa. In the past two months the leading banks in three county seats adjacent to Tabor have closed. Last year the college was carried over December and January by a local drive. This year such an effort was unsuccessful because of the conditions surrounding this little college town. For this reason there are no funds with which to meet the January salaries.

IV.

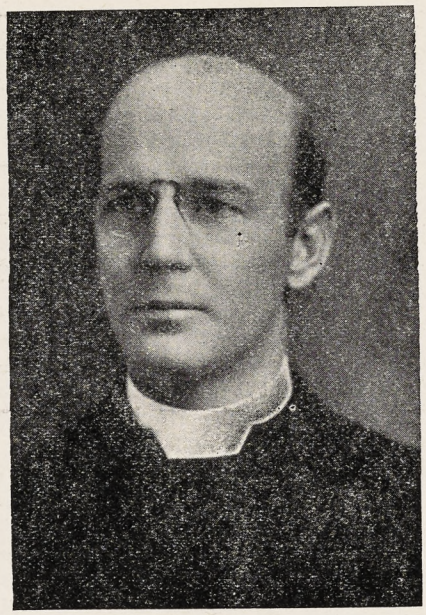
The Baptists have just made a grant of $20,000 to their college in Des Moines; the Congregationalists support generously their institution at Grinnell. The Methodists and the Christians (Disciples) give generously to their institutions in Iowa. Yet Tabor is dependent upon the daily mail for existence.

I am glad to be the editor of THE WITNESS and I have come to look upon its constituency in a personal way. You have never failed me yet in any request that I have made. If you fail me now I shall try to accept defeat gracefully, but I do feel sure that the readers of THE WITNESS are sufficiently interested in this attempt to carry an institution that has proved itself so worthy of support.

If you feel that way about it will you send at once to Rt. Rev. Irving P. Johnson, Insurance Building, Denver, Colorado, an offering, no matter what size, so that the aggregate of your generosity will carry the college over the month of January and into February. There are excellent prospects beyond that. But just now it requires that we give all together and lift this burden off Dr. Clayton's shoulders that he may carry on in the fight that he is making.

If you feel like helping do it now. It means some sacrifice for each one in order that the college may be pulled through this critical period.

Let's Know



HOW DO YOU FIND IT?

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

I AM wondering about the Salvation Army. How do you find it in your town?

Here in Eau Claire, where I live, the local branch of the Army has been holding services on Sundays at the same hours as the various churches in the city. They have organized their own Sunday School and appear to be operating as a full-fledged Christian communion. In the Year Book of the Churches, as published by the Federal Council, the Salvation Army appears in the table of statistics with its reported number of churches, ministers, members, Sunday School scholars, etc.

A couple of years ago one of their agents came to me for a bit of backing in their annual drive for funds. I laid these facts before him and added, "It looks very much as though the Army were converting itself into another denomination. This, of course is their privilege, if they consider it best for their work; but, as another denomination, why should they come to me for support? Moreover, insofar as they teach their people to be wholly contented with membership in the Army as their full Christian duty, they are, from my point of view, pursuing a perilous spiritual policy because the Army recognizes no Christian sacraments of any kind."

BISHOP OLDHAM
Crusades On the Coast

This particular agent was much surprised. He assured me that I was entirely mistaken and that he would put the matter before the proper authorities and secure an official correction. I never heard any more of it. Last year a very energetic woman came to town to put on their drive. She was not a member of the Army but was a free-lance promoter working on a commission. All told, she spent several hours in my office going over the same ground, insisting that I was all wrong and offering to pass it on to headquarters for a formal statement. Again, I never heard anything from it.

This morning the captain in charge of the local Army work addressed our Ministers Meeting. He stated that the Army was definitely engaged in building up its own membership. He said they recognized no sacraments but received members by signature of their Articles of War. He acknowledged that their charity work overlapped that of our Family Welfare Association and that they were developing plans to get from under the relief work and devote themselves strictly to religious activities. He figured that their own following could support the religious program and that, unencumbered by charitable responsibilities, they hoped to do away with their annual drives and finance themselves. When asked by one of those present if that did not constitute a new religious denomination, he rather reluctantly admitted that it did at least contemplate a definite religious organization.

I do not wish to appear critical of any Christian effort to do good. But when I learn that some of their enthusiastic members have endeavored to take a couple of my Sunday School children away to the Salvation Army school, where they will be taught the needlessness of sacraments as compared to a bass drum, I can't help but wonder why they should expect me to help raise money to undermine my own work. And where community chests are operated, I can't see why the Episcopal Church has not just as good a claim on a split in the appropriations as the Salvation Army denomination.

It seems as though the Army had cleverly capitalized an exceedingly limited but rather picturesque program of the last war and that post-war prosperity had stimulated its denominational ambitions. Am I right, or is this merely a local aberration? How do you find it in your town?

Cheerful Confidences

BUILDING A CONGREGATION

By Rev. George Parkin Atwater

AMONG the strenuous duties of my ministry has been the congenial task of persuading more than six hundred adults to be confirmed. In the interviews and conferences necessary for such a result I probably heard every difficulty concerning the Episcopal Church, that could arise in the mind of a normal person.

Having in my makeup an average amount of laziness, I sought a way to answer the standard difficulties without hours of talk. I found that about ninety-five per cent of the difficulties were common to all types of mind, and that only five per cent were special. So I wrote a book of twelve chapters which dealt with the usual difficulties. The literary form of the book was different from the usual presentation. It was in the form of a conversation in the Rector's study. The four persons who engaged in the discussion were a Doctor, who was the inquirer; a Judge, who was senior warden of a parish; a Major, who was a practical man; and the Rector.

But some alert and imaginative rectors have found a use for it which is exceptional and interesting. They have enlisted the aid of three men, and they have assumed the characters of the book, and have read it aloud to evening congregations, each man reading the portion assigned in the book to the character he represented. Many of the clergy have told me that they have used the book in this manner, and that it instructed their people. It has been used during Lent in some parishes in this way, as it takes six evenings to read it aloud in its entirety.

I am venturing in this column to pass the word along to the clergy and the laity.

The book achieved for me the result I desired. Instead of hours of talk, I now give the book to every person whom I seek for confirmation, and ask him to read it. If he does so, he has the equivalent to twelve confirmation lectures. This permits me to use the usual confirmation instruction hours for advance work.

It may be interesting to my readers to know that the occasion which was the immediate cause of my writing the book, was the visit to my study of five young business men, who desired to know what the Episcopal Church had to offer them and their families. They had voluntarily sought me, with their request. I spent twenty hours with them and their wives, in instruction and discussion. They were all confirmed. With that experience fresh in my mind I wrote the book. This was a few years ago. Today four of the five men are vestrymen of a parish, and the fifth is a regular attendant.

Those twenty hours were well spent.

About Books

By Rev. Charles L. Street

Early Days at St. Mary's. Rev. C. L. Leffingwell. Morehouse, 1926. $3.00.

Early Days at St. Mary's is a collection of stories, letters, verses, testimonials and clippings concerning St. Mary's School of Knoxville, Illinois. The Rev. C. W. Leffingwell, founder of the School and its rector for many years, is the author, and although he has written in a modest vein he is the veritable hero. Dr. Leffingwell gives a vivid and colorful picture of the pioneer days. The account of the fire probably told for the first time in detail is a thrilling tale. Every "old girl" (the name given to all those who have attended St. Mary's), will want a copy of this book.

Vera Noyes.

The Birth of the Divine Child. Walter Lowrie. Longman. $1.00.

In this Christmas sermon the rector of our American Church in Rome traces the connection between the Christmas story and certain other prophecies of the coming of a saviour for the world in literature other than the Jewish. His text is that passage from Virgil's Fourth Eclogue (read, we discover, by Constantine, to the bishops assembled at the first council of Nicea) which so amazingly parallels the prophecy in Isaiah, 11:6-9. He cites the Epiphany story—the wise men from the East who learned of the coming of the Saviour from the stars. All these prophecies, he believes, go back to "a well nigh universal myth of a divine Sun Child." In the brief compass of this sermon it is not possible for Mr. Lowrie to follow his interesting speculation very far, but he writes from a wealth of classical knowledge, and makes suggestions which might well open doors to further study.

Richard Green Moulton. W. Fiddian Moulton. Macmillan Co.

"If you would be a great man, read the biographies of great men. If you would be a good man, read the biographies of good men." Thus says the sage—and as usual, the sage is right.

Richard Green Moulton was a man both great and good. He is best known as the compiler of the Modern Reader's Bible. He took his degree in classics at Cambridge in 1874, and from that time on his chief interest was in bringing the rank and file of the people to an appreciation of the riches of the world of literature. For the next fifteen years he was among the leaders of University Extension work in England. In 1891, on a visit to America he met William Rainey Harper, who was at that time about to accept the presidency of the University of Chicago. President Harper persuaded Dr. Moulton to return to Chicago for the academic year 1892-3, and the long and short of it was that he settled in Chicago and taught at the University for twenty-seven years. His broad scholarship and his genius as a teacher played no small part in moulding the destinies of that university. This memoir by his nephew not only provides a fascinating story of Dr. Moulton's life and work, but throws some interesting side-lights on the early days at the University of Chicago.

Crusade Follow-Up

DESIGNED as follow-up material to the Bishops' Crusade, Bishop Johnson is now writing a series of six articles on Spiritual Values and Religious Standards. The articles are written with lay members of the Church particularly in mind, and it is hoped that they will serve as useful material for Lenten Adult Study Groups. The articles will run during Lent together with other Lenten features. Plan now to take a WITNESS Bundle; a number of copies to one address at three cents a copy.

BAA-LAMBS

By Rev. A. Manby Lloyd

Dame Madge Kendal addressed the men's meeting at Whitefield's Institutional Church, a special collection being made for the fund devoted to the Christmas treat which the men give annually to 600 of the poorest children in St. Pancras. In the course of her remarks on the manners and modes of today, Dame Madge Kendal said: "We must not give ourselves up to too much amusement, although I agree with amusement, of course, because I earned my livelihood that way, but I would not think myself of doing anything in the theatre that I knew would not appeal to one good woman, and we must be like that in every profession. The British public's good sense ensures the tone of the theatre. It is very good now, and we give you a great deal for your money—a great deal too much, I think—but what I mean is that it is in your power to make it what it should be." She thought, however, that our British Sunday was becoming a little too lively, and dancing was becoming today something of a disease, for everybody was dancing, "if you can call it dancing," she exclaimed. "I think it is walking about in strange positions."

"We are getting too much like baa-lambs in following one another," continued the speaker. "I never meet a woman of any class anywhere today without pearls on her neck. Oh. I am so tired of pearls! And they always dress in the same way, so that I cannot recognize any of my friends at a glance. They wear hats coming right down to their eyebrows and pulled well over on the back of their heads, very much like the pictures of coal heavers' hats that Leech used to give us. And they all have such short skirts. I do not know what the poor darlings will be like when they are fifty. At a college one woman said she could not be a Victorian because she would have to wear a real flannel petticoat. I told her that the Victorians wore flannel petticoats to keep their brains warm."

"If I had been the Prince of Wales I could not have been more generously entertained," said the Dean of Chester when he arrived in Liverpool after his three months' tour in Canada and the United States.

"The whole thing has been smoothed over, and the officials were very considerate."

London's famous "wireless church," St. Martin-in-the-Fields, Trafalgar Square, is being taken over by Canon William Patrick Glyn M'Cormick, D. S. O., vicar of Croydon.

The Bishop of London has cabled his approval of the new appointment from Shanghai.

For twelve years the living has been held by the Rev. H. R. L. Sheppard, who has resigned through ill-health. Mr. Sheppard's first congregation numbered twenty, but of late years he has preached to a crowded church. St. Martin's at night has been open as a refuge for the homeless of both sexes, and for some time the evening service has been broadcast by wireless all over England.

I regret having to announce the death of a dear friend, who might aptly be described as the last of the Tractarians, for he was a pupil of Pusey and a friend of Liddon. I refer to the Rev. William Lowndes M. A. of Keble, Oxford, formerly vice-principal of Ely Theological College and a missionary in Nassau. He has died of blood-poisoning while wintering in Florence. It was his firm conviction that Rationalism, Modernism, etc. were undermining not only the Church of England in general but Anglo-Catholicism in particular, and he spent his last few years in delivering speeches and writing pamphlets which have become notorious; he fought with gloves off, he took no quarter, and gave none.

Famous English Woman Preacher Gives Her Ideas on the Life That Is to Come

LOVE ALONE REAL

Miss Maude Royden has been setting forth her views on the question of perennial interest to the human mind: What shall we do and be on the other side? She believes that will always remain a secret, and hopes nothing from Spiritualism. Speaking of the difficulty we all have of conceiving a future life apart from our bodies, she says that we can't think of ourselves except in the surroundings of time and space to which all our known experience has accustomed us. But, though she does not at all expect that we shall ever penetrate the Great Secret until we go in our own person to find out, she most confidently expects that we shall go, that there will be something to find out, and that our spirits do survive the great change which we call "death." She cannot rule intelligence out of the universe, and it is from that point that her belief in personal immortality begins. She asks: "What reason or what sense is there in developing my personality up to the point I have now reached, only in order to put me out like a candle? What is the sense of allowing humanity to develop up to the point it has reached, where it can desire immortality, and then leave it baffled and futile? . . . God cannot be an idiot! Nor, therefore, can our lives be 'a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.' No idiot could have made this universe; no idiot could have evolved humanity up to its present point. Would it not take an idiot to destroy it at this point? And is not death—if indeed we die—destruction?"

Miss Royden is confident that there is not only Mind behind the universe, but Love. She believes that what will happen on the Other Side is very much what has happened here. "I expect to go on," she says. "Indeed, I expect to find myself further on by the mere fact of being released from my body. I hope to take with me all those experiences, and the lessons they have taught me in my life here, which have been real experiences. I do not expect to remember or to take with me things that did not touch me very much—useless lumber of the mind and spirit. I do expect to take with me those things that have been real. Love is the most real thing in the world, and I therefore do not believe that any real love that I have either given or received will pass out of my life in the next world."

Bishop Oldham to Be the Chief Crusader in the Dioceses of the Pacific Coast

MEXICO

By Bishop Stevens

The intensive week for the Bishops' Crusade in the Missionary District of San Joaquin is now under way. In Los Angeles Bishop Oldham will begin his mission at St. Paul's Cathedral on February 13th. In addition to Bishop Oldham, the Rev. B. T. Kemerer and Miss Emily Tillotson, the National Commission has assigned Bishop Thomas of Wyoming to Los Angeles.

One of the stimulating experiences of my Christmas was attending the entertainment for Merchant Seamen at the Seamen's Church Institute at San Pedro. A turkey dinner was provided and Christmas boxes were presented to all the men. From July 1, 1925 to June 30, 1926, 127,638 seamen visited the Institute; 12,693 letters were received for seamen and 6,549 letters written for them. Money deposited by seamen for safe keeping amounted to $13,509; 6,305 men were given lodging, and a regular schedule of services is maintained. The Seamen's Institutes are among the finest enterprises sponsored by the Church. There are fifteen of them in all, of which that at San Pedro is the fourth in size. The Rev. Harold H. Kelly is in charge of the work.

The Mexican situation has been the subject of considerable discussion in Los Angeles. In the latter part of November there was held the first of a series of lectures for the purpose of "acquainting Americans with the violation of religious liberty now being perpetrated south of the Rio Grande." Mr. Joseph Scott, prominent Los Angeles attorney denounced the "Mexican ejection of representatives of the papacy" and as a result received a challenge to debate the question with Mr. Jose W. Kelly (the wires seem crossed on these names) who is general delegate of the Mexican Federation of Labor. Mr. Scott stated that he would take no notice of the challenge and that Mr. Kelly could appeal to the courts.

The chief Crusader for Idaho will be Bishop McElwain of Minnesota, who is to hold an intensive mission in the Cathedral at Boise. Dean Paul Roberts of the Cathedral is preaching special preparatory sermons on the Christian Life and is also conducting a series of personal conferences in small groups. "It is most important," writes the Bishop of Idaho, "that all of our people bear the Crusade in mind and pray daily that it may result in a great awakening among our people."

For a number of years the Los Angeles Russian congregation has worshipped in the chapel of the Neighborhood Settlement. Two Russian bishops have recently visited the congregation and their visitations were marked by services of great solemnity and elaborateness. It is a satisfaction to the diocese of Los Angeles to provide a place of worship for this group of people, many of whom are persons of great distinction—former officers, musicians, artists and public officials.

I have just read Mr. Reginald Wright Kaufmann's article on the Orthodox Church in the January number of The Forum. Orthodoxy seems to lose all its sweetness and charm when interpreted by an Occidental adherent (Mr. Kaufmann being a member of the Eastern Church). For smugness and assurance his article exceeds anything that Protestant fundamentalism or Roman ultramontanism has ever produced. I am glad that I know Orthodoxy from personal contact with its clergy and laity, rather than from the pen of Mr. Kaufmann. It may be all that it claims and its members may think as he thinks, but they use a decent reticence—and they never sneer.

The California Congress of Religious Education recently held in Los Angeles was a success, perhaps not from the point of view of numbers, but certainly as far as the excellence of the addresses were concerned. The speakers included representatives of the various California colleges, many of the clergy of all denominations, including two Roman Catholic priests and two rabbis,

TEN years ago the following item appeared in this paper: Two subscriptions of $100,000 each and others aggregating more than $52,000, making a total of over a quarter of a million dollars, have been contributed in the diocese of Long Island toward the Church Pension Fund. Bishop Lawrence addressed a large company of clergymen and laymen at a luncheon at the Hamilton Club, Brooklyn, on the 25th, arousing deep interest in the Fund.

Bishop of Washington Says That Spirit of Jesus Is Lacking in Our Diplomatic Relations

HITS IMPERIALISM

By Rev. William B. Spofford

The Bishop of Washington, Dr. James E. Freeman, in his closing sermon of the Bishops' Crusade in New York assailed us for allowing our diplomatic relations with other countries and our own domestic laws to be dictated by business interests. "We are very much the worshippers of the gods of things as they are. Our Crusade is being carried on as a wholesale manifestation of discontent and dissatisfaction. This is no time for men to talk smoothly. Issues of today are greater than in any age of recent history and do not leave us in a position for a spirit of ease and contentment. This is no time to say 'America is great and puissant, surrounded on two sides with oceans and opulent with power.' This is not time to extend material boundaries. We should extend the boundaries of God."

If any of you are interested in the Mexican and Nicaraguan situation I suggest that you send to Bishop Paul Jones, Fellowship of Reconciliation, 383 Bible House, New York City, for a recent statement that that society has issued on the matter. I am told by those who know a great deal about such matters that it is a very fair statement, and it has the virtue of being stated exceedingly briefly.

I try not to bring my own special interests into this column too much, but I must say another word about that New York strike about which I wrote last week. The committee of a hundred, organized by men representing the churches, was successful in persuading several of the manufacturers to state their case before a group of impartial people the other evening. The workers also had their side presented by their union representatives. It was one of the most interesting meetings that I have ever attended; worth, in my judgement, a dozen pow-wows where people come together to make speeches at each other and pass resolutions. Here was the old war between the classes, stripped of the fine phrases that professors throw about it. Too soon to say what will come of it; some of us hope that peace will result. In any case if nothing further comes of it, it can be said that the churches accomplished a great deal in bringing the warring camps together for this meeting. When folks tell me that the Church is stupid and slow and afraid,

The daily papers have a tremendous advantage over us. Here comes a pretty picture of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, showing the architect's final design with the new tower. One is about to send it off to have a nice halftone made at a cost of ten iron men, when the dailies blossom forth with the picture on their front pages. And I suppose that by this time the Sunday picture sections all over the country have reproduced it. So we lose out—save the $10—there is a bit of consolation in that. Anyhow the Cathedral is completely Gothic in design now, and everyone seems to think that it is going to be a lot nicer.

Delaware had a banner year in 1926; the amount pledged toward the deficit of the National Council which Bishop Cook pledged at the General Convention, was paid; quota to the Church Program for the year was paid in full; the diocese maintained its missionary work more generously than ever; and a nice balance remains in the bank to carry on diocesan activities at the start of 1927.

What becomes of choirboys? Now there is an interesting question to ponder over. What of the boys that have been in your choir in years gone by? A gentleman from Springfield, Ohio, took the choir of Christ Church in the year 1900 and sent to F. P. A., the famous writer of the New York World, the following score sheet; (1) studied music in Europe; (2) to Germany for the same purpose; (3) joined a minstrel show; (4) joined Ringling's Circus; (5) Ralph Wetmore, solo violinist of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra; (6) "Dumpy" Taylor does an act in vaudeville; (7) Orin Dudley is a soloist in a New York parish; (8) Francis MacMillan; (9) Bobby Clark of the team of Clark and McCullough; (10) Barney Phillips, the rector of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C. (They had him down as rector of a Philadelphia parish in the World; brother, 'taint been so for several years now.) This has all the ear marks of a new game. I'll play if you want to, but I'm not urging you since none of you sent me any Famous Sons of the Clergy.

Bishop Creighton writes of interesting developments in Church life in Mexico. Here is a paragraph: "Last week, Mr. Orihuela (rector at San Jose) received a visit from a man from a village in the state of Puebla, bearing a letter from the people of the town, inviting him to come and hold service in the Roman Church. Mr. Orihuela explained once more our position and told this good man that we were not Roman Catholics and could not accept the invitation; and to his surprise the man said that he knew all about us, knew who we were and what we stood for, and that the people of the village had decided to become members of our Church; and wanted to turn the Roman church

Annual meeting of the Church Mission of Help in New York last week. Mrs. L. Frederic Pease, secretary, traced the history of the organization from a small beginning in 1909 to a society that is now organized in fifteen dioceses, and is doing unusually fine work for wayward girls. Mrs. John M. Glenn, national president, said that the next step was to secure a trained man executive who would handle the boys and men involved in the problems of girls under their care. It was with regret that the organization accepted the resignation of Mrs. Pease who has served as secretary for eleven years. She is to move from New York in the Spring, when the resignation becomes effective.

Grace Church, Cleveland, is made up entirely of working class people. In 1925 they called the Rev. Brinley Abbott to be their rector; paid him $1800 a year, and handed him a debt of $800 to start going on. In November of that year they improved their parish house, spent $3000 to do it, the men of the parish giving their labor free. In January of last year the rector got $300 raise. In August, 1926, they remodeled the rectory at a cost of $4,750; in October they installed a beautiful organ, made by A. J. Schantz, Sons & Co. of Orrville, Ohio. And now the other day they boosted the rector to $3000 a year. Not a professional man in the congregation; all mill workers, which is perhaps a bit of a sidelight on the much discussed question, The Church and Labor.

At the archdeaconry meeting held in Harrisburg, Pa., last week a resolution was passed unanimously calling upon the government of the United States to keep out of Mexico; "problems of Mexico are solely and purely the domestic affairs of the Mexican people." Miss Laura Boyer was over there too, conducting a class for the women who met the same day. Busy person, Miss Boyer; she generally figures in the news four or five times every week.

They always have a fine Christian Festival service at St. Katharine's School, Davenport, Iowa, as soon as the girls get back from their vacation in January. It is a service adapted from that used at the Cathedral at Truro, as arranged by Archbishop Benson. It consists of nine lessons, each lesson followed by the appointed Benediction from the monastic Matins office. Each Benediction in turn is followed by the singing of a Christmas Carol appropriate to the lesson. The lessons at the service this year were read by Dean Marmaduke Hare, and the Benedictions were given by the Bishop of Iowa. The Carols, beautifully sung, were by the St. Katharine's choir.

Rheumatism
A Remarkable Home Treatment
Given by One Who Had It

In the year of 1893 I was attacked by Muscular and Sub-Acute Rheumatism. I suffered as only those who are thus afflicted know for over three years. I tried remedy after remedy, but such relief as I obtained was only temporary. Finally, I found a treatment that cured me completely and such a pitiful condition has never returned. I have given it to a number who were terribly afflicted, even bedridden, some of them seventy to eighty years old, and the results were the same as in my own case.

I want every sufferer from any form of muscular and sub-acute (swelling of the joints) rheumatism, to try the great value of my improved "Home Treatment" for its remarkable healing power. Don't send a cent; simply mail your name and address, and I will send it free to try. After you have used it, and it has proven itself to be that long-looked-for means of getting rid of such forms of rheumatism, you may send the price of it, One Dollar, but understand I do not want your money unless you are perfectly satisfied to send it. Isn't that fair? Why suffer any longer, when relief is thus offered you free. Don't delay. Write today.

"Our quota is not a large sum in itself," writes Bishop Carson from Port au Prince, in a note accompanying the final payment on Haiti's quota, "but if you knew the economic condition and the real poverty of the people making the offering, its significance would be felt immediately. It has come in coins of the value of a fifth and even a tenth of a cent, and from all parts of the field. As the people are largely dependent upon their coffee in order to make this offering, and as this crop does not mature until Fall, we seem to be slow in making our payments to your office. Our interest, however, is sustained throughout the year in everything that touches the work of the Church. The annual Convocation of the District will meet January 10th, and it will give me the greatest pleasure to tell them that again they have paid 100 per cent of what was pledged a year ago."

Good idea paragraph. Couple of weeks ago we printed a letter under this heading in which it was contended that a leaflet explaining our services, and how to use the Prayer Book, should be distributed in the pews for the benefit of strangers. One such leaflet, very beautifully printed and well gotten up, has come from the Redeemer, Chicago. I am not authorized to do so, but that seldom matters with editors; put two or three stamps in an envelope and send it to the Rev. Alfred Newbery, 56th and Blackstone Avenue, Chicago, for a copy. He is a great booster for missions; we'll give him a chance to exercise that spirit by sending this leaflet to the corners of these United States. Bet he will have his wife do it at that.

and the reconciliation of faith and modern learning. These matters are dealt with in three books—'A Parson's Defense,' 'Christianity According to St. Luke,' and 'A Large Room'. All of these books are marked by a firm and intelligent grasp of the essentials of Christianity and Churchmanship, great candor and openness of mind, and—what has helped to commend them to a wide circle—a lively wit and a sense of contact with actual human beings and their problems. Another book, 'God Save the People' is in the press.

"Mrs. Carpenter has had much experience of work among women and girls. She is a member of the Central Committee of the Mothers' Union and the Girls' Friendly Society. She has been a very successful producer of Nativity Plays, having for many years filled the Guild hall at Cambridge night after night with her play 'The Christmas Mystery'; she has also produced religious plays with great success in the Cathedral at Manchester. Mrs. Carpenter is an effective speaker with a wide range of interests and knowledge of human nature, and she faces problems in a fresh way. She can speak on 'The Modern Girl,' 'Marriage Problems,' 'Prayer and the Devotional Life,' 'The Rising Generation in English Towns,' 'The Sunday Kindergarten,' and other topics."

In an editorial in the Mission Herald, the diocesan paper for North Carolina, the Rev. G. F. Cameron pays a great tribute to the late Eugene V. Debs. The words of Debs, quoted in the statement on the social gospel issued by a number of clergymen recently, Mr. Cameron says, portray the mind of Christ and contain an unescapable charm and grace. The paragraph quoted from Debs is as follows, "Years ago I recognized my kinship with all living beings, and I made up my mind that I was not one bit better than the meanest of the earth. I said then, and I say now, that while there is a lower class I am in it; while there is a criminal element I am in it; while there is a soul in prison I am not free." The words were uttered by Debs while on trial for treason.

CULTIVATING VIRTUES

Several Practical Suggestions

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

THE average American doesn't want anybody else to pay his grocery bill or his funeral expenses. We have a national passion for leaving enough to pay for our own obsequies.

On the other hand Americans do not object to having some one else pay for their cigars, their taxes and their religion.

It seems to be the distinguishing mark between being a pauper which we do not like, and having a graft which we rather enjoy.

It is, however, one of the specific injunctions of our religion that we should not only bear our own burdens, but also carry the burdens of other people who are not so able to bear them fully.

The Gospel of Christ never seems to me to have been intended to save the souls of selfish people in order that they may go on eternally in their selfishness; but rather to test out men's magnanimity and to invite the generous and the chivalrous to dwell with the Lord Christ in the abodes which He has prepared for us.

One just cannot associate Christ with meanness or stinginess or offishness.

And yet that is what ministers have to look out for in their own lives and exhort their people to avoid in theirs.

Somehow we are apt to spend so much of our time and energy in attacking sin that we do not take enough time to cultivate virtue.

The Bishops' Crusade seems to me to have been undertaken for the purpose of calling upon each Churchman to assume his burden cheerfully and to go on his way joyfully.

Here we are, a household which has been enjoying fine buildings, lovely music and delightful fellowship for so long a time that we have grown too contented to fight.

It is a great privilege to be a member of the Episcopal Church and to enjoy all the riches which have come down to us from the spiritual treasury of our forefathers.

And it is a great joy to walk in her ways of pleasantness and to pursue her paths of peace.

But it has its dangers. We are apt to forget that we have two responsibilities—one is to find the peace of God and the other is to bring others into the home atmosphere which we enjoy.

The Bishops' Crusade meant just this: that those who have been selected as your spiritual leaders, have asked you to face outward from your home and to go forth in quest of friends. A Crusade is an intensive effort to accomplish something through the co-operation of all. It seems to me to place upon us certain individual obligations which we cannot assume or shirk, but which we ought to welcome as opportunities.

So many of us have expressed the wish from time to time that the Episcopal Church were more aggressive. Of course none of us have a right to say this unless we are willing ourselves to be aggressive when the opportunity comes.

We feel too conspicuous to do very much as individuals. We want to do it all together. The Crusade was a call for concerted action. It is like the call for volunteers to go forth on a disagreeable task. It is expected that every good soldier will step forward and volunteer his services.

No one ought to want someone else to do that particular piece of work which is his own sphere of responsibility. Every man ought to want to pull his full share on the oar.

What are we asked to do?

First, to answer to the roll call.

In various parts of the country during these first months of the year, a week of special services and instructions is being observed. The least that we can do is to be present in order that we may receive our general orders. I should think that all Churchmen would feel responsible for that week, whenever it is, and set it aside to listen in.

If God has something for you to do it would seem reasonable that He would give you the signal then and there. At least if you want to do something it would be very reasonable to ask at that time for light and guidance.

It is a time such as the Lord frequently invited His apostles to utilize—to come apart and rest awhile with Him. It is a time to catch the spirit of co-operation in spiritual effort. It is not merely that as Christians there is something for us to do; it is also that we need to be endued with power from on high that we may do it graciously and effectively.

I do not expect that God is going to give us heroic tasks so much as he is going to give us obvious duties.

In talking with young men I notice how they think in quantitative ways about the thousands who are indifferent and the millions who are without. In studying Christ I am impressed with His care of the individual, however obscure and however misled. So many of His efforts were over a single person and so much of His time was spent in avoiding crowds.

I would like to see the Bishops'

Crusade awaken all the strength of this Church to three things:

First, I am a workman. I do not want to be ashamed. Let me do my full share and proportion of the labor expected of us all.

Second, I have a friend, a neighbor, a child, a dependent, a lonesome person, someone in distress or misfortune. I am to be to that person that which I believe Christ would be if He were in my place.

Third, I am a child of God whose mission is to find someone whose candle I can light and whose darkness I can illuminate. If each individual Christian in the United States who is capable and able would be a light to one person in need or trouble, and would be to that person a constant strength, in season and out of season, we would not need any organized charities The Church of Christ would fulfill its mission.

We haven't time to do this because we fill our time so full of other things. No one is more sympathetic with the joys of her children than Mother Church. She is a lenient and kindly mother. The more shame if we impose upon her kindness and fail to do that which we would most assuredly do if she drove us to it. Her call ought to be imperative.

The Bishops' Crusade was organized to provide us with a time and a place and an opportunity for God's Holy Spirit to find us assembled together with our whole nature attuned to hear His voice, and to do His will.

INTO CHRIST'S FLOCK

As A Soldier and Servant

BY CANON JAMES ADDERLEY

WHEN I, John Manson, was in the hospital at Boulogne I used to read and I used to think. I remember Dick Something in the next bed saying that he had no "use for religion." He said this just after the Padre had been going his rounds. Well, I asked myself whether I had any use for religion, and I began to try to answer that question, and I have gone on thinking about it ever since. I still have not got a complete reply. I don't suppose any of us have or will have until the Judgment Day, if there is one. I am going to write down what I think I have found is, or ought to be, the use for religion in an ordinary man's life.

We will begin at the very beginning. Shakespeare says, "At first the infant, mewling and puking in the nurse's arms." That is all he has got to say. But the Church, if you read the Prayer Book, has got a lot more to say and to do about the infant.

Padre lent me a Prayer Book and there I read over, just for fun to pass the time, what, according to the Baptism service, had been done with me when I was at the mewling stage of my existence. Apparently on a certain day, the date is in the Register at Bagminster Church, my father and mother brought me to the parson. With them there must have been two godfathers and one godmother, though I don't know who they were. The parson had a lot to say to God on that occasion. He seems to have thought that there was a good deal more for me to do than mewl. At any rate I was worth doing a lot to in view of my future life on earth and even in the next world. I like that expression, "passing the waves of this troublesome world." Through the hospital window I could see the ruthless waves of the channel and my life has been rather like that. It is not calm yet. Now to me it is rather jolly to thing of the old Church bothering herself about me and these troublesome waves that I was likely to encounter. She took me on board her ship at the start of my life. My parents and these mysterious people, the godparents, had brought me to the Church. They consented to hand me over to her keeping.

Yet they did not wash their hands of me. The Church took good care not to let them off their responsibility. First of all she asked them a lot of questions to make sure they meant business and would see to it that I was brought up as a Christian. Now I am not going to say that my parents or the others have kept to their part of the bargain as well as they might have done. I fear they have not. The very fact that I don't know who my godparents are proves this. But I am finding a use for religion and I am assuming that everybody concerned does his part honestly. You don't find fault with a good machine which has been allowed to get rusty. You condemn the slovenliness of those who neglected it. If everything went right we should soon find a use for religion. All I want to say here is that, granted that the Church and the people concerned in my Baptism had all done their bit, there would have been a real use for religion at this earliest stage of my career. To begin with, I am jolly glad that my parents brought me to the Font and put me in the way of knowing the Christian religion. I have a neighbor now in my street who boasts that he will not send his children to Church, and that he wants them to find it all out for themselves if they like to do so when they grow up. I think this is hard on the kids. The odd thing is that my friend is not a blank materialist. He is not like the man next door to him who has no soul above betting and gambling. On the contrary, he is an artist and an actor. He believes, or says he does, in things "spiritual." Of course he must if he loves art and poetry and beauty generally. Now he does not mind putting his children in the way of seeing beautiful objects. He makes them read poetry and the best literature. He takes them to the theatre and the National Gallery. Why should he draw the line at religion? He has brought his children up in an atmosphere of beauty as regards furniture and a garden and pictures and books. But the most beautiful spiritual thing, the story of Christ or the atmosphere of the Christian Church which has inspired the saints, they must know nothing about. This seems to me silly on his part and almost cruel.

Christening a child is just the opposite way of going to work. My parents (without perhaps knowing exactly what they were doing, for we are all very badly taught about these things in this country) did anyhow present me to the Church. They put me down at the Font as Jesus, when he was asked who was the greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven, put a little child in the midst of the crowd and said: "That's the greatest." I think He meant that a little innocent child with all his life like a clean slate in front of him had the greatest chance of bringing about God's Kingdom. He was not as yet contaminated with all the humbug and beastliness of the world. Give him a chance. That's what my parents did. They gave me to the Church on spec. The Church is ready to help me. I shall have more to say about the Church some day. Suffice it to say that I look upon this Christening of mine as a very important thing. The Church claims every little human being as a soldier in the army of Christ.

I am glad I was put into this army to fight against all the bad things in the world and in myself. I became a part of Christendom when I was christened. The world should all be Christendom, that is under the rule of Christ. We shall never get right until it is. I don't care if you look at yourself or at society, at industry or politics, or home life or anything. The whole lot of it wants Christ.

Now I would make a lot more of these christenings if I were the Church. They should be no hole and corner affair. I should let everybody know that every little child baptized is being taken and put into a society which has for its object the christening of everyone and everything. I should have a grand service as they have with the other sacraments. Is there not something grand in this which the priest says after he has christened a little child:

"We receive this child into the congregation of Christ's flock and do sign him with the sign of the Cross, in token that hereafter he shall not be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ crucified, and manfully to fight under His banner against sin, the world and the devil; and to continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end."

Our Cover

WE like to select a nice cold day in February to run on our cover a tropical picture. This week it is of the Bishop, Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral at the Panama Canal Zone. The fifth from the left is Bishop Morris; the third, Dean Meredith, recently deceased. The laymen are notable leaders in Panama; Mr. Evans, senior warden, the assistant head of the medical division (with the cane); beside him Colonel Rigley; fourth, Captain Baird; sixth, Mr. Beverly, assistant head of the Panama railroad; seven, Dr. Curry, chief health officer of the Zone; eighth, Judge Blackburn of the Accon and Balboa municipal court, and Mr. Johnson, assistant manager of the American Foreign Bank.

When I talk like this to my mates, they say: "Supposing the whole thing's untrue, supposing Jesus Christ never existed, what becomes of all your high flalutin' language about the little child and the Kingdom and all that?"

I do not see it that way. Mark you, I entirely believe that Christianity is true myself. I agree with old Gladstone who said it was "the only hope for our poor wayward race." But for the benefit of my sceptical friend I say that at any rate, so far as I have gone in what I have said about Christening and the ceremony of Baptism, it makes a better beginning to a child's life than anything anyone else can offer. What can be better than that every child should grow up to know that at the very beginning he was claimed to belong to the highest and best, that he is bound to fight for the truth, that the rule of truth and beauty and goodness is that highest and best to which he belongs and for which he must strive all the days of his life? Don't call it "Christ" if you don't want to, but I venture to think it is better than the Communist dedication of a child, of which we hear, a dedication of a little innocent to the class war of hatred and malice and all uncharitableness. That is not the way to peace on earth and goodwill towards men.

THE AGNOSTIC QUEST FOR GOD

The Value of Meditation

BY MARGUERITE WILKINSON

THE quest might well begin with reading and meditation, for these require nothing in the way of a positive affirmation from the agnostic who is scrupulous about his mental integrity. Presumably he knows, being an unbeliever, the arguments against the truth of the gospel, the reality of Jesus, and the validity of Christianity. Mere fair-mindedness ought to suggest to him the value of considering the affirmative side of the argument. He will be willing to read of Jesus in the books of His friends, realizing, of course, that his own enemies and opponents never understand him so well as people who are sympathetic and interested in him. He will begin with that wonder-book, the New Testament, and if he reads it as all great literature should be read, quietly, thoughtfully, and in solitude, he may become certain, after a time, that the literal meaning of it, noble as it is, is never the whole meaning, but that a universal significance which can never be fathomed by our intellects working alone flows through it in a deep, hidden current from the beginning of things to the end, out of eternity into time and then into eternity again. I once heard a good man say, "These words are simple, but they are deep, deep as Heaven."

Then, if he will obstinately refuse all popular orthodoxies and such interpretations of them as seem to have been dictated to stenographers between committee meetings and manufactured into books, and seek out the writings of the great witnesses who, from the time of the New Testament until today have appeared again and again to testify for Christ with words profound, and sound, and eloquent, he will gradually perceive that this same deep current of hidden wisdom flows through their work too. St. Ignatius, the pupil of St. John, Clement of Alexandria and Origen his successor, St. Augustine, Jacob Boehme, George Fox, the superb Saint Teresa—these will have news to tell him if he will have ears to hear. So much for reading.

What do I mean by meditation? I mean a certain practice common enough in the Orient which, if introduced into strenuous American life, might save many people from nervous prostration, or at least from indigestion. I mean a process of holding an idea before the mind and under observation, of considering and reconsidering it until we have extracted as much of its meaning as we are capable of getting, and have made it our own. This does not at all decry or inhibit the value of other methods of thinking. The logical mental process that moves swiftly and keenly from thought to thought is valuable and necessary too, but in another way. This logical thinking should be used for the management of the external and practical activities of life. Perhaps that is why Americans, and indeed all Occidentals in general, have developed this method of thought. It seems to serve their purpose. But that is no adequate reason for the total neglect of another way of using the mind, a way which is chiefly valuable for the development of one's higher intuitions and powers.

If the unbeliever will consider and reconsider in this way any of the great experiences of Jesus, or of his witnesses and friends, he is likely to find out, sooner or later, that somewhere in his own nature there is a clue to such experiences, an echo and an answer to the words he is reading. The clue may lie deep under dust that the world has cast upon his holy things. The echo and the answer may be almost inarticulate at first. But his conscience is quite clear in discovering that they exist in him and for him since he has not yet committed himself to any creed. Perhaps he has not even prayed. Even St. Paul, with an admirable candor and sympathy which the clergy and others who talk with agnostics would do well to remember, said "How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed?" If the groping human mind touches God's mind even remotely, at first, through other minds of men who have really known Him, it is enough.

Perhaps the first prayer will be an unconscious aspiration, a mere reaching gesture. Perhaps it will be a sudden fiery realization burning up all doubt once and forever. Perhaps Our Lord will make the first prayer in the unbeliever and for him Himself and listen so quietly that the man is almost unaware of it. Perhaps He will come so near to the seeker in a quick and vivid moment that the whole human consciousness in him will suddenly awake and glow, making prayer inevitable. His way, the saints and prophets tell us, is never the same with any two souls. But when He has once been felt and perceived the candle of vision is lighted. It remains to follow Him into all truth, testing every bit of the way, if we wish, with all the powers we possess, but trying faithfully to do the will that we may learn the doctrine. As we find greater and richer experience and grapple with it, enlightenment goes on. And it may very well come to pass that the man who believed in nothing may learn to move mountains.

Cheerful Confidences

A FIELD FOR LAYMEN

By Rev. George Parkin Atwater

THERE is certainly something very optimistic in the effects of a good dinner. Nothing appears so certain as the energy of a group of laymen who are enjoying their cigars after a banquet, and are being inspired to great applause by an energetic speaker. The world is conquered before midnight. But the task of harnessing this energy to some useful work is another matter. It's like Niagara, a great spectacle, and enormous energy and lots of foam and rainbows in the mist, and gigantic power carried out to sea. No matter with what rosy visions the movement starts for a rally of laymen, it too often ends by asking each one to make a contribution to a fund to employ some one to do the work. There is a certain inevitable rotating movement observable in such meetings. I once attended four successive annual meetings of an organization. The business was about as follows. The minutes were read, and the treasurer's report. Then came an election. Then the new officers were welcomed by speeches. Then came along discussion as to where to hold the next meeting. Then a committee was appointed to enlist new members. Then a committee was appointed to arrange the details of the next meeting. Then the constitution was revised. Then somebody made a speech urging everybody to get to work, the work being largely to be more energetic in reporting promptly and in paying up promptly. And so on for a day or two. Then we adjourned, exhausted. We thought we had done a lot, but we hadn't done a tap!

BISHOP REMINGTON
Expects New Inspiration

If we are to develop our laymen we must have a perfectly definite task for each willing person to perform. That's a hard thing to arrange, but it's the basic thing. To try to inspire a group of men to work, when no clear task is definitely assigned, is as useless as urging the wind to blow. And to portray the needs of a field, without indicating the exact steps to help that field is as futile as urging a citizen to drop in at the school house on his way to work, and to reform our educational methods.

To employ a lot of exhorters to tell us our faults is no more necessary than it is necessary for the state to employ a man to think up numbers for automobile licenses.

Our laymen are awaiting exact instruction as to duties. It is true that they do not often like the thing most necessary, such as teaching Sunday School, or running a boys' club, or visiting the members. It's human nature to like a dinner, and listen to spell-binders, and catch visions. But the task of our leaders is to create a co-ordinated system of individual efforts, and to get a man to assume each task.

You laymen who have the interest of the Church at heart may help your rector by going to him and saying, "What's the job that you have the most difficulty with? I don't care how humble it is, how simple it seems, how remote from the public eye, let me do it." And when the rector tells you what it is. do not fade out, but tackle it. That's better than cheering at a dinner!

Let's Know

TWO SAINTS

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

THE memorial days of two "black letter" saints come this week—Feb. 3 for St. Blasius and Feb. 5 for St. Agatha. Our knowledge of both of these saints is fragmentary and mingled with traditional embellishments. However, they seem to have been real persons who gave their lives for Christ and are therefore worthy of Christian remembrance.

Blasius was a physician of the early fourth century whose Christian piety was so well known among the faithful that he was made bishop of Sebaste in Armenia. He was caught in the net of the Diocletian persecution after Constantine had released the Christians from their disabilities, but evidently before his merciful action had penetrated as far as Sebaste.

The saint had sought refuge in a cave when the Christians were being hunted down, but he was discovered by some sort of treachery. One old legend says that he cured an animal of its wounds and that other animals came to him in such large numbers that his hiding place was revealed. At any rate the governor sent soldiers after him and Blasius greeted them with the joyful announcement, "Let us go at once; today the Lord remembers me." The governor tried to induce him to recant saying, "Hail, Blasius, favored of the gods." But Blasius was not to be inveigled into any pagan entanglements. He boldly replied—"Hail, most noble prefect; but they are no gods, but devils." Whereupon he was beaten and had the flesh torn from his back with iron hooks. "Though my body is in your power, you have no power over my soul," he said. And he was beheaded along with his two children.

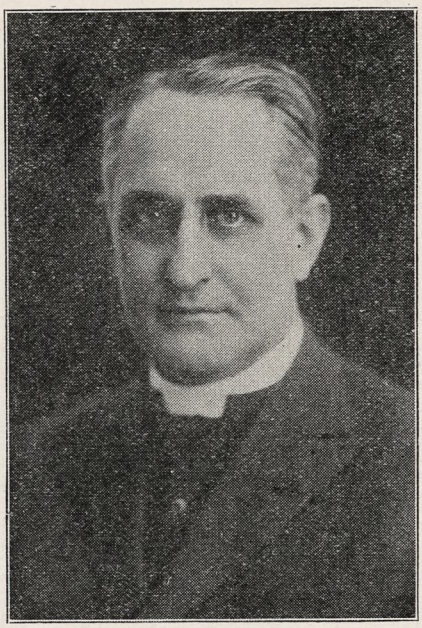
Quite a contrast is offered in the story of St. Agatha. She was a very beautiful young woman who came of a noble and wealthy family in Sicily. Quintianus, the governor, was infatuated with her beauty and paid his amorous respects to her. But Agatha turned him down without any compunction. Like any full-fledged villain, the governor gnashed his teeth over her refusal and resolved his questionable affection into violent hatred. If she would not have him, she should have nobody else. Of course, she wanted nobody else, for her life was consecrated to Christ. Quintianus ordered her up for trial (probably during the period of the Decian persecution) and demanded that she renounce her Lord. "He is my life and my salvation," was her calm reply. Threats and promises were alike ineffectual. "Your words are winds, your promises are vain," she said. Racked and tortured in a most unspeakable manner, she still remained constant. After four days spent in prison, she was subjected to further torture and died the death of a Christian martyr.



The two persecutions under Decius and Diocletian (250 and 304 A. D. respectively) represent the two great efforts of the powerful Roman Empire to crush Christianity out of existence. Other persecutions were local and spasmodic in character. The pagans seemed incapable of understanding Christianity. They would have been perfectly willing to worship Christ along with the large gallery of pagan gods and it irritated them to find the Christians so very exclusive in their spirtual allegiance. So they killed some Christians and thereby stimulated the vigor of the Church.

FAVOR NEW DIOCESE

A resolution approving the creation of a new diocese for Northern Wisconsin was passed unanimously at the convention of the diocese of Wisconsin held last week in Milwaukee. The proposal was submitted by Bishop Webb. The proposal will next be submitted to the General Convention next year when it meets in Washington, D. C. The Rev. Frederic Fleming, rector of the Atonement, Chicago, was the speaker at a Church Club dinner. He outlined the Bishops' Crusade plans and reported that the Crusade had created a great impression in Dallas, Tex., from which city he had just returned.

Pilgrim Souls

By Rev. Charles L. Street

A Soul's Pilgrimage. Charles F. B. Miel, D.D. Mitchell.

There was reviewed in this column last week the memoir of Richard Green Moulton, lecturer and teacher and editor of the Modern Reader's Bible. Dr. Miel's reminiscences, "A Soul's Pilgrimage," form an interesting contrast. Dr. Moulton in his life and work brought closer together England and the United States. Dr. Miel, born and trained in France, did something of the same sort for the United States and that country. And an item of special interest to the book editor of THE WITNESS—both men had a somewhat intimate connection with Chicago in its earlier days.

Dr. Miel was born in 1818. His early training was in the Roman Church. He went through the novitiate of the Jesuits, and was ordained, but never was professed in that order. Questioning the validity of the Roman position he went to the city of Rome, only to be disquieted by the pomp and arrogance which he found there. Seeking freedom to think through for himself his religious position he came to this country in 1855.

In his early days an admired teacher, Pere du Ravignon, gave him this maxim as a test for true doctrines, "All that tends to elevate the mind and enlarge the heart is true; all that has a contrary effect is false." Throughout his life, Dr. Miel felt, he was guided by these words. The book is characterized at the same time by a simple faith and an acute criticism. His faith in God and the mystic certainty of God's love and God's presence seems never to have deserted him. So different from many who have left the Roman fold he never lost his affection for what was best in that church, and he was ever grateful for his early training in the way of perfection. His criticism was directed towards its errors and its authority. Incidentally the book is a strong apologetic for the position of the Episcopal Church—an apologetic all the more convincing, because it is unconscious.

A Pioneer Family of the West. Asa Appleton Abbott. The Evangelical Press, Cleveland, Ohio.

This little book, published by Canon Abbott, is an account of his own branch of the Abbott family, and will be of interest primarily to the members of that family. But incidentally it paints a thrilling picture of pioneer days in Missouri. The Abbott family is a family, we would say, whose story is well worth recording—not only on account of its size (including grandchildren of all degrees of greatness there were living at the time of Mr. Abbott's mother's death in 1921 three hundred and fifty-seven persons who were direct descendants from her and her husband), but on account of the record of sterling Christian citizenship.

Preacher, Pulpit and Pew

By E. P. Jots

THIS story was sent to us by Mr. Frank A. Ellis of Denver, Colorado, who vouches for its truthfulness. A well known Pacific coast attorney, who prides himself upon his handling of Chinese witnesses, was defending a railroad damage case. Being a bit near-sighted he failed to notice that the clothing of this particular witness was a bit finer than that of the ordinary "coolie." Instead of following the usual questions as to name, residence, etc., the following dialogue ensued:

"What is your name?"

"Kee Lung."

"You live in San Francisco?"

"Yes."

"You sabe God?"

"Mr. Attorney, if you mean 'do I understand the entity of our Creator?' I will simply answer by telling you that on Thursday evening next I shall address the state ministerial association on the subject of the Divinity of Christ, and I should be very happy to have you attend."

When order was restored the examination proceeded on ordinary lines but to the day of his death this lawyer will never cease to be asked if he "sabe God?"

English Prayer Book Will Cause No Split

English Correspondent Calls All Talk of Split in English Church Newspaper Copy

THE ANGLO-CATHOLICS

By Rev. A. Manby Lloyd

The middle of January the House of Bishops of the Church Assembly met in Lambeth Palace to consider the final draft of the revised Prayer Book. They were engaged in this task for ten days, and on February 7th, at a joint meeting of the Lower Houses of the Convocations of Canterbury and York, the Archbishops will present the bishops' draft to the representatives of the clergy. "Views with alarm" in the papers and excursions with banners from then till March 4th, when the revised Prayer Book will be submitted to Convocation and the Sword of Damocles will have fallen. The Church Assembly will have no power of amendment, and Parliament must accept or reject it, lock, stock and barrel.

The crux will be the proposed new rubric governing the Reservation of the Blessed Sacrament. Till the Oxford movement woke the Bishops up the Protestant party had had it all their own way. Much ethical fervour was accompanied by shocking liturgical ignorance and discipline was unknown. While Lord Tom Moody's table was blazing with light and color and even the soup was consumed with reverence, the Lord's Table was cold and cheerless and people treated their communions as a badge of respectability or a legal obligation.

On this ungodly Philistinism the Puseyites dealt sledge-hammer blows. But it was too academic to move the multitude. Then came Charles Lowder, Dolling, Stanton, Adderley, Stewart Headlam, to lift the movement to the practical plane. If Pusey and Keble could come back the results would astonish them. But I am bound to express my own belief that the modern Anglo-Catholic school is not alive to the situation. The attack on doctrine and ritual has been repelled. The Protestant Die-Hards are a small but noisy body of people who no longer count. The people who do count are the Broad-Church, Modernist school, led by Dean Inge and Dr. Hensley Henson. It is Dr. Barnes who has got to be answered, not Kensit or Sir Thomas Inskip, who belong to the era of Guy Fawkes, Titus Oats and the Gordon Riots.

Anglo-Catholicism (horrid word!) is a new statement of religion and it needs a new philosophy as its foundation. We are back again in Greek and Roman times discussing the questions that Heraclitus and Plato, Arius and Nestorius brought to the front. We are arguing about Reality and Experience, about Spirit and Matter, about Being and Becoming. Our theologians have nothing to say to Bernard Shaw, Bishop Barnes and H. G. Wells. So it seems to me that we are wasting time in quarreling about dots and dashes in the Prayer Book. What the modern man wants to know is whether or not the Catholic religion is true? Is the Bible a forgery? Were the saints a fraud? The Anglo-Catholic answer seems to falter. They tell us the first is "evolved"; Bishop Gore says that the Bible, like the curate's egg, is "good in parts"; and we are all agreed that the saints were stupid people anyway, getting themselves slaughtered when they might have made a lot of money.

There is the usual talk of a split. There is nothing in it. A few non-entities will go to Rome, a few more will go to Geneva. But the bulk of people who call themselves C. of E. will be unmoved, and the mob will only want to know why Jiggs didn't play for Sheffield United in the big game of the season.

Chicago Citizens Praise Jane Addams

Cosmopolitan Gathering at Testimonial Dinner to Famous Hull House Founder

MAYOR DEVER SPEAKS

By the Rev. Irvine Goddard

On Thursday evening, January 20, 1927, there was given at the Furniture Club of America a dinner in honor of Jane Addams. Almost fifteen hundred persons were there and as many were denied admission because of the lack of accommodation. It was one of the most eventful occasions in the life of the City of Chicago.

There were hundreds of telegrams piled up on the speaker's table from all parts of the world, some of which were read by the charming and gracious Miss Julia Lathrop, who was presiding. There was also read a letter from no less a person than Calvin Coolidge in which he stated that he was very much impressed by the fact that Jane Addams had given her life and strength to the service of humanity. Speeches of appreciation were made by William Allen White, Judge Hugo Pam, Professor Merriam of Chicago University and the mayor.

Amid the prolonged applause which greeted Jane Addams when she rose to respond to these glowing tributes of affection and esteem, she was the embodiment of true humility. Like Moses of old "She wist not that her face shone." That was the secret of it. If she had been thinking about it her face would not have shone. As she stood there protesting that she was only a very simple person, wondering why all this fuss was being made over her and expressing her gratitude and appreciation for the tribute paid her, the unconscious radiance of a life which had utterly yielded to the will of God and the service of humanity, a life that had lost all thought of itself in doing its work, illumined her tired face with a "light that never was seen on land or sea."

The secret of that marvellous sympathetic unspoiled life lies first in this: The unpopular truths for which she has stood and has unwaveringly uttered, clearly, concisely, cogently, she first of all lived herself, so that she might certify to their reality in the depths of her own soul. Then, with the true intuitive and brooding wisdom that begets patience, she has stood back and let these truths go forth and find lodgement in the lives of men and women to accomplish their transforming and transfiguring results.

Churchmen Travel 270 Miles by Automobile in Order to Attend Service of Bishops' Crusade

MINIMUM STANDARD

By Bishop Stevens

Two hundred and seventy miles in a motor car to attend a religious service! During the intensive week of the Bishops' Crusade in Fresno, California, the Rev. W. E. Patrick, rector of Bakersfield, which is one hundred and thirty-five miles from Fresno, brought large groups of parishioners in automobiles just for the evening services. Other parishes sent delegates from a considerable distance. It was my privilege to serve as one of the Crusaders along with Dean Fleetwood of Salt Lake City and Miss Helen Magill of Pasadena. Under the direction of Bishop Sanford and Dean MacDonald, the preliminary arrangements had been made with unusual thoroughness and contracts provided with every phase of diocesan life. Dean MacDonald is a member of the National Commission on Evangelism.

A layman of St. Mark's Church, Berkeley, has worked out a key for self apportionment for gifts, religious and charitable. The following is a sample form for a family of four with two children in the Church School. Their income is $2,400.00 a year; debts on house, etc., amount to $3,000.00 on which interest at 7 per cent equals $210.00 per year; taxes and insurance premiums are $100.00 a year.

Family income		$2,400.00
Less interest on debts	$210.00
Less taxes and life insurance premiums	100.00	310.00
Balance on which to apply percentage		2,090.00
Contribution to Church, Community Chest Red Cross, etc. (Income tax allows 15 per cent)	15 per cent
Less 2 per cent for each dependent child (2 per cent multiplied by two)	4 per cent
Difference between items 5 and 6 to be applied to amount opposite item 4	11 per cent
Result of computation: 11 per cent of $2,090.00		229.90

The Churchmen of Marin County, California, are considering the possibility of having a model made of the "Golden Hind," the ship in which Sir Francis Drake came to California in 1579. As has been pointed out before in this column, this visit marked the first use of the Book of Common prayer in America. In December, 1577, Drake started out on a free-booting expedition, in which he passed the straits of Magellan, obtained rich treasure on the Pacific Coast of Spanish America, crossed the Pacific and returned to England by way of the Cape of Good Hope, arriving in 1580. This was the first English circumnavigation of the globe and resulted in the knighting of Drake on his own ship by Queen Elizabeth.

Bishops' Crusade Is Getting Huge Crowds Everywhere; Plans Under Way for Follow-up Work

GAMES

By Rev. W. B. Spofford

Occasionally sincere well-wishers, who do me the honor of reading what I jot down here, set up a modified cry for more dignity in presenting the news of such a venerable Church. They remind me that many of the sentences are without nouns, that split infinitives are frequent and that while I may be a faithful recorder of American as she is spoken on the sidewalks of New York, my paragraphs are hardly a credit to the Anglican communion which was established, among other things, to perpetuate correct English speech.

The best defense for such an indictment is an admission of guilt. I do appreciate criticism and take it seriously; so seriously in this case that I spent hours in the public library doing research work. I discovered that in the year 1923, the last year for which figures are available, there were printed 3,485,015,597 copies of magazines. That total does not include Sunday or daily papers. How much of the 24 hours in a day can we expect people to give to reading? An hour say? Now deduct the time spent on daily papers and books. How much time is left for these three and a half billion magazines? And how much time can we expect even good Episcopalians to give to a Church paper, in view of the fact that these three and half billion magazines glare at them from every news-stand, with poster covers of bewitching females who adopt various methods of beckoning to the passerby. THE WITNESS is a frail sheet to have to compete with their charms for a share of this hour, or less. I have therefore made it my mission as far as these columns are concerned to present news as briefly and as briskly as possible, figuring that people will say: "Oh, I'd rather read something more snappy but since I can get some idea of what is going on in the Church in ten minutes by reading THE WITNESS I might as well stick to it." And slang is the soul of brevity. For instance: "peppy" is slang; will someone kindly give me a correct dictionary word that means quite the same thing? There doubtless are such words but I do not know them. I would have to write a sentence to convey the idea contained in that word. So, to save your time, I use it.

My wife has read the paragraph above. Her comment: "Bunk. You write as you do because you can't help it. Why all that piffle about saving other people's time?" There you are; a girl educated in a perfectly good diocesan Church School, and she used two slang words in one sentence. Yet how could she say as much more briefly?

Comfort comes from the Rev. H. Percy Silver, the rector of the Church of the Incarnation, New York, with whom I discussed Church journalism the other day. He told me a story of a headline writer who saved a dull story with a snappy heading. A Church mass meeting was to be held in a theatre in a mid-western city. A large crowd was expected. Instead but 200 people were scattered about in a hall that seated 1500 or more. For an opening hymn the chairman announced: "Oh, that we had a thousand tongues to praise." The next morning the following headline appeared across the morning paper: EPISCOPALIANS EIGHT HUNDRED TONGUES SHORT. I wish I were as resourceful in presenting the dull news that comes to my desk.

wasn't difficult apparently for the government to develop patriotism and hatred during the war. It was the Church's job now, particular purpose of this Crusade in fact, to develop loyalty to the Church, to spread knowledge of her aim, and to build up a hatred of sin. Several missionaries also addressed the meeting.

Bishop Page, visiting five northern missions in Michigan which are under the care of the Rev. H. R. Hole, assisted by a woman worker, finds a marked increase in the number of children and young people in the congregations. Where two years ago there were twenty-five children in one of the missions and practically none in the others, there are now 150 in all, with improvement continuing. The field has its own summer training conference for teachers and young people.

New three manual organ, built by the Austin Organ Company of Hartford, was dedicated on January 23rd in St. Mark's, Milwaukee. The organ contains 59 stops and couplers with 38 adjustable combinations, and is of the latest electrical action, and contains a peal of chimes and a celestial harp. At the dedicatory service the combined choirs sang a festival service, with a sermon by the rector, the Rev. E. Reginald Williams. That evening an Epiphany pageant was given; on Monday evening a recital was given by Mr. Sheldon Foote, organist and choirmaster of St. Mark's, and on Thursday a recital was given by Mr. Stanley Martin, organist of the Sunday Evening Club, Chicago.

Bishop Barnwell of Idaho and the Rev. Robert P. Kreitler were the crusaders in Camden, New Jersey; got crowds of course. But here is an interesting bit: Bishop Barnwell broadcasted one address and received as a result letters from fourteen hundred listeners-in. I wonder if he is going to answer them all; ought to be done somehow, though of course the Bishop himself can hardly do it. What plans have been made to follow-up such "leads"? Believe me if the inquiry came to a business house about their product there would be a representative on the job the next morning. . .a whole flock of them. Of course something is being done, and I shall tell you just what in another week or so. Meanwhile I should like to know if any preacher ever received as many as fourteen hundred letters as a result of a broadcasted sermon?

Here is another interesting bit of Crusade news; the Rev. Robert P. Kreitler of Scranton had hardly stepped inside his home after a week of crusading in New Jersey when the 'phone rang. It was the local Baptist minister: "Say Kreitler, we want you to come down to our church Sunday night and tell us all about this Bishops' Crusade you folks are engaged in." Of course he went.

All right, here's some more; on Saturday morning. . .Saturday, mind you. . .over two hundred and fifty people gathered in Trinity Church, Elizabeth, New Jersey, for the Holy Communion. This service was toward the close of a week's mission.

Another Crusade note. The Rev. S. Parkes Cadman preaches at a broadcasted service each Sunday from Brooklyn, New York. I suppose it is the most popular radio religious service in America, with hundreds of thousands of people listening in. After his address Dr. Cadman answers questions. He was asked: "What do you think of the Bishops' Crusade now going on in Brooklyn?" Here is his answer:

"I am very glad to call attention to this noble crusade made by our brethren of the Protestant Episcopal Church—mark you, not only here, but throughout the length and breadth of the nation. It used to be the Methodists who headed the advance. I remember marching after my father when I was a youngster, yelling lustily, "Turn to the Lord and seek salvation." I am glad to see the Episcopalians have caught the fire. I hope the Salvation Army, present here today, will not let the honors be taken from them as the shock troops of God's glorious army of fighting saints. I trust the day

Atlanta, Georgia should be the next city to be heard from. I have here something of their Crusade plans and I have an idea that the city will be stirred. It starts next Sunday, with Bishop Rogers of Ohio as the chief crusader. The chairman, the Rev. High Moor, acting for the clergy of the city, has ordered a couple of thousand copies of THE WITNESS for next week. They figure on getting a copy into the home of every Episcopalian family in the city, and hope that a large percentage of them will be subscribers before the week is over.

A new stained glass window, dedicated to mothers, is to be dedicated on Mother's Day, May 9th, in Christ Church, Washington, D. C., the Rev. Calvert E. Buck, rector. Bishop Rhinelander, canon of the National Cathedral, is to dedicate the window, the main theme of which is Mother Love.

Sure, I think it is a lot of fun to play games, so I have taken to solitaire. I tried to play Son and Daughters of Clergymen. Who's Who, so I am told, is full of them. But nobody seemed interested. Then I suggested that Choir game. So far nothing doing. What's the matter—doesn't anyone read these paragraphs? Ah, come on, let's play. Don't you know some famous son or daughter of a clergyman? I can think of a dozen right off the bat. And what has happened to that choir of fifteen or twenty years ago? We can't use up all the space telling about new altars and stained glass windows. People are a lot more interesting.

Lots of things stirring in Christ Church, Eau Claire, Wisconsin, during the past year over $44,000 has passed through the treasury; paid its full quota to the Church's Program, and have pledged themselves to a hundred per cent payment this year; installed new stained glass window; erected a war memorial; installed a broadcasting outfit so that the morning service is now being put on the air every other Sunday. Last Sunday Bishop Ivins unveiled a rood beam, and now the order is placed for new light fixtures for the church. Then of course it was a parishioner of Christ Church that offered $100,000 for an endowment for a new diocese in Northern Wisconsin.

Bishop Maxon, coadjutor of Tennessee is the chief crusader in Minnesota. With the Rev. John S. Bunting of St. Louis, he is to speak each evening at a mass meeting in Minneapolis, while Dr. Stewart and the Rev. Charles E. Coles of Kansas address mass meetings at St. Paul.

Thousands attended a mass meeting in New York last Sunday to protest against the policy of the government in the Mexican and Chinese situations. The Rev. W. Resolution

THE following resolution was passed at the Annual Parish Meeting of St. John's Church, Northampton, Mass., and the secretary of the meeting was instructed to send copies of the resolution for publication to the leading Church periodicals:

During the year just past, our Senior Warden, Mr. Clarence B. Roote, completed twenty-five years of service in that office. Such a period of service is unique in the history of this parish, and rare indeed in the experience of any parish. Not alone in the length of time which it has covered has Mr. Roote's tenure of office been remarkable; the unfailing faithfulness, and the self-forgetful devotion of the duties of his office have endeared him to rectors and people alike. It is most fitting that at this meeting of the members of St. John's parish, due recognition should be made of this signal example of long and devoted service to the Church, and expression be given to our great appreciation and to the affectionate esteem in which we hold our Senior Warden.

Be It Therefore Resolved, That the people of St. John's parish, through their representatives here assembled, extend to Mr. Roote their most grateful appreciation of splendidly faithful service rendered to the parish over a period of a quarter of a century and the assurance of the affectionate esteem in which he is held by all.

Be It Further Resolved, That this resolution be spread upon the minutes of the Annual Parish Meeting, and that a copy of it be sent to Mr. Roote.

In Memoriam

WE, the Vestry of St. Stephen's Church of Providence, Rhode Island, wish to record our sorrow in the sudden and untimely death of our rector, the Reverend Frederick Spies Penfold, which occurred on Advent Sunday, November 28, 1926.

Dr. Penfold was a priest of rare ability. As a preacher few could excel him, and his assiduity in executive management was unflagging and unsurpassed. During the seven years he was with us he brought the interior aspect of St. Stephen's and its devotional services to a high altitude of Catholic faith and practice, of which he was an ardent and intrepid champion.

His burning love of our Lord's Presence on the Altar kindled in the parish a flame of devotion which, please God, shall never be extinguished.

In the full vigor of matured man-

New Parish House for Calvary Episcopal Church, Summit, N. J.

Under the inspiring leadership of Mr. Philetus H. Holt, as Chairman of the Campaign, Calvary Church decided on $135,000 as the goal for a campaign for a new Parish House and engaged the services of Ward, Wells, Dreshman and Gates to direct it.

Five days in January were set aside for the intensive period, but in four days $152,000 was subscribed and the campaign closed with great enthusiasm, the Rector and Vestry unanimously agreeing that it was the greatest event in the life of the church since the main church building was erected thirty years ago.

The following letter from the Chairman gives his estimate of the value of expert guidance:

17 State Street, New York City.
January 18, 1927.

My dear Mr. Ward:

Now that our campaign has ended so happily, I wish to thank you; first for your courtesy in coming to Summit in advance of the campaign to meet our Rector and Vestry, then in sending us your Mr. Sarcka to direct our efforts.

The result fully proved to my mind my contention at the outset that success would only be possible with expert guidance.

We found in Mr. Sarcka all that you told me we would, and the work progressed pleasantly to the satisfactory finish. Finish possibly to the raising of funds for the present—but beginning, I trust, of renewed life, interest and faith in our people.

With sincere best wishes for yourself, your firm and Mr. Sarcka personally, I remain,

Yours very truly,

PHILETUS H. HOLT,
General Chairman.

We shall be glad to confer with you concerning your Financial Problems. A conference costs you nothing.

PRACTICAL MEN AND FUNDAMENTAL FACTS

The Church a Living Organism

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

IN WOODWARD'S very readable life of George Washington is to be found this comment: "Practical people are excessively bored by any discussion of principles; they hate abstractions. The result is that their mutual misunderstandings hardly ever get to the root of anything. They like to take up each question as it comes along and decide it superficially and temporarily in respect to its immediate consequences. Abstract principle is left far behind, and comes trotting along after events as a dog runs after a wagon, without ever quite catching up. The result of this propensity is that large questions left in the hands of practical men are almost invariably tangled into hopeless snarls. In all communities of practical people the race of lawyers thrive enormously. They are needed to elucidate the misunderstandings of practical people."

I do not know how the problem that faces the preacher can be stated more delightfully. It is just that; he is called to state principles and practical people are telling him to elucidate their misunderstandings.

The average Churchman is conscious that there is a difference between the historic Church and the dissenting denominations, but he is not quite aware nor much concerned as to what the dissent is, while he is quite consciously aware as to what the resemblance is.

On the other hand he is vaguely conscious that he has something in common with the Roman and Greek Churches but is very consciously aware what the differences are. This vagueness is due to the fact that he does not distinguish between the Church as an organism and its substitute as an organization; and yet this distinction is a very profound one, whereas the resemblances are rather visible to the eye and are therefore superficial.

The difference between the Church as an organism and another society as an organization is just the difference between a living vine in which there is sap flowing through the branches and a vine made of human hands to decorate a building.

The one is organic having life within itself and the other, while it may be just as artistic, has no life within itself.

In the one, life is dependent upon the grace of God and in the other life is dependent upon the skill of men. As a denominational minister once said to me: "Our church cannot function unless it has a group of adherents who can supply the inspiration." How could such an organization start except it came out of the Church?

One is not saying that the creations of man are more or less beautiful to the eye than the works of God, but one may say that the product of man has not life within itself.

Protestantism as such could never have survived the dark ages after the fall of Rome for it would have been dependent upon the morale of its members to have kept it alive, and there was none.

The Church is an organism whose life is in itself whereas the sect is an organization with a program which it adopts.

You develop an organism from within; you embellish an organization by adopting rules and setting up a program. America is full of organizations and programs. There is but one Christ and one body of Christ to which the branches must be related or ultimately perish.

If I tell a practical man that the Church is divine he acts bored and tells me to stop talking theology.

If I tell him that a cabbage is divine and no human brain can build one he asks me if I think he is a fool not to know that.

The difference lies in the fact that he can easily visualize a cabbage but the Church is bigger and he regards my statement as an abstraction. And yet the Church and what it is should be fully as vital to him as any cabbage.

It is just this distinction which causes many a priest to be a Churchman and minister to a small group of humble people rather than to be a spell-binder preaching to a multitude.

It is just this distinction which is taught our primary children in the catechism when the child says: "My sponsors in baptism wherein I was made the child of God and an inheritor of the kingdom of Heaven."

The thing which the practical man pooh-poohs is made the chief stone in the foundation of our belief, from which all our subsequent faith and action is derived.

If you are not interested in the root of the matter it is not surprising that your fig-tree bears nothing but leaves. You can't tie figs onto your tree. Neither can you attach virtues to the tree of life.

The righteousness of Christ comes to us from Christ through the instruments which He created, not from the bystander who attaches them by other processes.

After serving in the ministry for forty years I am more and more convinced that the Christian life is something vitally different from an ornamental paganism which often seems just as artistic but lacks vitality.

It is the imitation of Christianity not the fruitfulness of Christ. For the essential thing in fruitfulness is that the flower, bud and fruit shall come successively from the root and the trunk; not be attached capriciously by the horticulturalist. The gardner who ignores the roots may grow fruit but it will not command a very high price in the market.

The failure of Christians to register is because they are looking for sap everywhere else but where God put it and they are persistently confusing a good imitation with the living thing.

Virtue is admirable, but it is not to be confused with life. It is merely one of the products of life, and you cannot bear fruit continuously and eternally unless you abide in Christ who is the root and trunk from which spring eternal life, for in Him is grace and by grace ye are saved and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God.

It is just this fundamental difference in principle between the Church as an organism and, say, the Rotarians as an organization. The distinction does not lie in the external deeds done from day to day by the individuals who compose them. But the distinction lies in the claim of the Church that through Christ it is vitally related to the Holy Spirit who is the Lord and Giver of Life, whereas the Rotarians make no such claim. In the Church you receive the sacraments because you believe in a living Christ who is operating today as He operated nineteen centuries ago.

In following a program you do good but it is you who are doing it. In contrast, with Christ in the sacraments you are receiving a life which has overcome sin and death. Both acts are praiseworthy, but the principle is not the same. In one you have established a personal relation with Him who is the fountain of life and in whose power and grace you believe; in the other you are doing an act which has no such contacts or implications.

For after all is said and done our own virtues and good deeds are limited in their power and scope so long as they are merely ours. No one says that they are not estimable, but merely that they are ours. In your contact with Christ it is His righteousnes, His grace and His power that you invoke, so that you join your efforts to that dynamo of power, and for God's purposes not your own.

Of course you may not believe in this power, but if it is a real power then it is He dwelling in you who multiplies the value of your deeds.

It is just this difference between mortality and eternal life; between a living organism and a going organization; between a living tree and an artistic scroll; not so much in its external beauty as in its internal power. Virtue is a product of life, but it is not life; and Christ came that we might have life and have it more abundantly and so grow in virtue endlessly.

THE CHURCH AND SOCIETY

A Chicago Convention Address

BY REV. ALFRED NEWBERY

TO EVEN the most casual observer must be apparent the wonderful development of the social agencies in our country today. Community budgets have brought home to many citizens the ramifications of the impulse to help. A glance at the program of the National Conference of Social Work is bewildering to the layman with its divisions and sub-divisions, its manifold approaches, and its impressive personnel of speakers. It is unfortunately still possible to influence the casual observer by superficial sneers and criticisms. He can still be told that all this is paper, that it is either providing a job for some theoretical meddler, or is the hobby of sentimental uplifters, and has no permanent and vital place among the needs of society. We can assume here that no one will be misguided by such observations, and that the development of which we speak is a legitimate growth in answer to ascertained needs, and that without it we should be in a very bad way.

But marvellous as is this development it does not begin to cover the field of need. Our greatest achievement has been not so much to meet the need as to establish and put into operation in a small way the methods by which the need must be met. Our development, in other words, is largely pioneer work, and in almost every aspect needs both workers and support for the tasks that lie immediately before it.

And that situation is in itself an indication of the state of our society. It reveals to some extent how far astray from a true way of life we have wandered. Our ways of living, economically, socially, are so wrong, and wrong on so great a scale, that there have come into being what we might call social diseases which no longer respond to simple remedies, and call for the specialist. (By the term "social disease" we mean something much more inclusive than a polite way of mentioning syphilis and gonorrhea; we mean our entire set of social habits.) And all our efforts in professional social work, are in one sense, professional substitutes for that which should ideally obtain among human beings in their relations to each other. One cannot be satisfied today that industrial strife can be made to disappear by means of a device. Class feeling will not die if Moscow can be kept out of the United States, any more than the evils of capital can be removed by bringing Moscow in. The economic situation is calling into an effective and active existence the social engineer, like Herbert Hoover, who is rapidly becoming a necessity to our present economic structure. The probation officer, to take a simpler example, has become part of our machinery because of the vital necessity of friendship in the solution of the problems of delinquent youth. He is there to apply officially the friendship which if we had applied it in the first place, would have disposed of the problem before it ever got to the courts. But he is more than the official substitute. So far astray have we gone, so complex are our relationships, that it takes a highly trained person to apply that friendship intelligently and fruitfully. We shall need the specialist as long as the diseases exist. We should make a mess of things if we tried to dispense with him. Our task is the primary one of getting back to a way of life which will not produce those diseases.

The largest part of our professional social activity must alas! be directed to healing those who are socially sick, the unadjusted and the badly adjusted. Professional social work is so heavily burdened with the needs of individuals, that it has little leisure for needs of society as a unit, and where it is able to make some contribution along those lines, we of the laity have even less understanding with which to follow its lead.

An Age-Old Challenge

The age-old challenge of the world to the Church is to create that society wherein perfectly healthy relations will obtain. And the age-old obstacle in the Church's way is the failure of her members to appreciate her fundamental teaching that we are members one of another. (It might be here observed that however badly we have done in the Church, those outside have done even worse. That fact, if it be a fact, is a legitimate stimulus to carry on, but it is hardly a basis for self-satisfiedly standing still!) The Church's task in creating that sense of oneness, that sense of membership, one in another, that social-mindedness, is further complicated by the conditions of our life today. We have not even a blank page to write upon. The number of ways in which we react upon each other is bewilderingly large and quite beyond the capacity of most of us to grasp. Our public is enabled to form and express prejudices with astonishing rapidity, and is in point of information and training quite unfitted adequately to handle the manifold problems that are brought to its attention every day. If the newspaper represents what the people want to read, and if its emphases are based upon an accurate measure of the public interest; if the movie is an authentic portrayal of our standard of values, and if our best sellers and periodicals reflect correctly what people are thinking about and how they think about them, we should be silly optimists to say that the voice of the people is ready to grapple with the great social problems of our times. The mere ability to handle the data of our problems is by no means a common possession.

Complications

Another complication in the Church's path is the divided and ineffective witness that we her members bear to the vital necessity of the sense of membership. If all the members of the Church were free from race prejudice, we should not thereby have achieved a solution of race problems, but we should at least be in a position to work one out. If all the members of the Church were sufficiently socially minded to want to cast their votes when given the opportunity, we should not thereby perfect the working of our governmental machinery, but we should have introduced a new hazard into the calculations of the political boss. If all the members of the Church were conscious enough of their membership in society to be disgusted with the results of our present theories of punishment, we should not thereby have stopped crime, but we should be in the way of stopping a large part of the production of criminals. If all our members were socialized enough to have graduated out of the present national jealousies and swaggerings, we should at least have made it harder for the next war to get under way.

Rev. Frank E. Wilson
Crusades in Chicago

But we are far from having an actual social conscience or consciousness, and it is the first step in the Church's task to create one. It begins in our worship. It was a medievalist who said, "We are not bidden to love God with one love, and our neighbor with another; neither are we instructed to cleave to the Creator with one part of our love, and to creation with another part; but in one and the same individual love should we embrace both God and our neighbor." (John Sotus Erigena). Until the Holy Eucharist is recognized as a sacrament of unity binding man to God and man to man, until our public confession is more than the arithmetical sum of a number of persons, each pleading his individual sins, until we take on our shoulders the weaknesses and transgressions of others, as well as a share of our corporate responsibility, and confess to God our collective inadequacy to promote the welfare of our fellowman in body and soul, until our common prayer IS common prayer, by all and for all until then we shall be in no real sense fitted to make our contribution to an unsocial world.

Our Task

The Church is not normally bound to provide a mechanism for the untangling of society's knots. It is not usually her business to declare for this or that side of a controversy over a remedy. But she has the task of pouring into society a stream of consecrated lay people who as citizens will apply Christian principles to the issues of social living. More than once has Bishop Gore pleaded for the creation of "circles of representative men in each district or within the area of special professions, to draw up a statement of what is wrong in current practice, and of the principles on which Christians ought to act," the creation of bodies which "would be formulating with adequate knowledge the general maxims of Christian living."

But not all of the Church's membership are fitted to take a part in that important venture. The great majority of us would be able only to create the atmosphere favorable to such an effort. And we shall not do that without some knowledge of facts, some meditation on principles, as a basis for our prayer and influence.

Spiritual and Secular

It will be seen then that we are talking about a fundamental aspect of the Christian way of life, and the Christian basis of life. The name for the emphasis on that aspect, which the Church is striving to deepen today, is social service. It implies, of course, doing something. The social agencies of each and every community are in need of intelligent co-operation and support. We must get rid of that form of spiritual snobbery which arrogates to ourselves the adjective "spiritual" and assigns to all other effort the word "secular." There is of course a distinction. The Church teaches the eternal verities divinely revealed. The social sciences speak in terms of ascertained facts and at any given time these may seem to be the basis for a social theory which is at variance with the revealed truth. But this is not always or even frequently the case. The Church has a spiritual contribution to make, but we of the Church are under obligation to make clear just what that contribution is, to render it effectively, and, where we are doing what every other social agency does, to do it as well as the others do it, and not to disregard, duplicate, and overlap their efforts.

OUR VENTURES

Then there are our own ventures in the field of specific endeavor.

These call for our loyal support and understanding co-operation. They struggle constantly against rising costs and deteriorating equipment, widening fields of service, and the ever present temptation of our people to forget that the penalty of success is the greater opportunity to serve, that life means growth, and that all we accomplish there is a small fraction of the field to be served. Of no work can we be more proud than that of our own Church Mission of Help, with its trained social ministry to unadjusted youth at every point, from the potentially wayward girl to the unmarried mother and her baby, offering a service which neglects no aspect of the individual's health, physical, mental and spiritual, doing a work of reclamation and prevention of a superior order of excellence. Yet I venture to say that many of our people have a very slight acquaintance with these endeavors and could not adequately describe them, and are therefore the less whole hearted in support of them.

But underlying the doing of something is the thinking and feeling of something, the cultivation of that understanding of situations, and that deep regard for the eternal worth of the individual which is divorced alike from a cold mechanical technic of putting human beings through a process and from the excessive warmth of sentimentality. We must break down our prejudices and antipathies with the spiritual weapons of disciplined prayer and meditation, we must make good our inadequacies of power and understanding with sacramental grace, we must enter into worship in spiritual communion with the world of men. And then we must channel our services through paths that have been built with an intelligent knowledge of field that calls for our efforts. That to be sure is, as it has been, the task of the ages. Only today we come to it with a new sensitiveness, and a new appreciation of a phrase that lies at the very heart of the Christian revelation, and a new determination to make it vital in our common life. It is the phrase, "with one another."

Cable from Bishop Roots, February 1st: "Members of the foreign staff in Changsha, Ichang and Shasi have been recalled to Hankow. All are well. All Middle Schools, except Boone and St. Hilda's, Wuchang, have been closed for the present. Later it may be necessary to close these two also."

Let's Know

THE SUN

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

ONE of the interesting facts connected with primitive religion is the great prevalence of sun-worship. Our early ancestors seem to have had an instinctive feeling that the sun was vitally important to them, even if they could not tell just why. So they expressed their feeling by offering worship to the shining orb.

The Brahman made a special offering every morning in order to help the sun rise. The early Mexicans offered human sacrifices to the sun, which largely accounts for their persistent cruel wars in search of victims. The Rhodians annually cast a chariot and four horses into the sea for the use of the sun in making his daily journey across the sky. A quaint custom was once observed among Central American natives when the first-fruits of the season were offered to the sun; it consisted of placing a criminal between two huge stones, balanced opposite each other, and then allowing the stones to fall together—much to the flattening of the criminal. At the beginning of the Christian era Mithra was often identified with the sun and so worshipped. The Parsees (originally of Persia but now of India) have always paid great devotion to the sun.

And now comes modern science justifying the respect felt toward the heavenly luminary by our primitive forefathers. Within the last generation many interesting experiments have proved that the sun is not only a source of light and warmth but also that its rays contain valuable health-producing properties. The ultra-violet ray, which is part of sunlight, is now known to be a very necessary element for our physical health. For instance—two groups of rats were kept in cages where the sun never penetrated; one group was fed with grain which had been subjected to the ultra-violet rays and they grew as rats ought to grow; but the other group was fed with grain not so treated and they didn't grow at all. Rickets, a disease which prevails in lands of cloudy skies, is greatly benefited by sun treatments and so is tuberculosis. Open air cures at the seashore were known to be beneficial long before it was known that the sunshine had anything particular to do with it. All this is more important than ever in these days when so much of our life is indoors under artificial conditions.

It is one more example of the fact that the religious instincts of human beings are far more reasonable than they have sometimes been thought to be, even when they work on distorted lines. The primitive appreciation of the blessings of sunlight was right. The Christian still appreciates the blessings—and more intelligently than his ancestors—but he offers his devotions to the Creator who is back of it all rather than to the created agent through which the blessings come. And science bears out the important features of early faith.

When objectors try to bowl us over with labored arguments designed to show how Christianity has its roots sunk in the superstitions of the savages, we can afford to smile. The fact is that these savage instincts were headed toward the truth. It can be just as easily shown that modern science is the product of primitive magic.

Pyschology with a Soul

Some Sermons and Some Poems

By Rev. Irvine Goddard

The Theology of Personality. William S. Bishop, D. D., Longmans Green & Co.

The Theology of Personality with its mass of well reasoned and conservative opinion is an excellent correction of the Behaviorists School of Psychology which is so popular and quite the fashion at the moment. We need to be reminded that the Behaviorists utterly ignore such a hypothetical entity as the soul, in fact, their phychology may be justly termed soulless. Concerned as they are with intellectual, emotional and volitional activities, they know nothing of the ego behind these activities and presumably the source of them. Men like Watson laugh somewhat scornfully at Leibnitz's famous addition to the scholastic formula that there is nothing in the mind that has not come through the senses except the mind itself.

In this admirable little volume Dr. Bishop cogently and lucidly sets forth the truth in reference to personality. Divine and Human Personality as the supreme category of human thought is exhibited as having its last and highest application in reference to God and to Christ and finally is viewed in reference to ourselves in the light of the Divine Revelation. If you have been carried about lately by the winds of strange doctrines—read Theology of Personality, it will steady your bark and help you greatly to make the Port.

Great Southern Preaching. Ed. by Charles M. Crowe. Macmillan, New York.

Beware of labels. Unless you scrutinize them closely they are to mislead you. Here is a book labelled "Great Southern Preaching." The preaching is Southern all right, it is fairly representative of every state below the Mason and Dixon line, but a little biased as to where this greatness lies denominationally. Baptists, 6; Methodists 6; Disciples 4; Presbyterians 3; Episcopal 2; Congregational 1. But as to their being great sermons the Editor evidently uses that word in an emotional sense, just as boys, leaving a party say they have had a great time.

No doubt when these sermons were delivered they made a great impression and did good, but lacking the personality of the preacher they are now like spent shot. The absence of lawn sleeves detract somewhat from the impressiveness of the sermons contributed by our two Southern Bishops. There is one sermon particularly compelling called "Mostly Back Streets" and a touch of Modernity in another "The Dropped Bridle-Rein"; but on the whole there sermons represent the thought and style of a generation that is quickly passing.

When They Shall Lead Us Home." George Klingle. Morehouse Publishing Co., Milwaukee, Wis. Price $2.

"When They Shall Lead Us Home." is a very attractively bound book of verse of high order. The poems which make up the collection have appeared from time to time in various church papers. The initial poem is exceptionally good; this, and several others of the collection ought to bring comfort and inspiration to those in bereavement.

A Book of Modern Prayer. Compiled and edited by Samuel McComb, Longmans. $1.50.

The sixty prayers and passages for devotional reading in this volume were collected by Dr. Samuel McComb. The prayers are the work of a number of authors, mainly modern, and illustrate very well the awakening of interest in the inner life which is characteristic of our day. Dr. McComb's introduction on "Prayer, Its Meaning and Value," is a real contribution.

Our Cover

THE Rev. Irwin St. John Tucker comes from a famous Church family. His career has been varied; first a newspaper reporter, then a migratory worker, a seminary student, then charge of important Church work in New York and Chicago where he conducted probably the largest forum meetings ever to be held under Church auspices. He then became an educator, devoting himself particularly to work with the unemployed "hobos" of Chicago. He finally returned to newspaper work and today holds an important position with one of the largest daily papers in the country. A brief outline of the series of articles that he has written for Lenten classes will be found in the third column of the ninth page of this issue.

General Theological Seminary, as you doubtless know, is raising a million and a quarter dollars; need it for increases in salaries, repairs, and to extend and promote the work now going on in conjunction with St. Peter's Church, where a sort of religious clinic for the students is conducted under the direction of the Rev. Thomas Cline.

Preacher, Pulpit and Pew

By E. P. Jots

Here are a couple of stories that come to us from the Rev. Eric Smith, rector of St. Michael's, Paonia, Colorado: A Sunday School superintendent made the announcement one Sunday that the favorite hymn of each class would be sung at the close of the lesson. A teacher was inquiring of her pupils which hymns they liked the best and one boy spoke up and said: "I wish they'd sing the stealing hymn." The teacher said: "What do you mean by the stealing hymn?" The boy said: "I mean the hymn where the little boy stole the old man's watch." Upon investigation, it was discovered that he meant the hymn, "Hushed was the evening hymn," and the reference was to the second verse which runs as follows:

The old man meek and mild,
The priest of Israel slept,
His watch, the temple child
The Little Levite kept.

The next concerns the Midnight Eucharist. This year one of the star football players of the high school team here, in company with many others, attended the service this Christmas Eve. After the service, he was asked how he liked the service. He remarked: "It was beautiful, impressive, in fact I have never attended a service so wonderful in my life, but you know I just could not get on to the shift signals."

Minister (to hostess's little daughter)—Wouldn't you like to come to Sunday-school and hear about heaven and the beautiful golden streets?

Little Lola—Yes, sir, but it will take away the surprise when I get there.

A dear old Methodist, obliged to remain in a certain town over Sunday, started out to attend service in one of the churches of his own faith; but losing his way, and seeing an open church door just across the street, he entered, not knowing to what creed the congregation held. As the service progressed, his religious emotions waxed warmer and warmer, until finally he gave vent to them by shouting out, "Praise God!" Immediately one of the ushers tapped him on the shoulder and said:

"You can't do that in this church, sir."

The Rev. Fr. Harrison, Order of Holy Cross, and the Rev. Thomas Opie of North Carolina crusaded last week in the diocese of Springfield with splendid congregations everywhere.

Texas Makes a Great Impression On Editor

Eastern Editor Thinks That Something Should Be Done for Church in the West

NEED GOOD MEN

By Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott

I have missed out on my column for several weeks, for I have been down in West Texas on the Bishop's Crusade.

WEST TEXAS—it was a revelation to me, and in many ways. For one thing—San Antonio! Have you ever been in a more interesting city than San Antonio? And, have you ever known a more charming and hospitable people? I have travelled the world far, both in Europe and America, and I have never experienced anything more delightful than the people of that ancient city. And I have seldom been more impressed by the beauty, personality and potential growth of any community.

Then, that part of the Lone Star State! Why, it is an empire in itself. The King Ranch, of one million and a half acres! It defies the imagination. It is like talking in billions of money. How many states could you put inside it? How often could England, Scotland and Wales be included within its domains? I sat next to a man one day who told me that he had a ranch of twenty-six thousand acres. He spoke of it without marked enthusiasm. I humbly suggested that that was "some" tract of land. "Yes," he replied, "it is quite a piece of property. You could put the state of Rhode Island in it twice over, and then have some margin." I dined in Uvalde with a most courteous host. I asked him if he had a ranch. "Not exactly a ranch," he answered, "more of a farm." "How many acres," I enquired. "Six thousand," was the ultimatum! In the language of the gutter—"Can you beat it?" Why in the world should anybody worry about the possible over-population of the world when Texas is on the map—Texas with its limitless miles, its far-stretching distances, its empirical spaces, and Texas with its glorious climate and inherent richness of soil? We can do without wars for centuries to come, so far as wars are supposedly necessary to decrease an excess in the number of human beings, with Texas on the map! And, blessed indeed would be the people who from force of circumstances, if not from prediliction, were compelled to take up their permanent abode in Texas!

Yes, I was deeply impressed by the at present "largest city in Texas,"

San Antonio, and by the spaciousness of the country, both in the extent of its territory and in the corresponding breadth of its people. But, I was chiefly interested in the Episcopal Church in West Texas, as I saw it in San Antonio, Cuero, Brownsville, Corpus Christi, San Benito and Uvalde. St. Mark's Church, San Antonio, is just about one-third of the Diocese of West Texas in the financial support of the Church and in the work of the Church, and it is a great institution. It has had such rectors as the present Bishop of Delaware, the present Bishop Coadjutor of Los Angeles and the present Bishop of Olympia. The present rector, the Rev. Rolfe P. Crum, has recently raised one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars towards the first unit of parish buildings that will hold their own with any other similar group in the Episcopal Church in the United States. The Sunday School in this parish, and the organizational work generally, would compare favorably with the Sunday School and the organizational work of the largest of eastern parishes.

But, and here is the infinite pathos of it, the Church outside San Antonio, with some notable exceptions, is in a weak and struggling condition. Why? Not through any fault of Bishop Capers, whose leadership and oversight would be a benediction and a Godsend to any diocese anywhere; but through the difficulty of securing men, and the right sort of men to take charge of the parishes in the small towns and rural districts. The oranges and the blue bonnets and the roses in West Texas go on for ever;

Chicago Convention Meets at St. James'

Bishop Anderson Urges Hearty Worship and Discusses Midnight Masses at Christmas Time

RURAL WORK

By the Rev. Charles L. Street

The Ninetieth Annual Convention of the Diocese of Chicago opened with a celebration of the Holy Communion at St. James's Church, Chicago, on February 1st, 1927. The Reverend Duncan Browne, Rector of St. James's, was the preacher. At the opening business session of the Convention, Bishop Anderson gave a brief charge in which he discussed the worship of the church and pled for a more hearty joining in of the people in the hymns and psalms and responses. "A service in which the congregation joins wholeheartedly" he said, "is a great missionary power." He raised the question of midnight celebrations of the Holy Communion at Christmas time. He pointed out that the midnight services is having the effect of reducing the attendance at the services on Christmas day to almost nothing. "For practical purposes" he said, "the day begins when you get out of bed." And there are other objections, among them the lack of preparation for the service on the part of many people who come to the midnight mass. "I have not the power to forbid the midnight communion," said Bishop Anderson, "and I would not forbid it if I could. I am simply calling attention to what seems to be a new and very popular fashion in Christmas services."

On Tuesday afternoon and evening there were meetings and conferences of various church groups. The Rev. John W. Suter spoke on Religious Education. The Young People's Association of the Diocese held its annual meeting and elected Sylvester Lyman of St. Luke's Church, Evanston, President. The Rev. Alfred Newbery spoke on Social Service. The business sessions were uneventful. It is significant that the church work in that important part of the Diocese outside of the city of Chicago is having a larger place in the Councils of the Diocese every year. For some years of the four priests and the four laymen elected to the Bishop and Council each year for a three year term, there have been two representatives nominated by the rural deaneries. This year on the motion of Dean Pickells of Freeport a committee was appointed to study the rural problem in the diocese of Chicago and the National Council's Program for rural work.

Famous Head of the Church Army Celebrates His Eightieth Birthday Alone

LOOKING FOR DRAMATIST

By Rev. A. Manby Lloyd

Last week Prebendary Carlile of Church Army fame celebrated his 80th birthday, so I called on him yesterday at Church Army Headquarters to offer my congratulations.

"I feel more like 18 than 80," he said. "I live here in a home 10 feet, by 6, and there's lots to do, so why should I grumble?"

There is a tragedy behind the brave jest of that little home, for Dr. Carlile's real home in the country was broken up for ever just about two years ago when his wife died.

He was wearing the purple ribbon of the Companion of Honour on his tunic, a decoration of which he is very proud. "And all the prouder since Dick Sheppard got it," he said.

"But why are you wearing gaiters?" I asked. "I thought you belonged to the No Gaiter League, as Dick Sheppard does?"

Prebendary Carlile's eyes twinkled. "Well, you see," he explained, "I've been promoted. The Bishop of London says I'm 'Archbishop of the Gutter,' so I must wear gaiters."

"Besides, my legs are cold."

"When first I was ordained," Dr. Carlile went on, "I was Carr Glyn's curate in Kensington"—Wilson Carlile at S. Mary Abbot's; it seems about as appropriate as for Billie Sunday to be Master of the Temple! "On Sunday mornings he had the church full, and in the evenings I had it empty. That wouldn't do at all; so every night, at nine o'clock, I preached in the streets and, when I got tired, I put up someone else—a groom, a valet, anybody who had a love for Christ and his fellow-men, and I gave him two minutes. That type of preacher draws for two minutes, and bores in four. So I kept him to two, and them somebody else had another two, and so on. (They were all live wires; but all the life went out of them after two minutes). And then I realized that the witness of the layman tells more than the witness of the cleric. And that was the beginning of the Church Army."

The Rev. T. P. Stevens, the popular vicar of St. Matthews-by-the-Elephant, has discovered that the way of the stage is a thorny one.

He has always been interested in the theatre, and has been a pioneer in the introduction of plays in his church.

The other day he was rather perturbed about some recent developments which have arisen out of a statement to the effect that he was looking for a dramatist who would write him a little play about St. Francis.

About twenty budding geniuses submitted scripts, none of which was suitable.

But one man, who was asked to call, has been a nuisance ever since.

"He brought me his manuscript one evening about 6 o'clock," said Mr. Stevens, "and confided to me that he was a greater man than Shakespeare, and had learnt the 'reverberations of sentences' from Homer, and what he called 'sim-miles' from Horace.

"So I asked him to leave his play that I might submit it to my producer."

"Three hours later there was a terrific knock at the door, and my dramatic friend, who is a tall and powerful man, with a sinister expression, presented himself.

"He said he didn't like my producer, although it appeared he did not know him, and asked for his play back.

"So I gave it to him."

"And then the trouble began. He bombarded me with letters, telling me that he had spent thirty-five days and nights upon his chef d'oeuvre and was not going to be put off. He threatened to report me to the ecclesiastical authorities, and has gone on threatening me ever since.

"I shall issue no more rash invitations to unknown genius."

At Christ Church, Brooklyn, each Sunday evening, there is a dialogue sermon between the Rev. John B. Pitcher and Canon Chase, the rector. Sometime I must hear it—certainly before I list it as a good idea.

Ten Years Ago

TEN years ago the following items appeared in this paper; Pope Benedict XV is taking under consideration the appointment of a special commission to be composed of four Cardinals, looking toward the reunion of Christendom. They will especially cultivate friendly relations with the Anglican and Russian Churches. The Rev. Frank Hale Touret was consecrated fifth Bishop of Western Colorado in Grace Church, Colorado Springs. Four Bishops were present: Bishops Tuttle, Capers, Faber and Johnson. Bishops Thurston, Jones and Atwood were detained by a severe snow storm.

News Paragraphs Of The Episcopal Church

An Unusual Series of Articles for Lent Written by a Clergyman; Is Also Newspaperman

HERE IS A TASTE

By Rev. William B. Spofford

Thursday and Friday are busy days for me. It is then that I scatter about on my desk and on spots on the floor not covered with books, the news items that come from various parts of the country; to read them, sort them, and condence them to fill our limited space. One o'clock in the morning is bedtime on Thursday; if sleep catches me too early it turns Friday into a wicked day.

It was this Thursday morning that I received in the mail a manuscript of forty long pages, typed. The first page had this printed upon it:

THE BIG STORY

The Gospel According to a Newspaper Man

By Irwin St. John Tucker

"Interesting" said I, "attention will have to be given to anything that he writes"; and with that I tucked it away in a brief case that I might glance over it in the evening—just glance over it, for there was work to be done.

At ten-thirty my work had not been touched. Why? Because I read the first page of that manuscript and simply could not stop until I reached the end. Let me give you his opening paragraph: "When I was a very young reporter, before the mystery of that calling had faded and its romance shredded away, I said once to my city editor: 'I wish I could uncover the biggest story in the world.' He grinned. Then he reached into his inky, battered desk and drew out a Bible. 'Run that story down' he said, adding, 'it's a long assignment.' For twenty years I have been working on that lead; THE BIG STORY. To me the Bible appears in the guise of a newspaper. The men who followed Christ around and took notes on His sayings were reporters. The man who sailed with Paul and wrote up his wrecks and imprisonments was a special correspondent. The men who reported the trials before Agrippa and Pilate were court reporters. So was the man who took down in shorthand the speech of Stephen before the Sanhedrim. It was a rewrite man who gathered together the notes other men had taken and wove them together into the Gospel of St. Luke. And it was an editorial writer who took all these accounts, mingled with them his own experiences and reflections, and gave the world that marvelous editorial known as the Gospel According to St. John. The Bible is the bound volume of a newspaper containing many columns of matter that do not interest us now, but containing bound up also within it the ringing instalments of the world's greatest story, told by eyewitnesses, written by the greatest of special correspondents—the Story of the Romance and the Murder of God."

In seven instalments Irwin St. John Tucker unfolds this story; the Gospel According to a Newspaperman. It thrilled me. I believe it will thrill you. Certainly it will open up a new vision of the book to the lay people of the Church. It has been divided into seven chapters by Mr. Tucker; that is one for each week during Lent. And THE WITNESS will run the first instalment of this scoop, for I am convinced that it is nothing less that that, in the first Lenten issue, March 3rd.

Just a word about Irwin St. John Tucker; a newspaperman; then a hobo; then an educator; then a student at the General Theological Seminary from which he graduated; then a priest of the Church with important work in New York and Chicago parishes; then a prophet crying in the wilderness against the sins of his people; today, holding an important position on the Chicago Herald-Examiner, one of the big daily papers of the country; and no less a priest of the Church than he ever was.

You are offered two great series of articles during this coming season of lent. Spiritual Values and Religious Standards, a series of articles by Bishop Johnson of Colorado; a series written as a follow-up to the Bishops' Crusade; a series which he hopes will be used as material for Lenten discussion groups. A mere announcement is sufficient for anything written by Bishop Johnson. And now this Gospel According to a Newspaperman, a series of seven articles, by the Rev. Irwin St. John Tucker, also an ideal basis for a Lenten study group. The back page of this issue contains an announcement which I sincerely hope you will act upon; if a rector, order a bundle at once for Lent; if a lay communicant, please call your rector's attention to that back page and suggest to him that it be acted upon.

REV. A. R. MCKINSTRY
Goes to Large Albany Parish

There appears in the paper this week a photograph of the prize poster which is to be used throughout the Church this coming Lent. It was drawn by Miss Sarah Taylor, Grace and Holy Trinity Parish, Kansas City, Missouri. There are five other posters, all in color, which you will see hanging in your parish house before long. The others will be reproduced here from week to week.

Rheumatism

A Remarkable Home Treatment Given by One Who Had It

In the year of 1893 I was attacked by Muscular and Sub-Acute Rheumatism. I suffered as only those who are thus afflicted know for over three years. I tried remedy after remedy, but such relief as I obtained was only temporary. Finally, I found a treatment that cured me completely and such a pitiful condition has never returned. I have given it to a number who were terribly afflicted, even bedridden, some of them seventy to eighty years old, and the results were the same as in my own case.

I want every sufferer from any form of muscular and sub-acute (swelling of the joints) rheumatism, to try the great value of my improved "Home Treatment" for its remarkable healing power. Don't send a cent; simply mail your name and address, and I will send it free to try. After you have used it, and it has proven itself to be that long-looked-for means of getting rid of such forms of rheumatism, you may send the price of it, One Dollar, but understand I do not want your money unless you are perfectly satisfied to send it. Isn't that fair? Why suffer any longer, when relief is thus offered you free. Don't delay. Write today.

At the diocesan convention of Tentessee, held last week in Knoxville, a committee reported favorably on military training in schools and colleges. The chairman of the committee stated that an investigation that he conducted into the matter confirmed an opinion that he held before he was made chairman of the committee, that "true patriotism and the Church's duty to the state in times of peace no less than war," "clean mind in a clean body" "duty to God and man," "efficient in creating a splended physical manhood," etc., etc., etc. Those present who were opposed to an endorsement of the R. O. T. C. stated that this country was headed for the same condition that existed in Germany before the war. The convention acted favorably on the report.

THE RESULT OF THE PAY-AS-YOU-GO PLAN

By Lewis B. Franklin

The first year of the "Pay-as you-Go" plan is closed. Here are some of the results:

1. The National Council will close its books for the year with a small surplus without using as current income the principal of any undesignated legacies.

2. Out of 97 dioceses and districts to which quota were alloted 49 have paid their full share of the budget. In 1925 there were 32 dioceses which paid the full budget quota.

3. The Council has received from 74 dioceses the amount they told the Council to expect, while four others met their budget quota but failed to pay an expected surplus.

4. The dioceses told the Council to expect $3,057,934 (corrected figure). The dioceses paid $3,028,983.51 making a net shortage of $28,950.49. The shortage has been made up by savings in excess of earlier estimates in operating expenses.

The National Council expresses to all who have worked so earnestly throughout the year its heartfelt appreciation.

but, the servants of Christ, the supposedly self-sacrificing followers of the Crucified Son of God "come and go." This sounds well as coming from a city rector in the east; but I bore my "burden and heat of the day" as a young man, starting out on three hundred dollars a year in the ministry, looking after struggling mission churches on a barren sea-girt coast, burying many a baby in a biscuit box, and I have earned the right to say what I think in this connection.

Our young men should offer for just such posts as are to be found in the rural communities and small towns of West Texas, and the Church should possess the authority to place her men in such strategic points in West Texas, Oklahoma and elsewhere for such a period of time as the diocesan considers best for all the interests concerned. Irremediable opportunities are being lost in Texas through the worldly ambitions of our young and less young priests who are anxious to stick to the larger centers of population and who prefer "cushy jobs" to the enduring of hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. Our Bishops in the West, South West and in the more remote dioceses of the Church are at their wits end to provide spiritual supervision of the people within their ecclesiastical jurisdiction. It must simply break their hearts to realize what might be done and to know how little is being done to meet the opportunities that are rich to the seeding and harvest.

Reliable statistics show that "the Church has very nearly three-fourths of her communicant strength within the territory of the States first settled through the original colonies, and that nearly three-fourths of her active clergy are at work in this territory." Think of it! Twenty-two hundred and sixty-four of the clergy are serving in the following group of six states, including the District of Columbia: Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Maryland, and this out of a total working force in the United States of four thousand, eight hundred and fifty—inclusive of bishops, archdeacons, general missionaries, executive secretaries, chaplains, professors and teachers. And, a hundred years from now the greater population of this country will be west of the Mississippi River! What do I suggest? Well, it is of very little importance to anybody what I suggest; but I suggest this: AN ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF OUR HOUSE OF BISHOPS TO CONSIDER JUST SUCH MATTERS AS THE FOREGOING. And, now, my space is up!

THE MEANING OF THE CHURCH YEAR

An Article for Young People

BY REV. GEORGE PARKIN ATWATER

IF YOU were to attend a baseball game with no knowledge of the game, or of the rules, it would not interest you. If any grown up American boy should appear at school who did not know the difference between first base, second base, third base and "home," you would think that his education had been neglected. It wouldn't be any fun to have a boy in the game who didn't know enough to run to first when he had hit the ball. The boy himself would not enjoy the game.

Have you ever watched a game of chess? Two men sit on opposite sides of a "checker-board," on which are placed odd little pieces, of curious form. The men stare hard at the board for a long time, and then one player moves a single piece to another square, or else he removes a white piece from the board entirely, and puts one of his black pieces in its place. If you know nothing about chess it is very perplexing. Why should that piece that looks like a horse's head be moved in such a peculiar fashion? And why should that tall piece have the privilege of going clear across the board?

In order to understand the game you must first study the names of the pieces. You learn which is a Knight, which is a Castle, which is a Queen, and so forth. Then you must learn the manner in which each piece may be moved on the board. After you have proceeded so far you may begin to learn to play. And then you may watch a game with real interest.

SYSTEMATIZE

It is so with every method or device intended to systematize our actions or our knowledge. They become interesting or valuable only when we give enough attention to them to learn the meaning and the vocabulary of the system.

The Church has a great number of valuable things to teach you. It would be confusing to present them in one big group of unrelated facts rather than in a definite and logical order. It would be as if the Baldwin Locomotive Works should deliver two or three car loads of "parts" to a railroad, and say "Here is your engine." We know that it is not really an engine until it is "assembled."

Latin grammar is hard enough as it is, but how much harder it would be if we tore apart the pages of the book and tried to study grammar by selecting pages at random.

The Church wishes to teach you certain facts and principles in a proper order. And as she teaches she wishes to have you put the teachings into practice, so that you may carefully express in life, and in character, the very thing being taught. It is as if an instructor in the gymnasium should not only tell you how to exercise on the parallel bars, but should, with each instruction, have you actually exercise on the bars.

THE CHURCH YEAR

So within the Church there has been developed a system of presenting its teachings. This system is called the Church Year.

The Church Year is an arrangement of the calendar year, in eight seasons, during which the Church sets forth, in order, the events of Christ's life, His important teachings, and other Christian facts and instructions.

During the year the Church presents its truths and teaches its practices, to increase your knowledge of the Christian religion, and to develop your Christian character.

We must think of the Church Year, not as a succession of Sundays which have special names, but as a succession of seasons in which certain Sundays naturally fall. Added to this are certain special days which we call Holy Days, on each of which a special event is commemorated, or some person remembered.

The Church Year will never have its real value for you unless you are willing to spend a few minutes to learn the order of the seasons. Can you imagine the perplexity of the person who did not know the order of the months of the year? If he thought that June followed February, and that December followed August, his mind would be in confusion about summer, and Christmas and birthdays, and the orderly succession of events.

LEARN THESE

This is equally true with the Church Year. Our first task is to learn the order of the Church seasons. And it is a very easy task if we undertake it in the proper way. There are only eight seasons, but they should be learned in groups. Fix your attention upon this group, and repeat the words until you have them firmly fastened in mind.

ADVENT, CHRISTMAS, EPIPHANY

Repeat this group of words until you cannot fail to say them in the right order, just as you would say Sunday, Monday, Tuesday. When this is really learned take the next group of three seasons:

LENT, EASTER, ASCENSION

Having repeated these until you can say them without effort, then learn the next two:

WHITSUN-TIDE, TRINITY

Now repeat the whole group in this fashion:

Advent, Christmas, Epiphany (pause)
Lent, Easter, Ascension (pause)
Whitsun-tide (pause), Trinity

There you have them, and no one will ever be able to convince you that Advent follows Epiphany.

THE REASON

But there is a logical reason for this grouping of the seasons. Let us consider these facts about the first group:

Advent, Christmas, Epiphany are the seasons that illumine the teachings of the Coming of Jesus Christ to earth.

The word "Advent" means "coming" and refers to the coming of Jesus Christ. There are four Sundays in the Advent Season. On those Sundays the Church teaches us that Christ's first coming was expected, and that we should prepare for His second coming. The Advent season falls in December (see Prayer Book, pp. 52-57).

It is natural that the Season of Advent, which sets forth the expectation of Christ's coming, should be followed by the season in which the Church celebrates the fact that Christ came, in the flesh.

This is the Christmas season, the chief festival of which is Christmas Day. It is not necessary to enlarge upon the meaning of this season, for it is the part of the Church Year that is observed by all people. (See Prayer Book pp. 58-67).

EPIPHANY

But we must not forget that Christ came, not to be the Saviour of the Jews only, but to be the Saviour and the Light, of all people, for all time. The Church teaches this in the Epiphany season. The word "Epiphany" means "a showing forth" or "manifestation" and refers to the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles.

The Epiphany season begins with the Feast of the Epiphany, January 6th, and lasts from one to six weeks, depending on the date of Easter. (See Prayer Book, pp. 69-80).

The next group of seasons, Lent, Easter, Ascension, sets forth the facts and teachings that surround the latter days of Christ, and His departure from earth. His coming is thus presented in three seasons, and His departure in three seasons. But that the transition may not be so abrupt, the Church has set apart three Sundays, between Epiphany and Lent, in which to prepare her children to go from the joyous seasons of Christmas and Epiphany, to the penitential season of Lent. These are the Sundays with the hard names:

SEPTUA-GESIMA

SEXA-GESIMA

QUINQUA-GESIMA

These mean "seventieth day," "sixtieth day," and "fiftieth day," and refer to the approximate relation of these Sundays to Easter Day. They are like a chain of three links binding together the Advent-Christmas-Epiphany and the Lent-Easter-Ascension group of seasons. (See Prayer Book, pp. 81-84).

LENT

Lent is a penitential season of forty days, not counting Sundays. Lent begins with Ash Wednesday. The last day of Lent is Easter Even, or the Saturday before Easter. The second Sunday before Easter is called Passion Sunday, and the week following Passion Sunday is called Passion Week. The Sunday next before Easter is called Palm Sunday, and the week is called Holy Week. Thursday in Holy Week is called Maundy Thursday. Friday in Holy Week is called Good Friday. (See Prayer Book, pp. 86-124).

LENTEN PRACTICE

Lent is the season in which we practice self-discipline, in Prayer, Fasting and Alms-giving, so that we may retain the mastery of the spiritual life over the material. The Church teaches us in Lent of the suffering and trials of Christ, which culminated in His crucifixion on Good Friday, when he died upon the Cross for our redemption. Christ by His death upon the Cross made a full, perfect and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world.

We receive the benefits, the power and efficacy of that sacrifice, the remission of sins, by the sacrament of the Holy Communion which Christ Himself instituted on Maundy Thursday, just before His death.

But Christ overcame the power of death, and on the third day He rose from the dead. This fact we call the Resurrection. So on the third day from Good Friday we keep the Feast of the Resurrection, Easter Day. (See Prayer Book, page 125).

(Observe that from Palm Sunday to Whitsunday the Church provides the same number of days to commemorate the events as the events themselves actually occupied. From our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Palm Sunday), to the descent of the Holy Spirit (Whitsunday), eight weeks elapsed. The Church uses eight weeks to commemorate the events of that period).

QUEEN OF FEASTS

Easter Day is called the Queen of Feasts. It fell on the first day of the week. Ever after that Christ's disciples met on the first day of the week to carry out His injunction, given on Maundy Thursday, to celebrate the Holy Communion. This is the origin of the observance of Sunday. Every Sunday is a festival, an echo of Easter. (See Prayer Book, pp. 125-139).

Christ was forty days on earth after His resurrection. He then departed from the earth on Holy Thursday, which we call Ascension Day. We observe Ascension Day always on the fortieth day after Easter. (See Prayer Book, pp. 140-141).

The Ascension season lasts ten days.

We now come to the great festival which is called Whitsun-day. The Apostles tarried in Jerusalem ten days after our Lord's ascension, waiting for the fulfillment of Christ's promise that they should receive the power of the Holy Spirit. On the day of Pentecost (Whitsun-day) they received the power. (Read the Second Chapter of the Book of Acts.)

So the Church observes the Sunday which falls ten days after the Ascension as Whitsunday. (See Prayer Book page 143.) This is the birthday of the Church. From this time the Apostles began their work conscious that they had received power to do so from on high. (Read St. Matthew's Gospel, Chapter 28, verses 18-20.)

Whitsun-tide is the season which begins with Whitsunday. It lasts one week.

TRINITY

Trinity Sunday is the Sunday following Whitsunday. It begins the long Trinity season, which lasts about six months. During this season the Church sets forth the teachings of Christ. (See Prayer Book, pp. 148-186.)

Throughout the Church Year are numerous special days, all of which may be learned from the Prayer Book. (See pages 188-219.)

The Church emphasizes the different seasons, not only by having special names for the Sundays and seasons, but also by providing a special Collect, Epistle and Gospel for each Sunday and Holy Day, and by using proper colors for the hangings and vestments.

If we begin in Advent to observe the Church Year, and use our Prayer Book, and listen to the lessons, we begin to walk in the footsteps of Christ, and to learn His life. It is as if the Church spread the life of Christ before us as a panorama, and we see the succession of events in proper order. Each year we participate in services filled with the spirit and knowledge of Christ.

THE GREAT DRAMA

From Advent to Trinity the great drama of our Lord's life is unfolded with impressive beauty and profound meaning. From the first light that begins like the dawn in Advent, from the joy of Christmas and the universal blessing of Epiphany, the Church leads us through Lent to the depths of our Lord's sufferings on Good Friday; raises us again to the joy of Easter, and the coronation of Ascension Day; then carries us forward to the full appreciation of our fellowship in Him and His Church at Whitsun-tide, and in the teachings of the Trinity Season. The never-to-be-forgotten record is thus interwoven into our lives, so that we are not merely hearers of the story, but are like His disciples, walking with Him over the plains of Galilee, riding with Him over the waters of blue Capernaum, climbing with Him the mountains of Judea, treading with Him the Temple courts at Jerusalem, standing at the foot of the Cross; and finally sharing with the apostles the peace of His Holy Spirit in our lives.

A CONVERSATION FROM LONDON

With the English Editor

REV. A. MANBY LLOYD

First Voice: Hello! Is that you, Spofford?

Second Voice: Yep. Sounds like Manby Lloyd.

1*st V.* Right you are; London talking to New York. Do you hear me? I say do you hear me? (Static.) Hello. Do you hear me now? Say, Canon Elliott, vicar of Leeds, just returned via Aquitania from Chicago. Rotarians may be interested. Anticipate attendance of 8,000 at Ostend meeting in June. Seven Cunarders have been chartered. And are things pretty slick your way, Mr. Sub-editor?

2*nd V.* Wonderful. Ford has started a New Religion, and everything is getting set for a couple of wars. And how's the Empire getting on at your end?

1*st V.* Empire! Begad! That I should live to see its downfall. Closed its doors last night. Crowded with "mashers"; old boys who'd seen Genee dance and had happy memories of such artistes as Arthur Roberts, R. G. Knowles, Vesta Tilley, Marie Lloyd and many another in our time who had set London in a roar. "Good humour," as Goldsmith said, "is the gate to happiness." The Tivoli gone, Pavilion and Oxford passed away, and now the Empire——.

2*nd V.* Hold on, there; this is no vaudeville sheet. I mean the British Empire, not the theatre. Wake up, Manby.

1*st V.* Sorry, my error. British Empire you mean. Well, guess you have heard about the rival Chinese war lord. Somebody is gunning for a war. We think we know who that somebody is; the Bondholder. A little naval demonstration, eh what! If the China Nationalists become stable no doubt English holders of China securities will lose money. China has been victimized in the past; for example, it has been made impossible for her to use her waterfronts freely. Lord Inchcape says the missionaries are to blame. Of course, of course. There was no gold on the Rand, no oil in Persia, no trade in China. Good old Baldwin, he is ——.

2*nd V.* Never mind him—not at $25 a minute; how are Shaw and Wells and Chesterton and Temple and Toc H? They are more important.

1*st V.* Shaw hasn't got over Christmas yet, and Christabel Pankhurst has turned Second Adventist. Great meeting at Albert Hall. F. B. Meyer says movement began nine years ago when our troops entered Jerusalem. Hopes it will lead to reunion of Christendom. Christabel is pessimistic. No sign of the world growing better. That can only come by some cataclysm, some great act of God, to which man will contribute nothing. Dinsdale T. Young said the earthquakes.....

2*nd V.* Never mind what he said. How about Don Quixote?

1*st V.* Chesterton? Sure, he's been talking to the men of Sussex. Spoke of his early days as a child when he was hurried as happily as possible through the beauties of Sussex and chucked out at Brighton, that hideous and vulgar suburb. He was then subjected to a torture known as "sight-seeing." He suggests that a system be organized whereby carefully selected persons may be thrown out of the train at various points between Victoria Station and Brighton so that they may be brought to understand the beauty of Sussex. By the way, how is your Mr. Coolidge? Some one over here has said that he is nearly as eloquent when he speaks as he is when he is silent.

2*nd V.* Wonderful to think we're really telephoning from London to New York. Twenty-five dollars a minute sort of bothers my Yankee disposition, though.

1*st V.* I suppose, but, Bill, this man Chesterton may be a bit heavy at times, but at his best he can put more ideas on a stamp than many men of genius crowd into a page. He's going for Wells again, whose notion of man is a mere transitional type. Wells says that man has become less sexual. Here is Chesterton's answer: "This is hardly the impression of most people who can calmly look around at the life and literature of our time. But it soon becomes apparent that Mr. Wells does not mean what he says, but something quite different. He means, apparently, that man has become less domestic. He means that he is less settled in his sex relations; and he seems in some mysterious way to regard the mere relaxation of sex relations as a retrenchment of them."

2*nd V.* That's good. Go on.

1*st V.* Don't interrupt—I'm reversing the charges on this call you know. To resume—now listen to this: "Darby and Joan are sexual, but Don Juan and Lothario are not. Bancis and Philemon are a shocking case of sexuality; but Jupiter turning into a bull, a swan, and a shower of gold, to pursue his profligacies is an illustration of how completely a divine being disdains the sentiment of sex. It seems to me quite obvious that Mr. Wells is simply using sex as a term of abuse; with a curious trick of employing Puritan denunciations in defense of Pagan philosophy. Hissing the word sexual in that fierce fashion betrays the eternal Manichee inside the materialist."

2nd V. Anything doing in Church news, Manby?

1st V. The Prayer Book, of course, but it is old stuff to you folks. You have gone through all that. Dropping a word here and adding one there, with a few people objecting and the papers making headlines of a split when really things are very calm. There was a great meeting of the English Church Union the other night at which a resolution was passed protesting against the use of our pulpits by Dissenters. The fact is the little chapels are not what they used to be; these meeting houses where the "gospel" was preached by cobblers and clerks have been swamped by the big central halls, with orchestras and jazz hymns and jazzier sermons with plenty of pep in them. Spurgeon, Wesley and Joseph Parker would shed bitter tears over them today. So the best men in dissent are seeking a platform in the Anglican Church. The Union went on record as opposing the practice, the "amiable practice," of inviting the heads of film companies or the proprietors of hotels in Switzerland into the pulpit to enliven, instruct or stimulate the people in the nave. As the resolution stated, "the pulpit matters quite as much as the altar. We must not divorce the mission of the preacher from that of the pastor and priest by allowing any person of good report to occupy the pulpit. To do so is contrary to the Church order."

2nd V. Manby, I am really getting worried about the cost of this. Have you anything more to say that is vital?

1st V. Just lots. It was only this morning that I read in the Mail that troops were on their way to.....

2nd V. Write me about it. I'm not squandering any more money just to hear about another war. Good-bye.

Let's Know

CLIMATE

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

"ENERGY," said Dr. William A. Murrill, of the New York Botanical Garden, "moves the world and energy is very closely related to climate."

He goes on to tell us that changes in climate, so long as they are not too severe, are exceedingly stimulating to human activity. In changeable weather we work better and think better than in weather all of a sameness. It stimulates the blood, like hot and cold baths. Most of us are likely to work best at the end of a storm when we have reacted to the stimulating effects of atmospheric variations.

Crusades in the South

The ideal climate ought to run to moderately cool winters for mental stimulus and moderately warm summers for physical stimulus; there should be rather a high humidity, and frequent changes in temperature, humidity, sunshine, electricity, and barometric pressure. Climate has had a considerable say in the development of various races. Dr. Murrill assures us that the patient endurance of the American Indian was a characteristic acquired during the long period of migration from Asia through the cold north country along the Bering Sea, while the excessive heat of Africa has served to repress development among the negroes. The persistent savagery of the Australian bushmen is said to be induced by the combination of extraordinary heat and desert drought.

Great centers of civilization have existed only where the climate was right for energetic activity. Apparent exceptions to this rule are accounted for by changes in climatic conditions. For instance, the climate in Persia and India of earlier days was much more varied and stimulating than it is now. The fall of the Roman Empire is laid chiefly to similar changes in climate. In the great days of Roman supremacy storms were frequent and rainfall was abundant, but in the third century the storm areas shifted with a resultant decrease in agriculture and a corresponding increase in malaria. So Rome's greatness went out on the wings of the storm.

You may think that this botanical expert is riding a hobby and somewhat straining his conclusions. But there is an interesting thought in connection with it all which may not be altogether far-fetched. Christianity as a universal religion found its origin and took its root in a very small corner of the world called Palestine. But those who study such things tell us that there is no other spot of similar size on the face of the globe which contains such a variety of climatic conditions. Up in the Lebanon mountains one finds almost perpetual snow and pine trees while down around Jericho one meets tropical heat and palm trees; the wheat fields of fertile Esdraelon are in sharp contrast with the sandy stretches of the sea-coast running off toward Egypt. If you take a cross-section through the mountains of Judaea, you will begin with a climate like Egypt on the coast; going up into the foothills, you meet something like the conditions of southern Europe; the Judaean moors farther up are very much like the uplands of central Germany; then you drop suddenly into the Jordan valley where everything is tropical; and finally out on the eastern table-land where the climate is brisk and variable, and where the Arabs say "the cold is always at home." Yet from the sea-coast to Trans-Jordania is only 70 miles.

Was it more than a mere coincidence that Christ came to the world by way of Palestine? Looking at it in a long and large way, God does seem to know how things really ought to be done.

Current Comment

By Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott

THE big-city church is predominantly a rural institution with scarcely an attempt at adaptation to its urban environment, according to the report of a study of Protestant churches in cities of over 100,000 population just issued by the Institute of Social and Religious Research, New York. Fifty-eight per cent of all the churches studied, the report finds, bore evidence of only the most meagre degree of adaptation to the perplexities of city life, while one quarter of them must be classed as wholly unadapted—nothing more or less than "transplanted rural churches." The report, which was written by H. Paul Douglass and is published under the title, "1,000 City Churches," was based upon a sample of 1,044 churches in seventeen of the big-city class. All this is rather sad; if true. As a matter of fact, I do not believe it to be true of Episcopal Churches in our larger communities. Certainly, it is not true of the churches of our own Communion that have come under my personal observation in various cities in the United States. I find that these churches are well-manned, that they have constructive policies and that they are alive to the opportunities prevalent in their midst. I have but little confidence in the reliability of the findings of the average survey in any department of life. A survey is apt to be a bird's-eye-view, and a bird's-eye-view is misleading. Any man in an aeroplane will tell you that!

THE new Governor-General of Canada, Viscount Willingdon, attended divine service on his first and recent visit to Toronto, at St. Alban's Cathedral, and read the lessons in the service. I rather like that; don't you? It means that the representative in Canada of His Majesty King George officially sets all His Majesty's subjects a good example in church-going, and publicly expresses his belief in the Scriptures as the Word of God. Our own public men might well follow suit. After all, the mass of people are just waiting for "a lead." Consciously, or unconsciously, we are all taking our notions of the Christian Life from other people.

THE great appeal that I would make, and it is presumptuous of me to make any appeal at all, is that the Church in the East should set Herself to learn more of the needs of the Church in the West, Middle West, South West, and elsewhere. There is a glorious Harvest Field; but reapers and money are needed.

ON THE Bishops' Crusade in West Texas, I was chiefly struck by three things: The immense distances in the Lone Star State; the great need of population to open up and develop the country; AND the immediate need of clergy to minister to the people already there. I was preaching on the latter count in my own church in Baltimore last Sunday evening, and the next day I received a letter from a layman in which the following words occurred: "The next time you have occasion to write to your friend, Bishop Capers, you can tell him that you have one recruit. I have never made any reservations, mental or otherwise, as to where I would serve my God, and if I were particularly interested in money the ministry would not have any appeal for me. West Texas, or Timbuctoo, sounds as good to me as any other place." There is the right ring in that. And, this from a married man, twenty-seven years of age, engaged at the present time in business. Would that more of our

A Crusader on the Coast

Seminarians were imbued with the same selfless spirit, and ready to give at least a period of their lives to comparatively unremunerative work in the Middle West, South West and West. Then, like "a mighty Army" would move forward the Church of God.

I DO not want to appear too pessimistic, but unless more men are available for the ministry of our Church it will not be long before the Episcopal Church will become extinct in many of the less-settled parts of our country. "Men, and more men," and "More men of the right sort," should be the two-fold slogan of the Church at the present time. And, we must rely less upon recruits from other Churches and from the Church of England in Canada. We must supply our needs from our own Church households and from our own nation. We have been "sponging" for too long a time. "Men, and more men," and "More men of the right sort,"— unless we awaken our Church constituency to the urgent demand for the satisfaction of that slogan the future will not belong to us.

WE ARE all debtors to the Ven. Archdeacon Patterson Smyth, D. D., late rector of that great Church, St. George's, Montreal, for inspiration and comfort. His books have been read and digested by thousands of church people in this country, and he has done us lasting good. "How we got our Bible," "The Gospel of the Hereafter," "A People's Life of Christ," and other volumes, have entered into our souls as abiding substance of spiritual profit, and we are all grateful. Let us wish him God Speed in his retirement from active parochial life, and pray God that he may experience in fullest measure "light at even-tide."

Bishops' Crusade Brings Out Large Crowds in Cities Throughout The South

FOLLOW-UP IMPORTANT

By Rev. High Moor

The Bishops' Crusade which began in the diocese of Georgia January 23rd met with overwhelming success from the very beginning. The first service was held at Christ Church, Savannah, with the Rev. Julius Schaad of Augusta as the missioner. A choir of over 100 rendered the music. The congregation, composed of all of the churches of the city, completely filled the church. Morning services were held during the week when Mr. Schaad lectured on the "Inner Shrine." Each afternoon the women met under the leadership of Mrs. Loring Clark of Tennessee. Mr. Courtney Barber of Chicago addressed several meetings for men, while the Rev. C. C. J. Carpenter of Waycross was the leader at the meetings of the Young People. The last service was attended by a thousand people, Bishop Reese, assisted by four clergymen, administering the sacrament to over seven hundred.

The Crusade in the diocese of Florida closed on January 21st, after a most successful week in four centers: Jacksonville, Gainesville, Pensacola, and Tallahassee. The crusaders were Bishop Mikell of Atlanta, Rev. Dennie Whittle of Virginia, Mr. Bartow Strang of Chattanooga and Mr. Edward Bonsall of Philadelphia. Crusaders are now going throughout the diocese holding services in every parish and mission.

An average of 2500 people attended the Crusade meetings in Richmond, Virginia, each day. The crusaders were Bishop Cook of Delaware, Dean Gateson of Bethlehem, Pa., and Dr. L. W. Glazebrook of Washington, D. C. The crusaders were in Charlotteville last week and are now in Alexandria.

The writer spent eight happy and inspiring days with the clergy and congregations of the Hackensack Archdeaconery in the diocese of Newark. I visited New York, of course, dropping into the New York office of THE WITNESS, allowed myself to be persuaded to undertake to write these News Paragraphs from the South. I shall need a great deal of help and will appreciate it if Southern Churchmen and Churchwomen will supply me with items from their parishes; my address, Atlanta, Georgia.

The Rev. Mr. Memminger of All Saints, Atlanta, has returned from the diocese of Western Massachusetts where he visited various parishes, holding services and conferences.

At Macon, Georgia, the Rev. Barney Phillips of Washington and the Rev. James D. Gobson of Covington, Kentucky, were the leaders. One of the things stressed at Macon was the regular reading of Church literature, and the Rev. Cyril Bentley, the chairman, reports that many subscriptions were taken for the Spirit of Missions and for THE WITNESS and many copies of Dr. Atwater's book, The Episcopal Church, were sold. It is a phase of the work that needs to be stressed. It is certainly one very effective way of retaining the enthusiasm for the Church that the Crusaders are arousing.

Ten Years Ago

TEN years ago the following item appeared in THE WITNESS: The Rev. Irwin St. John Tucker, the well known clergyman, lecturer, and editor, who in recent news dispatches has been called the confessor and social advisor to the Hobo College, founded in Chicago by James Edes How, the millionaire hobo, has announced that the government is preparing formally to recognize the migratory worker in connection with the Federal Employment Bureau. Mr. Tucker is trying to persuade the government to set aside a room where hobos may gather and discuss their problems.

The Churches Oppose Trouble in Mexico

Administrative Committee of Federal Council of Churches Demands Arbitration

NO FORCE

By Arthur E. Hungerford

"The present difficulties in Nicaragua and Mexico should lead our government to formulate a clear policy for our future relations with the peoples and governments of Latin America," says a statement to church people issued by the Administrative Committee of the Federal Council of Churches.

The document expresses "profound gratification" for the announcement by the governments of both the United States and Mexico that they have accepted in principle the method of arbitration, and also calls attention to the need for our nation to be "free from even the appearance of effort forcibly to control the life of other sovereign nations." It further states that "We cannot conceal from ourselves the fact that there has been a fresh outbreak of suspicion on the part of Latin-American people that the United States may undertake to dominate by force their economic and political life."

The statement adopted by the Federal Council of Churches is as follows:

"The Administrative Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America notes with profound gratification that the governments of both United States and Mexico have in principle committed themselves to arbitration as the method of settling present difficulties in their relations with each other.

"We are especially moved to express our appreciation of this procedure because the Executive Committee of the Federal Council on December 9 at its annual meeting in Minneapolis, attended by representatives of the 28 denominations comprising the Council, unanimously urged "that some method of peaceful settlement can and should be found."

Really very great interest has marked the Crusade throughout the diocese of Massachusetts, where the Rev. Henry Hobson of Worcester, Massachusets, Bishop Dallas of New Hampshire and Mrs. Samuel Thore, Jr., of New York have been the crusaders. A feature of the crusade has been a time set aside each day by the leaders for personal interviews.

Bishops' Crusade on the Pacific Coast Brings Out Large Attendance

HUMOR

By Bishop Stevens

The diocese of Los Angeles had as its special guests for its diocesan convention during the last week, Bishop Rowe of Alaska, Bishop Thomas of Wyoming, the Rev. Charles P. Deems, D. D., of San Francisco, and the Rev. Thomas Burgess, D. D., of the National Council. All of these clergy addressed some of the meetings held in connection with the Convention. From the point of view of numbers it was an unusually successful session. At the Woman's Auxiliary meeting many were turned away for lack of room and the attendance at the opening meeting of the Convention itself was the largest in years. The only note of sadness was the absence of the Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Joseph H. Johnson, who is still seriously ill at his home in Pasadena. Matters of special importance at the Convention were the raising of a special fund of $30,000 for Church Extension; the announcement of an Endowment Fund for St. Paul's Cathedral, and a special effort for St. Philip's Church, the colored congregation of Los Angeles.

Several years ago through the generosity of the Cambridge Theological School, an arrangement was made whereby a professor from that institution should be assigned each year for a month's work at the Church Divinity School of the Pacific in San Francisco. Last year the lecturer was Dr. James Thayer Addison. This year the Rev. Dr. James Arthur Muller of the department of Church History at Cambridge is giving an intense course,—forty hours in one month! Dr. Muller is the author of a brilliant work on Stephen Gardiner which was published about a year ago and which received the highest commendation on both sides of the Atlantic.

Bishop Freeman Says That Washington Was a Devout Churchman and Regular Attendant

ANSWER TO CRITICS

By Rev. William B. Spofford

The Bishop of Washington, the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, in a communication that has been sent to the clergy throughout the country, comes to the defense of George Washington as a Churchman. Within the past year two biographers have endeavored to show that Washington was a man without religious aspirations. Bishop Freeman quotes from the vestry book of Truro Parish, from the vestry book of Christ Church, Alexandria, from Washington's diary and from other records to prove that he was a devout Churchman who was regular in his church attendance. Bishop Freeman closes his communication by expressing the earnest hope that an increasing number of churches will observe February 20th, the Sunday nearest to Washington's Birthday, as National Cathedral Sunday.

producers of filthy plays, sordid sex-novels, and the publishers of indecent magazines, that their products are a sin against God and a crime against the life of our land, and that we will find a way to put a curb to them." More than 600 people greeted the Bishop and Mrs. Manning at a reception following the dinner.

While on the subject of indecent literature I have a little tale to tell. Not long ago I had an hour with a prominent clergyman who was holding a preaching mission in one of the largest churches in the country as a part of the Bishops' Crusade. Being connected with a Church school as a trustee, with much to say as to their business affairs, I talked to him about advertising, and particularly about getting the school before the people of the Church through the pages of the Church weeklies. Here is his reply; "We used the Church papers as you know a couple of years ago. It is doubtful if we will use them again for we have discovered that advertising in other magazines brings better results. We are now advertising in the ———, and we are paying in advance to get our ads in there. The reason that we are using that magazine is because it is spicy sex stuff that the girls read. The girls see our ad. The girls pick their school today, not the parents, and we find that girls are coming to the school as a result of this advertising." I can think of several New Testament texts that might be tacked on to these two paragraphs. I rather have an idea that a Church school that is building its enrollment on advertising in a sex magazine, and is doing it quite deliberately and frankly, will in the course of time be in as vital need of reformation as is the New York stage about which we hear so much. Of course I do not mean to depreciate the remarks made by Bishop Manning. He was frank and fearless in a day when to speak on such matters is apt to call forth cartoons in the daily papers in which one is pictured with a frock coat, a tall hat, a taller face and a drooping chin; and the school in question is several hundred miles removed from his diocese.

Investments in the Newsprint Paper Industry

The day has passed when large areas of pulpwood, lying close to ample water power and accessible to the great newsprint paper markets, can readily be found.

Existing properties of this character have, for this reason, an element of value, already recognized by thoughtful investors, which will become more apparent as time goes on. Available pulpwood, becoming scarcer each year, has immense potential value.

We are offering a highly attractive issue of First Mortgage Bonds of a Company which is an important unit in a group composed of some of the strongest newsprint interests on the North American Continent.

The yield is 6½% and we suggest that you send for circular No. 1258, describing this very desirable investment.

little pamphlet which is distributed free by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints which eloquently sets forth their claims. Is there anyone in Cincinnati or elsewhere who cares to make it possible for us to send Canon Reade a bundle of papers each week for free distribution in these institutions? If so, tell us how many to send and we will send you a quarterly statement at three cents a copy.

The season for Open letters is on apparently. One is received from the Rev. J. Baptiste Blanchet of Olga, Florida. Brother Blanchet, I judge from his remarks, asked for a job at the office of the National Council and was turned down. So he sends to us an open letter addressed to Bishop Murray, the Presiding Bishop, in which he bawles out the National Council, the Pension Fund, and is rather eloquent in his denunciation of Bishops. "It was recently truly said that the Church was dying of dry rot at the top, meaning the lackadaizical idiosyncrasy of the Episcopate. The National Council with heavy overhead expenses is very busy raising huge sums to convert the heathen (?) paying tithe of mint, anise and cummin but forgetting the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith toward those who have borne the burden and heat of the day without receiving the penny." One may appreciate such fire and eloquence even though one may have a hunch that a personal disappointment prompted it. Some pscho-analyist should tell Brother Blanchet that the clever way of airing one's own grievance is in pleading the cause of another.

Another letter is received from a very prominent layman who asks if something cannot be done to safeguard the sacred ministry from self-seekers. He gives a half dozen examples that have recently come to his attention of clergymen who left their parishes quite frankly because they could, if not fatten their pocket-books, at least make sure that something was in it. One of them discovered that the most attractive openings presented themselves to him as a Buddist and so he is now a Buddist priest; another fills a pulpit on Sunday and during the week knocks out a nice tidy sum as an insurance agent. And so it goes, through a nine page letter. But don't you laymen get too much joy out of it; he also has something to say to you: "We of the laity are for the most part spiritual paupers. We, like the beggar with his tin-cup, go to service on Sunday and to a large extent mechanically receive our unearned dole; others of us enjoy the intellectual treat furnished by the choir or the clergyman's essay. We of the laity must get into action to get at the substance of spiritual things."

The Rev. Thomas Casady, the rector of All Saints, Omaha, Nebraska, has prepared a Christian intelligence test. Here it is:

If you can give a clean-cut answer to the following propositions together with your reasons therefor and can defend your position in controversy, you have a brain. What is more, you know a great deal about the Christian Religion.

If you cannot answer these questions, except with indefinite, generalized opinions and if you are not willing to make a personal decision on each one of them is it not about time you began to study up a bit on the teachings of the religion you profess. Churchmen ought to have a Christian answer for the problems of the day. These are just a few of the easier problems as a sort of Christian intelligence test.

May a Christian fight?

What should be the Christian's attitude toward the criminal?

What business has the Church meddling in matters of state?

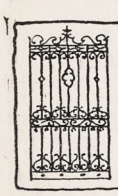
How can and does the Church of today relate itself to economic problems?

Is the praise of poverty to be commended?

Has the message of Jesus anything to offer in the solution of the labor problem today?

In this age of easy divorce what is the Christian solution?

How shall we view the problem of authority? To what voices shall we listen?



Given the world as we find it, with all the misery in sight, how shall we set things right?

As Christians what is our ultimate goal?

What have Christians to do with world affairs?"

Very successful Crusade meetings have been held in the diocese of Northern Indiana. The Crusaders were Bishop Mitchell of Arizona and Mrs. Edwin J. Randall of Chicago.

This from the Bishop of Maine, the Rt. Rev. Benjamin Brewster: "Perhaps you will find room in THE WITNESS for a mention of the fact that we have begun the Bishops' Crusade in Maine, with the Right Rev. Paul Jones, the Rev. A. R. Parshley and the Rev. F. D. Dean, M. D., as Crusaders, together with Miss Lucy Sturgis.

"In spite of unfavorable weather the work has gone on most encouragingly. The two presbyters conducted a successful mission in Portland with the Cathedral as the center of the work for six days beginning January 9. They then separated and went to various outlying stations.

"Bishop Jones began a six days' mission at Bangor January 16, afterwards going to two points in Aroostook County, namely Presque Isle, and Houlton for three days each. Bishop Jones commanded the interested attention of many in Bangor. The services and meetings were constantly splendidly attended, and on all sides it was evident that a profound impression was made by his searching and straight-forward and persuasive presentation of the far-reaching application of the Gospel. A like response undoubtedly has attended his efforts further north. Well known in Maine, Bishop Jones has deepened the thought of many people and has extended his circle of friends in the State."

Less than a year ago the first service was held at Brenwood, Contra Costa County, California, led by the Rev. A. E. Martyr, in charge of work in the county. Today a $5000 church is nearly ready for use. This church has been built entirely by the twenty communicants, two of whom were presented for confirmation several years ago by Bishop Johnson when he was rector in Minneapolis. These folks have not asked anyone for a cent—they are doing the job themselves.

The Federal Council of Churches has issued a call for prayer over world issues; suggesting that congregations throughout the country pray that our country be Christian in our attitude toward China, Mexico, Nicaragua and Europe. Meanwhile the recruiting stands in New York at least have chalked up over their gayly colored posters about "Join the Marines and see the World" these words: "Men wanted at once for China."

The choir of fifteen or twenty years ago: This from the Rev. Arthur T. Reasoner of Leonard Hall, Bethlehem, Pa.: "Your request for information about old choirboys brought to mind an incident of a few years ago in Ohio. Eleven of our clergy had gathered in a group after an ordination. During the conversation someone asked how many of those present came into the Church 'through the choir door'. We discovered that eight of the eleven had been choir boys and that they had all come from non-Episcopal families. They had been led into the Church and into the ministry by belonging to a choir. This shows that the boy-choir, which some of our priests so scornfully decry, is a powerful missionary force. Nine of those eleven had been in choirs; eight from non-Church families, with one only from a Church family. This is not quite the line you asked for but I did want to make my contribution to the game."

Now here is an interesting bit that I clipped from the New York Sun; refers of course to the Marlborough case:

When Henry Eighth began to search
For ways to put away his lady
He thought he had to found a church
To keep the deal from being shady.

It seems that Hank was not so bright;
The modern method's far more canny —
He should have claimed coercion, fright,
Annulled the bond and wedded Annie.

If he had known this simple way,
Had dropped his Church of England planning,
Just think! — we wouldn't hear today
A single peep from Bishop Manning!

Miss Lucia Briggs, President of Milwaukee-Downer, was given that honor at the meeting held in Chicago on January 13, 14, and 15. The President of one of the Church Colleges, Dr. Bernard I. Bell of St. Stephen's College was for the third successive year elected a member of the Directing Committee of six which controls the activities of the Association and also for the third time its treasurer.

READING THE BIBLE

An Article for Young People

BY REV. THOMAS K. NELSON

WHEN I was a boy I had a friend who used to chin six times and read three verses of the Bible every night before going to bed. Both were good for him, but it is doubtful whether he got a very good idea of what the Bible was all about. I want to suggest to you a few ideas which will make the Bible a real live book to you. Boys do not, I fear, read the Bible very much, and this is because they find it either uninteresting or unintelligible—it really is neither.

Read Intelligently

In the first place the Bible should be read intelligently. In order to do this you must read it like any other book. That is, you must try to find out what were the conditions under which the author wrote and what he was trying to say. Now the Bible is not one book by one author written in one age, it is a collection of a great many books by many authors, and its writing took at least 900 years. It follows that one of the first rules is this—Read the Bible not by verses or chapters, but by books—Take some one book and find out just who the author was, when he lived, what problems he had to solve, and how he solved them. With some books this is very difficult, with some almost impossible, but with others it is not difficult, and with some whose author is not known it is still possible to discover the period in which he wrote and the purpose for which he wrote. As examples, I would suggest Amos or Ezekiel in the Old Testament; Acts or one of St. Paul's shorter epistles in the New Testament.

Again you will find it helpful to take stock of the chief difficulties you find in reading the Bible, face them frankly and see if you cannot find out how to overcome them.

Words and Phrases

First there is the difficulty that you meet with words and phrases which you do not understand. There are two ways of meeting this difficulty, the first is to use a commentary or dictionary of the Bible, the second is to read the Bible in a modern translation; very good are Kent's Shorter Old Testament and Moffatt's or Goodspeed's New Testament.

In the second place there is the difficulty that there are long passages which are uninteresting and tiresome, such as genealogies. The best thing to do with these is to leave them out. There is nothing to be gotten by ploughing through them as though the Bible were a collection of magic words all of which must be read in order to make the charm work.

Contradictions

The third and more serious difficulty is that some statements seem to contradict the facts of nature as scientifically demonstrated, as for example, the story of creation in Genesis 1 and 2. Two things are to be said about this, first there are really very few such passages, none so far as I remember in the New Testament and a very small number in the Old. If they disturb you leave them out—or better still get rid of the comparatively modern idea that every word of the Bible is true and learn once for all that the Bible grew just like any other literature and represents not the work of God revealing infallible words to men, but the Pilgrim's Progress of a race, the long search of man for truth, and that it contains the results of man's early and unscientific attempts to explain the universe—explanations which we no longer hold.

Primitive Ideas

A fourth and still more serious difficulty is this, that we find ideas about God which are opposed to the character of God as revealed in Christ, as for example that God is the God of Jews alone, caring nothing for other nations, that he is a God of vengeance who practically delights in bloodshed so that when Achan sinned not only he, but his whole family must be stoned to death.

I am certain that many boys reading such passages feel that they cannot worship such a God and they are right. Again such ideas occur only in the Old Testament, and again the solution to the difficulty lies in remembering that the Bible records the religious ideas of a race extending over many centuries and that these ideas rose gradually to a higher plane. Our Lord Himself saw and taught this—when John and James wished to call down fire on the village which would not receive them as the prophets of old might have done, He said, "Ye know not what spirit ye are of."

The Test

Test every idea of God in the Old Testament by the character of Christ—any idea which is opposed to His character is not true of God. For God is like Christ, and God's character has not changed. He always has been like Christ. My first main suggestion then is that you face quite frankly the difficulties you may meet and read your Bible intelligently, remembering that Christ said you must love God with your mind.

My second suggestion is that you read your Bible with a definite purpose and it seems to me that there are two purposes worth setting before you, the first is to study the Bible historically—to watch in the Old Testament the development of the Hebrew nation as a nation and of the Hebrew religion as a religion, and in the New Testament the development of the Christian Church and the religion of Jesus. These are fascinating stories and well worth the trouble of some real work. This kind of work can perhaps best be done in organized classes under trained leaders, but it is not beyond the power of any intelligent boy especially if he will get a few good books on the subject.

READ THE BEST

The second and more important purpose is to read your Bible in order to get the best out of it. Now that best is not after all either scientific or historical truth, but religious truth, the truth about the nature of God, the nature of man and the relation between the two. The Bible is not the only book which contains these truths, yet there is no other book in all literature that declares them as profoundly and as clearly as the Bible. Read it with your heart and mind keenly alert to find these truths. A man who had in his hand a heap of pebbles some of which were of great value, would not throw them all away because some were of no value. He would search through them until he found the valuable ones and those he would hold on to as a great possession.

So with the Bible, many parts may seem useless to you, yet some are of priceless value. As one example, take the book of Deuteronomy. There are in it many laws useless to us, but there are also some statements of eternal and priceless truth, such as:

Thou shalt love Jehovah thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind.

This is the highest aim a man can put before himself.

READ REGULARLY

My third suggestion is that you make a habit of giving some of your best time each day to reading your Bible. By your best time I mean the time when your mind is fresh and keen. I believe in the custom of reading a little of the Bible every night before going to bed, because it puts good thoughts in your mind to spend the night there and that is a fine thing to have, but I do not think that the last few moments at night are a time when the mind or heart is very keen and I do not think it is a good time to learn anything. So I would suggest that you give a few moments each day of your best time to the Bible. Notice too that I say make a habit of doing this. It is not necessary to dwell on the value of habit, it must have been drilled into you, but you might notice that the power of habit which is very great and very harmful when the habit is bad, is just as great and correspondingly helpful when the habit is good. So I say make a habit of giving some of your best time every day to your Bible and do not let anything interfere with it, or push it aside.

Last Call

RECTOR and Discussion Leaders planning to use THE WITNESS during Lent must send the Bundle Order by wire immediately to enable us to send them copies of the issue of March third. The paper during Lent is to carry two special series of articles: Spiritual Values and Religious Standards by Bishop Johnson; and The Big Story, the Gospel According to a Newspaper Man, by Irwin St. John Tucker. No orders can be filled that are received after noon, Monday, February 28th. Telegraph your order to the Chicago office.

READ PRACTICALLY

My fourth chief suggestion is that you read your Bible practically. You remember in Nicholas Nickleby Mr. Squeers' method of teaching. First, the boys learned to spell horse, then he went out and combed the horse, or he spelled window, then he went out and washed the window. Mr. Squeers was a bad man, but he had gotten hold of a good method. You may well apply it to your Bibles. First search them for some practical truth, then go out and practice it. It is perfectly useless to read Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself—and then go out and either forget it or do somebody a mean trick. You must go out and try to do it. It is useless to read: Blessed are the pure in heart, and then go out and forget it or be impure in thought or deed. You must practice it. You must be absolutely and chivalrously pure yourself and help others to be pure. The Bible is first and foremost a practical book, it teaches you what you must do. The traveler who studies his map, but does not follow it will get lost, the pilot who pores over his chart and does not follow it will wreck his boat, the man who learns the laws and then disobeys them is liable to land in jail. The Bible is all of these: a map for the traveler by land, a chart for the sailor, a book of rules for the player of life's game. Read it and then obey it.

This is the point that Jesus insisted on in the great parable in the seventh chapter of St. Matthew: There were two men who built each a house—one house fell, the other house stood. The difference was that one man obeyed the word, the other did not.

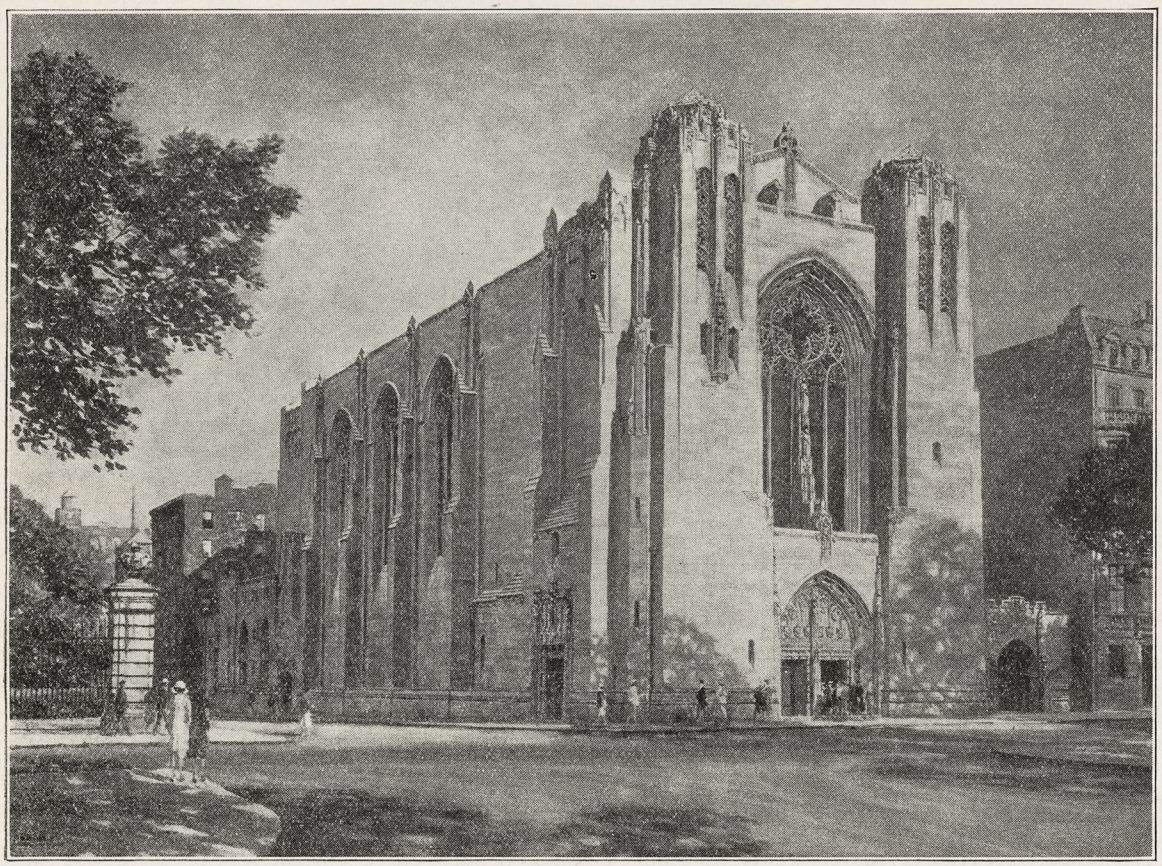
READ PRAYERFULLY

My fifth and last suggestion is that you read your Bible with the help of prayer. Prayer for wisdom to understand for as St. James says, "If any of you lacketh wisdom let him ask of God, who giveth to all and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." Never forget that Christ himself said, "The Spirit of God shall lead you into all truth." You may be sure that if you pray to God His Spirit will show you more and more clearly the truth about Him, and illustrate for you the dark places in His word. And pray for the will and power to obey it. It is much easier to understand God's word than it is to obey it. There is a dark mysterious Power striving to pull you down, but there is a greater Power striving to pull you up. Read your Bibles with prayer and you shall know the truth. You shall learn the will of God, and have grace and power to fulfill the same.

Almighty God who has caused all Holy Scriptures to be written for our learning, grant that we may so read them, that we may both learn thy will and receive Power to obey it. Through Jesus Christ our Lord.

LIBERALS MEET IN PHILADELPHIA

Resolutions approving the creation of an organization that would strive to eliminate the Catholic party within the Episcopal Church were adopted today by clergymen attending the Septuagesima Conference of Liberal Churchmen of the Province of Washington and parts adjacent.



A plan for creating such an organization was outlined in a paper by the Right Rev. Robert L. Harris, Bishop of Marquette, Mich., which in the absence of the Bishop was read by the Rev. George Shepard Southworth, dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, Marquette.

The paper depicted the Catholic party in the Episcopal Church as an "enemy within" and the discussion following its reading was so spirited that Bishop Garland, of Pennsylvania, was moved to say:

"Let us not forget that there are many on the other side who love the Church as much as we, and that some in the Catholic party do not want the Church to be Romanized. We are all seeking the truth, and a militant spirit accomplishes little. Let us present the truth in love, confident that by so doing the truth will prevail. But let us present it in love."

In Seattle they had to have an overflow meeting when 2,000 people tried to crowd into St. Mark's for the opening service. Bishop Faber of Montana and the Rev. Mark Rifenbark of California, and Mrs. Wilson Johnston of Portland, were the Crusaders.

NEW CHURCH ON FIFTH AVENUE

To be Built This Summer

BY JOHN LARKIN, JR.

A NEW phase in American ecclesiastical architecture will be presented in the Church of the Heavenly Rest and Chapel of the Beloved Disciple now being constructed at Ninetieth Street and Fifth Avenue, New York. While the edifice is Gothic in principle, it has no direct prototype, being essentially an American creation.

The church group consists of three units, the church, the chapel and the parish house, which includes a community center. Hardie Phillip, of the firm of Mayers, Murray & Phillip, architects, formerly known as the Bertram G. Goodhue Associates, prepared the designs and plans in compliance with certain definite requirements of the church's building committee.

Now, the church is engaged in raising $1,000,000 by gifts and memorials to complete the necessary $3,250,000 building fund. Approximately $2,250,000 was realized through the sale of old sites. Frank L. Polk is general chairman of the campaign committee; Robert E. Allen, executive chairman, and Clarence C. Chapman, treasurer. The campaign will end with an intensive effort from March 4 to 12.

The site selected, 256 feet deep and 100 feet on Fifth Avenue, is on the avenue's highest point and faces the Carnegie Mansion and Central Park. The church will be one of the only two edifices dedicated to religion on upper Fifth Avenue facing the park. Architects agree that it is one of the last sites in Manhattan on which to build an enduring structure along the grand and uncompromising lines so necessary for ecclesiastical beauty.

Considering this tremendous advantage, the architects next turned their attention to preserving the proportions of the edifice when tall apartment houses are built around it. Aided by scale models, they succeeded in determining proportions which can not be affected by taller buildings.

The Rev. Dr. Henry Darlington, ractor of the parish, in discussing the new church, said:

"While the architecture of the group is Gothic, it is not a copy of the Gothic of any particular time or place. It has drawn its inspiration freely from whatever sources lent themselves to the undertaking. It represents an effort to do as the Gothic builders themselves would have done—that is, to develop new forms and new methods of handling them in accordance with the particular problems involved.

"Apartment houses will surround the building some day. To study this problem the architects prepared small scale models of tall buildings and the church. It was evident from these that towers which had been contemplated would be inadequate unless they were colossal in height. The solution of the problem was found in simplicity of mass, with large areas of plain wall surface relieved at suitable points by carefully detailed mouldings, rich tracery and fine sculpture.

"No direct prototype for this design can be found. It is Gothic in background and in spirit. It is modern in its application of Gothic principles. And moreover, it is a product of this land in which we live."

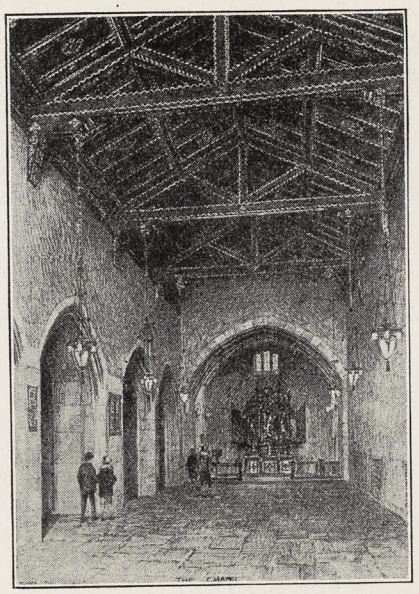
The nave provides space for 1,000 seats, each with unobstructed vision and hearing. These will be divided into four divisions instead of two and will be served by five aisles instead of the customary three, thereby avoiding the discomfort of passing many persons in reaching the inside seats. The floor is to be raised only one step above the street level.

Traceried windows open on the chapel on the south aisle wall. There are none on the north. Above, on both walls, are large clerestory windows forming a deep recess in each bay.

The church is to be lighted indirectly. This plan eliminates large hanging fixtures and avoids their glare in the eyes of the congregation.

The chancel is slightly narrower than the nave. The organ case cannot be seen in it. The pipes are secreted in the walls and speak through a gorgeously carved stone screen flush with the wall surface and from behind the reredos.



On the gospel side of the choir parapet is the lectern made of stone. On the epistle side, against a pier, is the stone pulpit surmounted by a delicately carved wooden conopy. In this canopy loud speakers will be hidden to amplify the voice of a visiting preacher should it be weak. The sedilia and bishop's seat are of stone and like the rear rank of choir stalls, will be built into the walls.

This arrangement makes the altar with its richly colored hangings the focal point of the chancel. The reredos and rose form a stirring background to it. As the reredos rises from a plain stone surface, it is adorned by carved ornament and sculpture, becoming constantly richer until it flowers into a cresting of delicate tracery which frames the rose window.

The chapel to the south of the church is a memorial to the parents of Miss Caroline Talman who first provided for it in 1870. Seating 200 persons, it is reached through a cloistered passage with an entrance on Fifth Avenue. Its walls will be buff sandstone and its ceiling, decoratively painted timbers. The altar will be of wood, decoratively painted in polychrome.

A mortuary chapel will be built under the chancel. Unfinished space under the nave will eventually become a spacious crypt.

East and south of the chancel of the church will be the parish house. A large assembly hall occupies the first floor. The building will contain class rooms and guild halls.

Cheerful Confidences

THE BISHOP'S CRUSADE

By Rev. George Parkin Atwater

THE Bishops' Crusade is drawing to a close. It is hard to estimate its fruits. It is quite probable that we shall never know exactly how much has been accomplished. It has aroused enthusiasm and it has stirred up loyalty. It has generated the power. Now must follow the period of quiet and persistent application of the power to the tasks of the Church.

It is almost unnecessary to point out that every period of intense preaching, or arousing, has one danger. It is the danger of providing no adequate outlet for the power thus generated. If such outlet is not carefully provided, then the power escapes, and the persons suffer a most unsatisfactory reaction.

The period following the Bishops' Crusade should be devoted to intense pastoral and parochial work; to the adjustment of the power to useful tasks; to teaching parish classes; to pastoral calls; to intensifying the efforts of parochial organizations. This will transform the energy into permanent storehouses of service.

The clergy must be careful how they attempt to perpetuate the Crusade, by trying to repreach it on Sundays. The need is now for intelligent and painstaking application of it in the kingdom, not for a decreasing series of arousings.

The supreme task of the Church today is not to arouse spiritual energy, but wisely to direct the energy generated in the Crusade. This is really the harder task, but it is the only way to make the Crusade permanently fruitful.

Today I heard a Bishop preach to nearly three thousand people on loyalty. It was a splendid message, forcefully delivered. The task now is for the clergy to adjust as many as possible of those three thousand to tasks that will promote the kingdom of God.

Fortunately we have an interval before Lent in which to do this painstaking and exacting work in our parishes. It will require all the patience, perseverance and pastoral fidelity which we possess. It must be done quietly, by personal conference, with wise judgment and discretion. Then Lent will come to help us hold the people steady to their tasks. Lent will provide the time to enlist the whole parish by its persistent pressure upon their conscience.

We need less, for the moment, the pressure of more preaching, and we need more the discipline of better practicing.

Anyone who drives an automobile knows the danger of "racing the engine." The Bishops' Crusade has developed the power. Let us not race the engine by further exhortation, but let us give this power some point of application. Then shall we profit by the Crusade.

Reality

Canon Streeter Thinks It Through

By the Rev. C. L. Street

Reality, B. H. Streeter. MacMillan, 1926. $2.00.

Most of us take our opinion ready made from the people we associate with. We don't think, we merely think we think. Those who do achieve some real thinking on ultimate problems in their early days, once having gained a fairly satisfactory position, more often than not rest on their laurels for the remainder of their lives. An open mind—a willingness to rethink our philosophy of life in terms of new discoveries and new points of view—is the fountain of youth intellectually, and one of the hall marks of greatness.

Canon Streeter went to Oxford in 1893 meaning to study law. But before long he realized that the religious beliefs on which he had been brought up rested on a very slender foundation. After a year or so of reading and discussion he arrived at what seemed an adequate intellectual basis for religion in terms of T. H. Green's idealism, taken over from Illingworth and Gore. But before long he realized that his position was far from being "intellectually water-tight," and resolved to think the whole question through again. This book is the result of his labors. He begins by saying that we start with the wrong question. If we ask, "Is Christianity true?" we make religion itself the problem, whereas the truth of religion is worth inquiring about only if, and in so far as, it offers an answer to the problem posed by life." The Christian theologian, having asked the wrong question, has put himself on the defensive. He finds himself "defending the faith." "In effect, he has gotten himself into the position of being anxious to save religion instead of expecting religion to save him."

We must begin, Streeter says, by trying to get at the truth about the world we live in. The universe itself compels us to ask questions. Are we to think of it alive or dead? If alive, what is it after? Then comes the fact of evil, and the practical question, "Is there any way in which I personally can overcome and help others to overcome the suffering and the wrong?"

The author's position is that there are two avenues of approach to reality—science, which works purely in time and space relations and gives part of the picture, and Art and Religion, which do not aim to give knowledge in the scientific sense, but to make us respond in a manner harmonious with the nature of reality. Science is a "representation" in terms of quantity. Religion is a "representation" in terms of quality. Both are equally important. But quality can only be made known by imparting some experiences of it. So in religion what is most important is not theology but "myth, ritual, hymn, parable, epigram, paradox, all of them methods of Art." From this point he goes on to discuss the Christian story. The figure of Christ he says, is the supreme revelation of reality, valid for all time. His life is of the nature of a work of art in that it reveals reality to us directly. And, like a work of art, it can never be superceded.

There are chapters on the "Defeat of Evil," on the new psychology and on immortality. It is a great book.

Rev. Frank Warfield Crowder, rector of St. James', New York, has announced that through the generosity of twenty members of the congregation the organ is soon to be completed—has 33 stops now, and will have 75 before the summer's over. Austin Organ Company is doing the work.

REV. BLAND MITCHELL
Recovering from an Illness

Let's Know

"WHEN YE PRAY"

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

A SERIES of questions comes to me about prayer. Some of them are easily answered; some are a matter of trial and experience.

1. Shall we pray for ourselves or for others first?

I presume this means whether in one session of prayer we ought to give to ourselves or others the priority of attention. I should say that we would better begin with prayer for ourselves in order to be in an attitude of closer communion with God before offering our petitions for others. If there is anything in our own lives which hinders the spirit of prayer, it needs to be cleared away at once. This seems to be the order in the Lord's Prayer—"Give us this day our daily bread and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us."

2. Shall we thank God for His goodness first, or shall we first ask forgiveness for our sins, and for a continuance of His blessings?

Thanksgiving is the best way of opening our spiritual communications with God. It reassures us of the fact that God is willing always to hear us and thereby strengthens the faith with which we proceed to make our further petitions.

3. Is any particular bodily posture necessary when physical ailings and age make some particular posture difficult?

No. Under normal conditions, kneeling is the posture most conducive to prayerfulness, but it is by no means a necessity. In the Eastern Church prayers are mostly said while the people stand. Forbes Robinson, one of the most devout of recent saintly characters, said that he often paced the floor when engaged in a concentrated period of prayer for some particular person or some particular object.

4. Is it not right to say some prayers in bed—for example, to supplement prayers that one has made before going to bed? This may happen when the bed-room is very cold or the person very tired. And would it not be helpful to do so in the morning before one arises from bed?

The answer to No. 3 largely covers this question. God is not so much concerned with how we do it as He is with the spirit which animates our devotions. Particular methods of prayer are encouraged because they have been found to be helpful to us—not to God. We are not all alike. Some methods are more helpful to some of us than to others. There is only one caution. We ought to be careful against following the lines of least resistance. Prayers in bed might be only a mark of spiritual laziness. An offering of drowsy devotion to God is not the best kind of reverence. There is something to be said for standing by habits even of slight self-sacrifice. There are circumstances, of course, which entirely justify recumbent devotions. Christian experience advises us that these conditions should be considered extraordinary rather than normal.

I am glad there are some people who are interested in discovering how best to pray. There is a spiritual technique just as much as there is mechanical skill. We learn to be good mechanics and good Christians in the same way—by practise and experience.

Lots of building going on in that part of Oregon that comes under the jurisdiction of the Rev. Dr. Thomas Jenkins, general missionary. Couple of chapels, a fine new parish house, and land for a church in still another place.

Rev. Kirk B. O'Farrell of Cleveland, had been doing his share on the Crusade—first at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., and just recently in Virginia. My informer also adds: "Also want to tell you that the congregation at Emmanuel, Cleveland, is growing so large that the ushers are having quite a time seating them—course I mean number of people."

Deplores the Poor Singing in Churches

English Parson Requests His Congregation to Remain for Practice

WANTS BETTER SINGING

By Rev. A. Manby Lloyd

Great are the uses of advertisements! Every Monday morning we read of some parson, hitherto regarded as small fry, boosted into fame by the press. This week it is the Rev. M. O. Hodson, vicar of an E. Ham church, who surprised his congregation on Sunday evening by telling them how feeble was their singing, and inviting them to a pre-service choir practice on the following Sunday. In reply to an interviewer he said:

"It is quite true that I criticized the hymn-singing of my parishioners. I even went as far as to liken them to tame cats, I think. I am sure they will take it in good part. Religion must be a warm and living thing. Good, full-throated singing is as necessary in religion as in ordinary secular life.

"The old hymn-books are excellent in their way, but they were written from the point of view of the trained choir. Many of the hymns rely on four-part harmony for their effect. What we want are hymns wherein the melody of itself compels hearty communal singing. Religion should appeal to every side of life, and notably to our love of music. I do not like subjective, lugubrious hymns, so often full of sorrow and without a spark of joyfulness."

Mr. Hodson has only been a fortnight in the parish. He came from Durban, South Africa, where he was an archdeacon.

Then our old friend, the Rev. P. T. Stevens, vicar of St. Matthews, New Kent Road, intends to "name" women scandal-mongers from the pulpit. This should be a draw. Betsy Prig hasn't been to kirk for many a long day, but she is sure to be there if, by any chance, she might hear justice done to Sarah Gamp.

The Archbishop of Canterbury bids all whom his words can reach to guard with wisdom as well as enthusiasm the sacred heritage of the Lord's Day. He says a strange selfishness leads many people, some of whom have leisure all the week through, to spoil the Sundays of other men by the carelessness which leads a man to think only of himself. "Those in responsible positions must have their eyes open to the danger if unintended progress from the provision of innocent recreation to the encouragement of great competitive games or matches, with inevitable conditions of popular gatherings and excitement and consequently multiplied labor. My own feeling is that a word of warning is gravely needed at this time, a word of warning to the whole country and to public bodies in particular, that if Sunday were to be given up chiefly to pleasure-seeking and if facilities for such pleasure-seeking were to be indefinitely multiplied, the price would be deplorable. We should lose the quietude and recuperative restfulness of Sunday in proportion as Sunday traveling, Sunday trading, and Sunday labor were increased. Those on whom the sacrifice would be enforced belong chiefly to the class which has the greatest need of the advantages of Sunday, and is least able effectively to secure them."

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald says that labor is more interested than any other section of the community in preserving one day's rest in seven, and by rest he does not mean recreation.

Sir Harry Lauder, in a message from West Virginia, writes: "I am against Sunday theatre shows, and I have told my fellow artists that if we fail to uphold our religion and our Sunday, men will scorn us, women will weep for us, and children will be taught to hate the name of the theatre, and the curses of the generations to come will be forever at the stage door. Men who disregard God's word and God's work can never hope to be respected. . . . When, for the first time, I came to America, I had four Sunday performances, and a more miserable engagement I never fulfilled. I felt I was doing something against my religion, something which I had been taught by my mother, was wrong. It was unnatural for me to work on the Sabbath, and I felt ashamed of it."

Ten Years Ago

TEN years ago the following item appeared in THE WITNESS: "The Rev. Dr. Manning, rector of Trinity Church, New York, has announced the following as the special preachers for Lent: Bishop Richardson of the Canadian Church; Bishop T. I. Reese, coadjutor of Southern Ohio; Dean Fosbroke of the General Seminary; Dean Vernon of Portland, Maine, and the Rev. J. O. S. Huntington, of the Order of the Holy Cross."

Suicides Caused by Purposeless Lives

President Bell of St. Stephen's, Says That Young People Need a Purpose

PROPOSES CREED

It is no wonder that so many students commit suicide; I don't blame them." said Dr. Bernard Iddings Bell, President of St. Stephen's College, Annandale, N. Y., in a sermon in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. His subject was "Facing the Challenges of Life; Knowledge Is Not Enough."

"Knowledge, and knowledge alone, is almost certain to remove from man that courage which results from ignorance, without substituting anything for it," said Dr. Bell. "Cowardice is the besetting sin of our modern life. To be brave one must believe in something. Too much education takes away belief in love and hope, the ruling forces of the universe. Those who believe in nothing become the slaves of everything. If education is to be defined as the accommodation of man to his environment, then it is more of a curse than a blessing.

"Experience teaches us that love brings pain. It is easy to say 'Little children love one another,' but it is not easy to do. And so we grow to despise human love because we ask too much of it. We must find something to supplement the knowledge which experience brings.

"It is no wonder that so many students commit suicide. We become worse than men without a country; we become men without a cause for which to live. The solution can never be an amalgamation between science and religion.

"Man says, 'I am a free spirit as well as a mechanical being; I may be descended from an anthropoid, but I am the son of God as well.' The cultivation of science without religion makes for insanity. To train the mind without training the soul is to deprive youth of balance."

Dr. Bell suggested the following creed for students: "I must know, but I must believe as well. I believe in life; I believe in love; I believe in God. I don't know anything about any of them, but I believe."

Bishop Davenport of Easton, addressing the Auxiliary, early this month, spoke on the debt that city parishes owe to the churches in rural communities which furnish them with many of their staunchest parishioners. Bishop Darlington at the same meeting urged adequate support for the national work of the Church.

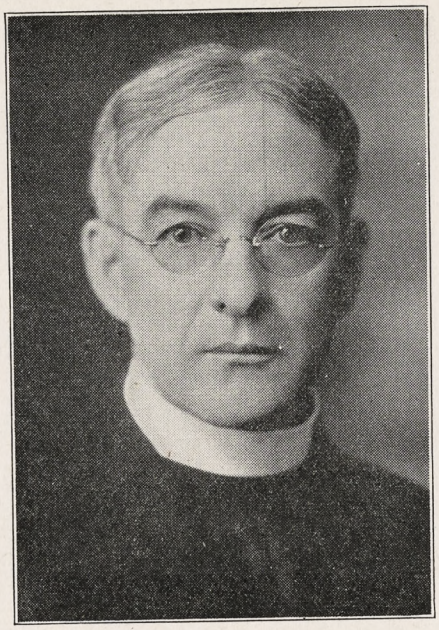
The Best Way to Help Mexico Is With the Friendship of America

CLERGY STUDY

By Bishop Stevens



The new hospital of the Good Samaritan in Los Angeles has been completed and will be in use by April first. It is a massive building of Mediterranean architecture, twelve stories in height and with a Chapel seating about four hundred persons. The total cost will be $1,550,000. The hospital equipment now consists of the new building, the old hospital (a Class A building with fine equipment), a nurses' home, the residence and a doctors' office building owned by members of the medical staff. The new buildings are all of reinforced concrete.

One of the best aids to the right relationship with Mexicans and the Mexican people is friendliness on the part of Americans. There is an organization known as the "Friends of the Mexicans" which, about two months ago, held its sixth Annual Conference at Pomona College, Claremont, California. About three hundred delegates were registered and the entire conference numbered about six hundred. These delegates represented educational institutions, chambers of commerce, settlement houses, Roman Catholic and Protestant welfare bureaus, churches, and other organizations. Originally organized by and with its attendance practically restricted to teachers interested in Mexican child and adult education, the scope of the Conference has gradually widened until it covers all problems pertaining to our Spanish-speaking population.

The Conference emphasized the fact that the nations of the world today are seeking a common basis of understanding and that permanent peace can not be secured through superficial expedients, but will only be brought about by a mutuality of viewpoint, outlook and ideals. The consciousness of unity could be the result of educational processes.

The Conference of "Friends of the Mexicans" is not to be looked upon merely as a type of propaganda, or as an "uplift" movement in the generally recognized sense of that term. It is, rather, an effort toward a proper adjustment with our Mexican neighbors, a sharing of our different national cultures, and an adequate appreciation of the fact that Mexico has much to give us in exchange for what we have to offer her. The technique of this adjustment to another culture, yielding nothing in zeal for our own, but respecting and understanding the other, is now being made the subject of most serious study by the leaders of sociological thought in our colleges and universities, and also by forward-looking statesmen in the economic, religious, educational, and political world.

Twenty-five of the clergy of the Diocese of Los Angeles are engaging in the study of Psychology of Religion. Under the direction of Professor J. Hudson Ballard of Occidental College, they are meeting weekly to learn more of this important phase of pastoral life. Dr. Ballard belongs to the "Purposive" school of psychologists as opposed to the "Behaviorists" whose point of view is largely, if not entirely, inimical to the Christian philosophy of life.

Reports of the intensive week of the Bishops' Crusade in Arizona are enthusiastic. Under the leadership of Bishop Moulton of Utah and Archdeacon Porter of San Francisco, services of great inspiration were held at Trinity Cathedral, Phoenix. According to the Cathedral Bulletin, their services were a great challenge to the evolving of a new vision of God's goodness and a desire for harmony with Him. The Cathedral Bulletin, by the way, is an interesting parish leaflet edited by the Dean, the Very Rev. Edward Seldon Lane. The Bishop of Arizona has been absent from his district as one of the Crusaders in the Diocese of Northern Indiana.

Church Has Yet to Work Out Policy for the Schools of the Church in China

NATIONALISM

By Rev. William B. Spofford

Bishop Roots of Hankow who recently visited Changsha finds that the Nationalist party, which controls China south of the Yangtse River, has made it a stronghold of revolutionary propaganda. "Anti-Imperialism" and "anti-capitalism" are the chief slogans. The radical wing of the Nationalist Party is in control and has organized the administration of the city on a communistic program. There are many evidences of Russian influence. For instance, the Bishop found the walls of the city placarded with posters, "Long live the October Revolution," referring to the Russian revolution of 1917.

Partly growing out of this condition there has come about a state of unrest among teachers and students in the mission schools. The Bishop found they desired to set aside the methods under which the Church has developed its educational system in China and substitute regulations put out by the Cantonese government. This would make impossible any Christian teaching as a part of the curriculum or any required attendance at religious services as part of the school routine. In places of the usual brief religious service with which the Church Schools in China have been accustomed to open, it was proposed that our schools should in future begin the day's work with an assembly at which patriotic songs would be sung, announcements made, with, on occasions, a brief address. Once a week the assembly would become a patriotic meeting and have the following additional features: Three bows to the national flag and the portrait of Dr. Sun Yat Sen, repetition by the school of Dr. Sun's will, and two or three minutes of silent meditation.

Dr. Sun's will reads as follows: "For forty years I have devoted my life to the cause of the People's Revolution with the object of securing freedom and equality for China. My experience, accumulated in these forty years, has fully convinced me that to attain our object we must arouse the people and fight side by side with such races of the world as have accorded us equal treatment. As the Revolution has not yet come to a complete success, my compatriots must continue to strive according to the teachings in my books, namely, 'The Plans for National Reconstruction,' and 'The Three Principles of the People,' and in my proclamation made during the first National Representative Convention, until our cherished aims have been completely achieved. The recently proposed People's Assembly and the abrogation of unequal treaties especially should be pressed to their realization at the earliest possible date."

The Department of Missions meeting February 9th and 10th gave careful consideration to these proposals as interpreted by Bishop Gilman, suffragan bishop of Hankow. Its conclusion is embodied in the following statement, which was laid before the National Council and ratified by it:

RESOLVED, That the Department of Missions considers that there is nothing fundamentally inconsistent between the Christian character of a school and the conduct of a school on the basis of voluntary worship and instruction. The department recognizes the desirability of a national system of education in China directed by Chinese authorities. The Church in the United States desires to do everything it conscientiously and properly can to adjust its educational work to such a system. Meanwhile without attempting at this time to establish a permanent policy with regard to the conduct of schools in China the Department of Missions in view of the present attempts of military duress to enforce upon schools certain political regulations, considers that it is not practicable to conduct our Church schools in accordance with the plans outlined in Bishop Roots' letter of December 24th and his cable of February 1st. The Department takes this action with deep regret and will be ready at any time to consider plans for the conduct of the schools upon which the bishops in China agree.

suspicion upon her activities in Manchuria. Japan faces this dilemma—she must either fight for a larger place in the world or find some other way of supporting her surplus population.

She has chosen the way of peace. With her back to the wall, handicapped by the financial consequences of the terrible earthquake disaster which destroyed her most prosperous cities, by the high American tariff, by commerce-destroying political turmoil in China and by the world economic aftermath of the war, she is struggling to develop the one peaceful means through which she can hope to take care of her population at home—industrial expansion.

Japan's agricultural resources are not adequate. On an area smaller than the state of California, only 14.6 per cent of which can be cultivated, she must support a population equal to one-half that of the United States. A former member of the House of Peers, Count Soyeshima, says: "Supposing that all the farms in Japan are put into one large farm, it can be crossed in a Ford car from one end to the other in about five hours. And from this tiny space our industrious peasants do their utmost to feed fifty-six million people." It is to industry then that Japan must turn. Her factories are therefore working day and night on two shifts and she has organized her industries scientifically in order to keep her head above water.

I shall be glad to welcome visitors at the New York office of THE WITNESS. Bishop Manning has very kindly assigned us room in the Diocesan House, 416 Lafayette Street, which is reached by taking the subway to Astor Place or 8th Street. The office we occupy was formerly the study of Bishop Potter, and contains today fully a thousand volumes with the bookplate HENRY CODMAN POTTER, pasted inside their covers. Around the border of the ceiling is the Benedicite in Latin, printed very decoratively in bright colors. Needless to say, an inspiring place to work, particularly so since from across the alley comes the throb of modern machinery to remind us that it is the year 1927.

Some week when news is scarce I shall rummage over these volumns and tell you what is here. As a taste here is an old book of Epitaphs, without date, but I should judge a rather old book. Here is one, from a grave stone in Stamford, England, dated 1783:

William Pepper

Tho' hot my name, yet mild my nature,
I bore good will to every creature;
I brewed good ale and sold it too,
And unto each I gave his due.

Eighteen parochial missions, all of six days' duration, have just been held in the diocese of Minnesota as a part of the Crusade. They are planning to have a mission in every parish in the diocese before Lent. The week in Minneapolis and St. Paul, with Rev. George Craig Stewart and the Rev. Thomas Casady as Crusaders was a great success. There were 2,500 at the opening mass meetings; with 2,800 at the closing meeting; from 1300 to 1700 out every night for mass meetings. Then during the week there were innumerable conferences and meetings, special atten-

The Rev. Fred Clayton, president of Tabor College, has been stirring them at Iowa State College, Ames, where the Rev. LeRoy Burroughs is doing a great work. Folks over there are going to build a fine church before long. They have the land; not only that, they have the stone too right there on the lots out of which a church can be built once they can gather together enough cash to hire a few derricks and a flock of stone masons. Anyhow the Rev. Wallace Essingham has been given the job by the diocesan authorities of raising $75,000. Just as soon as they secure $20,000 they are going to start on the parish house where services will be held until the church is built.

There is not going to be any debate over marriage between Bishop Manning of New York and Judge Lindsay of Denver. The Judge sent a challenge which the Bishop declined with the remark that "for Christians the moral standards given to the world by Christ are not open to debate."

The Bishop of New York, on advise of his physician, has been obliged to decline important engagements, including his part in the Bishops' Crusade in Chicago. Bishop Manning is not ill but the doctors advise him to store his energy for the important work in his diocese.

The Rev. Frank Wilson, editor, in his column of January 27th, had a word to say in regard to the Salvation Army. You probably read it; if not see if you can't dig it up for the question raised is an important one. Here is a letter from the Rev.

Rheumatism

A Remarkable Home Treatment Given by One Who Had It

In the year of 1893 I was attacked by Muscular and Sub-Acute Rheumatism. I suffered as only those who are thus afflicted know for over three years. I tried remedy after remedy, but such relief as I obtained was only temporary. Finally, I found a treatment that cured me completely and such a pitiful condition has never returned. I have given it to a number who were terribly afflicted, even bedridden, some of them seventy to eighty years old, and the results were the same as in my own case.

I want every sufferer from any form of muscular and sub-acute (swelling of the joints) rheumatism, to try the great value of my improved "Home Treatment" for its remarkable healing power. Don't send a cent; simply mail your name and address, and I will send it free to try. After you have used it, and it has proven itself to be that long-looked-for means of getting rid of such forms of rheumatism, you may send the price of it, One Dollar, but understand I do not want your money unless you are perfectly satisfied to send it. Isn't that fair? Why suffer any longer, when relief is thus offered you free. Don't delay. Write today.

Frederick C. Williams, rector of St. Paul's, Willimantic, Conn., on the subject:

"The experience of the Rev. Frank E. Wilson with the Salvation Army is almost identical with my own. The Army in this town has a Sunday School with a Catechism claiming special appointment of General Booth to teach the people how they should serve God. It is organized much like a church, it draws members from the churches of the town, and especially from the Sunday School, when it can.

"When we are asked to assist them in their drive for their budget, and remind them that they are working like an added denomination, they can't see it, but claim that we ought to assist a good work. The men sent to carry on the campaign for funds say that they will report the matter to headquarters, but nothing comes of the promise.

"The local corps of the Salvation Army does little relief work, just making a display at Christmas time as an excuse for having their buckets on the streets for donations. They never give an accounting of moneys collected or distributed.

"It strikes me that they have capitalized their war-work reputation to set up local churches in a great many towns, and to ask the community to support them."

The silver alms dish which, as announced in the Church press, the King of England has had made for the Cathedral of St. John, in New York, was presented by the British Ambassador, Sir Esme Howard, at the 11 o'clock service Sunday morning, February 13th. The Ambassador was attended by Major W. H. S. Alston, assistant military attache to the British Embassy. Sir Henry Armstrong, the British Consul General, New York, and Lady Armstrong were also present.

Bishop Stires has sent a personal letter of congratulation to each clergyman in the diocese, because their efforts throughout the year past resulted in the notable increase of missionary giving, largely surpassing the best previous attainment of the diocese. After the "referendum" of a year ago, Long Island notified the National Council that $125,000 might be expected from Long Island in 1926. This was much more than the diocese had ever contributed before. Bishop Stires has now notified

The Crusade was very successful in Long Island. At the seven centers selected for the Crusade in the diocese, the total attendance for the six successive nights, and the noonday service at Albee's theatre in Brooklyn for five days, was just under thirty thousand. The largest gatherings were those in Albee's theatre, where Bishop Stires was the preacher. Beginning with thirteen hundred the first day, the number steadily increased to more than twenty-six hundred the last day.

The volunteer "driver" of the Liverpool London Express had performed the unprecedented feat of bringing the great train thundering into Liverpool twenty-five minutes ahead of time! "Ladies and gentlemen — don't thank me — thank God. I only found out how to stop this thing ten minutes ago."

SPIRITUAL VALUES

First of a Lenten Series

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

RELIGION is a life and not merely a philosophy about life.

The great problem in any form of life is that of unemployment.

Back of unemployment lies the failure to train.

And the failure to train is due to a lack of appreciating true values and an unwillingness to make the effort necessary to attain them.

As little children we had an entirely different estimate of values from that of our parents. We wanted highly-colored toys and indigestible sweetmeats and irresponsible freedom.

As we grow older we changed our price tags but still resisted the monotony of training.

Once more in high school and college we readjusted our values.

Instead of tiresome work we eagerly sought certain social connections, athletic distinction or philosophical speculation.

Our values kept changing as we changed. And while we grew to disregard the highly colored toys which once were paramount, we merely substituted other playthings more suitable for our age.

Test of Value

The value of a thing is determined by our desire and education is a process of drawing out from within us certain latent desires which require training before they become habits.

The small boy feels injured when he is forcibly taken from his toys to study his lessons, but eventually he may find greater satisfaction in studying chemistry than he previously found in playing with mechanical toys.

So the adult has by experience learned to attach certain values to certain pursuits which have no value to the boy or to the savage.

Moreover, the boy or the savage has no means of comparing his values with those of an educated man, so that those cultivated values are foolishness unto him, until he tests them in his laboratory.

The trained mind, however, is capable of comparing the value of a life spent in gratifying physical sensations and one spent in satisfying spiritual aspirations.

In short, one must have experience in order to compare values, and training in order to appreciate the higher values.

This is precisely what St. Paul means when he says: "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned; but he that is spiritual judgeth all things; yet he himself is judged of no man." And then St. Paul asks a question: "Who hath known the mind of the Lord that he may instruct Him?"

Creative Lord

In other words, the Lord made us and not we ourselves; He created our desires, and those things which minister to those desires. He knows the values; we have to learn them by experience.

He created the truths of science, the beauties of art, and the goodness of human conduct.

He created the capacities within us and the processes by which we develop those capacities.

He it is, who invites us to train those potential powers with which we are endowed by Him, and He it is who rewards us with the satisfaction which we experience when we enter into our spiritual kingdom.

So St. Paul answers his question by stating that "we lack the mind of Christ," by which He means that Christ is endowed with the maximum of spiritual attainment and that we find our satisfaction in spiritual growth as we receive and appropriate to ourselves the mind of the Master.

In other words, you cannot appreciate spiritual values unless you are willing to translate your desire for righteousness into that sort of training or education which will enable you to see the value of things from the viewpoint of Christ.

It is the failure of Christians to do just this thing which accounts for so much of the arrested development in those who have assumed Christ's name, but not His discipline.

Hard-boiled Vestryman

It accounts for the hard-boiled vestryman who accepts Christ's teaching up to and including the point where the gospel is helpful to business and tends to protect investments. To him business is the highest value; to which spiritual things are always subsidiary. This type used to function on vestries and boards quite generally thirty or forty years ago. He was usually honest, prosperous and respected, but he gave little and did less for the Church in his official capacity than did his Jewish neighbor. The Church never thrived under his patronage.

It accounts for the emotional enthusiast, who mixes up prayer meetings and questionable business methods in a most dexterous fashion, and so becomes the favorite alibi for the spiritual short-comings of his business associates.

It accounts for the zealous reformer of other people's morals, who sees in the Gospel of Christ a great opportunity for shifty legislators to impose a morality on the public of which they themselves are destitute. Here the mind of Christ is used to put sinners without political influence into the penitentiary, a process in which I am sure Christ has not the slightest interest.

It accounts for all of the professional, platonic, philosophical, polysyllabic piety which talks learnedly and critically about "the thinglessness of the that and the whatness of the is," while it bathes itself in the smug, self-complacency of its own intellectual superiority. I am quite sure that the Master is not impressed.

ECCLESIASTICAL HOBOES

It accounts for the great multitude of ecclesiastical hoboes who beg their bread from Church to Church but who do nothing, give nothing and stand for nothing; who come out of their vagabondage solely for weddings and funerals.

It is all an arrested development, due to the fact that such folk are trying to make spiritual values subsidiary to some other purpose than that of spiritual development. For spiritual values can be attained solely by spiritual methods which the mind of Christ reveals to us most clearly, and which can be appreciated only by those who do His will.

The Faith of the Gospel is still that which He delivered to the Apostles, and is not that which Babbitts may substitute for it.

1st. It is simple, artless, primitive —"The light of the body is the eye," and the eye is something which children and peasants have in common with philosophers and financiers.

"If thine eye be evil (blurred or confused), then thy whole body is dark." Of course, one can correct astigmatism with spectacles, but they have to be frequently renewed and gradually become less and less effective. If you have to see God through some philosophy, you merely have poor eyesight. Don't boast of your blindness.

2nd. It is friendly, sympathetic kindly. It takes no pleasure in forming unfavorable judgments of neighbors, but is rather concerned in confessing its own failures and correcting its own faults. It is never arrogant, censorious or self-laudatory, no matter how orthodox or zealous it may be.

3rd. It is reverent, devout and self-sacrificing, never casual, capricious and self-seeking. It does not address God in public as though He were a sort of buddy with whom one feels on quite intimate terms. It does not worship God merely when it is convenient or serve Him intermittently and slovenly.

4th. It is generous, patient, and magnanimous. A stingy Christian, or a sulky one or a narrow one, simply has failed to catch the mind of Christ and is trying to attach Christ to some personal ulterior purpose.

CHRIST'S MIND

And the curious thing is that although these points are obviously descriptive of Christ's mind yet multitudes are subordinating His mind to their own mental limitations, instead of realizing that in order to appreciate spiritual values they must grow into the whole Christ, and then they will comprehend the beauty of holiness, even though they may be as remote from attaining it as was the thief on the Cross or the woman who was a sinner. "I count not myself to have apprehended," says St. Paul, but He could appreciate the spiritual value in Christ and therefore could press toward the goal, even though the distance to be traveled was very great.

It is one thing to appreciate good music; quite another thing to produce it, but before you can ever hope to produce it, you must be able to appreciate it.

In the same way, one must accept the whole Christ, no matter how far the distance may be which one has to travel. It is better to creep along the right road than it is to rush along the wrong one; for in the latter case you will never arrive at your destination.

One must appreciate values before he can hope to acquire the riches of Christ.

If men do not grow in grace, it is because they do not really desire the values which Christ offers to those who seek them. One may not retain spiritual values, if, like Esau, he is ready to exchange them at any time for a mess of pottage.

The process of our spiritual training involves a strict discipline over our desire for temporary indulgence.

ARCHITECTURE AND CIVILIZATION

Building Ourselves in Stone

THE RT. REV. JAMES E. FREEMAN, D. D., LL. D.

WE BUILD ourselves in stone. Even the literature of a people does not give more enduring distinction to their traits and characteristics, their aspirations and hopes than what they leave behind in the way of enduring buildings. We can almost judge a civilization by the kind of buildings it produces. This is conspicuously true concerning those monumental structures that still endure to witness to the religious aspirations of a people. Architecture literally interprets the spirit of an age.

It was said of the Roman Emperor, Augustus, that "he found Rome brick and left it marble." This transition marked the growing refinement of the people as well as their increasing love of the beautiful. Changing types and forms of architecture more than anything else indicates those great transitions in human thought that have marked the rise of man from lower to higher levels of thinking and living.

Nowhere is this more evident than in those great buildings that still stand as the witnesses of a growing and deepening sense of religion and its higher aspirations after things that satisfy the yearlings of the soul. It is little wonder that when man was engaged most assiduously in creating works of monumental grandeur to express his religious aspirations that he gave freshened impulse to the crafts and the arts. The very creation of these mighty buildings gave inspiration to painters, sculptors and musicians, and by their very majesty and beauty lifted the thoughts of men and led them to envision and produce that which was born of the soul.

When King Solomon built the great temple in Jerusalem he not only undertook to make it so rich and splendid that it would command the reverent admiration of those who worshipped in it, but he also sought to make it the focal point in the life of the nation as a whole. It was to be at all times to his people, whatsoever their condition, their fortune or misfortune, whether dwelling under its shadow or in places far remote their witness to Jehova's presence in their life, the visable evidence of His unfailing guidance and support in all the concerns of their pilgrimage. What this building meant to this people, what conspicuous place it occupied in their thoughts and movements it would be impossible to say.

Again and again, such great buildings have been reared, representing the sacrifice and love of a people, and many of them have endured through the long ages, even in spite of changed and changing conditions of apathy and even of apostacy, to witness to an undying religious faith. Sabatier is right, "man is incurably religious." However he may stray from the path of rectitude, however he may change the forms of his religious expressions and devotions, he still continues to demand that which satisfies the deeper and finer yearnings and aspirations of his soul. The great cities, ancient and modern, have been builded about some splendid central house of worship, that has stood like some mighty sentinel or guardian of the community in which it was placed.

Our age, more than any other, has been one that has been distinguished by the rise of great cities. In the matter of building, and in some respects in the matter of architectural splendor, it has no parallel in the known history of mankind. One sometimes wonders as he marks this amazing growth and development, what future ages will think of the civilization that produced the cities of the present time.

Commercial Age

Once religion and the arts rearer their noble temples and made them the outstanding features of the community in which they were placed. Once the things of the spirit articulated themselves in such forms of beauty that they outdistanced all competitors. What are we producing today that shall speak to succeeding generations of the spiritual aspirations and hopes of the age in which we live? Is there in our modern life that which adequately witnesses to our love of beauty and to our deep sense of religious values?

The observation made by two discriminating English visitors concerning our modern cities and their architecture is suggestive: "the things that have impressed us most," they observed, "are your amazing railroad stations and your superb banking institutions." They had seen our great American cities, they had felt the throbbing life of this great western continent, they had been overwhelmed with our growth along material lines and our commanding place as a commercial nation. They had evidently seen little that spoke to them of the soul of America. We recall that when Henry James visited the nation's capital some fifty years ago he observed the noble character of its splendid buildings erected for administering the concerns of the state. (Even then, Washington gave promise of being one of the beautiful capitals of the world.) Turning from these, he sadly remarked that he saw in the nation's capital nothing that gave adequate testimony of the spiritual ideals of our people.

Must Heed Spiritual

In an age that is producing as ours is the evidences of our commercial sovereignty as well as the witnesses to our growing love of luxury, it is imperative that we give heed to those things that affirm our trust in God and our belief in His superintending care and guidance. Perhaps at no time in the world's history has there been greater need of these than in this present pregnant hour. We are staggered if not overwhelmed as we contemplate the amazing growth of this country. We have risen in the brief space of one hundred and fifty years to occupy a commanding place among the nations of the world. Our growing wealth and power is the wonder and the envy of the older nations of Europe. Our leadership in the things of commerce is unchallenged. What do we suggest to the world concerning the things of the spirit? Where are the evidences that along with our unparalleled growth in things material that we are conserving the things of the soul?

It is this that has moved the lovers of America to attempt to erect on the greatest eminence in the capital city a mighty fane that shall stand through the ages to tell to all the world that we believe that righteousness alone exalteth a nation. To make it stand in the capital as worthy of companionship with those buildings that witness to the strength of the state, appeals to our deepest love for God and country.

Here where the forces of the country find their meeting place, here at the very fountain head of the government itself, must be erected a worthy witness of the faith by which we believe the nation lives. Here beneath the aches of this noble temple must be heard the great prophets, whose messages concern the most vital things of our life. It grows increasingly clear to the wisest men in public life that such a building is supremely needed. Great in its compass, magnificent in its proportions, beautiful and symmetrical in its lines, it must be broad and comprehensive enough to shelter all who believe in the sovereignty of God and the brotherhood of man.

We readily accept an imposed tax for the building and maintenance of those splendid structures that in the capital are used for administrative purposes. We ought with like readiness to accept our responsibilty and to give voluntarily for the erection in the capital of this great witness to the Christian faith. It appeals to our patriotism, to our love of country; it appeals to our finer sentiment as a supreme expression of the beautiful; it appeals to our deeper religious nature as that which witnesses to the finer things of the spirit. It can only go forward through the loyal support and generous gifts of those who have the vision to see its vast importance.

Description of Cathedral Close

"The Hill of Zion Is a Fair Place"

During the past ten years a landscape development of a unique character has been quietly progressing on this hillside of sixty-seven and one-half acres. The wonderful opportunities offered here on landscape work are being carried out as sincerely and intelligently as the building of the Cathedral itself, as it is absolutely vital for the fabric to have its proper setting, crowning as it does the wooded slope of Mount Saint Alban, four hundred feet above the city, commanding an unsurpassed view of the National Capital. This landscape work within the Cathedral Close combines two things quite different in character:

1. The development in the immediate neighborhood of the Cathedral itself and its adjacent buildings: a type of landscape work in the spirit of Old World gardens; England in the fourteenth century, with its oak, yew and holly, box and ivy; plant material which has stability and permanence, dignified, beautiful, with as much of it as possible of historic interest, forming a background which can be enlivened in suitable places by the more delicate beauty of perennials.

2. The development of the wooded slope of Mount Saint Alban: preserving all its natural beauty, increasing its dogwood, laurel, wild azalea and choice undergrowth so that for the pilgrim the upward climb might have true refreshment. "The charm of approaching the Cathedral up a wooded hillside, leaving the city far behind and below, helping one to forget the hurly-burly and busyness of a work-a-day world must be taken advantage of to the fullest extent. The sweeping branches of the great trees seem to brush off, as it were, the dust of the city so that one should at last reach the Cathedral cleansed in mind and in spirit." As one thinks of this future approach with its roadway from below (entrance on Garfield and 35th Street, as one turns to the right from Massachusetts Avenue) this road mounting up the slope through the dense green of an ancient forest, one recalls the designs of some of the old 14th century tapestries of the same period as the architecture of the Cathedral.

Historic Trees and Shrubs. Among some interesting specimens of boxwood of historic interest, most of them in the Bishop's garden, may be named:

The George Washington boxwood, transplanted in 1925 from an old garden maze at the ruined house, Hayfield Manor, Fairfax County, Virginia, built in 1761 by George Washington.

The Thomas Jefferson box: a tall sempervirens variety, brought from Monticello by Thomas Jefferson himself and given to the orignal owners of Mount Saint Alban.

The Dolly Madison box, taken as young sprigs from her inaugural bouquet by Dolly Madison and given to these same garden lovers of a hundred years ago.

The Bishop Harding Memorial boxwood, a remarkable specimen of ancient growth. Undoubtedly over two hundred years old, of dwarf (suffructicosa) variety, and yet in spite of its immense size (weight 6 tons, root area eleven feet in diameter) was transplanted successfully from a distance of approximately thirty miles.

A "Shadow House" or Garden House, in keeping with the architecture of this period, is about to be erected at the angle in the wall near this boxwood garden with a flight of low stone steps leading down to a lower level.

Among examples of other types of historic plant material, might be named: The Glastonbury thorn, from Glastonbury Abbey, ivy from Canterbury Cathedral, and some cedars brought from Lebanon twenty-five years ago.

THE BIG STORY

The Gospel According to a Newspaper Man

BY REV. IRWIN ST. JOHN TUCKER

WHEN I was a very young reporter, before the mystery of that calling had faded and its romance shredded away, I said once to my city editor: "I wish I could uncover the biggest story in the world."

He grinned. Then he reached into his inky, battered desk and drew out a Bible.

"Run that story down," he said, adding, "it's a long assignment."

For twenty years I have been working on that lead. Many other men have been assigned to cover it. Lately, a number of them seem to think it is a sort of Promotion story, from the Business Office. They reduce it to the level of Success Drives and Booster Campaigns. Such men simply lack news sense.

If you can understand an old reporter's feelings when a young cub, pet of the front office, has fallen down on a big tip, you will know how I feel about these condescending "interpretations" which take all the heart out of the Big Story. I have read versions of the Gospel which reduce Jesus Christ to the level of an unsuccessful bond salesman.

Reporters

When Jesus spoke his parables, he talked the language of his listeners' trade. To fishermen he told stories of nets full of fishes; to jewelers, of pearls of great price. To housewives, of yeast in the dough. So to me the Bible appears in the guise of a newspaper. The men who followed Christ around and took notes on his sayings were reporters. The man who sailed with Paul and wrote up his wrecks and imprisonments was a special correspondent. The men who reported the trials before Agrippa and Pilate were court reporters. So was the man who took down in shorthand the speech of Stephen before the Sanhedrim. My impression is that this reporter was Paul himself.

In law school, Paul must have learned to take swift notes on his lectures. Certainly the main outlines of Stephen's plea are also the outlines of Paul's teaching, and it was this speech, together with Stephen's prayer as he died, which began the conversion of Saul Bejaminson into Paul the Apostle.

Rewrite Man

It was a rewrite man who gathered together the notes other men had taken and wove them together into the Gospel of St. Luke. And it was an editorial writer who took all these accounts, mingled with them his own experience and reflection, and gave the world that marvelous editorial known as the Gospel According to St. John.

Across the copy desk of any large newspaper the deeds of the world flow in an unending current. By telegraph, by mail, by telephone, by reporter, press association, special correspondent: through rewrite man and city editor and telegraph editor and news editor this torrent converges as through a funnel from all the wide seas.

Seeing the World

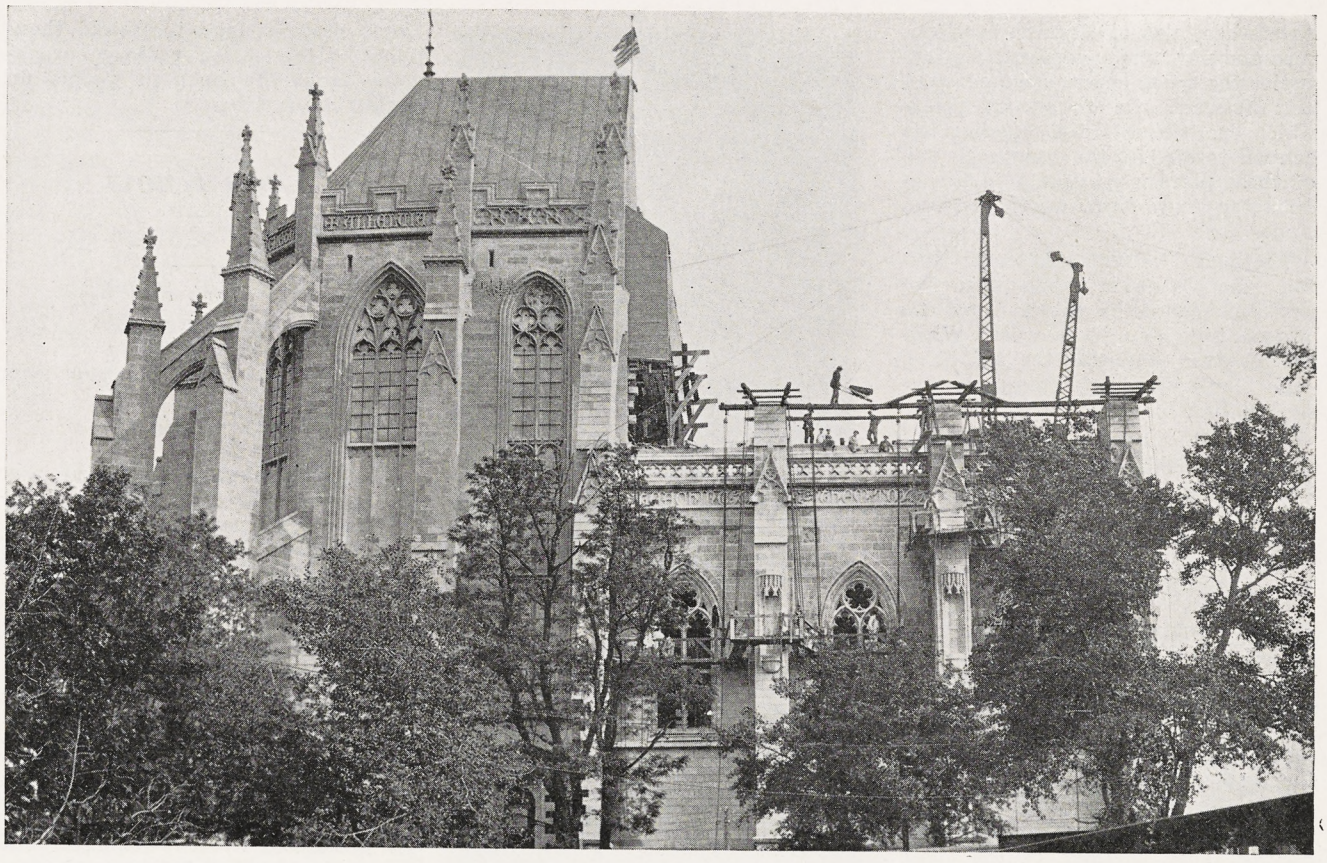
Murder, wreck, flood, disaster of fire and earthquake; weddings, funerals, elopements, divorces; sermons, political speeches, trials, hangings, acquittals; church suppers and raids on dens of vice! society and outcast —we see them all. Physicians see chiefly the diseases. We see, also, the splendid athlete. Lawyers see chiefly the criminal and the dispute; we see also the harmony, and the benevolence, and the charity. Pastors see mainly the professedly good. We see also the professedly evil. We see the world as no one else sees it, save God.

And He, because He sees the event, where we see only the report; because He beholds what is hidden as well as what is revealed: because He sees the slaying as well as the hanging; He is the best reporter of us all, and this story — if He did, indeed, write it—is the masterpiece of journalism.

Such an impersonal umpire as a newspaper man is apt to become cynical. I do not know a police reporter who believes in justice, nor any political reporter who has any faith in democracy.

The Big Story

So the Big Story looks perhaps a little different from our point of view. In the first place, a newspaper man knows the battle for truth, decency and honor to be so desperate that in most cases he feels the outcome foregone. It is a bitter struggle in which he has largely ceased to expect justice and innocence to triumph of their own right, but rather expects to see them fall of their own incompetence.



He has little patience with nincompoops in nincompulpits, who preach a delicate gospel. Life as he sees it is not perfumed with the genteel aroma of the philosopher's secluded den.

The Bible is a true newspaper. It tells scandal, murder, wreck and disaster with a lusty gusto. It spreads before us shocking details of shocking happenings. It puts down no soft pedal on the life of a great man, whether it be Abraham, or Jacob, or Moses, or David, or Peter. Not even the most sensational of yellow sheets would dare use such plain language as the Bible uses, on occasion.

It was not written at one time, but by instalments spread over a thousand years. It does not come from one pen, but from eye-witnesses of many a tremendous event.

The Bible is the bound colume of a newspaper containing many columns of matter that do not interest us now, but containing bound up also within it the ringing instalments of the world's greatest story, told by eye-witnesses, written by the greatest of special correspondents;— the story of the romance and the murder of God.

THE NATIONAL CATHEDRAL TODAY

Preparing for the General Convention

BY EDWIN N. LEWIS

SINCE the Cathedral in the Nation's Capital was authorized by charter from Congress in 1893 more than $6,000,000 has been given through bequests, gifts and other offerings to the undertaking now being carried to completion on Mount Saint Alban. These offerings have varied from nickels and dimes sent by American Indians in New Mexico to a half-million dollars for the building of the apse or sanctuary which is plainly visible to the city of Washington.

The names of more than 25,000 individual donors who have aided the Cathedral are preserved forever in the Book of Remembrance which is to be placed in a special niche or aumbry in the sanctuary of the completed edifice.

Five thousand friends of the Cathedral are making annual offerings of from two to one thousand dollars for its building and maintenance through the National Cathedral Association. They represent all states in the United States and several foreign countries.

Approximately $10,000,000 will be needed to complete the Cathedral itself including the remainder of the choir, the crossing, the north and south transepts, the nave, the west facade and the central tower. This estimate does not provide for furnishings, stained-glass windows, sculpture and the necessary endowment funds for the maintenance of the Cathedral as a great spiritual power-house. Additional gifts will also be required for the Cathedral library, the synod hall or hall of assembly, the chapter house, administration building, gymnasium for St. Alban's School for Boys, and other buildings to be associated with the whole undertaking.

The Dean of Chester Cathedral, England, who recently visited this country, said:

"It is its spaciousness of vision—much less easy of achievement and of far more worth than material bigness—that makes Washington Cathedral, in my judgment, the greatest single Church undertaking in the world today. . . . A few years ago I ventured to write a little book on 'The Nature of a Cathedral.' In it I put all that I then saw in connection with our old cathedrals on this side of the Atlantic. At Washington I found almost every idea that I ever had, and a great many more, being splendidly embodied on an altogether majestic scale."

Architecture of monumental proportions and sculptured stones of exquisite beauty may be seen in the crypt chapels of the National Cathedral.

The Bethlehem Chapel of the Holy Nativity, where services are held daily throughout the year, was designed by Henry Vaughan, one of the original Cathedral architects, who is buried beneath this chapel. It is of Gothic architecture and strikes the keynote of the Cathedral design as a whole. More than 200,000 pilgrims and visitors were counted entering the Bethlehem Chapel during 1926. It is a memorial to the Right Reverend Henry Yates Satterlee, D. D., LL. D., first Bishop of Washington.

The Chapel of the Resurrection, recently completed under the south transept, is of massive Norman architecture of the 11th century. It will be dedicated within a year as a memorial to the Right Reverend Alfred Harding, D. D., LL. D., second Bishop of Washington.

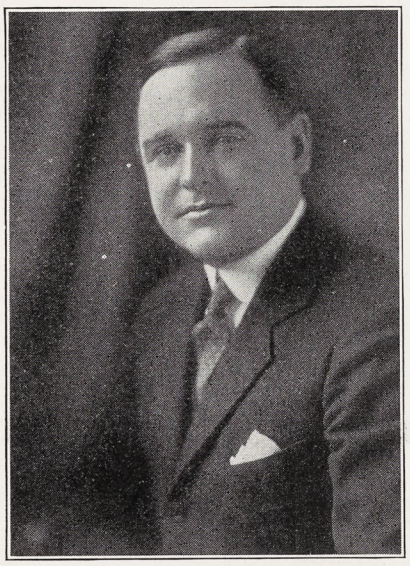
Arimathea, also of Norman architecture and now under construction, occupies the space beneath the crossing and between the four huge piers which are ultimately to support the central tower. At the base each one of these piers is 24 feet 2 inches in diameter and constructed of solid stone.

Frohman, Robb & Little, of Boston, the Cathedral architects, say that this chapel is enclosed by the largest stone piers in the world. When the tower is completed the weight on each pier will be approximately sixteen million pounds.

This will be a mortuary chapel and will be available for funeral services for families in the army, navy, diplomatic service, etc., who, perhaps, have formed no church home affiliations during their temporary residenc in the National Capital.

NEW CONSTRUCTION AUTHORIZED

Construction work in the crypts being practically completed, the trustees recently authorized a new contract for continuation of the main Cathedral fabric. This work, which was started January 1st, includes the extension of the north and south choir aisles to the crossing, thus completing those portions of the choir up to the triforium, and two of the great eastern piers of the crossing to the height of the triforium roof. This impressive piece of work will result in the erection of the superstructure in part to a height of approximately 66 feet above the main choir and crossing floor level.



The scaffolding and plaster model of a section of one of the great piers, required for the initial steps in the new construction, are now plainly visible to the people of Washington as they motor by the Cathedral Close.

It is the earnest hope of the Bishop of Washington, the Dean and the Cathedral Chapter that additional offerings, gifts and pledges amounting to approximately $1,500,000, will be forthcoming soon for completion of the choir walls, the crossing, and their respective vaultings.

If this portion of the fabric can be constructed, in connection with the present contracts, temporary facilities for worship can be made available on the main floor of the Cathedral for the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church which is to meet in Washington in October, 1928.

PLANS FOR GENERAL CONVENTION

It is expected that from 20,000 to 25,000 visitors will come to Washington for this gathering, including the members of the House of Bishops, clergy and laymen in the House of Deputies, men and women in the auxiliary and affiliated organizations of the Church, and the members of their families who will welcome the opportunity to visit the National Capital.

Bishop Freeman announced a few days ago that Admiral Cary T. Grayson has been appointed general chairman of the Convention Committee with Hugh T. Nelson as general secretary, and H. L. Rust as treasurer. Among other outstanding leaders in the Diocese of Washington who are serving as chairmen of important sub-committees are the Rev. Dr. ZeB. T. Phillips, Eugene E. Thompson, the Rev. Dr. George W. Atkinson, Dr. L. W. Glazebrook, the Rev. Dr. George F. Dudley, Harry K. Boss, Major General George Barnett, the Rev. Dr. Robert Johnston, the Rev. Charles T. Warner, M. O. Chance, and Newbold Noyes.

OPEN-AIR SERVICE AVAILABLE

In addition to the facilities which it is hoped will be available for the convention on the main floor of the Cathedral, there will be unrivalled accommodations within the Cathedral Close for a great General Convention open-air service. The amphitheater in the declivity in the hillside adjacent to the Peace Cross, forms a natural auditorium with temporary benches affording seats for congregations up to 17,500.

Several great religious services have been held in the amphitheater. The voices of President Roosevelt, the Lord Bishop of London, and other outstanding prophets, both lay and clerical, have been raised amid these sacred surroundings. If one of the purposes of a Cathedral is to offer public worship, to all people under the most dignified and inspiring surroundings possible, then this ideal is being commended to thousands present—and to untold thousands in the unseen radio congregation—from the open-air pulpit on Mount Saint Alban.

Let's Know

TIMES CHANGE

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

Hippolytus and Callixtus first
Agreed to have a fight;
For Hippolytus said the pope was wrong,
And he alone was right.

The afore-named Hippolytus was a very aggressive person who lived in the third century and was a prolific writer. In the course of his writings he tells the story of Callixtus I, bishop of Rome. Callixtus, it seems, was a slave in the household of a Roman Christian. His master entrusted him with some rather large sums of money and Callixtus set up in the banking business. Various Christians, including certain penurious widows, deposited their savings with him and he lost all the money. Then he ran away. He attempted to drown himself but was hauled out of the sea and committed to a penal colony for renegade slaves. A little later he was sent to the mines in Sardinia after courting martyrdom by unfriendly actions towards the Jews. When a batch of Christian slaves was released, Callixtus managed to be one of them and returned to Rome. He wormed himself into the confidence of Zephyrinus, bishop of Rome, and was placed in charge of the Christian catacombs which still bear his name. Through judicious bribery, he gained great influence with Zephyrinus and actually succeeded in securing the election to the Roman episcopate after the death of his benefactor. He relaxed the discipline of the church so grievously that some of the Roman Christians rebeled and elected Hippolytus as an anti-pope. Hippolytus scored him fearfully, accusing him of heresy and sundry other things in which he was supported by the sagacious Tertullian of Africa.

Hippolytus himself was a very powerful personage, though his personal history is not altogether clear. He was a priest in the Roman Church and a student under the great Irenaeus. He was an acute theologian and became bishop of some diocese, probably in the neighborshood of Rome. His schismatic movement which elevated him to the office of anti-pope continue through the episcopates not only of Zephyrinus, but of the next two popes, also. Toward the end of his life he was banished to Sardinia, eventually made his peace with the opposing faction, and died in harmonious relations with his fellow Christians. Because of his death in exile, he was accounted a martyr and was highly revered by the Christians of Italy. Many of his writings have been lost, but enough of them were preserved to rank him among the most important Christian theologians of the first three centuries. He was a rigorous disciplinarian. An old legend tells how he met his martyrdom by being pulled to pieces by wild horses, but this is probably a romantic reminiscence of the pagan Hippolytus whose name he happened to bear.

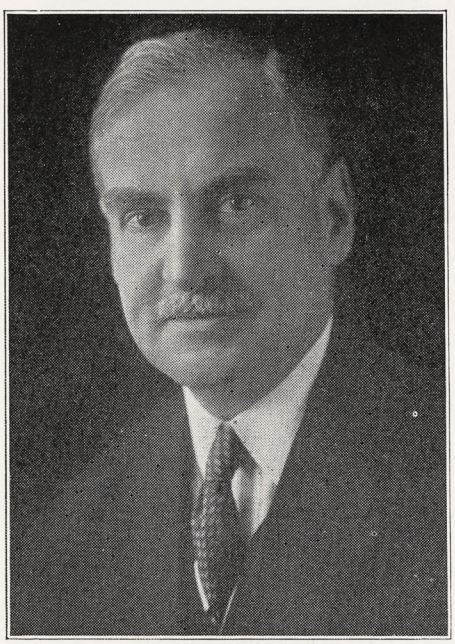
The Catholic Encyclopedia, speaking of the serious charges laid against Callixtus by Hippolytus and Tertullian, says that "their calumnies are probably based on facts." The relative merits of the issues raised in the controversy do not concern us very much, but it is a matter of some interest to know that both Callixtus and Hippolytus are numbered among the saints in the Roman calendar. What Henry VIII said about the popes of his day was not a circumstance to the charges of Hippolytus, but one could not suppress a smile at the thought of "St. Henry" appearing in the Roman calendar. Evidently times do change — even in unchangeable Rome.

TWIN CATHEDRAL IDEALS

Washington and Philadelphia



BY HONORABLE GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER, LL.D.,

Senator from Pennsylvania and Chairman of the National Cathedral Foundation

A GENERATION ago Bishop Satterlee had the wisdom to fly in the face of the judgment of many people as to where the site of the Cathedral in the Nation's Capital should be. He had the wisdom to cross what was then thought the impassable chasm of Rock Creek Park and to place the foundation of the Cathedral on Mount Saint Alban. His foresight has been wonderfully vindicated. It is a happy circumstance that Bishop Garland and Mr. Scull and the others who have been influential in the beginnings of things in Pennsylvania have had similar courage and foresight, and have chosen a site, which, for the time being, many will criticize, but which in process of time, will be recognized as the direct result of wisdom and inspiration.

We have down there in Washington a ready-made congregation. You may feel sorry for the people, but you will marvel at the circumstance when I tell you that I have spoken to thirty thousand people on the Cathedral Close on a bright September afternoon. It was not possible, so great was the attendance, to get within a mile of the place to park your car. The whole body of massed choirs of the city were there, and everything conspired to give you the conception of a great concourse of people waiting to have a Cathedral roof put over their heads.

Washington is a place for missionary work. Some people think of it as a place where a few senators and congressmen gather with a few people who go to Washington to lobby. Why, my friends, Washington is a place to which people repair in increasing numbers from all over this country and from all the countries of the world. The number of people who go out to see the beginnings of

SENATOR PEPPER

Washington Cathedral is simply amazing. The number of people who are in Washington, unchurched because they are there too short a time to form parochial connections, and too long a time to feel comfortable in forming no connections at all, is a standing invitation to build this great central church.

There are fifteen hundred or more Pennsylvanians employed in the departments at Washington, and a similar thing is true of people from every other state. The number of conventions that meet at Washington, people who stay there two, three, or four days or a week is greater all the year around in every year than it has been under pressure in Philadelphia during the Sesqui-Centennial year. We have a condition of affairs there which nobody will believe unless he has studied it. We have a congregation crying out for a roof under which to worship. We have had two thousand people turned away from the Cathedral from each of two services on a single Sunday, because there was not room to admit them. We have the beginnings of a building, which, as the Dean of Chester has said, will assuredly fill a place in the category of great Cathedrals of the world.

It was done wisely. The men of a generation ago, instead of inviting competitions of architects and selecting a design from the mass submitted determined what type of architecture they wished to adopt for the purpose of the Cathedral. Having decided in favor of the English Gothic, they then selected the great exponents of this type of Gothic of that day—George Rodley in England, and Henry Vaughan in Boston—and gave them carte blanche. The result is a design of matchless beauty, followed out, under the leadership and inspiration of Dean Bratenahl, to a degree of completeness of detail and genuineness of thought which would amaze you if you would only visit the place and see it.

Think of a structure as large or larger than Winchester or York, without one pound of steel in its construction, solid stone from the bowels of the earth to the top of the tallest tower, built after the fashion of medieval masonry. Think of every bit of material in it tested by the Government Bureau of Weights and Standards for two thousand years of longevity. Everything gives the idea of solidity and permanence, and all in accordance with a plan such as we shall have here for the Cathedral in this diocese, and which we have actually realized down there.

The General Convention meets in Washington in 1928. It is proposed that we shall have advanced far enough with the Cathedral adequately to house the convention. To do that we have to sign, early this year, a contract for the completion of the choir and crossing. We already have the noble apse and choir aisles, three chapels in the crypts, the foundation for the whole structure and the four great columns ultimately to carry the central tower. We must sigh this contract soon. In appropriate ways and at appropriate times you will be asked to help to make this possible; not now, because we are in the middle of a diocesan drive here, which concentrates our attention upon our local interests, and quite rightly so. I am pledged in service and heart to that and nothing that happens here today can interfere in the least degree with the success of that project. But from now on we are going to carry in our minds the twin ideals of these two great houses of God, the one symbolizing the religion of the Republic as the Capitol sympolizes its Government, and the other destined to be the House of a Father in God, and the center of the diocesan life of Pennsylvania.

THE S. O. S. OF CIVILIZATION

The Futility of Force

BY REV. G. A. STUDDERT KENNEDY

S.O.S.! If you ever saw the signal, and heard the response to it in modern war, you are not likely to forget it. Of all the lurid memories that I brought with me back from hell, that remains most vivid, least touched by time.

The sudden flaming of the lights against the darkening sky, the pause of moments that lingered like eternity, and then the roar as though ten thousand obscene devils had been let loose to torture poor damned souls on earth before their time.

Save Our Souls!

It is a strange name to give it. There have been some very odd schemes of salvation proposed in the course of the ages, but that is the oddest ever. If souls could be saved by force, brute force and destructive energy, the Western peoples of the world would have blasted a way to heaven years ago. But unfortunately force is not power, it does not save souls, it merely destroys bodies, and does that in a very expensive and clumsy fashion.

The greatest weakness of the world today is in the Great Powers, as they call themselves. They will be the death of us yet, if they don't learn to see that they are great fools, with their "imperial prestige," their "national honour," their "absolute sovereignty," and all the rest of the high falutin' bunkum behind which they hide their animal stupidity and social impotence.

We use force to destroy bodies precisely because we lack power to save souls. If our souls were saved we would not go about blowing mothers' sons to bloody ribbons, and wasting the fruit of a woman's woe, to make a wilderness and call it peace.

There is not enough power in all the armies of the world to save a single soul. It can't be done with ships and shells, submarines, with aeroplanes, or poison gas, or perjured propaganda.

When men sit down solemnly to discuss what proportion in armaments will give them "security," they are just about as likely to come to a satisfactory conclusion as they would be if they discussed the problem, "If it takes an aeroplane five days to fly from Paris to Hankow, how long will it take Mr. Lloyd George to crawl through a barrel of treacle?" It is the kind of question that two lunatics would discuss in Bedlam.

The Real Question to Discuss

Civilization has been sending up an S.O.S. for years. Poverty, squalor, and sullen discontent breaking into open revolution; senseless competition in armaments leading to an orgy of destruction — these are the signals that have flamed out again and again telling us that the soul of civilization is in danger. How is that cry for help to be answered?

There is no more important question that can occupy our hearts and minds than that. The first necessity is to get to the roots of it. We must not mistake the body for the soul. Civilization is not a body that has a soul; it is a soul that has a body. There is a multitude of conflicting voices proposing different operations that can be performed upon the body in order to save the soul; but they would only alter the signals — they would not touch the danger.

Civilization cannot be saved by making everybody comfortable, even if that were possible. If we could take away all the crosses and serve out plush cushions instead, we would no sooner have them nicely arranged than men would take and hurl them at our heads, cursing us and our cushions. Real men rest to live, they do not live to rest.

To suppose that all would be well if we could secure enough of this world's goods for everyone, good wages, good houses, and all the rest of it, is to make it quite clear that you have not mastered the elements of the real problem.

Behind all the bodily needs of man there is his soul, hungry, thirsty, naked, desperately demanding satisfaction.

"We Must Have God"

Trying to satisfy men with comfort is like trying to make a full-grown forest lion content with a golden cage. There is only one way of doing it, and that is to kill him. You may pamper and coddle him, and he may seem to be at rest, but suddenly, when you least expect it, the rage for the open spaces and lust for the wild will overcome him, and he will dash himself against the bars until he sinks back, bloody but unbeaten, to find a refuge in his dreams.

Man is the real king of beasts, because he is more than any beast. He cannot chain his soul, it will not rest in its clay prison, it has strange longings and desires which he cannot account for nor explain, yet they are there and must be satisfied. He demands something to make life worth while, something to give it a meaning; he craves for the things that have absolute value and are worth having in themselves. He must have something or someone to worship. He must have God.

He knows deep down that money is not an end in itself, but a means to an end. What end? He knows that power over other men is not an end in itself, but a means to an end. And again, what end? What's the good? That is man's question, the question which he must either answer or perish, soul destroyed.

It is not a question for the few, a question for philosophers and those who live in studies; it is for plumbers and those who work in streets. Philosophers think the question, plumbers feel it—that is the only difference. If he cannot solve it a philosopher becomes a cynic and takes to sneering, the man who "feels it" becomes a drunkard and takes to swearing; two different ways of dying, that is all.

The multitudes that throng our great cities are hungry souls asking consciously or unconsciously, "Who will show us any good?" That is why the social questions are, at their root, religious questions, demanding religious answers. Men will not work unless there is for them some meaning in their work, some great purpose to give it dignity and make it worth their while.

There is a lot of nonsense talked about the dignity of labour. Labour is not dignified if men only labour for the meat that perishes, labour for enough to keep them labouring. It is undignified and ridiculous, and men run away from the boredom of it as soon as they can find the meaning of life in pleasure and in play. Men cannot be kept to their work by higher wages. What they need is a vision of higher purposes.

Many of those who complain that people do not understand the dignity of labour, as soon as they have made enough, give up work for good. And no wonder, since they, too, are souls demanding more than bread even if it is buttered on both sides and has some jam on top of that.

What We Live For

What we are really seeking is a God, a King to serve, a cause to live for, a purpose and a meaning worthy of our finest work. That can only be found as we develop, not merely our intellect and practical intelligence, but our imagination, and our faculty for communion with the great invisible realities through prayer. I make no apology for that.

Man must pray if he is to live; he is not a stomach, but a soul. And it will take God to save that soul. We must have God.

Reprinted, by arrangement, from "The Torch," organ of the Industrial Christian Fellowship.

A PRAYER FOR THE NATIONAL CATHEDRAL

O LORD JESUS CHRIST, who hast taught us that all things are possible to him that believeth, and that thou wilt favorably hear the prayers of those who ask in Thy Name; we plead the fulfillment of thy promise, and beseech thee to hasten the building, in the Capital of this Nation, of this House of Prayer for all people. Make speed to help us, O Lord, whom with the Father and the Holy Spirit, we worship and glorify as one God, world without end. Amen.

Cheerful Confidences

THE WASHINGTON CATHEDRAL

By Rev. George Parkin Atwater

WHEN you take your first trip to Europe and after various thrills on shipboard step ashore in England, and assure the polite Inspector of Customs that you have only a very small supply of your favorite tobacco, you at once begin to examine the skyline to catch a glimpse of a towering English Cathedral. Of course if you should land in London you might do as Daniel Webster did. It is said that upon his arrival in London he took a conveyance, and said to the driver, who looked down upon him from his lofty perch, "Drive to Westminster Abbey." After a hasty inspection of that historic pile, Webster said, "Drive to the Tower of London." There, likewise, he made a hasty inspection. "Now drive to the hotel." Webster could not wait until after lunch to satisfy the longing that had probably been growing in his soul since childhood.

The English Cathedrals occupy a large place in the attractiveness of the land for the tourists. But a Cathedral is not merely a bit of scenery. It is a center of inspiration.

So when we come to appraise the Washington Cathedral we must not value it for its appeal to the sightseer. It has other values.

Nevertheless we must not overlook its appeal to the many visitors to the City of Washington. Nearly every one in our land visits Washington, at some time or other. More and more the city is becoming the center which attracts and inspires travellers. No one has really seen America until he has seen Washington. And it is most fitting that our Cathedral should stand out on its high hill, as a beautiful symbol of the righteousness that exalteth a nation.

Every one who has known Bishop Freeman of Washington will agree that he will make the Cathedral more than a lifeless monument. It will become a center of life and work. Bishop Freeman is a man who knows how to work. I had a few minutes' talk with him one day in Washington—and he told me that he had seven addresses to make that day to various organizations. If you come from some remote town and happen to run across Bishop Freeman, you may safely introduce yourself, and you will get a cordial greeting. His Cathedral will not be an ecclesiastical refrigerating plant, where attendants will be congealed by the frigidity of an aloof hierarchy, but it will be a place of spiritual warmth, and of human joyousness. A Cathedral may make a man seem physically insignificant, but it should make him feel spiritually significant. And the Washington Cathedral, under Bishop Freeman, will do this.

So when you go to Washington, go out to the Cathedral, and see its glorious beauty, and then realize that there is a vital energy behind that beauty; an energy that is devoted to the high task of inspiring our national life with high ideals and noble purposes, in the name and power of Jesus Christ.

Sonny had just returned from his first attendance at Sunday-School. He beamed proudly as he announced that the minister had spoken to him.

"Well," said his father, "what did he say to you?"

"He told me to keep quiet," replied sonny.

"My dear young lady," said the clergyman, in grieved tones as he listened to an extremely modern young woman tear off some of the very latest jazz on the piano, "have you ever heard of the Ten Commandments?"

"Whistle a few bars," said the young lady, "and I think I can follow you."

"Why?" asked the clergyman.

Important Changes In Prayer Book Few

Changes Proposed in the English Prayer Book Are Much Like Our Own

OBEY OUT

By Rev. A. Manby Lloyd

Yesterday afternoon the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Archbishop of York disclosed the text of the revised Book of Common Prayer on which the House of Bishops have been engaged for the past year. The revision is issued in the form of a composite book, containing virtually the whole of the existing Book of Common Prayer, together with permissive additions and deviations.

While there is no violent departure from the characteristic forms of the old Book, the revised version is permeated with the spirit of the age.

Sex equality is recognised by the making of the marriage vow of both man and woman identical, a change which involves the omission of the word "obey."

Provision is made in the burial office for cremation.

Prayers for the dead are no longer excluded.

Many of the harsher phrases of 1662 have been deleted or modified, as, for example, the curses in the Communion Service.

The more sensitive ears of today need no longer to be affronted by an unduly outspoken recital of the causes for which matrimony was instituted.

To a large extent the new Prayer Book gives sanction to practices which have grown up without any authority behind them. Indeed, for the first time, by means of the revised Prayer Book measure, the Archbishops and Bishops will obtain legal sanction of their frequent duty of putting out special forms of prayer. It will be a surprise to many people to learn that the forms of public prayer which were put out during the War and at the Armistice were, strictly speaking, entirely illegal.

The new Book allows for shortened forms of morning and evening prayer, the use of special psalms on Sundays, and the omission of those parts of the psalms which Churchpeople have often been reluctant to recite.

In the most controversial part of their work, the revision of the Communion Service, the Bishops, without adding much new matter, have so re-arranged the structure of the order of existing prayers as to bring the rite into much nearer accord with the ancient liturgies. In this respect it corresponds, to some extent, with those of the Scottish, South African, and American Prayer Books, which are themselves revisions of the Book of Common Prayer.

The doubt about the legality of the Eucharistic vestments is finally set at rest by a new rubric, ordaining that the priests shall wear either the surplice or vestments.

A settlement of the question of Reservation of the Blessed Sacrament, which in recent years has excited great controversy, has been attempted by a rubric prefixed to the Service of Communion of the Sick, in which reservation is allowed for the communion of the sick and for no other purpose whatever.

The plan of interchange opens up a prospect of limitless variation, but it is deemed the only one which will have any prospect of winning the approval of the clergy and people generally.

Already the wigs are on the green. Bishop Knox, the Bishop of Manchester, from 1904-20 says the proposals are worse than he feared! Sacramentally, they go back in the direction of the mechanical and material ideas of a viaticum or passport to Heaven . . . of the Presence of Christ. In fact, the result is to comprehend two religion in one book.

Lord Hugh Cecil expresses perfect satisfaction with all the new Eucharistic arrangements. He was only concerned about the occasional offices.

Maude Royden thinks the new marriage service an "extraordinary advance"; she regrets that the bride is still to be given away (an "obsolete and meaningless" custom), but the other alterations are top-hole.

Miss Sybil Thorndyke is cordial but "as for the actual changes in marriages—well, none. Some women have always obeyed—and some never will." Miss Marie Tempest replies to an inquiry that she "has obeyed all her life and the deletion of the word in the marriage service will not affect her in the very least."

There is the usaul stage-thunder from Mr. Kensit, who says that Cramer's P. B. is being sacrificed on the Anglo-Catholic altar. Thirty years ago Dean Farrar told his father (the famous John Kemit) that the church as a Protestant institution was gone. If so, there can no longer be any reason to maintain it as the National Church.

But on the whole I think we shall find that the general disposition is to live and let live. The rock ahead is Parliament itself. If they refuse assent, then indeed there will be trouble; eventually disestablishment.

Dr. Almon Abbott Is Called to Montreal

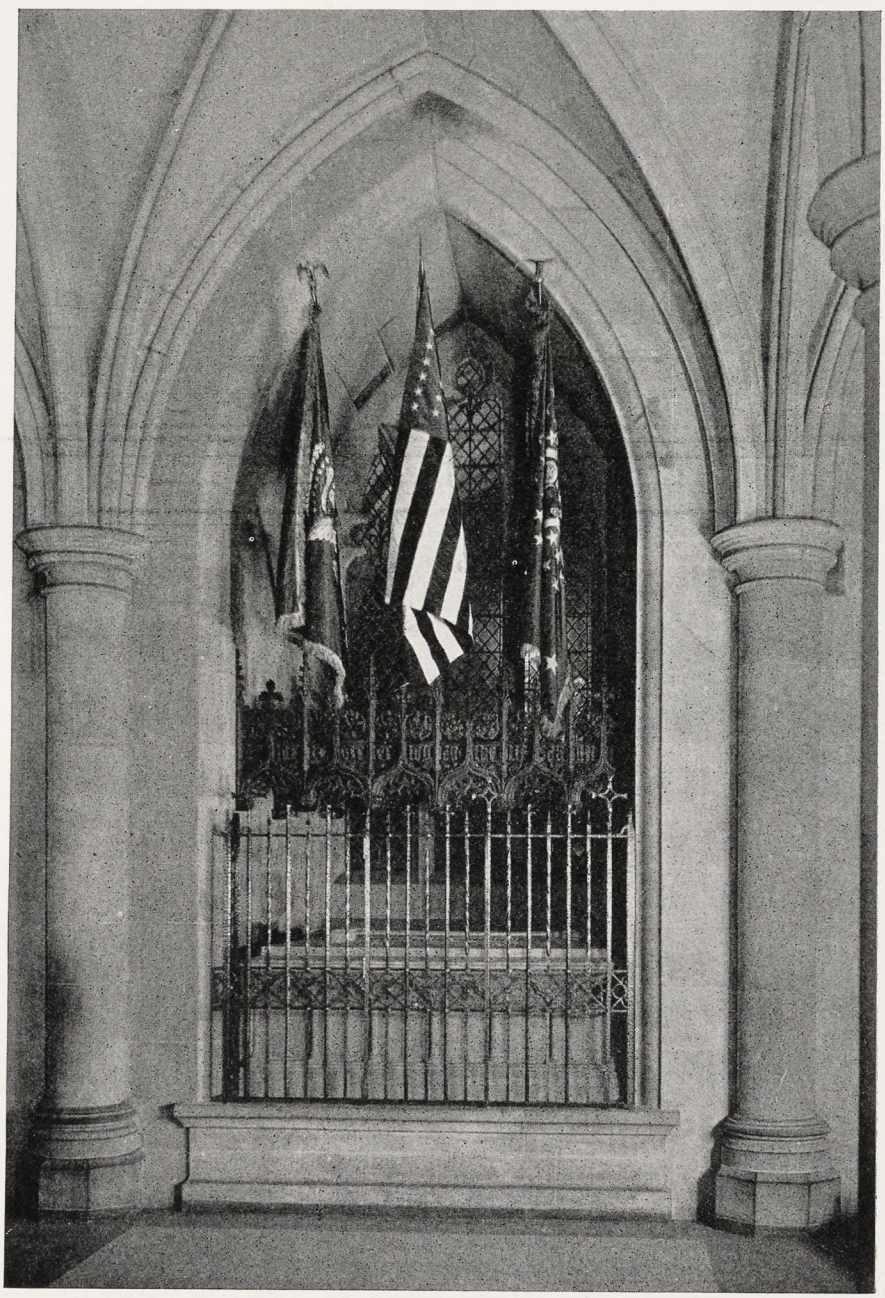
Member of Witness Editorial Board Is Called to Montreal Parish

CONSIDERING

The Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, D. D., rector of Grace and St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, Md., and one of the editors of THE WITNESS, has received a unanimous call to become rector of St. George's Church, Montreal. St. George's Church is the outstanding church of the Church of England in Canada. It has had a succession of illustrious men as its rectors; all the rectors heretofore having been secured in England and Ireland. The last rector of St. George's was the internationally known Archdeacon Patterson Smyth, D. D., who accepted the rectorship when professor of pastoral theology at Trinity College, Dublin. Dr. Patterson Smyth is one of the best-known authors in the Anglican Communion. Many of his books, notably "How We Got Our Bible," and "The Gospel of the Hereafter" have been translated into many languages, and are enjoying an ever-increasing sale throughout the Christian world. Dr. Patterson Smyth has recently resigned on account of ill health and advancing years. The Canadian Churchman in a recent issue said: "The committee appointed to select a rector for St. George's is having a difficult time to secure the right man. They have looked in Great Britain, Ireland and Canada, but no one has been chosen as yet."

Montreal is now a city of over a million people, and the opportunities in the church life are tremendous.

Dr. Abbott has been rector of Grace and St. Peter's Church since June, 1919, approximately eight years. The church has flourished under his leadership, and the congregation has quadrupled in numbers. Two hundred and forty thousand dollars have been expended in improvements, and the revenue for seven and a half years has totaled more than seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Dr. Abbott has the matter under consideration.



BIG GIVING

Fifteen hundred communicants pledge to the work at St. Luke's, Evanston. The canvass for 1927 resulted in $46,000 being pledged to the work of the parish, and $23,500 pledged to missions. Is there any parish in the country that gives more, annually, to missions?

Welcoming Visitors At the Cathedral

Curator's Office Under Rev. Robert Lee Lewis Is Important Department in Washington

200,000 VISITORS

The Curator's Office of Washington Cathedral is the place of contact between the Cathedral and the thousands of pilgrims, (last year more than 200,000) who annually come to Mount Saint Alban to offer their prayers for this spiritual witness of the faith of the nation and to inspect the impressive construction of a great Gothic Cathedral. Not since the 14th century has a cathedral like this been built.

Recently this important department of the Cathedral offices was put in the charge of the Rev. Robert Lee Lewis, a clergyman with an excellent record in human contacts and of genial nature. He acts as host, as it were, to the pilgrims and visitors from many states and lands. A temporary building has been erected near the entrance to the Bethlehem Chapel for the Curator's office and therein has been installed a large model of the Cathedral as it will look when completed and other exhibits in connection with the work.

A visitors' register makes a permanent record of the pilgrimages of individuals to the "Holy Hill" and booklets, guide books and a complete assortment of postcard views of Washington Cathedral are available. A cordial invitation is extended to all visitors to the National Capital to visit this office, bring their friends there and utilize to the fullest extent the facilities established to make a pilgrimage to Washington Cathedral more memorable and instructive.

Even a casual inspection of the Visitors' Register gives an idea of the wide range of interest in the Cathedral. A name from Maine or Minnesota is apt to be followed by a name from Texas or California. During one month in which a count was made, visitors registered from forty-six states of the Union and from fourteen foreign countries. Literally the ends of the earth are represented by the signatures on the register. Within the span of a few pages visitors may be noted as having come from southern India and Assam; Greenock, Scotland; Shanghai, China; Riga, Latvia; the Philippine Islands; Belgium; Auckland, New Zealand; Rome, Italy; Mexico; Czecko-Slovakia, and France; while England was represented by visitors from London, Sheffield, Durham and York.

REV. R. L. LEWIS
Curator of Washington Cathedral

The fact that within the crypt of the Bethlehem Chapel are sleeping the mortal remains of President Woodrow Wilson and George Dewey, Admiral of the Navy, attract many of their friends and admirers to pay the tribute of a visit to their tombs. Woodrow Wilson is the first president to rest in this Westminster Abbey of America and the first president to be buried in Washington. His burial place is marked by a sarcophagus recessed in the south wall of the Chapel. The body of Admiral Dewey was moved from Arlington at the request of Mrs. Dewey on March 28, 1925, and placed in the Cathedral with full naval honors.

Vergers of the Cathedral guide the pilgrims through the crypts and, weather permitting, over the new construction, pointing out the matters of interest and giving a detailed account of the undertaking and its plans for the future. The pilgrimage ends in the Curator's office where the Reverend Mr. Lewis gives a scholarly exposition of the Cathedral model, emphasizing architectural beauties of the structure, as well as the samples of the various stones that are to enter into the construction, perfect ashlars, carved stones, sculptured bosses and gargoyles which are on display in this department. Many pilgrims accept gladly his cordial invitation to remember the National Cathedral in their prayers.

It is a notable fact that the Curator's office is doing a fine work in humanizing the Cathedral-in-the-making on Mount Saint Alban.

Have Minimum Standard for Church Schools of the District of Eastern Oregon

THE CRUSADE

By Bishop Stevens

The District of Eastern Oregon has adopted a "minimum standard" for its Church School with ten points.

1. Opening Service and Training in Worship.
2. Christian Nurture with its graded scheme.
3. Forty-minute teaching period.
4. Regular meetings of workers for training and conference.
5. Systematic records and reports.
6. Nine to twelve-month session.
7. Systematic training in giving with class or school treasury system.
8. Advent and Lenten offerings.
9. Training in Christian Service in the five fields of service.
10. Little Helpers' Department.

The Crusaders in the District of Eastern Oregon are Bishop Cross of Spokane, Dean Roberts of Boise, and the Rev. C. A. Kopp of Kalispell, Montana. That the Bishop of Eastern Oregon is entirely "sold" on the Crusade is evident from the latest number of "The Oregon Trail Churchman." "The challenge of the Bishops' Crusade in the Episcopal Church is as the sweeping of the words of God over the dry bones in the valley of decision," he says. "If we pray as we have been urged to pray, 'Come from the four winds, O breath and breathe upon these slain, that they may live,' we can confidently expect a great new inspiration to come upon us in answer to our fervent prayer."

The dates for the Bishops' Crusade in the diocese of Oregon were from Sunday, February 6th, to Friday, February 18th. This period was divided among Portland, Eugene, and Marshfield. The Crusaders assigned to the diocese were the Rt. Rev. B. F. P. Ivins, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Milwaukee, and the Very Rev. J. W. Gresham, D. D., Dean of Grace Cathedral, San Francisco. An interesting feature of the program is that the two Crusaders alternate for the evening sermons.

One result of the Crusade clearly seen is the drawing together into closer fraternal bonds of the clergy. One cannot work with a man, pray with him, sing with him and enter into his labors with enthusiasm for a week without being deeply moved, strengthened, and inspired. The task facing us all now is the follow-up work, which must be thorough.

Cathedral Associates Throughout Country

Field Secretary of the Cathedral Association Finishes Tour of the South

NEW MEMBERS

The Rev. Edward Slater Dunlap, Canon of Washington Cathedral and field secretary of the National Cathedral Association, has completed a month's tour of ten cities in Texas and three cities in Oklahoma during which he has addressed many gatherings of cathedral friends and members of the association, conveying to them the thanks of the Bishop of Washington, the Dean and the Cathedral Chapter for their annual offerings and their prayerful interest.

As a result of his journey, new members were gained for the National Cathedral Association, now numbering more than five thousand who by their prayers and offerings are helping to build Washington Cathedral. This organization, started in the early days of the Cathedral undertaking, now has thirty-seven committees and members in practically all states of the United States and in many dioceses of the Church.

Annual memberships are maintained in the National Cathedral Association, in accordance with the wishes of the members, as follows: Master Builder, $1,000; Honorary Builder, $500; Associate Member, $100; Honorary Member, $25; Sustaining Member, $10; Contributing Member, $5; and Active Member, $2.

All classes of membership include a subscription to "The Cathedral Age," official quarterly magazine of Washington Cathedral and the first magazine to be devoted exclusively to Cathedral interests. It publishes beautifully illustrated articles on cathedrals throughout the Christian world and its writers endeavor to interpret cathedral architecture, symbolism, and associated subjects.

Among the cities visited by Canon Dunlap were Dallas, Fort Worth, Wichita Falls, Austin, San Antonio, Galveston, Houston, Waco, and Beaumont. He also visited Oklahoma City, Tulsa and Muskogee.

In his report to local committees and contributors, Canon Dunlap told of recent progress on Washington Cathedral. He announced that new construction had begun on the main floor of the Cathedral this month in the building of two of the four crossing piers ultimately to support the great central tower which will rise above the Potomac River 100 feet higher than the tip of Washington Monument.

It was of great interest to Texas friends, also, to learn that while the building of the Cathedral fabric has been going forward the spiritual service included in its Congressional charter also has been well developed. The inculcation of high principles of Christian education in youth is provided through the two Cathedral schools on Mount Saint Alban, both of which have graduates living in many states of the union.

REV. E. S. DUNLAP
Canon of Washington Cathedral

The first wing of the Cathedral library, through the gift of Mrs. Violet Blair Janin, a devoted churchwoman in Washington, in memory of her mother, has been erected to house the beginnings of a theological library ultimately to include 300,000 volumes. The College of Preachers has been organized to offer clergy and lay workers special training in the prophetic mission, thus seeking to draw to the Church those groups now out of touch with Christian teachings.

As field secretary of the National Cathedral Association, Canon Dunlap will visit other sections of the country to express the appreciation of Cathedral authorities to members for their offerings and prayers. He will also organize committees and other groups in behalf of the Cathedral.

Rev. Arthur B. Rudd, formerly rector of Emmanuel Church, Newport, R. I., is expected to join the clergy staff of Washington Cathedral on March 1st with special duties in connection with the National Cathedral Association program.

Rev. Frederick S. Fleming, rector of the Atonement, Chicago, has accepted a call to St. Stephen's, Providence, R. I. The Rev. Alfred Newbery, assistant at the Redeemer, Chicago, has accepted an election to the rectorship of the Atonement.

The Congregational Commission on Evangelism Issues Tests for Lent

NOW OBSERVE SEASON

By William B. Spofford

That Congregational Churches throughout the country are now widely observing Lent is indicated by these test questions which have been sent to local congregations by the Congregational Commission on Evangelism ,whose secretary is Rev. F. L. Fagley.

The questions, equally applicable to the rest of us, are:

"Do the people appreciate the meaning and opportunity of worship?

'Are the people lax in their attendance at the communion service?

"Do the people understand what participation in the communion means?

"Are the children being brought to baptism, and do their parents understand the meaning and implications of infant baptism?

"Are the baptized children being trained as members of the family of God?

"Are those who are drifting slowly from the church being sought after and being urged to return?

"Are new people being looked for, invited to the church and welcomed to its services?

"Are the people being taught to pray in public services, at home, and in their daily walks?

"Are we giving care that our services are deeply spiritual, and that the people participate wholeheartedly and in reverence?

"Are the services so conducted that strangers will feel welcome and desire to come again?

"Do the people read the Bible and gain from it strength for daily needs?"

"The Lenten season," Dr. Fagley said, "is a time for an examination of the inner life and for spiritual discipline. These considerations apply to the life of the church as well as to individuals. Each parish should determine that the answers to the questions in its self-examination should be given not in words only, but in fruits—'fruits of the spirit' which shall abide eternally."

Choirs of the respective Churches will have charge of the music. On the evenings of Holy Week there will be a Preaching Mission in St. Paul's Church, the missioner to be Bishop Davenport, of Easton. The Very Rev. C. C. W. Carver, Dean of the Cathedral, will preach the Passion Service in the Cathedral on Good Friday.

There will be the usual noon-day services, excepting Saturdays, during Lent in St. Peter's Church. The speakers include Bishop Nelson, Bishop Oldham; the Rev. Messrs. D. M. Brookman, Morristown, N. Here you have the exciting life of a bishop in Mexico. This is from Bishop Creighton:

"My first official visit to San Jose. Mrs. Creighton was to accompany me, but this morning the lavandera was full of pulque and there was a riot in the kitchen. The cook and the maid said that she was not a fit woman to live with. Mrs. Creighton discharged her and I ordered her out of the house at once, but she refused obstinately to leave. Hence I had to make my visit to San Jose alone and leave Mrs. Creighton to fight the battle.

"When I arrived at the Church Mr. Orihuela, the rector, was much perturbed because the congregation was not larger. However, I vested and occupied my seat in the Chancel and we began a very beautiful service, with especially good music, accompanied by organ and violin. Many people came in during the first part of the service and soon we had a good congregation.

"Mr. Orihuela explained to the people that the government had granted me permission to wear my robes and sit in the chancel, but that I was unable to take any part in the service. He then announced his text and proceeded with the opening sentence of his sermon, when the pew occupied by Sr. Davalos, the treasurer, and su estimable senora like the one-horse chaise, collapsed in every part. Sr. Davalos and his senora are heavy people. They slid gracefully to the floor, while various members of the congregation, acolytes and chaplains ran to their assistance.

"Fortunately both of these people were valeroso and were drawn from their position without any outcries and with the deepest reverence. They were placed in another pew, while the sexton, chaplains, acolytes and various members of the congregation carried out parts of the offending pew. No one in the congregation as much as smiled. It was a remarkable moment and despite the terrific noise the sermon was resumed and in a few minutes reached a climax of eloquence, which held all present spell-bound and in utter forgetfulness of the incident.

"After the service, there was quite a reception in the Sacristy and many members of the congregation and teachers and pupils from Hooker School and Sagrado Nombre came to greet me.

"Archdeacon Watson came home with me in an automobile to see if he could be of assistance in getting the lavandera out of the house. We found that she had gone, taking with her two sheets, a blanket, two dresses, and practically all of Mrs. Creighton's best napkins."

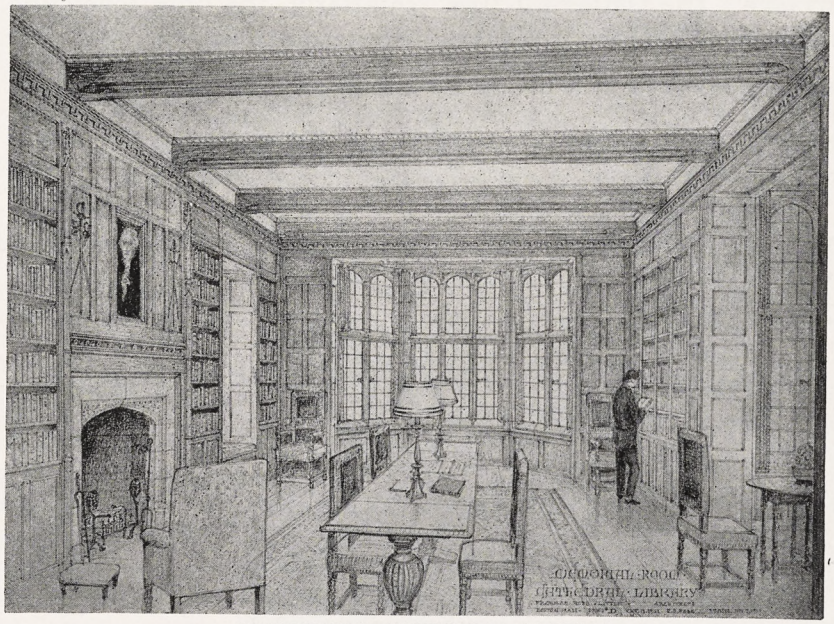
Many Chinese young men who come to America to study in our leading universities go back to China "worse than they came," the Rev. Dr. Caleb R. Stetson, rector of Trinity Church, declared at a meeting of the Women's Missionary Auxiliary of the church in Trinity Mission House.

Dr. Stetson spoke informally following an address on "Mission Work in the Orient" by the Rev. Francis Creswick Todd, rector of St. Andrew's Church, South Orange, N. J.

"The young men who come here from China after being taught by our missionaries there what Christianity is are much disillusioned when they get to America," said Dr. Stetson. "They are disillusioned when they study in our pagan universities and when they see our pagan civilization. They find when they get here that Christianity is almost a negligible quantity in our civilization. The result is that they go back to China worse than they came."

BISHOP RHINELANDER
Canon of Washington Cathedral

The Rev. Mr. Todd predicted that China would find a solution for her present internal trouble.



"I have the greatest sympathy for China," he said. "She is going to work things out, but she has a stiff road ahead. I do not think you could find any finer patriotism in the United States than you do in China.

"The Chinese are the alert, outstanding, wide-awake people in the Philippines. At our St. Stephen's Home in Manila I saw some fifty Chinese babies playing in the nursery. They were the snappiest little things. The Chinese children are children are so quick, so full of pep, and the little Filipino boys and girls are so heavy and dull in comparison."

A dialogue between the clergyman and a member of his congregation displaced the conventional sermon in the chapel service at Trinity Collee, Hartford, Sunday morning, February 13, and from the evidence of the students present proved superior in every way to the discourse method of expository teaching.

The experiment was made by Rev. Remsen B. Ogilby, president of Trinity and Dr. Louis H. Taylor, assistant professor of French. Such a method of presenting a subject had never before been attempted, so far as college authorities have been able to determine. It is an outgrowth of an extremely successful series of dialogues Trinity faculty members have been giving weekly over radio broadcasting station WHIC, the Travelers Insurance Company, for the entire college year. Dr. Ogilby conceived the dialogue method of presenting educational matter over the radio and its reception by the public was so enthusiastic that he determined to make the same experiment with the sermon.

As he explained the experiment to his congregation after the discussion was closed, he has felt for some time that the conventional sermon is a poor method of religious exposion. Unless it is filled with more oratory than matter, he said, it is somnolous, and, more important, misunderstood by his hearers. If a clergyman is given, through questions, the layman's attitude and viewpoint, he said, he can make what he wants to say more clearly than he possibly could in a discourse, and if he learns what points in his discussion are not stated convincingly he can explain the basis for them.

As exemplified in the Trinity Chapel, there is nothing of the open forum in Dr. Ogilby's experiment; nothing of the tricky "stage ef-

Did You Ever Take an INTERNAL Bath?

By T. A. BALLANTYNE

This may seem a strange question. But if you want to magnify your energy —sharpen your brain to razor edge— put a glorious sparkle in your eye—pull yourself up to a health level where you can glory in vitality—you're going to read this message to the last line.

I speak from experience. It was a message just such as this that dynamited me out of the slough of dullness and wretched health into the sunlight atmosphere of happiness, vitality and vigor. To me, and no doubt to you, an Internal Bath was something that had never come within my sphere of knowledge.

So I tore off a coupon similar to the one shown below. I wanted to find out what is was all about. And back came a booklet. This booklet was named "Why We Should Bathe Internally." It was just choked with common sense and facts.

What Is an Internal Bath?

This was my first shock. Vaguely I had an idea that an internal bath was an enema. Or by a stretch of the imagination a new-fangled laxative. In both cases I was wrong. A real, genuine true internal bath is no more like an enema than a kite is like an airplane. The only similarity is the employment of water in each case. And so far as laxatives are concerned, I learned one thing—to abstain from them completely. A bonafide internal bath is the administration into the intestinal tract of pure, warm water purified by a marvelous tonic. The appliance that holds the liquid and injects it is the J. B. L., Cascade, the invention of that eminent physician, Dr. Charles A. Tyrrell, who prefected it to save his own life. Now here's where the genuine internal bath differs radically from the enema.

The lower intestine, called by the great Professor Foges of Vienna, "the most prolific source of disease," is five feet long and shaped like an invested U—thus ∩. The enema cleanses but a third of this "horseshoe" — or to the first bend. The J. B. L., Cascade treatment cleanses it the ENTIRE LENGTH—and is the only appliance that does. You have only to read that booklet "Why We Should Bathe Internally" to fully understand how the Cascade alone can do this. There is absolutely no pain or discomfort.

Why Take an Internal Bath?

Here is why: The intestinal tract is the waste canal of the body. Due to out soft foods, lack of vigorous exercise and highly artificial civilization nine out of ten persons suffer from intestinal stasis (delay). The passage of waste is entirely too slow. Result: Germs and poisons breed in this waste and enter the blood through the blood vessels in the intestinal walls.

These poisons are extremely insidious. The headaches you get—the skin blemishes — the fatigue — the mental sluggishness — the susceptibility to colds —and countless other ills are directly due to the presence of these poisons in your system. They are the generic cause of premature old age, rheumatism, high blood pressure and many serious maladies.

Thus it is imperative that your system be free of these poisons. And a sure and effective means is internal bathing. In fifteen minutes it flushes the intestinal tract of all impurities. And each treatment strengthens the intestinal muscles so the passage of waste is hastened.

Immediate Benefits

Taken just before retiring, you will sleep like a child. You will rise with a vigor that is bubbling over. Your whole attitude toward life will be changed. All clouds will be laden with silver. You will feel rejuvenated—remade. That is not my experience alone—but those of 800,000 men and women who faithfully practice this wonderful inner cleanliness. Just one internal bath a week to regain and hold glorious, vibrant health! To toss off the mantle of age—nervousness—and dull care! To fortify you against epidemics, colds, etc. Is that fifteen minutes worth while?

Send for This Booklet

It is entirely FREE. And I am absolutely convinced that you will agree you never used a two-cent stamp to better advantage. There's a chapter in "Why We Should Bathe Internally" by Dr. Turner that is a revelation. There are letters from many who achieved results that seem miraculous. As an eye-opener on health, this booklet is worth many, many, many times the price of that two-cent stamp. Use the convenient coupon below or address the Tyrrell Hygienic Institute, Dept. 336, 152 West 65th Street, New York City—Now.

fects"; nothing of the theological discussion between two priests, and above all, nothing which is inharmonious with the ritual service and solemnity of worship. It is a serious attempt to make theological questions understandable to laymen by getting the layman's point of view, and to help the earnest layman who studies his religion have an active, positive belief rather than a passive, negative creed; and at the same time to retain all of the dignity essential to a service of worship so that the primary object of spiritual exaltation will not be destroyed.

Mr. Ernest E. Piper, superintendent of the department of religious education for the diocese of Michigan has planned for round-table fellowships for men and women during the season of Lent. Prof. Howard Y. McClusky of the University of Michigan will give a series of lectures on the "Psychology of Adjustment to Modern Life"; Carl H. Sorensen, a combustion engineer, will have a course in "Science in Modern Life"; and Bishop Page will lead a course on the subject of "Inner Life." After-dinner lectures will be given by Dr. A. L. Jacoby, city phychiatrist, Judge James A. Moynahan, of the Circuit Court, and Dr. Lynn Howard Hough, pastor of Central Methodist Episcopal Church. The fellowship is entering on its sixth year. Upwards of four hundred men and women attend.

Washington's birthday was made the occasion of special services at St. Paul's Cathedral Sunday, February 20 and a demonstration in behalf of national defense. Military and patriotic organizations attended Evensong in the Cathedral, where the preacher was Dean Herbert L. Johnson. It was necessary to conduct over-flow meeting in the auditorium of the Cathedral House and also in the adjacent assembly hall of the Knights of Columbus.

in 1923 and is now a senior at the University of Maryland, is the president of the Conference and acted as toastmaster at the "get together" supper on Friday evening. At the general meeting the conference had the honor of an address by the presiding bishop of the Church. The Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes of Washington Cathedral, spoke on "The Layman and the Church."

The conference also had the advantage of the presence of the Rt. Rev. John T. Dallas, bishop of New Hampshire. Bishop Dallas opened the conference on Saturday and closed the day with a Quiet Hour in preparation for Holy Communion.

A letter has been received from the Rev. Walker Gwynne who is one of the older alumni of the General Theological Seminary, among other things. It is an eloquent plea for cash in which he points out many distressing matters and urges one and all to chip in toward the needed million or more now being raised. After prohibition the most popular subject that crosses my desk is money. I am sure that this paper could be easily filled with appeals which in the opinion of those sending them, are of the most vital importance to the Church. Obviously we cannot print all of these requests for money but we do urge all Church folks with money to spend on education of others to give thought to the General Seminary.

ambitions which he has cherished since he became bishop are about to be fulfilled. One, he wanted more money in the fund which pays the salary of the bishop. Now a friend has offered to pay the salary, $15,000 a year, until such time as the income from the fund is great enough to handle it. His second ambition is that the salaries of the clergy of the diocese may be increased.

Rev. L. F. Kent of Cordova, Alaska, writes:

"Never let anyone tell you that the work in Alaska is a failure. With the right kind of effort it will grow and grow big.

"If there ever was a place where a missionary should have an academic degree it is Alaska. Here in Cordova thirty-four per cent of the people are college men and women. Our congregations are growing; we have an open forum every other Thursday evening where we discuss the history of religion. The intervening Thursdays, we have a Bible class of 40 or more of college people.

"Our average Sunday morning congregations range between thirty and forty in Cordova; Church School enrollment is sixty-four. Open Forum membership forty-five; Bible class membership about forty; Order of Sir Galahad twenty; Boy Scouts twenty-four. In Valdez our congregations run about sixty. I go there once a month. In Latonohe the congregations run about forty. In McCarthy they ran about thirty and in Kennecott about sixty-five."

Questions?

The following questions are based upon the articles, Spiritual Values by Bishop Johnson, and The Big Story by Irwin St. John Tucker, and are for those who plan to use these series of articles to run in installments during Lent, in Study Classes.

SPIRITUAL VALUES

1. Illustrate from your own experience what Bishop Johnson means by his use of the word "values".
2. What is essential for a real appreciation of spiritual values?
3. What does Bishop Johnson mean by "ecclesiastical hoboes"?
4. What is the difference between philosophy and religion?
5. Does one have to be educated to be religious?
6. Give the characteristics of the Faith of the Gospel.

THE BIG STORY

1. Find in the New Testament an account of a wreck; of an imprisonment. What is a "special correspondent" and just why does Mr. Tucker say that these accounts were written by one?
2. Find out what a "rewrite man" is on a newspaper. Elaborate on Mr. Tucker's statement that the Gospel of St. Luke was the work of a rewrite man. (If there is nobody in the class to do it, ask the rector to talk on it for a few minutes).
3. What does Mr. Tucker mean when he says that the Gospel According to St. John was the work of an editorial writer? (Get your rector's opinion on this).
4. "The Bible is a true newspaper." What is meant by that statement?

This from the Rev. Walter Stowe, rector of St. Mark's, Denver:

"Mr. Spofford is partial to interesting games and we therefore suggest this one: What parishes have had the same treasurer for over thirty-five (35) years?"

"Saint Mark's, Denver, sets up this record for the rest to shoot at. Mr. Nathan O. Vosburgh has just completed his thirty-fifth year as Treasurer of Saint Mark's Parish. He celebrated it by writing checks which paid IN FULL our parish quotas to the Diocese of Colorado and the National Council for the first time since 1919, after coming close to paying the quotas in full every previous year.

"In 1892, while Mr. Vosburgh was away on his honeymoon, he was elected treasurer (a mean trick, some will say!).

THE BIG STORY

The Gospel According to a Newspaper Man

BY. REV. IRWIN ST. JOHN TUCKER

WHEN anything happens, a newspaper man's first inquiry is "Is it news?" which simply means, will it interest my readers to know about it, so that they will buy the paper to find out? That depends on how many people it affects, and how deeply. Specialized news—such as real estate or sports or fashions, opening of a new store, burning of a home, a church supper—interests only a few people. But human interest stories and big news have a universal appeal.

HUMAN INTEREST

"Human interest" news means that an obscure person has done or undergone, something unusual that illustrates common human nature. "Big" news may be the determination of a point in national policy, a great disaster, or some achievement; like the withdrawal from the world court, the Miami hurricane, or the swimming of the English channel.

Is the Bible news? Once I was in a print shop ordering a circular. Machinery was thumping and whirring, with ink and industry everywhere. The man to whom I was talking referred to religion as "all that bunk." I replied I did not think it was all bunk. He said, "I thought you were an educated man. Do you believe in an old fellow with whiskers who sits up on the clouds?"

Before that discussion had gone five minutes, the printers had stopped their work and were crowding around, listening. As I was leaving, one of them said, "Don't forget all this is just as important to us as it is to you."

THE BIG STORY

—"Just as important to us as it is to you!" This story of religion is of universal interest, beyond any other. It has the supreme appeal. Neither death nor disaster, nor prosperity nor tribulation, nor war, pestilence or famine can compare with it for all-pervading and continuously sustained interest.

Stories of real, basic, breathless importance are those which affect the life and death of those we know, and who are dear to us. During the Florida hurricane every newspaper office in the land was besieged with telephone calls and personal visits from relatives and friends of those in the path of the storm.

Nothing is more fatal to a newspaper's reputation—and circulation—than the reputation of spreading disaster stories which are not true. On this count the checking up of the Bible is of supreme importance. For its story affects the life and death, not only of all the living, but also of all the dead.

PROPERTY INTEREST

Next to the life and death interest comes the property interest. In this also, the news value of the Biblical story is far in excess of any other. In every city the church holds property of high value in its own name, and the collective property of all its members reaches an astounding figure. Church buildings, parish houses, rectories, church-owned hospitals, orphanages, convents, church schools, rescue institutions and asylums of all sorts, are valued in the billions. Added to them is the intangible value, the very real increase in security of property and life where the Church gains strength.

Huge sums of money are involved. Money raised and spent for all purposes, domestic and foreign, by the combined churches of the United States, is a current expense account of staggering totals.

HISTORIC INTEREST

In addition to this is the historic interest; the vital part taken by the Christian Church in ages past in coloring and shaping the trend of history. For twenty centuries the human interest of the Church has never faltered, but has grown deeper and wider. It is interwoven with personal as well as public life. It is the dominant interest in the lives of professional clerics and devout believers. It is a subordinate interest in the lives of 30,000,000 communicant members. It is a dormant interest in the lives of 113,000,000 Americans—as of all other nations. All of us at some time or another have been to church, or have come in contact with it through Christmas or Easter celebrations, or weddings, or funerals. Even those who hate it cannot ignore it.

All of this huge property value, immense current finance value and all pervading personal interest are based upon the belief that the story is true.

There is one quality about big news which distinguishes it from a feature story. That is, that action of some sort follows its publication. A story is not a really big story unless it "stirs up a follow;" unless people get together and pass resolutions, or reorganize the police force, or enlist in the army, or raise money for relief.

ACTIVITY

Well, all this activity in connection with the gospel story is not only public, but individual. It exerts a very definite force toward changing lives in private as well as altering public activity. In fact, it has exerted more force in both these directions than any other one story.

By all the tests, therefore, it is the supreme news story. This makes it all the more important that it should be checked to its sources, and its reliability, in so far as we are able to test it, either proved or disproved.

CHECKING UP

Sent out on an assignment of any kind, a reporter first checks on the source of his information. Given a notice of an important wedding, or death, or mass meeting, or wreck, or killing, he asks first: "Where did you get this tip? Who sent it in? Is he trustworthy?" Anonymous communications are discarded, unless there is very strong outside evidence that the statement is true.

Now here we are given an account of happenings of profound interest, affecting the whole human race, on the basis of which millions of dollars are spent yearly, millions of lives regulated, and the course of history has been altered. Any well-trained reporter will immediately ask: "Where did you get this?"

Eyewitnesses there are none. The last event set down occurred in the year 64 A. D., and consists merely of the visit of a number of Jewish gentlemen to Saul Benjaminson, usually known by his nickname of "Paul," which means "Little One." The visitors left in a wrangle, after which Mr. Benjaminson remained in Rome, where he was on a legal matter, for upward of two years. He was then prosecuting an appeal to the supreme court of the Roman Empire, and there are certain letters bound in the volume which indicate he was unsuccessful. There are reports that he was executed; but there is nothing in the book to prove this.

Between 64 A. D., and 1926 A. D., stretches a lapse of nearly nineteen hundred years. Nobody now living saw, or heard, any of the events narrated. On what basis can we accept them as true? Where did the story come from?

Tracing the Sources

In the book which I used as a starter, I found the imprint of a publishing firm in New York City. There is no date given, although the book was purchased new in 1902. There is, however, a preface addressed "To the most high and mighty prince JAMES, by the Grace of God King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, etc.; the Translators of the Bible wish Grace, Mercy and Peace, through Jesus Christ our Lord." One gathers from a reading of this preface that the James addressed succeeded Elizabeth on the throne of England. The address is full of obscure references to the Man of Sin, Popish Persons, the Church of England, Self-Conceited Brethren, and the like, all referring to some controversy which was felt to be of great moment at the time, but throwing no light on the origin of the Book, and certainly far from direct evidence of the truth of its statements.

Any history of England informs us that this King James came to the throne in 1606, and that the translators of the Bible completed their work in 1611. But this very date is perplexing: it means one thousand, six hundred and eleven years AFTER the principal events narrated in the book under discussion.

We are not, then, much better off. As between two witnesses, neither of whom saw the murder, the difference between 1611 miles and 1926 miles of distance from the scene amounts to nothing. Both are equally unreliable.

The controversy centering around the King James Version seems to bear on the advisability of making this translation. Its title page reads: "The Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Testaments: translated out of the Original Sacred Tongues, and with the former translations diligently compared and revised, by his Majesty's special command."

Former translations there were, then (as there have been many since) and the "original tongues" were Greek and Hebrew. These translations vary in phrasing, as any two reporters will give slightly different versions of the same event, although the main facts are identical.

Manuscripts

But are there, in these two Original Sacred Tongues, any existing authentic manuscripts written by any man or men who saw the events narrated? We are met by a flat and sweeping denial. The oldest "dated" manuscript is in Hebrew, and claims to have been written in the year 916 A. D.

There are a number of manuscripts in Syriac, Egyptian, Slavonic, and Latin, translations of the originals, scattered over a very wide area, dating back to all sorts of different times, and giving the same stories, told in the same way. Here is evidence of value. These were translated and copied, one at a time, from an original which has been lost, but the fact that they all say the same thing establishes fairly well what the originals said.

But who wrote the originals? And who copied them? Did the copiers do so in good faith, believing the words they wrote to be true? Or did they do it as the Arabian Nights were copied in Arabic, as fairy stories, without the slightest idea in anybody's mind that the things so described actually happened?

We speak of inspiration of the Scriptures. But the Bible I now have was put into type by printers, members of the Typographical Union of New York City. I know a great many printers, and I am willing to testify under oath that not one of them believes himself inspired. They smoke, chew tobacco and swear, even while setting up the pages of the Holy Bible.

Was it so with the men who copied these pages by hand? And where did they get the pages they copied?

Cheerful Confidences

SAVE THE OLD TUNES

By Rev. George Parkin Atwater

I MUST confess to a sense of disappointment whenever I hear an old hymn sung to a strange tune.

From childhood we have been accustomed to a familiar tune. We piped up in Sunday School, and we feebly warbled in church, and the old tune sank into our hearts and we liked it.

Now come the musicians and say we were all wrong about that old stuff. It was florid, or sentimental, or trashy, or meretricious (which is the high-brow word for trashy). We have spent years in training our ears for music, developing our taste for music, and refining our musical judgment. That old tune has a distinct strain of the commonplace in it. It jars on our delicate sensibilities, say the musicians. The very fact that most people like to sing it is condemnation enough. It has a certain swinging, joyous melodiousness that brings it at once under suspicion. You must scrap it, and put a tune having musical merit in its place.

"But," answers a boy, "we like that old tune. Even Dad tried to sing that in church, and Dad generally can't sing enough to sit in at a college dinner."

"Tush, boy," answered the musicians, "we must not have tunes that will suit your father (same as Dad). Tunes are for the edification of the choir, not for the 'hoi polloi' in the pews. It's rather bad taste to sing in church. You might annoy your neighbor."

"But," answers the boy, "we like to sing. And if you take away these old familiar tunes, we have to keep quiet. Moreover, you pitch them so high that we have to sing falsetto when we, in the pews, try to give the trained choir a slight lift."

"The very idea," answer the musicians. "The deplorable taste of the people. Here we offer them the delicacies of music, the caviare, the pate de fois gras, the very pialam-ode of music, the enrapturing and entrancing des colelettes de veau, and the undiscriminating plain people prefer beefsteak and hash browns. It's too distressing. Why will people go to ball games when we can let them have the thrill, the excitement, the rapture of a chess tournament. Why will they read the Saturday Evening Post, or THE WITNESS when we offer them the Apex, and the Hibrough. Why will they like Doug and Mary when our little theatre presents the drahma of the top notchers in modulated English.?"

But they do. And we would like some of our old tunes back in the Church Hymnal. We would like to sing, even if we ran the risk of being arrested. And we would like to be able to reach the high notes without standing up on the pews.

I might add that it would be only fair to do your best with the new ones. You will probably like them in time. But rise up and ask for the old ones.

RELIGIOUS PRACTICES

The Ideal of the Church

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

RELIGION is the most serious business in life. If it is worthless, man is justified in ignoring or opposing it. If it is capable of real value, it must be pursued as one follows a vocation.

As St. Paul says, it is "the vocation to which we are called."

Whichever view we may take of it, we have no business to take it casually.

It is either the chief end of man or else his greatest folly. One has no right to treat it lightly and then to pass judgment on it.

It is only as we do God's will, that we can hope to appreciate His purposes.

Behind every real business in life there must be a certain training which fits man for that particular business.

DISCIPLINE

It is difficult for the raw recruit, who wishes to become a soldier, to understand why he must undergo a rigid discipline in a training camp. It is only after the battle has been won or lost that he begins to comprehend the value of training.

In the process of learning the value of discipline, one grows weary of the manual of arms and the tedious marches and countermarches. It is not easy to see why he must learn to shoulder arms and to go through the mazes of drill, until he visualizes in battle the difference between trained soldiers and an undisciplined mob.

Mr. Bryan erroneously supposed that we could martial an army overnight because America had such good material, but experience has taught us that good material is merely cannon fodder unless it be carefully trained.

A sentimental mob led by a cheer leader is a poor army to throw against disciplined troops.

This explains why millions of Christians in this republic are so ineffective in their efforts to defeat the forces of evil. It also demonstrates the weakness of successive attempts to overthrow the power of the Roman Church, for whatever you may think of that institution you cannot ignore the fact that it understands the value of training.

You cannot dislodge veteran troops with an undisciplined mob of individualists.

Personally, I believe that the Prussian army was over-disciplined, so that it was effective only in mass movements and woefully deficient in individual initiative.

DISCIPLINE AND FREEDOM

So I believe that discipline is necessary, but that it must not be carried to the point, where personal freedom is submerged in hierarchial direction.

In the discipline of the Church, we are dealing with those to whom Christ has promised liberty, but only as we learn the value of freedom in cooperation and fellowship.

Discipline is valuable, but it can be overstressed.

Individual initiative is valuable, but it can be overemphasized.

In the Church we are a group of free men who are anxious to accept discipline in order that we may be effective as against the enemy, but not that we may be suppressed in our personal lives.

It is possible to carry discipline to the point where the man loses his identity in the mass formation.

It is possible to carry individual initiative to the point where there is little or no corporate power.

It is just this balance which is the ideal of this Church, and because this balance is most difficult to maintain, we are constantly being urged to one of the other extremes, which are exemplified in Rome on the one side and Protestantism on the other.

There are minds which are so constituted that they cannot preserve this balance of constitutional freedom and insist that we must belong to one or the other of these antagonistic camps.

They cannot see how one can be both Protestant and Catholic; Protestant in our opposition to hierarchial domination and Catholic in our insistence upon constitutional order.

The one compartment mind must be one or the other; the judicial mind sees good and evil in both camps, and refuses to be stampeded into either.

THE IDEAL

We prefer to strive for a difficult ideal, rather than to accept the dictates of mere numbers and unjustifiable assurance. Yet we are by virtue of our historical alliances more disposed toward independent individualism than we are toward disciplined cooperation.

To those whose prejudices are paramount we seem to belong to one camp or the other when as a matter of fact we belong to neither. It is impossible to say which is the more insistent in its declaration; whether it be the Romanizers who declare that we are nothing but Protestants or the Protestants who declare that we are merely an imitation of Rome.

This counter charge is the best evidence that we are really what we are—a body which has retained Catholic traditions without accepting papal domination.

This is possible only where Anglo-Saxons have kept their minds and have not sacrificed realities in order to gratify their prejudices. The real crux of our status lies in the relative emphasis assigned to discipline in the proportion of doctrine, discipline and worship.

Rome has exalted discipline until doctrine and worship are made subsidiary to it; whereas Protestantism has relegated discipline to the point where everyone does that which is expedient in his own eyes.

The Church has not scrapped the discipline of the primitive Church; neither has it yielded to the assumption of discipline by an Italian hierarchy.

Of course it is the most difficult course and therefore the most liable to failure; also the most effective when attained.

We are called to a discipline based upon the foundation of the Church before it was regimented to papal domination or rent asunder by Protestant resentment.

The real difference between the Anglican Church and Rome is not a matter of ritual or pious practices, but one of personal liberty.

The real difference between the Anglican Church and the reforming denominations is largely a matter of ritual and practices and not a matter of personal liberty.

APPEARANCES

But because candles and vestments are external and personal liberty is internal, we look more like Rome and act more like Protestants. Obviously we are more readily condemned by our looks and clothes than we are by our ideals and actions.

As a matter of fact, we have a more glorious ritual than Rome and far greater personal liberty than that enjoyed by the various sects, some of whom are as dictatorial as Rome and equally ambitious for political power.

In the perspective of appearances, we are condemned by one side for our clothes and by the other for our refusal to be regimentated.

In the midst of this controversy we are liable to lose our heads and to spend our time arguing with one another.

THE DANGER

The greatest danger that confronts us is a divided camp in which we accuse one another of dreadful things that are not so. And they are not so, because after all we stick to our ideals and our loyalty.

This really determines our allegiance and no one has the right to question it.

We must, however, make up our minds to certain things.

First—That what we do in secret is the real test of our sincerity and devotion. Our religious life is spoiled by advertisement. The arrogant assumption that we are virtuous is quite different from the insistence that our ideals are those of the Master.

Religious bodies are to be suspected just in proportion as they claim to have apprehended virtue and to be respected just in proportion as they adhere to high and difficult ideals.

"Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself" and only that which we do in secret is approved of God.

Second—That our ideals are difficult and not easy, for they require that we do voluntarily that which others do under the duress of legal requirement.

MARY VAN KLEECK
Is Chairman of Conference

Liberty of personal action is a very different test of loyalty than that which is demanded under both Roman and Puritan domination.

MUTUAL RESPECT

Third—That our mutual consideration for one another must be very great for we necessarily differ so radically as we lean toward one or the other of the great camps which adjoin us.

It is far easier to bear the accusations of those without our camp than it is to endure the suspicions of those within.

It is a reflection upon my motives, my intelligence and my morals to accuse me of being a Romanizer because I love a gorgeous ritual; or to accuse me of being merely a Protestant because I enjoy the greatest simplicity.

The real test of my allegiance is to be found in my response to that which the Church requires of me in prayer and giving and personal service.

The test of my loyalty to the ideals of the Church is measured by her requirements and not by the demands of any group within her borders; and the proof of my loyalty is to be found in the fact that I neither go over to Rome nor exchange my orders for those of human origin.

It is futile to answer the vague accusations of partisan prejudice, because it is never fair and always distorts the facts.

The vital thing in all of our contentions is to be found in the devotion with which you and I serve a constituted authority which purposely allows a great latitude of practice rather than in our deference to the self-constituted authority of private prejudice, which often assumes an air of papal infallibility.

Preacher, Pulpit and Pew

An Oklahoma mother has been trying Coueism on her children. Finding some difficulty in getting her young son to take a spoonful of castor oil, she reminded him, "Now, Wilbur, you know all you have to do is to keep on saying to yourself, 'It tastes good! It takes good!' and it won't be hard to take at all."

Suddenly Wilbur had an inspiration. "Mother," he cried, "I know a better thing to say. I will say, 'I've already taken it! I've already taken it!' and then I shan't have to take it at all."

A little girl was impressed by the minister saying grace at a dinner party to which she was admitted.

A few days later her mother gave a lunch to a group of friends and the little one said, "Mother, is the minister coming again to pray before we eat?"

"No," answered her mother, "this is just an informal lunch."

The child paralyzed the guests when they were all seated, by saying, "Mama says this is such an infernal lunch that we will not have a prayer before eating it."

Harold had returned from his first Sunday School lesson, and his mother asked what the lesson was about.

"It was about two people who lived in a garden called Paradise, and they were happy until the servant came."

An old preacher told the boys of the Bible class what lesson he was going to read the following Sunday. The boys, finding the place, glued together the connecting pages. The next Sunday the preacher read on the bottom of one page: "When Noah was 120 years old he took unto himself a wife, who was (then turning the page) 140 cubits long, forty cubits wide, built of gopher-wood, and covered with pitch inside and out." He was puzzled. He read again, verified the statement, and then said: "My friends, this is the first time I ever met this in the Bible, but I accept it as evidence of the assertion that we are fearfully and wonderfully made."

Books for Lent

By the Rev. Irvine Goddard

In Time of Sorrow, a Book of consolation, by Bishop Slattery. Macmillan. $1.50

Bishop Slattery has the triune qualifications essential to a successful pastor. He is highly cultured, deeply spiritual, and always courteous. In other words he is a scholar, priest, and gentleman. One can imagine that in his ministrations as a parish priest, especially in hours of discouragement and bereavement, his very presence would be an unfailing comfort and an inspiring assurance of the Eternal Vereties. Into the pages of this little book of consolation which he calls In Time of Sorrow, has crept much of the helpful wisdom and tenderness of spirit which has characterized his ministry. His words will give sanity and peace not only to those in the first frenzies of their grief but also to those to whom a great sorrow has brought dark questionings about the reality of God's love.

The Touch of God, by E. Herman. Doran. $2.00.

There are many genuinely Christian people, whose eyes ever seek the ground and who spend their days in running the small dust of life through their fingers. Such people regard the mystic with suspicion. They thing him a dreamer—impractical, fanciful, vague and obscure. If there are any such who read this review, clerical or lay, please secure a copy of The Touch of God, for your Lenten devotional reading. It will not only enlighten your mistaken attitude towards the worth of real mysticism, but will bring you into touch with one of the most intelligible exponents of mysticism the church has produced. There is not a single essay in the volume that is casual; each one is the rare distillation of a great and devout mind.

Acts of Devotion. MacMillan, 1926. 60 cents.

Prayer is the soul's sincere desire to form contact with the source of its inmost being and the principle of its deepest life. Acts of Devotion is a very handy little volume of carefully selected prayers articulating in the choicest diction every phase of man's inner needs. It is well worth possessing.

Jesus and the Problems of Life, Sidney A. Weston. The Pilgrim Press.

Jesus and the Problems of Life is a problem discussion course of study. Discussion is often provocative of more heat than light unless there is an adequate background of material worth discussing. Leaders of discussion groups will find admirable material within the covers of this book. It has the merit of having been already tried out among such groups successfully.

The Words from His Throne, a Study of the Cross, by Bishop Slattery. Longmans Green & Co., $1.00.

The Three Hours Service is more of a Roman invention than Anglican and like much that is Roman is even in danger of becoming tawdry and second-rate. Whether we preserve the balance of sanity and reality will depend largely on the meditations that are given or read at this service. There are stacks of books on the Seven Last Words, few that are good and many that are largely pious drival. The clergy will be grateful to Bishop Slattery for The Words from His Throne. They will find in it wise and helpful suggestions for their own meditations—or a book to read at the Three Hours Service that will enrich and deepen its spiritual tone, and preserve the note of reality throughout.

Rectors

FREQUENTLY letters are received at the office of THE WITNESS asking for information in regard to commissions for subscriptions. We are very glad to allow a commission to any representative who works with the consent of the rector of the parish, of 50c on each yearly subscription. In many parishes during Lent subscriptions are taken by the children, the commissions going into their mite boxes. May we suggest that a representative, or a number of them, be appointed in your parish to take subscriptions during Lent. It serves a double purpose; it enables the young people to earn money for their mite boxes; it means the weekly visitation of a Church weekly to the homes of your parish throughout the year. Simply write the names and addresses carefully on one side of the paper, and send them to us with $1.50 for each yearly subscription.

Questions?

The following questions are based upon the article by Bishop Johnson, Religious Practices, which is in this number, and The Big Story, the Gospel According to a Newspaper Man, also in this number. The questions are intended for those who are using the articles as a basis for a Lenten Study class, but if you are in no class see if you can answer the questions after reading the articles.

RELIGIOUS PRACTICES

1. Why is religion a serious business?
2. Is there a conflict between discipline and freedom?
3. What do you mean by the words "Protestant" and "Catholic?"
4. What is the position taken by the Episcopal Church?
5. Comment on this statement: "As a matter of fact we have a more glorious ritual than Rome and a far greater personal liberty than that enjoyed by the various sects."
6. Discuss the three points made by Bishop Johnson at the end of his article.

THE BIG STORY

1. What constitutes "news?" Is the Bible news, and if so, why?
2. Name those things in which people are chiefly interested.
3. What is the first thing a newspaper does when it gets a "tip" on a story?
4. Have the rector tell you how we came to have our present Bible, tracing its development.

Notable Address By A Baltimore Pastor

Baltimore Pastor Tells Laymen What the Modern Trends of Religion Are KEEN ANALYSIS

By Rev. James A. Mitchell

An address of great significance, reflecting the intelligent opinion of modern Protestant leadership, was delivered in Baltimore recently before a great mass meeting of laymen from all the evangelical bodies of the city. The speaker, the Rev. Harris E. Kirk, D.D., occupies an unique position in the city by the influence of his pulpit over young people and professional men.

The announced subject of the address was "The Situation of Protestant Christianity in Baltimore," but the speaker dealt in the main with the larger issue of modern Protestantism and its problems. His conclusions will be of particular interest to Episcopalians. A digest of this portion of his address follows:

A. An analysis of the environment in which the church works: In the Middle Ages life was God-centered. Religion was the mother of the arts. The age was not moral but was more conscious of God. During the Renaissance interest drifted away to man and his growing material activities. Today, in consequence, our view is circumscribed and partial; we are interested in particulars and not in the whole. We are over-impressed by bigness and mass. This has led to several results.

(1) The humility of the Middle Ages has been displaced by self-assertiveness. Hence there is a loss of dependence on God.

(2) There is a non-religious motive for living. Culture, art and science have taken the place of religion as "ends."

(3) The church is no longer of one mind but is a church of adaptation and compromise. Hence there is a loss of responsibility over souls.

(4) Fear of God has been displaced by fear of the mechanistic life;—no longer do we feel the immediacy of the eternal. Thus the soul, and the beauty and glory of living early depart.

(5) There is a new asceticism. Formerly asceticism was a sacrifice of the world; now it is a sacrifice of cultural possibilities, of the church, of the nation and of God, to be successful in business.

(6) A revolt of the spirit against the tyranny of things is inevitable. This is difficult to discern but is there at the very center. Science having built up the modern world now turns and says it leads nowhere. The lowest form of such thinking is behaviourism.

Amid these discouraging symptoms there are others which may eventually lead us out.

(1) There is a break-down in non-religious motives for living. "Frog" philosophy, which sees the lily pods and mud but cannot view the whole as does the bird, and "cafeteria" thought, are dying out in our colleges.

(2) The infallibilities of science are waning. In many respects science has been a fine ethical teacher and has not always been appreciated by the church. It has a real love of truth. But its search for truth obliges it to follow the results of its own investigation. Hence if God exists and the spiritual world is real, science will ultimately reach this conclusion.

(3) The searching mind is making new demands upon the church. The church has been too much concerned with comfort and external conduct. It has been tied to the Anglo-Saxon idea of keeping things as they are, and to an emphasis on mere ephameral morals of an age. Our time is weary unto death of this sort of religion.

B. What kind of religion is most likely to solve these problems?

Protestantism must learn that religion has two aspects: to behold the beauty of the Lord and then to inquire in His Temple; it must include both worship and teaching. The non-liturgical churches have so exaggerated the sermon and the personality of the minister that God is not felt in Church unless the preacher is in the pulpit and the crowd in the pews. There is too much secularity in modern Protestantism. The church is not the place for paid agitators; for prohibition propaganda; for condemnations of certain newspapers,—but for salvation of souls. The laymen cannot expect to have a prophet in the pulpit if they demand a "go-getter" all week.

Dr. George Craig Stewart has just been appointed as one of the seven representatives of the Episcopal Church in America to the World Conference on Faith and Order which meets in Lausanne, Switzerland, August 2 to August 21. Several weeks ago, when alternates were chosen, Dr. Stewart was the only priest alternate elected; Dean Fosbroke, of the General Theological School of New York, having declined his election, Bishop Manning of New York, the chairman of the commission of the Episcopal Church, has appointed Dr. Stewart to the vacancy created.

Young People Come In For More Talk

Bishop of Lichfield Says That We Must Get Families Out of Hovels

SUNDAY SCHOOLS

By Rev. A. Manby Lloyd

The principal matter of discussion at the spring session of the Church assembly which met last week at Westminster, under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury, arose out of a report of the Social and Industrial commission. The Bishop of Lichfield, introducing the report, suggested that in every diocese there should be formed a council of youth.

"There is," said his lordship, "a freer relationship between the sexes to-day. The chaperon is almost a thing of the past. 'Charley's Aunt' has been almost entirely disestablished. (Laughter.) With regard to young people of the wage-earning class there is certainly a greater freedom of intercourse. There are dangers in it but it is by no means all to the bad, because if young people of both sexes can join together in ordinary comradeship in the common interests of life, apart from merely sex questions, it tends to healthier relationship and the removal of a great many difficulties of which we are only too conscious."

There was another special difficulty—the Sunday question. Young people went out on motor-bicycles or on push-bicycles on Sunday afternoons in the summer. "We cannot say it is wrong for them to do that," said the Bishop. "It is no use pretending that it is wrong, but it does make our Sunday afternoon classes a matter of great difficulty. It seems to me that the only thing we have got to do is—I won't say to make the worship of God more attractive—to make our arrangements for worship such that they really meet the needs of our young people, as well as the old." Nothing they did for their young people would ever succeed unless it was remembered that most of their time was spent in their homes, and that the home influence was paramount. "How can there be adequate home influence in the miserable hovels in which so many of our people still have to live?" he asked. "And yet the home influence in some of these overcrowded houses is better than the home influence of some of the well-to-do."

"Then," the Bishop went on, "there is the sex question, which must not be an obsession with us.

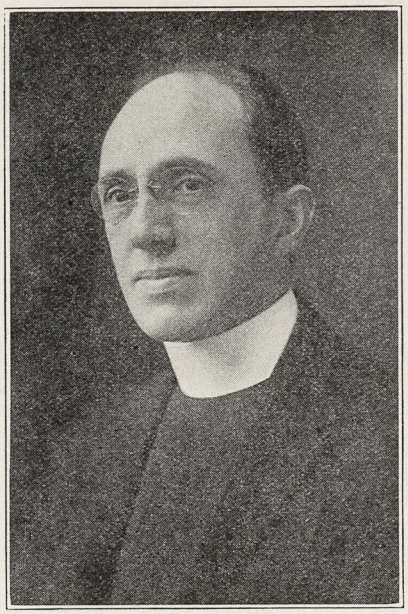
C. L. I. D. Holds Fine New York Conference



Two Hundred Churchmen Meet for a Discussion of the Church and Industry

NOTABLE GROUP

By Mary C. Crawford

Surely it was appropriate that at the luncheon conference of the Church League for Industrial Democracy held in New York on Washington's birthday the blessing should have been invoked by Bishop John Poyntz Tyler, grand-nephew of the tenth president of the United States, and that the Rev. John Nevin Sayre, closely related to the family of the late President Wilson should have been one of the principle speakers. Moreover it was interesting to have brought out by Mr. Sayre that there was an instinctive feeling on the part of our first president that an army in peace time should be an incidental rather than an intrinsic part of the Federal Government. Washington, it appears, recorded in his diary that he regarded it as an impropriety, when making a merely friendly visit to Boston, to review the Massachusetts militia.

The chairman of the conference was Miss Mary Van Kleeck, director of industrial studies of the Russell Sage Foundation and a vice-president of the Church League for Industrial Democracy. The first speaker was the Rev. Norman Thomas of New York who spoke on "American Industry and Our Foreign Policies." In a vigorous and eloquent manner he developed the idea that the question of American industry and the relation of our country with others involves deeply the relation of man to his God. "We in the United States still have a certain belief in what we call 'political democracy' although we also cherish devotion to industrial autocracy as it exists. But our country can no more continue industrially autocratic and politically democratic than it could continue half slave and half free. We who possess for the first time in history the possibility of banishing poverty are not doing it. The crime wave about which we hear so much is closely related to wretched housing. We desperately need groups who can be intelligent crusaders for a better social order. This group here today which cares about better conditions must see to it that the crusading spirit, which, most regrettably since the war, has passed largely into the hands of those secular Jesuits, the Communists, does not remain in their hands. And just as we must protest against existing economic conditions so we must protest against our present foreign policy, born of a marriage between Jingoistic militarism and American economics."

REV. P. S. GILMAN
New Dean at Orlando

Speaking on American Militarism Mr. Sayre gave a careful analysis of the present situation in America, with the expenditure in 1926 of the largest sum ever spent by the government for military preparation. "There is a nip and tuck race between the military people and the peace people and it is for us as Christians to decide at once where our influence is to count."

The next speaker was the Rev. Worth M. Tippy, secretary of social service of the Federal Council of Churches, who declared that the goal of the Christian religion has, from the beginning, been the welfare of the whole people with emphasis on the welfare of the unprivileged. Yet over against this the acquisitive motive has become increasingly powerful in the lives of men. It is the task of the Church today, he went on, to give men a Christian motive for their work. Dr. Tippy said that he was hopeful that the clergy of the future will better understand the workers and the problems of industry. A more difficult problem, he declared, will be that of inspiring the workers of the country so that leadership will come from them.

Following these three addresses there were five minute addresses by these prominent leaders, all pointed

A Congressman from California Thinks That the Federal Council Has Too Much Money

INVESTIGATION

By Rev. William B. Spofford

I am curious to find out if this Congressman from California, Arthur M. Free, who introduced a resolution in the house calling upon Congress to investigate the Federal Council of Churches, is really a friend of that organization. I know that for a long time the Federal Council has been having a hard time making ends meet. And now along comes Congressman Free and suggests that they are so wealthy that they are able to maintain the most extensive lobby in Washington, and that upon the pressing of a button they can set into motion a machine that sweeps all before it. He credits them with blocking a war with Mexico, with making it difficult for the military minded to get billions from Congress for battleships, and with various other things that point clearly to Moscow. So he wants it looked into by a committee of Con-

Picture in the paper this week of Old Trinity, Tiffin, Ohio, just to show you that all of the fine churches are not just off Fifth Avenue. This church, of which the Rev. Herman S. Sidener is the rector, has been completely made over, and a number of beautiful memorials have been presented. Among them is a candelabra, the gift of Mrs. Elizabeth Reifsnider in memory of her husband who was a vestryman for ten years, and an alm basin as a thank-offering for her son, Bishop Reifsnider of Japan. Bishops Chair, Litany desk, pulpit, altar, reredos. . . .all memorials. . . .and all the work of the American Seating Company. The interior decorating was done very beautifully by the Howard R. T. Radcliffe Company of Toledo, while the metal work is from the studios of R. Geissler of New York.

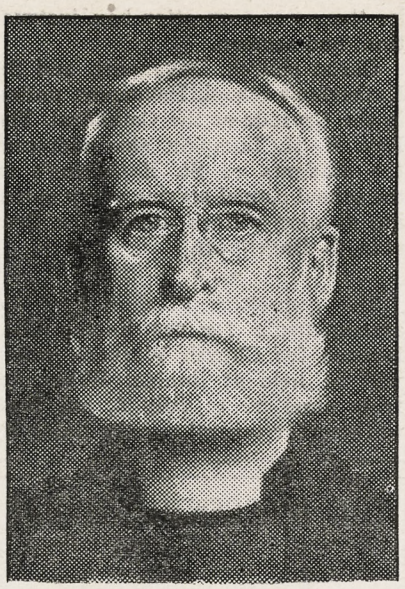
Sherwood Eddy, religious educator and economist, told 2,000 Chicago Forum hearers that Russia, conducting the world's greatest governmental experiment, will succeed within a short time in restoring that country among the leading nations.

Mr. Eddy recently returned from Russia. He told his audience in the Erlanger theater that Russia, by three changes it can easily make, should be recognized by the United States. These three changes, outlined by President Coolidge are compensation of despoiled American citizens, payment of debts to this country contracted by the previous regime, and discontinuance of propaganda in this country.

"When Russia makes these three changes, especially the last, this country ought to recognize that nation," Mr. Eddy said. "All other civilized nations have done so, and we cannot hold back, merely because we do not agree with Russia's form of government.

"We did not agree with the czarist form, but we recognized it. It is better to bind Russia with trade and peace agreements than to anger her by outlawing her."

Mr. Eddy deplored the attitude of communists in Russia toward the former aristocracy, but he praised the ideals of the great mass of Russian people. He also decried the growth of atheism.



"There is no reason why America should fear the propaganda of the handful of radicals in this country who are powerless against the education, wealth and civilization of America," he said.

The Bishop's Crusade was held at Trinity Cathedral, Davenport, Iowa, the Very Rev. Marmaduke Hare, dean, in the form of a mission conducted by the Rev. H. H. Lumpkin, rector of Grace church, Madison, Wisconsin, from Sunday, February 20, through St. Matthias Day, Thursday, February 24. There were two or three celebrations of the Holy communion each morning, with a class in Personal Religion in the afternoon, and an evangelistic service each evening. In addition there was a children's service and a supper for young people. There was an after meeting for prayer after the evening services which proved of great value. At each evening service there was a question box, instruction, and sermon.

Christ church, Davenport, and St. Katherine's school, Davenport united in the Crusade at the Cathedral. The Rev. H. H. Lumpkin also addresses the students of St. Katherine's at the school chapel service every morning at nine o'clock during the Crusade in Davenport.

Rheumatism
A Remarkable Home Treatment Given by One Who Had It
In the year of 1893 I was attacked by Muscular and Sub-Acute Rheumatism. I suffered as only those who are thus afflicted know for over three years. I tried remedy after remedy, but such relief as I obtained was only temporary. Finally, I found a treatment that cured me completely and such a pitiful condition has never returned. I have given it to a number who were terribly afflicted, even bedridden, some of them seventy to eighty years old, and the results were the same as in my own case.
I want every sufferer from any form of muscular and sub-acute (swelling of the joints) rheumatism, to try the great value of my improved "Home Treatment" for its remarkable healing power. Don't send a cent; simply mail your name and address, and I will send it free to try. After you have used it, and it has proven itself to be that long-looked-for means of getting rid of such forms of rheumatism, you may send the price of it, One Dollar, but understand I do not want your money unless you are perfectly satisfied to send it. Isn't that fair? Why suffer any longer, when relief is thus offered you free. Don't delay. Write today.

Bishop Burton, in his address before the diocesan convention of Lexington, asked for a Bishop Coadjutor. He pointed out that he had served the diocese as bishop for 31 years, that he has been in the ministry for 50 years and that he will be 75 years old in November. Said he felt the need of help, particularly since there was much to be done in the rapidly growing eastern part of the state. He wanted to turn over three-fourths of his salary to the newly elected Bishop, but the committee refused to consider that proposition. They did, however, recommend that a Coadjutor be elected and a special convention is to be called for that purpose.

sure I cannot give a satisfactory answer to the question. But here is a letter that just came in from a clergyman who has been reading the paper for a long time. He seems to have some idea on the matter, so I will let him speak. It is from the Rev. I. Harding Hughes of Greensboro, North Carolina: "You do not realize what a joy THE WITNESS is to me. It goes straight forward, giving readable news, speaks straight from the shoulder, seeks to inculcate the true spirit of the Christ through its editorials, and puts in the discard the continual slapping back and forth concerning the minor details. In other words, it seems to me to try to represent the Church and not a party therein. So on with your splendid work, and may God bless you in your labours; and may you continue to make the Church the attractive place that it should be for all who want to fight for Christ's eternal principles, at whatever cost, letting the anise and the cummin take care of themselves."

Here's a letter from Mississippi:

"I think that "Son-and-Daughter-of-Clergymen"—game a good one and I'm sending you several names which you may do as you please with. However, please do not print my name as sender. Not that I am ashamed of it—or that my information is not correct! But I'm modest!

Rt. Rev. William Mercer Green, Bishop Coadjutor of Mississippi is the son of Rev. Duncan Green and the grand son of Rt. Rev. William Mercer Green the first bishop of Mississippi.

Rt. Rev. Henry St. George Tucker, coadjutor Va. is the son of the Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker of Southern Virginia. I think this same Bishop B. D. Tucker has three others sons in the ministry.

Rev. William DuBose Bratton is the son of Rt. Rev. Theodore DuBose Bratton, D. D. of the diocese of Mississippi.

I know lots of others but I'll wait to see if this won't start people playing the game."

and pithy comments; Bishop Paul Jones; Rev. Norman Nash of the Cambridge Theological seminary, who said that the Church could say little about wages as long as it sweated its own clergy; Dr. Harry Laidler, who stated that we needed the enthusiasm of the British Labor Party; Professor A. D. Sheffield, who said that a contact with everyday life was necessary for religious experience; Rev. Charles K. Gilbert, who spoke optimistically of the present situation; Rev. James Myers, who spoke of a recent strike experience; Mrs. Mary Simkovitch, who called for a resolution on the Nicaragua situation, which was passed unanimously, copies being sent to the President, the Secretary of State, and the chairman of Foreign Affairs; Professor John A. Fitch, who stated that students were thinking about social problems and that we should be encouraged; Miss Rose Schneiderman, secretary of the Woman's Trade Union League, who, speaking for Labor, said that what they expected of the Church was sympathetic understanding; and Mr. John Coughlin, secretary of the New York Central Trades and Labor Council, who paid a great tribute to the Church and the part the Church has played in industrial matters.

Following the addresses the summing up was done by Professor Vida Scudder in a masterful way, in which she expressed her deep satisfaction that so much stress had been placed by all of the speakers on the high value of effecting a union between the mystical and the social impulse.

Before the adjourning of the conference, which was attended by about two hundred persons, a resolution, offered by the Rev. Smith Owen Dexter, registering the appreciation of the League for the great services which were rendered the cause of industrial democracy by the Rev. Percy Stickney Grant was passed. It was also voted by those present that the Washington's Birthday Conference of the Church League for Industrial Democracy, so successful this year, be an annual event.

Wednesday morning a corporate communion for members of the League was celebrated at the Church of the Transfiguration, the Rev. Harrison Rockwell, a League member, officiating.

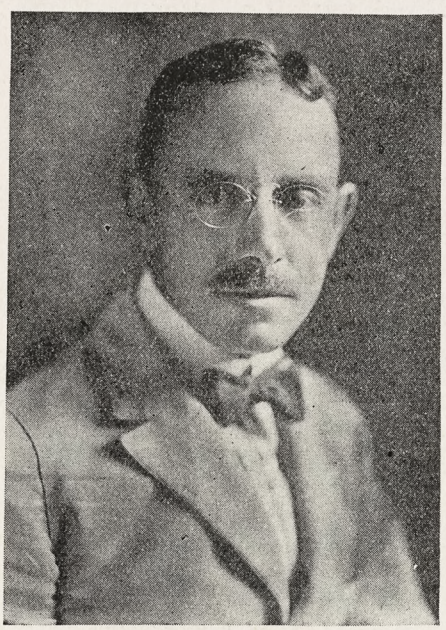
WHAT BECOMES OF THE COLLECTIONS

The Place of Money in Religion



BY LEWIS B. FRANKLIN

THERE is a familiar story told of three Scotchmen who went to Church one morning thinking there was to be no collection, and when they found that an offering was to be taken, one of the Scotchmen immediately fainted away and the other two carried him out.

Few people are so mean that they avoid a collection as these Scotchmen did, but there are many of us to whom the collection seems the least interesting part of the Church service. This feeling is, I think, due to the fact that we do not appreciate just what is comprehended in the simple act of giving some of our money to the work of the Church.

In the first place, we ought to realize just what money is. It is not wealth in itself, but merely a measure of wealth. Real wealth consists of things of material value such as homes, factories, stores, railroads, farms, mines, forests. Pieces of paper such as stocks, bonds, mortgages, and money, which we frequently think of as wealth, are merely evidences of wealth. All of this real tangible wealth comes from one source,—human labor applied to the natural resources which are given to man as the free gift of God. The coal in the ground has no value until man's labor both of the brain and of the body, is brought to bear upon it, making it available for the use of mankind. Through human labor the iron ore and the limestone become steel; through human labor the steel becomes the framework of a building; through human labor the clay becomes the brick and through human labor the brick is used to complete the building. The building is wealth and if a mortgage is issued then that mortgage is an evidence of wealth, but the real wealth remains in the building.

If, then, wealth is the product of labor and money is the measure of wealth, the giving of money is the giving of labor and therefore the giving of self.

MR. L. B. FRANKLIN

A man who works in a mill and for his day's work receives four dollars, takes two of this amount and places it on the plate at the Sunday morning service. Has he done an uninteresting or stupid thing? By no means. He has given to God a half a day of himself, his toil and his sweat, the product of his brain and his muscle. He has to a degree carried out the pledge he made in the Holy Communion Service, "And here we offer and present unto thee, O Lord, ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy and living sacrifice unto thee." The thing which he has given is not a dead, intangible, dirty piece of paper, but part of a life, full of personality.

These facts are recognized by our Church in its Prayer Book. The only provision for taking an offering is found in the most solemn service of the Church, that of the Holy Communion. The rubric gives instructions as to how the offering shall be taken, "and reverently bring it to the Priest, who shall humbly present and place it upon the Holy Table." Just think what this means. On that Holy Table, or Altar, only three things are allowed—the Prayer Book, the sacred elements of the Communion Service and money. The cross, the flowers and other decorations are not on the altar, but behind the altar. But it is eminently fitting that the thing which measures the value of part of a man's life should be placed there.

What becomes of the money after it has been given? Does it lose that individuality of which we have spoken? By no means. In most of our parishes today a large part of the offering is taken through the means of the duplex envelope, part of the money going for the current expenses of the parish and part of the money going for the extension of Christ's Kingdom in the Diocese and throughout the world, what we call "Missions."

"Current expenses" sounds mighty stupid, yet here again we find that this classification includes little that is not human. Part of this current expense money goes to buy coal and the price paid for the coal means payment for the labor of the men who transported it and the men who mined it, toiling in their underground workings. The light which lights our church building seems far removed from any human agency and yet it is human labor which has produced it and the money which is paid for it is paid for human labor ministering to the worship of God.

And then there is the more personal and individual side of "current expenses." Part of it goes to support the life of the man who keeps our church building heated for us and cleaned up for us; part of it goes to support the life of the man who is our spiritual leader and guide, our Rector. Part of it goes to help mould the lives of the youth of our parish in the Church School. In every item there is life, rich and throbbing.

And then the other side of the duplex envelope, which we call "Missions." As I have said, part of the money in the "Missions" side of the envelope goes to the Diocese in which we live, and here, too, we find that it is transformed once more into life. It becomes the City Missionary laboring in the jail, the asylum, the poor house, the home for the aged. Perhaps part of it is used in the direct support of the unfortunates in some of these institutions. Or else it becomes the worker in the country districts, carrying help and cheer and the message of Christ to the people in lonely places.

The other part of the money in the "Missions" side of the envelope goes to the work under the supervision of our National Council which includes practically all of the work done by our Church which is neither parochial or diocesan. Part of your offering which goes to the National Council may be shortly transformed into the life of a priest of the Church living year after year on the shores of the Arctic Ocean, ministering to the little groups of Eskimo people, travelling up and down the coast in the dead of winter, perhaps on days in which the sun rises for only a brief hour or so above the horizon, and with the thermometer ten or twenty degrees below zero. He brings to these primitive people the message of the Christ in all its fulness, a message made real by his work not only for their souls but for their minds and bodies. Another part of the money may be transformed into the life of a nurse in our little mission hospital in Liberia where the heat of the tropics is just as hard to endure as the Arctic cold and where the need of loving care is just as great.

And then part of the money is going into politics, the kind of politics that is going to decide the fate of the world. It is helping to support great institutions of learning in China, the land where live one-fourth of all the people in the world, a land of little learning and great potential power. Through the leadership created largely in these schools and universities, is to come in some future day the stable government which will enable China to take its place among the great nations of the world.

And so we might go on through the list, finding everywhere stories full of heroic service and romance. The stupid, inert thing we call money has ceased to be stupid and inert; it is part of our own life transported to distant fields so that we, too, may share in the great adventure of the extension of the Kingdom.

THE BIG STORY

The Gospel According to a Newspaper Man

III. TRADITION AND HISTORY

BY IRWIN ST. JOHN TUCKER

IN ANSWER to the question, "Where did you get this Bible?" a vivid picture is called up. Between the first printed Bible and the last event recorded in its pages stretches a period of some fifteen hundred years. Counting three lives to a century, this means that forty-five hundred lives, laid end to end, are required to bridge the gap. During all this time the Bible existed only by slow, painful copying. Thousands of copies made in this period now exist. Millions must have been made.

THE FIRST BIBLE

How much labor is involved in making a single one of these may be estimated by the experiment of writing out in good, careful painstaking printed lettering, a single page, without any errors, omissions, or interpolations. Get the lines all perfectly straight and the words evenly spaced, making each letter as perfect as you know how. Now multiply this single page by the sixty-six books of the Protestant Bible, add the thirteen extra which are included in the Catholic Bible. You will vision an amount of toil that is simply stupendous. You will see why it could take one man a lifetime to copy a single Bible. Now multiply that one Bible by the myriad copies made. You get a picture of all Europe covered by toiling scribes, men to whom writing came much harder than it does to us, because we are constantly reading and writing while to them it was an abstruse art seldom indulged and by only a few.

Century after century toiling men bent over sheets of papyrus and rolls of sheepskin, painfully transcribing letter by letter Latin translations of Greek and Hebrew manuscripts which had been thumbed into tattered fragments and lost centuries before. There have survived to us one or two precious copies whose known dates go back to nine centuries after Christ. Before that, only a vast void.

It requires a leap of faith to bridge that gap!

But we find something stranger yet. In the original Hebrew records were kept in a sort of shorthand, with only the consonants written down, jammed together without a pause. The first verse of Genesis, for example, would read:

NTHBGNNGGDCRTDTHHVNSN
DTHRTHNDTHRTHWSWTH T F R
MNDVDNDDRKNSSWSNTHFCF T
HDP.

All sorts of different meanings might have been given this, according to the way one divided the letters and put in vowels here and there. To keep the readings straight, a set of marks was invented, somewhere about two hundred years after Christ, so that the script read like this:

N TH BGNNNG GD CRTD TH
i e e ii o eae e
HVNS ND TH RTH
eae a e ea

This makes it much clearer. But the men who invented these marks and the men who wrote the original documents lived perhaps a thousand years apart. How do we know they got the right meanings?

In the case of the Old Testament, it is evident we have to rely on the Jewish Church. The tradition of the Scribes, their integrity, their fidelity to the text they copied, their preservation—by word of mouth handed down from teacher to scholar—of the correct interpretation of the text so copied—this is our sole guarantee that we have anything like the original meaning of what was written.

There are any number of errors noted in the text of the Bible by the copyist, places where the reading is quite different from what is written. Sometimes this difference of the word pronounced from the word written arises from reverence, sometimes from an evident mistake, piously preserved, but with a warning.

An Example

Take for example the word used in Revised Versions for the name of God, "Jehovah." The original name of the Lord was "Yahweh"—I am, or He who Is, it is translated in Exodus. But because of the warning against taking the sacred name lightly, Yahweh was referred to as The Lord, as in the New Testament He is referred to as Heaven. So they put the vowels for The Lord under the consonants for Yahweh, or Jahveh. It is like this: suppose under the consonants for George Washington, GRG WSHNGTN, we should write the vowels for Father of his Country, a e o i o u y, and thus arrive at the curious result:

"Garego Wisohnugtyn" as the name of the first President. This is not a whit more foolish than the name "Jehovah."

We know from references in the Old Testament that there were a great many books not included in the Old Testament: such as the Book of Jasher, the Book of the Wars of Yahweh, the Song of the Bow, the prophecies of Iddo the Seer, of Gad and of Nathan. These have vanished, except for the fragmentary quotations preserved in the books we have. Who picked out the ones that survive and let the others die? How do we know that the right ones were kept?

In the New Testament the case is the same. There are any number of books that run current among the early Christians which are not among the Twenty-Seven. What became of them? Who picked out the ones that survive, and let the others die? How do we know the right ones were kept?

There is no way of putting intelligent faith in the Bible unless we put a preliminary faith in the people who wrote it, compiled it, and preserved it. If we believe these people were falsifiers, blasphemers, deceivers, anti-Christs, Men of Sin, Enemies of God, then the whole Bible falls to the ground, for these are the people who selected it, wrote it, and gave it to us.

If a message is delivered to me by a man I believe to be a scheming liar, enemy both of the person who sent the message and the person to whom it is delivered, I am apt to have but a faint and glimmering faith in the message itself. It is true there is confirmatory evidence in parallel records, such as the Babylonian, Egyptian and Greek historians, and in the Latin annals, of some of the principal events. But that which gives the story its color and meaning to us depends on the intimate preservation of fact and utterance which are, in the nature of the case, to be found nowhere else.

Rev. Postell Witsell
Goes to Little Rock, Arkansas

It is important, then, to test the attitude of the men who copied these records toward the statements contained therein. I found they were parts of a world-filling organization whose existence was staked on these statements. Beside this host of humble toilers, spending their lives in copying page and paragraph, I discovered a great and splendid line of interpreters, who kept even pace with the current of these volumes, as they flowed through the world. These men had names that fill one with joy. There was Benedict, the Blessed Francis, the Frenchman; the Jester of God; Gelasius, whose name means Laughter; Augustinus, the Little Splendid One; Leo, the Lion; Gregory, the Sheep-Watcher; Athanasius, the Undying; Chrysostom, the Golden-Mouthed. Their names sound like a Pilgrim's Progress through the ages: Merciful, Resurrection, Gift of God, the City Man, the Forest Dweller.

What They Endured

I found these men engaged in warfare with pagans who burned their victims alive in wicker cages, who wore the heads of their enemies as ornaments on their chariot rims. I found them subduing the gladiators, conquering empires, transforming kingdoms by the power of the word they preached. I saw the great empire which embraced both East and West to the uttermost limits of the mountains and the sea, totter and fall before onrushing barbarians; but the order of writers and speakers rose above the downfall. I saw the whole world's roads so ruined and robber-ridden that none could travel them, for the peril of death that lurked in every morass, except these same humble scribes. I found them going out into savage wildernesses, building there little bachelor clubhouses, and transforming the wilderness into universities and fair lands of prosperous farms.

I found these copyists and scribes gave up home and family, fortune, independence, and frequently life itself, to testify their belief in the words they wrote with such care. I found that, so far from being liars and perjurers, they staked their own lives, and frequently lost them gladly, on the truth of the message they delivered.

I found any number of pallid Ethical Culture cults, and frenzied fanatic Holy Rollers, and dour Calvinists, and enthusiastic Methodists, and street singing Salvation Armies, arise in the course of that long lapse of centuries, before the printed word began. I saw sects rise and sweep across the sky and die again, beside the patient army of scribes who sat on, day after day, year after year, century after century, copying the words of Holy Writ.

I saw the old gods melt and die away before the patient scratching of the pens of these old scribes, and before the fiery eloquence of their interpreters, and before the skillful planning of their generals, and the deep, slow, burning patience of believers.

Other Methods

I saw that to ages and nations where the people could not read, interpretations were carven in stone and cast in brass, displayed in pageantry and immortalized in high architecture. I saw bronze doors and marble baptisteries, altars and pulpits reredoses and wayside calvaries tell forth the story of the Scripture to those who could make nothing of A and B and C. I saw great festivals, wherein Old Testament and New were acted out by word of mouth and in scenes of great splendor, for those who could not understand philosophy, and who nodded for weariness in the length of great sermons.

And I saw that these two were inseparable, the Writer and the Teacher, the Message and the Messenger, the Bible and the Church. If the one is false, so also is the other. But if either be true, so also is the other. I came therefore to this conclusion: that any who believe the Bible must have faith also in the Church, or their faith is void.

AUTHORITY IN THE HOME

The Revolt of Youth

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

WHAT a mess society is in regarding the question of authority! We have enough of it on paper, but apparently so little of it in practice.

There is parental authority and federal authority and episcopal authority of public opinion. Any one who listens in at the consecration of a bishop, would think that he was receiving oceans of authority, whereas when he comes out of the trance produced by the service, he finds his mother's pail would hold all that he actually possesses.

As for the others;—Parental authority has degenerated into a sort of absent treatment and federal authority is sending poor devils to jail for the very offense that his honor may have committed in the circle of his friends, the night before.

We Americans do not have a high regard for authority except when we are arguing with socialists or fighting a national enemy. Under certain circumstances we exalt authority more than any people on earth, but ordinarily we do not regard it seriously. Our legislatures have a mania for making laws and their constitutents for breaking them.

I do not believe that there is a single keeper of all laws,—no, not one. We adore the stars and stripes; we boast of our government; we accept the decisions of our courts and we respect authority, if there is a policeman on the corner to enforce it.

Our whole American people act in about the same manner as we did in college. We loved our Alma Mater and broke every law that she enacted for our protection.

It was not a disgrace in our eyes to be known among our fellow students as a breaker of the law.

Of course the result of this unusual disregard of authority has its dangers and also its blessings.

It means, if carried too far, that society will deteriorate. A college or a nation in which flagrant violations become too common, loses its morale.

Regimentation

On the other hand, it indicates an unwillingness to be regimentated to the dictation of a political or religious hierarchy, which same regimentation has always been highly exalted and never justified by the results of its domination.

Man is not a mechanical device intended to work in fixed grooves, but an automatic personality created to exercise personal freedom within certain liberal bounds. He is subject therefore to centripetal and centrifugal forces—which keep him in equilibrium.

But if the centripetal force of authority succeeds in destroying the centrifugal force of personal liberty, then man ceases to be a child of God; and if the centrifugal force of self-will succeeds in destroying all reasonable restraints then he ceases to be human.

In the first instance he is goose-stepped into insensibility and in the second instance he degenerates into that kind of a beast who calls himself liberal and slays those who disagree with his particular kind of liberality.

What then is authority?

St. Paul did not seem to have a very high regard for it, because he says, "He must reign until He has put down all rule, and all authority and power" for says St. Paul significantly, "the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death," thus classifying death and authority as common enemies of perfect freedom, but implying that both authority and death are rather necessary evils, at that.

Now what are we going to do about it? There is no use wringing our hands and saying that we are all going to perdition because nobody obeys the laws. The aged have been doing that for several centuries over just this issue, and the world is much pleasanter to live in today than it was under the Puritans or the Tudors or the Bourbons, all of whom were sure that they were divinely commissioned to regulate their fellow men, and all of whom made a mess of things in doing so.

When you have to make frequent use of the stocks, or the guillotine or the stake, the trouble is not with humanity, but with those who assume to regulate the school. They accuse poor human nature of being wilful, when they are merely proving themselves incompetent and arrogant.

I believe that the average American is willing to respect authority when he sees that it is necessary, but resents it when he feels that some one is invoking his father and theirs, as an excuse for regulating him.

So let us analyse the scope and character of authority in the family, in the state and in the Church.

An Analysis

Manifestly a maximum of authority is necessary where reason and experience are dealing with the immature, the defective and the incompetent, but even such authority must not conceive that it is divinely commissioned to deal with these materials in such a way as to keep them permanently dependent.

In the family life, there is just one power that is effective today, and that is competency based on a disciplined adult character.

I believe that there is far more of this authority in our homes than we imagine and as a result, there never has been a finer group of boys and girls than those being produced under this regime.

The tragic failures in parental control are first in the homes where the parents are themselves undisciplined. We have many juvenile parents and so there are so many adult children at the helm.

Parents, whose own self-indulgence is unrestrained, are having a hard time holding the respect of their modernized children.

Mere Assertion

And the second tragic failure is where mere assertion of parental authority breaks down in the daily contacts of the child outside the home. You cannot successfully import the Old Country home into America and fit it in with our public school system.

But where a parent has a standard of conduct and religion which represents real values and not fictitious ones, the results are by no means disheartening.

As I compare youth today with that of forty years ago, I say without hesitation that the large middle of immaturity, which existed then, has been diminished now, and that both the right and left wings of fine character and insolent impertinence have increased.

If one were to pick a group of one hundred youths of both sexes today, which would represent a cross section of the whole juvenile world, the number of the vapid and useless would be more than outweighed by the positive and hopeful characters which are being developed.

Emptiness

The impression is otherwise because of the fact that empty wagons make the most noise; though if incapable of carrying loads, they are quickly scrapped.

Parental authority is a symbol of all authority. Its function is to develop independence and needs to be withdrawn as self-reliance demonstrates its own control.

Man is a being who was created to inhibit himself, but only when he has so mastered himself that he is fit for freedom.

Copyright 2020. Archives of the Episcopal Church / DFMS. Permission required for reuse and publication.

The trouble is that he himself is the very worst judge of such fitness.

Parental authority has ceased, however, to be a mechanical device for the suppression of youth and has become a cooperative agency in the development of freedom. Anything less than this is a failure today.

The parents who would be faithful to their task must first learn obedience by the things that they suffer —partly in learning to put up with one another, and partly in striving to regulate their own faulty habits in life, by the standard of the Master.

The Church is the parent's training school for there he orientates himself to a standard of righteousness, which he himself did not manufacture but which has been proved and tested by the experience of the race.

If those who serve the historic Church have no other compensation, they have this;—that as a rule those who have been faithful in love and service are justified by their children.

The proportion of children who have been reared and trained in the atmosphere of Mother Church and who then have gone wrong is very small.

As a rule they grow up to reverence their parents and to respect even if they do not always practice, their religion.

Current Comment

By Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott

CONTROVERSY may be the spice of religious life and give it much of its flavor; but there is a limit to it worthwhileness and a time of definite arrival when the flavor begins to pall. Publishers of religious literature report that sales of controversial religious publications are falling off. The decline began in October last and has continued steadily ever since. The sale today is about one half the sale of a year ago. Publishers are discouraging the would-be authors of such books, and one well-known publisher has declined three such manuscripts recently submitted. The fighters, apparently, are still keen to fight; but the public is weary of polemics, and craves the constructive awakenings of the spirit. The sale of evangelistic books has increased enormously.

IT IS always interesting to have a great man attempt to explain himself. Dean Inge, of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, has recently attempted the impossible. He objects to people picking out his gravest misgivings and prefacing them with the familiar headline: "Utterance of the Gloomy Dean." "It is always a pleasure," he says, "to be argued out of gloomy apprehensions. But the optimist is generally rather a foolish person; the kind of man who would buy from a Jew and sell to a Scot and expect to make a profit." The Dean says that if it amuses the public to call him a pessimist, he cannot help it. He remarks that an occasional lunge at social wreckers, bigoted anti-protestants and others whom he does not love is a decided relief to his feelings. He says further that "there is one thing that elderly men ought to remember, and sometimes forget, and that is that if there is a way out of our troubles, the middle-aged must find it, and the young must take it." He concludes, "The old fellow will persist in giving good advice as long as people will listen to him, and a little longer." We hope that the caustic dean will go on giving us advice, good or bad, for many years to come. After all, we are not compelled to take it.

IT IS a source of real gratification to us all to know that the Army and Navy chaplains are reporting to their respective religious weeklies that the spiritual value of their work has greatly increased. The reorganization made a few years ago is said to be proving its worth. One of the best results is the increased efficiency of the one hundred and twenty-five individual chaplains. Large numbers of ministers have voluntarily assumed the duties of chaplain for special purposes. The strength of the chaplain section of the Officers' Reserve Corps is now one thousand one hundred and seventy-two. At three important military posts private funds are being raised to provide houses of worship of suitable character. In many other places small chapels have been provided. Church parades, chiefly of a voluntary nature, are being tried out, and the attendances are on the increase. Surely, there is a great field for the preaching of the Gospel of Christ and for the ministrations of the Churches among the defenders by land and sea of our national heritage.

I SEE that the Bishop of Southwark deplores the decline in Bible reading in England. He characterises it as a spiritual disaster to Church and Nation. He makes three suggestions to those who are not very familiar with the Bible and who wish to read it more regularly and intelligently: First: Obtain some good and simple introduction to the Bible. Second: Do not always read the Bible in small sections. Read through, if possible at a sitting, one of the books. Third: Use occasionally a modern translation of the Bible, such as Dr. Moffatt's. We might well deplore the decline in Bible reading in America and we might elaborate the suggestions and put them into practice with profit.

Rectors

FREQUENTLY letters are received at the office of THE WITNESS asking for information in regard to commissions for subscriptions. We are very glad to allow a commission to any representative who works with the consent of the rector of the parish, of 50c on each yearly subscription. In many parishes during Lent subscriptions are taken by the children, the commissions going into their mite boxes. May we suggest that a representative, or a number of them, be appointed in your parish to take subscriptions during Lent. It serves a double purpose; it enables the young people to earn money for their mite boxes; it means the weekly visitation of a Church weekly to the homes of your parish throughout the year. Simply write the names and addresses carefully on one side of the paper, and send them to us with $1.50 for each yearly subscription.

Questions?

AUTHORITY IN THE HOME

1. Define authority; freedom. Discuss the amount of each that there should be in an American home.
2. Is youth today exercising too much freedom, and what evidence have you for your opinion?
3. If the answer to (2) is "Yes," are the parents in any way to blame?
4. Discuss this: "Parental authority has ceased to be a mechanical device for the suppression of youth and has become a cooperative agency in the development of freedom."
5. Discuss this: "The function of parental authority is to develop independence and needs to be withdrawn as self-reliance demonstrates its own control."

THE BIG STORY

1. How was the first Bible made?
2. Upon what is our faith in the Bible based?
3. What reward did the first Bible makers receive?
4. How else was the Bible story handed on?

Unusual Bit of Work Done by Lay Workers

The Purpose of the Bishop's Crusade Translated into Action in New York Parish

EVANGELIZED

By Charles D. Kroeger

Emmanuel Church, Norwich, N. Y., where the Rev. Lloyd S. Charters is rector, has just completed a most remarkable record of personal evangelism—a record achieved because the rector with thirty of his men and women really prayed for fiery zeal and went forth in the spirit of Our Lord's own disciples to interest Christians in Christianity; to make the indifferent, different; and to bring men and women into the Church.

All of the clergy of that city, including one Roman Catholic Priest who cooperated unofficially, determined to make a survey of the religious life of their city. They employed Dr. L. E. Ripley, an expert in this work, to undertake the task. In six days, January 24th to 29th, with both paid and volunteer workers furnished by the churches and schooled by him, he completed a careful and accurate analysis of the whole city. Practically every family and individual had furnished, willingly, the information sought concerning their church membership or preference.

Each church, separately, immediately after the completion of the survey, undertook its own follow-up work and sent out its own campaigners, two by two. In no case were the campaigners easily secured. In Emmanuel Parish, as in the other churches, they all together began to make excuse. They said they could not go out "To talk to people about religion." But thirty of those selected were prevailed upon to "go out and try it" as a matter of loyalty to their rector. Out they went to call upon the prospects for Emmanuel Church, to visit with them, to talk to them in simple fashion, definitely and directly about God and His Church. At the feet of over two hundred and fifty people they laid a challenge, a challenge not easily cast aside. The success of their efforts was phenomenal! And as success came, the campaigners became more and more enthused. Eagerly the eighteen men and twelve ladies reported to the rector the measure of their success. They caught the vision! All of them, though busy people, continued in the thrilling work of bringing men to Christ. And at least two of them, representative business men, practically closed up their business for the week.

Without fear of contradiction, Emmanuel Parish had the most outstanding success in this visitation work. Within a week its fifteen teams reported over one hundred decisions for Christ and His Church.

But this is not all! Thirty others, communicants of the Church elsewhere, have been "discovered." Many of these were absolutely unknown to the rector or the membership of the parish. But all of them have secured their letters of transfer and have signed decision cards promising to be faithful in their religious duties.

There were certain other interesting discoveries. Five people who had been communicants of the Episcopal Church and who for one reason or another had deserted the Church were reclaimed and brought back into the fold. One elderly lady, confirmed in 1870, had left the Church to embrace a form of spiritualism. Another lady, confirmed in 1888, had left the Church to become a Methodist. Three, confirmed respectively in 1883, 1887 and 1903, as a consequence of moving here and there, simply drifted from the Church. All of them, however, have been reinstated and have promised to attend to their religious obligations with a renewed devotion.

But the most outstanding incident of this record of personal evangelism is the case of a man who, in a strange manner, was won for Christ. This man for a period of twenty years or more had ignored and despised the Church—all churches. His wife had informed the survey worker that she preferred the Episcopal Church but that her husband was "interested in none." A team of ladies, alert and devoted to the Church, was sent to interview this good wife. In the midst of the conversation, as the ladies were presenting definitely the challenge of the Church and the ringing call to personal dedication, this man who had no use for the churches entered the room. Well, the interruption was rather violent, to say the least! But the ladies remained and listened to his complaints. They heard, among other things, his story dating back some twenty years. They heard how, as a youth, he was accused of something he did not do; how he had been falsely accused in a church! The case was one in psychology, of course. But, nevertheless, he rid his mind of a burden. And before the ladies left that house that night they had secured his decision for Christ. Two weeks ago, immediately after the early Celebration of the Holy Communion, he and his wife were baptized. And they are looking forward to Confirmation in June.

Prayer Book Causing Divisions in England

Protests Caused by the Use of the English Prayer Book at a Service

UNUSUAL SCENES

By Rev. A. Manby Lloyd

Dr. Geikie-Cobb, rector of St. Ethelburga, Bishopsgate, had just remarked in his sermon that he was to use the alternative communion office in the new Prayer Book when a young man with red hair stepped out from his seat and said: "I protest against the use of this service before it has been passed by the Church Assembly."

Everyone looked around, but the rector was unruffled. "I cannot allow anyone to speak here, but myself. It is my duty not to allow it." The young man quietly retired.

Just as the rector reached the altar after the address a woman left her seat: "I also protest against the use of this service which makes a fundamental difference in the doctrine of the Church." Nobody took any notice of her, so she left.

This is but a straw, but it shows which way the wind is blowing. The new P. B. is reviving old battles and Low Church parsons and laity are signing the Protestant Alliances petition against the revised version. The Rt. Rev. Lord William Gascoyne Cecil, Bishop of Exeter, has joined Bishops Knox and Pollock in protest. Speaking to a big meeting in London the Bishop of Norwich (Pollock) said: "Yesterday, I was alone in the wilderness; today I am a twin."

Both sides are maneuvering for position. They are looking fifty years ahead when disestablishment and perhaps disendowment are accomplished facts. It is the Eternal Triangle—on one side is Rome, on another Orthodoxy, at the base is Puritanism. But Nonconformity is run to seed, the Eastern Church is in ferment and Rome alone seems to be making converts.

Lenten services at St. Andrew's, Forth Worth, Texas; Rev. I. D. Lang; Rev. E. S. Barlow; Rev. T. M. Melrose; Rev. C. R. Tyner; Rev. E. H. Ecfikel, the rector; and the Rev. F. W. Golden-Howes. In addition the Rev. Paul Bull, Community of the Resurrection, England, held a mission the first week of Lent.

Speakers Are Announced for the Church Congress That Meets in San Francisco

MEXICO

By Bishop Stevens

After many years of devoted service as Dean of the School for Christian Service at Berkeley, Deaconess Anita Hodgkin has resigned, for the purpose of taking an extended rest at her home in Mill Valley. Deaconess Hodgkin carried the School through the difficult early years of its life and leaves it in excellent condition. She will be succeeded by Dean H. H. Powell of the Church Divinity School of the Pacific who will administer the school in connection with his work at the Divinity School; an arrangement which will be altogether logical in view of the proposal to move the school to Berkeley.

The oldest communicant in the Diocese of California, Miss Theodosia Provost, recently died at the age of 101 years. Miss Provost was a Churchwoman of singular devotion and was especially active in the work of the Daughters of the King. Another death that has caused great sorrow is that of Mrs. Henry Rushton Fairclough, wife of the distinguished Latin scholar of Stanford University and of our own Church Divinity School. Mrs. Fairclough was the daughter of the Rev. Joseph Antisell Allen of Canada, a Priest of the Church. Her eldest brother was Grant Allen, the well-known writer.

Speakers already selected for the Church Congress in San Francisco in June include Professor Gowen of Seattle, Dr. Learned of Pasadena, Dean Chalmers of Dallas, Bishop Sumner of Oregon, Dr. Guthrie of New York and Bishop Thomas of Wyoming. The following topics will be discussed: "Moral Standards in an Age of Change;" "How Can Christianity Satisfy the Religious Needs of All Races?"; "The Relation of Christianity to Political and Industrial Democracy;" "Do the New Thought and Health Cults Contribute Anything to Christianity?"; "Some Aids to Personal Religion—First, Prayer; Second, the Sacraments; Third, The Bible"; "In What Sense Should Our Church Be Catholic"?; "In What Sense Should Our Church Be Protestant?"; "Evangelism: Its Aims and Methods."

The Convention of the Diocese of California has gone on record in behalf of arbitration as follows: "Whereas the Church as a Christian body is committed to the principle of the settlement, in so far as possible, of international disputes by arbitration or by some other form of peaceful adjudication. Be it resolved, that the Diocese of California of the Protestant Episcopal Church in convention assembled endorses the principle recently set forth in the resolution adopted by the United States Senate advising arbitration of the issues now pending between this nation and Mexico, and similar statements of a policy in accord with the principle previously announced by the President and Secretary of State; and expresses the hope that the government may find a way compatible with its responsibilities to apply this principle to those issues. And be it further resolved that copies of this resolution be forwarded by the Secretary of this Convention to the President, the Secretary of State and the Senators and Congressmen representing the State of California."

It Apparently Takes All Sorts of People to Make a Christian Community

CHINA

By Rev. W. B. Spofford

For the next few weeks I propose to present in this top paragraph a few of the Christian characters whom I have met here in New York during the past few months. My object is to give some enterprising showman the entertainers for a conference on "What Is the Christian Religion About?" If he will book them all I guarantee that the conference, if and when held, will be front page stuff, and I am not sure but a job for the police as well, for their convictions on the nature of the Gospel are as intense as they are varied.

The first is a gentleman I met the other day of unusual piety, who has assigned himself the task of spying on other people's morals in the name of his God. Not being particularly successful as a Shylock and having behind him an organization with cash, he hired a couple of charming gentlemen of the underworld, who are experts on holding their liquor. These boys step out of an evening, get themselves genially lit on the money furnished by their benefactor, and then the next morning, or as soon thereafter as possible, present the names and addresses of their drinking companions, together with

He in turn passes the information over to the district attorney, who, in a tone of surprise, exclaims that he can hardly believe that such places exist today, promises a speedy investigation and a flock of jail sentences. The object of the game is to railroad as many men and women to Sing Sing as possible in the name of Christianity. I do not mean to pass opinion on the Christianity of this gentleman. I merely state that I have not overdrawn this description which should prompt any person with show sense to seek out this pious one as an excellent performer for the proposed conference.

The General Synod of the Church In China, appointed for May, 1927, in Foochow, has been indefinitely postponed.

The following institutions are in operation:

Central China University, in which Boone University is included, with 100 students.

Boone Middle School with 200 students.

St. Hilda's School, with about the same enrollment as last term.

The primary schools in Wuchang and Hankow have a full enrollment.

Please help me by making room for the following statement with regard to the Kuling School.

Question has been raised several times of late as to whether the school is "carrying on" and whether, under present conditions in China, funds are needed.

This makes me apprehensive, the more because it is natural that people should think that temporarily gifts might be suspended. As a matter of fact the very situation involves the probability of increased financial obligations.

The school is continuing its work in temporary quarters. This means increased operating costs, a lessened earned income, possibly added emergency expenditures, while salaries must go on as usual.

I cannot too strongly urge at this time the continuance of that steady and generous support which has made the Kuling School so real an asset and which will, if maintained, insure its future development.

Here is a new one: six laymen, members of the parish, are to read papers Sunday evenings during Lent on "The Meaning of Prayer" at All Saints, Brookline, Mass. Good idea.

Miss Lucy Gardner, Englishwoman, recently a visiting lecturer in these United States, in an article in an English paper, says that she found us quite up and coming on current social questions. Also changes her mind about us in several respects; for instance, she had thought that we had too exalted an idea of youth, but she came to believe that we were quite solid on this subject. She also came to scoff at our liquor law but is now of the opinion that it is working out fairly well, and that it is an experiment that deserves support.

Sixth annual Young People's Fellowship of Massachusetts was held in Trinity Church, Boston, last week end, with a couple of hundred present. Rev. John W. Suter Jr. was one attraction and the Rt. Rev. Peter T. Rowe, bishop of Alaska, was the other.

Going to use a portable church in Milwaukee. Move it into a neighborhood, get things well under way, build a church, leave a man in charge, then pack up and repeat the process in some other likely part of the city. Seems like a good idea.

Lenten preachers at Trinity Church, Boston: Rev. Percy Kammerer, Pittsburgh; Rev. Robert Johnston, Washington; Rev. Joseph Fort Newton, Philadelphia; Rev. W. Russell Bowie, New York; and Bishop Slattery.

Suppose it will be as well for me not to tell you who wrote this snappy report—can tell you however that he is a very prominent man—it shows the way a prominent fellow writes when he thinks only one person who is a friend is to read it; "No doubt you have heard of the Crusade in Chicago—big mass meeting in Orchestra Hall and local meetings all over the lot. Then out in the sticks. There was a great day in Rockford that ought to be given attention. The thing was well advertised and well arranged. There was a Preparation Service Saturday night that was very well attended. Big communion the next morning. Then a meeting with the kids and a packed church for morning and evening services. In the afternoon had a big mass meeting in the local theatre with folks from neighboring towns as well as Rockford. About 100 massed choir on the stage that ate it up. The evening service was a re-dedication service with a couple of alms basins filled with signed cards presented on the altar." You can say what you will, I call that realistic reporting.

Here is a bit of news that I have been expecting: Mr. Frank G. Wadsworth, employment secretary for the New York Y. M. C. He has habits of luxury and demands a salary all out of proportion to his worth. Luxurious fraternity houses, million dol-

Dean Robbins of the Cathedral, New York, is the preacher at the noon-day services at St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston, this week.

A Lenten week-day service on Saturday mornings, followed by a hand-work period, is the unusual program for the boys and girls of St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit.

Bishop Ivins, coadjutor of Milwaukee, recently preached to three congregations at once; the regular congregation at Christ Church, Eau Claire, Wisconsin, the radio congregation, and a congregation of deaf people who "saw" the sermon through the fingers of the Rev. George F. Flick, pastor to the deaf in the middle west, who interpreted it. Very beautiful rood beam was dedicated and a large class was confirmed, including eight members of the deaf congregation. The class also contained a number of people who were formerly Romanists.

They came out from America, under the Department of Missions, within a few weeks of one another,—the Rev. Arthur Hall Richardson and the Rev. Benson Heale Harvey,—as deacons assigned to the Missionary District of the Philippine Islands. Both lived at Bishopsted, became firm friends, and soon became known to the members of the Mission as "A. H. and B. H." They were ordained to the priesthood at the same time, on St. Paul's Day, January 25th, 1927, at the Cathedral of St. Mary and St. John, Manila.

By an interesting coincidence each will make use of a Communion set with a background, as he undertakes missionary work in the Islands. Shortly before leaving America Mr. Harvey was presented with a Communion set that was originally a gift from members of Christ Church Parish, Fitchburg, Massachusetts, in 1902, to the Rev. Richard E. Armstrong, when he came to the Philippines and was rector of Holy Trinity Church, Zamboanga. The set therefore has made two trips to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. Richardson will take up work at Balbalasang, in the mountain district of the sub-province of Abra, early in February, and awaiting him there is a Communion set that was formerly used in White River Junc-

Here is another letter, with a report enclosed of a memorial service that was held at St. Mark's Church, Fall River, for the Rev. Percy Stickney Grant. The Rev. D. D. Addison, D.D., of Boston, preached. Here's the letter: "This service was not as melodramatic as the one at the Bouerie, New York, but it was real and it was sincere. Dr. Grant told me that his best work was done in Fall River. He had a mighty hold on the hearts of the common people of Fall River, even though he left the town in 1893. I thought you might want to say something about it, for few people know that he spent seven years among cotton mill workers. He never had any money, they tell me here, because he gave it all to the poor devils who didn't make enough money in the mills to keep body and soul together." The writer of the letter was the present rector of the parish, the Rev. Loyal Graham.

A number of Episcopalians are to preach this Lent at the noon-day services at the Old South Meeting House, Boston: Bishop Laurence; Rev. Barrett P. Tyler, rector of All Saints, Brookline; Bishop Slattery; Rev. Carroll Perry, The Ascension, Ipswich; Rev. Henry Ogilby, Brookline and Bishop Babcock.

Grace Church, Plainfield, is one of the banner parishes of the Diocese of New Jersey. For years it has given the full amount of its quota and generally more than the quota. But Grace Church goes even further than this. One of its young women, Miss Viola McGoldrick, a trained nurse, volunteered for service abroad about three years ago. Grace Church said to the Department of Missions, "We want to make Miss McGoldrick our missionary. We will provide for her support in China over and above the amount of our quota." Miss McGoldrick is now one of the staff of American nurses at St. Luke's Hospital, Shanghai. In common with her associates she is doing excellent work in caring for the sick, relieving distress and, what is quite important for the future, helping to train Chinese to be efficient nurses. How the Church's work might go forward if every parish would follow the example of Grace Church, Plainfield, by giving its quota and then going the second mile by giving a missionary and the amount necessary for that missionary's support!

Mr. A. S. Taylor of Stamford, Connecticut, nominates a fellow townsman as a Famous Living Episcopalian—I'll say she deserves it: "Mrs. George S. Wallen, a member of Christ Church, Greenwich, Conn., has been the means of securing good homes for sixty children from New York orphanages. In almost every case the child adopted is of just about the same age as a child called away by death. In every instance Mrs. Wallen first had the child examined by trained psychologists and, if the report was satisfactory, had the child adopted in all due form of law; so, the adopted child was in law and in fact one of the family.

"One pathetic fact brought out by the unique work of Mrs. Wallen is that, almost without exception, the children of orphanages she visited were found to be under weight, not through any lack of good food, but through lack of something else. This 'something else' is what Mrs. Wallen and the Episcopal Church of Connecticut are trying to give the child; and, incidentally, the youngsters soon are of normal weight."

Resolution to the memory of James H. Bolton

At a duly convened meeting of the Vestry of St. Thomas Church, Sioux City, Ia., on February 12th, 1927, the following minute was adopted:

"In the passing of our dear friend and brother James H. Bolton, from this life to his eternal reward, the city has lost one of its most useful citizens, and the Church a devoted and earnest worker in her cause.

"We who knew him and worked with him in St. Thomas' parish, where he gave over fifty years of service as vestryman and warden, are at a loss to express the deep sense of our bereavement. His simple and unquestioning faith in God; his earnest devotion to Christ and His Church; his enthusiastic response to all of her calls, either spiritual or material; his genial, friendly spirit bound him to us with hands of steel. We loved him as it falls to few to be loved. We deeply mourn his loss, but are comforted by the sure knowledge that his soul is in the care of the loving Saviour whom he has so faithfully and devoutly worshipped.

"He has fought a good fight. He has finished his course. He has kept the faith."

To his devoted family we extend our deepest sympathy.

AUTHORITY IN CHURCH AND STATE

We Are Sons, Not Subjects

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

IN ORDER to visualize the problem, one must ask the question: "What is the ultimate purpose of these institutions?"

Church and state are like the Sabbath Day. They are divine institutions and therefore to be respected, but they are not ends in themselves, but means to an end. One does not belittle their divine origin when one respects the limitations which God places upon them. They were made for man; man was not made to become parts in the machine.

Governors and ministers do not exist to be ministered unto but they hold office to minister to the lowliest person in the institution. The divine right of kings and bishops is scarcely anything more than a divine right to be instruments of divine love. To claim divine privileges when one is side stepping divine responsibilities is to play the fool. Rulers are elevated not to exercise lordship but to render service.

Sons, Not Subjects

God calls all men to be sons, not subjects. His service is perfect freedom, not parole on good behavior. The Lord Jesus did not come into the world to found a penitentiary, but to found a household of faith. To run state or Church as though one were the warden of a prison is to misrepresent the divine commission. As with the parent, so with the ruler. He is there to lead the children of men into the freedom of sonship; not to keep him in subjection and use him to exalt one's own dignity.

If there is one text in Holy Scripture that has been abused frightfully, it is that unfortunate remark of St. Paul's when he spoke about magnifying his office.

So many men being in honor have no understanding of this text and confuse their office with their own little persons. A parent or a bishop magnifies his office only when he treats the people under him as those who have been called to sonship and to priesthood, and who are being trained as princes to rule as kings. This is where high office in Church and state differs from the headship in a penitentiary. In the latter case he is making no conscious effort to train his trusties to be wardens. Christ drew a very sharp distinction between His ministers and the lords of the Gentiles. His ministers had a difficult and peculiar duty. They were to become distinguished only as they served the least of their brethren; not as they were magnified by the greatest of their constituents. Christ's apostles were to avoid that oriental isolation which makes for efficient domination but lacks in constructive development.

Official Religion

So long as the Church was persecuted by the state, its prelates were humble. As soon as Constantine admitted bishops into the councils of state, they began to assume the titles and habits of Gentile lords. Their elevation went to their heads and their hearts suffered in consequence. The whole union of Church and state has been a tragic misuse of opportunity. The state gained much in so far as it could use the innate loyalty of Christian people to bolster up its authority; but the Church lost that gracious quality of being concerned with the least of these, their brethren. It resulted in ecclesiastics aiming at temporal power and losing their spiritual leadership.

There was a time when priests and bishops ruled in the courts of Europe and they ruled so badly that the name of Borgia became hateful. There was a time when bishops looked to kings for preferment and the regime of the Georgian bishops nearly finished the spiritual power of the Church.

Ideal Ruler

Men forgot the injunction of their Master that He who would be the ruler of all must like Him become the servant of all; not merely in a piece of perfunctory ritual but in the spirit of paternal kindliness. There is no fundamental difference in relationship between a bishop and his flock; a rector and his people; and a father and his children. The terms prelate, rector and warden are not happy words to describe little man in an exalted office. They emphasize the wrong thing and call attention to that which ought to exist but ought not to be advertised. The very fact that the incumbents dote on them makes them as dangerous as academic degrees, in the control and bestowal of which a little learning becomes a very dangerous thing, which frequently sets forth a conventional standard of great unreality.

That is why one who is unduly anxious to become a bishop or possess a degree is apt to lose rather than gain by the distinction. One is so apt to be anxious in the inverse ratio of his fitness thereto, and in the end deceive his own self, and nobody else. There is nothing more dangerous than power. Gunpowder has been a great blessing to the cause of human liberty, but only when handled carefully. If allowed to follow its own tendencies, it is liable to blow up those who use it. In the same way, ecclesiastical dignity is dangerous when it merely inflates.

It is so hard to be humble and to remain humble when you think you deserve recognition and above all to remain humble when you fancy that you have achieved distinction. Far better that you be the last one to acknowledge it instead of being the only one who recognizes it. Cardinals are hinges (that is what the word means); but if the hinge fancies it exists chiefly for admiration, and adulation, it has lost sight of the real purpose of a hinge. Of course a hinge may have some slight ornamentation, but if it has too much, then the door exists for the hinge and not the hinge for the door. "I am the door!" and we can be nothing at best but humble hinges.

Authority is not an end in itself but merely a means to an end, and ecclesiastical authority, like parently authority, which aims to keep the children in a perpetual condition of hopeless dependency has missed the mark. It is this note which has marred the work of the Greek Church in Russia; the Roman Church in Mexico and strangely enough which marred the work of the Congregational Church in the Hawaiian Islands.

Glory of Anglo-Saxons

It is this conception of a minimum of authority consistent with a maximum of personal liberty which has been the glory of the Anglo-Saxon Church in China, in Japan, in the West Indies and in Liberia and which by virtue of its alliance with the state has marred it in India. As children grow older it is best that authority should change from absolute to limited; from commands to requests; from dictation to felicitation. Authority is something that should always exist but seldom be exercised in a growing family; for the purpose of the family is to develop personal initiative along with respectful consideration for the wishes of the one in Moses' seat. Surely those who sit in Moses' seat have the right to command and as the Master says should be obeyed, but in saying this He condemned the rulers whose authority he acknowledged.

There is a type of ecclesiastic, whether Evangelical, Liberal or Catholic, it matters not, who demands that all under him shall be like him.

I feel sorry for those under him, but I feel sorrier for that state of mind which localizes the claims of the papacy in a dome which is not St. Peter's; and in the end this kind of arbitrary rule breaks down in the household of faith. In the period before the civil war, the difference between high and low Church was so strong and the conception of authority was so rigid that a division was made whereby the high Churchmen took the domestic field and the low Churchmen took the foreign field with the result that after the war, the domestic field became Evangelical and the foreign field, Catholic. Truly, man being in power has very little understanding. It might be well for Catholics and Liberals today to realize that no one has ever yet been able to regimentate the Anglo-Saxon to stay put in any program of ecclesiastical things which he must do to be saved.

Our Cover

WE ARE picturing on the cover this week a Memorial Window which is now being placed in the Lady Chapel of Christ Church, Bronxville, New York, the Rev. C. W. Robinson, rector. The window pictures the Annunciation and the Madonna and Child. It is a Memorial to Lydia Anne Hayward, and was designed and executed in the studios of the firm of ecclesiastical artists, Calvert, Herrick and Riedinger.

THE BIG STORY

The Gospel According to a Newspaper Man

BY IRWIN ST. JOHN TUCKER

WHEN a murder occurs, or a big fire breaks, or anything sensational happens, the first step is to send a man to look over the ground. Whether it happened a long time ago or only yesterday, any event can best be understood by seeing where it happened and what was going on around it at the time.

Surveying the Scene

Palestine is a small patch of land on the southeastern corner of the Mediterranean. It is peculiarly cut off from the world, and yet peculiarly linked with it. To the east runs a deep river, called the "Go-Down," or Jordan, emptying into the Dead Sea far below the level of the Mediterranean. To the south is the desert. To the west is the Great Sea, and to the north the mountain ranges of Lebanon. It is a dry, rocky plateau, not very fertile, with practically no water except the rain.

Buffer State

But it lies between two huge empires, Egypt and Babylonia for thousands of years, immensely rich and powerful. Trade between them flowed in continuous streams by caravans which were compelled to cross the little land of Palestine, or else to strike straight across the shifting, dangerous desert.

It is with something of a shock that we discover, from contemporary records, that Egypt and Babylon had alternately controlled Palestine for centuries before Moses. They had to. Whoever controlled Palestine, controlled the caravan trade. First one and then the other held it. In the private correspondence of Pharaoh Akhenaton, uncle of the recently disinterred Tutenkhamon, we read desperate messages from the Governor of Jerusalem, begging Egyptian troops to beat back the marauding Hebrews who are sweeping savagely out of the desert and capturing the towns of his province.

Babylon and Egypt both had huge temples, elaborate civilizations, schools of tremendous antiquity and learning, traditions and epic poems of immemorial age, when the Hebrews were a wild mob of ragged, starving tramps.

In between the glittering splendors of Egypt and Babylon lay the Great Desert, peopled by shifting tribes who drifted across its waste like storms of sand. Civilization held that narrow bridge between sea and desert as a link which bound together two treasure houses which without each other could not exist, and yet were mortal foes.

Drama of Redemption

Upon this narrow bridge between two huge civilizations the drama of redemption was played out. It is as though Palestine were the visible stage, while on either side stretched two hidden huge expanses of wings, from which actors rushed with maddening cries and exultant songs and bursts of wild lamentation across the little space of vision in a play incomprehensible to those out in front who see only the stage, and have no knowledge of heart-shaking events transpiring behind the curtains to right and left.

Abraham comes out of Babylon and goes into Egypt, then back to Palestine. Jacob goes into Chaldaea for his bride. His sons go down to Egypt for corn. Joseph becomes food administrator for Egypt, and his brothers and children take root there. On the events of their exodus from Egypt the whole subsequent mythology of the Paschal supper and consequently of the Easter feast is built. They are imprisoned in Babylon; and with their return from Babylon, their history suddenly ends.

Between Old and New

A long gulf stretched between the close of the Old Testament and the opening of the New, a gulf entirely unbridged in the Authorized Version. When the Old Testament ends, Persia is supreme, Israel governed by a priest and a judge under the mandate of the Persian Shah, and the Holy Land is peopled with a straggling little handful of miserable pioneers, with a hut for a temple.

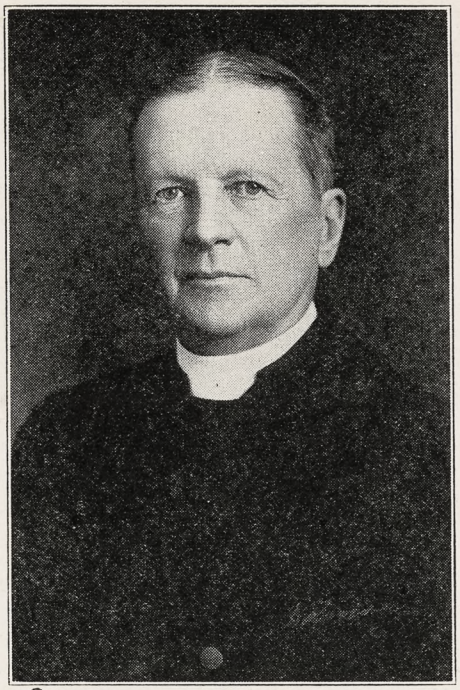
When the New Testament begins, Persia has passed away like a storm in the night. Alexander has risen, flamed across the East, and gone like a meteor. Rome has appeared to the west, has spread and engulfed the world. Carthage and Egypt have been subdued, the empire of Alexander has become the empire of Augustus.

Evidently there is an installment missing out of the middle of the story. It does not make sense. It is as unintelligible as a continued story would be if we had only chapters one to five and ten to fifteen, with chapters six, seven, eight, and nine left out.



Even with the glorious Books of the Maccabees included—which explain the Feast of the Dedication, without which many incidents of the New Testament mean nothing—there are gaps. The writers thought everybody would be able to fill in the gaps, out of common knowledge. It is for all the world as if we had the manuscript of a play, with stage directions and instructions for scenery left out. The book does not stand alone. It requires this body of common knowledge, both history and tradition, to fill it in.

But this body of common knowledge we are beginning to piece together from outside sources. Hosts of investigators are busy in Egypt, in Babylon, in Palestine itself, digging in old mounds and unearthing fragments of vanished cities, with a bit of writing here and a scrap of a statute there throwing floods of light upon what we have forgotten.

Discoveries

It is a story in itself, this record of the explorations and discoveries; Flinders Petrie and the buried store-cities of Pithom and Ramses; the buried city of Tel El Amarna, and the rediscovered correspondence of Pharaoh Akhenaton, with all his wonderful romance; the Tables of Commandments of Hammurabi, written on stone; the potsherds of Oxyrhynchus, with their key to the "common Greek" in which the New Testament is written; fragments of statues in Beth-Shan and Nipper, Jerusalem and Jericho, each adding a bit of corroborating evidence to the narratives of Scripture.

Reconstructing them, and piercing them together, we vision this tiny stage set for action as it appeared when the curtain of ages unrolled upon it. Egypt and its pharaohs lay to south and west, Babylon and its priest-kings to north and east, and in the great Arabian Desert which sundered them a wandering mob of savages who once had lived in Babylon, and then had gone to Egypt, and now were roving around among the oases, fighting desperate battles with other roving mobs, waiting their chance to pounce in upon the settled land which lay between.

Bishop Lawrence
President of Pension Fund

Their chance came. There was a revolution in Egypt, brought on by the attempt of splendid young Akhenaton to abolish old beast gods and substitute worship of the Sun. At the same time there was a revolution in Babylon, when Assyria rose against the Lady of Kingdoms and conquered the Golden Tower.

The Israelites

In that brief pause, when two giants, forever striving for Palestine, were deadlocked, and their attention distracted by events at home, the desert tribes swoped out of their lairs amid the oases and gained foothold in Palestine. They were a savage, anarchic lot. Morals they had none, at least none recognizable to us by that name. Murderous, treacherous and brutal they certainly were, as described by their own records, which set down as cold fact monstrosities of horror no newspaper in the world today would print.

Why was such a ragamuffin horde chosen as the mouthpiece of the Almighty? Now you are asking me to go behind the record and express my own opinion. But if I may make a rough comparison, I should say it was necessary to take a new sheet to write on. The Hebrews as they swept into Canaan were as near nothing, in the sense of moral and religious attainments, as we can find in history. They had but one idea, and they held that with a bulldog grip. It was that while they were yet slaves in Egypt they had been chosen, by the God who ruled the thunder, as his own, and that he had promised them they should rule the world.

It appears, from the account in Exodus, that the original Ten Commandments had nothing of morality, nothing of what we know as religion. They were instructions as to how sacrifice should be offered whereby the Covenant should be renewed. It would have been useless to deliver to such a mob high ethical preachings. They had been drawn from the lowest scum of Egypt's great welter of oppression. They had been scoured by desert sands, winnowed by desert winds, and bleached in the glaring desert sun, for so many years the original generation of the exodus had all died. Whatever high knowledge they might have had when they left Egypt had been blown away in that fierce heat. They knew but one thing: they had made a vow, and that vow must be kept; and the vow, with its fulfillment, make up the whole story of the history of Israel, for that vow was THE OLD COVENANT.

Cheerful Confidences

TRIBUTE TO GEO. M. DARROW

By Rev. Geo. Parkin Atwater

SOME twenty years ago I spent a week in Paris. I was doing the usual things that American visitors do. Now please don't smile and look wise. I will be very glad to print the whole catalogue here, but you are quite familiar with it—the Louvre, the Boulevards, etc.

One morning I started on the top of a sight-seeing bus, under the direction of our ubiquitous friend, Thomas Cook, to visit some distant points. As always happens, I fell into conversation with a very genial American gentleman, who was accompanied by his wife. I did not have my clerical vest, and consequently he had no clue to my profession. We indulged in the usual preliminary comments that lead up to closer acquaintanceship. For nearly an hour we sparred in this friendly fashion. Finally, in a church which we visited, I discovered that he had a general knowledge of names of church furnishings that led me to believe he might not be unfamiliar with the Episcopal Church. So I ventured to make a reference which immediately brought forth the fact that he was quite familiar with the Episcopal Church.

Our acquaintanceship rapidly developed, and during the lunch hour, which the party all took together, we sat at the same table, and I casually mentioned a bishop.

Now, to mention a bishop in general conversation is at once to invite attention. In Europe, if one makes a prolonged reference to his general acquaintance with the clergy, and especially with bishops, it is a prelude to one of two things—either he is getting ready to ask for the loan of a little money or he is preparing to disclose the fact that he is a clergyman. Not being willing to create the suspicions that the former plan was in my mind, I felt it would be wise to reveal to my friend the fact that I was rector of an Episcopal Church.

This was a strategic move, with most delightful consequences. I discovered that my friend was Mr. George M. Darrow, of Murfreesboro, Tennessee. He was treasurer of the diocese, and deputy to the General Convention from Tennessee, and a most esteemed and warm friend of the Bishop and clergy, and an exceedingly loyal and earnest churchman. We had many a delightful hour together. Two years later we met again in Paris, and renewed our friendship. From time to time we have exchanged letters, and have met at General Conventions.

Now I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. Darrow, which says that he has just resigned the office of treasurer of the diocese after thirty-three years' continuous service.

We can hardly do too much honor to a man who has been so faithful in the discharge of an arduous duty. Not only the Diocese of Tennessee, but the whole Church must express its gratitude to a faithful servant in a difficult field. His letter reveals the fact that he has been actuated by the very highest motives of service, and with the feeling of consecration and of devotion to the cause of Christ.

This is but a feeble way for us to express our appreciation of the strength that comes to the Church through such a loyal layman. But let us all, bishops, priests, and laymen, unite in an earnest prayer that God may bless George M. Darrow of Tennessee.

WHAT USE CLERGYMEN?

Their Place in Society

BY CANON JAMES ADDERLEY

I AM not describing how I found a use for religion in the exact order of my discoveries. I put the clergy second, not because I found out their use at an early stage of my existence, but because I think if we are to know their usefulness we should at the very beginning understand what it is. The clergy are everywhere, all over the place, and the man in the street has a sort of right to be told what they are for. There are some foolish fellows in my factory who say they do not see the use of a foreman; others who talk of "soft jobs" that some of the leading men in the firm have. They make just the same sort of mistake as those who see no use in the clergy. Of course, I am supposing that we have a general sense that religion has some use in itself. If it has not, then, of course, the clergy are useless too. I am writing as one who has found a use for religion, and that is why I want at the beginning to say what is the use of the clergy, who are the leaders in religion. When I was a boy the parson used to come into our school and teach us twice a week during the "scripture hour." I did not think much of it at the time, but I see now that there were a whole lot of useful things he taught us to learn by rote which otherwise I should never have known. I may say here that unfortunately my parents did not tell me these things. I wish they had. Then in Sunday School I picked up a good deal, though the state of disorder there as compared with the order in day school made it very difficult to get as much information as one ought to have done. I call it "information," because it was nothing more. I do not pretend to say that these early lessons made me really religious. They just made me aware that a large number of people believed in God and Jesus Christ, and that they thought it very important that I should believe also. It was at a later stage that I began to imagine things about the Church and Christianity as useful to myself. The parson just laid some sort of foundation for me, and I am glad he did. Then again it was the parson who made a friend of us boys, and arranged for us Scouts and Clubs and Games. In fact, I suppose at that time I thought this was his chief work, and perhaps in a certain sense it was. Jesus Christ went about doing good, and this was the way our parson did the same with us boys.

Besides that, he visited the sick and helped people in all sorts of ways. There were a whole lot of things our parson did which, so far as I can see, nobody else would have done if he had not. A parson seems to me rather like a mother who has a lot of household duties to perform, keeping the house going, preparing meals, and cleaning, etc., ready for father and family when they come home from school and work. There is a jolly prayer which calls the Church God's "Household." The parson is the head of the household. He does a great deal which it is difficult exactly to describe, but which has got to be done if the Household is to go on, and to be what the family wants it to be.

A Church, if it is to be any good, must have Worship, public worship as well as private prayer. (Of this we shall have more to say later.) Now the clergy must lead the worship. There are a number of duties which the clergy must perform in order to provide the whole Church with opportunities of worship. They have got to get it all ready for us as a mother gets the meals and keeps the house clean.

Again, there is a great deal of study continually required so that humanity may learn about God, and understand the difficulties which religion always has had and will have. Religion deals with great mysteries which men in all ages have sought to fathom. The clergy must study and be ready to help men to understand and think for themselves. To go back to my illustration from the factory, how would the work of a factory go on if there were not scientific students providing the knowledge by which inventions and machines are made? Theology, which is the science of religion, requires students to keep abreast of other learning in every department of thought. Clergy are also rather like doctors, for they have to deal with spiritual disease and accidents, and for this, too, learning is required and something more. They must be very careful of their own spiritual health and strength if they are to be of any use to sinners and unhappy people. But that they can be of use and of more use than any others I have no doubt whatever.

Perhaps the life that a clergyman leads openly before all men is the most important way by which he can be of use.

St. Francis of Assisi (who, by the way, was not a priest himself) told his followers that it was by their lives that they could preach the best sermons. But we must not think that it is therefore only the clergy who are to have a high standard of life, and that we, the rank and file, can adopt a lower one. Christianity is to be carried into ordinary life by all. If you once grant that the Church is to be an organized body, and of that we shall write next month, it is certainly good, if not absolutely necessary, to have regular officers. Looking back on the history of Christianity we find that the failure of the Church to keep together with its regular Orders of clergy at the head has led to a great deal of confusion, and the spread of Christianity has suffered accordingly. It does seem best to have Bishops (the name, of course, doesn't matter) who preside as the chief officers, governing the institution; Priests or Elders who carry on the official work of the Christian Church, baptising the babies, wedding the couples, helping the troubled souls, leading the worship, and generally keeping the great business going from day to day, and the Deacons to help the Priests. Do you know a "better 'ole" than that which has been carved out of the Rock of Ages, riddled by the bullets and shells of the world, the flesh, and the devil, but still affording shelter for the soldiers of Christ with their padres too?

Let's Know

FORGIVENESS AND THANKSGIVING

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

"WHEN we have committed a sin and afterwards asked God in penitence to forgive us that sin, shall we then forget all about it, or shall we always ask God to forgive us that sin? For God's gift of His Blessed Son, and for other gifts, it is not enough to thank Him only once for these blessings, is it? Then does it not consistently follow that we must continually ask for forgiveness for our transgressions?"

So writes a correspondent. I would put it a little bit differently. When we have once brought our sins before God for forgiveness, we would hardly expect to forget all about them because they are part of our life experience and can scarcely be scratched out of our memory as tho they had never occurred. But we can think of them in quite a different way. I do not think we need to keep asking forgiveness for the same offenses but we do need to profit by the experience we have been thru. We can remember what we have learned but our penitence for the sins can be converted into thanksgiving for God's forgiveness of them. To keep on considering them as sins requiring forgiveness would probably create a mordid state of mind in which we would live under heavy burdens of conscience. It is neither necessary to forget them nor to brood over them.

Of course we are never done with being thankful for God's gift of His Blessed Son. That is a continuous, daily blessing of which we can never afford to be forgetful. It does not follow that a sin needs to be a continuous, daily burden. To be sure there are likely to be daily faults from which we need to be cleansed. But "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We do need the habit of laying our sins before God just as we need the habit of regularly washing our face and hands. If at some time we have been badly plastered with mud, we do not need to keep digging forever at the same old dirt. Once we have got it off, we are clean, but we remember the experience with wholesome horror of the mud and corresponding gratitude for its removal.

There is always something for which we ought to be thankful. I think it would be a fine thing if we would use our prayer-time frequently for nothing but thanksgiving. More often we use it only for askings. It is not that we are ungrateful; we are merely careless. I have been seventeen years in Holy Orders and I could not tell you the number of times I have been asked to offer prayer in Church for those who are sick. But I could count on my fingers the number of times I have been asked to return thanks for recovery from sickness. Now, I do not wait. When I see a person in Church for whom we have prayed in time of sickness, I go to the altar, open my Prayer Book and read the prayer of thanksgiving for recovery from sickness. Usually the person in question, shaking hands with me on the way out, will say—"Thank you for saying that prayer; I should have asked for it."

Thanksgiving and confession are always in order. But the latter merges into the former.

Opinions

THE management of THE WITNESS will appreciate very much having your opinion as to the merit of the series of articles now appearing, THE BIG STORY, by Irwin St. John Tucker. We seek this information in order that we may be aided in a decision as to future articles by the same author. A note to the managing editor, 416 Lafayette Street, New York City, will be a real favor. And to rectors: appoint a representative to secure subscriptions in the parish. We allow a commission of 50c on each yearly subscription, thus enabling the representative to earn and at the same time perform a service by getting a Church paper into the homes of the parish.

About Books

Reviewed by Rev. C. L. Street

The Catholic Church and Philosophy; Father Vincent McNabb, O. P. The Catholic Church and Its Reactions with Science; Sir. Bertram C. A. Windle. Macmillan. Each $1.00.

Other volumes in the Calvert Series have been reviewed in this column. Father McNabb begins by defining philosophy as "organized and supreme common sense."

"On plain simple matters of fact any twelve men or women, and especially any twelve fathers and mothers of large families, are more likely to see straight and talk straight than any twelve professors, especially professors of psychology, for whom the word 'intelligence' has ceased to have any definite meaning."

This is a gorgeous start, and the rest of the book lives up to it. He gives, in 122 pages, a fascinating summary of the church's philosophy in ancient, mediaeval, and modern times. It is, of course, a defence of scholastic philosophy, but it is a defence which leaves one with a new respect for scholastic philosophy, and for a church which can produce thinkers like Father McNabb. It is to be regretted that there was not space for a discussion of the relation of scholastic philosophy to some of our present philosophical tendencies.

Dr. Windle's book on the Catholic Church and Science is more definitely apologetic and less exciting. It is mainly a defence on behalf of the church against the accusation, or rather the current prejudices, that it is opposed to science. Within this field it is a fine piece of work. Those who are oppressed by the claims of science will thank Dr. Windle for this quotation from Whitehead, "Faith in the possibility of science is an unconscious derivative from mediaeval theology. Science has never shaken off the impress of its origin in the historical revolt of the later Renaissance. It has remained predominantly an anti-rationalistic movement based upon a naive faith. What reasoning it has wanted, has been borrowed from mathematics which is a surviving relic of Greek rationalism, following the deductive method. Science repudiates philosophy. In other words, it has never cared to justify its faith or to explain its meanings."

Protestant Reunion Suggested in England

Nonconformist Divine Comes to the English Church Union to Talk Over Reunion

SHEPPARD BETTER

By Rev. A. Manby Lloyd

I can tell you a little story which you are not likely to see in print. The other day a leading Nonconformist divine visited the headquarters of the E. C. U. and intimated that within the next three years it was hoped to effect a reunion between three Nonconformist bodies, involving a membership of seventeen million people (an exaggeration, but let it pass). Their ultimate desire was to achieve reunion with the Church of England, and holding that the Anglo-Catholics would constitute the Anglican Church in the next generation —they being the only body which definitely knew what they wanted— preliminary inquiries were being made. "Most of our people" said the eminent divine, "feel that you are getting on too quickly with the Eastern Church and with Rome, and I have come to ask you to stop at once any further conversations at Malines, and the rapprochement with the Easterns. Put them on one side and have an accession of strength of 17,000,000. We could then exercise a moderate Low Church influence on the Church of Rome." The reply was that they could not commit the Church of England one way or the other.

A winter at Broadstairs has done Dick Sheppard so much good that he hopes later for a "full and active life" if he is allowed to go easy. At the end of February he moved into his new house in Holland Road. Meanwhile Canon Pat McCormick has been induced as the vicar of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. He drops the "canon" and becomes plain "Mr."

All up and down the country a few nonentities, who remind one forcibly of the curate in Charley's Aunt, are posing as early Christian martyrs because the new Prayer Book is brought in line with the Scotch and American models. They may stir up the ignorant mob, and they will certainly unloose the purse-strings of a lot of old women, but the days of Low Churchism are numbered. The future lies with the Broad (Modernist) and High Church Schools of thought. The attempt to prove that the new P. B. is all in favor of the Anglo-Catholics is disingenuous. The legality of "vestments" was fought and won long ago. What the new book does is to legalize the surplice.

BISHOP SUMNER
Proposes a Cathedral

Again, the "Anglos" do not reserve for "the purpose of Adoration" . . . never did and never will. They reserve for purpose of communion. Adoration follows the line of faith. If you don't believe you don't adore. Our Lord, Jesus Christ, did not become incarnate for "purposes of Adoration." But being found Incarnate He was adored by those who walked by faith and not by sight. These things are matters of elementary knowledge to the rank and file. In fifty years' time they may penetrate to the craniums of the high and mighty.

I have been reading a fine biography, "Stewart Headlam," by Brittany. It tells you a lot of good things about this fine priest who couldn't get a license from his bishops (London) for eleven years and was at eternal loggerheads with them when he did. For a time Headlam was a prison chaplain and sent for Stanton to preach to the prisoners. After the sermon a prisoner sent for Headlam and said, "Lord, sir, what sort of a madman did you send to preach for us. Why he's balmy, that man. He waived his hands and flung about his arms and said, 'The best bread, the best fish!'" Headlam was accused of being "ungentlemanly," the greatest insult that you can hurl at an Englishman's head. He replied, "You see Our Lord and Isaiah were so ungentlemanly that I prefer to be so also." It is good reading about this brave man who tackled Bradlaugh on the platform and sent a telegram of condolence to him when he was jailed; who founded the Church Socialist League which rose, phoenix-like, from the ashes of the Guild of St. Matthew.

Church Pension Fund Has an Anniversary

Church Pension Fund Has Now Been in Operation in the Church for Ten Years

GRATIFYING RESULTS

On March 1, 1917, a group of workers assembled in an office at 14 Wall Street in New York City. As the clock struck the hour for the opening of business the pension system of the Episcopal Church went into operation. This had been preceded by years of effort. A commission of both houses of the General Convention had studied the problem of how an organization like a Church should provide for the old age of clergmen, and for the family that a dying clergyman may leave behind him. After a painstaking investigation, and after their findings had been approved by the General Convention and by each diocese, a committee, headed by Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts, organized a campaign which produced the great sum of $8,750,000 to be the initial capital.

Ten years have elapsed since that March morning. What has happened to the pension system? The first great problem was to persuade the parishes and missions to pay over to the fund the 7½ per cent of a rector's salary. To vote a thing was one thing; to raise salaries of all the clergy 7½ per cent was quite another matter. There were those who stated that it was sure to fail. Yet here is the fact on March 1, 1927, the Church Pension Fund has received 98½ per cent of all possible pension assessments.

The Church Pension Fund has carried out all of their promises with punctilious exactitude, and at the same time they have maintained a solvency which the utmost partisanship has never doubted.

The fund necessarily only covered those clergymen who were in active service when it started. Yet the trustees have paid out over a million and a half dollars to clergymen who retired before the system started. Also the payment of $1,000 immediately to the widow upon the death of a clergyman, which has been done for the past five years, was unpromised when the fund was proposed.

Perhaps the greatest testimony to the effectiveness of our pension fund is that the services of the officers are being constantly sought by other churches, all desiring to install a system like our own.

The president of the Church Pension Fund is Bishop Lawrence; executive vice president, Mr. Monell Sayre; executive secretary, Mr. Bradford Locke.

Not So Easy to Have a Big Synod Out in the Province of the Pacific

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

By Bishop Stevens

The Council of the Province of the Pacific met in the Diocesan House, San Francisco, on Thursday, February 24th. The business meeting was preceded by a celebration of the Holy Communion, Bishop Sanford of San Joaquin being the celebrant.

Reports of various commissions were presented and plans discussed for the meeting of the Synod which is to be held at Trinity Church, Seattle, Washington, beginning Tuesday evening, May 17th. The corporate consciousness of the province of the Pacific is unusually strong, remarkably so, considering the long distances. Some one has said that the Church laid out seven provinces and then included everything that was left in the eighth. It is a longer trip from one end of the province to the other than from Maine to Chicago, which territory includes four provinces,—the First, Second, Third and Fifth.

There is at the present time before the legislature of California a new bill to permit week-day religious education. Its provisions are as follows:

"The Board of Education in the country, city, and city and country, or the trustees of the public school shall provide for the release and shall release any pupil in the public schools of this state, in all grades up to and including the eight grade, or its equivalent, from daily attendance at any public school in this state for a period of one hundred and twenty minutes each week during the school year, on such days and during such school hours as such board may designate, for the purpose of receiving religious instruction by some religious organization, when such release is requested in writing by the parent or guardian, or other person having custody or control of such pupil.

"Actual attendance at the place designated for such religious instruction shall count as attendance at the public schools of this state for all purposes where daily attendance forms the basis of computation.

"Such release shall only be effective in case the pupil released for that purpose actually attends the place designated for such religious instruction.

"No teacher of the public schools shall participate in such religious instruction during the hours for which he, or she, is employed to teach in the public schools, and no public funds shall be used directly or indirectly for such instruction, nor shall any school house or public school property be used for that purpose."

The bill is receiving very general support from all church groups although a newspaper report of recent date states that a committee of representatives of various religions has been formed to work for its defeat. This committee includes Archbishop Hanna of the Roman Catholic diocese of San Francisco, and a prominent Rabbi. Many other Roman Catholics and Jews, however, have been distinctly favorable to it.

What in Your Opinion Is the Great Problem Now Waiting to Be Solved?

TWO OPINIONS

A professor in one of our theological seminaries recently asked his class: "What is the greatest question before the world waiting to be solved?" One of the young men, gifted beyond his fellows, expounded at length on the industrial problem. The professor listened patiently and then in a characteristically quiet way said: "Mr. Blank, you are wrong. The great question is whether or not there is a God."

I haven't the space to set down here just what he said; wish that I did have for I am sure it was most worthwhile. The jist of it is this: in his opinion people who believe in God have got to fight for their right to believe. Mechanistic philosophy is destroying the conception of God in the minds of people today, and without God there is no moral life and our industrial problems and our international problems are unimportant. On the other hand give people a real conception of God and these other problems are sure to be solved. Believers should line up against the real enemy, and not devote their time and waste their energies in warring on each other; "High" against "Low," Protestant against Catholic, Christian against Jew. All believers, of whatever creed should stand together in the fight on unbelief, especially as we find it in mechanistic philosophy.

He had things to say about the Church, comparing it to a fine automobile, beautifully equipped, with good tires all around, spares on the rear, and a high powered engine under the hood. But it is out of gas. "As a result people are leaving it stalled beside the road and are wandering aimlessly across the fields. The Church has everything but God. And without Him it is as useful as an automobile without gas." If a person played the organ for a large city church for forty years, hardly missing a service, a big dinner would be held at the Ritz-Ritz, the boys would all dress up in their funny clothes, speeches would be made, and probably the organist would be presented with a purse, though I am not bold enough to say how much there would be in it. Just because a fellow had the good sense to live in a small town and play the organ there is no reason for not slapping him on the back a bit in these paragraphs. Mr. George W. Heber has been playing the organ in Holy Trinity, Brookville, Pa., for forty years. During that time the diocese has had four bishops, and the parish has had nineteen rectors, about all it can stand, I should judge. Mr. Heber is still at the organ every Sunday, and according to the papers he is there for the glory of God and not for a monthly check. Folks over there cut cake for him the other night in the parish house. They didn't give him any purse, but fourteen of them made speeches so it will have to go down in the records as an occasion. They are going to put a bronze tablet in the church about him pretty soon.

Mission was held last week at St. James' Church, Roxbury, Mass., conducted by the Rev. George Rodgers Wood. It is the feeling of the parish as a whole, that it was one of the greatest things ever done by the historic parish, where no mission has been held for a hundred years.

It must delight the hearts of those who are interested in religious education to realize the great emphasis which is being put on this department of religious activity in the construction of new parish buildings in the Church.

The latest building to be dedicated is the new parish house of the Church of the Advent, Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, Rev. George C. Dunlap, rector. It combines utility, efficiency and beauty and is certain to be of the greatest help in the educational, social and devotional work of this great parish.

An interesting historical fact is that the parish had its beginning in the parlor of an Irish lady, Mrs. Charlotte Moffett, in 1855, whose grandson is the Right Rev. Thos. F. Gailor, Bishop of Tennessee, former Presiding Bishop of the Church. A beautiful chapel in the new parish house, seating nearly one hundred, is a memorial to this event. The Perkins Memorial Club room has been enlarged to an auditorium, seating 250. Though increased in size it retains the social intimacy it has always suggested.

Dr. Almon Abbott's comments of a few weeks ago on the subject of a shortage of men for the ministry, and especially on the undermanned parishes in the west, got a "rise" out of several of the brethren. Dean Bonell, of St. John's College Greeley, has written a fine three page letter setting forth the claim that the real trouble lies in the fact that parishes raising $50,000 budgets, buying $10,000 windows, and $1,000 copes, give not a penny to thelogical education. He knows of rafts of men who are keen to go into the ministry but they can't find the $200 to pay their board. Hence Dean Bonell's solution: give your money to theological seminaries. Another letter comes from the Rev. Angus Clephan, recently called to Sandusky, Ohio, in which he objects to fellows on "cushy" jobs telling the other fellow what he ought to do. Enclosed is a story of his own days on the front, most of it away from civilization in the far north with the thermometer down around fifty below a good bit of the time.

Funny isn't it how we all know that the solution is wrapped up in our own job. Talk with a dean and he tells you that the Church can get nowhere until it spends money on seminaries, his own at the moment being in the need of one million dollars, and do you know anyone who wants to give it. The president of the college says: "The Episcopal Church might as well shut up shop. They are not doing a thing for my college, and are thereby missing the greatest opportunity the Church ever had. Where is the missionary spirit?" Then you come to the head of a prep school and he says: "What is the use of educating them after they are twenty if you neglect them entirely

ROCHES EMBROCATION

Rheumatism

A Remarkable Home Treatment Given by One Who Had It

In the year of 1893 I was attacked by Muscular and Sub-Acute Rheumatism. I suffered as only those who are thus afflicted know for over three years. I tried remedy after remedy, but such relief as I obtained was only temporary. Finally, I found a treatment that cured me completely and such a pitiful condition has never returned. I have given it to a number who were terribly afflicted, even bedridden, some of them seventy to eighty years old, and the results were the same as in my own case.

I want every sufferer from any form of muscular and sub-acute (swelling of the joints) rheumatism, to try the great value of my improved "Home Treatment" for its remarkable healing power. Don't send a cent; simply mail your name and address, and I will send it free to try. After you have used it, and it has proven itself to be that long-looked-for means of getting rid of such forms of rheumatism, you may send the price of it, One Dollar, but understand I do not want your money unless you are perfectly satisfied to send it. Isn't that fair? Why suffer any longer, when relief is thus offered you free. Don't delay. Write today.

before that. Now at St. ———, etc., etc." Why I have even run into rectors of parishes, strangely enough who felt that they could use more money to good advantage. And did you ever talk to any of the inmates of 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City? Why I could tell a tale myself. "Now if rectors only had the good sense to get a Church paper into the home of every single one of their parishioners it would revolutionize the Church. And why is it that the readers of Church papers do not buy from advertisers. It is the advertiser who keeps the paper going, yet how he is neglected. Oh, such a dumb lot; here am I ready to be of great service if the Church will only have the good sense to dump a lot of cash into my lap. Maybe sometime they will wake up and realize that the Episcopal Church cannot possibly exist without THE WITNESS."

consists of statements from speeches by eminent men in which all who disagree with their particular point of view are called hard names. For instance it is not convincing to hear a congressman from Georgia say that everyone who fails to live up to the 18th Amendment in letter and spirit is undermining the Constitution. There is a negro gentleman who cleans up my office who tells an entertaining story of how he attempted to vote once down in Chattanooga. He took a constitutional amendment seriously and was lucky to get off with only a busted head. It seems to me, things being as they are today, that he shows rather good judgment in now preferring to chance a night in jail for breaking the 18th Amendment than to chance being lynched for insisting upon his rights under the Fourteenth.

Preacher, Pulpit and Pew

By E. P. Jots

Mr. Haley Fiske has done unusual work in connection with the fund raising for the Cathedral of St. John the Divine.

It seems that a tramp beggar accosted a group of New York insurance men the other day, and one of them pointed out Mr. Fiske and said:

"Nothing doing here, brother, but that fine looking gentleman in the grey suit is very charitable, and if you tackle him you're liable to make a haul."

"Thanks, boss," said the tramp in his husky voice, and he hurried off to Mr. Fiske, while the others looked on with interest.

The tramp and the capitalist were seen to talk earnestly together for some time. Then their hands met, a piece of money passed between them and the tramp stepped jauntily away.

"Well, did you land him?" one of the insurance men asked.

"Oh, no," the tramp answered cheerfully. "I gave him a dollar for his cathedral fund."

FEAR

The Autobiography of James Edwards

By John Rathbone Oliver

The breakdowns from worrying which occur so frequently in every man's circle of business and social acquaintances raise the query, 'Who will be the next?' 'Will it be my turn?'

Here's a good human story of how they "get that way" and how you may be getting that way yourself, for it is almost everybody's story in these speeding up days.

It tells you all about the breakdown of a busy man who cracks when the doctor of the insurance company refuses to pass him. It makes you see that it was not the worries he talked about, but the worries that he kept to himself which finally "got" him. It tells you all that he "went through" to get back on his feet.

If you yourself, or some one whom you dearly love is plainly headed in the same direction, the reading of this book may throw the good kind of scare into him that will get him to ease up on himself before it is too late. Price $2.50

CHANGING BACKGROUNDS IN RELIGION AND ETHICS
By H. Wildon Carr

Dr. Carr takes the stand that the problems of truth and goodness have completely changed in our modern world. Both matter and life now have to be interpreted not in terms of mechanism, but in terms of energy and vitality. Our thought lives not in a world which is a beautiful machine, but in a world like unto a living organism forever inventing and experimenting at the behests of a creative life urge. Price $2.00

STANDARDS OF WORSHIP

The Holy Communion

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

IF GOD desires His creatures to worship Him it is evident that He has furnished them a standard of that which He desires us to do. It is something so tremendous that man must be anxious to orientate himself to God's will and not desirous of substituting his own prejudices or preferences.

Has God indicated His will in this matter? Has He set us a standard of worship to which we can orientate ourselves? A subject would not presume to enter the throne room of an earthly monarch on his own terms but would expect at once to conform to the usages of the Court.

Is There a Standard?

Where shall we find such a standard if it exists?

I would say to the Fundamentalist that he will find it in the Bible and to the Modernist that he will find it in the fitness of things. It is strange to me that the Fundamentalist is a man who demands that you accept such portions of Holy Scripture as he has approved, and that you join with him in rejecting such portions as run counter to his prejudices.

Where, for example, in the Bible does he find any justification for an extemporaneous worship? It is to be found neither in the Old Testament nor in the New, but solely in his own assurance that he has been invited to a public intimacy with the King of Kings which must not be confused with the private fellowship of which Christ approves in the Sermon on the Mount.

It might be permissible for you to enjoy a private friendship for the King of England which would become ridiculous if carried out in public. For an intimate friend to enter the room in which his majesty was enthroned and to say "Good morning, George!" would be to end at once an intimacy upon which one had presumed; and yet I have heard a certain religious type who speak to God in public in about that way. I am sure that God loves this type but I am equally sure that He does not admire them. For God in Holy Scripture is never careless of His honor.

It is all right for Christians to say that the Old Testament has no binding force upon them in the details of its temple worship; but why do men assume that the fundamental principles of public worship have changed so that God demanded dignified reverence then and encourages easy familiarity now. Certainly nothing that Christ did or said justifies such an assumption.

For He went up to the temple to worship and, outside of His private, personal prayers in the mountain or the garden, when at the most, only two or three of His apostles were present, Christ never conducted a prayer meeting or anything resembling one. On the contrary he forbade His disciples to pray in public, although he encouraged them to worship there.

His Admonition

Study His admonition in the Sermon on the Mount, in conjunction with His own personal practice. He did participate in the liturgical worship of both temple and synagogue, and He did object to the practice of introducing extemporary prayer which was more or less in vogue in the synagogue of his day. Notice the comment in this context.

"And when thou prayest" (There is a vast difference between private prayer which is an individual act and public worship which is a corporate act.) "thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets." (One wonders by what process of interpretation this has been expurgated from the Bibles of Fundamentalists.)

Christ goes on to say that the danger of such prayers lies in the motive which impels hypocrites,—"that they may be seen of men."

This is exactly the difference between the confident assurance of the professional prayer and the diffident reticence of the liturgical worshipper.

To the former, the latter is lacking in fervor; to the latter the former is lacking in modesty. And to this Christ seems to agree.

"But thou when thou prayest shut thy door and pray to thy Father which is in secret" and He might have added His own practice, when thou worshippest go up to the temple and lose thyself in the common worship of the temple.

Surely there is much food for thought in this injunction which, whatever it means, does not mean the very opposite of what it says.

Nor does the advocate of casual worship find any great consolation in the Book of Revelation.

Book of Revelation

For if the Old Testament lays down the principle of liturgical worship; and if the practice of Christ enforces that standard, then the Book of Revelation endorses it as the practice of heavenly persons.

For the Book of Revelation is a symposium of candlesticks and incense and prostrations and anthems and ritual.

Where, then, in the Bible, do we learn that God is pleased with the easy familiarity of extemperaneous worship?

We are told that it makes for zeal, and we answer in the words of St. Paul, that it has affected people "zealously but not well;" for our American Christians in stimulating zeal have lost reverence, and the lack of reverence is being visited on the children of the third and fourth generations.

It is not the spirit of the Master to arouse enthusiasm at the price of reality, nor to endanger modesty by methods which He says are characteristic of hypocrisy.

Of course He doesn't say that all those who practice extemporaneous worship are hypocrites. What He does say is that hypocrites thrive on public prayer and that His disciples ought not to follow their example, or encourage their methods.

And now as to the fitness of things.

The flames of the sun are said to be thousands of miles in height. If you could suddenly be confronted with this phenomenon in a way to realize it, certainly in the presence of such a majestic spectacle you would not chatter. You would be awed into silence. Talk would be ridiculous.

But the presence of God is infinitely more overwhelming than such a physical phenomenon.

How can man enter into God's presence without feeling awe and if He speaks at all it should not be in a conversational manner.

More Silence

We must speak because speech is the method by which we express our emotions, but it would be better if we had more silences and less utterance. While mumbling is an indication of nothing else than mental deficiency, to prattle through the service is to develop the soul of a hackman at Niagara. To orate the service is to acquire the nature of a spell-binder.

The holiness of God is greater than any physical phenomenon. Before Him in His temple we should either be silent or repeat the prayer which He hath taught us. We should never chatter or mumble or talk commonplaces.

The Church has set us a standard of worship which preserves modesty while it encourages adoration.

Because man could not behold the glory of God, Christ came.

"The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us."

And those who beheld Christ saw all that God could reveal to us of Himself. And so Christ instituted a service through which man could approach God as the timid felt sure that they could touch God in touching Christ. The Eucharist is the only service which Christ Himself instituted.

He wasted no words. "Do this!"

"If you love me keep my commandments." And so the early Christians broke bread on the Lord's Day.

This was to them the one thing needful in the observance of the Lord's Day. If they neglected to receive the Eucharist it was sent to them at their homes. It was the tie that bound all Christians together and cemented them to Christ.

It is the one thing needful in the household of faith. Not that other things are unimportant, but that this is essential. For, to be a Christian, it is far more vital that we do something than that we say something, and this is the one thing in relation to worship that we are told to do.

To Give, Not Get

The failure to do it has made us a group of talkative Christians instead of a band of worshipping Christians. Wherever the Eucharist has been omitted worship has become a lost art; people get off their knees and sit down. Religion has lost its center. Men go to Church to get whatever is offered and so they sit expectantly. Christians should go to Church to give themselves, their souls and bodies to God,— not in their own sufficiency, but joined to the offering of Christ on Calvary.

The Holy Eucharist has always been the center and the standard of Christian worship, because it has given men the time and the place and the opportunity to join the offering of themselves to the sacrifice of Christ.

It is the very essence of obedience for it is doing the very thing that He commanded us to do; and wherever the Eucharist is highly esteemed, the note of reverence is always found, except where men substitute a mechanical performance for what was given to us as a continuous personal contact.

The Big Story

The Gospel According to a Newspaper Man

BY IRWIN ST. JOHN TUCKER

THERE is a tendency to gloss over or delete the horrible parts of the Bible, as being too rough for our modern ears. Yet it is those horrible parts which give it vitality and meaning. This story of desperate wars, of destroying cities and nations who did not accept the God of Israel, bitter denunciations of king and people for obeying what we should call the commonest dictates of humanity, are necessary to the story. In fact, they are the story. Deleting them, or soft-pedaling them, is much like giving the details of the Declaration and the Constitution while omitting all reference to the Revolutionary War.

The Prophets

One is struck by the conviction that never was there a national history like this. From beginning to end it is full of abuse of the people whose doings it records. From their first rush out into the desert from the "cucumbers, and the melons and the leeks, and the onions and the garlick" of Egypt, they are denounced by every prophet as stupid, stubborn, treacherous, stiffnecked, pledge breakers, lying, thieving, adulterous and altogether worthless. If there is any adjective of denunciation which is not applied constantly and in all its meanings to the people of Israel by the prophets of the Old Testament whom they so lovingly cherish, I have not discovered it.

Can you imagine a "radical" newspaper which spent its whole time denouncing president, congress, governors and all the people, being bound up in the national archives and preserved with great reverence as the book of books, the only trustworthy history of the nation?

The editorial columns are worse than the news columns. No bitter I. W. W. newspaper ever was filled with more constant, consistent, all-comprehending and whole-heartedly-poured-forth vitriol than this account of Israel's history, which is protected and loved to such an extent that millions of those whom it abuses have died in its defense.

This certainly is evidence in favor of its accuracy. No man who is making up a history of his own exploits depicts himself as consistently beaten, perpetually cruel, senselessly barbarous. He endeavors always to make himself out better than he is.

We have two stories of the same events running more or less parallel. One is the raw, crude narrative of what happened, told by the men to whom it happened. The other is the rewritten narrative in which everything is toned down, touched up, brushed over and gilded.

Leg-men of the Bible

On every large newspaper there are two sets of reporters. One is made up of leg-men, who get out and actually dig up the news. Chicago, or New York, or St. Louis, are too big for the men who actually see what happens to get into the office and write it up in time to make press deadlines. They telephone in what they have found out, to rewrite men, who weave the accounts sometimes of several different eye-witnesses into one story. The notes of eye-witnesses frequently differ widely from the published account, and still more widely from the editorial view which follows a day or so later.

These two species are clearly shown in the books of Joshua and Judges. Joshua tells the story of the conquest of the Holy Land as it ought to have happened, from the viewpoint of later ages. It gives a picture of the triumphant march of the tribes across the country, destroying their enemies with a succession of miracles. But Judges is the rough, crude report of the eyewitness.

Both Accounts

It begins out in the desert, with the two tribes of Judah and Simeon debating whether to charge in now and see what they can get, or wait until later. They consult the oracle, which says "Go." So they go, Simeon first. And from that time on the tribe of Simeon cannot be found with a microscope. It suffered the fate of all pioneers, being wiped out. The territory assigned Simeon on the tribal maps is in the fringe of the desert, south of Judah's pleasant land, a territory where no one could live. Judah rolled in over Simeon, through the breach Simeon had made, secured a foothold, and by slow degrees established himself with the capture of town after town. What says the record? "And the Lord was with Judah, and drove out the inhabitants of the mountain, but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron."

Judges is full of little incidents which bear all the marks of a correspondent on the spot; such as Adoni-Bezek and his thumbs and great toes, and the capture of Kiriath-Sepher. Caleb, the partner of Joshua, said "He that smiteth Kiriath Sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife." And Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother, took it; and he gave him Achsah his daughter to wife. And it came to pass, when she came to him, that she moved him to ask of her father a field. And she lighted from off her ass, and Caleb said unto her, "What wilt thou?" And she said to him,"Give me a blessing; for thou has given me a south land (namely, a desert patch) —give me also springs of water. And Caleb gave her the upper springs and the nether springs."

"Give me a blessing." To the Hebrew mind at that stage, a blessing was something very practical — a present. The Commandment which we translate "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord Thy God in vain" originally meant "Thou shalt not call upon the Lord thy God with empty hands"— namely, do not pray without having offered sacrifice. The reasoning is perfectly sound. What we get free we do not value.

Our Cover

JOHN DOMINIQUE LaMOTHE, Bishop of Honolulu, was born on the Isle of Man in 1868. He graduated from King William College, Isle of Man, and from the Virginia Seminary, Alexandria, in 1894. He was rector at Hamilton, Virginia, from graduation until 1901, when he went to Washington as the assistant at the Epiphany. In 1903 he became rector of Christ Church, St. Joseph, Missouri, but returned to the Epiphany the following year as associate rector. From 1907 to 1916 he was rector of St. Paul's, New Orleans. Then, after serving as rector of the Ascension, Baltimore for a year, he was elected to his present position.

Read on through the book. You find incidents like Ehud the son of Gera, "a man left-handed" — killing the king of Moab, "a very fat man"; and the parable of Jotham; and the horrible story of Jepthah; and the final welter of bloody madness ending with the verse: "Every man did that which was right in his own eyes."

Judges and Joshua

Judges consists largely of news — war news and police news—whereas Joshua consists largely of highly editorialized comment. Ruth belongs, let us say, to the Woman's Section. It consists of a vigorous essay in opposition to the law against mixed marriages.

Samuel and Kings are straight news pages. Chronicles are the same story, editorialized and rewritten. Ezra and Nehemiah are accounts of the same happening written by two widely different men, one a soldier, the other a priest. Esther is a feature story, a Sunday Magazine entertainment, apparently without any moral at all.

Pure Editorials

With Job we get into the purely editorial sections. Psalms and Proverbs are poetry and paragraphs. Ecclesiastes is a pessimistic editorial. Song of Songs is a romance of the society section, depicting the wooing and wedding of the King.

With the prophets we get into politics. These are really the turning point of the book. They thunder forth denunciations of their time in language always terrific and sometimes appalling. Following the tide of their fervor is like riding on the crest of a wave of dark eloquence that sweeps down the narrow channel of a swollen stream, from Amos to Malachi, whose last verse sounds the promise of which the opening of the New Testament echoes the fulfillment.

Cut out all this, the "horrible parts," and you cut out the story, leaving only a few fables, a few songs, a few pious sermons suspended in a meaningless blue haze. The point of this huge struggle that went on in Israel, the meaning which lifts its denunciatory psalms and prophecies to the dignity of a leading role in the world drama, is brought out by the course of parallel religious history in Egypt, Babylon, Greece, and Rome. What seems useless barbarity and pointless vehemence when we read it by itself, stands out as a desperate battle against the whole world, against the common drift of humanity, which Israel alone, of all the nations of the world, stemmed and turned aside and compelled to reverse its flow.

Jordan dashed downward into the Dead Sea, salt and bitter, whose waters killed all it touched. But this stormy current of the river of humanity flowed from the Dead Sea upward until it reached the River that flows from the throne of God, giving life to thirsty souls who find strength therein, and elsewhere none.

WE ARE accustomed to surprises from the Rev. R. J. Campbell. There was his "New Theology." That was a surprise in more senses than one. Then, there was his reception into the Church of England, and his publication of "A Spiritual Pilgrimage." That was a joyful surprise to all members of the Anglican Communion. Then, there was his renunciation of the pastorate that he might devote himself to dealing with individuals for Christ one by one. Recently, he has given us a surprise of a new order. Last month he married his secretary and adopted daughter, Miss Ethel Gertrude Smith. The wedding took place by special license in a Brighton church, and was kept secret from all save a few intimate friends. The new wife is thirty-nine years old, and the bridegroom is sixty years old.

DR. STOCKMAN, a prominent Methodist Episcopal pastor says that "America is passing through a state of moral adolescence." A further testimony, I suppose, to the dominating influence of "The Rising Generation." Morals occupy so much of our time when we are young. One of the comforts of getting on in years is that morals come to take care of themselves. It is because the country is morally adolescent, I suppose, that so many people, legislators included, seem to be worrying overmuch about other people's morals. And Uncle Sam is depicted with grey hairs!

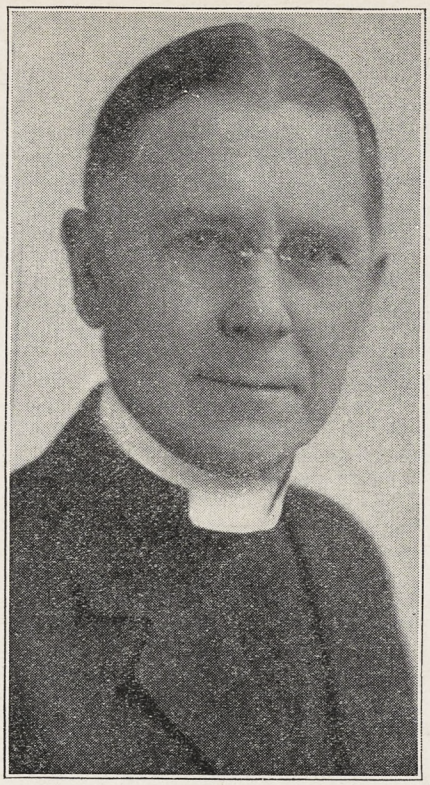
A CONGREGATION of two thousand persons, representing the membership of eighteen churches in a section of Manhattan, uttered in unison their reaffirmation of faith in a personal God after hearing a sermon by Dr. S. Parkes Cadman the other day. Almost a Petrine Pentacostal experience. What a wonderful man Dr. Cadman is! What a mind, and—what prodigous industry. How in the world does he do all that he does do, week by week? Quantity and quality! It is phenomenal. We should all be broad-minded enough to thank God for such a Champion of the Faith in this our land, day and generation.

Let's Know

A GREAT MAN



By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

APPRECIATION of great men runs by custom. Some really great men seldom get the recognition which is due to them because no one has ever promoted their cult.

One such, to my mind, is that much neglected Old Teastament character, Nehemiah. His book is obscured in the collection of Hebrew historical writings and sermons are not often preached about him. Yet he appears to me to have shown tremendous leadership under exceedingly adverse conditions.

For a hundred years the returned Jews had been attempting to rebuild the city of Jerusalem. There had been alternating periods of activity and depression. At last the people had fallen into a state of despair. The city and temple were rebuilt but they were unprotected against hostile neighbors and the spirit of the inhabitants was demoralized. Ezra had come to tone them up and had attempted to erect fortifications but had failed.

Nehemiah was cup-bearer to the

BISHOP THURSTON
Bishops to Act on Resignation

Persian king, Artaxerxes. He secured permission to go to Jerusalem and immediately things began to happen. He organized the populace into building squads and began to build a protective wall. The unfriendly Samaritans plotted violence against him so that he had to organize a defensive system at the same time. He taught his people to watch and pray. He taught them to use building tools with one hand and weapons with the other. Treachery within the city was added to danger from without. Four times his enemies tried to trick him into a dangerous situation but every time Nehemiah evaded their plans. Matters were further complicated by great distress among the people of the city. While they were working on the walls, they were obliged to cease their usual vocations and many of them fell into debt, mortgaging their homes and possessions. When Nehemiah heard of it, he called a meeting and made the creditors cancel their mortgages so as to give the common people a fair chance. At last the wall was completed and dedicated. Then he called for Ezra and held another public meeting. The people were instructed in the law and Nehemiah demanded that they should enter into a solemn covenant to preserve the integrity of their race and the purity of their faith. Signatures of leading citizens were affixed to the document and the crowd gave vocal response as a sign of their allegiance.

In a very business-like way Nehemiah took a survey of the situation and made a census of the city. He found there were only about three thousand adult persons in Jerusalem —too few to carry on civic affairs and defend the city against its enemies. Thereupon he had lots cast among the families living in the neighboring hills, ordering every tenth family to remove its residence within the city walls. So he not only fortified the city but supplied it with a population for defense.

After twelve years of arduous labor he returned to the royal court but as soon as he was out of sight Jerusalem got itself promptly into more difficulties. He returned to find their duties neglected and an epidemic of intermarriage going on with the hostile Samaritans. Nehemiah proceeded to purge the place. Even Manasseh, grandson of the aged high priest, was married to a daughter of the notorious Sanballat, Israel's most persistent enemy. When Manasseh refused to break his Samaritan connection, Nehemiah excommunicated him and sent him about his business. He soon got matters straightened out again and concludes his account with the humble prayer, "Remember me, O my God, for good."

Cheerful Confidences

FOGS

By Rev. Geo. Parkin Atwater

AS I SIT in my study at Grace Church I can hear the whistles of the many boats in New York Harbor. I am only a few hundred feet away from the water's edge, at a point where the East River opens into the Upper Bay. Almost every morning when I turn into the short street in which the parish house is situated I see a great Japanese liner just at the end of the street (which ends abruptly at a bluff). The ship looks as if it were about to come up the street.

But tonight there is a fog overhanging the harbor, and the boats are having a merry time with their fog-horns and whistles. There are toots of every kind and description. I hear long loud growls, short snappy barks, piercing shrieks, and snarly yelps. They are in every key. Boats big and little are trying to make their way through the fog without having a collision. It's rather weird to hear their ceaseless complaining. Otherwise I hear no sound except the ticking of my clock, an occasional automobile, and possibly the closing of a door as some householder returns to his domicile. But the fog-horns continue without cessation.

Chancing to pick up the newspaper which contains the announcements of the religious services in New York I was struck by the very heavy fog that was hanging over the minds of men, through which little puffing tugs would toot their way on Sunday. Fifteen Christian Science services will contribute their bit to the confusion. You can hear a woman speak on "Personal Liberty, or Other Smoke Screens." Divine Science has a meeting in the Church of the Truth. There are to be some addresses in the new Bahai Center. A "New Church" will enlighten the people about the "Second Day of Creation." A Bible Institute will have "A Lenten Luncheon Bible Message." One gentleman advertises that he will preach without manuscript or notes. A Jewish Science Center will answer the question, "What is the Matter with You?" At one meeting in the Hotel Astor, questions will be answered by invisible teachers, by dictation to a visible person. A School of Insight presents "The Socratic Platform." A lady is going to tell "The Truth About Satan."

This is but a slight glimpse of all the talk that will take place tomorrow in New York. Rather foggy place,—this vast metropolis.

But with it all there is a vast amount of earnest, clear and sensible Christian preaching and a vast amount of Christian effort. One is not compelled to wander into the misty swamps for lack of roads or proper guides. But man is by nature speculative, and no doubt some people like to take a flyer into the obscure, the occult, the esoteric and the misty absurdities of grotesque fantasy.

But it is safer to stick to the highways.

About Books

Reviewed by Rev. C. L. Street

A Modern Plea for Christianity
By Louis de Launay
Macmillan, $2.25.

Dr. Delany has done a real service in translating this confession of faith of a great French scientist. The author goes about his work with a simplicity and lucidity which is characteristic of French thought at its best, and throws new light on the old problems of the relation of religion to science, the divinity of Christ, and the nature of the Church and the Sacraments. There is in this book a combination of scientific and theologic learning and simple Catholic piety which is charming.

The Eloquence of Christian Experience
By Raymond Calkins
Macmilan, $2.00.

The Lyman Beecher Lectures at Yale have been the occasion for some notable books on preaching. Mr. Calkins' book is a worthy member of this series. The most important thing for the preacher, he says, is a living experience of Christ. The first half of the book is a careful study of the grounds of Christian experience in the light of modern thought. The second half of this book is an application of this to the problems of preaching, of pastoral work, and of the minister's inner life. The book is an expression of that which is finest in Evangelical Christianity.

Securing Christian Leaders for Tomorrow
By Samuel McCrea Calvert
Doran.

The author of this book, the General Secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, has made a valuable study of the whole matter of the recruiting for Christian service. He points out that training for life service should begin in the home, and go on through the local church, through school, and through college. He makes a plea for intelligent vocational guidance. Any kind of constructive work may be a field for Christian service. In any recruiting program first consideration should be given to the individual rather than to any particular work to be done or any specific position to be filled, There is a valuable biliography, including books on the technique of vocational guidance, and on the opportunities in various fields of work.

Can the Churches Unite?
A Symposium
Published under the auspices of the World Conference on Faith and Order. The Century Company, $1.25.

One of the great events of our decade will be the World Conference on Faith and Order, to be held at Lausanne, Switzerland, from July 31st to August 21st of this year. It is an event for which the churches have long been preparing. It is an event about which Christians of every name should be thinking and studying and praying. The authors of the nineteen brief essays in this volume represent ten different Christian bodies. Mr. F. C. Morehouse, Bishop Anderson and Bishop Brent are among them. The book gives a good idea of the problems involved in Church Unity and of the spirit without which the problems cannot find solution.

May: Yes, in a way.

When Henry Ford, Edison, John Burroughs, and Harvey Firestone set out on their camping trip in the years shortly before the death of the famous naturalist, they had many amusing adventures along the way, some of which Mr. Firestone tells in his autobiography, "Men and Rubber," written in collaboration with Samuel Crowther. Among the tales which he has not printed is this little story of the Ford agent at whose garage they stopped to change a tire. While the work was being done, Mr. Firestone got into conversation with the owner. Thinking that he would be interested in knowing who his customers were, Mr. Firestone said: "The thin gentleman on the right is Henry Ford, who makes all the cars you sell, the white-haired man next him is Thomas A. Edison, who lights them, and I make most of their tires."

"Well," said the Ford agent, glancing at the long-whiskered face of John Burroughs, "I suppose the other one is the Almighty."

An absent-minded professor received a couple of tickets for the opera from a colleague. Finding that he was unable to use them, he rang up some friends and said: "I have a couple of tickets for the opera tonight, but an unfortunate dinner prevents me from attending. Could you use the tickets?"

"We would be glad to do so," was the reply, "but, you see, we happen to be your unfortunate hosts."

STUDDERT-KENNEDY AS A PREACHER

Delivers Two Lenten Sermons

Reported by

REV. A. MANBY LLOYD

IT IS three years since I saw Studdert-Kennedy and he seemed getting thinner, haggard and more ascetic. In the first sermon of his I ever heard he began: "There is a common tradition among anthropologists that man is a descendant of Simian ancestors. When I see myself in the looking-glass I fancy there is something in it." Preaching in Lent at Hereford to a midday congregation of parsons and the bourgeoise, S. K. is quite another story. The essence of life, he began, is the desire to live—the passion to preserve and perpetuate our own existence. "The man who has outlived the desire of life is already dead." This passion, he went on, is stronger in men and women than any other creature, though lower natures "red in tooth and claw" and the savage in the war dance illustrate the elementary stages. It makes men drunk and turns them into wild beasts.

Then there is the passion for dressing up and showing off, the men strutting like peacocks, the women apeing the fan-tailed pigeon. It keeps some in palaces and others in pig-styes, some in fine linen, while others sit in rags and squalor. Then there is the sex passion, popularly supposed to have been turned by the parsons into a sin, but really nothing to make a fuss about. Yet we know that it leads to abominable follies and cruelties. Then there was the passion for getting more and more of anything, perhaps the strongest passion of all.

Now the truth is that our passions are the raw material of a strong character, but leave it raw and it will go rotten. Handled properly, self-assertion passes into self-sacrifice, e.g., the tiger fighting for its kith and kin; life is now bound up with the two little cubs behind her. It is not conscious and it does not last. But in man it is conscious and goes on and on and he dies for his wife and children. It is the raw material of patriotism, when lives are thrown away with reckless joy. The man gives his life while he grabs at life. If there is no one we would die for life is not worth living. We reach out to the higher by throwing away the lower. If your selfishness is satisfied you can rest content. But Jeremiah was prepared to wreck his country to worship goodness, duty and truth. There can be no science, art or society without goodness, beauty (or duty) and truth.

The preacher mentioned the late Lord Shaftesbury, who stood up and faced the scorn of society out of pity for the poor, demanding justice. To him a purposeless, chaotic world was intolerable. In the long run, said Kennedy, it comes to this—you believe in God because you want Him and cannot do without Him. Man is the only creature that has this passion, that longs for goodness and revolts against injustice. "I can make God in my own image because God is making me continually in His own Image."

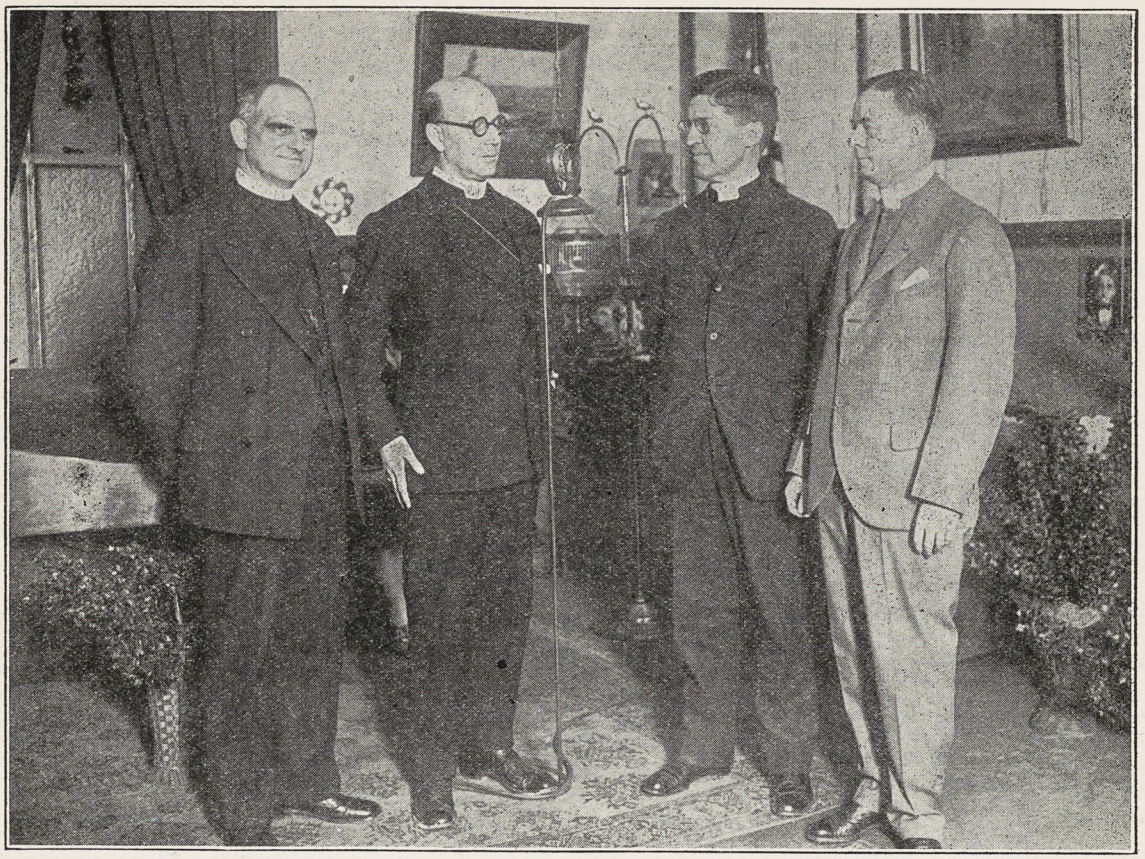
It was not a great sermon, judged by S. K.'s own standards. But it was a live one, full of pathos and poetry. There was but one touch of humor, when he alluded to the parasites who suck the blood of the social organism . . . . "there are plenty of fleas in the world." For the most part he talked with his eyes closed. Perhaps he opened them at that remark and saw the raised eyebrows of the parsons' wives. And that is always a storm signal to the Anglican preacher.

In the evening we had a touch of the real "Woodbine Willie." Atmosphere may not be everything, but it is a factor, and there were more of the horny-handed fellows in evidence and fewer guys in non-stop collars. This alone would add fifty per cent of "pep" to the proceedings. He dealt mainly with the attitude of those outside the Church towards those within. There were, he said, an increasingly large number of men and women who, while anxious to do all they possibly could to uplift the human race, conscientiously felt that the less they had to do with the Christian religion the better it would be for them.



They were not bad men and women by any means, in fact, they very often put lukewarm Christians to shame by the enthusiasm they displayed and the energy they expended in any work they undertook for the good of humanity. One at any rate knew how he stood in relation to some of these, for, as an example, "if Bob Smith at the Pig and Whistle does not want to go to church because in his own church the hymn books have handles to them you know where you are with him." But it made one think seriously in the case of a thoroughly good man who would not go to church. It had to be admitted that religion was not, of necessity, a good thing, as quite the most abominable, vile and filthy crimes had been committed in its name. If they could not learn to be reasonable there was no hope at all for this world, and not much for the next.

The attitude of those outside the Christian religion was displayed in the oft-asked question: "What is the use of you saying you are going to bring peace into the world and do away with wars and industrial strife when you cannot keep peace among yourselves?" It was a kind of "Roman Catholics on the right, Anglicans on the left, and fancy religions in the rear." How were they going to answer this accusation? The "snag" was that they had to keep people from talking religion and politics if they wanted to keep peace. Unfortunately one could not keep off politics or religion either unless one went to a desert island and lived on monkey nuts. The real "snag" was, however, that one did not find a reasonable man in 10,000, and women were worse.

Coming Events

DURING the next few weeks there is to appear in this paper a series of seven articles by The Rev. G. A. Studdert-Kennedy, the famous English rector and author, who is the subject of Manby Lloyd's column in this issue. They deal with current problems of religion and morals and will, we feel, be appreciated by all our readers. In addition there will, of course, be the usual articles and features by the editors. The Bundle will be discontinued in some parishes with the Easter number. If there are any who would like to have the Bundle Plan continued in the parish, we are certain that the rector will be glad to hear from you in regard to it. Urge him to continue it. If he says he cannot, then hand your yearly subscription to the representative of the paper in the parish. In case there is none, mail the $2 directly to THE WITNESS, 6140 Cottage Grove Avenue, Chicago.

NEWS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH

In Brief Paragraphs

Edited by

WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD

SPACE in a little paper like this is ordinarily too precious to allow for the reproduction of such large pictures as the one above, but we do want you to see what Bishops and Deans look like while broadcasting. Here you have two Bishops and a couple of Deans putting a message of the Bishops' Crusade on the air from Los Angeles. In front of the "mike" is Bishop Oldham of Albany, looking just a bit as though he expected an attack from the two canaries perched nearby. The gentleman who made the halftone, a man completely lacking in proper respect, remarked that the Bishop was carefully guarding his pockets, as he should in such company. Yes, he was properly rebuked for saying such a thing. Anyhow, Bishop Stevens of Los Angeles, at the left, appears quite jubilant, due, no doubt, to the fact that for him the ordeal is at an end; while the two Deans, Ludlow of Topeka, Kansas, and Beal of Los Angeles, as is apt to be the case with gifted speakers, are encouraging the Bishop to finish in order that they may divide the remaining three and a half minutes of the allotted time.

The House of Bishops is to have a special meeting on June 1st, in New York City. The meeting is called, following the assent of twelve bishops, to act upon the resignation of Bishop Thurston of Oklahoma, and possibly to elect his successor. Provision is made in the call, issued by the Presiding Bishop, for the transaction of any other business that may lawfully be presented at a special session.

Bishop Creighton of Mexico ordained five Mexican young men to the diaconate on March 6th in Christ Church Cathedral, Mexico City. It was an unusual service, and a very significant one due to the present state of religious affairs in that country.

They had a church building at Glendale, Long Island, but not much else—not even pews. And no money. But they have a beautifully equipped church now, with altar, reredos, pews, altar rail, credence table and all. They made them all themselves, the men, all working class folks, giving their time in order to beautify their church. The Rev. J. Hill Johnson is in charge.

Since the diocesan convention in Olympia over $6,000 has been pledged to parishes and missions on the diocesan apportionment in addition to the amounts originally promised. As a result, the work which was feared would be given up in the mission field of the diocese is to be continued.

The Rev. Elmore M. McKee, in resigning as the rector of St. Paul's, New Haven, to become the pastor of the interdenominational church of Yale University, was called upon to make a difficult decision. He has been the rector of St. Paul's but three years, yet during that time the historic church has been re-established as one of the stronger parishes of the city. He is, in a real sense, forsaking his own creation. That he has arrived at the right decision is the opinion of all who understand the opportunities of the work at Yale, particularly in these days of uncertain faith. He takes up his new work with the enthusiastic support of President Angell and with the blessing of the Bishop of the Diocese, Bishop Brewster.

The rector of Grace Church, New York, was the preacher last week at the service in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine when a chandelier made of hand-cut Bohemian glass was presented by the government of Czechoslovakia to the Cathedral. He said, after telling the story of John Huss: "We ought to listen with reverent teachableness for the possible prophetic truth from the unexpected voice. We are often impatient of the man who would lead thought into unfamiliar paths. We brush him one side as an extremist. We label him with convenient opprobrums—a radical, a bolshevik, a pacifist, a red. Of course, there is no certainty that the odd man may be right, but neither is there any certainty that he may be wrong, and, in any case, we cannot tell whether he is wrong or right if we simply plaster on a label as a smug excuse for not facing the facts with thought. It may be that men who at first must stand alone will lead the Church and the nation to larger wisdom. Some voice that speaks, more bravely than the majority, of human justice, of the power of sacrifice in the social order, or of the power of faith to end the curse of war, may blow the enchanted horn before which shall open the gates of the mightier day."

The Bishops of China report that everyone is safe there. Bishop Huntington cables that "the situation in Wuhu is not so bad as has been represented in newspaper dispatches. Absolutely no cause for anxiety or alarm. Japanese steamers are running regularly on the Yangtze. There is no necessity for leaving stations at the present time." And from Bishop the Diocese of Olympia providing for Roots: "Passenger steamers for Shanghai leave Hankow almost daily. Four American, six English, five other naval vessels in port. I am keeping in close touch with American Consul and other authorities and consider it would be safer for women and children to remain in Hankow for the present. If necessary, we can leave on short notice." And from Bishop Graves: "Everybody in Shanghai safe."

The Rev. R. Ambrose Reeves of England has just concluded an eight-day mission at St. Peter's, Chelsia Square, New York, the Rev. Thomas Cline, rector. Students of the General Theological Seminary took an active part in the mission and held street meetings on the corner of 8th Avenue and 20th Street. Special afternoon meetings were held for the children.

Bishop Griswold was the chief speaker at the Round Table, the organization for the clergy in Chicago, at the meeting on March 21st. His subject was "Confirmation and the Pontifical Offices." The Rev. Peter Langendorf of Hammond, Indiana, spoke on "The Dioconate, Minor Orders and Lay-reading." About fifty clergymen were present.

Mr. Bedros Hagopian, until recently, was a student at the General Theological Seminary. Then, at the request of the Armenian Archbishop, he offered himself to the Armenian Church. This year he has been a student in the Armenian Seminary in Jerusalem. He was ordained deacon on March 20th, the Armenian Patriach officiating.

Meeting of the Church School Institute was held at Plymouth, Indiana, on March 13th, with folks present from Elkhart, Goshen and South Bend. The discussion was led by Miss Vera Rooney on the method of conducting drills, reviews and examinations in Church Schools.

A few months ago a questionnaire was passed around to the students in a western college asking for the reasons why they went to church. Eighty-five per cent turned in answers. The six chief reasons given were music, worship, parents, conscience, habit and sermons. Answers from the men showed the predominating reason to be worship, while the largest number of answers from the women showed music as the leading reason. In both instances sermons fell into sixth place. In other words, these young people go to church for devotional purposes more than for any other. They do not go to be harangued.

There is some real stuff on tap, including articles by Woodbine Willie, in which he deals with such matters as Revolution, Romance, The Ten Commandments, Marx vs. Moses, Gambling, Love. There is a real assortment of titles for you. Then, of course, there is to be the usual articles by the editors. Costs you but three cents a copy. The sheet isn't anything to blow about, but, at that, you could easily pay a lot more for less. Better continue to give your folks a chance to read it. Let us know as soon as you can, please.

The rector of St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg, Pa., the Rev. Dr. William Porkess has a vestry that certainly functions in a rather comprehensive way. Nine in all there are. Without an exception, they can be seen regularly at the services of the Church. Also specific service for the Church characterizes each man. Further, they are systematic givers, through the use of the weekly envelope. On recent Sundays, in connection with the parish's financial effort, six of these men gave ten-minute addresses from the chancel steps, under the general theme of, "A Comprehensive and Wholesome View of the Church." They spoke most convincingly, with the following titles in mind: "What a Parish Treasurer Sees and Knows," "The Functions of a Vestry," "Fundamental Knowledge of One's Parish," "Visualizing the Diocese," "The Church and Young People," "The National Church's Conscience."

STANDARDS OF SERVICE

Last of the Lenten Series

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

THE Christian life is not what so many people think it is. It is not merely being good according to the popular standards of moral conduct. Morality is the soil of Christianity but it is not the flower or the fruit. Christ takes morality for granted and then plants the seed of eternal life in the soil thus prepared. The Christian life is something different from the conduct of the natural man. "The natural man receiveth not the things of God for they are foolishness unto him." "Except ye be born again, ye cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven." This means, if it means anything, that in Christ we become new creatures, using all that we had before and putting on in addition that which Christ alone possessed.

His Righteousness

We are to seek the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and except our righteousness exceed the righteousness of mere legal performance, we cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven. In short, the righteousness of Christ is something higher than the morals of a good pagan; it is quite different from the morals of Socrates or Marcus Aurelius. It is as different as the attitude of a good son toward his father and the attitude of an excellent servant toward his master.

In the service of Christ there are two fundamental rules: "Thou shalt love God" and "Thou shalt love thy neighbor." This touches the motive behind Christian worship and Christian service. Each of these has God for its center. The Christian worships God because He is our Father; not because we are in debt to Him.

The Motive

The motive is love of a person; not payment of a debt. The Christian serves his brother because he is a blood relation. The motive is friendship for men, not patronage of them. The whole process is a change of heart, not merely a gesture of benevolence. Outwardly the things done look just alike. Inwardly they are quite different.

Marcus Aurelius was a good Emperor. He did many excellent things. He put Christians to death because they were obstinate. He was glad to help his fellow-men, but he did not love them. One doesn't execute a brother for obstinacy.

Organized Charity

Organized Charity does the same thing as the Christian Church has been trying to do for many centuries. Some think it does it better. But the poor are not misled. The poor realize that Organized Charity will help them. It never enters their heads that the average executive secretary loves them. Somehow a card index casts out love. What difference does it make as long as they are helped? It makes a lot of difference in the ultimate character of the one who writes the check and of the one who gets the order for groceries. In each case the benefit is one of temporary expediency, in which the giver gets out of trouble and the receiver either loses his self-respect and becomes an expert in circumventing investigation, or else he is forced into self-support. But there is no personal affection on the part of the giver and no affectionate gratitude on the part of the receiver.

The woman who was a sinner would never have broken a box of ointment over the feet of Organized Charity.

Don't misunderstand me. Organized Charity is good. We probably could not get on without it in our complex civilization, but it is not Christian any more than the street cleaning department is Christian. For Christian service involves personal contact in which the poor give more than they receive. Lazarus could have given Dives eternal life if Dives had thought it worth while to give Lazarus a little personal attention. To have sent a check to the Temple treasury for the relief of the genus, Lazarus, would have made the situation more decent, but it would scarcely inspire Dives with very much love for Lazarus.

It may be that some day an ingenious yankee will invent an electrical device for rearing children, and I have no doubt that many children will fare better than they do now, but such a device will not tend to develop strong filial love. Of course electricity may be a more potent factor than love, but it isn't quite so human.

A New Creature

Christ has a purpose which looks ahead further than Marcus Aurelius. Marcus wanted a decent world; Christ wants a new soul in man. Science wants to improve our habitations, our bodies, our social relations and that is good as far as it goes. Christ wants a new creature in order that he may populate a new heaven and a new earth. It is a different purpose and therefore employs a different method. Many men are not particularly interested in their own souls and so can scarcely be expected to have an interest in the souls of others. They are frankly satisfied with themselves, with good government and pleasant sensations.

Of course they do not get the mind of Christ. He is chiefly concerned with making us sons of God; and they are satisfied with transitory things. They cannot and do not look at things alike. And yet one who studies the past must remember that Roger Bacom in the 13th Century had an intuition of many modern inventions. They regarded him as a dangerous man. Jules Verne seemed to have hunches about things under the sea and around the world. Benjamin Franklin saw things electrical that proved to be astonishing. Christ saw possibilities in human life which found a response in millions of men.

Who can say that human intuitions and aspirations are not the work of the same Creator who made the mechanical universe? And who can say that a mechanical device for raising children would be a desirable substitute for the parental relation, even though it raised them more correctly? Who can weigh or measure the value of those intimate relations between mother and daughter, between friend and friend, between Christ and men? Who can evaluate love in terms of efficiency or substitute a completely electrified mansion for a wonderfully affectionate home? We cannot estimate the love of God and man in terms of organized efficiency, because it is a different kind of a thing altogether.

Christian Service

The standard of Christian Service involves certain things which the "practical" man doesn't know because he doesn't value them. There are many men of whom one can say in terms of the Rule of three: As Babbitt is to them so are they to Christ. There are numbers of spiritual Babbitts living on the Main Street of big business, who are supremely unconscious that they are not all there. They lack just that which Christ emphasizes. In Christian Service, there is a motive and without that motive our service is lacking in reality. St. Paul gives us the motive, taken from the laboratory of his own experience, "The love of Christ constraineth me."

Back of any service we render is personal devotion to Christ which makes the giving of a cup of cold water or the offering of two mites, a spiritual act.

The Spirit

Here the value is not in the material thing but in the animating spirit, which gives what it can, but gives because it loves. In Christian Service there is a purpose which glorifies and sustains the giver. It is that we may grow into the likeness of Christ who loved all men at all times; not just a few men some of the time. It involves forgiveness of offenders, endurance of bores, and the avoidance of advertisement. It is done to be seen of God and the less men know about it the better.

The Reason

Why? Because the less we put forward the Ego, the less danger there is that we become enamoured of self instead of God. There is a method in Christian Service. It is the way of the Cross, to deny ourselves and to take up our cross and to go on with cheerfulness and kindliness to the tasks that await us. A sour, stingy or sullen Christian is like a chorister who is singing out of tune. He ruins the anthem. A Christian is one who does things quietly, unostentatiously, persistently. Because he loves his Master he does the things that his Master commanded him to do.

Duties

He observes the Lord's Day by attending the Eucharist. He accepts and does not seek to avoid the work that he is requested to do by those who have the right to ask it of him, and when he accepts a task, he does it faithfully and cheerfully, as unto the Lord and not to men. He is no respecter of persons and treats the janitor with as much courtesy as he treats the bishop. He is not talkative about what he does or the recognition that he fails to receive, but is content to serve under the Master's Eye. He gives of his time and money as generously as he can with due reference to his other obligations in life, and is rather concerned with how much he can do than he is with what others are doing. He seeks private fellowship with Christ in the same spirit and with the same frequency as he would consult a friend. He lives to honor God rather than to advertise himself.

HOLY WEEK AND EASTER

The Light of the Cross. Frank L. Vernon, D. D., Litt. D. Morehouse $.75.

The dominant theme of these Good Friday addresses is the Illusion of the Irreparable. In fact, we might say the addresses in their entirety comprise one symphonic sermon, the treatment of each of the Last Words being used as variations of the symphonic theme. There are flashes of rhetorical beauty, mystical insight, and moral sternness on almost every page. We can readily believe that the most abandoned, hopeless person who was privileged to hear these addresses last Good Friday must have been encouraged to feel that every situation can be faced, and that the worst have a way out and a way home.

The Radiant Tree. Marguerite Wilkinson. Macmillan $2.50.

This is a collection of poems on the Passion and Resurrection of Christ taken from all the different periods in our own literature and in that of Great Britain, with an introduction telling something of the meaning of these grandest of all human experiences in the lives of modern Christians. "The Radiant Tree" is the Cross which acquired its radiance on the first Easter Day.

Spenser, Herbert, Crashaw, Vaughan, Herrick, and other poets of the past are represented with such modern singers as Christina Rossetti, Sidney Lanier, and Sarah Cleghorn.

"The Radiant Tree" is planned as a companion volume for "Yule Fire," Mrs. Wilkinson's Christmas book, and is illustrated in a similar way by George M. Richards.

Meditation and Mental Prayer. Rev. Wilfred L. Knox, M. R. Gorham $1.50.

A Place Called Gethsemane. A. C. Buchanan. Macmillan.

Our Father's Business. James Thayer Addison. Doran $1.00.

Everyday Prayers. Published by Doran $1.25.

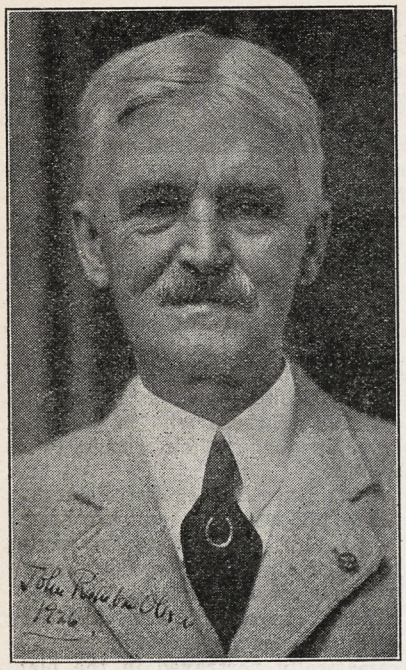
Meditation is a valued but very much neglected Christian activity. It is neglected partly because it is hard work, and partly because most of us don't know how to go about it. Father Knox's book is interesting and practical. It will not only tell you how to make a meditation, but, what is more important, will make you want to do it.

A Place Called Gethsemane is a series of meditations on our Lord's Passion and Resurrection, beautifully written and appropriate for devotional use, especially during Holy Week.

Professor Addison's book contains readings for every day in Lent. It is modern in the best sense and has a real social emphasis. But one wonders at certain omissions—as that of the Palm Sunday story for the "Sunday next before Easter," and mention of the Eucharist in connection with Maundy Thursday.



Everyday Prayers is a collection of brief prayers from many different sources, prepared by a sub-committee of the Schools Department of the Student Christian Movement. The selections have been well made, and there is a helpful subject index in the back of the book.

BOOKS ON THE CHURCH

Elementary Christianity. Cyril Alington, D. D. Headmaster of

JOHN RATHBONE OLIVER
Doctor, Churchman, Author

Eton College. Longman's Green and Co. $1.00.

Today there is a wide diffusion of the Christian Spirit and yet there never was a time when our religious faith was more acutely questioned. The opinion of the average layman is that everything is going wrong, and that the average parson is either ignorant or mentally dishonest. There are laymen who are disturbed by the views which modern science has discarded as obsolete, and for want of accurate knowledge often carry their crude conceptions of religion to the grave.

The purpose of Elementary Christianity is to meet in a limited way this modern situation and enable the perplexed layman to give an intelligent reason for the faith that is in him. Within the pages of this book he will discover that unless he believes that the Truth is strong and prevails he has no claim to the title of Christian. Further, he will find out that the Christian Creed is to be tested by experience, and that the Spirit which is to guide us into all truth is not a Christian monopoly—to claim it as such has had disastrous reactions. The Bishop of London wrote the introduction to this book before he started on his trip around the world, and before the book had been written, but we can assure him that his confidence has not been misplaced. Dr. Alington has given us a useful and helpful book.

WHAT IS THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION? Edward L. Parsons, D.D., Bishop of California. Morehouse $1.00.

Bishop Parsons of California with the simplicity of greatness, and a true catholicity of spirit tells us in these four addresses, What Is the Christian Religion? He realizes that he can only touch the edge of so great a theme. Nevertheless, his touch is sure and convincing. He says in substance that the mark of a Christian is that the ultimate values in his life are made by Christ. It is a life spontaneous, free; a life whose motive power comes from within rather than from without. This life is linked up with an institution that is divine. For the Church is divine because it is so altogether and inevitably human—human because the Great Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ entering into human life can reveal full meaning for human life only in a society. And finally, this life so lived is transformed. Indeed, when one would speak of the transforming power which has come into the world with Christ, the difficulty which faces one is not to find instances of that power, but to choose among them.

JESUS: THE WAY, THE TRUTH, THE LIFE. The Rev. W. Arthur Wesley, B. A. Morehouse $1.25.

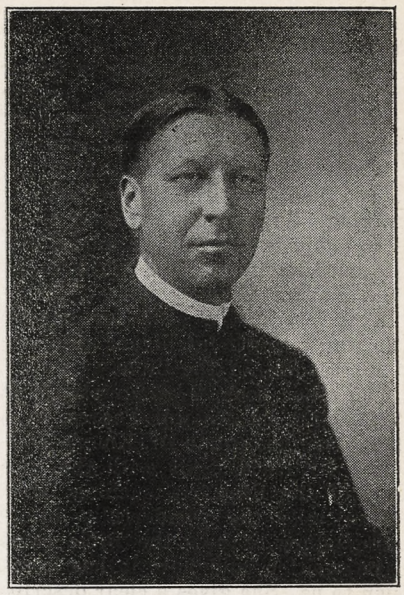
It was once reported that the reason a certain clergyman of distinction was not elected to an important office in the church was that the Liberals and Evangelicals suspected him of being a Catholic, and the Catholics knew that he was not a Catholic. Be that as it may, there is evidently some confustion in the minds of both parties as to what constitutes an Anglo-Catholic.

Jesus: The Way, the Truth, the Life is a very sane exposition of Anglo-Catholic teaching, which may serve a double purpose. For those who are willing to do some thinking and not merely rearrange their prejudices, this book will clear away a great deal of misunderstanding on the part of the so-called Liberals, and enable them to interpret sympathetically the Anglo-Catholic movement. It will also clarify the minds of not a few of the avowed adherents of the movement, and save some from the alleged absurdities of the extremists.

The word Anglo-Catholic is an admittedly ugly word. It is, however, accepted as a penance by those who style themselves such for past neglect of definite teaching on the part of our church. This readable little book will give you a balanced idea of what that teaching ought to be from an Anglo-Catholic point of view.



Irvine Goddard.

RELIGION AND MEDICINE

FEAR: THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF JAS. EDWARDS. James Rathbone Oliver. Macmillan $2.50.

This fictional autobiography is an intensely human and gripping story of a man of large affairs, who, when refused additional life insurance develops a fear neurosis. The first half of the book is a graphic description of the disintegrating power of this fear neurosis on an otherwise strong and commanding personality. The latter half is an intimate and realistic depiction of the rehabilitation and reintegration of this personality at the hands of modern medicine and modern religion. More often than not in historical and medical novels we find neither history, medicine, nor literature. But "Fear" is a gratifying exception. It is an arresting piece of fine writing, and the mental medicine is sound. Once you open the book you will be tempted not to lay it down until you finish it.

BOOKS ON THE BIBLE

KNOWING THE BIBLE. Raymond C. Knox. Macmillan $2.50.

THE SCRIPTURES IN THE MAKING. Abigail Pearce. Macmillan $2.00.

Here are two books of exceptional value to the layman who wants to know what the gist of the Bible is, and how the Bible came to be.

Dr. Knox is a Churchman and Chaplain of Columbia University. His contact with students has taught him how to present the Bible in a way that will awaken their interest. He is thoroughly conversant with the modern view of the Scriptures, but does not fall into the slough of pedantry. In the few pages which he is able to give to each book, he makes clear just what this particular writer was trying to say and do. He gives just enough of the historical circumstances of the time of each writer to enable the modern reader to grasp the message.

The book is good reading in itself, but its value is increased by the question outline which follows each chapter. The questions are suggestive and will enable the student to get at the heart of the Bible writer's meaning. Suggestions are also given as to subjects for further study, and reference readings are advised to the one following these.

A very valuable book for anyone who wants to get intelligent guidance in his reading of the Bible.

The other book, The Scriptures in th Making, by Abigail Pearce, is a fitting complement to Dr. Knox's book. While Dr. Knox deals with the contents of the Bible as teaching, Miss Pearce tells the wonderfully interesting story of how the Bible came to be written and how it has come down to us. She gives a clear description of the gradual crystallization of the sacred literature into a canon, and shows how the increased historical knowledge gained during the past generation has helped us to understand it.

The section on the New Testament is specially interesting. In a very few pages it is made clear how the Gospels came to be written and the relationship between them. She discusses the apocryphal Gospels and explains the formation of the New Testament canon. The layman will find delightful reading in the chapter on "The Romance of the Early Manuscripts" and also in the story of the various versions of the Bible that have been current. D. A. McGregor.

JESUS AND HIS BIBLE. George Holley Gilbert, Ph. D., D. D. Macmillan, New York.

The thesis of this book is that the Church's conception of the relation of the Old Testament to the New Testament as summed up in Augustine's famous couplet:

The New Testament in the Old is concealed
The Old Testament in the New is revealed, is not to be found in Our Lord's words nor is it in harmony with his use of the Scriptures, but is a development of Apostolic days.

The thesis is supported by a critical examination of the Gospels. The author finds that in the Logia and in Mark, we have all the essential features of Jesus' use of the Old Testament. He knew it, regarded it, taught its ethical concepts, used his critical faculties in the interpretation of it. He recognized a Messianic element in it but personally appropriated this to himself only once in Mark and not at all in the Logia. The authority with which he spoke was not based upon the Old Testament, either in itself, or as supporting him as the

ABIGAIL PEARCE
Writes About the Bible

Messiah. It was an authority of inner conviction and manifest truth.

In Matthew's Gospel, Dr. Gilbert finds the idea of Jesus as the fulfillment of the Old Testament emphasized, and he traces the development of this idea through Luke and John and the Epistles of Paul to its fulfillment in the Epistle to the Hebrews, the examining being carried through these last two in an appendix. This development the author considers as due to the interest of the later writers in the relation of Scripture to the life of Jesus, an interest so keen that the writer of the fourth Gospel attributes it to Our Lord, too, and he feels that it is altogether out of harmony with Christ's use of the Old Testament.

Dr. Gilbert believes it important to recover this original use of the Scriptures by Our Lord not only for the help it gives in New Testament interpretation but also that the Christian world may copy it and thereby lay the spectre of fundamentalism.

James Foster.

SOME OTHER BOOKS

NEWMAN AS A MAN OF LETTERS. Joseph J. Reilly. Macmillan $2.50.

For those who have eyes to see and ears to hear, John Henry Newman is one of the most fascinating figures in eccelsiastical history. One of the most genuine of men, he is thrown constantly into dramatic situations. Quiet, retiring, aloof—what would he have thought of modern ecclesiastical publicity?—he was compelled in self-defense not only to write the story of his life, but to lay bare the inner workings of his mind. Always a gentleman, he was brought into contact with Manning, who was always a politician. Perhaps this contact was most conspicuous when it consisted in studied avoidance of one another. The flower of Oxford Anglicianism, it led him into a strange land, where he passed long uncomplaining years of neglect and total lack of understanding.

Dr. Reilly's book is concerned, not with Newman's theology nor with his ecclesiastical position, but with his literary life. Arthur Rogers.

VIGIL OF THE FIRST EASTER, by Mrs. Harlan Cleveland. Morehouse Pub. Co. A memorial to her son, the Rev. Stanley Matthews Cleveland.

A series of meditations on the characters involved in the passion of our Lord, interpreted as men representative of those who in this day, play their part in their witness to the Saviour.

Judas, the selfish egotist, Peter, 'the quarry pit, whence we all are hewn'; Thomas, the pragmatist; the twelve, typical of all human bewilderment in the great crises of life.

These characters are admirably sketched in each foreword and then dramatically portrayed in the blank verse of the narrative.

A very admirable delineation of the motives and scenes surrounding the passion, suitable for meditation in Holy Week and Easter.

It is fresh and original. I. P. J.

CHANGING BACKGROUNDS IN RELIGION AND ETHICS. H. Wilder Carr. Macmillan $2.00.

In the short space allotted to us we can hardly do justice to this very illuminating and challenging metaphysical meditation by one of Henri Bergson's ardent disciples. It is stiff reading, and yet just the book to enable us to make up our minds as to what the principle of evolution demands in a philosophic and religious reflection. If we are idealists we must be clear in our apprehension as to what is the content of an ideal. Sometimes an idealism may be nothing but a flattering name for indolence. The loose optimism of Browning's "What I aspired to be and was not, comforts me" can become mental dope instead of a stimulus to moral and intellectual endeavor.

Changing Backgrounds in Religion and Ethics is a very lucid exposition of how the progress of science has brought with it a complete subversion of the mediaeval concepts of substance and cause. The theory of evolution has completely altered the basis of the traditional religious concepts and antiquated the venerable superstructure. Dr. Carr maintains that in attacking the problem of religion and ethics we must no longer try to harmonize natural science with the old religious concepts, but reform our concepts of God in accordance with our progress in interpreting and knowledge of the physical world. Irvine Goddard.

THE BIG STORY

The Gospel According to a Newspaper Man

BY IRWIN ST. JOHN TUCKER

WHAT about this matter of inspiration? To me it seems simple. It is like what happens to a reporter who comes into possession of some tremendous bit of news. His first impulse is to get to his paper with fullest possible details, and get there first. He tries to be accurate as well as complete. But before all, the first thing is to flash the news. Reporters will undergo peril and risk death to cover a big story. I have never known one who falsified the news intentionally. That is done, if done at all, by command of the editorial higher-ups.

THE GOOD NEWS

Well, the word for Gospel is "evangel"— good news. That burning hunger to tell the good news drove the apostles around the world. It nerved them on to face danger and certain death. They had an exclusive story. They had—as the expression goes—the world scooped. And any newspaper man who has ever felt the thrill and tingle of that possession knows there is no thrill quite like it.

This quality of a good news story accompanies the Gospel all the way down through its history. There have been men, it is true, who tried to "sell their tips" to use this inside information for private profit. But as every good newspaper gets rid of such men as soon as it detects them in a general shake-up, so the Chief seems always to have had a supply of new men whom he could break in to cover the story, as all good stories must be covered, for the sake of the news and not for the sake of the pay.

WHAT IS THE NEWS?

Thus the inspiration of the Scripture is the inspiration of a big news break. But what is the news? Just what is the bigness of this story which has had so much telling, and never seems to go stale?

Is it merely that there was an amiable young man who loved everybody? Is it that there was a coiner of maxims, of good "selling slogans," who raised a riot in a big church by whipping out the senior vestrymen, and got killed for it? That would be news for about one day, and not very big news at that. What is the excitement about?

Looking at this story from a news standpoint, many little things that may have perplexed one, fall into their place and perspective, as details subsidiary to the main interest, If he was what the Gospels assert him to he, He must have known what was important, and what was not, about His own message. Therefore the question of how he was born is not of the essence of the Gospel, however interesting the question may be. If it had been, he would have stated it.

But if the matter of his birth was not particularly vital, the manner of his death is. To that his message refers constantly. The manner of his death is almost the dominating factor in his life. From the moment his cousin John said, "Behold the Lamb of God," his doom was fixed.

In this matter of the lamblikeness of Jesus we have completely lost the point. When one spoke to a Hebrew of his time of a Lamb of God, he did not think of a gentle little animal gamboling on the green. He thought of a lamb on fire, killed as a sacrifice and burning on an altar. The Lambs of God were the temple flock down at Bethlehem, raised and nurtured carefully to be offered in the Temple at Jerusalem to take away the sin of the nation.

In the book of the revelation, reference is made to the "Song of Moses and the Lamb." The only time Moses is mentioned specifically in connection with a lamb is when he ordered a lamb killed, and his blood sprinkled on the doorpost of each family. By virtue of that blood they escaped death and slavery. Then when they had made their passover, and had heard the thunder and seen the lightning for the first time in generations (there are no clouds, and no thunder nor rain in Egypt) and had accepted the covenant, Moses sprinkled blood upon the altar and upon the people, and said, "Behold the blood of the Covenant, which the Lord hath made with you."

THE NEW COVENANT

On the night in which he was betrayed, Jesus took bread; and when he had given thanks, he broke it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, "Take, eat; this is my body; which is given for you; do this in remembrance of me. Likewise after supper he took the cup; and when he had given thanks, he gave it to them, saying: drink ye all of this, for this is my blood of the new covenant, which is shed for you and for many for the remission of sins. Do this in remembrance of me."

The essence of the Old Covenant was that the mob of escaped slaves there pledged themselves to follow the God Yahweh, who had called them out of slavery, and none other. He was to be their God, they were to be his people; and the contract was signed in blood. It was renewed daily in blood, the blood of two lambs, offered morning and evening upon the altar. For a thousand years it was so offered. But for two thousand years it has not been offered, neither in Jerusalem nor anywhere in the world.

The first recorded words of Jesus were spoken at the Passover Feast the year he was twelve, and had come up to the Temple to be made a son of the law; or, as we would say, confirmed. "Knew ye not I would be in my Father's house?" At the same feast his cousin, John, six months older than himself, must have come to be confirmed. John, the son of a priest, was himself a priest. He would therefore have the run of the Temple. Jesus, his cousin, and he, having met for the first time, naturally they would wander around Jerusalem together, as boys will, viewing the great throngs of Jews from every nation under heaven assembled for the celebration. Delegations were there from Britain and China, from South Africa and North Germany, and from every place where Roman arms had been followed by Greek trade and Hebrew finance. All across the Mount of Olive and through the valleys and hilltops their campfires must have gleamed. There the two boys must have pledged allegiance to the cause which fired them both. There they saw the Passover Lamb, slain to take away the sin of Israel. And when John saw Jesus again, eighteen years later, at the passage of the Jordan, his first words were, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world!"

John, as a priest, laid hands upon his cousin and sanctified him to his death, as a sacrifice.

HIS UNDERSTANDING

Jesus was always prophesying his death. His parables show clearly his understanding of the doom which awaited him: as in the story of the husbandmen who slew the son of the lord of the vineyard. "Destroy this temple, and in three days will I raise it up." Nine-tenths of all that his immediate followers wrote about him centered around his death, and the manner of his dying, and his rising again. Omit these and you have left out the story.

What was there different about this death of Jesus from the deaths of Moses, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekial, James or John? Why should it be the

NEWS FROM THE WESTERN DIOCESES

In Brief Paragraphs

Edited by

BISHOP W. BERTRAND STEVENS

AMONG Coast visitors during the past month has been the Bishop of Athabasca, Dr. Robins, who has been preaching in a number of important parishes. In spite of the many pressing needs of his own diocese he has come to appeal for another work, that of the Mackenzie River district. Certain of the Canadian dioceses whose bishops were formerly supported by the English Church Missionary Society have been without adequate funds for Episcopal support. Bishop Robins' visit is a beautiful venture on his part to try to secure an endowment of modest proportions to enable the Church in Canada to proceed with the election of a Bishop for the remote Mackenzie River field.

Tabor College has friends in the Diocese of Los Angeles who are trying to further its interests. A "Friend of Tabor" movement has been organized under the leadership of Mr. Robert Redenbaugh, a graduate of Tabor, and a former Registrar of the institution. Iowa Churchmen of whom there are many in California, ought to show a special interest. Long Beach, California, is sometimes facetiously referred to as the capital of the State of Iowa.

Reports of the recent convocation of the Missionary District of Eastern Oregon refer to it as "the best and most helpful ever experienced in the district." It was held in Hood River and was marked by a special emphasis on the Bishops' Crusade, an ordination to the Priesthood, and the licensing of three men as lay readers.

The key note of the three days' gathering was sounded by Bishop Remington in his annual address to convocation. Here was to be found a statesman-like view of the conditions in the world at large and the important part the Church is to take to adjust matters for the coming generations. "It would seem," said the Bishop, in part, "as though humanity was becoming hungry and thirsty for the Bread and Water of life, but they have not yet discovered where to find gratification of their appetites. We should be deeply thankful for this evidence of religious interest, and then should ask ourselves, as an integral part of the Church, whose business it is to satisfy the soul hungether of mankind, whether we have been giving them a stone when they asked for bread, or a scorpion when they asked for fish." And, continuing, and emphasizing that the Church and only the Church can fulfill the desires and heart hunger of the people, the Bishop said, "..... if the Church can be fully converted, one day those on the outside will take knowledge of those on the inside that they have been with Jesus.....Jesus did claim that all power had been given unto Him both in heaven and on earth, but that power was the compulsion of an inner ideal. He insisted that men should be born again; in other words, that they should enter into a realm of experience which made them conscious of a character and a destiny which was of God and eternity rather than of material things." Begging for a return to the fundamental principles of Jesus, Bishop Remington said he believed if Christians only could set themselves to that ideal, the fruits gained in bringing souls to Christ would be beyond human comprehension.

The use of lay readers is increasing in California. Some of the strongest parishes began as little missions under the devoted ministrations of laymen. At the present time the Diocese of Los Angeles has seven missions that are administered by laymen work ing under the direction of the general missionary. A special collar has been adopted with a bronze cross as their distinguishing vestment. A strong lay-readers' league meets monthly to consider problems of general interest. Already two members of the league have proceeded to ordination to the Diaconate.

Building operations have begun on the new Scripps College for Women at Claremont, California. This institution, it will be remembered, is a unit in the new Claremont Colleges plan and although non-sectarian in character it numbers five communicants of the Church among its trustees. The buildings are to be of the Mediterranean type. The new rector at Pomona, which is four miles from Claremont, is the Rev. B. L. Warren, formerly of Walla Walla, Washington, where he had a large and successful contact with the students of Whitman College. He succeeds the Rev. Stephen C. Clarke Jr., now rector of St. Mark's, Pasadena.

The Bishops' Crusade in the Diocese of Los Angeles has been an unqualified success, marred only by the failure of the California weather to behave. Torrential storms prevented the overflowing attendance at St. Paul's Cathedral that we anticipated, but large congregations were present to bear the inspiring messages and instructions of Bishop Oldham of Albany, Dean Ludlow of Topeka and Miss Emily Tillotson of the National Council. The week after the Crusade at the Cathedral a Mission was held at St. John's Church by Father Palmer, S. S. J. E., another at Trinity Church, Santa Barbara, by Dean Beal; another at St. Stephen's, Hollywood, by the Rev. William Cowans; another at the Church of the Angels, Los Angeles, by the Rev. M. L. Kain, and numerous others.

Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts last October opened a series of students' conferences at the Messiah, Boston. During the winter seven conferences have been held with 1200 different students attending. The largest attendance at any one meeting was 600. The series was closed last Sunday when Bishop Lawrence led on "Changes in Thinking About Religion."

Notice

THE management of THE WITNESS will appreciate it if those having news items about Western dioceses and missionary districts will send them to Bishop Stevens, 619 South Figueroa Street, Los Angeles, California. It is his purpose to cover the news in that part of the country that is commonly spoken of as Western and your aid is solicited. Kindly send him items, diocesan papers and parish papers. We also urge rectors in the West, as well as elsewhere, to appoint a WITNESS representative for the parish to take charge either of the BUNDLE PLAN or to solicit subscriptions upon which we allow a commission of twenty-five per cent.

NEWS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH

In Brief Paragraphs

Edited by

WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD

THE picture of the last Supper is a scene from a moving picture of the life of Our Lord, The King of Kings, soon to be released; first showing to be in New York on Good Friday. The picture is a great piece of cinema art and is sure to appeal to vast audiences. It was produced by Cecil B. DeMille, who is, incidentally, an Episcopalian, at a cost of two and one half million dollars. Other pictures, taken from this production, will be shown in THE WITNESS next week.

We have been having quite an exciting time in the little town that I live in near New York. It seems that a couple of Chinamen came there sometime back and opened a laundry. Somehow or other they got the idea into their heads that it was not necessary for them to obey the laws of the town, insisting always that while they were inside their laundry they were to be guided by the laws of China. Naturally enough the folks in the town got rather excited over it, particularly the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution and the boys at the Legion Post. The other night they had a meeting at the Post and the boys decided that they were going to throw the "Chinks" out of their laundry. When they got there, however, they were faced with a couple of machine guns, and instead of two "Chinks" they faced a company of Chinese marines, who had come up from New York at the request of the laundrymen. To add to the difficulties these Chinamen had persuaded the Greeks who run the candy store on the corner to take the same position; likewise the Italian fellows over on Third Street, a couple of first-rate boys who for a number of years now have been supplying us with whatever we cared to order. I had always supposed those fellows to be good law-abiding chaps. Pretty mess, with machine guns sticking out of their front windows at the crowd of Legion boys.

But it all had its funny side—the next thing we knew, Joe Western, our chief of police, came on the scene with five of his finest; said the "Chinks" had called him on the 'phone and demanded protection. Imagine that—these "Chinks," refusing to be governed by the laws of our town, and with machine guns pointed at the heads of a bunch of hundred per cent Americans, had the nerve to call up the police and demand protection! Joe walked right into their laundry and said: "We don't want anything to happen to you fellows, to the Greeks over there, nor to the Italians on Third Street. You have asked for protection and you will get it. But the first thing to do is to send these marines back where they came from. Then pull those machine guns out of the window; they are only getting the fellows out there madder every minute. Do that and we will see that you don't get hurt. On the other hand, if you insist on having these marines here with their fingers on the triggers of machine guns, we can't be responsible for what happens." That is about where the matter stood when I left; though I have been told that the Chinese papers in New York have been running big headlines about the affair and have been demanding that more Chinese marines be sent to our little town to protect these two "Chink" laundrymen. Just what will come of it all nobody seems to know; but I ask you, how do folks get that way?

IT IS appropriate that the picture of Joseph Fort Newton should appear on the cover of our Spring Book Number since he is one of the foremost writers on religious subjects. Dr. Newton is now the rector of St. Paul's Memorial Church, Philadelphia, having been ordained a clergyman of the Episcopal Church a little over a year ago, after having served a most useful ministry as the pastor of a Church of another communion. Each year Dr. Newton edits a volume of "Best Sermons" and more recently has edited a book called "My Idea of God," which is a symposium to which a number of the foremost thinkers of the present day contributed.

Immediately after Easter we are to run in this paper a number of articles which I am sure will be appreciated. They deal with such matters as the so-called New Morality, the Philosophy of Mechanism, Marriage and Divorce, Student Suicides, Crusades, Miracles of Science, What Does the Church Believe? A couple of weeks ago I mentioned in these paragraphs a worldly religious man, devout and disgusted. Such a rare combination in a man surely should be utilized. He has therefore been asked to write a bit for THE WITNESS. In addition there will appear the articles by Studdert-Kennedy; Marx vs. Moses, On Gambling, Revolution and Romance,— seven topnotchers. Those of you who are taking a Bundle for Lent better write us to continue it for a bit longer. I promise you this is real stuff that is coming.

their ministry. I conceive that I should be hindering the spread of true religion were I to prohibit such invitations as the rector has issued. Neither in this matter nor as regards sermons by Free Church ministers from the pulpits of our churches am I prepared to repudiate the Lambeth resolutions. The cause of Christian reunion I have deeply at heart. I earnestly desire that the Church shall make the fullest possible use of the religious gifts of educated women. For these reasons I must return a decisive negative to the requests implicit in the resolutions which you have sent me."

After remarking that in some Christian communions, as, for example, in "that branch of the Church Universal known as the Salvation Army," women equally with men are ministers, Bishop Barnes goes on: "I do not see how, without repudiating the authority of the Lambeth Conference, it is possible that objection could be taken were representative women such as Mrs. Bramwell Booth or Miss Royden to preach in Anglican churches with the permission of the bishop. Such invitations to women to preach in the Parish church of Birmingham as have recently been issued with my cordial approval are justified by another resolution of the Lambeth Conference of 1920."

The Rev. Stanley S. Kilbourne, rector of St. Peter's, Port Chester, New York, reports exceptionally large attendance at the midweek Lenten services. The preachers have been: the Rev. J. O. S. A conference of parish treasurers was recently held in the diocese of Long Island, with forty-four attending. They discussed their common problems and arrived at the following conclusions: (1) that all parish treasurers should be bonded; (2) that treasurers of subordinate parish organizations should report to the parish treasurer; (3) that moneys in hand, not needed at once, might, if united by deposit with the treasurer of the diocese, be invested to greater advantage than the two per cent which banks commonly allow on balances.

dedication of the new Park Avenue Synagogue. Bishop Manning said: "I am a Christian and believe with my whole heart and mind the religion of the New Testament but because of this, and all the more because of this, I am glad to be here to offer greetings on this happy and sacred occasion. We know that unfortunately race prejudice and religious prejudice still exist among us, and I say with sorrow that many of us who call ourselves Christians still show this spirit. But I say also that such spirit finds no warrant or sanction in the Christian religion. Nothing could be more thoroughly un-Christian, more contrary to the whole spirit and teaching of Christ than a feeling of prejudice against one's neighbor because he is a Jew."

I add a loud Amen to this: the Rev. George A. Ray, rector of Calvary, Batavia, Illinois, in his attractive parish news sheet, The Sun Dial, writes that he attended many services during the Bishops' Crusade. He hands out this observation: "The hymns chosen while giving the choirs an opportunity to show what they could do, were quite hopeless as mediums for congregational singing, and some hymns seemed to be quite unknown to the majority of people in the church. No one had thought of including 501, 'When will Thou save the people, O God of mercy, when?' a magnificent hymn for the purpose not only in sentiment but tune."

Convocation of the Panama Canal Zone met in Christ Church, Colon, with all of the clergy of the district present, and with lay representatives from practically every parish and mission. A fitting and touching tribute was paid by the Bishop to the memory of the late Dean Meredith, dean of the Cathedral at Ancon.

Nothing said recently in these paragraphs about Parish Papers. Many especially attractive ones come to the office, among the best being little four-page leaflets that are multigraphed. They all have this virtue; space is decidedly limited, and therefore nothing unimportant is said. Among the larger papers that I have seen recently are a number gotten out for parishes by the National Religious Press of Grand Rapids, all of which are most attractive, with colored covers and well selected "filler" copy.

Rheumatism

A Remarkable Home Treatment Given by One Who Had It

In the year of 1893 I was attacked by Muscular and Sub-Acute Rheumatism. I suffered as only those who are thus afflicted know for over three years. I tried remedy after remedy, but such relief as I obtained was only temporary. Finally, I found a treatment that cured me completely and such a pitiful condition has never returned. I have given it to a number who were terribly afflicted, even bedridden, some of them seventy to eighty years old, and the results were the same as in my own case.

I want every sufferer from any form of muscular and sub-acute (swelling of the joints) rheumatism, to try the great value of my improved "Home Treatment" for its remarkable healing power. Don't send a cent; simply mail your name and address, and I will send it free to try. After you have used it, and it has proven itself to be that long-looked-for means of getting rid of such forms of rheumatism, you may send the price of it, One Dollar, but understand I do not want your money unless you are perfectly satisfied to send it. Isn't that fair? Why suffer any longer, when relief is thus offered you free. Don't delay. Write today.

op." I must explain, without in the least detracting from the praise due Mr. Reinheimer, that he was elected to the great office by a linotype operator who set "archdeacon" as "archbishop," a mistake which was not caught by the proofreader who, for all I know, may have inside knowledge of affairs in Southern Ohio and thought that the word should stand.

The annual service of the Church Mission of Help, an organization which ministers to wayward and delinquent girls and unmarried mothers was held Sunday, March 27th at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. The preacher was the Very Rev. Howard C. Robbins, Dean of the Cathedral. Particular mention was made of the range and efficiency of the work done.

The work undertaken by the Church Mission of Help is of the highest value to increasing numbers because of the moral unrest of the youth of today. The Church Mission of Help deals with its clients in the spirit of modern social case work, and is one of the few organizations which invokes Psychiatry and other scientific methods for dealing with the mal adjusted.

The Church Mission of Help during the past year added 250 cases to a total of 276 in its jurisdiction at the beginning of the year. Of these, 114 were of the wayward and delinquent type, many of them paroled from State institutions. The Society dealt with 76 unmarried mothers, the effort in each case being to keep mother and child together. The work of the organization is undenominational.

central point of a story whose interest has not faded for twenty centuries? Why should those who tell and believe the story think it a badge of honor to wear, and carry about, and display on tops of steeples and on book covers and in the form of jewelry a representation of the hideous instrument of torture on which this death was accomplished? I shall attempt to answer these questions in my final article of this series next week.

Flood Fails to Stop Loyal Churchmen

Team Captain Swims to Safety

Do our church campaigns always reach their objectives?

Not quite always. There are times when to reach seven-eights of the objective is a great victory; for instance, the campaign we directed for St. Paul's Episcopal Church in San Diego, California.

The opening dinner came on the night of the beginning of the great flood which has been reported in the newspapers. The workers did not stop. There was no train service in nor out for several days, streets were almost impassable, yet the depleted force of workers stood loyal to their task. One captain soliciting in the outskirts of the town was compelled to leave his car and swim to safety, nearly losing his car in a canyon near the park.

Under these conditions the Rector, the Rev. Charles L. Barnes, and his devoted workers who were organized by D. F. Dunster, of our staff, have every reason to congratulate themselves on raising $63,000 out of the $75,000 objective for this, the first unit of their great plan.

THE CREDIBILITY OF THE RESURRECTION

The Message of Easter

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

"WHY should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"

This question was asked by the idealist, St. Paul, of the materialist, King Agrippa. It is still asked by those who believe in God as the Father of mankind, of those who assume that God exhausted His capacity for further development when He had created man.

To King Agrippa man was an end in himself. He had struggled hard by intrigue and flattery to attain his high place. He had attained wealth and position and power, not as a means to serve his fellow men, but as an end to exact service from other men. His amused answer, "Persuadest thou me to be a Christian?" indicates his entire satisfaction with the heights to which he had already attained.

To St. Paul life was just commencing; to Agrippa it was drawing to a close. When death came it was the end. There was nothing in Agrippa to suggest further progress. He had exhausted the possibilities of life and looked forward to a mausoleum which would mark the close of his career.

St. Paul was ahead of his time. He was a true evolutionist. He believed that the God who had begun creation would carry it on to a conclusion more satisfactory than the cemetery in which all man's hopes and aspirations would lie buried. Of course both men proceeded on an assumption. All business, all expectations, all hopes which men have are based on assumptions. Faith is merely a working hypothesis of life, based on t e assumption that He who hath begun a good work will carry it to its legitimate conclusion. The denial of faith is also an assumption that man's hope of immortality is an error and not an intuition of man's nature. "If a man die shall he live again?" asked Job some three thousand years ago and men have been asking the question ever since. Those who answer "No" are assuming that this hope is not an integral part of man's nature, but a false hope based on insufficient evidence. Those who answer "Yes" are assuming that God made us within and without and that a universal expectation of immortality is a guarantee of its possibility.

St. Paul, as a Pharisee, believed in the future life; he did not at first believe in the fact of Christ's resurrection but was confronted with evidence which convinced him of its reality. To St. Paul Christ became the answer to Job's question. "I am the resurrection and the life" was the sufficient answer.

Agrippa could not have believed in Christ without changing his whole nature, his motives, his purposes, his methods. He was committed to a life whose end was in itself.

St. Paul found it difficult to believe in Christ because such faith involved a reversal of his whole conduct, but he was willing to pay the price. It was not so radical a change as would have been the case if Agrippa had become a Christian, for St. Paul inherited a faith in future life which Agrippa lacked.

Let us reduce creation to the proportions of a broadcasting outfit. Inside my brain there is a thought, which by a certain impulse and the use of certain muscles and nerves is carried from my brain and through my mouth is transferred into a word. I utter this word and it travels regularly through the atmosphere at a fixed rate of speed and strikes the receiving station in somebody's ear. Then by a process unknown to man, after passing through certain muscular reactions, becomes a thought in the receiving brain. It is a complete broadcasting outfit.

To be told that it was set up by chance and as the result of molecular action is to be told something too marvellous for my credulity.

To be told that God made it is credible even though I have never heard or seen God.

If I believe that God made it, I also believe He created the thought, the word and the impression made in the brain of the other man. He made it within and without. I find within certain aspirations for the receiving and imparting of truth. I assume that He is the truth who first planted in me the love of it. I cannot believe that the love of truth is the result of molecular activity. I believe it has its source in intelligence.

If this same broadcasting station has an almost universal tendency to receive and to send out impressions of immortality, I again assume that He who made the instrument controls the messages that it conveys; at least the originating of an idea.

It is not merely a logical process; it is far more one of intuition, which causes men to receive and to broadcast the fundamental ideas which are the basis of science, art and religion.

Whatever latitude we may allow man in the combination of various elements into chemical compounds we fully realize that man did not create the elements.

So the psalmist expressed this truth when he said: "Like as the hart desireth the waterbrook so longeth my soul after thee, O God!" It is a primitive and well-nigh universal instinct which is responsible for the well-nigh universal concept of religious hope.

If God made us without he made us within. If He made the vista He also made the capacity to seek the beauty concealed therein.

"Why should it be thought a thing incredible that God should raise the dead?" since man, being made as he has been made, experiences an impulse toward that end. It is not the next world that is incredible. It is this one that is unbelievable. If we assume that this one is God's handiwork, and if we assume that from the earliest dawn to our present noonday there has been a steady progress or evolution of life, why assume that little man is the final and ultimate end of such progress? Such an assumption is absurd enough to be funny—to think that a universal intelligence made the world so that Agrippa was right in assuming that it ended in him, and St. Paul was wrong in assuming that man as he lives here is but one more link in the chain of progress.

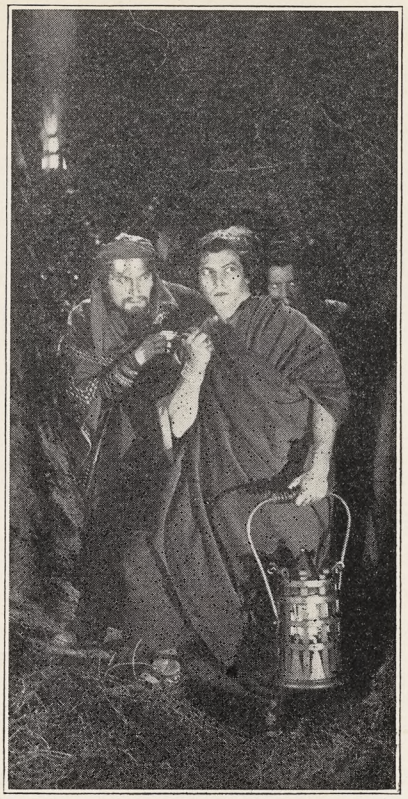
It is a tremendous difference in spiritual values which makes St. Paul a more creditable reflex of divine purpose than Agrippa. To make Agrippa right in his assumption and St. Paul wrong in his contention is to subvert development and to assert that life which has been ascending for cycles of time should come to rest in Agrippa, or rather in his mausoleum. This would be to end creation in a blind alley and make the Creator a prodigious imp who played pranks with truth and found satisfaction in deluding the righteous. It is St. Paul and not Agrippa who justifies God for having created man.

The resurrection is credible because it fits in with the development of life which precedes man, and gives an intelligent purpose in the struggle for righteousness in which he is engaged.

To believe that the vain and egotistical Agrippa is the last word in God's creative genius is unthinkable.

Let's Know



OLD CATHOLICS

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

A LETTER comes in asking for information about the Old Catholics.

This body dates from the Vatican Council of 1870. Considerable opposition developed at that Council over the new dogma of papal infallibility. one of the chief opponents being the noted historian, Dollinger. In that same year a meeting of protest was held in Germany attended by more than thirteen hundred Roman Catholics. The upshot of it was the formation of what is now called the Old Catholic Church the following year. Joseph Hubert Reinkens was chosen as their first bishop and he was consecrated by the Dutch archbishop of Utrecht, whose Orders came through Bishop Varlet of Jansenist fame in the eighteenth century.

Similar movements followed in Switzerland, Austria, Italy, England, and finally followed immigrants into the United States. Some thirty years ago a strong movement in this direction appeared among the Poles in this country, led by Bishop Koslowski. It still persists under the name of the Polish National Catholic Church, which, I believe, operates independently of the Old Catholic Church proper, though they both represent the same kind of thing and stand on the same fundamental principles.

JUDAS BETRAYS
Going to Give the Kiss

Doctrinally the Old Catholics base their position on the tenets of catholic theology. They recognize the Pope as the Primate of the West and pray for him accordingly but they manage their affairs without him. The historical creeds are the basis of their teaching. They are in communion with the Eastern Orthodox Church and welcome to their altars communicants of the Episcopal Church also. Some of their services are said in Latin, others in the respective languages of the people to whom they minister. The administration of ecclesiastical affairs is in the hands of the Episcopal Synod, consisting of an archbishop and a couple of auxiliary bishops. In case of a vacancy in the episcopate, a new bishop is chosen by the clergy who is approved and consecrated by the bishops. The ceremonies and liturgical vestments are those of the Latin Church.

They report 22 churches, 17 clergy and about 24,000 communicants. The Polish National Church reports an additional 34 churches, 45 clergy, and some 28,000 communicants. The Most Rev. W. H. Francis, 1035 Loyola Ave., Chicago, is the archbishop of the Old Catholic branch, while the leader of the Polish branch is the Rt. Rev. Francis Hodur, who makes his headquarters at Scranton, Pa. Doubtless further particulars could be had by addressing either of these two gentlemen.

In 1902 the Polish Church made overtures to the Episcopal Church for recognition and intercommunion on the basis of the Lambeth "Quadrilateral." At that time they stated their desire to minister to those who cannot intelligently take part in worship conducted in the English language. The matter was referred to a committee from which, so far as I know, it has never emerged, and the whole question still hangs in the air. It seems a pity that something might not have been done to heal up one at least of the breaches of modern Christendom. Perhaps it is not too late to hope that the opportunity is still open and that our two branches of the historic Church may yet find a way to get together before many more years go by.

Current Comment

By Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott

I LIKE Henry Ward Beecher's conception of Heaven as an expansive place. There will be lots of room there, and people will not be packed together too closely. Uncongenial souls may wish one another a happy time in happy surroundings, and proceed to frisk themselves away to the extent of the Milky Way. Surely, without that thought Heaven would be less than Heaven in anticipation!

ALONG that line, Bishop McConnell has recently said that we cannot expect everyone to love us, and that we cannot be expected to love everybody. It would be rather desperate, would it not, if everybody were to love us—decidedly mushy and unpleasant. Personally, I should much prefer respect from other people. Dr. Charles Elliott had that in mind when he said that it is better, much better that children should respect their parents than that they should simply love their parents. Respect means appreciation of true worth. Love may mean nothing of the kind.

AS I read the news of the churches and of the nations today I am driven to the foregoing observations and inferential conclusions. To put ourselves in the other man's place is what is needed to cure the present sores of this poor world and to preclude all unnecessary woundings in the future.

THE BIG STORY

The Gospel According to a Newspaper Man

BY IRWIN ST. JOHN TUCKER

THERE is no question about what the cross meant to those who wore it first. It represents the crossed beams on which a criminal was put to death; that and nothing else.

There is no sense in this, until we get the background so deeply imbedded in the consciousness of the people who wrote these books that they could not conceive of any one not knowing it. Among them, no covenant was considered binding until it had been ratified in blood. Back of this lay the primeval conception that there can be no bond between men, involving the keeping of promises, rescue in distress, sharing of prosperity, and general good faith, except between members of the same family. A word to an enemy was given only to be broken, in those primitive days which lay so close to the consciousness of men who surrounded the Great Desert, that reservoir of primeval days kept unchanged. One did not, in fact, have dealings with an enemy except to kill him. Therefore before there could be any agreement made, either to be kept or broken, kinship must be established. The same blood must flow in the veins of the contractors, or they could not enter into a contract either in good faith or bad. One's enemies, outside the blood-circle, were perpetual minors in the eyes of the law, unable to testify or to make a contract.

Thus originally, in the far off days, men making such agreements let their blood flow into a common goblet, and drank of it, thereby becoming blood brothers. To make an agreement with God, it was necessary that human blood be spread upon his altar, or shrine, or abiding place. Therefore the oldest son of the king, or his nearest and dearest, was slain, and blood poured upon the sacred stone, or sacred tree, to establish a direct, blood kinship with God.

It was in obedience to this ancient law, which prevailed for countless milleniums, that Abraham undertook to offer Isaac upon the altar of sacrifice. He was doing nothing unusual. The unusual thing came when he unbound his son and offered a ram instead.

When the "horror of great darkness" descended upon him, and he divided in sunder the five victims, and at night a smoking furnace, a brazen lamp—namely a great sacrificial fire from heaven—passed between the pieces, it was proof that this substitute was acceptable. Noah's covenant was sealed with blood. So were those of David, of Moses, of Solomon, of Elijah.

New Testament

Every time this old covenant was reaffirmed, it was done with the shedding of blood, whose smoking message to the skies above was "We are kinsmen, you and I." And every time the New Testament writers refer to the death of Christ, they speak of it in a strange fashion as having "justified us by his blood." We are "dead to sin"; ". . . We preach Christ crucified," says St. Paul. Peter, the rugged fisherman whose wranglings with St. Paul form quite a part of the record of the Acts, and who confessed his inability to understand the logic of his great opponent, starts off with a reference to the "sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." John, the beloved disciple, who leaned on the breast of Jesus at the Last Supper, and whose epistles breathe the doctrine "Love one another" as their single note, might be expected, if any one might, to repudiate the tangled sophistries of St. Paul in favor of a plain gospel of benevolence and uplift. But he begins his epistle with the proposition that "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin."

Even the Epistle to the Hebrews, written supposedly by a woman, and which certainly displays a mastery of the pomp of language St. Paul could never touch, spends most of its magnificent eloquence comparing the death of Christ to the sacrifice on the Day of Atonement. St. James, the hard-headed apostle of common sense, believed to have been the Lord's brother, refers to him casually as "Jesus Christ, the Lord of Glory." Jude, whose wild vehemence packs into a very brief epistle more terrific curses than any similar body of literature, refers as a matter of course to the "mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ" as necessary to eternal life.

On the basis of this record, any man who has read the Book with any degree of fair intelligence will dismiss as idiocy such pompous asininities as have become quite the fashion, referring all the mystical doctrines of the New Testament to the Apostle Paul. The idea that Christ taught a simple doctrine and Paul an obscure one simply cannot be held by a sane mind which has perused the whole Bible without any particular bias to begin with.

Christ lived and died in the same tradition that the prophets held before him and the apostles who came after. Paul, and John and James all held the same idea. They expressed it differently—of course—but that testifies to the fact that they did believe it, and were not merely mouthing misunderstood words copied one from the other.

The Fathers of the Christian Church held the same views. The

MADONNA AND JOHN Watching at Calvary

Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed were headlines written over the story to bring out its main points. The "tangled theology" of the early Christian centuries is no more than a diagram of a certain locality in a sensational crime story, with a cross to mark the point where the murder was committed.

What made it so sensational? Once men offered men in sacrifice to God to reestablish a broken kinship and claim protection. Then they offered their choicest animals, first consecrating them into the family, so that the Lamb of God, when its blood was shed, might be accepted as blood of the tribe.

THE POINT

But the point of this story—the wild, mad, incredible assertion that set men aflame with its splendor when they first heard it—the news which has astounded all generations since it was first flashed across the tingling nerves of a world bored and blase with tangles of cult and philosophies—is that all this is completely and utterly reversed. Instead of man sacrificing man to win the favor of God, what happened on that hilltop outside Jerusalem was that God sacrificed himself to win the favor of man.

You, that were sometime alienated and enemies . . . yet now hath he reconciled. . . . Be ye reconciled to God . . . God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself. . . . Last of all he sent unto them his Son, saying "they will reverence my son. . . ."

Was this the fancy of Paul, you say, that epileptic little scribe who had never seen Christ in the flesh? Why, when Christ began teaching, he said, "It was said to you of old time 'Thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not commit adultery'; but I say unto you. . . ."

Immediately those who heard him would naturally ask "YOU say unto us? Who do you think you are?" And his answer is unmistakable, "Before Abraham was, I am. This is My blood, of the New Covenant."

You may believe it or not. But that is what the story says. That is what the story IS. A new nation was created of souls bought by the blood of God, who, because his teachings had been misunderstood, came down to be his own Sacrifice: God, sacrificed to win the love of man.

"We will make a new wedding compact, you and I, God and man, divinity and humanity; only this time God will be his own lamb, and his own blood will sprinkle the altar, which is the earth, and his people, which is all mankind."

This is the plain, open, unmistakable meaning of the life and death of Jesus. It cannot be attributed to Paul any more than to Peter and John. It is as much the teaching of Luke as of James and Jude and Revelation. If you believe any part of the Bible you must believe this, because it is the whole Bible.

You may condense the story, trim it, cut it down to a bulletin; you may play it up or play it down. But cut this out of it, and you kill the story.

The Bible, and specifically the New Testament, is not a collection of wise sayings by an unfortunate and misunderstood young man. It is not a feature story nor an entertainment, nor a picture page intended to lighten a dull news day. It is the world's biggest story, the story of the romance and wooing and murder of God. Leave that out, and, as any reporter will tell you, you kill the story.

Cheerful Confidences

PEWS

By Rev. George Parkin Atwater

AFTER having been rector for many years of a church with no rented pews, I find myself now rector of a church with a few rented pews.

This has brought to me an entirely new problem. At first it did not seem to be a very serious one. It really seemed absurd that in a church seating nearly seven hundred persons, with five hundred unassigned pews, and with a congregation, as I found it, averaging less than one hundred at the eleven o'clock service on Sunday, it seemed absurd, I say, that there should be any problem about seating the few people who did not have rented pews.

But there was a problem. And it can best be illustrated by combining all the possible predicaments of a mythical Mr. and Mrs. Blank, who had moved into the neighborhood and who had determined to try the church.

MAGDELENA, MARY AND MARTHA
At the Foot of the Cross

On the first Sunday Mr. and Mrs. Blank were met at the door by a polite usher who showed them to a good pew. They were quite well satisfied.

On the following Sunday another usher, seeing that Mr. and Mrs. Blank were quite nice looking people, and realizing that his own family was not to be present on that day, took them to his own pew. They did not know that they were the pew guests of the usher.

On the third Sunday they came while the ushers happened to be occupied for a moment, and feeling more at home they wandered up into the pew that they had occupied on the previous Sunday. Soon the usher's family arrived, and entered with the air of belonging there. Private Prayer Books were in the rack. The family was hospitable, but Mr. and Mrs. Blank were uncomfortable. They realized they were guests.

On the fourth Sunday Mr. and Mrs. Blank sought out an usher at once and were shown into a pew at the rear of the church.

On the fifth Sunday they were ushered down the side aisle and had an entirely new perspective.

On the sixth Sunday they sat in the rear and on the seventh they found themselves in the front pew, where they had the responsibility of starting the collection with either a bill or silver.

On the eighth Sunday they were guests again, as the usher had mistakenly thought a regular pew holder to be out of town.

Mr. and Mrs. Blank discussed the question of renting a regular pew. But they were not accustomed to the practice, and so delayed this act of complete affiliation.

In the next two months they wandered all over the church, never feeling settled. The church was a labyrinth into which they never dared to venture without a guide—one of the several very courteous ushers who apparently wanted them to try out every pew in the building.

The predicament of Mr. and Mrs. Blank came to my attention. I learned that children likewise hesitated to come to church because they did not like to be ushered, and because they feared they might get into a rented pew.

After consulting with the vestry we did a very simple thing. We placed a small metal Maltese Cross on the pew end of every unassigned pew, and printed a little announcement which we gave to every attendant, stating that the Maltese Cross said "Welcome to this pew."

Today any person entering the church may easily, and without an usher, find an unassigned pew in any section of the church in which he prefers to sit. He need not wander about or be uncertain as to his welcome. One hundred little crosses fairly shout to him "Welcome to our midst."

If you have rented pews in your church, mark plainly the unassigned pews, and verify my statement that the stranger, visitor or new comer, will be more apt to come again, if he is informed as to this custom.

Caution. Do not mark the rented pews. It is much more pleasant to inform a stranger that a Maltese Cross means "welcome" than to inform him that it means "stay out."

About Books

HIS MOTHER. By Alice W. Darton. Macmillan $2.25.

This book by a devout Roman Catholic is a story of the life of Mary, the Mother of Christ. It is based on the gospel narrative, filled in with material dealing with the history and customs of the Jewish people in our Lord's time, and not too much colored by Roman doctrines about the Blessed Virgin and pious imagination. It presents the story of our Lord's life on earth from a fresh and suggestive angle. C. L. Street.

DAWN. A Lost Romance of the Time of Christ. By Irving Bacheller. The Macmillan Co., N. Y. Price $2.50.

The novelist who chooses to make the New Testament the setting for a historical romance has set himself a difficult task, and one in which he must expect his work to meet comparison with the two or three masterpieces in that field. Judged by the standard of such books as Ben Hur or Quo Vadis Dawn, although it is a pleasingly written and interesting story, does not quite make the grade. Ostensibly the book is based upon the original writing on a palimpsest manuscript discovered late in the last century in a convent on Mt. Athos and only recently deciphered. The story, which is told in the first person, is the life history of Doris, The Woman Taken in Adultery of St. John VIII, from the time when, at the age of fifteen, she alone is saved out of a caravan destroyed by a desert sand-storm, through her intimacy with Vespasian, then a young Roman officer in Palestine, her conversion to Christianity, the obstacles which beset her love for that Apollos who became the successor of St. Paul at Corinth, until in her old age her martyrdom is imminent. Thrilling adventures and hairbreadth escapes abound; the long arm of coincidence is always in the picture. The tone is perhaps too "sweet," and pious, but young people will enjoy the book and others will find it a pleasant evening's pastime.

IF DEATH BE DEATH

BY REV. G. A. STUDDERT-KENNEDY

IF IT be all for naught, for nothingness
At last, why does God make the world so fair?
Why spill this golden splenernity
The western hills, and light the silver lamps
Of eve? Why give me eyes to see, and soul
To love so poignantly that, like a pain,
This beauty stabs me through, and wakes within Rebellious voices crying against death?
Why set this hunger for eternity
To gnaw my heart strings through, if death ends all?
If death be death, then evil must be good,
Wrong must be right, and beauty ugliness.
God is a Judas who betrays His friend,
And with a kiss damns all the world to hell
If Christ came not again; for was not Christ
God's kiss upon man's lips? A traitor's kiss,
Luring him on to vanity, vain faith,
Vain hope, and vanity of vanities,
Vain love, if death be death indeed, and life
Rots in the grave? Truth is not love but hate,
Malicious cruelty, foul fiendish spite,
Without the empty tomb. Curse God and die.
But I go laughing in my heart, I know
There is no death, 'tis but a phantom fear
That haunts the soul apart from God. Christ rose,
The stone was rolled away and echoing
His voice startled death's sentry guards, "Behold!
I live for ever and have cast the keys
Of hell into the bottomless abyss."
Lift up your heads, ye golden gates, for all
To enter in who will to walk the way
Christ lives and round the living Christ, new worlds
Burn to their birth in light, new triumph songs
Make music 'mid the silent stars, and swell
Like ocean's thunder on a sounding shore,
Life! Life! More Life! Christ Lives for Evermore!

Is Democracy Possible Today?

English Writer Raises the Question

Correspondence from

A. MANBY LLOYD

WHAT is Old England coming to? That question exercised the minds of Carlyle and Ruskin and is still unsolved. Wells, Shaw, Orange, Belloc, Chesterton, Hammond, Henry James, Kipling, all have their way "back to Eden." Gilbert Murray and Zimmern look to Greek ideals, others are fascinated by mediaevalism.

Bernard Gilbert has of late years entered the lists and has qualified himself by long residence in rural communities. As an artist—a literary artist—his fame slowly increases, and his last book should specially interest Americans. In his "Letters to America" there is enough material for Social Study Circles and Rectory Armchairs to last for several years, and six dollars will not be a wasted outlay, if you have the six dollars. I am lucky to have the loan of a copy.

The scene is laid in the Fen country and his characters are drawn from life. But it is the philosophy that matters. He has some things to say about democracy that are complimentary neither to the old country nor the new; for example: "What Carlyle and Tolstoi failed to see (because it was impossible then that they should see) was just this, tribal man, living in his tiny community, knowing everyone, is the foundation of democracy. Plato's perfect state would correspond with the District of Bly (Fen Country). Aristotle said that for the proper distribution of justice and of authority it was necessary that the citizens be acquainted with each other's character, else mischief would ensue."

This is the key, says Gilbert. This is democracy. It isn't to be transplanted. The moment men live in communities where they are unable to know their fellows, the moment they get into industrial cities, they are lost. Democracy presupposes the communal unit. There is no democracy possible in the modern industrial world.

There are some typical parsons in this book and no hasty judgments. But Gilbert has no hesitation about the professors and high-brows. "I have long thought that professors and authors are entirely divorced from practical life. I'm divorced, and know it. I've concluded that no man should be admitted to a professorship or a priesthood until he has worked on a farm for a year and down in a mine for a year, and kept a little shop for a year; living on his earnings during the whole period. These professors spin words and there's never any reality. As for our novelists there isn't a living one who knows the first thing about life, except perhaps Arnold Bennett. He did, but he left it for London. The rest of them are ridiculously ignorant of reality."

Here's another chunk: "Modern civilization exploits its hinterland; a process which cannot continue forever. You, in America, have lately awoke to this peril. Roosevelt made some fuss about your wasting resources, your senseless slaughter and destruction, by which, in half a century you have ravaged the storehouse of a thousand centuries. But all modern civilizations do just that. We've done it. We all live on our capital, like spendthrift sons. You have gutted your forests, your virgin prairies, your coal and oil. And soon too you will turn as we have done to foreign resources and exploit the outer world as long as you can. Only there is less scope than in the last century. There may be enough in South America to last a few generations, but the end must come, and that's the end of Industrial Capitalism. You have only to turn to China to see the truth. China, however, won't be absorbed. China persists precisely because she does not waste her resources."

Speaking on the matter of a proper observance of Sunday Mr. Ramsay McDonald has this to say: "I agree that Labour is more interested in this than is any other section of the community. We are getting altogether too superficial and too thoughtless, and unless we can pull ourselves up and accustom ourselves to getting inspiration from the deeper silences that lie within us, neither as individuals nor as a nation shall we be able to face the great problems that modern civilization places before us."

The Rev. C. E. Spencer, the former Sub-Dean of Shanghai, contributes to "St Martin's Review" an article in which he points out that, "because the world is rapidly becoming a unit, and an unhealthy East reacts upon the West, and vice versa, the sense of race-consciousness has come to China." In summing up his views, he writes: "One would say that China's aspirations, political and religious, are legitimate. China must take her place in the comity of nations; but she cannot be allowed by the rest of the world family to blow up all her bulwarks, props, and supports, to tear up treaties, to use uncontrolled banditry, to swallow wholesale indigestible revolutionary propaganda, and to claim independence of the world, until she has stabilized her government, effected domestic understanding, and emerged from her dream-staggering and shown herself conscious of the responsible part to be played in this unit of a world."

Protestantism is taking to ceremonial, and Protestants are crowding into Anglo-Catholic churches. The Puritan bigot survives but no longer dominates. When the Cross rallies the emotions, reason hides itself ashamed. "Intellect," says Bergson, "is characterized by nothing so much as the inability to understand life." Symbolism is not dead. The ring in marriage, flowers at funerals, palms in processions, banners and flags; this is how the religious idea best expresses itself.

Bernard Shaw has been taking Rotary to task; too many lunches and funny stories. Not enough ideal. The secretary of one of the Rotary Clubs asked Mr. Shaw to address them. He thanked them for the invitation, but stated that "he had shot his bolt" and had nothing more to say to such a crowd.

Dr. Guy Warman, the Bishop of Chelmsford, told the following amusing story of an experience at a small town in his diocese to the members of the Springfield (Chelmsford) Bible Class.

"I was coming out of a shop," he said, "when a small boy ran his head into the place where I wear my belt and bolted, leaving my episcopal dignity desperately upset.

"After I had recovered my breath I noticed that the boy had dropped half-a-crown. Now what was to be the attitude of a Christian bishop? Should I leave it where it was and so maintain what little episcopal dignity remained to me?

"I could pick the half-crown up and put it into my pocket as some small compensation for the loss of my episcopal dignity, or I could run after the boy in spite of my episcopal dignity.

"But wild horses shall not drag from me what I did!"

NEWS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH

In Brief Paragraphs

Edited by

WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD

THE picture on this page, and other pictures in this issue, including the cover picture, are from the moving picture, The King of Kings, mentioned in these paragraphs last week. Those who have followed the making of the film state that a spirit of reverence and devotion was manifest throughout, evident in the stage hands and workers about the studios quite as much as with the large cast. A prayer service was held when the first crank was turned and the spirit of prayer, according to the Rev. Dr. Andrews of the Federal Council of Churches, who has been in close touch with the picture from the beginning, has found its way into the production. He says: "It is a picture which I believe will prove of vast significance to the Christian as well as to the non-Christian and should have the united backing of all lovers of Christ."

Over one thousand attended the services and meetings during the parish crusade week recently held at the Epiphany, Chicago. Among the speakers during the week were Bishop Partridge of West Missouri, Mr. Edward Carter of Northwestern University, Mr. L. H. Allen of Glen Ellyn, Illinois, Rev. H. W. Prince of Chicago, and Rev. Harold Hoag of Berwin. The crusade closed with a great service at which the preacher was the Bishop of Chicago.

Hundreds of people attended a healing mission held last week at Christ Church, Canon City, Colorado, under the direction of the Rev. Robert B. H. Bell, rector of St. Thomas's, Denver. The rector of the parish, the Rev. L. A. Crittenton, reports that a splendid work was accomplished.

Bishop Rhinelander, canon of Washington Cathedral, has announced plans for the third annual summer conference of the College of Preachers, to commence June 13th. He also announces two gifts, of $10,000 each; one for the College of Preachers from Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock of Washington, and the other from Miss Olivia Phelps Stokes of Redlands, California, the income to be used for the people's evensong services, which have been held at the Peace Cross for more than twenty-five years.

Bishop Rhinelander announces that the two general topics of the summer conference will be "The Evolution and the Incarnation" by the Rev. William C. Woods of Kent, Connecticut, and "Preaching the Atonement" by the Rev. Leonard Hodgson of the General Theological Seminary. Last year 45 men, representing 20 dioceses, attended.

Friday evening. On Saturday lectures on preaching, the use of the hymnal and the Prayer Book, and the use of the Stereopticon were given by officers of the Church Army. On Sunday the men took part in church services, and also, as one of the captains of the Army said, "were taken out on the street, placed on a tub, and told to go ahead and witness for the Lord." That looks like the real sort of stuff.

A conference on church work for dependent and neglected children is to be held in New York City on April 21st, sponsored by the Federal Council of Churches and the Child Welfare League of America. Among those on the program are Mrs. Martha Falconer of the Federation of Agencies caring for Protestants; Dr. Hastings Hart of the Russell Sage Foundation; Mr. Charles H. Johnson of the State Board of Charities; Dean Lathrop of the social service department of the National Council and Dr. Worth M. Tippy of the Federal Council. The meetings are to be held at the Russell Sage Foundation Building.

Church Army men are holding missions in the upper part of the diocese of New York this week and next.

The Church of the Holy Communion in New York is at 6th Avenue and 20th Street, which means something familiar with that particular part of the United States. Dr. Mottet, the rector, decided to keep the church open nights as well as days during Lent to see if anyone would possibly use it. At twenty minutes after one in the morning on a day last week forty-seven people were on their knees in that church saying their prayers.

The author of this letter is a prominent physician and layman of the diocese of Southern Ohio—Dr. William S. Keller. I rather have an idea a dean or two will be heard from next:

"The notice that appears in the News Paragraphs of a recent WITNESS, relative to the proposed intelligence tests, is most amusing. While of course the practical application of such a test is unfortunately, at present, not possible, it carries with it a very subtle inference that has been running through many minds. I, for one, have never been an enthusiast about our Bishops' Crusade. At the present time, I could work up a tremendous enthusiasm for a Crusade that might be directed toward the efficiency of our seminaries and the "up-to-dateness" and scientific approach of all our institutions, that they might inspire the high-minded, intelligent young people for tomorrow's leadership. I fail to see that we have made much progress in this direction and I despair for the future. It is one thing to evangelize and get persons into the Church, and it is quite another thing to hold them, after you have gotten them in. I am more concerned about the losses we have sustained in the past ten years, in the loss of forward looking, intelligent young laymen who have been born and brought up in the Church, than in the acquisition of new timber. Is it not vastly important to develope a program and a type of leadership that will hold our present constituency? Under Current Comment in the same issue, there is an appeal for 'men and more men—more men of the right sort.' May I say that I know of four fine young men in the past year who entered

Announcement

THE series of articles by the Rev. G. A. Studdert-Kennedy, previously announced, will start with the issue for next week; as will also a number of important articles written by the Rev. May we take this means of urging rectors to either renew their Bundle order or else to have a member of the congregation take subscriptions from those who have been taking the paper regularly during Lent. The price for a year is $2, and 50c is to be deducted from this amount as a commission. We will appreciate your cooperation.

The annual report for the year 1926, of the Cathedral Parish of St. Mary and St. John, Manila, P. I., shows that 435 services were held during the year, that the Church School is the largest in its history, and that one thousand more communions have been made than in any previous year—the number for 1926 being over three thousand. For the first time the parish met its apportionment, in fact overpaid it by one hundred pesos—whatever that is.

people who had leisure at mid-day rather than business people; for though the service lasted fifty minutes, which is a long time to take out of one's "lunch hour", few left during the service. The proportion of men was not remarkable. The "Gloria Trumpeters" led the hymns, and also rendered two instrumental numbers. Bishop Stires placed the responsibility on lay members of the churches for the fact that there are sixty million of people in the United States without church affiliation of any kind. Religious services, he said, are dangerous when they leave the worshippers with a sense of satisfaction over duty done; and successful only when they inspire the worshippers to act. The attendance of thousands of people at Lenten services ought to show its effect in the community through increased zeal for God.

Two European conferences have been arranged by the International Missionary Council, on the relation of the Christian Church to Judaism and the Jews. They are to be held in April, one at Budapest, April 7-13; the other at Warsaw, April 19-25. Delegates are limited to 100, of whom fifteen are from the United States and Canada.

The conferences are the result of the realization of great changes that are taking place in Jewish life and thought, a recognition of a revolt against traditional Judaism, and of a widespread anti-Semitic feeling. It is felt that the time has come for a study of the whole Jewish situation and for the Christian Church to recognize its responsibility in the matter.

cal service and religion, as distinct from the earlier use of the air to entertain and to give information. The Seamen's Church Institute, New York, regularly employs the radio to give directions for the treatment of sick or injured sailors in many parts of the world. Bible societies are getting orders for supplies from distant fields. A Presbyterian missionary in West Africa ordered by radio an additional broadcasting set from his board in New York. The order was not picked up by the board, but by an amateur in Minnesota, who transmitted it to New York, and saved a couple of months' time. Methodist and Catholic organizations report similar practical employment of the air.

Complaints against the radio are being made by churches, which say that only such persons as might otherwise go to church "listen in." Others finding jazz fading into Bible study, search for another station, and continue the jazz. Anyhow, say Church leaders, radio is only another form of preaching, and the great need of churches is not more preaching, but more working. The great pulpiteers are overshadowing and driving out the smaller ones. Most people who "listen in" to sermons do not come in contact with collection plates, these church people complain, and appeals to send in checks avail little. Mission boards trying the radio to raise money report the plan a failure. Baptists have tried it in largest ways, but they say to small purposes.

When Bishop Stearly of Newark reached Chicago for his part of the Crusade, he found that the dollar watch that he had carried for years had given up the ghost, and quite unconscious of the fact that he was close to the place where watches are made by the thousand, he mentioned that fact in Elgin. So while in the city he was taken to see the factory and shown many fashions in watches by Mr. Ed. Herbster, the General Manager, an ardent Churchman. Mr. Herbster urged him to accept the watch which pleased him most as a memento of his visit to the city, and from the Company. The Bishop demurred somewhat, but Mr. Herbster ultimately induced him to make an even trade of his defunct dollar

Bishop Creighton of Mexico has made arrangements with the Mexican Government, which will enable candidates for confirmation to be brought to Christ Church Cathedral, Mexico City, for the rite. There are classes now prepared in several places, but they are unable to make the trip for lack of cash. The Bishop, therefore, writes: "I am wondering if some of our friends in the States would not be willing to assume this expense as an expression of good will toward the Mexican people? Are there not some parishes whose confirmation classes would assume the expense of bringing their Mexican friends into the city for confirmation? It will entail an expense of $150." If so, it can be done through the department of missions, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York or by writing Bishop Creighton, Calle Zacatscas, 229 Mexico City, D. F., Mexico.

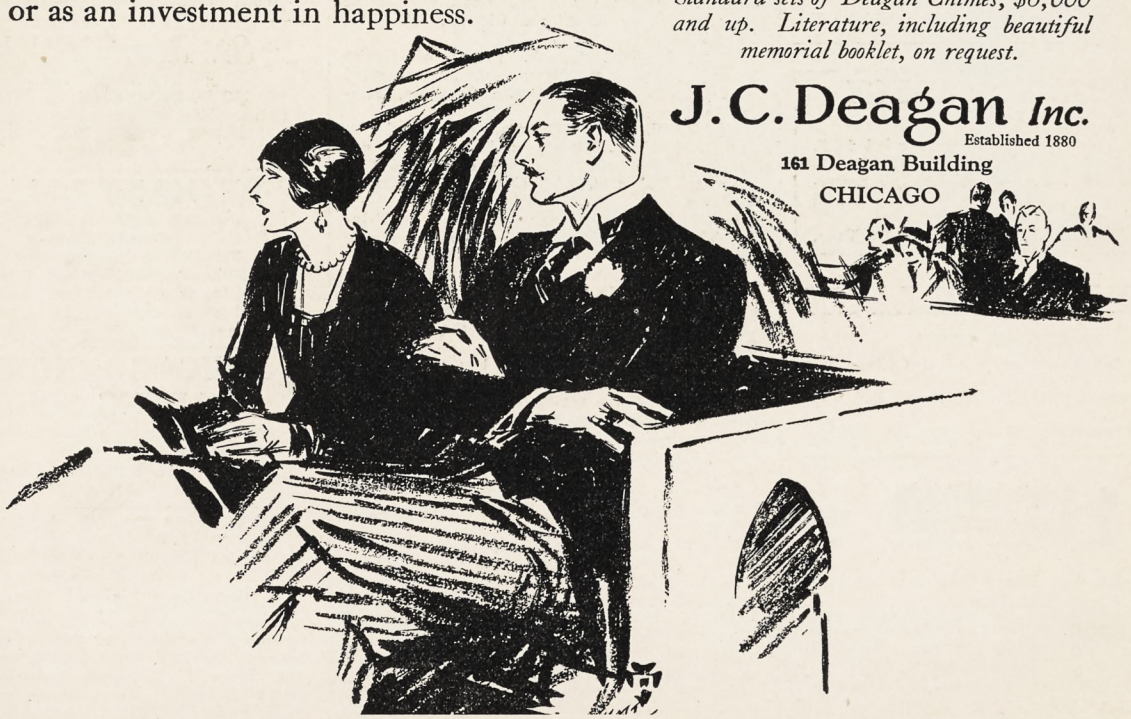
Somewhere there is a man . . .

Somewhere . . possibly in your own congregation, there is a man to whom Easter, 1927, will be a day of ineffaceable memory.



Guided by this advertisement, he will, on Easter Day, picture his church with the added charm of Golden-Voiced Chimes. In his mind the tower will cease to be a "silent finger pointing to the sky" and will become, instead, a gloriously militant voice—vibrant with the spirit of Easter; alive with the joy of the arisen Christ.

Inspired by the picture his mind has created, this man—either individually or in combination with a group—will take steps to make his dream a reality. Chimes will be installed as a memorial to a departed one, as a tribute to a beloved pastor, or as an investment in happiness.

Week after week as the song of the chimes casts its salutary spell over the community, he will be reminded anew of his beneficence. The peace and solace that the age-mellowed hymns hold for the aged; the persistent but sweetly musical appeal that they make to the wayward; the renown that they bring to the church, and the joy that they carry to all, will each be a reminder of the thought born on Easter Day, 1927.

And when the donor begins to realize that year after year the blessings of the chimes continue—that generation after generation they extend the same soft, sweet, musical invitation to the church—his will be the joy of a philanthropy well conceived, of a good work well done!

Standard sets of Deagan Chimes, $6,000 and up. Literature, including beautiful memorial booklet, on request.

ROMANCE AND REVOLUTION

Taking the Dullness Out of Life

BY THE REV. G. A. STUDDERT-KENNEDY

SUPPOSE the Kingdom of Comfort were for all of us achieved, suppose we were all well clothed, well housed, and possessed of a secure and ample living wage, would we be content? I can hear a million or so of mortals saying: "I don't know, but I'd like to risk it. I'd like to try and see. Anyhow, we are miles from that yet, so what is the good of asking such silly questions?"

But it is not as silly as it seems. If we want to understand our present discontent we must go down to its very roots; it will not do to take a merely surface view of things. It is obvious that Industrialism has robbed a large number of human beings of some of the prime necessities of life, such as sunshine, fresh air, access to natural beauty, room to stretch themselves and breathe, and every now and then the chance to be alone, for some measure of privacy is a more universal human need than people commonly imagine it to be.

That millions of our crowded city dwellers are deprived of these things is obvious, and it is equally obvious that they will not rest content until they get more of them.

A Fundamental Craving

But if we add to those necessities the need of some security from want, have we included all there is, or is there something more? I think there is one other fundamental human craving which modern mechanical Industrialism tends to starve. It is a vague desire and difficult to define. But then most of the powerful influences in human life, like faith, and hope, and love, are difficult to define. Because I have no other and no better name for it, I call this vague but fundamental craving of which I am thinking the craving for Romance.

I remember once sitting in a room in Harley Street with a distinguished surgeon and a great mental specialist. They were both men absolutely consecrated to their warfare with disease. They hated disease as St. Paul hated sin. We had been discussing modern anaesthetics, and their power of killing pain. The surgeon had been an untiring worker in that field. It had been an animated and interesting talk, but at last there fell a silence on us all, and for some time we sat and smoked and thought—listening to the dull roar of the London traffic as it floated in through the open window.

Then the surgeon said quietly: "After all, the greatest of human miseries, the most deadly of diseases, is one we cannot touch with the knife, or save men from by drugs." "What do you mean?" I said. "Cancer?" "Oh, no," he replied, "we'll get that little devil yet. I mean—boredom. There is more real wretchedness, more torment driving men to folly, or to what you parsons call sin, due to boredom than there is to anything else; and men will do anything to escape it; they will drink, drug themselves; prostitute their bodies, and sell their souls; they will take up mad causes, organize absurd crusades, fling themselves into lost hopes and crazy ventures, they will torment themselves and torture other people to escape the misery of being bored. Anyone who discovered a cure for that would put an end to more tragedy and misery than all of us doctors and physicians put together."

The Misery of Boredom

It was a queer speech. I have not given it verbatim. There was a lot of it, illustrated by stories from a long and varied experience of men and women. It set me thinking. The misery of boredom, and the necessity of Romance. How much of our modern discontent is due to that if you get down to the real roots? I wondered that when I had finished "My Life for Labour," by Mr. Robert Smillie. It is so evident that the cause of Labor supplied in his life just that great need—the need of Romance.

How far does it supply that need for others?

How far are popular leaders "pure adventurers"? That word has a double meaning. It has a good meaning, and a bad one. "An adventurer" may be the best, and is sometimes the worst of men. Christ was an adventurer; what about Mr. Cook, or any other popular leader — Mr. Winston Churchill, for instance? How far are they pure adventurers? And how about the smaller fry, the men who are just struggling out of the rank and file—how far is it the lure of adventure that leads them on?

Second-hand Romance

It is no good lecturing men who are out for adventure on the gospel of safety first. The coldly reasonable point of view does not touch them; it is not what they want. For the business man, who is on his own, business itself supplies a measure of romance; there are risks to be taken and battles to be won; there is success to be achieved.

But for the industrial worker who serves a machine, there is no element of adventure in life. It is deadly monotonous. He is part of the machine he serves. He belongs to the machine more really than the machine belongs to him. His tools are not his own; his workshop is not his own; the product of his labor is not his own. The business venture is outside of him altogether. Nothing is his but the wage he draws, and there is precious little chance of either increasing or decreasing that by any effort he can make himself.

He tries to escape from this meaningless monotony by gambling a bit with his wage, by drink, and by the adventure and romance of sex, and by the second-hand romance of the movies.

They satisfy his cravings to a certain extent. They play an enormous part in his life. The appeal of sex is not all animal by any means. Can you not imagine how a working lad dreams of a motor bicycle with a girl in silk stockings on the pillion, and the unknown road before them both, as a saint dreams of heaven, or a warrior of war? I can see him gazing at that second-hand one on the easy payment system, seeing the girl's face, and feeling the clasp of her arms about him, and raging within because he cannot manage it.

Life Not an Adventure

That is the call of Romance. But there are many who cannot find full satisfaction that way; they want something larger, they want power, they want to fight, they want the applause of men more than the tenderness of women. For them the glamous of politics is irresistible; it is a way out; it is the open road and the call of the unknown. They go to it as a moth goes to the candle. This is human, but it is dangerous. Modern politics and romance do not go well together. Modern political questions are intricate, complex, and difficult to follow; they demand patience, balance, and self-denial. The romantic mind tends to substitute passion for patience, and courage for care; it sees life as an adventure to be hazarded, rather than as a problem to be solved.

There is a romance in solving a problem, but it is romance of a subtle and spiritual sort. It does not thrill the senses or flatter self-esteem. It is romance, but not cheap romance. It is adventure, but high adventure, demanding discipline and self-control. In every grade of our political life there is the danger of the man who consciously or unconsciously seeks in politics, local or national, cheap romance, easy applause, dominance over his fellows. He may be only a little frog, but he can be a big frog in a little pool, and it is the little pools of politics that make up the big one.

"The Only Way"

Whether it be the successful local tradesman or the shrewd and clever workman who uses politics for the purpose of cheap romance, it is equally dangerous. It is commonly recognized as a danger that political leaders may seek to fill their pockets, and we guard against it, but we do not recognize so clearly or guard ourselves so carefully against the human craving for position, notoriety, dominance, adventure, and all that goes to give men cheap romance. It is not easy to see how we can guard against it. Leadership makes high demands on character, and those demands must be met or democracy will go bankrupt. As the veteran Socialist writer, Karl Kautsky, says: "Let us study our feelings, and the applause of excited popular meetings less, and let us study the economic driving forces and their laws more. This is more tedious, and often very unpopular, but it is the only way."

Our Cover

THE PICTURE on the cover is a scene from a motion picture illustrating "The Twenty-third Psalm." The actors are real shepherds of Bethlehem with their flocks. David, "the sweet singer of Israel," embodied in the beloved "Shepherd's Psalm" the experiences that he had had tending his father's flocks as a lad, centuries ago. The shepherds of Bethlehem today go through the same routine as that followed by David, for shepherd life has not changed these many centuries in the hills and valleys of Palestine. The modern shepherd leads his flocks by the same "still waters" that David did; he makes them lie down in the same "green pastures." The scene on the cover was photographed at Ain Fara—the small stream East of Jerusalem where David is supposed to have watered his father's flocks. The motion picture is released by Pathe.

Current Comment

By Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott

"SEEING the other fellow's point of view"—that is the basis of all true respect. Yes, and between individuals, employers and employees, churches and nations. There used to be a tribe of shepherds in Armenia who gave assent by shaking their heads, and denial by nodding their heads. From our point of view we have misunderstood them thoroughly and regarded them as liars and thieves. Is it not something like that with China and Mexico today? We are estimating the Chinese and the Mexicans from our American standpoint. If we could only understand the value of their terminology; if we could only approach their problems through their minds and see things through their eyes, we might well undergo a revolution of conviction.

IN MEXICO, for instance, if you admire a picture in a man's house, he will say: "Senor, the picture is yours." What is the appropriate reply? Something like this: "Gracious Sir, the gentleman who has the taste to have such a beautiful picture in his house deserves to retain it in his house for the benefit of those who are honored with his friendship." If you were to say: "Thank you very much, I will send for the picture tomorrow," you would be a boor of the first water, and you might well be impounded for a contemplated robbery!

THE Mexican mind versus the American mind—yes, and the Chinese mind as against the American mind! In one of the most popular and beautiful parks in Shanghai a few years ago there was this sign: "Chinese not allowed in this park." How would you like such a sign as that to appear overnight in one of the parks in your city? "No Americans allowed in this park." It would not remain there for long, would it? The British, the Americans and the Germans, as well as other nations, have exploited China and the Chinese for a long time. They have made money out of China and the Chinese. It is not altogether surprising that the worm is beginning to turn. There are good Episcopalians who are running around and saying something like this: "The Chinese are an ungrateful people. We have done so much for China, and here is China unappreciative of her debt to us." It is all tommy rot. What have we done, as Episcopalians? We have sent missionaries to China, wonderful men and women. We have attempted to impose our sytem of education and our conception of Christianity upon limited numbers of the Chinese people. We have done it all with the best intentions, and with some true measure of success. BUT, you cannot impose anything for long. People react and retreat under compulsion. Just to present the message, and to let the people accept it or reject it—that is the only paying method of procedure. "The other fellow's point of view"—I do not see how we can call the Chinese ungrateful. Only when we measure evidences with the measuring apparatus of the Chinese and the Mexicans and every other nation under heaven may we expect wars to cease throughout the world and the swords of our neighbors to be beaten into ploughshares.

WE HEAR so much about "National Honor." It suggests the words of Dr. Johnson, "Patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel." I am for America, and unqualifiedly; but I am, also, for humanity, and—"the other fellow's point of view." It is possible for national honor to become national dishonor unless we have a care. Christ said that a good Samaritan was better than a bad Jew any day. And, a bad Jew in His estimation was the Jew who was only a Jew. "Which of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbor to him that fell among the thieves?" "He who showed mercy upon him." Exactly—the man who put himself in the place of the wounded traveler, and helped him as he would have helped himself or have desired help under similar circumstances.

PEOPLE ARE DIFFERENT. Let us realize it. Even Psychologists are different, and the modern kind! Here is one man who says: "If a man does not look you straight in the eyes, beware—he is a shifty and crafty customer." Here is another Psychologist who says: "If a man looks you in the eyes, beware—he is a brazen creature." Evidently the truth is to be found somewhere between the two extremes! People ARE different. Let us try to realize it and appreciate it by the GRACE of GOD.

Cheerful Confidences

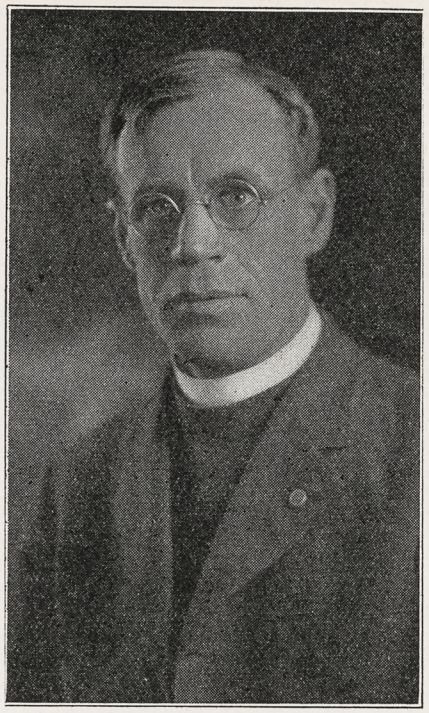
NOW FOR THE PERSONAL CAMPAIGN

By Rev. George Parkin Atwater

JACK had plenty of enthusiasm and many ideas. Great things were expected of him, when he was employed to sell radio sets to individual customers, in a given territory. Jack went to his work with vigor, and the territory assigned to him was soon aware that radio sets were available. He advertised. He placed a set in an advantageous place in a candy store, and gave free concerts. He spread circulars about, and had placards placed in conspicuous places. He carried a set to the annual meeting of the "Society for Providing Special Can Openers for Left-Handed Persons" (in which you could buy a life membership for $100), and entertained the crowd. He opened an agency and leaving a clerk in charge, he rushed up to headquarters.

"How are things coming, Jack?" inquired the boss.

"Fine," said Jack, "I have them sitting up and taking notice. We had twenty people looking in our front windows the very first morning we opened up. Better speed up production a little, to take care of us."



"We'll just wait a week, Jack, before we build an addition to the factory. Drop in next month."

In a month Jack again reported.

"It's great," he said to the boss, "I am giving the people a concert every day. I have ads in all the papers. I have joined three organizations, and speak to dozens of acquaintances on the street."

"How many sales?" asked the boss.

"Just around the corner," said Jack. "No sales yet, but we have the best window display in town."

BISHOP ROBERTS
To Lecture at Rural School

A month later Jack again reported. He was not quite so optimistic. He hadn't enough sales to pay expenses.

"Those people are hard-boiled," said Jack. "They just don't respond to anything. They don't want radios, or, if they do, they rush off and buy some inferior article."

In the end Jack gave up the territory. Jim came on the job. Jim didn't try to lure the whole town to his show windows or concerts. But Jim took means to discover a man who had never had the radio properly presented, and he took time to interest that man. For the moment, the world market for Jim was one man. At the end of his campaign Jim sold a radio, and incidentally learned a good deal about the community and its needs. Jim worked along slowly with individuals. Every prospect was followed to some definite conclusion. Jim sold radios, not by trying to persuade a whole townful of people at once, but by fastening into a likely customer and giving him complete and exhaustive attention.

The people gave concerts for him in their homes, to friends and visitors. Every set sold created a prospective customer or two.

This is a parable of parish work.

A very few parishes are able to advertise fine music, interesting sermon topics, and a general attractiveness, and by such methods receive enough attention to get a congregation. Too often it is a fickle crowd, large numbers of whom have not the slightest interest in the parish. If the faithful few will continue to pay bills, the crowd will give an impression of successful work.

But most parishes are not built up in this way. Only in rare instances does this general method upbuild a parish. A parish must be strengthened by persistent personal attention to individuals. A "prospect" must be attached by special attention to his needs. He may be a victim of wrong ideas about religion and the Church, and he must be re-educated. And he must be assimilated by attachment to a parish group of some sort, so that he will find normal satisfaction in friendly relations with those who will welcome him, know him by name, and permit him to share in some common task.

Ninety-five per cent of our parishes must grow, if at all, from work with children, and from persistent personal approach. To prepare to read services, preach and sing to the hypothetical crowds that ought to respond to our general appeals, is to beat the air.

The personal approach of rector and competent workers in our parishes to unattached individuals and families is the most vital missionary work that confronts the Episcopal Church.

Let's Know

DO WE DO IT?

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

LET me give you the following letter just as it comes to me. It is unsigned which it shouldn't be, but I assume the writer is in earnest.

"May I inquire why the Church does not provide a Bible Class for the instruction of the people? What a wonderful awakening could be realized if every Church devoted one evening a week to Bible instruction and permitted the every-day man and woman to attend them — overlooking social and class distinctions as Christ did, working for redemption and salvation and a better race of men and women, in place of the present Church policy which is fostering degeneracy and lunacy. Hoping the Church may consider the great need of the people for spiritual instruction. Respectfully ——."

First, let it be said that the Church is by no means unmindful of the value of Bible classes; neither is it indolent in its interest in them. The Bible class was one of the outstanding points emphasized in the Bishop's Crusade. The Brotherhood of St. Andrew promotes them industriously. They are part of the program of the Department of Religious Education and good material is provided for use in such classes. Moreover there are a lot of parishes where Bible classes are actually being conducted very satisfactorily and to the great benefit of all concerned.

To be sure there are practical difficulties in conducting a Bible Class in the Episcopal Church as it is usually conducted in other communions on a Sunday morning. The average Rector has two services every Sunday morning and very likely a children's service besides. There are physical limits to what one man can do on one day. This, of course, would not interfere with a class during the week and many such are held. Competition with other interests is apt to be keen on a week-night and consecutive attendance is not always easy. I recall one woman who urged me with much persistence to start a Bible class on a week-night and when I did it she was conspicuous by her regular absence. I am not sure whether her absence contributed to degeneracy and lunacy on her part but, if so, the Church was not responsible in her case.

Having said so much—let me emphasize the importance of just such classes. Ours is a teaching Church and our people ought to be taught. Moreover, on the whole, they welcome it. They are much more interested in instruction than in exhortation and, generally speaking, it is better for them. One of the main features of Lenten observance in my own parish for several years has been Monday evening instruction classes. This year we are talking, with much chalk and several blackboards, about the period between the Old and New Testaments. We average an attendance of one hundred persons by actual count and this is not a large parish. One reason why people do not read their Bibles as much as they should is because they find them dull. And the reason they find them dull is because they have not the back-ground to enable them to read intelligently. That, I think is the most important function of a Bible Class—to supply people with a back-ground for their own Bible reading. The Book of Daniel, for instance, is a collection of childish stories and night-marish visions to the casual reader and is, therefore, quite unimpressive. Put it where it belongs as a powerful plea for faith and spiritual courage given to the Jews who were suffering under the insane persecutions of a half-mad Syrian king in the second century B. C., and it becomes an inspiration. Yes—let's have more Bible classes.

The annual retreat for men and women in the diocese of Connecticut was recently held at the Church Mission of Help, Bridgeport; largely attended.

An Offer

A NUMBER of inquiries have been received in regard to an offer recently made to the clergy. For each new subscription to this paper (not renewals), or for a Bundle order for at least ten copies for at least thirteen weeks, we offered an Auto-Strop razor, with the accessories, exactly as illustrated in the picture that accompanied the letter. This unusual offer is made possible through an advertising contract that we have made with the manufacturer, and stands until the supply is exhausted. Clergymen having a standing order for a Bundle will be sent a razor if they will write us a note signifying their intention to continue with their Bundle. Any clergyman is entitled to this premium who sends us one new subscription for a year, the subscription price of $2 to accompany the order.

About the Bible

AN OLD BOOK AND A NEW ONE
Reviewed by the Rev. F. R. Myers

THE MESSAGES OF THE BOOKS. Being Discourses and Notes on the Books of the New Testament. F. W. Farrar, Dean of Westminster. Macmillan, $2.50.

This is a republication of a book long out of print. In that fact is the basis for the only possible adverse criticism which might be made of this volume. It is written for the general reader, who cannot be expected to be familiar with events or dates in the life of Dean Farrar, and yet nowhere in it is there any indication that it was written in 1884 rather than in 1927. This omission, although no doubt unintentional, detracts from the value of the book and is bound to be misleading to those for whom is is intended. Much water has gone over the dam in New Testament study in forty-odd years and any book which purports to give a scholarly interpretation of the Books of the New Testament for popular reading ought, in strict honesty, to be dated. That is especially true when positions are supported, as here, which scholars have almost universally abandoned. For example, Dean Farrar insists that the Synoptic Gospels are entirely independent of any docementary inter-relationship. It is hard to believe that Dean Farrar would defend this thesis if he were now living.

When this single blemish is noted there remains for the book only the highest praise. In a series of thirty sermon lectures Dean Farrar (he was not Dean Farrar when these were written), in his inimitably graphic and clear style, discusses the occasion, the form, the content and the message of each of the twenty-seven Books of the New Testament. He maintains the thoroughly modern emphasis upon the study and understanding of the Books of the Bible as units rather than by isolated verses or chapters, and he presents a most interesting and readable presentation of the emphasis. Clergy and interested lay people will find it both useful and stimulating.

THE STORY OF JESUS. And the Beginnings of the Christian Church. Benjamin W. Bacon. Century $2.50.

Do you want to know what "Higher Criticism" is all about? Are you curious to read a book in which scholars' opinions on sources and dates and authenticity of the Gospels are discussed in simple, interesting, untechnical language? Do you wonder if the thoroughgoing critic has any religion, and, if he has, what it is like? If any of these questions touch you then Professor Bacon's book was written for you.

The questions noted above are not academic, they are very much alive. The prominence of the Fundamentalist-Modernist controversy has thrown the whole subject of Biblical criticism into the field of popular discussion. There must be many people in the Church who would really like to know just what the best modern scholarship has to say about the New Testament but who do not know where to find it in a form which they can use. And there are many others who are fearful both of the purpose and the consequences of critical study and who do not know quite what to make of the fact that most of the clergy of the Church accept the results of Higher Criticism. For both these classes no book can be more highly recommended than "The Story of Jesus." Professor Bacon is one of the most painstaking and learned of American scholars. He is always reverent and deeply devoted to the person of Jesus. He neither "talks down" to his readers, nor "over their heads."

NEWS FROM THE WESTERN DIOCESE

In Brief Paragraphs

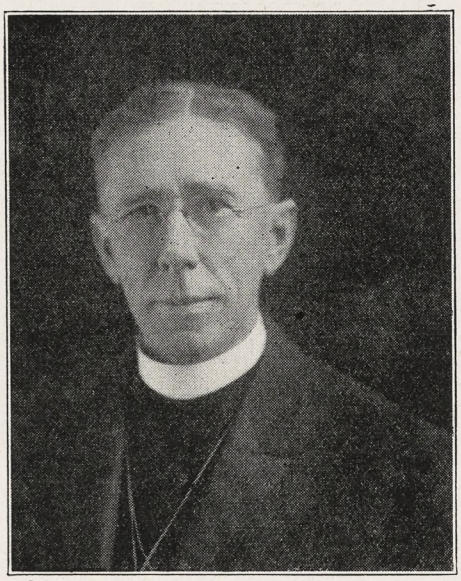
Edited by

BISHOP W. BERTRAND STEVENS

THE BISHOP of Sacramento in his convention address of 1927 has made a strong appeal for the small dioceses. Of his own dioceses he says:

"Here we are in a vast mountainous and rural section of the country, with an area of 50,000 square miles, with no big cities, large parishes or Church people of wealth. We carry on 17 parishes and 37 missions, 54 in all. We have work and institutions among Indians, whites and foreign born. We provide support of the bishop, including salary, house, pension premium and traveling expenses. We have an Archdeacon who is general missionary and executive secretary. We furnish our own appropriations for the Executive Council and its departments, pay for our own upkeep, motors, secretaries, taxes, repairs and new undertakings.

"We draw this support from our people in small towns, who are already carrying along rectors, rectories, parish houses, pension premiums and motor appropriations.



"We are informed that this Diocese has a larger number of self supporting rural parishes than any other in the United States. We are proud of this fact. We do not wish to change it. We haven't the slightest desire to go back to our former condition of dependency as a Missionary District.

"The hardship is in the fact that we cannot give our clergy a living salary and therefore are in constant danger of losing them to a stronger Diocese or to a Missionary District, which is allowed a large fund for supplementing clergy salaries.

"Because we are a Diocese we are largely left out of the general budget. No National Council underwrites our needs or even seeks to know what they are. Sympathetic officials write gracious letters, regretting, wishing there was more money, while Missionary Bishops get together, formulate budgets which are guaranteed by headquarters and in addition are given an appeal to the whole Church which a Diocesan Bishop cannot secure, although his problems and struggles are precisely the same."

The Church property at Lake Tahoe has been repaired and improved. The chapel of the Transfiguration at this popular resort is one of the most interesting and unique of summer chapels. Bishop Moreland arranges each summer for preachers of distinction and ability to officiate for a month or two at a time and the Church is presented with dignity and helpfulness at this strategic center.

How doth the busy editor
For want of something better
His brain belabor to replace

Seventy-six members of the Los Angeles Clericus gathered on April 4th at a luncheon at the University Club in honor of Sir Henry Lunn, who made a most happy and interesting address. His words gave his hearers a sympathetic understanding of his rich and somewhat dramatic career, and made them appreciate more than ever his valuable services to international peace and the cause of Christian unity. Sir Henry addressed the student bodies of local colleges and preached at St. Paul's Cathedral.

An unusual bit of social service is recorded of the Rev. E. C. Schmeiser of Cashmere, Washington. Apple harvesters arrived in the community long before the fruit was ready to harvest. Mr. Schmeiser used his parish house as a community centre, established an employment agency where over 2,100 persons were interviewed and 1,500 registered. By getting in touch with employers many of the men were placed at work. It became necessary to serve one meal a day which consisted of beans, bread and coffee. For this a charge of five cents was made. The food was donated by merchants and residents who have been so appreciative of the service rendered that they have urged its continuance during the coming year.

Bishop Wells, the retired Bishop of Spokane, retains his interest in his former diocese. He has a special fondness for St. Paul's School, Walla Walla, and this year added a considerable sum to its endowment fund by sacrificing his winter trip to a warmer climate, a trip which has been his custom for several years. Of his services the principal says; "Too much credit can never be given to Bishop Wells for his devoted service to St. Paul's School which owes to him not only its founding, but also its preservation in several crises that threatened its existence."

Noonday preachers at St. Paul's Cathedral, Los Angeles, Calif., included this Lent, besides Bishop Stevens and Dean Beal, the Rev. Paul Bull, C. R.; Archbishop de Pencier, of British Columbia; Bishop Sanford, Bishop Moreland, Dr. Deems of Trinity Church, San Francisco and Dr. Gardner, student chaplain of Stanford University. These services were preceded by half-hour organ recitals by guest organists. St. Paul's is one of the few downtown churches in Los Angeles, and the attendance at these noonday services is showing a gratifying growth from year to year.

The Rev. John W. Mulder, former Congregationalist minister at Corning, New York, was ordained to the priesthood in Christ Church, Corning, on April 2nd, Bishop Ferris officiating, the rector, Rev. George B. Kinkead, presenting the candidate. Mr. Mulder was received into the Church last year and has been in charge of Zion Church, Avon, New York, where he has done an unusual bit of work. He is a graduate of the Yale Divinity School.

MOST of you will be familiar with the picture. It is the architect's drawing of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine now being constructed in New York City. It is different from the other pictures that you probably have seen inasmuch as the tower has been changed, thus making it purely Gothic.

Last summer I had a lot of fun with a half-dozen seminary students who took jobs in factories in and around Boston. We met for conferences over week-ends at the Cambridge Theological Seminary, with experts sitting in who told us what in their opinion a clergyman ought to know. This summer plans are being made for a group in Chicago. The men will live together at some centre where they will be brought into touch with the interesting side of Chicago; the president of one of the building trade unions has agreed to help the men get jobs, which means that they may be given the opportunity to study unionism from the inside; and conferences will be had with employers and union leaders. There will be pilgrimages to the stock yards, steel mills, the trade board of the clothing industry and other places worth seeing. All of this is merely the plan. It will be carried out only if at least a half dozen seminarians or college students are sufficiently interested to get at life in this way. This paragraph is printed with the hope that it will catch the eye of several of them. If you are close to students perhaps you will place this in the hand of some likely chap with the suggestion that he write to me at 416 Lafayette Street, New York City. I can guarantee an interesting summer—I have been in the town long enough to know places and folks, so I am sure we can have a lot of fun.

Other subjects to be discussed will be: "Do the new thought and health cults contribute anything to Christianity"; "How can Christianity satisfy the religious needs of all races"; "In what sense our Church should be Catholic"; "In what sense our Church should be Protestant"; "The relation of Christianity to political and industrial democracy"; "Evangelism — Its aims and methods"; "Some aids to personal religion, the Bible, the Sacraments, prayer."

The Round Table Fellowship, held on Monday evenings of Lent, came to its close and climax Monday, April 4th. The address, given by Dr. Lynn Harold Hough of the Central Methodist Church, Detroit, was one of the most charming and stimulating utterances ever heard at the Cathedral. Taking as his subject "Expanding Horizons," Dr. Hough sketched, in an autobiographical strain, the story of growing appreciation of various schools of religious thought. and soul to its ministry, Dr. Hough said that the great communion to which he belonged stood for the supreme importance of religious experience. During the years of his development, however, Dr. Hough had found that there were other religious values. So, Congregationalism stands for independence of thought; Presbyterianism stands for definite and carefully-argued conviction; Anglicanism for the worship of God in the beauty of holiness; and Romanism for the ideals of corporate solidarity. Even there the speaker did not find that his expanding sympathies stood still, but went on to speak of the meditative charm and deep spiritual values in the life of Gautama Buddha, and experienced by many of his followers. Last of all, he paid an unexpected tribute to Mohammedanism, which he said stood for the active and positive doing of the will of God; a salutary off-set to the passive, resignation-attitude to that will. The Round Table Fellowships, under the direction of Mr. E. E. Piper, diocesan superintendent of Religious Education, have gathered together, week by week, about two hundred men, studying the problems of devotional life, the adjustments of human relationships and science in modern life.

A notable rectorship comes to an end on June 5th when the Rev. Peregrine Wroth, for fifty-one years rector of the Messiah, Baltimore, retires from the active ministry. The Rev. James A. Hugh Benson's passion play, "The Upper Room" was given by members of the Berkeley Divinity School during Passiontide. The performance of the play made a deep impression upon large audiences, many being literally moved to tears by the series of beautiful and touching scenes. So much was this the case that the play had to be given three times in succession.

The success of the play was largely due to the interest and organizing skill of Mrs. Carpenter, wife of the Rev. S. C. Carpenter, the visiting English lecturer at Berkeley this year. Benson's play was somewhat modified and Roman accretions to the Gospel story eliminated. Mr. Carpenter himself played the part of Peter, Professor Hedrick of the Berkeley faculty that of Judas, Mrs. Hedrick that of Mary Magdalene, Mrs. Ladd helped in the singing; the part of the Blessed Virgin was taken by Miss Raftery, and the other parts by students in the school.

This cheering note comes from Mr. Charles A. Tomkins, assistant treasurer of the National Council:

"There are sixteen dioceses that have paid or overpaid the minimum amount due to April first as against ten dioceses in 1926.

"At the present time we are focusing our thoughts for the next three months to come with the hope that with the Easter offerings and the children's Lenten offering that we may be able to go well on into the summer without loans from any source.

The Rev. Caleb Stetson, rector of Trinity, New York, said: "China and Asia are rebelling against industrialism and commercialism, against the machinery that is making a slave of man. We white men pride ourselves on our wealth, our riches, our big activities, our mass production. We say that spiritual stuff is from the pulpit and it gets us nowhere in the world. The Chinese have long resented this attitude, silently. They live for life itself. And I cannot say that I blame them for at last rebelling against the restraints of our civilization."

Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick said: "The most disturbing fact about the Crucifixion is that those who sent Christ to death were just ordinary business men acting from familiar and ordinary motives. First the religious people who felt their prejudices to be very sacred; second, the business men who discovered that large profits feel very good; and, third, the politicians who helped kill him merely to play safe."

Rev. Frederick Swindlehurst has served in the diocese of Albany for twenty-two years. He resigned from his rectorship at Scotia the other day to accept an appointment as chaplain of Immigration Service at Toronto. Lots of parties and gifts by way of farewell; $500 of glittering gold from the vestry; traveling case and a typewriter from a guild; $150 from a community club; a check from Dr. Brooks, rector of St. Thomas's, New York, formerly the archdeacon of Albany; a trunk, umbrella, fountain pen and desk set from the police and fire departments, and a watch from the men of St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church. Somebody ought to have given him a truck to get his gifts to Canada. Such treatment will tempt a lot of parsons to resign.

Reports generally of attendance at Lenten services are that they are larger than usual. In some instances it is no doubt, due to the fact that several churches have united for their services, as for example, with the churches of the Heights in Brooklyn, St. Ann's, Holy Trinity and Grace. With them, combined services have been held afternoons during Lent with fine congregations. Recent preachers have been the Rev. Frank W. Crowder, rector of St. James,' New York, and Bishop Oldham of Albany.

The Fellowship of Reconciliation has sent a communication to 30,000 clergymen, including our own, urging them not to sit quietly by and allow another world war to develop under their noses. It is accompanied by a letter from Bishop Jones, in which he says: "The question of war and Christianity is no academic speculation, as the current dispatches from China, Mexico and Nicaragua show. The 'next war' is here now, even though it may not be formally declared; for many of the methods of war are being used by our government. And further, the newspaper correspondents at Washington are convinced that it is the intention of the administration to raise the embargo on arms to Mexico very shortly. That would mean still more war. We are sending out this communication in the hope that ministers generally may face the issues involved as a growing number already have done, so that the Church as a whole may not be caught unprepared."

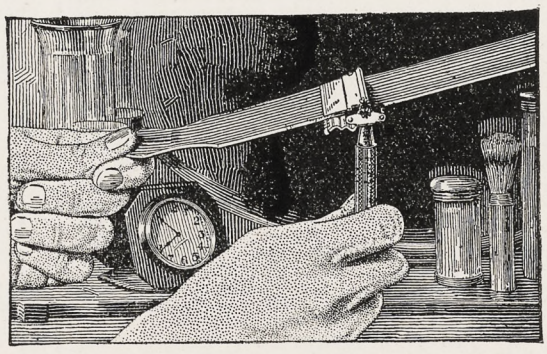
Consider Your Face

ISN'T it worth the best razor you could buy—the razor that will provide a smooth, keen-edged blade for every shave?

The cutting edge on all razor blades is dulled after each shave. The infinitesimal teeth which make up the blade edge should be stropped back into alignment—or your skin will be scraped and roughened with a dull, rough edged blade. Avoid this discomfort. Save your face! Valet AutoStrop Razor is the only razor that sharpens its own blades—while the blade remains in the razor. A smooth, keen-edged blade for every shave.

Each outfit is complete with case, razor, strop and extra blades. For sale at all stores carrying shaving supplies.



GUARANTEE

We wish that every user of a Valet AutoStrop Razor be constantly enthusiastic. Should anything happen to yours affecting its perfect service, send it to us and we will restore it to perfect condition, without charge.

Rheumatism

A Remarkable Home Treatment Given by One Who Had It

In the year of 1893 I was attacked by Muscular and Sub-Acute Rheumatism. I suffered as only those who are thus afflicted know for over three years. I tried remedy after remedy, but such relief as I obtained was only temporary. Finally, I found a treatment that cured me completely and such a pitiful condition has never returned. I have given it to a number who were terribly afflicted, even bedridden, some of them seventy to eighty years old, and the results were the same as in my own case.

I want every sufferer from any form of muscular and sub-acute (swelling of the joints) rheumatism, to try the great value of my improved "Home Treatment" for its remarkable healing power. Don't send a cent; simply mail your name and address, and I will send it free to try. After you have used it, and it has proven itself to be that long-looked-for means of getting rid of such forms of rheumatism, you may send the price of it, One Dollar, but understand I do not want your money unless you are perfectly satisfied to send it. Isn't that fair? Why suffer any longer, when relief is thus offered you free. Don't delay. Write today.

Irvin S. Cobb recently acquired a son-in-law and before and during the ceremony a number of questions were put up to him to settle as the nominal head of the family. One problem was submitted by his (then) prospective son-in-law.

"I don't know how to address Mrs. Cobb," he said. "How did you address your mother-in-law?"

"Well," replied Mr. Cobb, "it was this way: For the first year I called her 'Say' and after that we all called her 'Grandma'."

North Adams, Mass. Demonstrates Wonderful Community Spirit in Church Campaign

On February 14th, the Methodist Episcopal Church at North Adams was burned to the ground. The city appreciated that this was a community loss, but few believed that sufficient funds for the re-building of a Church for the Methodists was possible at this time, particularly in view of local industrial conditions. But the Congregation of less than 900, including old and young, became impatient; our firm was consulted and our Wayne A. Sarcka was sent to meet with the official board.

It was agreed that a campaign should be launched without delay, since the Methodists were compelled to meet in a High School Auditorium for Sunday worship. With less than three weeks of preparation, a campaign for $150,000 was started; one hundred and sixty men and women enlisted—forty of whom represented teams from Churches of other denominations, under the leadership of H. B. Clark, a Baptist, and a Jewish team voluntarily joined the enterprise. In short, the interest and co-operation of the entire community was secured.

Despite adverse business conditions, the goal of $150,000 was secured in five days, an achievement which everyone considered extraordinary for North Adams. Members of all Churches worked and contributed liberally, demonstrating that there is a real, live, happy relationship between the Churches in the City. Accordingly, a new Church will rise from the ashes of the old edifice and a new dawn for the Methodists in the city at the foot of the Mohawk Trail. This is Mr. Sarcka's fourth consecutive Church victory.

Church Must Help Solve Old Question

BY IRWIN ST. JOHN TUCKER

RECENTLY, some forty students, both boys and girls, have killed themselves, leaving notes expressing despair with life. Most of them were in college, some in high school. Their number attracted attention because they were students, and because most of them laid their self-destruction to the philosophy they had learned in school.

But day by day suicides of old men, middle aged men, young men, deserted wives and betrayed girls, occur in numbers past accounting. Nobody troubles to add them up. In an appalling number of cases, fathers and mothers destroy two or three children together with themselves. It is a standing joke in newspaper offices, where most jokes are ghastly—"Keep stock head No. 1 standing in type: "KILLS WIFE AND SELF."

These daily horrors occur because of hopelessness; no job, no money, no friends, no prospects, long-continued illness. Economic maladjustment is to blame. But student suicides are not traceable to economic maladjustment. In most cases, life has been far too easy. From kindergarten on through college life has been one long career of ease. There has been no struggle to develop spiritual backbone.

MATERIALISM

By a majority of them, blame is laid on the materialist philosophy of life. This philosophy is blamable for more than suicide. The world was startled by the "thrill murder" of Bobbie Franks by Leopold and Loeb. Two young collegians, of immensely wealthy families, with brilliant prospects, had so exhausted the joys of pleasure that they turned to murder for a new sensation.

Arthur Rich, collegian, son of a wealthy Michigan manufacturer, is spending his life in prison for criminally assaulting a girl student. Three young collegians in Illinois are spending twenty-five years of their lives in the penitentiary for criminally assaulting a girl student. Nine Chicago boys were sent to prison recently for murdering a peddler. They laughed as they went. The average age of criminals has moved down from thirty to sixteen. Gangs of boy criminals, with girls aiding and abetting them, multiply in every city. "Bob-haired bandits" have become a joke. "Sheik slayers" are a matter of course. Crimes against children multiply.

This swift spreading rottenness is not the product of the slums. It cannot be laid to ignorance and poverty. Girls and youths of highest breeding and great wealth take part in it. The low-grade criminal, the "moron" as we used to call him, has been outclassed by the high-pressure criminal, product of educated wealth.

NO RIGHT OR WRONG

Coupled with this moral rottenness is the idea that there is no responsibility for anything. Anybody who commits a crime is immediately proclaimed to be insane, and therefore to be cuddled. After the atrocious murder of Bobby Franks, their lawyer pleaded in court, with tears in his eyes, for "these poor boys"—Leopold and Loeb! Harold Croarkin, who seduced and then murdered little Walter Schmith, aged six, was described as "this poor, sick boy." Two young bandits who shot in cold blood a taxi driver and an engaged pair sitting in front of the girl's own home, were slobbered over by a maudlin group of clergy, beseeching pity on the ground that they—the murderers—"never had a chance." The doctrine of responsibility has gone. There seems to be no longer any right or wrong.

THE CROSS ARTICLES

Some months ago THE WITNESS published articles by a divinity student, an undergraduate at one of the great Midwestern Universities. He analyzed the philosophy current at his university, taught at practically all of them, as entirely destroying any idea of responsibility. We are not causes, but phenomena. There is neither praise nor blame. We cannot be blamed if we do wrong, nor praised if we do right, because there is neither right nor wrong.

He cited, as a necessary result of this teaching, the rotting of moral fibre. He gave instances, as almost any student at any university could give, of the indulgence of unwed girl students with men students. Immediately there was a terrific hullabaloo. Wilford Cross was denounced by officials and directors of universities, and his statements branded as lies.

Everybody seems to know about these things except the clergy. A famed missioner of one of the monastic orders told me, "A certain bishop once asked me 'What do you do, when a man comes to you for confession? What does he say?' I replied, 'Well, he tells me what he has been doing that's wrong; perhaps stealing, perhaps adultery.' And the bishop replied, in a shocked tone, 'Adultery! Oh, no! Not in the Episcopal Church!'"

Every known variety of sin is to be found among the members of any fair-sized Episcopal church, as it is among the members of any other church, or lodge, or factory. If that were not true, the Prayer Book, with its continual reiteration of "Miserable sinners" would be a lying jest. Yet, when a divinity student attempts to analyze the causes of the spreading immorality, he is howled down by the clergy.

What would you think of a medical school which tried to prevent its students from discovering that there is such a thing as disease? What would you think of a school of engineering which tried to prevent its students from knowing that steel, under certain strains, and unbraced, will break? What, then, must we think of a Church which stifles an attempt at pointing out, calmly and dispassionately, that moral fibre, under certain strains, and unbraced, will break?

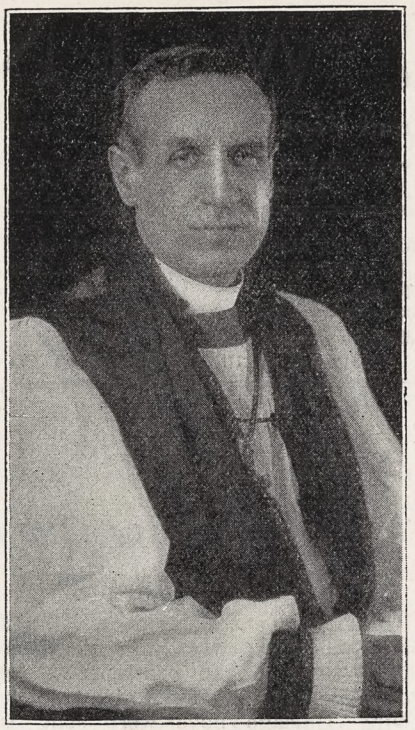
In Lewis Sinclair's latest book, "Elmer Gantry," is described a conference of ministers, at which the Roman Catholic priest observes, "The Catholic Church is not nearly so much shocked as some others seem to be at the discovery that sinners frequently sin." Stifling discussion of sin is not only cowardice. It is not only treachery. It is a confession of spiritual bankruptcy—this hushing up of all discussion of what is being talked of in every home and in every newspaper, in every high school, in every college; namely, conditions under which the animal, so strong in all of us, demands and obtains its gratification.

Church's Task

How shall the moral fiber be made strong to resist temptation?



That, I take it, is the chief business of the Church. When physicians conceal reports of an epidemic, they are not only cowardly, but treacherous. They confess not only incompetence, but collusion. When The Witness met that storm, outsiders looked on bewildered, as a spectator might look at a man holding a blanket in front of a fire, to hide it from view, while it devoured his home.

Take two or three thousand young men and women, at the most inflammable age; tear them loose from all old moorings of home and church; put them in an atmosphere wherein all old things are derided, wherein man is regarded as a meaningless phenomenon, a chemical reaction without responsibility—and the result is as if one dropped matches into kerosene.

No Leadership

Two years ago, at a mass meeting of Young People in connection with a diocesan convention in a large Mid-Western city, three bishops spoke. One of them said, "I do not know what to say to you young people. I do not know what message would appeal to you." Another said, "I would like to have the young people talk to us. We older men would learn much from them." The third said, "I was chaplain of an army cantonment during the war, where not less than 7,000 men, young men, reported themselves attached to the Episcopal Church. There were never more than three of them—not three hundred, but three—who attended our service on any Sunday."

Three public confessions of utter incompetence, from three leaders—three bishops!

Bishop Booth
Brings Army to Vermont

If the Bishops' Crusade wakens the Episcopal Church to a realization of its incredible spiritual poverty; if it stuns it into a knowledge of the vast spiritual splendors which wait ready to break into it from every side; if it convinces its members, including its clergy, that the soul of the world is at stake, it will have been worth while.

What can one say of a Church which relies on the tombs of its ancestors to prove that it is a child of the Holy Ghost? Jesus said it: he said it to the Scribes and Pharisees: "Hypocrites!" . . . "I say unto you, God is able of these stones to raise up," successors of the Apostles.

Is God dead? Do we have to find God among the tombs of the Historic Episcopate? Is the Holy Spirit bound up in the black and white of a bishop's robe? "He is a God of the Living, not of the dead," said Jesus.

What shall we say to these eager young spirits who are surveying vast new empires of dazzling knowledge, breaking upon their eyes? What can the Church say to young college men and women before whose vision astronomy, biology, geology, zoology, chemistry, physics, are unveiling the very workshop and laboratory of the Almighty? Hand them a prayerbook, and tell them to arrange the flowers on the altar on the third Sunday in every month? Or has the Church a vital contribution to make? A discussion of this question is herewith proposed.

Cheerful Confidences

FOLLOW UP THE VISITOR

By Rev. George P. Atwater

LAST WEEK I wrote in this column of the necessity of personal missions. Today I wish to point out a field for personal effort that is apt to be overlooked. Almost every parish in our land is guilty of neglecting a very obvious source of human supply for the upbuilding of a parish.

Many a parish is like the owner of a tract of land which was not sufficiently irrigated. The owner began to dream of a huge dam built across an adjacent river, that would divert a large body of water to his land. Had his project been possible he would have had a volume of water a hundred fold more abundant than he could possibly use. It might even reduce his land to a swamp.

Not far from this tract was a small spring whose waters found some quick outlet to the river. If he could arrange to have the waters from that spring flow to his land, they would be sufficient to make it productive.

Suppose the crowds suddenly took the Church at its word, and every unattached person should suddenly turn up at Church. The Church would be swamped and helpless. The tide would soon recede because the individuals thereof could not have personal attention.

The Church puts an "ad" in the Saturday papers, and says "Everybody welcome." On Sunday four persons appear at Church as the result of that "ad." The vital question then is "What are we going to do for these four persons?"

Are we going to say, "We provide a warm church, soft cushions, good music, and thus give them an opportunity to worship. What more can they expect?" If we say that, the Church might as well make arrangements today with the diocese for the subsidy that it is going to need at some future time. Decay is inevitable.

But if it really believes in missions, that Church is going to do something about those four visitors.

I think it is not too much to say that probably on every Sunday of the year an average of 25,000 strangers drop in at the Episcopal Churches in our land.

These persons are the most fruitful field of our missionary effort.

If we let them slide out without any attempt to gain their attention, or their interest, we are overlooking our best chance to propel the Episcopal Church.

What appears in any parish to be a tiny trickle of prospects, is in fact a mighty army.

Most churches let this little contingent slip away, Sunday by Sunday, without any attention whatsoever. And the visitors go off muttering "That's the last time I'll ever go into that refrigerator."

Copyright 2020. Archives of the Episcopal Church / DFMS. Permission required for reuse and publication.

What can we do about it? Naturally we cannot be completely efficient in extracting the valuable ore from this stream of visitors. But we ought to attempt to do these things:

1. We ought to give the visitors a good pew, and see that he has some clear guide to the service in which he may wish to participate.

2. We ought to give him a cordial greeting as he leaves, and make an earnest effort to secure his name and address.

3. We ought to place in his hands some pamphlet which will give him the fundamental information about the Church in general, and about the parish.

4. We ought to have some one call on him within a week.

5. We ought to extend an invitation either after the service, or during a call, to some group meeting.

6. We ought to persist in this attention until it is apparent that our work is hopeless.

If "missions" has any real meaning for you, and is not merely a sentimental emotion about the needs of people in remote places, then try to practice "missions" in your own parish.

The most deplorable tendency in the Church today is to blame the golf clubs, the automobile, the radio and the spirit of the age for our troubles. A season of self-examination would not be amiss.

THE TEST OF DISCIPLESHIP

The Need of Love and Self-Sacrifice

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

THERE is a human appeal which has no relation to economic, scientific or legalistic reactions. It is a legitimate appeal.

When someone comes into our life who makes this appeal we are not concerned as to whether we are going to make money out of him, or add to our store of information from him, or be more law-abiding citizens because of him. We love him simply because he is lovable. He may or may not help us in any of the above ways, yet we are drawn to him, enjoy being with him and are anxious to render him any service which he may require. It is a joy to make sacrifices for him.

Of course there are bipeds who have smothered these instincts and with whom my association is an endurance test.

I have been ogled by such specimens and have felt that their appraisal was similar to that which an expert might bestow upon an ox, or a psycho-analyst might give to a case, or a lawyer might render a client. What am I going to get out of this specimen? It is this sort of attitude which the Pharisees had toward Christ when they asked him when the Kingdom was to come. Christ's reply was a striking one, "The Kingdom of God cometh not with observation." The Greek word for observation carries with it the meaning of "censorious appraisal." It answers a lot of critics in a word.

But Christ amplified this further: "The Kingdom of God is within you."

Ah! You must bring something to Christ before He will impart anything to you.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, except you become as little children you cannot enter—not even the porch of the Kingdom." What is this quality which must mark your approach to the Master? I rather think that it is the direct opposite of sophistication. Children are not always attractive but they have almost invariably a wistful capacity for friendship which sophisticated people are incapable of giving.

So your failure to appreciate Christ may not be due at all to any failure on His part to be winsome, but rather to an utter incapacity on your part to receive or impart friendship.

Christ was very tired of people who tried to impress Him with their self-conscious rectitude. He was very responsive to all sorts of curious people who longed for a friend. He was ready to be a friend to the very least of these in spite of their sins and their heresies. This does not mean that he justified them in these sins or heresies but that without the capacity to love and to be loved mere rectitude and orthodoxy were unsatisfactory. They were mere humans with the human left out.

"She was forgiven much because she loved much." She had a capacity for love in spite of her misuse of life, and she was willing to manifest that love in personal sacrifice.

"If you love me, keep my commandments."

Of course you will. If God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son as an act of love: and if that Son willingly gave of Himself for love, then our test is to meet Him half-way.

The Son of God has manifested Himself to man as the most lovable of men, and manifestly it is only those who crave affection who will find in Him that which they seek. Christ appeals to the instinct for fellowship in men and I very much question whether He cares to be under critical observation, either as a condition to or as a result of His fellowship. After all, if He is what He claims to be, He could not overlook the presumption of those who would reject His advances and try to substitute their own approaches. He does not want your money, your opinions or your approval unless with it you give your fellowship.

If Christ really died for us and we really believe that He did, love is the only response we can make and self-sacrifice in the only guarantee of our love.

It is the way that the dear Lord has of leading us out of our little self-centered lives, looking for admiration and applause, into another kind of a life in which we are longing for the fellowship of one who satisfies our hunger for real friendship.

The test of our faith is not to be found in faultless logic, but in our desperate need and his capacity to satisfy that need.

A DEBATE

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

I WONDER how many people ever read any of the books of the Apochrypha, which are properly a part of any complete version of the Bible?

There is an interesting story told in the First Book of Esdras which has to do with Zerubbabel, royal prince of the house of Judah, and the effort of the Jews to rebuild their Temple after the return from the Babylonian captivity.

Josephus, the Jewish historian, supplies the introductory information that the work on the Temple had been held up by hostile influences and that Zerubbabel had finally offered to make the journey from Jerusalem back to Babylon to make a personal plea for help from Darius, the Persian king.

Then we read how Darius made a great banquet to which he invited all the notables of his kingdom. After much liquid refreshment Darius felt inclined to sleep. During the royal slumbers Zerubbabel and two other young men of the palace were discussing a promise of the king that the one who propounded the wisest sentence would be honored with many lavish gifts. They thereupon agreed that each should write his wise sentence on a sheet of paper and place it under the head of the sleeping Darius where he would be sure to see it when he awoke. No sooner said than done.

When Darius found these three pearls of wisdom, he promptly called for their authors and asked each one to defend his statement by argument before an imposing group of courtiers. The first had written "Wine is the strongest." He proceeded to argue the powerful effect of wine upon the one who consumes it—"it causeth all men to err that drink it." Then, rather illogically, he added that "it turneth every thought into jollity" and "it maketh every heart rich."

The second man then stepped forward to support his contention that "the king is strongest." He argued that man rules the world and that the king rules men; ergo, the king is the most powerful of all created things. Certainly it was a clever way to win a prize from a much flattered monarch.

Finally Zerubbabel takes up his theme that "Women are strongest." He shows how the king himself wouldn't be there at all if a woman had not given him birth and, further, how all men, even kings, are subject to the arts and wiles of the feminine gender. But, granting all this, Zerubbabel goes on to point out that there is still another factor more powerful than any which have been mentioned, namely, "truth, which liveth and conquereth for evermore." And he winds up his argument with "Blessed be the God of Truth." Whereupon the courtiers all shouted "Great is Truth, and mighty above all things."

Zerubbabel, of course, won the debate and Darius asked him what he desired as his reward. This was the occasion for which the Jewish prince had been waiting. He reminded Darius of an earlier vow that Jerusalem should be restored and called upon him to fulfill his vow. That was all the reward he wanted. This generous plea for the people of Israel roused the admiration of the king and he quickly granted all his request. Zerubbabel was sent back in high honor bearing the royal consent to the work of restoration. Under this authority the half finished Temple was soon completed and was dedicated with much rejoicing.

Perhaps it is history. Perhaps it isn't. In any case it is a fine story of courageous devotion to his people on the part of one who was born to the responsibility of leadership.

I HAVE just finished reading another book that deals with the Church, the Episcopal Church this time, and the hero of which, although far from hero he is, is the rector of an Episcopal Church. "The Man of Little Faith," by Kauffman. More mistakes, technical and theological, than are piled into that spicy novel it would be difficult to find within the same page-compass anywhere. I suppose that the uninitiated reading public will swallow it whole. At least we are comforted with the realization that the Church and Religion must be making a very definite appeal to the lay mind, as evidenced by the books that are coming red-hot from the press upon the all-absorbing themes. It is all a compliment in disguise.

A CERTAIN parish paper presents the following for thoughtful consideration of its members: "Put Christ before the Church; put the Church before the club; put Christianity before the denomination; put God's Word before men's opinions; put more of God into your work, and less of self; put Jesus before the professor and teacher; work more by faith and trust, and less by sight and reason; live to give and share, rather than to get; strive to be Christ-like, rather than to be great; seek to be holy, rather than to be happy; feed your soul as regularly and as generously as your body; live for others now, rather than for heaven hereafter." For what it is worth, I commend it to the attention and practise of my readers.

I SEE that Martin Conboy prescribes Dickens and Scott as anti-suicide serum for our young people. It is a good idea, and weaker correctives have gotten more advertising. Dickens and Scott seem to be rather overlooked by the rising generation. I imagine that the movies have something to do with that. For the worst thing about the movies is that they take away the taste for the fiction that holds the mirror up to nature.

SURELY, one sure proof of the divine origin of the Church is that the Church has persisted for so long a time in spite of the false witness that has been borne against Her!

HARMER JOHN. By Hugh Walpole. Doran. $2.00.

Harmer John is "Hjalmar Johanson" of Stockholm and Copenhagen. The story is the story of the impact of his personal attractiveness and naive goodness on the people of the Cathedral town of Polchester, with its gossiping and bickering and petty scandals which readers of Walpole know so well,—and of the effect of the town on him.

It is done with all Mr. Walpole's mastery of the English language and consummate skill in creating characters that really live.

It is a good novel for the clergy to read now that Lent is over. It will provide both real enjoyment and a lot to think about.

Western Seminary Wins

GAINS LAWSUIT, LOSES DEAN

The Superior Court of the State of Illinois has just rendered a decision in favor of the Western Theological Seminary in its suit with the City of Evanston which, it is expected, will open the way for resumption of activities on the part of the seminary in the near future.

Three years ago the Seminary received a gift of some property across the street from Northwestern University in Evanston, and closed its buildings on Washington Boulevard in preparation for a new Seminary in the new location. After a financial campaign had been undertaken and about $400,000.00 raised, the Evanston zoning ordinance was changed in such a way as to prevent the Seminary from building. The Supreme Court held the decision of the Zoning Board void because the change had been made in the ordinance after the Seminary had made its plans and started its campaign. The decision is expected to be of importance not only to the Western Seminary, but as a precedent in other cases involving zoning laws throughout the country. As a result of this decision, it is probable the Seminary will go ahead in the near future with plans for erecting its buildings and resuming academic activities.

Almost at the same time as this announcement came another announcement of equal importance to the Seminary—that of the resignation of the Very Rev. William Converse DeWitt as Dean. Dean DeWitt has been in charge of the work at the Seminary for twenty-two years and has been instrumental in building it up from a weak and struggling institution to an institution respected on all sides. Dean DeWitt will retain for the time being his office as President of the Seminary and also the Chair of Homiletics and Pastoral Care. His action was taken in order to leave the Board of Trustees free to elect a younger man as Dean to direct the affairs of the Seminary in its new development at Evanston.

In presenting his resignation, Dean DeWitt made a statement which is in part as follows:

"A man advancing in years, occupying any public or semi-public office from which men of the finer type of character would find it painful to suggest his resignation, should be reasonably sensitive to indications within himself and in his environment, which lead to the conclusion that the interests which he represents could be better served by another. The experience acquired by many years of service is often undervalued; but it is often also overvalued. It is on that account that I have felt that it would not be right for me to undertake the major responsibility for reorganizing the faculty and recasting the curriculum for the new era of the Western Theological Seminary in its future university environment."

Dutch, Ed, Tubby and others of the boys of St. Andrew's School, St. Andrews, Tenn., who come from one of the wild coves of that region, made a beautiful white wooden cross during Lent and have erected it on the top of the mountain just where the trail comes up from their home valley. Formerly, it is said, that valley was a Godless and lawless place. Now the cross erected by its own sons stands in blessing above the little farms and humble homes.

Preacher, Pulpit and Pew

By E. P. Jots

Our wardens have gone traveling; they're on a mission bent.
To pick us out a rector—one with whom we'll be content,
He musn't be too High, and he mustn't be too Low;
We'd like him very plastic, a man made out of dough.
He mustn't be too short, and he mustn't be too tall,
And he must not have opinions that will clash with ours at all.
He mustn't be too young, and he mustn't be too old,
And he must be very humble and never speak out bold.
He must please the rich and haughty, and the poor and humble too,
And he must always praise us all for everything we do.
He must be very tactful, and have pleasant things to say,
And when we disobey him, he must look the other way.
Our wardens seem to think that they can find the very man;
But, do you know, I'm doubtful if they ever really can.

Admiral Sims, denying that he had ever attacked the Annapolis Naval Academy, said at a dinner in Newport:

"Trouble, trouble! The sailor's life is nothing but trouble from one end of it to the other. The fact is, I never knew of but one man who had a sane excuse for going to sea."

"Who was that, admiral?" asked a pretty Newport girl.

"Noah," said Admiral Sims. "If the old fellow had stayed ashore he'd have been drowned."

The boys of St. Andrew's Mission, Mayaguez, Porto Rico, are printing a Spanish Altar Book, one page at a time, on the Mission press. Mr. Saylor writes: "You can hardly realize what this will mean to us for the only printed page we have for Altar use is so small that one cannot see the printing, especially when the Altar is a bit dark or one's eyes none too good to read ten-point type at a distance."

THE BIBLE AND THE DEVIL

A Monk Makes a Bargain

Reported by

A. MANBY LLOYD

DR. M. R. JAMES, Provost of Eton, one of the most eminent living authorities on old manuscripts, lecturing at Eton on the evolution of books, said he was more specially interested in books that were made before printing came in—the written books which they called manuscripts. In the last forty years he supposed he must have handled not far short of 10,000 of them and had written and published descriptions of 6,000. One must imitate in a humble fashion the great Mr. Sherlock Holmes. If they did get the knowledge together they could sometimes hit upon the truth in a way that seemed surprising to Dr. Watson.

The other day someone called his attention to a manuscript book of prayers and asked where it came from; there was nothing on the face of it to show. He (Dr. James) looked at the calendar and was able to say at once, "From the nunnery at Amesbury in Wiltshire," chiefly because he saw the name of a certain Saint Melovius in red, and he knew that he was not honoured anywhere in England except at Amesbury. He was examining a large beautiful Bible of the twelfth century, with fine pictures in it, in one of the Cambridge libraries. He was cataloguing the library and wanted to know where the book came from. There was no inscription to show. When turning over the leaves he found one had been mended with a little slip of parchment on which someone had written the words, "Here, here," meaning "Here I am." This made it all plain to him, because he knew that when King Edmund was beheaded by the Danes his followers found his body, but not his head. They searched for it in the woods, and at last they heard a voice calling, "Here, here." They went to the spot and found the King's head, guarded by a she-wolf. This suggested to him that this Bible was written at the Abbey of St. Edmund at Bury, and once on the track he found other evidence to show that he was right.

He supposed the largest MS in existence was that at Stockholm, called the Giant of Books, and was about a yard high and far too heavy for one man to carry. This was a real monstrosity. It contained the whole Bible in Latin and other matter. Naturally it had been the subject of romance. It was called, besides the Giant, the Devil's Bible, and the story was that a monk condemned to death was told that he might get on if he would cover 150 whole skins of parchment with writing, or could copy out the whole Bible in a single night. They could guess what he did; he had recourse to the Devil. The parchment was there ready. The Devil came, and in return for the promise of the monk's soul set to and wrote the whole book before dawn, finishing up with a full-page portrait of himself on the last page. (Laughter.) This he (the speaker) had seen. The story seemed to imply that the Devil knew the whole Bible by heart. We were aware that the Devil could quote Scripture for his own purposes, but more than that he should not have credited him with. Of course, as a matter of fact, the picture of the Devil was the starting-point of the whole story; the book was known to have been written at Prague, in Bohemia, some time in the thirteenth century.

The Saturday Review deals severely and ironically with Bishop Barnes, who has been talking to Nonconformists at the City Temple, deploring the results of Prayer Book Revision. It reminds the Bishop that the Puritan ancestors of these people had their ears cropped for refusing to accept the Anglican Prayer Book and the Anglican Episcopate.

Labor has won some bye-elections and acquired recruits from Liberalism. People see clearly that a three-party system is abnormal and the decks are being cleared for a straight fight, Whites vs. Reds.

The question whether the P. B. should go forward to the Church Assembly was discussed at a joint session of the four houses of Convocation. The Archbishop spoke gravely and maintained that it involved no change in doctrine. Dr. Pollock wanted the measure thrown out on the understanding that a new one be introduced. "This book," he said, "will not bring peace and the only option it leaves people is the option of walking out of the Church." The Bishop of Durham is a wiser man, and recognizes that the counter-reformation has come to stay. Dr. Henson compared his brother of Norwich (Pollock) to St. Simeon Stylites on his pillar. Around the base of the pillar had gathered a mingled throng which included a number of moribund societies whose half-forgotten and almost unintelligible shibboleths are nearly extinct. He supported the Prayer Book because it would restore discipline with toleration.

I have been reading a fine biography on Stewart Headlam which tells you lots of good things about this fine priest who couldn't get a license from his bishops for eleven years and was at eternal loggerheads with them when he did. I could quote by the yard. For a time Headlam was a prison chaplain and sent for Stanton to preach to the prisoners. After the service a prisoner sent for Headlam. During the discourse Headlam asked him what he thought of the sermon. "Lord, sir," replied the prisoner, "whatever sort of a madman did you send to preach to us? Why, he's balmy, that man. He waved his hands and flung about his arms and shouted like a mad one." Headlam was once accused of being "ungentlemanly," the greatest insult you can offer an Englishman. Hedlam replied: "Yes, you see Our Lord and Isaiah were so ungentlemanly that I prefer to be so also." It is good reading about this brave man who tackled Bradlaugh on the platform and sent him a telegram of condolence when he was jailed; who founded the Church Socialist League which rose, phoenix-like, from the ashes of the Guild of St. Matthew.

There is an interesting story in the book about Bernard Shaw. Shaw was once present when Percy Dearmer was lecturing on Holy Baptism and spoke of it as the "sacrament of equality." In the discussion that followed Mr. Shaw fastened on the phrase as new and interesting to him. He went on to describe a scene at his own baptism in Dublin, when his uncle who was to be Godfather failed to turn up and a verger took his place. "Did the substitution make any difference?" asked Shaw. Headlam then arose and remarked how necessary it was to assert the true Christian view of equality when even Mr. Bernard Shaw doubted if a verger was a valid substitute for an uncle.

Stewart Headlam died in November, 1924. Canon James Adderley, whose articles have been appearing in THE WITNESS, read the burial office at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, Selwyn Image read the lesson and Canon Donaldson gave the address, claiming that Stewart Headlam was a great citizen, a true liberal, a Conservative and a Socialist. May he rest in peace.

NEWS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH

In Brief Paragraphs

Edited by

WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD

A GENTLEMAN from Iowa has written in a saucy style to inform us that we are insulting our readers by asking questions that are too easy in ASK ME ANOTHER. "Glance over the questions put by the Living Church in the issue of April 16th as a sample of the sort of queries to ask." Yes, I did that and my mark was considerably under 50 per cent. Here's the idea: the Living Church is edited on the assumption that its readers are well-informed Churchmen, as they doubtless are if they have been reading that excellent paper for any considerable time. THE WITNESS, on the other hand, proceeds on the assumption that there is a considerable number of folks among the million and more communicants of the Episcopal Church who would find it difficult to pass a canonical examination for Holy Orders. I might say, however, that this simple test is made with each set of questions before allowing them to appear; we put them to some parson. If he passes with a grade higher than 80 per cent, the questions are thrown out as altogether too easy. So far, we haven't found a clergyman who can make the grade. A New York parson this week failed on questions 1, 6 and 8.

The Rev. Edgar Jones became the rector at Oakmont, Pa., nine months ago. There had been a split in the parish. Now they are united again, the Bishops' Crusade having been a real contributing force in bringing about the reunion. At the beginning of Lent Mr. Jones organized prayer groups and sent out ten laymen, in pairs, to conduct the services. Last week the Bishop was there for confirmation and Mr. Jones presented 44 men, 36 women, 26 boys and 24 girls, a class of 130. In the class there were eight married people from one family; father, four sons, one daughter and a couple of in-laws.

St. Luke's, Evanston, has a hard time taking care of the crowd on an ordinary Sunday to say nothing of Easter. What to do, when you can seat but 900 and have twice that number of communicants, to say nothing of visitors. This is what the rector, the Rev. George Craig Stewart, did; he had one service at ten and another at 11:30, each with the same sermon, the same choir, the same music—identical services. Tickets were sent to parishioners whose names began with letters A to L, admitting them to the ten o'clock service. The rest of the alphabet came at 11:30. A few complaints, of course—pretty hard to have a parish of nearly a couple of thousand Christians without having some to whom that hour and a half would make a great difference—but on the whole it worked out exceedingly well.

This is from the Very Rev. Paul Roberts, dean of St. Michael's, Boise, Idaho: "Up to this year, we have, during the Lenten season, had all the women of the parish meet together for missionary talks by the women. The person who has done the talking has always gotten a lot out of it, but very few others. Also, it has been pretty superficial, of course. This year I decided to try an experiment which has worked so well that I am anxious that others should benefit by it. I doubt if it is at all new except to us, but it may be suggested.

"We have taken the book 'Christianity and the Race Problem,' by J. H. Oldham, which goes, of course to the heart of the whole missionary problem. The parish is divided into groups under leaders, both men and women; a lesson is assigned each week, the leaders meet on Monday afternoon and go over the lesson thoroughly, bring out the special points of discussion and then gather throughout the parish in groups from 5 to 15 on Wednesday afternoon and evening. We sold about 100 copies of the book throughout the parish and the discussions have been most interesting and the interest wide. Groups are kept small in order that everyone may feel able to take part. Of course the discussions get off to national as well as racial problems and it is an attempt to look at these problems, not simply as an American, but as a Christian. It is working unusually well and the average number attending the groups is twice as many as ever came to the old missionary meetings, and their coming now is not in any way a test of loyalty but is an expression of keen interest."

to preside and the service is to be broadcast. It is to include a pageant of scenes from the mission fields. Possibly the most interesting feature, however, will be the reports to be presented by delegates representing every diocese and district, including those overseas, as to the amount of their offerings.

The Department of Religious Education is making a great effort to secure accurate reports for this date. To do so it will be necessary for all parishes to send their offerings to their diocesan headquarters before April 25th.

The Rev. Chas. T. Wright has returned to his parish after a long fight against a severe illness, and because of the need of a larger parish house, and not enough ground at the present location, the congregation has voted to sell the property they now hold and move to a residential section where they may secure the necessary room for expansion.

Here is Church Unity at work in Camden County, Georgia:

In St. Mary's, where there are about sixteen communicants, mostly women, a group keeps the church in order, runs an organized Church school, visits the sick, welcomes strangers, holds regular meetings of the Woman's Auxiliary, always meets its quota, invites the whole town to service when a missionary visits the mission, and makes the Church a living, growing concern in spite of the fact that money is scarce and visitations few. They are planning to mend the roof and beautify the churchyard and this last is a community project. They unite the functions of Christian social service, the Church school, Altar Guild, Daughters of the King, study groups and rector's aid all under the name of the Woman's Auxiliary.

Almost as remarkable is the situation in the two little hamlets of Woodbine and Waverly. The women of both communities, all Communions, unite under the name of the Woman's Auxiliary, with a wise, beautifully serene Church woman as their head. She finds a study program that will be spiritually educating without dogma or doctrine. She holds business meetings attended by all women, for the purpose of planning work. All per capita dues are paid into the Woman's Auxiliary, but funds from entertainments and business enterprises are divided among the churches. These women, like the ones at St. Mary's, unite all the services of their respective churches under the general head of Woman's Auxiliary. They supply food, clothing and friendly service to all in need, nurse the sick and visit strangers.

Jane Welte writes from Kyoto: "I spent ten days on the island of Kyushu, chaperoning our senior class. We saw all the places of historical interest and beauty, ate all the strange fruits of Kyushu, slept on the floor, or else sat in third-class railroad trains, and saw all of our former graduates as we rushed along. It was very interesting and exciting. I traveled with two, and sometimes four, hard-boiled eggs in my pocket all the time .

"Everywhere we went the 'foreign lady' was given hard-boiled eggs to eat. I couldn't risk my digestion with six eggs a day, neither could I refuse to accept the extra hospitality of innkeepers, so I slid them into my sweater pockets and carried them off with me. I never failed to find some one willing to devour them on the train. When we arrived in Kyoto we were tired, dirty and ragged, but we were not hungry!'

Bishop Batty, in charge of English churches and chaplaincies in North and Central Europe (his title is Bishop of Fulham), writes of a day in Copenhagen: "I spent an amusing morning dodging such pressmen as I could and being interviewed or photographed by those I failed to elude. I always thought American and British reporters were the most pertinacious in the world, but henceforth I shall give the first place to the Danish confraternity. Whilst writing letters the door would open and a man appear with a camera. Words of protest were met with polite bows and a photo was taken before one could escape. He would be followed by another who in one breath asked my views on Reunion, the coal strike and the Church Con-

FEAR

The Autobiography of James Edwards

By John Rathbone Oliver

"No one can pick up this volume after an evening dinner and expect to retire before midnight. The book combines in a very remarkable way, good narrative, good science, and good religion."—Zion's Herald (Chief editorial, full page.)

"The book grips and holds the reader. Seldom does a novel read so absorbingly and yet more seldom does a novel carry so lucid and helpful a message."—Christian Endeavor World.

"Distinctly a one-sitting book: do not sit down to read it unless you have time to read it through."—Carl H. Claudy.

"I found this work instructive, stimulating and cheering. I have not read anything in a long time that has left me in a more wholesome mood."—Bishop Francis J. McConnell (Meth. Epis. North).

"This is a notable and remarkable book upon a theme of the utmost importance to religion and psychology. So much is written upon such themes by immature and incompetent and even by designing people that special significance attaches to a book like this by a man of high qualifications in character and intellectual training."—The Congregationalist.

"All the way through it remains a story, not a discussion in the jargon of science. His story is so practical that it applies to your case and mine and to that of our neighbor."—The Boston Herald.

"The readers of this book, and I predict they will be many, may accept Dr. Oliver's statements as correct and his account of the patient's mental state and the treatment which started him on the road to recovery as an illuminating exposition thereof." — (signed) Edward N. Brush, several times President of the American Psychiatric Association and now Editor of the American Journal of Psychiatry.

THE MODERN USE OF THE BIBLE

By Harry Emerson Fosdick

You can not have failed to notice what eager, devoted advance agents these new and odd religions make of their converts.

But have you traced the explanation to its source in their reading, nay more, their thorough study and wide circulation of the textbooks that tell about their faith?

The regular churches have been slow to profit by these object lessons. Why not turn your people into a reading church? A few of you can not by a few hours' work get the religious book reading habit started. All your working forces could spend six months accomplishing it and it would pay.

Plant 25, 50 or 100 copies in different households and sign your membership up to "an every member pledge to read" THE MODERN USE OF THE BIBLE in the succeeding six weeks. The atmosphere of your public services of worship will be transfigured.

In Hamburg, the Bishop, using the German language, confirmed Mission candidates from the Church Mission to Jews. He says the Jewish converts with whom he talked appeared to be men and women who had made a great decision after seriously weighing the temporal consequences.

Bishop Norris of Peking (English Diocese of North China) writes in a personal letter to English friends: "This country is presenting the world with some very serious problems. Their solution is by no means as easy as many people think. It stands to reason

(1) That a revolution in a country of this size must take time, say half a century, to work itself out satisfactorily.

(2) That it will be impeded by all external interests, influences and forces—they are like foreign bodies in a wound—irritants.

(3) That it will be marked by internal chaos for a time, because its local leaders will inevitably get the idea of being national leaders, and thus come to blows with each other.

(4) That the wisest course, therefore, for all outsiders, is to interfere as little as possible, to be patient with the chaos, and above all, to be as far as possible, unselfish in their attitude.

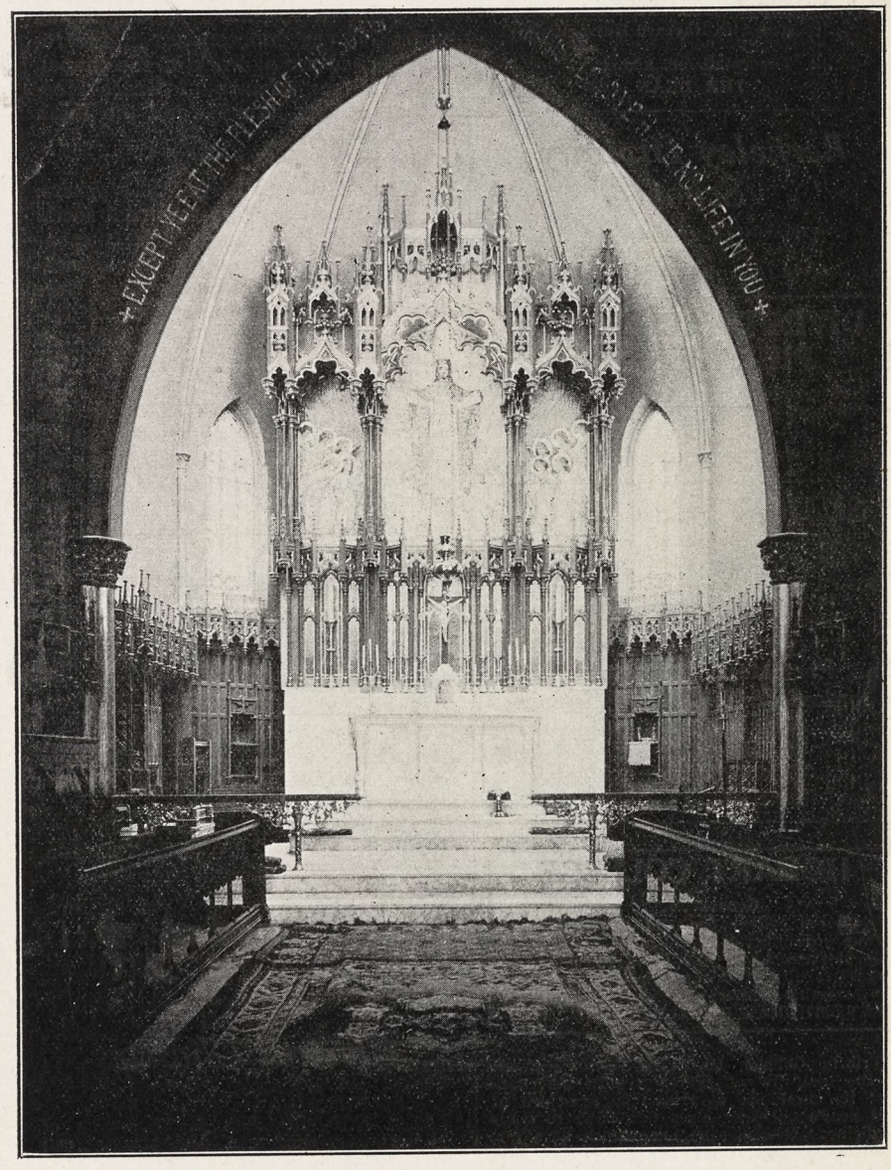
THE J. AND R. LAMB STUDIOS

23-25-27- SIXTH AVENUE
NEW YORK



St. Edward the Martyr New York

THIS illustration is of the Chancel as rebuilt through the generosity of the late Elbridge T. Gerry.

Mr. Gerry entrusted to Mr. Charles R. Lamb, the head of The Lamb Studios, New York, the designing and superintending of the execution of the entire scheme, including Carved Wood, Mosaic, Stained Glass, Metal, Marble, as well as Redecorating the Church Interior in harmony with the Redecorated Choir and Sanctuary.

This Chancel was dedicated by the late Rt. Rev. Charles Chapman Grafton, D. D., of Fond du Lac, who at the time of his visit stated that St. Edward's was now one of the most churchly interiors with which he was familiar.

This is one of the many examples of how The Lamb Studios of New York co-ordinate the work of their various departments to secure when completed a Churchly, Artistic and Architectural result.

CORRESPONDENCE is solicited from any part of the United States or the Missionary Field, by those interested in Churchly Rearrangement, Redecoration or Alterations. The Lamb Studios will prepare and submit comprehensive schemes for consideration showing what parts can most economically be executed by Local Labor, and what details of Artistic and Architectural importance can be forwarded from New York and installed in connection with the local work as completed.

A Booklet showing the various Departments of the Studios will be submitted upon request

A Great Word Gone Wrong

The Real Meaning of Charity

BY REV. G. A. STUDDERT-KENNEDY

THERE is no word in the English language which has had a stranger or more tragic history than the word charity. It once was the name of God Himself, and now is the name of God knows what. We call it charity when we give away what we don't want, to patch up and put poultices on evils which our slackness and stupidity have helped to create, as when we make money out of slums and give it to hospitals. We call it charity when I agree not to tread on the corns of your conceit if you won't tread on the corns of mine, and so we can rub along together and still hug our self-conceit.

Even if you know a man is a liar it is charitable not to tell him so. He might answer: "You are another," and then you would be stumped.

Our misuse of the word charity has dragged the poor thing down until she, who once was queen of all the words, goes about like a beggar maid from door to door asking for leave to live. "We want justice and not charity," say the poor and oppressed. "This is business and not charity," sneers the practical business man. Poor thing, nobody wants her and everybody despises her. But it would be a good thing if we could put her back in her place again, for she is badly needed.

Love and Whitewash!

She was originally used to stand for the very highest kind of love, and goodness knows we need a name for that as badly now as ever we did. We overwork the word love. We use it for everything and anything, for things in the highest heaven and things in the deepest hell.

The crude and brutal sex passion which is the main theme of the movie thrills, the animal attraction between men and women which torments them and drives them to torture one another and is the most savage, untamed, and tyrannical impulse of human nature, we call love, and, by giving it that fine name, whitewash it and deceive ourselves as to what it really is. It would be far better to keep for that the ugly name for an ugly thing, and call it lust.

If we realised that we send our young people to be thoroughly soused in animal passion and allow men to make fortunes out of sousing them, it might bring us to our senses and save us from being such fools. As it is, we are all mixed and muddled.

God is Love, and the perfect lover is a three times divorced movie actor; and so God gets tied up in our minds with the devil and we don't know which is which. If we called giving away what we don't want, to patch what we ought to cure, humbug and swank, we would know where we were; as it is, we deceive ourselves into thinking that pride can be charity—which means that black it white.

Wise Greeks

The Greeks were wiser than we; they boasted of two words. Cinema love they called "Eros," and they knew it was a savage, cruel thing. Ordinary human kindness or good nature—not treading on other people's corns—they called "Philia." They had not a name for the highest kind of love, for the very good reason that they did not know what it was. And so when the Christian saints got to know what it was, they invented a name for it; they called it "Agape," and it is that word which the translators of our English Bible render as Charity.

When it is said "God is Love," the more accurate translation would be God is Charity, and Charity means the passionate desire to create and sustain the finest kind of life. It is the desire to make men, and that is the very nature of God Himself; He wants to make a man of you, or a woman of you, and He is willing to go to any length and suffer any pain to do it.

That is charity, that and nothing else, and that is the power that ought to be the driving force behind all politics, business, and industry.

It may sound mad to say that the House of Commons ought to be a charitable institution; but, if you use the word accurately, that's just what it ought to be; it ought to be an institution which has for its one aim and purpose the creation and sustenance in the people of our country of the very finest kind of life. If the passion behind politics is anything lower or less than that, then politics cease to have any meaning and are just a hollow sham.

Industry

It may sound even madder to say that every great industry ought to be a charitable institution, but that's exactly what it ought to be, for if an industry has not got behind it the deliberate aim and object of creating and sustaining in the people the highest kind of life, then all the work that is put into it is waste and worse than waste. That is why mere luxury trades which have as their only aim and object the maintenance of a false and stupid self-indulgence are economically evil and morally rotten; they are no good because they are in no sense charitable institutions.

Working industry for charity does not in any way mean to tolerate bad workmen and makeshift machinery in order to be kind for the time being. The really charitable captain of industry will be the keenest and most efficient, always striving to get a thing done in the best possible way at the lowest possible cost, and using his brains and his nervous energy without stint for that end.

But his pride and glory will be in his workpeople, and in the service which he, in co-operation with them, renders to the community. He will feel that his job is worth while because it is helping to create and sustain fine life.

THE WORKER

The charitable workman will not be the man who slacks in order to encourage slackers, but who puts his back into his job, because he works not merely for his wage, but because he wants, in turn, to do his whack and to keep the best kind of life going and increasing in the world. It doesn't matter a rap whether you are digging coal or managing credits, selling bacon or advising kings, they all have the same aim and object, the creation of life, and charity should be the driving force behind them all.

We are all bound up together in these days. The poet depends on the plumber and the man that cleans his drains, and if he creates beauty, makes people see the majesty of mountains and hear the song of the winds, the man who makes his boots and cleans his sewers helps him to do it. If they did not do their job he would catch a smell, and then he might make music for the angels, but he would have to stop doing it for men.

It is charity that makes the world go forward; it is the baser passions that keep it going round and round in everlasting dreary circles that never have an end.

"THE GREATEST OF THESE—"

This is the very meaning of the Christian faith. God so loved the world—that is, God had such a passion to create and sustain the finest kind of life in the world—that He gave His only Begotten Son—that is, He gave the very essence of Himself—that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish—that means go downhill, slobber and muddle through life till he gets kicked out of it by accident or disease without ever having had the ghost of a notion what it means—but have everlasting life—that means the highest and best kind of life, the love of everything that is good and beautiful and true.

And that passion of charity which burns at the heart of God is meant to burn at the heart of man and to be the bed-rock motive of all his activities, social and individual. For there abide now Faith, Hope, and Charity, but the greatest of these is Charity, the passion to spend and be spent for the glory of making men and women—fine strong men, clear in the head and clean in the heart, pure and beautiful women and lovely children with the light of heaven's innocence still shining in their eyes.

That is charity, and it is the greatest thing in the world.

ROBERT P. KREITLER, the rector of St. Luke's, Scranton, Penna., was born in Brooklyn in 1875, and graduated from the General Theological Seminary in 1899. His first charge was as rector of the Epiphany, Ozone Park, L. I., which he served until called to Lee, Mass., in 1901. From 1907 to 1912 he was the rector of the Ascension, Mt. Vernon, N. Y. Since that time he has been the rector at Scranton, where he has done a most unusual work, not only as the rector and pastor of a large downtown church, but as a community leader. He has held innumerable diocesan offices, and was a delegate to the General Conventions of 1919 and 1922.

Cheerful Confidences

ORGANIST AND CHOIRS

By Rev. George P. Atwater

IF ANY of my friends wish to congratulate me upon two of the major blessings of my ministry—two bits of excellent good fortune, for which I am in no way responsible, but which have been like very extra thick delicious frosting on the cake—I would suggest to them that they make the two organists with whom my ministry has been particularly associated, their theme.

At the Church of Our Saviour, Akron, Ohio, Miss Maud Maxson had been organist for twenty-six years when I left that parish and still continues her services there. No one could have asked for a finer spirit of co-operation, better understanding of the problem of a volunteer choir, or more inherent musical ability than was exhibited by Miss Maxson. Musical achievement for churches is of a transitory sort, but no architect ever put more thought, love and concern into an enduring building than Miss Maxson did into the music. It is too bad that it is an evanescent task, which leaves its mark upon the memory and appreciation of the people, not in any outward and enduring structure. But it must be a satisfaction to her to realize how much she has contributed to the devotions, musical taste and enjoyment of the people. Her work is in some respects like the preaching of sermons—the results of which are intangible. Miss Maxson's devotion naturally built up a choir whose excellent music was an attractive feature of the services.

And now it is my good fortune to have as a team-mate in Grace Church, Brooklyn, Mr. Frank Wright, who on May 1st will have served thirty years in this parish. Mr. Wright is also one of those musicians whose very unusual ability, finest musical taste and friendly approach to his choir, have built up an organization which gives the very best service to the church.

We are about to have an anniversary commemorating Mr. Wright's thirty years. The congregation of Grace Church is to be congratulated that for all these years the musical portion of its services has been so excellently rendered. It would be futile to attempt to write in this column all the excellent things achieved by this notable choir.

Mr. Wright was active in founding the American Guild of Organists, and was for several years the Warden of the Guild.

To both Miss Maxson and Mr. Wright I am indebted for the most cordial co-operation. A Rector who finds such partners in the very important matter of the music is certainly fortunate, and I am sure that there are other Rectors throughout the country who would be equally glad of the chance to pay a tribute to their organists.

And now a word to you people in the pews, who take the music for granted. Please remember that the music is not like the weather report. The weather observer is not responsible for the nature of the report, but the organist is responsible for the nature of the music. He deserves your attention, your co-operation, your sympathy and your appreciation. So if you have an organist who is really achieving something, take ten minutes off today and sit down and write him a note and tell him so. Include the choir, so that he may read it to them. And then next Sunday, when you go to church, you will think at first that some metropolitan stars have been imported for the occasion, but you will soon discover that they are your same faithful singers, acting under the stimulus of some word of appreciation for their arduous labors.

Grace Church, Brooklyn Heights, Rev. George Parkin Atwater, rector, is celebrating the 80th anniversary of its incorporation this week. Services last Sunday and next commemorate the event. On Wednesday a service was held at which Bishop Murray, president of the National Council, preached. One of the features of the celebration was the observance of the thirty years of service of Mr. Frank Wright, choirmaster and organist. Grace Church has had but nine rectors in its long history. Three of them have become bishops, Bishop Benjamin Paddock, Bishop Chauncey B. Brewster and Bishop Frederick Burgess.

THE NEED OF RESTATEMENT

In the Light of Modern Knowledge

By IRWIN ST. JOHN TUCKER

JUST now echoes of the furious battle over evolution are fading. That struggle is not dead. Intolerance, coupled with ignorance, never abandons a fight. Biblical "fundamentalists" have a spreading organization, which they are using for political purposes. Their first skirmish in Tennessee was won. Too rapid expansion seems to have weakened their line. They are losing out in other states. But they have not quit.

We stand between two forces: scientific intolerance and Biblical bigotry; philosophical materialism, denying God, and fanatical ignorance denying knowledge. To meet them, tradition and freedom are essential, as inheritance and variation are essential in evolution. Tradition, because we can interpret to others only in their own psychology; freedom, because we must be at liberty to make old terms mean new things, if we are to bridge the gap between treasures old and treasures new.

Three Words

Let us take this step as a starter: there are three Words—the Created Word, the Incarnate Word and the Written Word. All Creation is a Bible, a written record of God's doings—with suns and universes for its books, with rocks and incandescent gases as its chapters, with all things living as its paragraphs, and with minds answering the Creative Mind as its message and goal.

The Incarnate Word is God made Body; the process of Life, whereby dead inorganic material is made vital and organic. That whole process of which man is the sun and crown is the long work of Incarnation.

Astronomers are priests and prophets of God: so also are geologists.

Physicists and chemists, biologists and botanists, physiologists and psychologists are devoting their lives to the deciphering of this tremendous Revelation. There are students of comparative religion, students of archaeology, students of history, who are sacrificing themselves, by living on scant salaries and under huge handicaps, to unlock, in the interests of pure knowledge, some further Revelation of the Most High.

Miracles of Science

Here in my home I sit and turn on a dial which floods my room with music and voices that come from hundreds of miles away. Voice and symphony are borne on mysterious ether waves, caught on a single wire suspended in my attic, and interrupted on their progress to the ground by a mechanism of vacuum tubes and condensers and transformers which multiply those faint vibrations until they shake a single tympanum, in such wise that it reproduces all the intricate sounds of an orchestra of twenty pieces.

Or I place a flat black rubber plate on a victrola. Through the point of one steel needle are transmitted a series of shakings, tremblings, oscillations and vibrations which bring forth, through a metal tympanum, the voices of singers dead, or of orchestras disbanded; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, or a fugue by Bach, in which, through that one single needle point, I can distinguish the quality of tone and pitch of instruments producing that complicated melody.

Or by pressing a button lights flood my house; a vacuum sweeper sucks up the dust on my carpet; by throwing a switch, currents of power rush along a copper wire in such force as to turn a press, or run a trolley car crowded with people along steel tracks.

All Miracles

All these are miracles. They are all manifestations of power, controlled and directed by man. They are witnesses to God.

I propose that we take the latest revelations of science as perceived by men who have given their lives thereto and through them study the Created Word. Let us bend our collective minds on what they can teach us of the universe and of ourselves, and from that draw our new vision of God.

I propose that we study the Incarnate Word, as it is revealed to us in our own lives and in the lives of great souls of this present age and of time past, as it is revealed in the mind of God working itself out in great masses of men, in the surge and drift of human currents.

I propose that we study the Written Word as it reveals itself in the New Canon continually being written, as often as honest souls come to grips with life and honestly say what they believe about it.

A Restatement

I propose that we do thus again what has been done so many times; as Aristotle did for his generation, as Thomas Aquinas did for his. This is not the work of one man, since no one man can even begin to know the sciences that must be reconciled in our philosophy. This growing Bible must be the work of many minds.

I propose that out of all these Words we formulate our philosophy. It will be a Sacramental Philosophy of inward and spiritual truth revealed by outward and visible signs. By Spiritual I do not mean irrational. Mathematics is a spiritual science: it deals with abstract truths. Logic is an abstract science: it deals with relations of things, requiring a mind to reconcile chaos into order.

Under the touch of this faith, we shall find the universe breaking open to us in splendor. We shall behold the earthworm in the guise of a messenger of God. We shall see the clouds of heaven in their true glory, as servants of the Most High. We shall see the greatness of bacteria, and the majesty of atoms, and the unspeakable wonder of the communal mind which guides insects, and wasps and bees. We shall peer into the measureless spaces of the universes, and into the immeasurable littlenesses of atoms We shall fall down in abasement before the infinite marvel of a single cell, and stand awed above the miracle-working chlorophyll which transforms that which is dead into that which is alive.

We shall behold the marvel of generation in flowers, and the incredible wonder of the life-cycle of a butterfly. We shall see how the tiny shellfish, and the mosquito are servants of the Logos. We shall see how glacial ages of times past, and hot tropic ages still further beyond them, all worked together to produce this supreme wonder of the mind which can measure aeons and infinitudes of time and space; which can reflect with a conscious image this far-seeing Wisdom in which nothing is little and nothing great; in which the tiniest may be the most significant.

We shall see how in every age and race men have sought union with this directing purpose, and found peace in the seeking. We shall see how they sought after God, and to all them that sought was vouchsafed some measure of finding. We shall read the visions and prophecies of men whose faith was expressed in other terms than ours, and we shall tingle and feel our souls glow under the kindling of a kindred spark.

What I am proposing is an overhauling of our whole structure of faith and organization in the light of all that modern science as well as antique philosophy can give to us. Otherwise the keen and eager minds of this present age will have none of us. What sort of a picture of Heaven is it, this vision of four beasts with myriad eyes, and a crystal sea, and harpers harping on their harps, to a young man who can tune in on a symphony orchestra a thousand miles away with a radio he has made himself; who can go sixty miles an hour in a car he has paid for with money he has earned; who operates a moving picture machine that brings before his eyes visions of times past and news pictures of the whole world's great events almost as they occur?

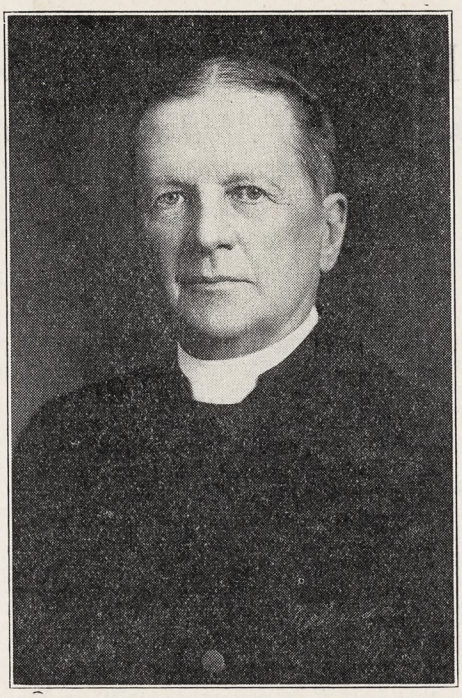
We need to re-express our faith. There is no danger that we shall throw religion overboard. Rather, we shall find it the more needful the further we go. We shall find our faith deepening and broadening and becoming more glorious. We shall cast overboard phrases of an outworn age, phrases that offend and hinder, but we shall bring to light a new and living faith.

Let's Know



CORRECTION

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

MY ATTENTION has been called to a bit of an error in a recent column on the Old Catholics. The original article was written in answer to a letter asking about the origin, history, and present status of the Old Catholics and the names and addresses of those from whom further information might be had. The story of the Old Catholic Church itself was, I believe, correct enough but in giving the names of responsible persons as sources of further information, I picked out of a reference book the name of the Most Rev. W. H. Francis, of Chicago. Another reference book which came to my desk a few days after the article was written shows me that this was a mistake.

It seems that in 1917 there was a split in the Old Catholic body and a small section moved out under the leadership of the Most Rev. W. H. Francis. This gentleman had formerly been a priest in the ministry of the Episcopal Church and had left us under not too happy circumstances. It is his detached wing of the Old Catholic movement which has gathered in William Montgomery Brown and has added him to its list of bishops. The head of the North American Old Roman Catholic Church is the Most Rev. Carmel Henry Carfora, Metropolitan and Primate, 6304 Leland Ave., Chicago.

Turning, then, to another subject, I suppose I receive about my share of anonymous letters. Some of them are amusing, some of them are silly; some are disgruntled whines and some seem to be very much in earnest. Of course, as a matter of good manners, if nothing else, they ought to be signed—but some people have strange notions of the purpose of the United States mails anyhow. Here is one I received last month containing a clipping of a newspaper report of a sermon I happened to preach in Chicago in which reference was made to spiritual inertia. It is signed by "a Citizen."

He Writes the Governor

"In regard to your talk at the Garrick Theatre, don't you think the priests are partly responsible for the spiritual inertia of today? When a believer approaches a church, the priest quickly lets him know by a heathenish system of sign language he is acting above his station in approaching nearer to God. What we need is a Christian understanding of the Sacrifice of Christ. The priests have read so much heathen literature their understanding is darkened and they are starving our citizens. The cause of so many suicides, so many discouraged and disheartened men and women is because the Church will not listen to the cry put forth twenty centuries ago—Feed my sheep. The whole nation should be offered a weekly Communion with Christ. The evil spirits are running the mind, body and souls of our men and women of today."

Maybe I am dense, but I confess that I do not know just what this Citizen means. If there is one thing the Episcopal Church does, it is to offer at least a weekly Communion with Christ at thousands of Church altars. The "heathenish system of sign language" and the "heathenish literature" are somewhat enigmatic expressions. Does the sign language refer to our liturgical service or to the boorish manners of the clergy? I have received other letters protesting that the clergy read only safe and innocuous churchly books and that they ought to keep themselves better informed of the other side of religious questions. So there you are. We clergy will not deny our own deficiencies, but I do think there is an absurd amount of talk about the failure of the Church to do its work. For my part, I simply don't believe it. If there were any way of striking a comparison, I believe we would find the Church doing a more honest, energetic, constructive, and telling piece of work today than any time in several hundred years. Some people will be disappointed because the pearly gates are not set with diamonds.

Current Comment

By Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott

I ALWAYS read with interest the parish paper of St. Mark's Church, Evanston, Illinois. The editor and rector, the Rev. Arthur Rogers, D.D., knows what he wants to say, and knows how to say it. Here is something that Dr. Rogers has just written regarding "Elmer Gantry": "This is a book which was foreordained to vigorous discussion. Its author has the public ear. No one can create such boring bores, such caddy cads, such impossible impossibilities, as Mr. Sinclair Lewis. * * * Elmer Gantry, the product of a small Kansas town, is a youth whose assets consisted of a robust ego, a booming voice, and the standards, mental and moral, of a tom-cat of the baser sort. * * * Compared with him, Iago was a gentleman, and Guido Franceschini a mere dabbler in misconduct. If the object of the book is to give us an example of total depravity, its success is beyond criticism, though we may wonder why it was necessary to call such a loathsome creature into life. But if Elmer is to be taken as a type of the ministry the book is a monstrous failure. It is not a satire, though these are fields in which the satirist might love to walk. It is not a caricature, for caricature means distortion, but not complete misrepresentation. It is not even libel, for no intelligent person could accept its point of view. It is a horrid nightmare, from which one wakes as he lays the book aside and goes to take a bath."

HORATIO BOTTOMLEY will soon be out of jail, and journalism in England receives a rude shock by the announcement that he will start another anti-American newspaper. How much influence he still retains it is hard for us to know on this side of the water; but let us hope that his record as an embezzler and crook will vitiate his erstwhile power with the unthinking masses. With the appalling problems before the nations today, problems that seem almost too great for humanity to solve, it cannot be tolerated that anyone should retard the approachment between the English-speaking people. American editors might well take notice; for there is a well-defined, even if insidious, propaganda against Britain and everything British in the United States today.

THE Bishop of Long Island recently made this statement: "With few exceptions, our clergy are seriously underpaid." A generous layman has volunteered to pay the Bishop's salary for 1927. Bishop Stires will turn back to each parish the amount assessed for his salary to be added to the stipends of the clergy within his jurisdiction. Let us hope that more generous laymen may discover themselves, that more of our good bishops may have the opportunity of doing the same thing!

Dr. Jacks is doing a real service in producing the series of books, "The Faiths", of which he is editor. Significantly enough, there are two volumes on the Anglican Communion—"The Anglo-Catholic Faith" by Canon Lacey, and "Modernism" by Dr. Percy Gardner—but Dr. Jacks explains in the preface that the editor and authors of the series are mindful of what St. Paul says about one faith and are trying in these books on "The Faiths" to study the "Varieties of Christian Expression" as they are actually found to exist today. The implication is that there may be discovered more oneness of faith than the casual observer might imagine.

Canon Lacey has done a unique piece of work in providing in attractive and readable form at once a brief history of the Anglo-Catholic movement in the Church and a well thought out statement of the Anglo-Catholic position. He combines great scholarship with real literary power.

As over against Modernism, Anglo-Catholicism has the advantage of having a definite and pretty well agreed upon point of view and program. For all the modernists may say, Modernism is essentially an attack on certain of the elements in historic Christianity, and lacks the unity and simplicity of that central position which has been being thought out through the centuries. The result of this is that there are a lot of different brands of Modernism. Dr. Gardner starts off with Mrs. Humphrey Wards definition, "Modernism is the attempt of the modern spirit, acting religiously, to refashion Christianity, not outside but inside the warm limits of the ancient churches, to secure, not a reduced, but a transformed Christianity." His emphasis on the importance of Christian experience is particularly valuable. If all the modernites were to read Canon Lacey's book and all the Anglo-Catholics were to read Dr. Gardner's book, we would make a long step on the path that leads from "The Faiths" to the Faith.

In "Church Facts and Principles" the Rev. T. T. Walsh has given us a valuable hand book of the Church's teachings and practices. It would make a good text book for confirmation classes, and contains a lot of fresh and interesting material. The Chapters on "The Episcopal Church", "Forms of Worship", "Infant Baptism", and "Departed Souls" are printed separately in pamphlet form and may be had for ten or fifteen cents each. "A Churchwoman's Outline-History" is a splendid achievement in co-operative thinking. It is the joint product of a class in Church History at St. Mark's Church, Louisville, Kentucky. It covers the history of the church, its sacraments and its symbols. Those who had a part in producing it must have found it an enriching experience, something of which may be shared by those who read it.

Preacher, Pulpit and Pew

By E. P. Jots

A negro woman of large proportions was in a motor car accident. She was transported to a hospital, where she soon regained consciousness. The attending doctor, seeking to comfort her, said:

"You undoubtedly will be able to obtain a considerable amount of damages, Mrs. Botts."

"Damages!" said Mrs. Botts. "What Ah wants wif damages? Lar's knows Ah got too much damages now. What Ah wants is repairs."

A connoisseur of paintings saw in the window of a second-hand dealer's shop the portrait of an admiral in full uniform. He offered the dealer £50 for it, but the latter declined to sell under £75. As neither would give way, the picture remained in the shop.

A short time afterwards the connoisseur saw the picture hanging in the dining room of a house he happened to be visiting. With an exclamation of surprise he walked towards it.

"Hello! What have you got here?" he said.

His host replied that the portrait had been bequeathed to him, and added: "It is the portrait of one of Nelson's admirals, an ancestor of ours."

"Was he, indeed?" commented the connoisseur. "A month ago he was within £25 of becoming one of mine."

Whether or not Ask Me Another is already a "has been" I cannot say, but it is interesting to notice that people are now playing the game by giving intelligent answers rather than merely correct ones. For example, the question, "What is the longest river in South America?" can be answered intelligently, I am told, by replying: "Are you sure the longest river is in South America." And the question: "Who was the fourth Secretary of State of the United States" is intelligenly answered by replying: "Who cares." I am not prepared to say that it is a legitimate game but I must say that it holds out interesting possibilities.

NEWS OF WESTERN DIOCESES

In Brief Paragraphs

Edited by

BISHOP W. BERTRAND STEVENS

APRIL 19th to 27th was Seaman's Book Week, the purpose being to put the public library on the sea. The California Library Association collects books and the Seamen's Church Institute places them on the vessels which leave San Francisco. All classes of vessels are served, both American and foreign. During the World War the value of libraries on the ship was so clearly demonstrated that various agencies throughout the country have carried on the work. A captain writes: "In this vessel there are on the average 200 books read each voyage by members of the crew, the passengers having a different library. Western fiction stories are, of course, the ones most read, although mystery, intrigue and adventure stories are always in demand. And then, too, we have some men each trip who will read nothing but non-fiction books on any subject obtainable."

The Chapel of Saints Simon and Jude of the Home for the Aged, Albrambra, Calif., was opened on Maundy Thursday. This is a beautiful building connected by cloisters with the main building. It is given by an anonymous donor as a memorial to the great first Bishop of California, Rt. Rev. William Ingraham Kip.

The new parish house of All Saints', Palo Alto, was formally dedicated on the afternoon of Easter Day. The rector of the parish, the Rev. Oscar Green, is building up the parish both spiritually and materially. Palo Alto is the site of Stanford University, whose chaplain, the Rev. D. Charles Gardner, is a priest of the Church.

Bishop Irving P. Johnson, of Colorado, due to the pressure of work within his own diocese, has resigned as a member of the Commission on Evangelism. Bishop Cook, of Delaware, has been appointed to succeed Bishop Johnson.

Word is received from Bishop McKim of the death, on April 6, of the first priest ordained in the Nippon Sei Kokwai, the Rev. Masakadzu Tai. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Williams in 1884 and priest by Bishop Hare in 1891, when Bishop Hare made a visitation in Japan. In his younger days Mr. Tai was one of the most eloquent preachers in Japan and an aggressive and fearless evangelist. He became a Christian under the Rev. W. B. Cooper, and for it was cast out by his family and ostracized by his friends.

The official opening of the Hospital of the Good Samaritan, Los Angeles, was held on the afternon of April 19th. Patients were transferred from the old building into the new and all departments are in full operation. The Rev. Thomas C. Marshall, secretary of the hospital for many years, will, after July, devote his entire time to his work as hospital secretary and chaplain.

The Dean of Trinity Cathedral, Phoenix, Ariz., asked for an Easter offering of $2,500. "It can be done," writes the dean, "but whatever the amount let the Easter offering represent the happy gift of the store-up personality of the friends and parishioners of Trinity Cathedral." Trinity Cathedral, by the way, follows the happy custom of having a parish dinner in honor of the members of the confirmation class. Such a mark of attention to the newly-confirmed has great value as a means of formally welcoming them into the full fellowship of the Church.

Work of the new church school and community of St. Clement's, Berkeley, Calif., is progressing rapidly and the building is to be completed in time for use when the Church school resumes its activities. Bishop Parsons laid the cornerstone of the new building on April 10th. St. Clement's has long felt the need of adequate accommodations for its large school and this building will meet the need in every way. This is the first unit of a complete Gothic Church plant. The Rev. L. H. Miller is rector.

Health conditions among the Indians of California are said to be bad. The Swing-Johnson bill provides that all funds for health, education and relief work among the California Indians should be turned over to the state agencies. The bill was not acted upon by the Sixty-ninth Congress, but it will be re-introduced next December and pushed through to decisive action.

The 19th annual report of the three diocesan homes of Arizona (St. Luke's Home, Phoenix; St. Luke's in the Desert, and St. Luke's in the Mountains) has been issued. These institutions, all founded by Bishop Atwood, have done valiant service for tuberculosis patients. I have often heard Bishop Atwood tell of the terrible conditions among those who came to Arizona in search of health twenty-five years ago. It was his personal knowledge of the great demand for such homes as St. Luke's that led him to raise the money for these three works of mercy. The Church is greatly in his debt for founding them.

Ask Me Another

A few "double barrel" questions; each counts 10 per cent with a credit of 5 per cent if you answer half of any question correctly. There is a catch question—watch out for it.

1. When did who say: "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee: In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth rise up and walk?"
2. Where was who consecrated the present bishop of New York?
3. What body, meeting where, in what year, elected Bishop Murray president of what? (Total of 20 per cent.)
4. What theological seminary is located where in Massachusetts?
5. Who, a member of what Church, wrote: "Christ the Lord is Risen Today?"
6. Who, accompanied by whom, made a famous journey to Asia Minor?
7. What Bishop resigned from what office because of his opposition to the World War?
8. Bishop Irving P. Johnson was the rector of ———— church, in the city of ————, before being consecrated Bishop of Wyoming.
9. What is the second service in the Prayer Book and what service follows?

For the first time in the history of the city, noon-day services were held in Eau Claire, Wis., during Holy Week. Twelve churches joined in holding them in a down-town theatre, with a different preacher each day. They began with an attendance of 500 and increased steadily until they had 1,100 on the last day, to say nothing of the thousands listening in on the radio. One family sent word that they lived too far to attend, but they had a family luncheon each day and then all joined in the service, singing, praying and listening. The ministers all reported renewed interest as a result of these services.

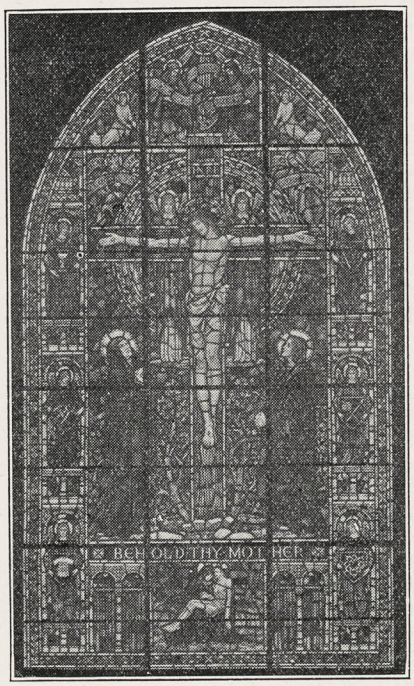
NEWS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH

In Brief Paragraphs



Edited by

WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD

THE Most Rt. Rev. William Henry Francis, who, among other things, is Metropolitan Archbishop of North America of the Western Orthodox Old Catholic Church, officiated last Sunday at an Easter service and confirmation at St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie, New York. The announcement of the service issued by the rector of St. Mark's, the Rev. William Norman Guthrie, was made with all the pomp and vanity of this wicked world. "In these days of striving for world freedom such a courtesy on our part is more than seemly. A service of a Catholic body yielding no obedience to Rome but loyal to all the devoutest traditions of Western Christendom should be interesting and edifying to our well-wishers." An easier reason might have been found for this get-together. Brother Francis, having bitten off a considerable chunk in making himself Archbishop of all of North America, has not found the time since his consecration to build any congregations. Likewise, Dr. Guthrie, I believe, has been cut off from Episcopal visitations because of the wild swings that he made while sparring with the Bishop of New York. What could be nicer that the get-together of a churchless bishop and a bishopless church?

I wonder if there is a complete list anywhere of the Metropolitans, Mitred Bishops, Archbishops, and what have you, that are running about the country in flowing robes and parted whiskers, and if there is anybody who really knows the spurious from the genuine? Apparently anybody can have himself consecrated who desires such honors and has the price. In any case, the inference is plausible since an archbishopric in some church or other was offered me a year or two after I was out of the seminary, and for a very nominal sum, too, which shows how lightly I hold such honors. The proposition was put to me by a clergyman of our Church who became quite indignant when I told him that I did not feel justified in borrowing five dollars for such a purpose, and besides, I had never been able to grow a mustache to say nothing of a beard. But this clergyman took the honor unto himself, flowing robes, whiskers and all, and really cut quite a swath in the vulgarian set of Fifth Avenue society. I have been told that he even challenged Brother Francis' right to be the Metropolitan Archbishop of all of North America, but as to the accuracy of that I cannot say. In any case he was convinced that Francis had no right to Alaska, since he himself traced his apostolic succession from Russia, and didn't the United States buy Alaska from that country? The last I heard of him he was in Washington to see the Secretary of State about it. But I must not tell more; perhaps I have said enough to prompt some person interested in ecclesiastical whiskers to investigate so that we may know just what have roots and what is hair from the tails of donkeys pasted upon the chins.

The Honorable John E. Rankin, congressman from Mississippi, recently delivered an address in the House of Representatives which adequately answered Congressman Free of California, whom you will remember introduced a resolution calling for an investigation of the Federal Council of Churches on the grounds that it was a part of the Third International, etc., etc. He reminds Mr. Free that Mr. Herbert Hoover was at one time a vice-president of the Federal Council, and that Mr. Charles Evans Hughes has been closely identified with its work. He closes his able address thus: "The Federal Council of Churches needs no defense at my hands nor at the hands of the Congress of the United States; but, on the other hand, Congress needs to follow the example of this great body of Christian men and women and to assist them in upholding the standard of morality, of common honesty, of common decency, of Christianity, and of all the other elevating and ennobling attributes which tends to upbuild and advance a good Christian civilization."

Rheumatism
A Remarkable Home Treatment Given by One Who Had It
In the year of 1893 I was attacked by Muscular and Sub-Acute Rheumatism. I suffered as only those who are thus afflicted know for over three years. I tried remedy after remedy, but such relief as I obtained was only temporary. Finally, I found a treatment that cured me completely and such a pitiful condition has never returned. I have given it to a number who were terribly afflicted, even bedridden, some of them seventy to eighty years old, and the results were the same as in my own case.
I want every sufferer from any form of muscular and sub-acute (swelling of the joints) rheumatism, to try the great value of my improved "Home Treatment" for its remarkable healing power. Don't send a cent; simply mail your name and address, and I will send it free to try. After you have used it, and it has proven itself to be that long-looked-for means of getting rid of such forms of rheumatism, you may send the price of it, One Dollar, but understand I do not want your money unless you are perfectly satisfied to send it. Isn't that fair? Why suffer any longer, when relief is thus offered you free. Don't delay. Write today.

A year ago a gift of $100,000 was made for an endowment fund for a new diocese in Northwestern Wisconsin, on condition that the new diocese should be erected within five years. The contemplated area of the new jurisdiction includes that part of the diocese of Milwaukee known as the Convocation of La Crosse, together with a strip of the diocese of Fond du Lac that lies in the west. Consent has gladly been given to the proposal by Bishop Webb of Milwaukee and Bishop Weller of Fond du Lac, and the proposal has received the unanimous approval of the conventions of both dioceses. The final requirement is the ratification of the General Convention, which meets next year. This month an effort is being made to raise $100,000 as an endowment, the income of which will be used to help support the missions in the proposed diocese. Gifts to the fund will be received by the trustees of the diocese of Milwaukee and turned over to the trustees of the new diocese when it becomes a reality. If there should by chance be no new diocese, the gifts will be returned.

Marked increase in mob murders during the last year was a great shock to the churches in their campaign for a lynchless land, according to a statement accompanying the Honor Roll of states free from lynching in 1926, made public today. A direct challenge to redoubled efforts to arouse public opinion against lynching, is the way church leaders sum up the situation.

The four other states which were free of the evil in 1925, but which lost their places on the Honor Roll because of lynchings during 1926, are Kentucky, South Carolina, Tennessee and Texas.

"The total number of states free of lynching in 1926 was 38, which was the same total as in 1925 and in 1924, and one fewer than the total number without any lynchings in 1923. The number of states in which lynchings still occured in 1926 was 10, the same number as in 1925, and in 1924; the number having lynchings in 1923 was 9."

An Offer

A NUMBER of inquiries have been received in regard to an offer recently made to the clergy. For each new subscription to this paper (not renewals), or for a Bundle order for at least ten copies for at least thirteen weeks, we offered an Auto-Strop razor, with the accessories, exactly as illustrated in the picture that accompanied the letter. This unusual offer is made possible through an advertising contract that we have made with the manufacturer, and stands until the supply is exhausted. Clergymen having a standing order for a Bundle will be sent a razor if they will write us a note signifying their intention to continue with their Bundle. Any clergyman is entitled to this premium who sends us one new subscription for a year, the subscription price of $2 to accompany the order.

Bridgeport. St. Paul's Parish is the one parish around which all such persons settle; the parish is in the very heart of the industrial center, the tenement house district. The other parishes are all in the fashionable parts of the city where immigrants are less likely to live. I have looked up those for whom you sent a memo, and they attend St. Paul's Church and are very much at home. I will be glad to have other names of persons who come to Bridgeport on the east side of the city where 'the slum district' is."

A parishioner of Christ Church, Savannah, Ga., found an old newspaper in his home which contained the program of a festival held in the Church in 1871. This year that program was reproduced as near as possible. A procession with banners of long ago, the carols of 1871, and the roll call of the classes of that year were called. Three teachers out of the 27 listed responded to their names

Proposed Parish House and Church—THE CHURCH OF THE REDEEMER, PELHAM, NEW YORK

Frank M. Snyder, Architect

For a number of years the Church of The Redeemer at Pelham, New York, had been greatly handicapped by not having a Parish House to serve the needs of a growing community. The Sunday School has met in the Church, and other parish activities have been carried on in the homes of parishioners or halls hired for the occasions.

Some years ago the Church acquired an ideal, centrally located site upon which to build a new Church, Parish House and Rectory. Under the far-visioned leadership of the Rector, Rev. Herbert Haigh Brown, the parish has now secured the necessary funds with which to build the first unit of the group—the greatly needed Parish House.

Under the direction of this firm the preparatory work of the campaign was begun March 16 and concluded with an intensive period March 31—April 12. The great success which attended this effort is indicated in the following letter from the Rector:

Church of The Redeemer
Pelham, New York April 13, 1927.

Mr. Cyrus P. Keen,
Care of Ward, Wells, Dreshman & Gates,
475 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

My Dear Mr. Keen:

May I express to you, as Rector of the above Church, my extreme gratification at the success which has attended your efforts in our campaign here.

As you know, we actually started out to raise $55,000, but subsequently raised our objective to $65,000, not because we believed we might reach it, but that it might act as a greater incentive to effort.

That you have labored under the most serious handicap, on account of my being laid aside with sickness almost throughout the whole period of the campaign, is obvious. Yet, despite this, you have actually raised $60,520 and the captains of the respective teams have pledged themselves to raise the remainder within the next few days—so great has been the enthusiasm engendered.

Such an achievement, under the most favorable conditions, would be a notable one; but under those which you have been obliged to labor, is absolutely amazing. Naturally my people are elated and grateful. They wonder, as I do, how it all happened. Certainly it is the biggest thing that has transpired in Pelham in many years.

And, may I add, that I have heard nothing but the kindest and most appreciative things about you and your staff. Such terms as zeal, efficiency, courtesy seem to sum up the general estimate of the manner in which the campaign has been managed. If ever we have another one, we shall most assuredly seek you out.

With many thanks and heartiest congratulations,
Believe me,
Faithfully yours,
Herbert H. Brown, Rector.

THE SERVICE PERFORMED BY TRINITY

Both Church and State in Her Debt

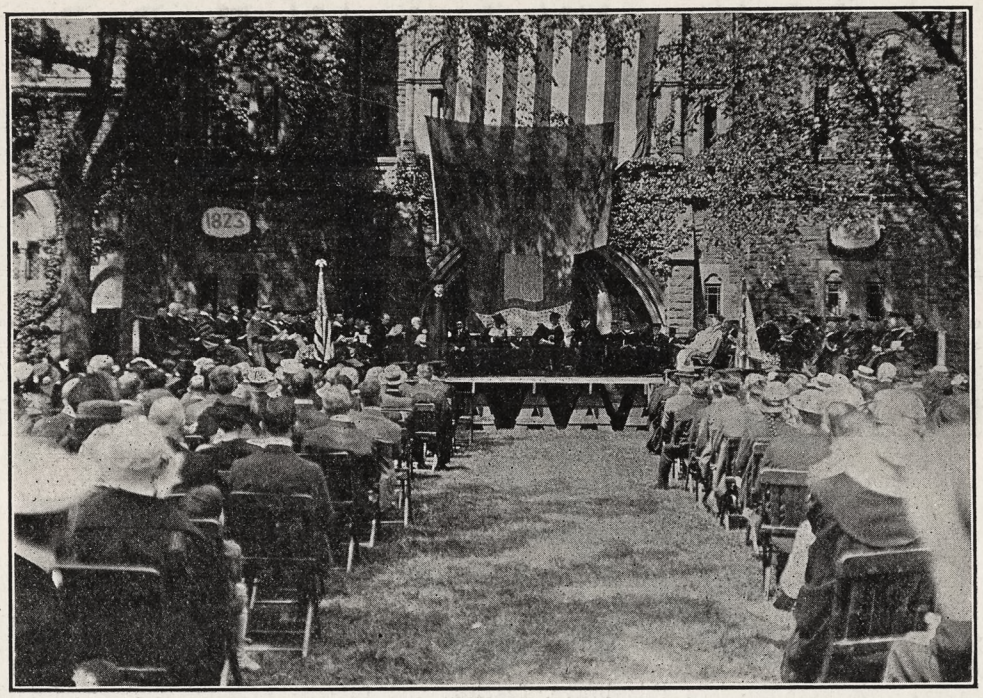
BY HONORABLE JOSEPH BUFFINGTON

Federal Judge and Trinity Alumnus

TRINITY has regarded herself as one of her Church's contributions to education, and in historic continuity and loyal faith has lived up to the motto of her founders, Pro Ecclesia et Patria, for Church and Country. Using the brief space here afforded, it is my part to touch simply on the high lights which evidence that Trinity has done her bounden duty in that state of life into which it has pleased God to call her.

In her century of life, she has laid her Church under a deep obligation to her, as a West Point, in officering her Church. The scope of that work is evidenced by the fact that she is one of the five Church colleges that today furnish to the Episcopal Church 50 of its 139 bishops and one-sixth of its clergy, facts which cause the thoughtful man and woman to wonder where our Church would be today if these colleges had not been back of the Church, and where the Church might have been today if she had not been back of these colleges.

Touching on the broader phases of Church life, missions, journalism, nationalism, I note that during his student days one of her sons visioned and inspired the pioneers of that mission spirit to the Orient, which led to the foundations of Boone University to be succeeded by St. Johns University and the great teaching forces now working in China. At the very close of the Civil War, when passion dominated the northern and southern divisions of all American Churches, Trinity College sent its President to the General Convention at Philadelphia. In the face of bitter partisanship and misguided patriotism, he fearlessly opposed and defeated resolutions that would have left a Church divided North and South, and the force of his personality and leadership brought about a fraternal resolution that in uniting a divided Church was as great as was the work of the fathers who had met in that same city in 1787 to form the Church. In this brave, fearless and far-visioned work, this Trinity President did in those post-war days a work for his Church which other great Christian bodies have not been able to do in seventy-five years of peace.



In the journalistic life of the Church (and a Church without that life is dead), two Trinity College professors when the existence of The Churchman was at stake, took on themselves its management in addition to their College work, and saved from extinction that great journal, then one of the very few publications of the Church. And in connection with averting the death of one great journal, one should refer to the great journalistic debt the Church owes to another son of Trinity College, who from nothing has brought into life THE WITNESS you now read, a journal which has found its way into more homes than any paper of our Church.

Marshalling the great, unrecognized forces that have come from this modest college, where service for Church and Country is a tradition, inbred, we should not overlook the great, and today living force of Dudly Buck, another of Trinity's sons. At a time when music as a handmaid of worship was unrecognized, it was he who more than any other awakened his Church to that dignity and high plane and place of music in worship, that enabled the Episcopal Church to become a great factor in raising the standards of religious music in all communions in America. I have often thought a monument to Dudly Buck, given not by his own Church, but by all American Churches, should stand on the Trinity campus. And by it I would place the figure of another son, Gallandet, whose pioneer work in his parish gave to the deaf and dumb of the United States the liturgy and service of the Episcopal Church and enabled it, as no other communion, in worship to cause the dumb to speak.

Passing to its service to the State and touching only a few of the high lights, we note that in the crisis of the Civil War, when the future of the Union came at Gettysburg, by the holding of Little Round, the officer in command who gave up his life and saved the pivotal position was one of Trinity's sons; in the Spanish-American War another was the first commissioned officer to give up his life, and another in command of the Marine Corps gained at Guantanamo the first foothold and landing place in Cuba, where his words, " I am in no more danger than the men," became an historic tradition of the Corps. In the World War, Trinity at once turned over its buildings, faculty and financial resources to the Government, accepted as its head an officer of the Navy and became a training school for officers. Out of approximately 2,000 alumni and undergraduates, it furnished the Army and Navy 680 men. One of its sons was the first Chaplain killed and the only one in command of troops when killed. Its campus flag staff and its always floating flag was the first college flag dedicated by religious service when erected, and the bronze figure of its founder with his hand pointing to that flag, symbolizes the two-fold mission of the college—to "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's."

Of the far-reaching things in education which this small college has pioneered, its influence in collegiate architecture should be noted. Seventy-five years ago when college architecture was painfully commonplace, Trinity College sent one of her architect sons to London, where, under the guidance of William Burges, the great English architect, plans were made for the buildings of Trinity College. The main building—an unbroken front of six hundred and fifty feet—is one of the pioneer, and is one of the best examples of English secular Gothic in America, and has been an inspiration and model for many of the present-day university buildings of the country. The environment of Trinity, with such buildings set in broad, open-visioned country, yet happily near a beautiful New England city, has inspired to architecture many of her students. The great Trowbridge always said he owed what he was in architecture to Trinity. Another of her architect sons was the designer of sixteen of Yale's buildings. In introducing in American colleges academic dress and insignia, Trinity did a pioneer work at a time when such dress was practically unknown or regarded with ill-favor. Her use so far preceded the present American degree insignia, that Trinity created degree hoods of her own which she still retains.

Trinity was, is, and will be, distinctively a college. She feels a university can do work she cannot; she knows she does work a university cannot. She has not aped in a weak way the great university, but she has done in a strong way what a college can best do. She seeks to influence character and fit men for leadership in their own sphere.

She selects her students. Unless barred by distance, no student enters who has not first visited the college and secured the approval of her faculty. Accepted, she aims to hold them to graduation through her work as a personal college, which she is, namely, where every head professor in person knows and teaches every student in his department. She feels that the mission of a personal college is to do some particular thing better than any other institution. As an example of this, we but instance the building up of a pre-medical course that is surpassed nowhere, that makes her graduates welcomed by every medical school; that this year finds one-third of her entering class preparing to study medicine; that in a late graduating class at the Yale Medical School, composed of graduates of educational institutions all over the country, four of the nine honor men were Trinity men. Her faculty are alive to advanced scholarship. Out of thirty members, fourteen have during the past year written books, articles accepted by professional journals and other publications. Her degrees are prized. Her trusts have been scrupulously guarded and individualized. Her budget is balanced. She has need of further equipment, funds and memorial buildings. Her century of accomplishment and her century of promise evidence the great service she has rendered in a quiet way to Church and State, commend her to thoughtful men and women as a place where their sons can be personally educated, and their gifts can be worthily bestowed with the assurance that the trusts committed to her will be loyally administered and preserved in historic continuity.

THE BUILDINGS AT TRINITY

And Some of the Pressing Needs

BY REV. REMSEN B. OGILBY

President of Trinity College

WHEN, in 1872, the trustees of Trinity College sold the land in the center of Hartford occupied by the college since its foundation in 1823, to move out to a site with more room for expansion, they turned to England for their architect. It is well that they did so: too many awful examples of American institutional architecture of the seventies are still with us. In England at that time, however, the Gothic revival had set in, and the man selected by the authorities of Trinity, William Burges, was a staunch supporter of that movement. As a result, the buildings of Trinity College are one of the earliest examples of English secular Gothic in this country, and are pronounced by experts to be one of the best.

The plans drawn by Burges were far too elaborate for the college of his time, and indeed, probably too elaborate ever to be completed. One side of one of three vast quadrangles was completed in the seventies and eighties, a series of dormitories and class rooms, dominated by a fine cluster of towers in the center. It is perhaps the longest single line of college buildings in America. Spread out along a ridge in the southern portion of the city, with a wide expanse of campus in front of it and cliffs dropping to a park behind, it is clearly visible from the main line of the New Haven road and is one of the architectural beauties of Hartford.

In 1914 was completed a building to house the College Library and the offices of the administration, at the northern end of the main building and at right angles to it, following the thought of Burges in his plans for a quadrangle. This building was given by Mr. J. P. Morgan, in memory of his friend, Bishop Williams. Benjamin Wistar Morris, the architect, an alumnus of Trinity, was singularly successful in keeping to the spirit of the Burges plans and this unit fits in well with the group. The other buildings of the college, the Jarvis Chemical and Physical Laboratories, the Boardman Biology and Engineering Building, and the Gymnasium were constructed more to meet definite needs than to harmonize with the style of the original plans; they are now so crowded that new buildings are essential to the work of the college.

At the time of his sudden death, two years ago, Samuel Breck Parkman Trowbridge, a graduate of Trinity and her consulting architect, was deep in plans for new buildings which would carry a careful study of the future needs of the college as well as reconcile the ideas of William Burges with modern methods of construction. His loss was felt not only by Trinity but by the whole architectural field in America. His firm, Trowbridge and Livingston, are continuing with his plans, with the help of Howard Greenley, Trinity '94, and the name of Trowbridge will be suitably perpetuated in one of the new buildings.

The most pressing need of Trinity today is a new Chemical Laboratory. Chemistry, important today in the curriculum of any college, is especially important at Trinity because of the success achieved here in the pre-medical course, of which chemistry is one of the foundations. The graduates of the pre-medical course at Trinity are in high demand at the medical schools, in spite of the fact that laboratories out of date in design are crowded to the limit of capacity and students often barred for lack of room.

Almost equally imperative is the demand for a new gymnasium. No part of institutional architecture has progressed faster than facilites for physical training since the old gymnasium at Trinity was built. Proper exercise for every student is the goal of the college of today.

Finally, Trinity needs a worthy college chapel. For over one hundred years she has been serving the Church and sending out trained leaders, clerical and lay. At present the Chapel is an "Upper Room" in the main building, too small to accommodate properly the entire college body at one time. The gift of a dignified Chapel, in architecture fit to take place beside the original buildings of Burges, would seem a suitable recognition of what Trinity has done for the Church.

A recent legacy has made possible the construction at some time in the future of a new dormitory. That, with new Chemical Laboratory, Chapel and Gymnasium, will make the plant of the College adequate—even complete.

THE SMALL URBAN COLLEGE

And Some of Its Problems

BY HARRY T. COSTELLO

Brownell Professor of Philosophy at Trinity

THE small college has some well marked advantages, such as closer contact between teacher and pupil, and pupil and pupil. An average student probably profits more, therefore, by the small college than he would in the big university. But the university offers more to the very exceptional and aggressive student, and possibly more to the dullard.

There are several types of small colleges. In New England there are chiefly two, those situated in rural surroundings and those in urban surroundings. There seems to be a strong tendency for the former to become gentlemen's country clubs, and for the latter to become "city colleges" with more or less emphasis on "practical" courses. Trinity College, though the growth of the city of Hartford has closed completely around its formerly almost rural campus, has resisted the tendency towards the practical. It is therefore an interesting experiment in education almost in spite of any intention of being such.

The elements of the problem may be briefly stated. Trinity has a long tradition and high reputation and this, of course, is all to the good. The student who goes to college largely to gain the prestige of the college degree would, however, be likely to choose certain of the great universities. The Trinity faculty is of high excellence, most of them finding a place in "Who's Who." Even the freshman comes at once in direct contact with these men in small classes. In the large university, the same student would spend the first two years as a member of large classes, and would probably meet directly no instructors of any maturity. But this advantage of the small college means a very great cost, if we count not merely student fees but also the endowment and plant necessary. It costs over a thousand dollars a year for each student at Trinity, personal expenses not included, or something like $2.50 every time he goes to class. Many who are going to college nowadays are not worth having that much spent on them. The tendency has therefore been, at Trinity as elsewhere, to raise higher and higher the minimum standard of entrance.

The general result has been to keep out poor students, but not necessarily to bring in good ones to a college such as Trinity. Parents who have appreciated the value of the small college have frequently felt that the city was a distraction and a danger. They have therefore sent heir sons to a rural college. Many students who come to the small college in the city do so in order to work their way through by the aid of work obtainable in the city, and while such young men are often admirably ambitious, such work is itself a serious distraction from the work of the college.

There seems to be a tendency to meet these outside distractions—which are by no means unknown, in somewhat differing forms, in the rural college—by building up, within the college, courses or groups of study so coherent and exacting that the student's ambition will be focussed and his mind and time fully occupied. Most such groups of study are essentially pre-professional. Thus at Trinity the most successful and widely known group of studies is the pre-medical group. Such a coherent course of study does build up, in a short time, prestige for itself, and so brings in good students. In turn, it graduates alumni whose success in the medical school adds still further prestige. Contrasting these fellows with the aimless loafing and drifting of so many college students, faculty and alumni begin to call for more such groups. In fact, there is a strong tendency to make the entire college pre-professional; or to do something which comes practically to the same, namely, turning all the good students, all the brainy and ambitious students, towards one or another sort of pre-professional work.

Such a college as Trinity thus tends to lead in a movement which is growing in all colleges today, the tendency to make college work distinctly pre-professional. In the old days, even only a few years ago, the bright boy just out of high school went into business or industry. Business men and manufacturers scorned the college man: it was almost a handicap to have been to college. The colleges, therefore, began to turn their graduates towards the professional schools, and the professional schools, finding they could get enough candidates for entrance from the colleges, began to refuse to admit to professional study any who were not college men. The colleges, which had always been more or less pre-professional in the ministry, now became pre-professional in all professions.

And then came the rush to the colleges, which we have still increasing today, and all the bright and ambitious young men seemed determined to go to college. And the college machinery had already been adjusted to pick out all the best of these, and send them into law, medicine, teaching, engineering. Unfortunately, the ministry does not seem to attract many candidates, though the college machinery is still adapted to that preparation also. The able young men go to college; the college leaders do not go into business.

Just now the business men are waking up to the fact that to get good men now they must get college men. But they have not yet awakened to the fact that they can not now get the best of the college men. It is too late. These latter face resolutely the long grind of ten years' training to get the meagre position of a beginner in the practice of medicine; and the glittering rewards of business they pass by because they are not interested. The colleges have educated them away from business, have taught them to be interested elsewhere. Business and industry face a very serious problem. Where are they going to get the leaders they need? The solution would seem to be the professionalizing of these fields, putting them on such a level intellectually and ethically that they will attract the best talent again. The popularity of the colleges puts the colleges in a position, such as they never occupied before—a position to dictate terms even to business. The colleges have a monopoly on talent.

But behind all this there rises still another question. Will not the standardizing of college courses into sets of pre-professional groups tend to make of colleges merely junior professional schools, and is this an altogether desirable outcome? Much professional life is routine; much professional work deals with the ills of society, with the sick, the contentious, the inmature; much professional knowledge is detailed and highly technical. Pre-medical work has probably already gone to far in the technical direction. The great educational problem before the colleges today is how to make college work serious without making it narrow; how to secure the advantage of a definite goal, such as the pre-professional studies offer, and yet do this without the specialization and inelasticity that makes the new professional training only the old "practical" training raised to a somewhat higher level of difficulty.

Let's Know

WHY EASTER?

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

COMES a letter with the following request: "Please tell us in Let's Know how the Church came to use the name Easter for the Feast of the Resurrection and what does the word Easter mean?"

The name Easter is purely an Anglo-Saxon name for the Feast of the Resurrection. According to the Venerable Bede, it came from Eostre, the name of a Teutonic goddess of the rising light of day and spring. Nothing much more than that is known of the goddess. Evidently it is another instance where Christianity absorbed a pagan festival. In most other languages the name for the Feast of the Resurrection is some form of the Greek "Pascha," following the Hebrew name for the Passover, which was "Pesach." In Latin it is Pascha; in Italian, Pasqua; in Spanish, Pascua; in French, Paques.

Some special observance of the Resurrection Day certainly dates from the very earliest Christian times. It must have been in reference to something like a Christianized Passover that St. Paul wrote to the Corinthians: "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us, therefore let us keep the feast." Its observance was not on a fixed date (as Christmas Day came to be observed) because it was linked with the Jewish Passover and that was a movable event dependent on the changes of the moon. The Passover occurred on the 14th day of the month Nisan, which was reckoned by the lunar chronology of the Jews. In those early Christian years the Feast of the Resurrection itself was universally kept but the exact date was a very complicated question.

Suffice it to say that in the east it was customary to regulate the time of the festival by the date of the Passover, whatever day of the week it might fall on, while in the west it was always reserved for the first day of the week. A heated controversy arose over this difference, which was not settled until the Council of Nicea, A. D. 325. Nowadays Easter falls on the first Sunday following the first full moon after the vernal equinox of March 21 each year. This means it can come anywhere from March 22 to April 25. Proposals have been made at various times to stabilize the Church calendar by designating a fixed day for Easter, but the old traditions are hard to escape. I believe the matter is under discussion at the present time in England in connection with the revision of the English Prayer Book, where it is suggested that the second Sunday in April should always be Easter Day.

It is a confusing business, but it shows the great importance of this Feast from the very earliest times. St. Paul said it when he wrote: "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain and your faith is also vain." Easter is the high water mark of every Christian year. It makes one a little impatient to see the ease with which some modern writers (like Bruce Barton) pass over the Resurrection as though it had never occurred. If St. Paul were here, he would probably write some more vigorous epistles about it.

Youth and Unity

REVIEWS OF FOUR NEW BOOKS

By the Rev. C. L. Street

THE NEW PATRIOTISM: POEMS OF WORLD BROTHERHOOD, by Thomas Curtis Clark and Esther A. Gillespie. Bobbs-Merrill $2.00

In this day when patriotism is so much the refuge of scoundrels that lovers of peace are often driven to account this ancient virtue as of no value whatever, this collection of poems comes with timely emphasis, stressing as it does the eternal truth that patriotism and world brotherhood are not incompatible ideals, but are necessary each to the other.

While the poems are mostly by present-day writers, Longfellow, Tennyson, Lowell, and Walt Whitman find a place. Incidentally, it is interesting to find Bishop Oldham's "America First" included.

PROTESTANT EUROPE: ITS CRISIS AND OUTLOOK by Adolph Keller and George Stewart. Doran $3.50

"Protestant Europe" is a book of some three hundred and fifty pages, which gives a detailed account of the problems which the Protestant Churches in Europe are facing. Dr. Stewart, in the first part of the book, gives a graphic description of the effects of the war on European Protestantism, and an analysis of Protestant thought and activities to-day. His study of the different theological viewpoints is scholarly and penetrating. What he has to say about movements in the Church of England shows a real sympathy and insight. Dr. Keller, in the last part of the book, reviews the different Protestant churches, country by country.

YOUTH AND CHRISTIAN UNITY by the Rev. Walter W. Van Kirk, D. D. Doran $2.00

Mr. Van Kirk gives in this book a moving picture of the evils of a disunited Christendom, and a stirring appeal for Christian unity, backed by the vision and strength of the rising generation. There is a good account of the progress that has been already made toward unity both in this country and in Europe, and of the plans and hopes of the Lausanne Conference to be held this summer. The book ends with a plea to the young people to make themselves felt in this movement. Mr. Van Kirk says: "The first step which youth must take if it would complete the building of this Church universal is to inform itself. It is doubtful if the enthusiasm of youth on any great moral question is matched by a mind that is sufficiently well informed. Some midnight oil must be burned."

YOUTH AND TRUTH by W. A. Harper. The Century Company.

The author of this book is the President of Elon College in North Carolina. The book begins with a vigorous and sweeping defence of youth as essentially earnest and essentially seeking for truth. It goes on to give a statement of the kind of Christian gospel which to the author's mind will best solve the problems of the present hour and best appeal to the mind and hearts of the rising generation.

Like many of the books about YOUTH with a capital "Y," this book is a piece of propaganda for a certain point of view rather than an objective study of facts. But it is a good piece of propaganda and written in a good cause.

Cheerful Confidences

SPECIAL CONFIRMATIONS

By Rev. Geo. Parkin Atwater

NO ONE in his right mind would desire to crowd any more work upon our bishops, yet I believe that there is one service which they might do the clergy which would be of real advantage. This would apply particularly to the larger cities of our land, and parishes adjacent to such cities.

Almost every rector has the experience of missing one or more persons from his Confirmation Class, because of reasons beyond control. There are reticent older folks who are scared off by the fact that the Confirmation Class is to consist largely of children. There are young people at college who are never home at the time of the visitation of the bishop. There are persons who miss the Confirmation Service because of illness on the night that the bishop comes—or for some other reason—and there are persons eager to be confirmed who do not want to wait ten months for the visitation.

My suggestion is this: that in the cathedral or some central church in every large city the bishop appoint an hour for confirmation, to which could be brought persons from every parish. Each rector who had some such interested candidate could prepare him for this particular service and inform him of the time and place and accompany him. If such a service were held once every two months, I think it would save many communicants to the church.

This suggestion came to my mind after an experience in my own parish. The rector of an adjoining parish and myself each presented one candidate to the bishop at a special service. I doubt whether either of these two persons would have been confirmed at the usual visits of the bishop.

Current Comment

By Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott

"YOU will find the worm of superstition wherever faith is buried," says a prominent clergyman. "Fad religions, flesh worships, sex cults and other phantasmagoria are fruitful in consequence today. We need a return to crude spirituality." True words; if you interpret "crude" in the old English sense. "Downright" spirituality is what is needed, fostered and conserved by the Church's sacramental system.

THIS seems to me rather trivial and strained: A Jesuit Priest is asked the question: "They say that clam chowder cannot be made without the flavor of pork. Is it safe to take it on Friday? Answer: You are allowed to use meat as a condiment to flavor what you wish to eat on Friday. However, this does not mean that you are to use a large chunk of pork in your clam chowder and call it a condiment." Surely, the Dear Lord must have abundant opportunity to smile, or weep, at the littleness of His children!

"EVIL is not a mere negation or absence of good. It is a positive and terrible force in the hearts of men. It has a thousand lives." So says Dr. Carl S. Patton, of California, named by Dr. Newton as one of the best preachers in his 1926 book. Our own experience teaches us that next to goodness, evil is the hardest thing in the world to kill. Certainly, the consequences of evil cannot be side-stepped. Sooner or later sin "comes into its own," and we appreciate the underlying personality beneath it all. We need more preaching indicative of the fact that God's conception of evil is not affected by the changing fashions of human thought. "I am that I am" might well be said of the Devil as well as of God.

"MOST of our minds resemble a Pullman berth which has not been put in order after being slept in all night." A terrible indictment that, and some of us at some time or other would admit its truth — especially those of us who are parsons and who have so much preaching to do in Lent that we do not know what to preach about next! We are our own porters, however, and we can do much in the way of self-help to remedy matters. The deliberate simplification of accumulated material tends to bring harmony out of chaos, and the minimum of wordage for the amount of idea. Intellect must be given the right of way over impulse, and time-exposure must be substituted for the snap-shot.

Preacher, Pulpit and Pew

"And your husband has become violently religious?"

"I should say so. Last Sunday he picked up the offertory from Fort Worth, the text from Winnipeg, the sermon from Boston and the doxology from San Francisco."

This incident is told by Mr. G. W. E. Russell in his biography, "Edward King, Bishop of London." An earnest but pessimistic priest visited the bishop to talk about his parish, and was very troubled about his lack of success among the younger farm lads lodging at the various homesteads. "For example," he said, "there is one lad who gave me much trouble and I hoped an influence for good was getting a lodging in his heart. But imagine my distress when I asked him what he had done in the way of preparation for his early Communion at Easter and all he said was 'I's cleaned my boots and put 'em under the bed.' It is sad indeed." "Well, dear friend," replied the bishop, "and don't you think the angels would rejoice to see them there?" The signs of regeneration are more than theological and ecclesiastical. Clean shoes may symbolize a clean heart.

A bishop recently addressed a large assembly of Sunday school children, and wound up by asking, in a very paternal way:

"And now, is there any litle boy or any little girl who would like to ask me a question?"

A thin, shrill voice at the back of the room called out, "Please, sir, why did the angels walk up and down Jacob's ladder when they had wings?"

"Oh, ah, yes—I see," said the bishop. "And now, is there any little girl who would like to answer that question?"

A small boy was taken by his father to Washington and taken to visit Congress.

He was much interested in the chaplain, who always opened the sessions with a prayer. Both in the Senate and the House he had observed this procedure.

Finally he asked: "Papa, why does the minister come in every day and pray for Congress?"

"You've got it all wrong, son," replied his father. "The minister comes in every day, looks over Congress, and then prays for the country."

"WOODBINE WILLIE" WRITES A NOVEL

News Paragraphs from England

Edited by

A. MANBY LLOYD

MR. STUDDERT-KENNEDY was bound to get into print and his sermons read better than most. For his preaching is simply thinking aloud. He breaks out into poetry; he is pathetic and sympathetic. Now he has blossomed out as a novelist, and it is something of this sort that explains this exciting and most original novel, "I Pronounce Them."

He is evidently much exercised about the attitude of the Church to some pressing questions of sex. To utter dogmas about divorce and birth control without any attempt to reconsider the whole situation is impossible.

Yet there is nothing final about this fine book. It is not the summing up of a judge. It is the utterance of an artist in the midst of his prayers. It is a very terrible story. We doubt if anyone else could have written it. It demands a Christian, devout and loyal to his Master and at the same time a man psychologically capable of looking right down into the abyss and yet keeping himself in the heavenly places.

The central figure of this powerful story is Jim Counihan, a delightful parson with a very troublesome conscience. He has been compelled to divorce his wife and for the rest of his life he is beset by similar and worse tragedies which befall those who seek his advice.

Maisie has contracted a miserable match with a scoundrel. Her real lover is Charlie. These two are obviously good Christians, but their manner of life offends Church law, and Jim is obliged to condemn it. Robin makes an unfortunate match with an airman who drinks too much. He leaves her. She, too, discovers that her real lover is not the one she has married. He is none other than Jim himself.

Incidentally a host of other problems—the unwanted child, the capitalistic system, the housing of the slum dwellers — buzz around the brain of this unhappy priest. He is left at last with the figure of Jesus turned away from him.

One cannot help feeling that the Church has some more urgent work to do in relieving the consciences of these martyrs than in revising the Prayer Book, which, on the showing of this book, there will soon be very few left to use.

Twisting the Lion's tail is still good sport in the United States said Sir Auckland Geddes, in a recent speech.

"Remember," said Sir Auckland, "that China is getting her Westernization mainly from America. A very large percentage of the Westernized Chinese are Americanized. It is the fashion to believe that there is little difference between Americanization and Europeanization. There is a very great difference, really. The American outlook is a very different thing from that of Europe. It is the fashion to think of America as being like ourselves and having a special sympathy with this country. Those of you who have followed the recent Mayoral elections in Chicago will have noticed that today, as in the past, an anti-British cry is helpful at the polls. The old sport of twisting the lion's tail, which, when well performed, carried many an aspiring Congressman into the House, is still good sport in America. From among the lower-middle class of America many of the Chinese have absorbed their Western outlook. There are, therefore, in China a very great number of young men and young women Westernized, Americanized, and anti-Britishized.

"America has not got concessions like we have," Sir Auckland added. "The Americans live in our concessions. They get all the advantages and none of the odium. I am not suggesting that there is a conscious American Governmental influence at work. Such a thing is not at work. What I am saying to you is this, that we have got in China a large number of Chinese who, having been in America, have absorbed the ideas which America gives, and, having got back to China, repeat some of the shibboleths they have heard in the United States about British dealing and British Imperialism, and they become leaders in an anti-British movement which has for its object the getting of something which has never belonged to them, and which their race never created, namely, the European cities of China. It is into a movement of that sort that has come the influence of Moscow, finding the ground deeply tilled and prepared, so that it could swing the whole movement in China into anti-British channels. It has suited their game, and it has suited their book, and they have played their game, as they always play it, with energy and skill. Their game at the present moment is to do as much harm to the British Empire as they can."

Hundreds of people who went to the Church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, Trafalgar-square, in the hope of hearing the Rev. H. R. L. Sheppard, the former vicar, preach in his old pulpit, were unable to get into the building. Half an hour before the service every seat was taken, and all standing room was occupied. It was estimated that at least 2,500 persons were present when Mr. Sheppard spoke. The service was broadcast.

Outside in the rain was a vast crowd. Many had come long distances. One party from Brighton joined one of the queues as early as five o'clock, but had to return without entering the church. Several members of the congregation had been in the church all day, taking only a few minutes for lunch and sitting through every service.

The Bishop of Derry, R. C., in his Pastoral, forbids priests to promote dances, saying: "There is an alarming lowering of the sense of modesty among young girls manifesting itself. A great cause of anxiety is the senseless infatuation which will be satisfied only by the endless excitement of the dance, which is a corrupt plague spreading rapidly, dealing ruin to many homes. Many dances now indulged in are not merely an incitement to sin, but in themselves are immodest to the extent that they could not be witnessed, much less engaged in, without sin. The dance now imitates the excited orgies of the savage, without even the merit of grace or measured motion."

Gaitered bishops are not such regular first-nighters that Dr. Russel Wakefield with a large party at Q Theatre could fail to catch the eye.

The former Bishop of Birmingham was watching his daughter-in-law, Isabel Jeans, in the play by his youngest son, Gilbert, who is a barrister as well as a playwright with an evident sense of drama.

Husband and wife had to share the honours together at the end of "The Yorick Hotel Case," though the author, modest man, had to be almost dragged on the stage, overcoated and shy.

NEWS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH

In Brief Paragraphs

THE program for the Church Congress, to meet in San Francisco June 14th to 17th, has been completed. Bishop Murray is to officiate at the Corporate Communion, assisted by the Bishop of West Texas, the Rt. Rev. William T. Capers, who is also to preach. Commission on Evangelism met April 27-28 at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Thorne, Harrison, N. Y. Present: Bishops Darst, Freeman, Oldham, Cook; the Rev. Messrs. John S. Bunting, George R. E. MacDonald, A. J. Gammack and Messrs. Samuel Thore and Courtney Barber. Bishop Cook filled the vacancy caused by the resignation of Bishop Johnson, and Mr. F. C. Morehouse to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Davidson. The chief business was to petition the National Council in co-operation with the diocese of East Carolina, to release Bishop Darst from his diocesan work in order that he may devote himself entirely to the Crusade work. There was a very decided feeling that the Crusade was a success beyond expectations and that a real spiritual awakening has been secured. It is therefore important that the work be followed up and continued. Attention is now to be given to evangelism in parishes.

REV. REMSEN B. OGILBY
President of Trinity College

A delegation from the executive board of the Woman's Auxiliary was present at the meeting of the commission on evangelism and stated it as their conviction that in places where there was preparation the Crusade had been successful; that people in urban and rural communities alike are eager for spiritual teaching; that religion has come to be looked upon as a normal and natural experience; that there is a sense of individual responsibility for personal evangelism; that one can give in a spiritual way only that which one has gained in a personal way; and that further help was needed from the Church leaders. The delegation urged especially the stressing of the world's need for peace and Christian international relations, particularly so in view of the situation in China.

Meeting of the National Council and departments, April 26-28th; Missions; provision made for the study of the missionary situation in the diocese of Sacramento (see WITNESS, April 21, Bishop Stevens' page). Steps were taken for the inauguration of work among the foreign-born in South Dakota. Much time was given to a discussion of China, with no definite policy being determined. Report was made that every effort is being made to place Chinese missionaries in other Oriental missions. Some have been transferred to the Philippines and others to Japan. One hundred members of the Chinese staff, including wives and children, are on their way home. Missionaries in Liberia have been granted a small emergency allowance, due to the high cost of living in that country. A number of appointments were made, including that of Dr. William J. Costar, of San Francisco, to relieve Dr. Grafton Burke at the Hudson Stuck Memorial Hospital at Fort Yukon, Alaska.

Eighteen of the twenty-five members of the National Council were present at its meeting. Bishop Brent, speaking for the Church colleges, protested against the cut of 50 per cent in the appropriations to our Church colleges. The committee appointed to consider the matter reported that it was impossible at this time to add to the sums they are now receiving. Bishop Wing reported on the situation in Florida due to the Hurricane; an appeal for $60,000 was made, but only $12,000 was received. He spoke especially of the fine work done by the colored congregation of St. Agnes' in Miami, which has given over $18,000 to build a church only to have it completely destroyed. This matter was referred to the committee on undesignated legacies. The field department requested the Presiding Bishop to appoint a colored field secretary for work among the colored brethren. The right man is to be sought.

Bishop Page of Michigan, addressing the synod of the province of the Mid-West, held at Mishawaka, Indiana, April 26th, urged the synods to take up for thorough discussion such matters as are apt to come before the next General Convention. Because of lack of time at General Convention there is inadequate discussion of important matters. By discussing them at the synods the members of General Convention will be able to vote more intelligently. The synod also urged the national department of religious education to prepare material for Vacation Bible Schools. Also a Children's Crusade, national in scope, was recommended for the purpose of enrolling children in the Church schools and for the development of adult leadership. The Rt. Rev. Camp-

A dinner in honor of Bishop Hall of Vermont, who recently celebrated his 80th birthday, was held in Burlington, April 26th, Bishop Booth, coadjutor bishop, being the host. It was attended by fifty clergymen and prominent laymen. Addresses were made by Bishop Dallas of New Hampshire, the Rev. George L. Richardson, rector of St. Paul's, Burlington; Mr. John Spargo, who spoke for the laity, and Captain Arthur Casey of the Church Army, who spoke of the high esteem in which Bishop Hall was held in England. Bishop Hall responded with feeling.

The past year has been the best in the history of Howe School. In spite of a new dormitory it was not possible to admit all the students who applied at the beginning of the year, which made careful selection essential. A great deal of building has gone forward, including a new administrative building, with apartments for married masters, a large power plant, with gifts which have further enriched the chapel, already one of the most beautiful in the country. On Ascension Day Bishop Gray is to dedicate the white marble altar steps, a memorial to Bishop White. Plans are under way for another dormitory. The Rev. Charles Herbert Young is the rector.

They did a thorough job in South Dakota on the Bishops' Crusade, missions being held in every parish, when the archdeacon with fourteen helpers carried the message of the Crusade to a hundred Indian congregations. Palm Sunday was the first day since the Crusade started in February that all of the clergy of the district occupied their own pulpits.

This is from the rector at Indianola, Mississippi, the Rev. Edward Maxted. Indianola has been badly hit by the flood.

"Everyone hears the news of the flood disaster over the radio, but it has occurred to me that your readers might be interested in hearing from a rector of our Church. I shall remain here throughout the whole business unless we are all ordered out. If religion is ever worth while, it is worth while now. Greenville, which is about thirty miles from us, has the worst of it, though Leland, which is a little nearer, is also suffering badly. But all that you will hear on the radio. Here we are all safe at present, and are daily watching the waters steadily drawing nearer and steadily rising in the bayou which runs through the town. It is overflowing in many places and some streets are under water. Today I have been visiting the people in a boat. Refugees are coming into the town daily. Search is being made continually for people stranded out in the country and many have been rescued from trees and roofs of the houses. Local committees are working with the Red Cross and are taking care of people as they come. The Court House is full of clothing which has been contributed by the inhabitants, so no one need remain wet. Some are camping in the Legion Hall and others in box cars on the railway. The Boy Scouts have been engaged in erecting sanitary conveniences along the track. How long trains will be able to come into the town we cannot guess, but when trains are impossible I suppose provisions will be brought in by boat. There was a little excitement at first, but it seemed to me that people settled down to the situation rather rapidly. We are completely cut off by road from the outside world, and are living on an island. Some think the water will not come into the houses, but no one knows. Last Sunday, when the situation burst upon us with apparent suddenness all our people were so busy that a very few came to Church. But I hope we shall have good congregations next Sunday, and we shall use special prayers with reference to the flood. I find that the Prayers for Use at Sea can easily be adapted for the purpose with slight alterations. I shall also announce next Sunday (May 1st) special daily services for the flood-time. In this town we have a daily prayer meeting in the picture show for men at 8:30 every morning and I shall do my best to induce them to keep it going. It will help very much to spend a quarter of an hour daily in prayer. Everybody, almost, is building a boat of some sort. It is mighty hard to get lumber, and some queer boats may be seen. I only hope no one dies during this time, for it will be next to impossible to bury them. May I, in conclusion, ask all members of our Church to pray for us and for all in the flood district?"

Trinity College, Hartford, Conn, has one of the best pre-medical courses in the country; its excellence is proved by one-third of this year's entrance class preparing to study medicine. Of the nine honor men of a late graduating class at Yale Medical School, four of the nine honor men were Trinity College men who took the Trinity pre-medical course.

five hundred before in their Lenten offering. But we did it. We have some dollars over the 600, too. How was this accomplished? Simple—so simple that they want the Church all over the country to know about it.

In consultation with the faculty of the school, the Bishop and the superintendent selected objects to which $100 would be designated. The school raised a little better than $500 last year, so we planned on more this year, of course. Fish for Bishop Rowe's Dogs, The House of the Holy Child in Manila, Bishop Remington's Work in Eastern Oregon, the Hospital at Cape Mount, Liberia, a Gatekeeper in China, and Work in the Southern Appalachian Mountains—each were allotted $100. Then each Sunday during Lent some boy or girl studied up on one of these subjects and presented it to the whole school in a five or six-minute speech. Every class vied with all the others to keep up the total due on the various Sundays; dinners were served, candy sales made, smaller sums earned in a number of ways by individuals and by classes. The class of boys studying The Life of Christ arranged for a pageant of that. Every child in the school seemed to catch the idea of doing for some far-distant brother and in consequence we can send to New York the largest Lenten offering ever made by our school of less than 200 boys and girls. The presentation of the objects by the pupils themselves is the secret of the success. Good idea.

Who is the oldest lay reader in the Episcopal Church? At St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, Mr. Robert W. Smylie has held his license for sixty-four years. A retired vice-president of the Peoples' State Bank, he was, as a young man, the class-mate in Oxford University, of three young Irishmen who later became famous as bishops of the Canadian Church; Carmichael, Sullivan, and DuMoulin.

"The Clerestory windows, of which seven are above the entrances to the seven Chapels of Tongues, are designed to depict the Book of Revelation of St. John the Divine. They are made by Messrs. James Powell & Sons of Whitefriars, London. Each window is of three lights with Rosewindow at the top and is twenty-eight feet high and seventeen feet wide. "These windows, which are of surpassing charm to the unaided eye, flash out with extraordinary brilliancy of color and affecting beauty of composition and execution, particularly those called "Christ Reigning in Glory" and "The Woman in the Sun," when examined with distance glasses (apply to Verger), although the less brilliant windows contain subtle details well worth studying, as, for instance, the symbolisms of the elements held by the angels in the window above the Chapel of St. Boniface."

THE STORY OF KENYON

Church College of the Midwest

CANON ORVILLE E. WATSON

Professor at Bexley Hall, Kenyon College

"GAMBIER!" announces the brakeman, and the train stops beside a little stone station whose tiled and broad-brimmed roof gives it rather a Japanese air. By faith you descend to the platform; by faith, for the little purple station stands alone in the level valley. There is something quite immodest in the way a village or a town usually permits itself to be approached by a railroad train; but Gambier remembers its traditions, it would seem, and shrinks from allowing casual eyes to explore its backyards and its parlor windows. A reserve of distance, and a rampart of trees on the flanks of hills behind, defend Gambier from passing curiosity, but with the finger of a slender spire rising over to beckon invited guests or honest pilgrims.

You may take the mailman's van, or an automobile which offers you modern method of transfer, but if your goal is Kenyon College—as presumably it is, since the village of Gambier is but an adjunct of Kenyon College—and if you value a first impression, you will choose not to make its formal acquaintance by way of Gambier, but you will follow some sweater-clad youth through a gap in an evergreen hedge and across the level of a football field which stretches like a moat below the bastion-wall of woods. And here is an opening among the trees where a path begins steeply to climb the hill. It may suggest to your now stimulated fancy a postern-gate giving access to enchanted court-yards above. For already you must begin to feel the stirrings of romance in this intimate approach to Kenyon College; intimate, indeed, because you are arriving by the students' own path, that path that they themselves have beaten in their comings and goings through many years. And if commonplace outlines waver reminiscently of the mystic Castle of Saint John, of which the battlements and towers may only be seen at the critical hour, it is quite what you might expect, for this is the young men's private road between the world within and the world without, where the wind's will keeps ever blowing, and where the long, long thoughts of youth make an atmosphere of magic and mirage.

But we have reached the top of the hill, and walls and roofs appear. We emerge from the barrier of the wood near the end of an old stone building, whose pinnacles and pointed upper windows temper its austerity and lend it a character quaintly Gothic. A great trumpet-vine like a climbing tree buttresses its hither corner and spreads out densely in the gable, as if the very architecture had taken root in the substance of the hill. A belfry and spire rise upon the middle of the long ridge of the roof, and give to the building a distinguishing accent. And rightly so, for this is "Old Kenyon," the original nucleus of the college, whose foundation stones were laid a hundred years ago.

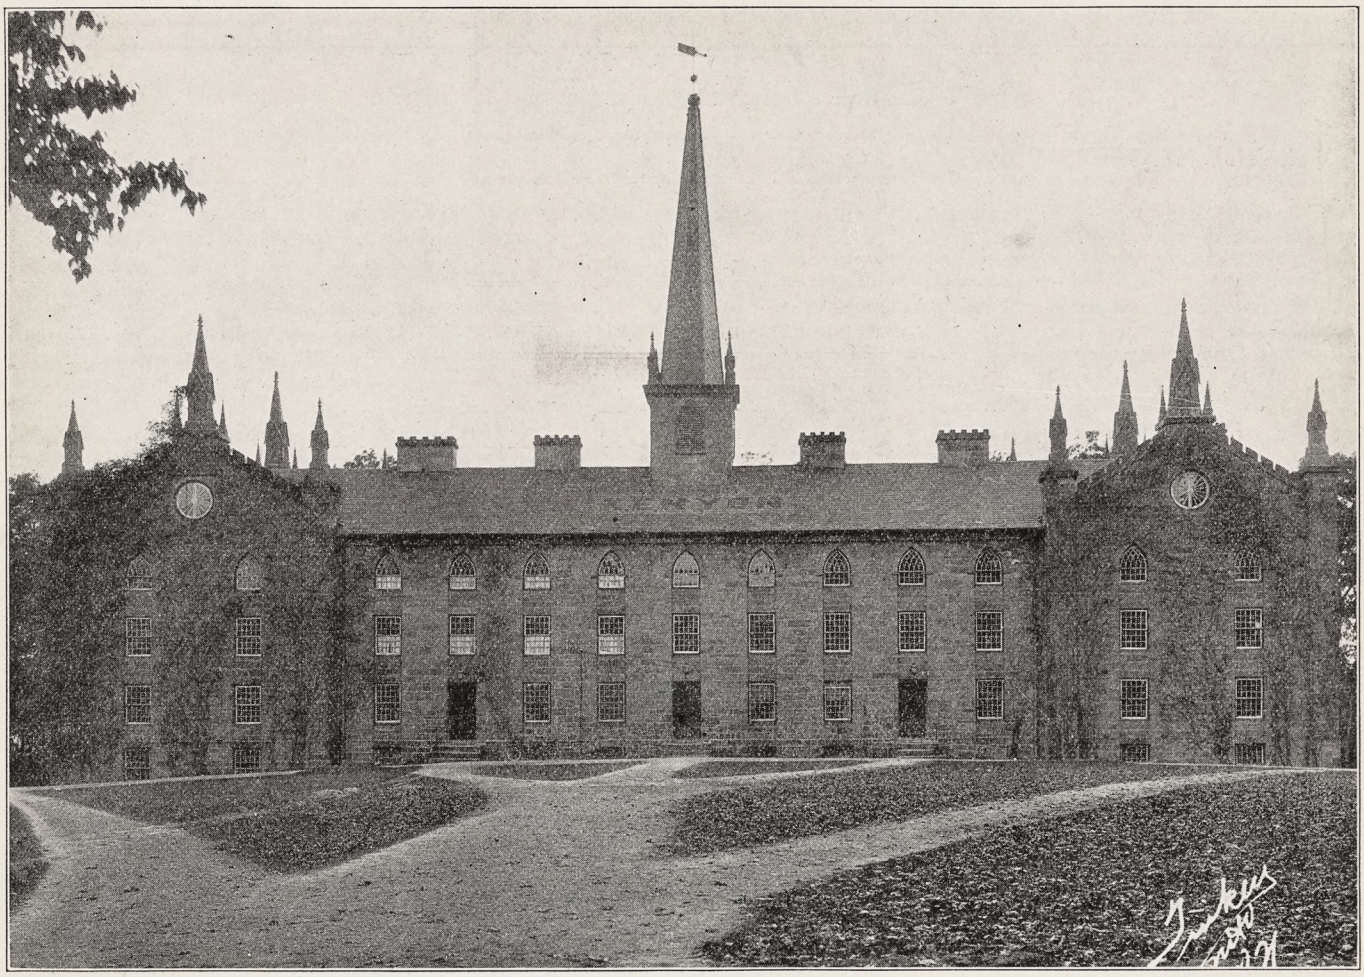
We have entered the college campus at the southeast angle, and as we pass around to the front of Old Kenyon, facing the avenue of trees that shade the Middle Path, a tall Celtic cross will catch our eyes on the left. It is Kenyon's "Prayer Cross," raised to commemorate the first religious service held here by Bishop Chase, more than a hundred years ago, consecrating this hill to a noble design, and asking the favor of Heaven upon it.

And if it were now some special hour which a group of the students felt moved to celebrate in song—and the campus and the Commons know so often such an hour that it has given to Kenyon the name of "the Singing College"—we might hear, off under the trees of the Middle Path, perhaps, the following song of Kenyon's origin:

"The first of Kenyon's goodly race
Was that great man, Philander Chase;
He climbed the Hill, and said a prayer,
And founded Kenyon College there.

"He dug up stones, he chopped down trees,
He sailed across the stormy seas,
And begged at every noble's door,
And also that of Hannah More.

"The King, the Queen, the lords, the earls,
They gave their crowns, they gave their pearls,
Until Philander had enough,
And hurried homeward with the stuff.



"He built the college, built the dam,
He milked the cows, he smoked the ham,
He taught the classes, rang the bell,
And spanked the naughty freshmen well.

"And thus he worked with all his might:
For Kenyon College day and night:
And Kenyon's heart still holds a place
Of love for old Philander Chase."

This is the college students' version of the story of a hero, told in the way that pleases them best. For Bishop Chase was truly a hero, and his story is one to inspire youth. A freshman from a distant state was asked why he had chosen a college so far from home. "Because I read the life of Bishop Chase," he answered, "and so I wanted to go to his college."

He had read how the Bishop had come as a new shepherd into the west, where all of his sheep were sheep wandering in the wilderness. And he had conceived the plan of establishing a school in the woods, not only that there might be men trained to be helpers in the arduous work of gathering the scattered flock, but also that it might be a center of civilizing influences to leaven the frontier's wildness. Across the road of the accomplishment of this scheme was a mountain of difficulties, indeed, for faith to move. Not least was the lack of resources for an enterprise so large; there were also doubts and fears of friends and active opposition of enemies. Money alone could answer effectively both enemies and friends, and Bishop Chase "sailed across the stormy seas" to seek it. His success was Kenyon College. Friendly doors at which he knocked are registered in names transplanted to this hill: Kenyon, Gambier, Bexley, Rosse. And that Hannah More, also, opened her door to the bishop, is intimated by a scholarship bearing her name, and by her autograph written in books she gave to the library of the new college.

So the cornerstone of Kenyon College was laid on the 9th day of June, 1827, and the hill was soon busy with workmen, hewers of wood and hewers of stone, teamsters, carpenters, blacksmiths, masons—sixty men of them there were, we read. The bishop besought aid from every source, he accepted every help—except one: he would not allow whisky to be drunk to stimulate the efforts of his men. So Kenyon College, it is pleasant to recall, was founded dry—in a time when drought was an idiosyncrasy.

But stormy as the seas might have been, they were not so incessantly storm-harried as the bishop's life on land. To plan and build a college on ground that had first to be cleared in the forest; to supply means and oversee their administration; to look after the thousand details of practical management—all this was a job for a man. But he had, besides, to face opposition and criticism and ridicule; to deal with stupidity and disaffection; to suffer from sickness and calamity. He could roar at rumors that his rising walls were a disguised British fort; he could thunder at the little dogs biting his heels; he could thank God for a miracle when a freshet dug a raceway for his new mill down the valley. In journeyings often, in perils in the wilderness, in perils among false brethren, in labor and travail and the care of infant churches, he fought a good fight with boundless energy and resource, till an arrow struck him in his heart—which was Kenyon—and he mounted his horse Cincinnatus and rode away.

We sit on the steps of Old Kenyon facing the campus, with other college buildings ranged back among trees on either side in loose quadrangular fashion, and with the clear space in front of Old Kenyon converging into the "Middle Path," which runs straight north under its avenue of maples, outlining for a mile the backbone of the hill, and ending, although it is out of sight, at the gate of Bexley Hall. And as our eyes thus take in Kenyon College as a whole—and beautiful it is to see—we realize that we are looking upon the fulfillment of Bishop Chase's dream, and a fulfillment fairer, though no greater, than he dreamed it.

Over on the left hand, near the "Prayer Cross" stands Hanna Hall, the gift of Ohio's senator. Beyond is the new Samuel Mather Science Hall, a model of modern equipment. And beyond is old Rosse Hall, the two tall Ionic columns in its front, together with the white monuments and evergreens of the college cemetery behind, reminding us that, although now a gymnasium, it was built to be the college chapel. And last on this left side is Cromwell Cottage, the house of the president. Turning to the right, we first see Leonard Hall, a new dormitory named in honor of Bishop Leonard. Next is Ascension Hall, picturesque with low tower and many gables. Beyond is an open space, always to remain open for the far view down the valley. And then, after the Alumni Library and stack-room, stands last on this side, and fitly at the campus entrance, the Chapel of the Holy Spirit, with its Early English spire and chime of bells.

Kenyon College retains the essential outlines of Bishop Chase's cherished dream. What he reared in thought was first of all to be a vantage-post of education to counteract the devastating miasmas of a new country, ignorance and irreligion. This center of learning and training was to be established in the place where it was needed, among the people who needed it. It was to take the "sons of the soil" and from them send forth ministers of the Gospel, teachers for the common schools, and leaders in every department of society. It was to combine a theological seminary and a college, And so was it founded, and so it has remained—the "Middle Path" significantly linking together Old Kenyon and Bexley Hall. And through it has passed, for a century, a procession of young men, from it receiving something which they have given back in forms of citizenship to their race and generation. The actual results of what Kenyon College has started or developed in these young men cannot be measured and weighed and summed up in statistics, any more than one can follow up the waters of a spring in a meadow through the myriads of invisible channels they take in earth and air. But many a name inscribed in Kenyon's matriculation book appears again in the record of men who have served well their country and their faith. Kenyon has justified the dream of Philander Chase, if only in the list of her soldiers and statesmen and men of affairs, her missionaries, and her fourteen bishops of the Church.

It is interesting to examine the courses of study in the new-born Kenyon College. Very elementary they must of necessity be, for the students who came had been reared on farms where there was little leisure for books, even were there books to read. Rude material were they to stamp with the culture of Oxford and Greece. And yet that was a part of the bishop's dream. The pointed window-arches of Old Kenyon and the dignified quadrangle of its original plan, were memories of Oxford;

BISHOP SANFORD,
President of Pacific Province

while the curriculum of the college included, as its most precious elements, crumbs that had fallen from the tables of Greece and Rome.

Then note, too, the classic names they gave to the towns they planted in the forest, like Athens and Akron and Xenia; they are splinkled all over the map of the Middle West. Even a Greek oration was not unknown in a log schoolhouse, as awe-inspiring to the audience as it might have been to the ancient Greeks themselves. So they will study Latin, and they will study Greek in Kenyon College. And Latin and Greek, in due degree, she has never given up, in spite of barbarian reversions, insistent and strident, labeled "Modernism."

One point more in Bishop Chase's program: his ideal college must be planted "in the woods." He was quite immovable about this. There is humor in the plea of Ohio villages, seductively offering him a site, that his new college ought to have the stimulus and urbanity of a "city environment." His decisive reply to these invitations was that his college must be protected against "city morals," and this by a wide barrier of distance. He could not, with all his virile imagination, foresee the day when seven-league boots and magic carpets would wither up distance to something negligible; when his Gambier, so carefully withdrawn, would be but a suburb of almost any city you please, where the lust of the eye and the pride of life would present themselves in dizzy inventions yet undreamed of.

But he was right in his location, even if he had foreseen the futility of his particular argument. Kenyon College could not be kept separate from the city, but it might be saved from being swallowed up by it. And so Kenyon College possesses in quiet its own hill, near enough to the currents of modern life to estimate them, while far enough away to escape the tumult and the smoke. And here the young man has an interval in which to take a deep breath before plunging into the whirlpools of his desire. It is the first hour of the morning, the first fruits of the day, and so to be regarded holy, as belonging to the gods. Here the young man has a little space in which to realize horizons, and to read a page in the book of beauty, and to dream a dream that may be the most real thing in his life.

So for this hour, youth's own hour, Kenyon offers refuge on its wooded hill, an Interpreter's House with an outlook toward the east. Here the young man lives something like his own life in community with his fellows, learning along with them to create a human society, laboratory experiment and practice in the art of living together. Favorable is the time and place, then, for the formation of friendships, and the awakening of appreciations, and the dawning of ideals, things that will make the Middle Path in memory as sacred as the aisle of a church. And he will never catch sight of the slender spire of Kenyon above the line of trees, traveling back in after years and watching for it from the window of the car, without feeling again the thrill in his heart with which he learned to sing Kenyon's song. And the words of "The Thrill" will arise in his mind, remembered like a creed. You need not smile to hear the same forms used that we employ to express patriotism and religion; for in this youthful emotion are the germs and the promise of both. It is what humanity desires above all things: something that unifies, something that never dies.

"There is a thrill of spirit which love imparts,
When turn our thoughts to Kenyon's glory;
Both old and young, with single tongue,
Unite to sing our Alma Mater's story.
Then let our song ascend in unison!
Our loyal hearts avow no other.
It unifies, it never dies,
The love of Kenyon, our mother.

"Thy beauty strikes a chord of harmony,
And bends us to a high endeavor;
Thy glorious name, thy spotless fame,
We'll cherish in our hearts forever.
Then let our song ascend in unison!
Our loyal hearts avow no other.
It unifies, it never dies,
The love of Kenyon, our mother."

MOSES VERSES KARL MARX

Are the Commandments Out of Date?

BY REV. G. A. STUDDERT-KENNEDY

G BERNARD SHAW wrote the other day to the Soviet Government of Russia to tell them that Karl Marx, the famous disciple of Socialism, was as out of date as Moses. I think he underrates Moses. The Ten Commandments are not out of date and never will be. They will be repeated by millions long after the last copies of Marx's works have been buried in the vaults of the British Museum.

I think, nevertheless, that he underrates Marx, too. The man is a marvel. He is not dead yet, by a long way. His power in Europe and in the East is tremendous. He may be out of date for intellectuals like Shaw, but he is the last thing out for thousands of men in the street. The revival of Marxianism is one of the historical phenomena of the Twentieth Century, which critics will dispute about in years to come. It is not easy to explain his influence, nor is it my purpose now to try, intensely interesting as the attempt might be.

It is the worth of his contribution to the most desperately difficult of all modern problems, the problem of the distribution of wealth that I want to think about.

WHO SHALL DEFINE "FAIR?"

"It is precisely because it is theoretically insoluble that the wage problem is a source of perpetual conflict," Charles Gide remarks, and that is a truth we have to face. "A living wage," "A fair day's pay for a fair day's work," "A just distribution of the product of industry," etc., ad infinitum, phrases expressive of a desire for justice, remain mere phrases because the essential words in each—"living," "fair," "just"—are left undefined when the problem is to define them.

Now Marxians believe that their master, if he did not solve the problem, at any rate made a very real contribution to its solution in the Labour Theory of Value. It is not difficult to understand the attraction which the popular version of this theory has for the manual labourer. "All wealth is produced by labour, therefore to the labourer all wealth is due," is a statement of his which, taken as true at its face value, has an immense and very complex appeal for the wage-earner.

It calls up visions of an Eldorado from which he is barred by a wicked conspiracy, a world for him to gain who has nothing to lose but his chains.

"A DEN OF THIEVES"

But, of course, taken at its face value, it is manifestly false, and begs the whole question at issue. It does this by leaving "labour" and the "labourer" undefined, and allowing the manual labourer to assume that manual labour alone is meant. It is sometimes brought as a charge against Marx himself that he made no allowance for "brain work."

This is not true. He was fully conscious that "labour" must include all sorts and descriptions of work ranging from that of the "unskilled labourer" to that of the inventor, the scientist, the manager and director; but he contended that all these various "qualities" of labour were capable of being reduced to "socially necessary labour" or "average labour power."

Unskilled labour may represent a single unit of "simple abstract average labour power," skilled work two units, more skilled three units, and so on. You thus estimate the value of a doctor's work in terms of a doctor's. Hence the value of these individuals as workers can be estimated and compared.

Now, if this were true it would be of immense importance. It would be a theoretical solution of the wage problem. If we can find a method of measuring the units of "simple abstract average labour power" in each man's efforts, we can determine his relative value as a worker, and pay him on a scientific basis. That would be an enormous advance even if it were only an advance in theory.

But how are we to measure these units and discover the "labour value" of a commodity. Marx answers quite clearly: "Take it to the market and find out."

Now that is a bitter disappointment!

It brings us back with a bump to where we started from—"the labour market." Labour determines value, but the value of labour can only be measured on the market. When the market comes in by the door, science goes out by the window, and we are back again to the haggling and bargaining which are the root of all the trouble. If there is a den of thieves in the world you will find it on the market, not in the factory.

ESTIMATING YOUR VALUE

It is the labour market, in its broadest sense, that produces our most glaring modern anomalies in the distribution of wealth. I saw the other day a cartoon representing the world's workers in order of their market value. The long line was headed by Charlie Chaplin, and he was followed by a prize-fighter, a newspaper owner, a company promoter, and so on. Scientists, teachers, authors were a long way down the line, and the parson came behind the navvy.

It must not have been strictly accurate, but it was broadly true. Is it "just"? It is hard to see what the word means in this connection. How can one compare the value of Charlie Chaplin with that of a doctor, a skilled mechanic, and an artist, and arrive at a "just" estimate? How can anyone be sure that he earns more than he gets or gets more than the earns?

"From every one according to his powers, to every one according to his needs" is the ideal, but who on earth is to estimate the "powers," and who, in heaven or earth, is to fix the "needs"?

A bargain appears to be inevitable, nor would the necessity be avoided by State management, Nationalisation, or any other such device. The product of industry would still have to be divided among people of immensely varying capacities, whose contributions are of different and incomparable qualities.

Unless we can discover some scientific basis of measuring the value of "different qualities" of labour we must strike a bargain. As labour becomes more and more elaborately divided and subdivided, producing qualities of labour more and more difficult to compare, and as the various grades of labor tend to combine in order by "collective bargaining" to do the best they can for themselves, and as each grade of labour becomes more dependent upon the others, the bargain becomes increasingly complex and difficult to strike.

Whenever a bargain is being struck there is the possibility of a fight hovering not far away. That is true of the simplest transaction, if the need on either side is great enough for the other to drive a hard bargain through.

In the last issue we must fall back upon moral power to prevent the bargain degenerating into a fight. We are forced to this by hard facts, and cannot escape the moral and spiritual challenge involved. This is where Moses comes into his own again, and we turn to the Ten Commandments.

Marx never really discovered a way round Moses.

Moreover, we need the whole ten and not selections from them. There is a story told of an Oxford professor who was in holy orders, but was more accustomed to presiding at examinations than to taking church services. He was asked to take duty for a rector, who was sick, and had to read the Ten Commandments. At the end he looked up over his spectacles and announced to the congregation: "Candidates are not expected to attempt more than five of these."

No Unholy Bargains

This unauthorized permission is very often taken, and the results are disastrous. We need the love of God and not merely the love of our neighbour; or rather, we need a love of our neighbour firmly based upon our love of God, if we are to stand the test of our modern labour market.

A bargain which has to be struck between men whose God is gain and not love, and whose purpose is self-assertion and not service, will always tend to degenerate into a fight, no matter how much elaborate machinery we construct to prevent it.

LETTERS OF A SOLDIER

Reviewed by Vida Scudder

An American Soldier. Letters of Edwin Austin Abbey 2nd. Houghton and Mifflin. 1927.

What does the modern world need more than examples of unworldly heroism? And where can such examples be better found than in the records of some of the young men who laid down their lives in the Great War? The most ultra pacifist, heart-broken though he be at the thought of young life sacrificed, as he thinks, under a misconception, can not withhold his dues of thanksgiving for these radiant souls. In the story of their consecrated devotion, he will find one more evidence that out of darkest confusion of wrong, God can reveal His purest light.

These letters of young Edwin Abbey, reprinted after several years, are treasures which our Church in particular may cherish. No wonder that one critic says he did not know there was such faith left on earth. From the first letters, registering intense resolute desire to enter a conflict deemed righteous and necessary, they carry us through the chronicle of trench life, broken by a period when the writer lies wounded in hospital, on to the very eve of the last and fatal attack. At every point they show an ardor of aspiration, a rare quietness of soul in the presence of danger, simplicity, crystal-clear and complete religious devotion. The lad's joy in his communions, his reverent noting of all holy days, his gratitude on learning that he is being prayed for in his school chapel, his exquisite fellowship with his devout mother, all show a life lived as our Church believes it should be lived. And the letters show the Church also, ministering to experience of the gravest, as only the Church of the Living God can minister.

Our communion should thank Mrs. Abbey for sharing these sacred letters with us. They remind us of the letters, no less beautiful, no less spiritual, translated from the French in the book called "A Crusader of France" Again we recall the profound and fervid mysticism of the letters of the young Italian, Giosue Borsi. Doubtless letters exist from some German boy, equally sustained by the certitude that he has offered his life as sacrifice on some holy Altar. Let us rejoice that perhaps, under the shadow of the Tree whose leaves are for the healing of the nations, they all give thanks together that Love is stronger than hate, stronger than death.

The Parson at Large, by the Rev. Jerry Wallace, Springfield, Illinois. 1927.

This is an account of the life and activities of the Rev. Mason Locke Weems, parson, wandering book seller, and friend and biographer of George Washington. Parson Weems' chief claim to immortality is that he is the author of the story about George Washington and the cherry tree. From Mr. Wallace we learn that he had another jewel in his crown in that his successful efforts to get himself ordained priest in England in 1784 opened the way for the consecration of bishops for the American Church by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Parson Weems is a captivating person, and his story is told in a fascinating manner in the twenty-four pages of this little book. It may be obtained from the author.

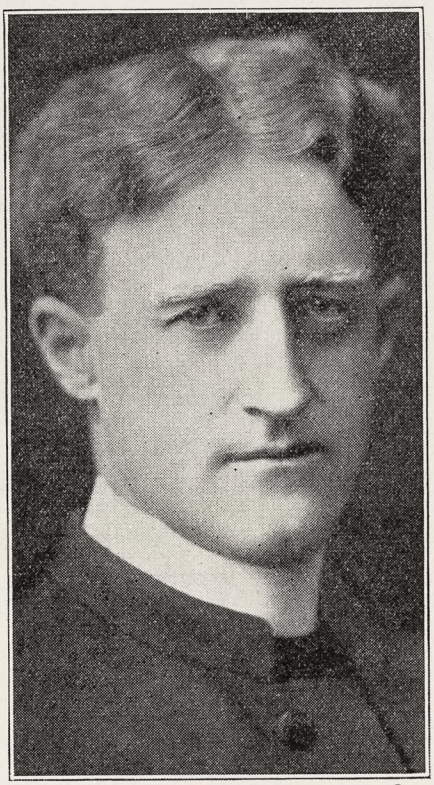
THE CONFERENCE ON RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

Notable Speakers Address the Gathering

Reported by

BISHOP W. BERTRAND STEVENS



THE National Conference on Religious Education was held at St. Paul's Church, Rochester, N. Y., on May 3-5. The opening address was made by Bishop Brent, who emphasized the importance of a religious education which can be summed up in faith. Our modern educational pitfall is in thinking of learning in terms of the intellectual and utilitarian. The bishop made a strong plea for family worship, pastoral care and the rights of children.

Following the opening address, the Rev. John Suter, executive secretary of the department of religious education, called the conference to order and the delegates from the various dioceses were introduced. Mr. Suter announced the acceptance of the office of secretary of adult education by Dean Ludlow, of Grace Cathedral, Topeka, Kan.

Officers of the department made announcement of plans for their fields; Miss Frances H. Withers on the Jubilee Lenten offering, Miss Mabel Lee Cooper on Teacher Training and Mr. Suter on the National Conference. The assigned topic for the afternoon was "Family Prayers and Church Going." Dean Chalmers, of Dallas, who was to have read a paper, was unavoidably prevented from being present and his place on the program was taken by Dean Hoag of Salina. Dean Hoag's appeal was for the reclamation of Sunday for family worship. He described in detail plans in operation at St. Mark's Church, Minneapolis, and the Cathedral at Salina, by which the children are able to attend the eleven o'clock service without remaining for the sermon. "The ideal home multiplied," said Dean Hoag, "makes the ideal parish. There is great need of checking up on family prayers."

The first items of business on Wednesday, following the corporate communion and breakfast held at Christ Church, were reports from officers of the department. Miss Frances Rose Edwards, newly appointed member of the staff, spoke on curriculum; Miss Clarice Lambright on "Young People's Work" and the Rev. George Norton, rector of St. Paul's, on "College Work." In connection with Mr. Norton's report, Mr. Suter announced the appointment of the Rev. C. Leslie Glenn as secretary for college work.

The general topic for the morning discussion was "The Child's Religion." Papers were read by the Bishop Coadjutor of Los Angeles and Professor Adelaide Case of Teachers' College. Dr. Case gave valuable illustrative quotations of children's prayers and poems. "We dilute too much our statement to children of the Christian faith. Their capacity is much greater than we dream of and more than our lesson systems take into account. Children take religion more naturally than adults. It is easier for them to relate religion to their own moral problems, to follow our Lord's example, to go over boundaries of class and race and to unify their attitudes toward the world." Dr. Case's address was a careful statement, from her own experience, of the religious instincts and impressions of children.

REV. W. F. PEIRCE,
The President of Kenyon

The afternoon session included a telling address by Bishop Ferris of Western New York on "The Child and His Bible." "We must not substitute superficial things for the Bible," said the Bishop. "Nothing can take the place of the Bible in teaching the child. He should have a Bible of his own and be taught to read it." The Rev. Malcolm Taylor spoke on "The Child and His Prayers." "The history of religion is the history of prayer. The first religious experience of the child is prayer and the last experience of man is prayer at his death bed. We must put the child in the presence of prayer, not merely try to get him to pray. We teach speech by example and imitation. Prayer should be taught in the same way, by imitation rather than by direction. The child should be brought to church. He must be prayed with and his maturing conception of prayer guided. He must be taught to pray for special needs and to love prayer."

On Wednesday evening the conference members were the guests at dinner of St. Luke's, the rector of which, the Rev. Dr. Samuel Tyler, made an address of welcome. Mr. Suter presided at the dinner and introduced the two speakers, the Rev. Henry B. Robins of the Rochester Theological Seminary and the Rt. Rev. Paul Jones. Dr. Robins appealed for five special emphasis (1) a teaching ministry, (2) a correlated program including religious education, social service and missions, all properly integrated, (3) more time for religious instruction (4) trained leadership and (5) a fresh sense of what it is all about—communion with God and service to neighbor.

Bishop Jones made an effective presentation of the subject of Christian love. "We so easily accept superficial loyalties," he said. "We lack understanding of forgiveness as a primary power. We have no technique for meeting evil except threats and punishment. As a race we are troubled by a superiority complex. Our job ought to be to discover and exploit the creditable things about other races."

At the Thursday morning session Mr. Norman R. Sturgis addressed the conference on church school architecture and Mrs. Richard B. Kimball on the book store plan of the department. Both addresses were evidence of the careful consideration which the department is giving to practical details of administration and instruction. Group committees reported recommendations during the remainder of the morning and during the early afternoon. In the evening a joint meeting of the department and the advisory committee was held.

The secretary, Canon DeVries, Dr. Karl Block and Dr. Phillips Osgood, who have attended nearly all of the conferences in years past, pronounced this year's meeting one of the best in the department's history.

NEWS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH

In Brief Paragraphs

Edited by

WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD

THE Information Service Department of the Federal Council of Churches have issued a bulletin setting forth the facts of the famous Sacco-Vanzetti case, sentenced to death in July in Massachusetts for a murder committed in 1920. The chief reasons for the widespread appeal for a stay of execution and the appointment of a commission to review the case are (1) Celestino Madeiros, Portuguese, has confessed that a gang of which he was a member committed the crime and that Sacco and Vanzetti had nothing to do with it; (2) this confession is corroborated by an affidavit from James Weeks, who says that Madeiros often talked with him about the Sacco-Vanzetti case and told him who actually committed the murders for which these men are sentenced to die; (3) an affidavit from Captain William H. Proctor, head of the Massachusetts State Police, who says that prior to the trial he warned the prosecutor that he would not testify that the fatal bullet was fired from the Sacco revolver. So, the affidavit says, the prosecutor skirted around the point, and that Proctor gave a pre-arranged answer to the question by saying: "My opinion is that it is consistent with being fired by that pistol." In Judge Thayer's charge to the jury he interpreted Proctor's answer as meaning that Proctor believed the bullet was fired from Sacco's gun; (4) Roy Gould, an eye-witness of the crime, states that he saw neither of the two men in the gang that committed the crime. There are other facts involved which have prompted many prominent people, including the Bishop of Massachusetts, to urge Governor Fuller to stay the execution, including the affidavits of two former agents of the Federal Department of Justice which state that the federal department co-operated with the state authorities in endeavoring to convict Sacco and Vanzetti and thus rid the country of two radicals.

Bishop William T. Manning, in his address at the 144th annual convention of the diocese of New York, called attention to the great need for vigorous work in extending the church in rural New York. People are leaving the city; it is the time now to establish work in those places that are soon to be suburbs. The bishop also stated that the diocese contributed for extra parochial purposes in 1926 the sum of $1,033,000. Bishop Manning also reported the laying of cornerstones for a large number of churches and parish houses in the diocese.

Announcement has been made of the sale of the property of Holy Trinity, Harlem, New York, to the City Mission Society of the diocese, which is to establish a work for colored people there. Or if you care to order a bundle of ten copies for thirteen weeks, we will send you one. The papers on the bundle plan cost three cents a copy and sell for a nickel. THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT

It's Meaning for Christians Today

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

IN ORDER to discuss any institution properly one ought to consider the fundamental principles, the ABCs, that lie at the foundation of its structure.

There is a whole lot of chatter about the League of Nations on the part of people who know little or nothing about International Law or diplomacy.

The fact that Messrs. Wilson, Taft, Root, and Hughes favored some sort of league, more than offsets the clamor of several million who talk without knowledge.

The Christian Church as an institution was founded by One who seemed to know what was in man and needed not that anyone should tell Him.

Before establishing the organization which was to carry on the Gospel, Christ laid down the principles which were to govern those who claimed to be His disciples.

St. Matthew gathered these sayings into a compact statement which is well known as the Sermon on the Mount.

In it we find those principles upon which Christian character was to be built and for which the Church was to be extended.

It may be of interest to point out some of these principles in the bearing which they may have upon a good deal of the chatter which emanates from novelists, pamphleteers, and philosophers, in their efforts to criticize Christianity and the Christian.

The Sermon on the Mount may be divided into three sections:

I. The values which a man must seek to appropriate before he is invited by Christ to become a disciple.

II. The manner in which he is to conduct himself in that discipleship.

III. The inhibitions which he is to recognize in his practises of that discipleship.

I.

After all, we must appreciate values before we are willing to make the effort necessary to secure them. So the Sermon on the Mount begins with the Beatitudes. What are they? Simply a statement of the ideals which the Christian must substitute for those which the world offers.

It is very questionable how large a proportion of human society have any appreciation of the blessedness which Christ asserts.

Do men want to be poor in spirit, pure in heart, or particularly merciful?

Do they really hunger and thirst after righteousness, or is it something for which they have a very moderate appetite?

It is a question of values, for which we are to be willing to make any sacrifice, even to accepting persecution joyfully, for it is the highest value in life.

It has nothing in common with the censorious rebellion against authority and traditions as most reformers imagine, for Christ came not to destroy the law, but to fill it full of meaning and life.

It is the spirit of the law as well as the letter which must be observed. Thou shalt not kill is insufficient; one must not be angry without an adequate cause. Thou shalt not commit adultery and furthermore thou shalt not yield to lustful desire.

Except your righteousness shall exceed mere legal observance, you will not enter the Kingdom of God.

It is a Kingdom of spiritual realities rather than one of legal conventionalities.

In addition to hunger for righteousness and reverence for authority, one must have an attitude of sympathetic fellowship toward our fellow men. Even our enemies should provoke us to kindness, and even social outcasts are to be objects of compassion.

The disciple of Christ is one who, for better or worse, has gladly accepted these attitudes of Christ, as his own desire, irrespective of the price that he must pay for his devotion. His goal is spiritual perfection, no matter how short a distance he may have travelled along the way.

The Christian life is not one in which we are to compare attainments, one with another, but in which we are to harmonize desire so that all may be in pursuit of the same ideal.

This brings us to the second group of principles in this remarkable sermon.

II.

There are three obstacles to spiritual progress which Christ warns us that the Christian must overcome:

First, the Christian must not live his life "to be seen of men."

In prayer, almsgiving, and fasting he is to practise privacy, not publicity; reality not pretense; fellowship with God, not public approval. He puts His gospel upon a qualitative and not a quantitative basis, and assures His disciples that God is the one whom we must please, even at the cost of man's disapproval.

Second, the Christian must not permit despondency and harassing vexation to disturb his poise, but he must trust that God will give him, each day, strength for that day's work.

Third, the Christian must not yield to censorious judgment of his fellowmen, for in doing so he will merit God's judgment on him.

It is not a popular quest which ignores the gallery, stifles self-pity and exonerates the other man from transgression.

III.

The last section of this sermon deals with the inhibitions of the Christian life:

First. The inhibition against a false liberality. The way is narrow; not the person but the way. How often do we find men reversing this process. It is so easy for a narrow person to advocate a broad way;—much easier than for a liberal person to approve a narrow way. The way is so narrow, Christ says, that few will find it.

One may have difficulties in deciding which of several narrow ways to take, but one may also reject entirely the broad way as being excluded by the Master. It is so difficult to discriminate between personal breadth and indiscriminate generalizations.

Second. Religious leaders are to be judged by their fruits. You are to take heed whom ye hear and Christ has given you a sign.

Do men gather figs or thistles? It so often happens that the man who points a narrow way becomes spikey and not digestible. It is not a part of the Gospel that because the way is narrow, the wayfarer shall be prickly. Quite the contrary! He is to be nutritious.

The mere assertion of religious privilege is to be disregarded for the Lord does not hear all who claim to have His personal ear.

Third. The whole Gospel is built up as a well built house upon a solid foundation and not as a temporary shack upon the sand.

The continuity and stability of His Church, He mentions elsewhere; here He contents Himself with the assurance of its stability.

If we seek a reason for the faith that He establishes, you will find it in the statement: "If ye then bring evil, know how to give good gifts to your children," * * * "do you think that if you ask God for bread, He will give you a stone?"

When one reads the Sermon on the Mount, he need not be concerned either with the failure of Christians to demonstrate it satisfactorily or with the accusations of critics, who do not themselves attempt to appreciate the difficulties of a system, the fundamental principles of which they make no effort to understand.

The Sermon on the Mount is like a mighty mountain, which few can climb but which does not lose its charm because dwellers on the flats speak scornfully of the failure of those who climb.

Of course, the man on the flats is in no danger of falling off. He merely fails to appreciate the glory of the mountains.

CHURCH COLLEGE WHICH MAKES MEN

St. Stephen's Place In Education

BY FRANK PIERREPONT GRAVES, PH.D.,

Commissioner of Education, State of New York and President of the University of the State of New York

THE importance of leaders to democracy, especially at the present time, when we are struggling hard to steer clear of the Scylla and Carybdis of bolshevism and dictatorship alike, is beyond all calculation. The average individual has a serviceable part to play and can perform ordinary activities and help to conserve the achievements of society; but we must always look to his intellectual superiors for the leadership and direction that will keep us clear of confusion and oppression. If democracy is to be preserved and advanced, it must be through trained leaders. Some colleges must make this function their distinct purpose, even if demagogues accuse them of aristocracy and exclusiveness. They will be the real servants of democracy. St. Stephen's College has such a purpose as its determining principle.

The chief impression upon my mind in the matter is that St. Stephen's knows exactly where it intends to go. That would seem to be an axiomatic requirement, but, as far as external evidence goes, it appears to be rather a rare occurrence for a college to have anything like a definite goal. President Butler tells us that, out of the one hundred or more universities in this country, but five —Harvard, Columbia, Cornell, Johns Hopkins, Chicago—have ever had any real goal either at their inception or any other time, and that the rest have grown up without aim by accretions,— pretty much according to whatsoever features have happened to appeal to various freakish benefactors. But what shall we say of the aim in the five hundred or more colleges in this country? The proportion of them that has ever possessed clear objectives, fundamental principles of control, and methods tending to make these principles a reality, must be considerably smaller. It seems as if their numbers might possibly be counted upon the fingers of one hand. If their graduates arrive at any distinction at all, it is largely because of happy accident and because the material composing the student body was well selected in the first place. It is assuredly an innovation for a college to hold, as St. Stephen's does, that it is of value to know just what it wishes to accomplish and to take thought as to how this most effectively may be done.

It is equally refreshing to learn that the chief principle controlling St. Stephen's is that of hard intellectual labor. This, too, seems like a novel goal for the twentieth century college, where the main objects are too frequently held to be a victorious athletic team, an ability to perform the Charleston, etc. Colleges eventually are bound to work their way out of the present confusion. It is evident, however, that St. Stephen's has pointed the way. Industry and perseverance are indispensible to real achievement in life, and, if the colleges are to allow men to form the habit of loafing, it would seem as if they had largely lost their function. Leadership can never be attained by the indolent and weak willed.

It is also well that St. Stephen's trains its students to approach the problems of life rationally and with an open mind. It has been too much the custom of professors to cultivate the ex cathedra attitude in themselves and to demand the ipse dixit frame of mind in their students. The result is that the latter study the subject less than they do the professors. This should not be interpreted to mean that a course of study, in order to produce intellectual labor and independence, must be uninteresting to the students. The essence of good teaching is the cultivation of interest; but intrinsic interest is not to be confused with that attitude of fictitious and transient interest which some instructors manage to produce by making clowns of themselves. Real teachers have little use for such an effort to sugar-coat the pill. The only person who can challenge the real interest of his students is the professor who is on fire with enthusiasm for his subject and understands both it and the men he is teaching. He will see that they are taught to love the new field and to revel in it. Nor will he confine his efforts to formal instruction in the classroom, but will desire to bring his pupils into constant contact with the subject through informal relations on the campus, in the field, and in his own rooms. The very spirit of the tutorial system can be realized at St. Stephen's for where can the opportunities for such interest and guidance be better developed than in an environment so removed from distraction and all extraneous activities as that at Annandale?

Another vital element in the St. Stephen's program is its express policy of the elimination of weak students. The most important factor in the success of any man is that with which he is endowed by the Creator. No man can compensate for the fatal error of choosing his ancestors unwisely. If a small college is to justify the large expenditures that are necessary to make it a going concern, it must frankly, though unobtrusively, sever the relations of such students as do not possess the mentality necessary for intellectual leadership. After a student has been at the college for two years and shown himself to be a person of only ordinary ability, an institution that is seeking to train leaders may well decide to suggest that it may be wisest for him to leave. He may with reason be advised either to enter some practical and respectable avenue in life not requiring intellectual superiority or else to secure a transfer to one of those larger institutions that train vast numbers of mediocre men on the wholesale plan.

Then the students that are retained, during the last two years should be permitted to specialize and to give all their time to real study in a selected subject. They may be emancipated from the restrictions of the class room and given an opportunity to pursue their work freely under the tutelage of a specialist, who shall serve as "philosopher, guide and friend." A number of colleges have now adopted such a policy, but in no other is it more fully developed or frankly avowed than at St. Stephen's. The result has been that, when these more gifted youths enter upon graduate study, it has been found that they have already completed the equivalent of a full year of post graduate work. That is to say, within the four years of undergraduate training at St. Stephen's, five years of actual work may easily be accomplished.

The training of leaders by such methods is the main mission of St. Stephen's College. It is an aspiration which may well fire the imagination. A policy of this sort, while expensive to maintain, is eminently worth while. It should attract both students and financial support. I personally have little doubt but that as educational benefactors generally come to appreciate what this adventure in educational sanity means to democracy and the common welfare, they will open their purses wide and give with generosity.

Let's Know

A PSALM

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

FOR the first seven years of his reign David made his capitol in the city of Hebron because the citadel of Jerusalem had never been taken by the Hebrews. Then the citadel fell and David prepared to move his capitol to the Holy City. It was to be the "city of the Lord of Hosts" and the Ark of the Covenant, symbol of God's presence, must be formally brought in.

It was a great event, worthy of a special psalm, and Psalm 24 was composed to grace the occasion.

As the procession bearing the Ark entered the Holy City, the people sang in chorus of the majesty of Him who was about to take possession:

"The earth is the Lord's and all that therein is: the compass of the world and they that dwell therein.

"For He hath founded it upon the seas: and prepared it upon the floods."

Then a single voice raises the question as to who is qualified to enter that holy place:

"Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord: or who shall rise up in His holy place?"

Another voice states the qualifications:

"Even he that hath clean hands, and a pure heart: and that hath not lift up his mind unto vanity, nor sworn to deceive his neighbor.

"He shall receive the blessing from the Lord: and righteousness from the God of his salvation."

Then the chorus sings: "This is the generation of them that seek Him: even of them that seek thy face, O Jacob."

The procession has now halted before the gates of the fortress itself—the gates being closed. One sings out the challenge in solo:

"Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors: and the King of Glory shall come in."

A voice from within asks: "Who is this King of Glory?" And the chorus thunders back: "It is the Lord strong and mighty, even the Lord mighty in battle."

Again sounds the challenge: "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors: and the King of Glory shall come in."

And again comes the question from within: "Who is this King of Glory?"

Then the final exultant chorus: "Even the Lord of Hosts, He is the King of Glory."

The gates are opened. The procession enters. The Ark is deposited in its future resting place. And God has taken possession of the Holy City.

Psalm 24 is one of the proper psalms for Ascension Day. Our Savior has triumphantly completed His mission on earth and is returning to His place in Heaven. The heavenly hosts greet Him and He enters as the King of kings and Lord of lords. What a fine pageant it would make for Ascension-tide!

FATHERS AND SONS by Samuel S. Drury, D.D. Doran $1.50.

There is perhaps no one better qualified to write a book on the modern family life and the right relationship that should exist between fathers and sons than Dr. Drury, the distinguished Head Master of St. Paul's School, Concord.

Fathers and Sons is not an academic treatise, or the pedantic utterances of a pedagogue who has gone stale on his job. It is thoroughly alive and up to date, a straight from the shoulder talk to men who have sons by a man who sympathetically understands the perplexities and problems of our modern youth, based on real knowledge. You will find here none of the cant and drivel which one usually hears at fathers and sons banquets. Out of his wealth of observation and intimate experience in handling boys, he offers to the father the sanest and most helpful suggestions that any parent might wish or need to meet the responsibilities of his growing son. He cogently maintains that if the father's influence is to be effective with his son, there must exist a real intimacy, not a prying familiarity. There is not a page of the book that has not some penetrating observation or some wise counsel to offer. The concluding chapter is a beautiful, tender appreciation of the boy's best friend after all,—his mother. We heartily endorse this book.

THE ROSALIE EVANS LETTERS FROM MEXICO. Bobbs-Merrill $2.50.

You may or may not be interested in the political and economic affairs of Mexico, which for the past decade or more have been bordering on anarchy, but you cannot fail to be interested in the letters of Rosalie Evans, which so vividly describe these conditions.

These letters are an intimate, yet graphic and penetrating account of a futile and tragic attempt to regain the property left to her by her husband. They turn the spotlight on the internal conditions in Mexico, which are apparently utterly corrupt and seem almost beyond redemption.

Even though this book is evidently a piece of propaganda inimical to the Mexicans, nevertheless it is one that cannot be passed on lightly. Apart from all this, the letters have distinct literary value and are written with vivacity and compelling charm. They are letters of flame.

MAN AND SOCIETY by George Milton James, Ph.D. Collegiate Press $.75.

These lectures, delivered by professor James of Gambier at the Bangor Theological Seminary two years ago, are without doubt the most illuminating and stimulating lectures on what some people regard as a "dismal science" that has ever been our privilege to hear or read. Every phase of our social relationships is treated with scholarly accuracy and yet with the alluring charm of humanness.

It is amazing that in the enlightened state of Maine, (we might expect it in Tennessee) one of the clergy who listened to these lectures declared publicly that they were unhistorical, unscriptural, and antichristian. We are grateful to this illiterate parson, because it stimulated Professor James to write a concluding chapter on Fundamentalism, which is the best exposition of that soul stultifying "ism" that we have ever read.

The students at the Virginia Seminary, through their missionary society, select their own preacher for commencement. This year the bishop of East Carolina, Bishop Darst, was honored.

Cheerful Confidences

ENDOWMENTS

By Rev. Geo. Parkin Atwater

FOR several years I have given much time and study to the needs for endowments for our parishes. I have been of the opinion that the people of the Church had not been sufficiently educated in the giving of large sums to perpetuate the work of the Church, or the making of bequests for the Church.

With the break-up of many old and substantial communities which supported a family church, many a parish faces an acute situation. We find we must do a large work among children and newcomers, and these do not, as a rule, bring sufficient support to the parish to permit it to maintain itself in an effective way.

I found at Grace Church, Brooklyn, a parish educated in the need of endowment. In the very most prosperous time of its career, it began to think of the future. The rectors kept the matter before the people. From 1893, when the endowment fund was inaugurated, the people were told of the need for gifts and bequests.

I was told when I came to Grace Church, that it was like many a downtown parish, about ready to expire. I did not believe this. I found a small but determined group of people carrying on a work that was admirable. They were doing charitable and social work of immense value. They had a constituency of working people that was in reality a mission within a parish. It is true that the congregations on Sunday were small, but they were dead in earnest.

The vitality of the parish had recently a test of real significance. On April 12th a vestryman offered $20,000 to the endowment funds of Grace Church, provided $100,000 could be raised. I started out and simply called upon one member after another and told them this story of the offer. Every one was interested and generous. The offer was made on a Tuesday evening. On Wednesday I had $7,000 more. On Thursday $3,000 was offered. On Saturday a gift of $20,000 was made. On Sunday $10,000 was offered. On Monday another $10,000 was added to the fund. On Wednesday still another $10,000 was given. On Thursday two gifts of $5,000 each were made. By Friday morning, therefore, the gifts had reached $90,000. Two gifts of $1000 each were secured on Friday morning. At a vestry meeting on Friday afternoon the balance of $8,000 was received. In exactly ten days the members had assured $100,000.

It was a magnificent demonstration of loyalty and generosity. But it was possible only because of the educational work in the necessity of endowment, that had preceded the effort. I did not raise it. I merely gathered the ripened harvest of an earlier sowing.

Why not begin now to prepare your parish for a similar harvest in some year to come.

THE NEEDS OF A MODERN COLLEGE

by

Bernard Iddings Bell

IN THE spring of 1919 St. Stephen's College, Annandale-on-Hudson, after fifty-nine years of struggle had practically ceased to exist and was waiting for more or less decent interment. It had only eighteen students, a small faculty of thoroughly discouraged men, a debt greater than its endowment, an impossible academic reputation. Instead of burying it, which would have been a disgrace to the Church and a waste of a million dollars worth of Church money invested in the property, a group of men decided to refound it and make it a credit to our communion. It never had been a theological training school but its service rendered had become confined almost wholly to men who were going into the ministry later on. It was determined to make of it such a college as would prove attractive to earnest students who were going into any profession or into the business world, a college where scientific education and honest religious aspiration should become complementary things. In the group of men who determined this were such persons as Alanson Houghton, now our Ambassador to Great Britain; Haley Fiske, President of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company; William T. Manning, now Bishop of New York; the late Walter B. James, Professor of Medicine at Columbia; and others. I undertook its presidency.

We determined to spend the time and money necessary to make the institution efficiently functioning and honored in the collegiate world before we asked for general support. It took seven years to do this and over eight hundred thousand dollars, which sum we have raised and spent. We have erected what we deem the most efficiently equipped undergraduate laboratories in the country; added twenty-five thousand dollars worth of new books to the Library; built a gymnasium; added modern dormitory facilities for sixty men; provided three faculty dwellings and a faculty apartment house; modernized every old building. We have brought together, and this is more important, a faculty of nineteen experts, properly paid, scholars of reputation and teachers of ability. The student body, without effort on our part, has grown to one hundred and twenty-five men, all we can accommodate and half the number that we desire for an efficient college. We have gained not only the respect but the enthusiastic interest of the collegiate rating organizations, which gives us class A rank, and of the presidents of all the colleges in the East. Now the institution is worth talking about. Now we dare ask that it be supported.

To complete the equipment for two hundred and fifty men and to provide enough endowment to balance our budget without charging fees too great for the average man, requires $2,000,000.

Nine hundred thousand dollars of this is needed for free endowment. The budget of the college provides for an expenditure of $183,000 a year. The $900,000 additional endowment will simply pay the annual deficit.

The following buildings are necessary if the two hundred and fifty enrollment is to be taken care of: an additional classroom and seminar building, $125,000; an enlargement of the Library building, $50,000; five new dormitory sections, for 112 more men, $390,000; three faculty houses, $50,000; enlargement of the Chapel, $40,000; an administrative building, $50,000; a new dining commons, kitchens, faculty and student conference rooms, $230,000.

It is expected that it will take five years to raise this $2,000,000. During that time we shall have deficits amounting to $165,000. This interim financing is our most immediate need at the moment.

St. Stephen's College has every confidence that the Church public will appreciate what has been done; will rejoice that to the large number of Church colleges which have

PICKING THE NEXT ARCHBISHOP

News Paragraphs from England

Reported by

REV. A. MANBY LLOYD

THERE are lots of things to write about; the Gloomy Dean on votes for Flappers; the "Church war" over the Prayer Book; and the more important war on labor being waged in the House of Commons. Before me are two pictures, one of the Rev. Francis Bacon, vicar of All Saints, Stepney, where knots of people have been walking out in protest, and the other of some Protestant agitators holding a prayer meeting outside. I know nothing of the disputants but judging from their faces and the way they pray my sympathies are with the vicar. Somehow I have a prejudice against people who pray standing up, with one hand covering one eye while the other is glued on their neighbor.

But I have not seen a paper for some days, and a newssheet like THE WITNESS should be up-to-date. So I have decided to go into the game business along with Brother Bill, my neighbor on the next page. I will give him one (and you) that is not too easy. Who is to be the next Archbishop? Canterbury, of course. Hm! Ha! Now we've got you in a cleft stick. The game should be as exciting as a baseball game or picking the winner of the Derby. That's where I came in. The Sporting Prophet, or the Lord High Grand Tipster. Fix on your gas-mask.

T'other day a bunch of parsons sat by the River Wye, under the shade of Hereford Cathedral and discussed this very question. Was it true that Dr. Randall Davidson was about to resign? "Not till the Prayer Book Measure is through," said minor Canon Mustard, who wears a yellow wig and is related to a famous general. "And before a Labor government comes in," added young Cocksure, who has just been through his deacon's exams and will be Gospeller at the ordination. The rest of us looked at Canon Creedo, whose monogram on "Q and the Synoptic Problem" has been translated into thirty languages, including Arabic and Scoali. The worthy Canon stroked his bushy beard and smiled sardonically. He has had the ear of more than one Prime Minister and is not unknown in the family circle of Stanley Baldwin. But he was as silent as the Sphinx.

Apparently it is a question of politics and expediency. Prime Ministers do not inquire after the sanctity or orthodoxy of nominees for the chair of St. Augustine. If a Conservative government is in, he must be something of a courtier, a diplomat, a leader of men. A Labor government will look for a man of ideas, a democrat, a champion of reform. I cannot give the whole debate, but boiled down, it comes to this. In the lifetime of the present government, with Stanley Baldwin at its head, the possibilities are:

1. Rt. Rev. St. Clair G. A. Donaldson, Bishop of Salisbury, formerly Bishop of Brisbane.

2. Rt. Rev. F. S. Guy Warman, Bishop of Chelmsford, formerly Bishop of Truro.

3. Rt. Rev. F. T. Woods, Bishop of Winchester, formerly of Peterborough.

4. Rt. Rev. T. B. Strong, Bishop of Oxford, formerly Bishop of Ripon.

In the event of a Labor government being in office, the choice would be between:

1. Rt. Rev. J. A. Kempthorne, Bishop of Lichfield, formerly of Hull.

2. Rt. Rev. W. H. Frere, Bishop of Truro, formerly of the Community of the Resurrection, the champion of "Jack" Bucknell, the Bolshie parson.

Other possibilities were discussed but Mr. Baldwin will take care that Dr. Hensley Henson does not get the office, and the nomination of Dr. Barnes would raise such a storm in all parties that few M. P.'s would risk that experiment. But he is a possible Labor choice. Everybody loves the Bishop of Woolwich, Dr. Hough, but he is well on in years. On the other hand, Dr. Temple, otherwise an obvious choice, is too young.

Remarkable scenes were witnessed at Queen's Hall when the Archbishop of Canterbury rose to address a crowded hall on the occasion of the 128th annual meeting of the Religious Tract Society. His Grace had just begun his address when a man in the gallery called out: "Before you start may I submit a resolution calling upon the Government to reject the Popish Prayer Book?" The Archbishop asked him to keep quiet; the man would not and was therefore led out by bobbies. No sooner had he gone than a second man shouted, "I want to second the motion"; then several women yelled, "Stop this Popish Prayer Book." A hymn was sung in order to quiet matters, after which the Archbishop was allowed to go on, amid cheers.

Everybody did not go to the Cup Final on Saturday afternoon. Two or three hundred people in Southwark remembered that it was also Shakespeare's birthday, and went to Southwark Cathedral to hear the Rev. T. P. Stevens speak in celebration of the event.

The crowd streamed out into the narrow by-ways of Bankside after Mr. Stevens had spoken, and followed him to the various points of interest, until at last they came to the brewery which is one of the twin disputed sites of the old Globe Theatre.

Here the stage was all in readiness —a lorry with a patient horse, well accustomed to his annual appearance as extra hand. And here the Ghost Scene from "Hamlet" was performed, with the youth of Southwark sitting on the backs of the actors, and a crowd half highbrow and half horny-handed applauding vigorously.

The Ghost's beard got in the way of his elocution, but he did his best in difficult circumstances.

Later on, the stage and the audience adjourned to the yard of the old George Inn to hear Mr. Darvill, whose front name is also George, give his idea of how Falstaff should be played.

Mr. Darvill is a metal-worker by trade, and a keen Shakespearian. Others in the cast included a civil servant, a woman cook from the Borough Polytechnic, and a shorthand-typist.

In the middle of the proceedings a party of leek-laden Welshmen who had been unable to find seats at Wembley arrived, attracted by what they thought was a promising fist-fight.

Charlie Cochran is going to run the Albert Hall, that monster mistake of the Victorian era. Pachmann at the piano and Kreisler fiddling are quite lost there. But the great showman, Cochran, counts music among his hobbies and is planning a Wagnerian festival. But the hall is really only suited to boxing. As Cochran slyly points out, the hall was originally known as the Albert Hall of Science and Art, "and what more noble science than pugilism."

MR. E. A. HARRIMAN, president of the National Federation of Church Clubs, in his address at the annual conference held May 5th-7th, declared that standardization of human activities is dangerous and "much of the lawlessness of the times is due to an attempt to standardize human beings and human organizations by law beyond the limit to which it can be carried without rebellion." Wider cultivation of friendships among members of the church was urged. Other speakers were Mr. E. Osborne Chote of Philadelphia, who spoke on the work in the parish; Mr. R. M. Everett of Boston, who discussed the work of church clubs in a diocese; while Dr. John W. Wood, secretary of missions, spoke on the work in the nation. Co-operation among organizations of laymen was discussed by Mr. Floyd E. Waite of Cleveland. Various organizations of the church were represented, the Brotherhood by Mr. Douglass Smith; lay-readers by Mr. Edmund R. Bishop Ingram of London has arrived home after a trip around the world. "Nothing to indicate that the world is going to the dogs," he said to reporters. In speaking of the United States he said: "I was feted and almost lionized. Even the queen of Roumania, who was starring there at the same time, did not outshine me. Her reception was a great success, but she did not get what I got —a degree of doctor of divinity. One of my greatest impressions was gained through preaching to 10,000 people in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine in New York. That is a magnificent edifice and a proud monument to Christianity. I was quite proud of my American game of tennis with Miss Helen Wills."

THE WITNESS has not had time to receive a reply to a letter sent to California for the score of the game, and we never allow ourselves to waste money on telegrams. However, a good New York authority states that Bishop Ingram won two of the fourteen games played with Miss Wills, but thinks it only fair to add that she was playing left hand at the time.

For the tobacco which you sent us through the American Tobacco Company, we returned chop suey. As for the students, it is not possible for me to say much except that they are generally found at the heads of their classes in your American universities." This Chinese gentleman paid a high tribute to the missionaires, but he didn't speak so well of American commercial interests in China, which goes to prove that he was lacking in diplomacy since one business man has more say in determining the policy of the United States toward his country than a whole procession of bishops.

Forty communicants of the Incarnation, New York, recently motored to the Incarnation Home, Lake Mohegan, New York, the occasion being the housewarming and dedication of the new DuBose Cottage, a recent addition to the Home, the gift of Miss Ethel DuBose in memory of her aunt, Miss Katharine DuBose, for many years an active and devoted communicant of the parish. The Incarnation Home is one of the finest pieces of social service work being done in the church, providing as it does an ideal place for the convalescents who are received from the Chapel of the Incarnation and from the social service departments of various hospitals. Brooks Cottage shelters 25 physically handicapped children, while the Home itself shelters 24 adults. With the opening of DuBose Cottage it will be possible to take care of many more. The Rev. H. Percy Silver is the rector and conducted the service of dedication.

This letter is from the Rev. Philip Davidson, rector at Greenville, Miss.: "Greenville, a city of fifteen thousand, was in the direct path of the first rush of water, April 21st, from the break of the levee at Stop's Landing. It was completely inundated and within a few hours fifty-five thousand industrious and self-sustaining inhabitants of the delta fled from their homes, saving little more than life itself from the deluge. A million dollars will not replace the clothing, household goods and other property destroyed in this city alone. In the suburbs many houses were swept away. More than two-thirds of the live stock, necessary to the tilling of the soil, has perished. There has been loss of life. Hundreds of families in this vicinity have not only lost their possesions but their means of support. The American Red Cross is performing a mighty task in aiding our unfortunate people, but it cannot attempt the rehabilitation of those who need actual cash assistance to take up daily life with some hope of success. Very many of these people turn to our clergy and church organizations for help. They need not only funds but bedding and clothing for men, women and children. Rt. Rev. William Mercer Green, Coadjutor Bishop of Mississippi, Meridian, Miss., will have charge of receiving and disbursing funds in this diocese. Checks for this purpose should be sent to him. Clothing and other supplies for the sufferers may

Is Your Church Still in the Dark Ages?

MOST of us probably think of the Dark Ages as a dead issue—something that happened a long time ago—something wiped out today by tremendous progress.

But think of those days for a minute — lost communication — days of doubt and mistrust—no man knew his neighbor—man controlled only what he could hold by fighting—everyone was the enemy of everyone else—because no one understood what others were trying to do.

Printing was the most powerful influence in breaking the Dark Ages. Any minister today who does not set down his ideas and ideals in printing is trying to run his church by "Dark Ages" methods.

The convention of the diocese of Harrisburg was held at Sunbury, Pa., May 10th and 11th, in conjunction with the celebration of the 100th anniversary of St. Matthew's Parish. The day before a conference was held on Rural Work. ("Rural Work" like "Young People" is now, I notice, always given capitals by correspondents, due no doubt to the fine work done by the Rev. Mr. Goodwin of Virginia, who served for a time as secretary of Rural Work for the National Council.) General C. M. Clement, senior warden of the parish, was toastmaster at the dinner for churchmen, which was attended by 350. He reviewed the history of the parish. He was followed by Bishop Darlington, who spoke on the growth of the diocese. The guest of honor was the Presiding Bishop of the Church, Bishop Murray, who spoke on the work of the National Council.

A significant report on the relation of white people and Negroes has been released by the department of religious education of the Province of Sewanee. The Rev. George Lay, Beaufort, N. C., was chairman of the commission, the other members being the Rev. Edgar H. Goold, head of St. Augustine's School, Raleigh, and the Rev. E. L. Baskervill, colored. The report deplores the lack of advantages that the colored church worker has, particularly in being cut off from contact with the white leaders of the church. The report makes definite recommendations, including the recommendation that colored representatives be given places on diocesan and provincial committees dealing with colored work, whenever feasible.

A young graduate of Syracuse University, Miss Marion Flagg, is bringing out an American oratorio—"Muhlenberg"—in which she portrays, musically, the life of the Pennsylvania Dutchman, Rev. William Augustus Muhlenberg, who founded Saint Luke's Hospital, New York, the main plant of which will soon be located in Greenwich, Conn. The hospital is about opening the first unit of its Country Convalescent Hospital in Greenwich, with accommodations for ninety-six patients. It has available for its second unit $1,400,000 from the estate of Miss Catherine Stuyvesant, for a memorial to Miss Stuyvesant's brother, Van Horne Stuyvesant. The architect will be Ernest Flagg, architect of the United States Naval Academy, the Singer Building, New York, and other buildings of note.

In Greenwich Saint Luke's will try to carry on Christian Social Service work on a scale broader than heretofore. Already twelve trained workers are on hand to find jobs for all who need them, see that every one leaving has a week's board, a week's room rent, and at least two dollars in cash.

Plans are under way for a large theater on the grounds, an Episcopal Church, baseball and football fields, swimming pools, amusement hall, tennis courts, and miles of flower beds.

The church to be erected on the grounds will be in memory of Rev. Mr. Muhlenberg, who migrated from Lancaster, Pa., to serve in New York as rector of the Church of the Holy Communion, and while thus serving founded Saint Luke's Hospital. The Saint Luke's work assumed such pro-

The Rev. Guy H. Madara, rector of Christ Church, New Bern, N. C., contributes the following account of a recent interesting experience:

An unusual instance of co-operation came in my ministry this year. One Sunday a car drove up to the rectory with two representatives of the Free Will Baptist Church of Cove City. Out there was a man that had never been baptized; he was 86 years of age; and desired to confess Christ before men and receive the Sacrament of Baptism before his present sickness would carry him off. But he desired baptism in the Episcopal Church. So I went out and found about a hundred people gathered at the lonely farm house, all deeply interested.

It was just at dusk; the only light was the flame in the fire-place, and its rays shone on the silvery hair of the old man and his faithful wife; the silver baptismal font gleamed red in the light; and the people standing crowded all around the walls of the room. It was a scene and experience not to be soon forgotten.

A few weeks later another messenger came with word that the old veteran of the War between the States had answered roll call above. Again I journeyed out, and again found the whole neighborhood gathered together. The neighbors had dug the grave, and made all arrangements; and the funeral was conducted with just as much competence and decorum as in a city. Nothing for the comfort of the aged widow had been left undone; the neighbors had anticipated every need. The service was read, and upon its completion many expressions of interest in the vestments, and other marks of the service, strange to them, were made. Many of them had never before seen vestments.

Through this whole incident runs a strain of brotherly thought, with the Free Will Baptists just as vitally interested and active as if the services had been for the admission of one into their own church, with their interest as keen in the spiritual regeneration of this dear old man as it was in the affectionate ministry to the widow in her grief.

its white congregation served at Easter by an Indian priest. The priest-in-charge, the Rev. George I. Baldwin, had to leave his charge on Easter Even by train in order to get to New York in time to meet the engagements made for him by the Department of Publicity. Roads were impassable, so using a motor was out of the question. For this same reason the Rev. Thomas J. Rouillard, of our Dakota clergy, could not reach one of the isolated Indian chapels. But it is an ill wind that blows no good, and this year on Easter Day the communicants at Dupree had a real Resurrection Day service. Mr. Baldwin has been with them for four years, but the first year he was still a deacon, and the past three years he has fallen ill during the latter part of Lent. Mr. Rouillard celebrated the Holy Eucharist and preached. The congregation was small, due to the condition of the roads, but the townspeople reaped a rich spiritual gain gathered there in the little chapel before its new white altar adorned with the flowering house plants of the devoted little band. Writing to her Bishop, one of the faithful members writes, "Our small vested choir of girls sang beautifully. We don't believe that there were probably any other white congregations in the United States presided over by an Indian priest on this Easter morning and we are very happy and proud of the distinction."

If You Are a Man Contemplating a College Course in Arts, Letters and Science

You will do well to investigate ST. STEPHEN'S COLLEGE, Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y., particularly for the following reasons:

1. Its Academic Reputation. It is fully accredited by all rating agencies. It has methods of individual study unique in American colleges, highly commended by Commissioner of Education Frank Pierrepont Graves of New York State and many others. Every student is taught by a skilled and scholarly expert. Science and religion are both fearlessly faced as contributing to sane, modern thinking. St. Stephen's graduates are desired by the better medical, law and other professional schools, and secure unusual opportunities in the business world.

2. Its Location. It is near enough New York City to be accessible—95 miles; and far enough to be free from the noise, dirt and distraction of a metropolis. Its campus, of forty acres, overlooking the Hudson River and the Catskills, is one of the most beautiful country locations in the Eastern part of America. Its buildings and equipment are complete and modern.

3. Its Life. It is a place for gentlemen, sportsmen and men desirous of real learning. It is sanely athletic, varied in opportunity for enjoyment. It puts scholarship first. The individual counts. A sense of comradeship and unity marks the student life. Friendship of students and instructors is not merely desired but realized.

4. Its Cost. All of these advantages are available at a cost lower than in any college of first rank in America. Six hundred fifty dollars a year pays for tuition, excellent board, and a good room, heated, lighted and cared for, in a modern dormitory.

An enlargement of facilities enables us to accommodate in 1927-28 a few more men than usual.

Address all communications to me personally.

THE PURPOSE OF THE CHURCH

What Your Membership Means

BY CANON JAMES ADDERLEY

THE Church is an institution for making religion real. I believe it is THE institution, brought into being by the spirit of Jesus Christ to further the knowledge of His religion, and to enable us to live it.

When any body of men have faith in a cause, and want to live a particular kind of life which is to be the expression of that faith, and try to spread that faith among others, they nearly always found some sort of society for the purpose. For instance, when modern Socialism began to be thought of in the 19th century, people soon got together and formed associations like the Guild of St. Matthew and the Fabian.

PURPOSE

It is, therefore, what we should probably expect that Jesus should form a society. This we believe He did. The purpose of the Church is the purpose of Jesus, namely, to bring about the Kingdom of God by united love of God and love of our neighbors.

I used to think the Church existed in order to organise a lot of services. I see now that these are only parts of the method by which the Church carries out its purpose. They are not the purpose itself. So long as I had this idea I could not feel much enthusiasm for the Church. It seemed to me a waste of time and energy to come to services on Sunday. It was when I got hold of the idea that the Church had a great purpose which, if completely fulfilled, would change the whole social life of men and women that I became keen. I had for a long time thought myself a bit of a social reformer. I used to talk about "Brotherhood" and "Justice," but I never thought that the Christian religion had any connection with such things. Gradually I came to see that here, in the midst of us, was a great institution, older than the State itself, and that I belonged to it, and that its main object was to bind people together to produce a real brotherhood on earth, and to live a common life of Righteousness and Justice. Another mistake I had made was in thinking that the "Church" meant only the "Clergy." Our squire's son in the country village where I lived "went into the Church," so they said, when he became a parson. Now I know that the Church consists of all the baptised men and women. This it is which has given me a use for the Church. I belong to it myself. It is not a little body of parsons acting upon me from the outside, trying to persuade me to attend services. It is a great world-wide society of which I have been a member all my life. To be a good Churchman does not simply mean giving a lot of money to the collection. I cannot do that. It means being a good soldier in the great army which fights against all that is bad, winning the whole of humanity to the side of Christ.

I used to laugh at the clergy for not being like Christ. I see now that I have got to follow Christ myself, and that it is jolly hard to do so. If I am not brotherly myself, and just in all my dealings, I am not a good Churchman. If the whole lot of us baptised people joined together to bring about the Kingdom of God we could overcome the world.

THE FAMILY OF GOD

I think I like the word "Family" better than "Society" or "Institution" to describe the Church. Christ told us that God is our Father. If the family of God realised itself, the earth would be a new place. Most of my talk about brotherhood was meaningless until I came to believe that we had a common Father.

Of course, I know that Christians have got divided, but so have many other families. We are more likely to get together if we believe we are a family. That is how St. Francis brought people together. Strikes and lock-outs and wars would cease if we really got hold of this family idea. We should all want to see the other's point of view. In my own family I am awfully fond of my young brother Ted, and as for my crippled sister, Mary, I would die for her any day. If only I could feel for the unemployed and the beggars and the dukes and the Members of Parliament who belong to the opposite party as I feel towards Ted and Mary! If only we could all feel kindly towards other nations and people of another colour! Now that is exactly what the Church should feel. "By this shall men know that ye are My disciples, that ye love one another."

NEED OF RIGHT SPIRIT

Here we are faced with a great spiritual difficulty. It sounds very well, but it is difficult to accomplish. We want the help of the great Elder Brother, Christ, Who is the only One in history Who showed Himself a Brother to everybody else.

The Christian religion affirms that He can give us this help by His Holy Spirit. The Church exists to enable us to have His Spirit.

We Christians find out the truth of this by living the Christian life of prayer and good works. We see Christ in others. "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these My brethren, ye did it unto Me." This is just one of the things you cannot prove except by trying it. The Church, with all its mistakes and failures, is the most likely to succeed in enabling us to prove it. She has been at it for over 1,000 years. By the way, when I call the Church "She" it is what a captain calls his ship or a chauffeur his car. It makes the Church seem alive and loveable.

Let's Know

SUBSTITUTIONS

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

A CORRESPONDENT sends in the following question: "Does the Holy Communion take the place of the Passover and Sunday the place of the Sabbath? And if so, does not the Fourth Commandment now apply to Sunday as it applied formerly to the Sabbath?"

Let us take these questions in order.

1. Yes, the Holy Communion may be said to take the place of the Passover. To the Jews the Passover was observed in commemoration of the deliverance of the Hebrews out of Egypt under the leadership of Moses. A lamb was sacrificed and eaten to the accompaniment of various ceremonies. On the night before Good Friday when the Passover lamb was killed, Christ gave Himself to His Church, represented by the apostles, telling them to eat His Body and drink His Blood under the forms of the consecrated bread and wine. The Christians understood that our Lord, in His sacrifice on Calvary, fulfilled all that was implied in the Passover offering. They called Him the Lamb of God. "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us," said St. Paul. The ninth chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews bears out this thought more fully—"now . . . once hath He appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself"; and "so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many." The Holy Communion is the re-stating of Christ's sacrifice, in which we share by our reception of the Sacrament. "As often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death till He come." The Passover stood for God's deliverance of Israel; the Holy Communion stands for God's deliverance of the world. The one leads into the other.

2. The first day of the week was observed by Christians from the beginning. At first most of the Christians were Jews and they continued to keep the seventh-day Sabbath also. As Gentiles were increasingly added to the Church, the question arose as to how far the Jewish law must apply to them. An Apostolic Council met in Jerusalem (Acts 15) where it was decreed that Christians should not be bound by the old law. Four things only were enjoined by that Council and the seventh-day Sabbath was not one of them. Gradually the Lord's Day for the Christians came to be fixed exclusively on the first day of the week, because it was the Resurrection Day. As the Passover found its fulfillment in the Holy Communion, so the seventh-day Sabbath found its Christian fulfillment in the Christian Sunday as the Lord's Day. The Fourth Commandment still held good, but the accessories were dropped. Christ Himself had said that "the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath." This is indicated in the arrangement of the Commandments in the revised Prayer Book where the command itself is printed in heavy type: "Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day" while the explanatory material is printed in light type and may be omitted from the reading. This explanatory material is not properly part of the Commandment as is shown in the difference between Exodus 20:9-11 and Deuteronomy 5:13-15. There is no more reason for all the accompaniments of Sabbath Commandment to be binding upon Christians than for all the details of the Passover Feast. The Christian Lord's Day takes the place of the Jewish Sabbath. Therefore, it is of doubtful propriety to speak of Sabbath School and Sabbath observance when we mean Sunday.

The cornerstone of the Nurses Home of Christ Hospital, Jersey City, was placed recently. Brief addresses were made by Bishop Lines, the Hon. Marshall Van Winkle and Mrs. Otto Wittpenn. The Home is to cost $200,000, the sum to come from the $500,000 that was raised for the hospital last year. The Rev. Thomas A. Hyde is the superintendent.

"Thank you very much indeed!" beamed the well-dressed flapper in the car, as a working man offered her his seat. "That was very kind of you."

The other blushed happily and gave a number of other males a hardy glare as he answered:

"Not at all, miss, not at all. I know some men don't give up their seats unless it happens to be a pretty girl, but looks make no odds to me."

And everybody except the young girl smiled.

She was still rather new at driving a car and a little bit confused in traffic. Down Broadway she forgot to stop soon enough at the signal and shot out into the middle of the street.

Pompously the traffc officer bore down upon her.

"Didn't you see me hold up my hand?" he shouted fiercely.

The culprit gasped a breathless "Yes."

"Didn't you know that when I held up my hand it meant—Stop?"

"No, sir; I'm just a school teacher," she said in a timid, mouselike voice, "and when you raised your hand like that I thought you wanted to ask a question."

The little boy had gone to the railroad station to see his father off on a visit. Amid the usual farewells, kisses and waving handkerchiefs, the train pulled out and the youngster gazed after it until it had disappeared. Presently a locomotive came in sight with a train of the same length as the one that had taken his father away, and as it entered the station he clapped his hands excitedly: "Mamma! Mamma!" he shouted. "Here comes the train back again! Papa forgot something."

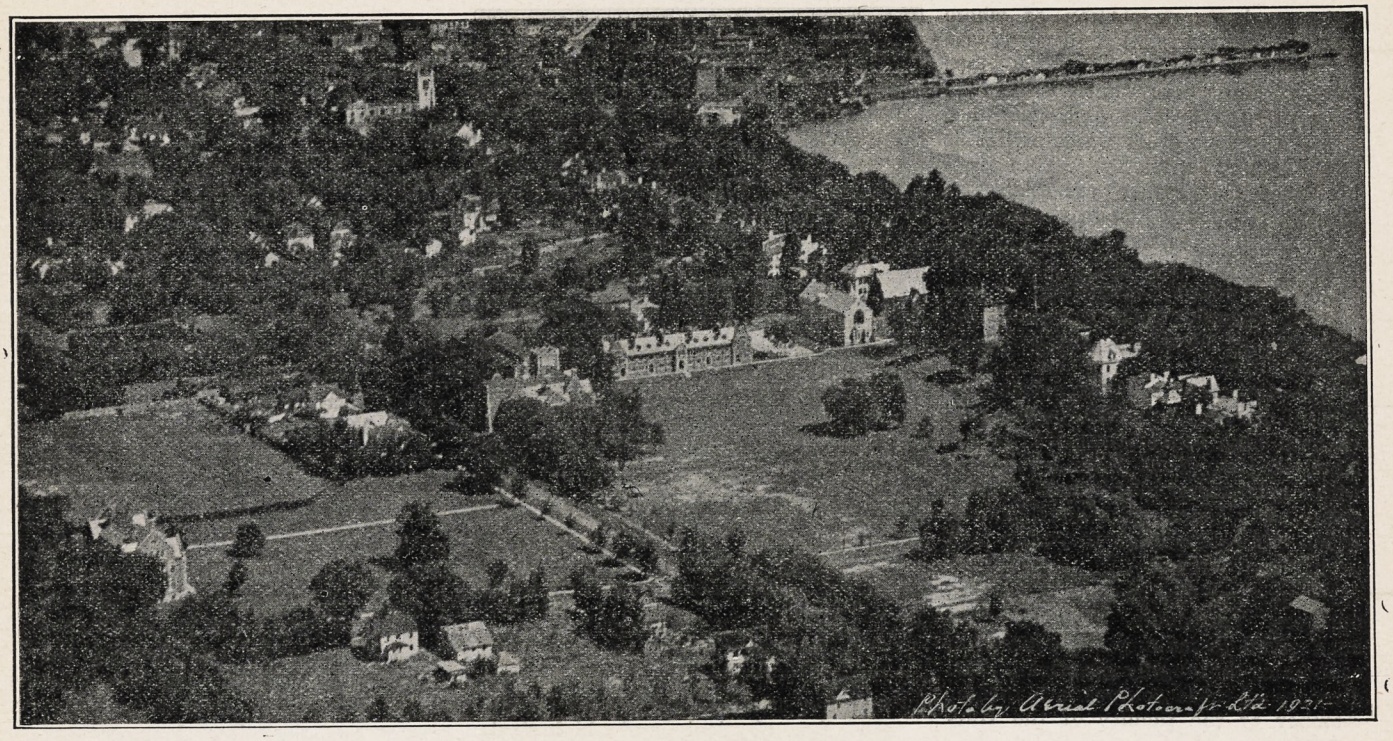
Although John and his wife had been married thirty years, it was said that they had never been known to agree upon anything—except once.

John bought a car, and in due course learned to drive it—in a way.



When he took his wife for her first ride all went merrily until John attempted to turn a corner.

"John!" screamed his wife, grasping his arm. "You're going to hit that pole!"

"I know it," said John.

And he did.

HOBART

Oldest of Church Colleges

BY EDWARD J. COOK

Secretary of Board of Trustees of Hobart

HOBART, the oldest of the Church Colleges, was given a temporary charter by the Board of Regents of New York State on April 10, 1822, which converted Geneva Academy into Geneva College. "Geneva Hall," where hundreds of Hobart men have lived and which is still used as a dormitory, was built in 1821 for the Academy. Geneva College was the westernmost college in the State of a chain of institutions raised from academic to collegiate rank by the Regents, among these being Hamilton and Colgate.

Geneva at that time was a progressive and thriving place, larger than Rochester or Buffalo. Her citizens were eager to have a college in this "pioneer section" of New York, but it is doubtful if they could have succeeded without the great personal interest and enthusiastic leadership of John Henry Hobart, Bishop of the Diocese of New York (which then included the whole State), one of the greatest missionaries and educational leaders the Church has produced. He it was who selected the site of the College on the high bluff overlooking beautiful Seneca Lake, and encouraged the trustees of the Academy to provide the funds required by the Regents by pledging and raising, through his own efforts, a considerable part of the amount so that in 1825 a permanent charter was granted and the first class was graduated.

Bishop Hobart was the champion and guiding spirit of the College until his death. From the first, a large majority of the Board of Trustees have been churchmen and each of its presidents has been a clergyman of the Episcopal Church. In 1851, after annual grants, still enjoyed, from the Protestant Episcopal Society for the Promotion of Religion and Learning, and by Trinity Church, New York, the trustees, with the consent of the Regents, changed the name to "Hobart College" in honor of the great Bishop, to whom all Hobart men look as their "founder."

In 1862, through the Swift endowment, St. John's Chapel, designed by Upjohn, was built and the Chaplaincy founded on the condition, accepted by the trustees, that the incumbent should always be "a presbyter of the Protestant Episcopal Church," to be nominated by the Bishop of the Diocese. In 1874 the Charter was amended, making the bishop a member of the board ex officio. In 1919 the present bishop of western New York, the Right Reverend Charles H. Brent, was elected "Chancellor" of the college by the trustees and he presides at their meetings. Under his leadership the college has doubled its endowment and more than doubled its student body. In the same year the Reverend Murray Bartlett, a former associate of Bishop Brent in the Philippines and in the A. E. F., was chosen president.

From the beginning Hobart has conspicuously served the Church by aiding and instructing young men in preparation for Holy Orders. Nearly 400 of them have been ordained to the priesthood. Her roll of Bishops is as folows: H. A. Neely, '49; E. R. Welles, '50; L. R. Brewer, '63; William Paret, '49; George Worthington, '60; M. N. Gilbert, '70; A. R. Graves, '66; L. H. Wells, '67; F. R. Graves, '78; Cameron Mann, '79; H. T. Moore, '99; D. L. Ferris, '88; G. W. Davenport, '93; A. W. Moulton, '97; H. H. H. Fox, '97; Alexander Mann, '81; F. W. Sterrett, '06. Bishops Ferris and Alexander Mann are trustees of the college elected by the Alumni.

This work for the Church is still being carried on. In September, 1926, ten of her graduates entered Seminaries of the Church, three at the General, three at Virginia, and four at Cambridge. Nine of these were members of the class of 1926, which numbered fifty-seven graduates, a large proportion of whom entered professional and graduate schools.

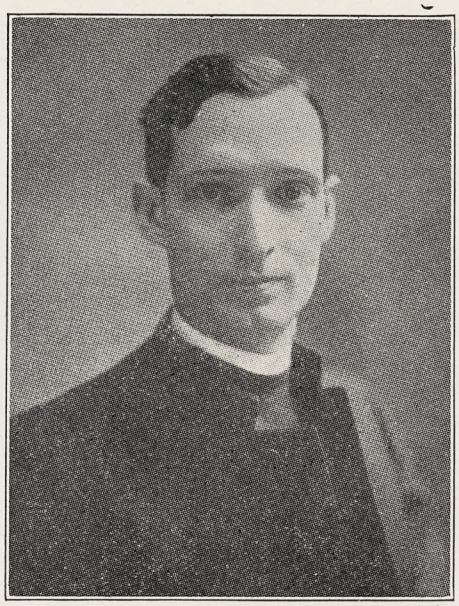
For Hobart consistently endeavors to give as thorough and careful a preparation for other walks of life as for the sacred ministry. In its preparation for medicine, particular care has been expended upon the departments of chemistry and biology, which are well equipped, with thorough instruction, extending to advanced organic chemistry and the elements of histology, anatomy and bacteriology.

The department of education fulfills all the requirements for the provisional high school teachers' certificate of New York State, together with instruction in physical education, and coaching school sports, which is an advantage to young men preparing to teach.

As most of the graduates go into business, particular attention has been given to making the courses in economics thoroughly practical. The director of these courses is a former member of the faculty of the Harvard School of Business and Hobart men are successfully carrying on their study in that graduate institution. A considerable number of men annually accept offers from large corporations before graduation.

An increasing number continue specific work in graduate schools, particularly in Chemistry and English. The English department has, as an adjunct, a dramatic workshop and "little theatre."



While there is an effort made to have the work of each department as complete and comprehensive as possible, it is the settled policy of the College to give every student a broad background of liberal culture, so that every man will be able to think straight and have a definite appreciation of the meaning and value of human life.

With this definite object in view, it is believed at Hobart that uncertainty and confusion as to the purpose and meaning of life, the greatest danger of modern higher education, is very largely avoided. The physical and biological sciences have lately opened up such a wide field of knowledge concerning nature and man that it is very easy to assume that there is nothing to study in either, but "behavior," and that man is essentially the highest developed of animals. This very prevalent point of view has a tendency to lead many to look upon their accustomed standards and values as "mythical" in nature and to follow the biological "urge"; while a few, confused, disallusioned and hopeless of making anything out of their lives, have found release in suicide.

At Hobart a consistent and concentrated effort is made to co-ordinate the physical and biological sciences with social and religious values. This is attempted not only by an orientation course for freshmen in the elements of civilization, and co-ordination courses for others in "General Science" (including psychology), in the "Social Sciences" (including ethics and religion), in "Masterpieces of Liteurature," but in intimate relationship between teachers and students individually and in conference groups.

So it is hoped that the ideal of Hobart will be more and more accomplished—that the real purpose of education is to attain a clear and definite knowledge of the meaning of human life, its value and its purpose; the fulfillment of its ancient motto, Vita Lux Hominum.

In 1908, under the presidency of the Reverend Langdon C. Stewardson, the trustees accepted the gift of $500,000 by William Smith of Geneva, providing for a separate college for women. This college has its own campus with dormitories and classrooms. Classes are taught by the Hobart faculty and degrees are given by the Hobart trustees. The dean of William Smith College is Mrs. Barbour Walker, M. A.

BISHOP STERRETT
Diocesan of Bethlehem

Student work is of great concern to all western dioceses. The diocese of Oregon has organized a drive of $130,000 to be allocated as follows: St. Helen's Hall, $60,000; church and rectory at Corvallis where the Agricultural College is located, $30,000; chapel on the campus of the University of Oregon, $20,000; chapel and parish house at Monmouth, $10,000; for Gearhart summer school, $10,000.

Tabor College—Finis

By Bishop Johnson

WHEN certain Churchmen undertook to co-operate with the Congregationalists and the local adherents of Tabor College in southwestern Iowa to save that venerable institution from extinction, we invited the Rev. Frederick W. Clayton to assume the presidency and to undertake the task. He agreed to do so for an experimental period of two years. The plan was an adventure in Church unity; a struggle to save a small college and an effort to continue the labors of those who in faith had begun the enterprise.

Permit me to say that Dr. Clayton has done wonders with the materials at hand. He has gathered together an able and loyal faculty. For a year and two-thirds he has secured the funds to pay them. He has built up in the school an atmosphere of mutual understanding between our Church people and Congregationalists without sacrificing any convictions. I have visited Tabor several times and have been charmed with the morale of the place.

The student body has never been much in excess of a hundred students, but they lived in the atmosphere of real religion, so rare in academic circles today. Dr. Clayton has had the respect of the entire community. The Episcopal Church, and especially the readers of THE WITNESS, has furnished its quota of the enterprise.

The Congregational Church in Iowa has paid what it promised, but has been unable to do more, probably because of the wretched financial conditions in Iowa and the fact that Grinnell College, supported by Congregationalists, has required all of their efforts. They have co-operated, but in a financial way rather inadequately.

The first year the people of Tabor and vicinity did their full share. But the local financial situation has grown more and more desperate, and this year the local support has dropped accordingly. Dr. Clayton is most anxious to finish the year by paying off the faculty in full. The pressure of ancient debts and the inability to raise the quota from the immediate locality this year has placed us in the position of the directors of a bank when they are persuaded that the institution is no longer solvent.

We can accept no more deposits made in good faith.

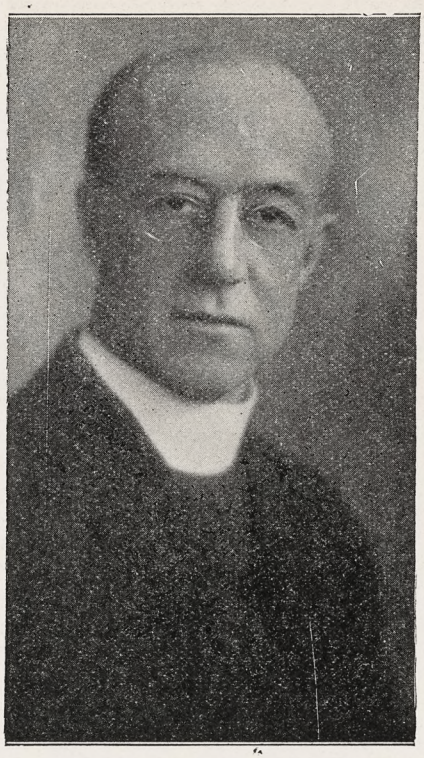
We must turn the institution over to a receiver.

We have come to this decision most regretfully for we feel that the spiritual values are unimpaired.

But unfortunately we must operate an institution in this world along the lines of commercial integrity.

We cannot call for more funds to perpetuate an experiment. We have had an opportunity; we have hoped to find a way out; we have failed.

I wish to say, however, that the failure does not reflect in the slightest degree upon Dr. Clayton in his conduct of the college. It is with the greatest regret that I have felt obliged to abandon my share in the enterprise as there is nothing in the work itself that would cause me to give up my efforts in its behalf.



If there are any of our readers who feel sympathy for a good loser, I would appreciate it greatly if they would show it by sending a check to Dr. Frederick W. Clayton, Tabor, Iowa, to help him pay his faculty for the final two months of their service, which they have loyally given in spite of the fact that they were told that there might be no funds.

In abandoning this work I feel that we are forced to give up one of the very best missionary enterprises that I have seen during my thirty-five years' sojourn in the West. It will comfort one greatly if some of our readers will help Dr. Clayton to meet these final obligations. After this there will be no further appeal for Tabor.

Cautions About Investments

Cheerful Confidences

RURAL WORK

By Rev. Geo. Parkin Atwater

WHEN Ben Franklin worked on a small printing press he was no doubt aware that he had a very crude kind of equipment. Had he continued to work at that press for a number of years, he would have found it the same at the end of the period as at the beginning. A printing press does not evolve of its own accord from the simple type that Franklin used to the enormous Hoe presses in use today. The improvements came by the application of the brains of men to the mechanism of the press.

When men began to ponder the mechanical problem and to realize the needs, they put enough creative genius into the printing press to get an effective result. Had they not done so, the printing press would not have grown of its own accord.

The rural work of the church is, in most communities, in the same primitive stage in which it was begun generations ago. There has been a hope that a better work would evolve by the expansion of the power and energy within the work itself. That is as false a hope as to expect a rowboat to grow up and become an ocean liner.

At the Convention of the Diocese of New York, held recently, the Rev. Thomas R. Hazzard, who has been doing rural work for a number of years in Dutchess County, introduced the following resolution:

Whereas within the upper portion of the Diocese of New York beyond the metropolitan commuting area, there are numerous rural communities either totally abandoned by all Christian bodies, or inadequately served by occasional ministrations, and

Whereas the most acute rural problem in America lies within the jurisdiction and responsibility of the most powerful diocese of the American Church, and

Whereas, the support of such rural work can only be secured by a convincing presentation of highly intelligent and forceful program of social service, combined with religious instruction, and

Whereas, the conscience of this Church should be aroused to the inauguration of work that should command as much attention and support as the metropolitan church-saturated communities, and

Whereas, the care of our neglected and consequently forlorn rural sections is the finest opportunity presented to this mighty diocese for a demonstration of its ability to meet a crying national need, and if successful would be a stimulus and example and guide to a church nationally bewildered by baffling conditions of rural life,

It is Resolved, That this Convention, through its chairman, appoint a commission of three clergymen and three laymen, who will support the Bishop and other agencies charged with this responsibility, and who will give intensive study to the rural problem, with power to inaugurate a model rural work, furnished with modern service equipment and personnel, that the entire church may know the cost, the method and the equipment necessary to maintain effective work in rural communities.

These Resolutions strike at the heart of the subject. If the great Diocese of New York will undertake to conduct one rural work effectively, as a laboratory experiment, at no matter what cost, so that it may know how much brain power, personal service, equipment and cooperation are necessary to get anything like an effective result, they will be doing a tremendous service for the whole land. Most of our rural work today is as ineffective as to try to stop an epidemic of typhoid with a liberal application of court plaster. To hold occasional services in a forlorn little church in a rural community, with a few people present, whose dismal loneliness is only emphasized by such a service, and who would escape, if they could, to a movie, if one was within reach, is about as forlorn an approach to the real problem of rural work as could be imagined.

Let us hope that the Diocese of New York will do something strong and effective about Mr. Hazzard's resolution.

BISHOP OF LONDON GIVEN A PARTY

Mixed With a Bit of Criticism

Edited by

A. MANBY LLOYD

IT HAS been a dull week in Church circles. Yet one or two exciting bits, foremost of which was an attack on the Bishop of London at a meeting of the National Church League. It was a welcome to the Bishop who has just returned, all nicely bronzed and looking exceedingly well, after a nine months' trip around the world. Mr. Joynson Hicks, Home Secretary, welcomed back the Bishop and then proceeded to go after the Prayer Book Revision and to accuse the Bishop of filling the diocese with men not loyal to the doctrines of the Reformation. "Let him alter that practice. You may take any parish in London in the gift of the Bishop and what will you find? Up, up, up, in each presentation. I do not want any hard things to be said, but I do want to get the bishops to realize that we have our rights as well as they; that we are loyal to the Church as well as they; that we are entitled to look at them as fathers of God, and in the Church to see that these things do not continue. I do not despair. There is deep down in the minds and hearts of the laity of this land the memory of the history of the pre-Reformation. That memory will arise when the moment comes, and I am satisfied that the great laity of England will never submit to a proceeding which has been recommended to us to accept without any compromise—doctrines and practices which are abhorrent to us because in our hearts we believe they are not the true word of God."

The Bishop of London states that he did not miss a single engagement on his tour; a real accomplishment as you in America are aware who know of his addressing a score of meetings a day when he was with you. To an interviewer, he said: "I return with two great impressions in my mind. One is of the extraordinary power and good influence of Great Britain all over the world, and the other is the immense vitality of Christianity today. I am more than ever convinced that the only hope of the world is in the progress of Christianity. No other religion has anything like its power. Wherever Christianity has gone life has become at once more progressive, more unselfish, nobler and happier."

* * *

Two of London's parish priests have written to the Times to say that silence on their part must not be taken as acquiescence in the matter of the new Prayer Book. "Obedience to its injunctions could only be secured at the cost of grievious harm to many souls." It is a small cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, but it presages approaching thunder. It is the first clear call to the Anglo-Catholic conscience. The writers are Canon Mackay, vicar of All Saints, Margaret Street, and London's foremost and most fearless preacher; and the Rev. Dr. Ross, vicar of St. Albans, Holborn, whose sad privilege it was to occupy the pulpit made famous by Fr. Stanton.

It was my good fortune to get Canon Creedo, mentioned last week, by himself the other day and pump him on the Archbishop question. Having congratulated the worthy man on the success of his new book on "The Pyramids" (on reading which the Egyptian fellahin has taken to horn-rim spectacles and elastic-side boots) the coast was clear. "What is your choice?" he drawled in his best Oxford manner. I gave him the list of possibilities already sent to THE WITNESS. Cannon Creedo's broad smile expanded into a grin and he finally shook with laughter, a most unusual thing for this dignitary.

"My dear boy," he said, "you have not hit the target, let alone the bull's-eye. There is going to be a grand shuffle. The Bishop of London is going to York. . . ."

"London losing Bishop Ingram?" I said, almost horror struck at the idea.

"Yes. He is a dear old man, but London Diocese is beyond his strength. At York he will cut a greater figure and warm his toes at the same time."

"But Lang," I said, "what about Cosmo Lang? Is he retiring, too?"

"No, you silly boy, he's the very man for Canterbury and a crisis. He has all the qualifications. He is an orator, a courtier, and a moderate in Churchmanship. What more can Baldwin want? True, he has written some very dull books, but he has been a parish priest and, what is more important, has never been a schoolmaster. But it is only a rumor and you must take it only for what it is worth."

Objection by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the production of a dramatization of "The Messiah" at the Albert Hall was revealed in a statement by Mr. T. C. Fairbairn. On being asked three months ago to produce a spectacle for the British Empire Cancer Campaign, Mr. Fairbairn suggested producing his dramatized version of Hansel's "Messiah." The committee agreed, and hundreds of people who were to take part were interviewed.

"Apparently," said Mr. Fairbairn, "the letter sent to Lambeth Palace was rather misleading, and the Archbishop understood we wanted to give a representation of the Oberammergau Passion Players. This was quite a mistaken idea. The Archbishop sent back a letter, in which he stated he did not think the Passion Players should appear in this country, although they were certainly to be encouraged in their own. I explained to the Archbishop's chaplain that there was some mistake, and a further letter came from Lambeth Palace in which the Primate expressed disapproval of the scheme, this time on the ground that he disagreed with any dramatized version being staged in this country in which our Lord appeared. The committee decided to abandon the idea.

"During Easter, however, I happened to visit a London church, where a performance was given which, in all its essentials, resembled mine. It seems strange and rather anomalous, therefore, that my play should not be produced. The clergyman who impersonated Our Lord told me the play had been performed annually for ten years. I have written to the committee of the Cancer Campaign explaining my views, and am awaiting a reply. If I am unsuccessful, however, I shall certainly not produce my work, but will consider, with the Cancer Committee's permission, staging 'Elijah' or some other great work."

NEWS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH

In Brief Paragraphs

Edited by

WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD

BROTHER JAMES EMPRINGHAM has burst forth once more on the front pages of the dailies under the heading, "Heads Episcopal War on Drys." A resolution which is said to have been passed last week at a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Church Temperance Society, denounces prohibition as a blemish on the Constitution and its enforcement a failure, and the whole works very unchristian. This meeting of the board having been held, according to the newspapers, at 281 Fourth Avenue, the National Headquarters of the Church, the inference is naturally drawn that the action was official Church action. It is hardly necessary to inform WITNESS readers that such is not the case. The Church Temperance Society has no official standing whatever in the Episcopal Church. It is entirely unofficial, having its beginning as a dry organization. One of the best informed clergymen in the diocese of New York goes as far as to say that Brother Empringham is the sole member of the organization at the present time. One must discount rumors, but the tale persists that Brother Empringham was not a howling success, financially, as the head of a temperance organization. Anyhow, the man who for several years had been filling your wastebasket with temperance and prohibition literature woke up one morning to discover that prohibition was undermining the constitution and was thoroughly unchristian. One should not minimize the importance of such sudden conversions, yet one does naturally wonder whether he should enlist under the banner of a man who took seven years to discover what is now such an obvious fact to him. There will be a lot of ballyhooing about it on the part of the wet papers naturally, and Brother Empringham, who still has the countenance of an ardent prohibitionist, will have his picture in all the papers, but it is all a false alarm as far as the Episcopal Church is concerned.

One might, however, raise the question as to who at the Church Missions House gives such an organization the right to meet there.

Dean Lathrop, executive secretary of the department of Christian social service, at the conference held recently in Des Moines, urged churches to make careful investigation of labor conditions in industrial corporations before investing Church funds in them. "It is a well known fact that Church finance boards handle literally millions of dollars contributed by devout men and women for religious purposes. Practically all of the Christian communions have expressed themselves definitely as to ideals and standards necessary in the world of industry and business. Responsibility rests in the finance committees organized by these churches to carry out as far as possible in their investments such ideals and standards." In his report to the conference Dean Lathrop commended three projects which should enlist the activity of Christian people, first, the community social work and activities in the town in which the parish is placed; second, the local jail; third, the poor farm. He urged the co-operation of diocesan departments in presenting to the parishes these three projects. "The only way the national department can operate is through the diocesan department of Christian social service. There is no other way." The Rev. Harold Holt, assistant secretary of the department, in his address to the convention, stated that a pastor or congregation was rarely found that might be called socially minded. "By socially minded I mean interested in the life of the city as a whole, able to see life as a whole, apart from the welfare of his own parish or denominational interest. There will be some interest in reform, some in scouting if it adds to the Sunday School, some in relief of poor families connected with their church, and if their church can put its name on baskets to be given, but rarely with the idea that social service to all people without distinction is the heart of the Gospel. There is, for this reason, an almost total failure to bring the resources and the organized power of the Church to bear on social problems under the leadership of one who should be the natural leader, the pastor of the congregation. Such members of the churches as do work in social service must do so as individuals, without the inspiration and the leadership of the pastor." Mr. Holt went on to outline the procedure for awakening a sustained interest in social service work in Church congregations through initial contact with local relief societies, leading to a well rounded program of co-operation between the parish and all of the welfare organizations.

Rev. Lyford P. Edwards, professor of social sciences at St. Stephen's College, has been appointed dean of the college to succeed Dean Upton, who is retiring.

The annual dinner and conference, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh diocesan board of religious education, for superintendents of Church Schools, was held in St. John's Parish House, Pittsburgh, on Monday evening, May 16th. One hour prior to the dinner was devoted to sectional conferences for superintendents and treasurers of Church Schools. In the evening excellent addresses, on specific phases of religious education, were given by the following: Mrs. T. J. Bigham, chairman of the diocesan church schools committee; the Rev. William F. Bayle, rector of St. Paul's Church, Monongahela, Pa.; Miss Charlotte E. Forsyth, diocesan superintendent of religious education; and Miss Evelyn Buchannan, salaried parish worker of Ascension Church, Pittsburgh. Following the addresses a good discussion took place, entered into by a number, describing some of the successful things that had been tried in the schools. The diocese was well represented by the clergy, superintendents and other officers. The Rev. Rodney Brace, chairman of the board and rector of St. John's Church, gave the address of welcome.

At a meeting of the Board of Trustees of Hobart College, held in Geneva, April 19, 1927, the following minute was unanimously passed.

"In the death of Douglas Merritt, Master of Arts, Hobart College has lost a most devoted friend and benefactor. Elected a trustee of the College in 1885, he served as a member of the Hobart corporation for the unusual period of nearly 42 years, a record without parallel in Hobart's history. From the beginning he took an active and constant interest in the welfare of the College, and not only by his regular attendance at every meeting, but by a generous expenditure of time and money was prominent in every movement undertaken for its advantage and expansion. In recognition of his leadership and faithful service he was elected Chairman of the Board of Trustees in 1905 and held this office continuously from that date until his death. He took a generous and active part in the Centennial Endowment Campaign and as Chairman of the Board presided at the Centennial Celebration in 1922.

"A life long Churchman, a patron of Arts and Letters, a Christian Gentleman, he truly represented the progressive spirit of Hobart College in striving for the ideal which unites a fearless search for truth with the saving grace of Christian character.

"THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED, that we, the members of the Board of Trustees of Hobart College, express our gratitude for the devoted service to our College and to the cause of Christian education of our beloved colleague, Douglas Merritt,

"FURTHERMORE, BE IT RESOLVED that this minute be inscribed upon our records.

EDWARD J. COOK,
Secretary of the Board of Trustees."

"TIME," the weekly magazine, is having a decided influence on religious journalism. The most recent convert to its terse style is the Bishop of Oregon, whose letter in the Easter number of the Oregon Churchman is so phrased as "to assist busy people to secure my message." "Council faces this situation," says the Bishop, "work already established must be closed unless expectations increased and National Council still has faith in God and His power. Refuses to close missions. Urges every rector, all members of vestries and congregations to increase their gifts to missions that there will be no deficit at the end of the year. How far are you willing to go to back up the Council? Scan the monthly statement of quotas and how nearly met each month. Plan to see who is approaching the duty of extending Christ's Kingdom."

The Oldest College of the Episcopal Church

Founded 1822

WHAT HAS BEEN DONE IN SEVEN YEARS?

THE ANSWER

Student body:	1919	90
	1926	250 (capacity)
Endowment:	1919	$ 675,000
	1926	$1,200,000
Tuition fee:	1919	$100 per annum
	1926	$200 per annum

(Whereas number of student body has more than doubled, income from student body has quadrupled.)

Professors' Salaries:	1919	$1,800 - $2,500
	1926	$3,500 - $4,000
Deficit:	1920	$20,000
Surplus:	1925	$ 600
Debt:	1920	$60,000
	1926	None

In addition to Hobart College for men, there is also William Smith College for women, a separate department on its own campus, where separate classes for women are taught by the Hobart Faculty. The student body at William Smith, which was less than one hundred in 1919, has now reached its capacity, one hundred fifty.

We are now on a firm, honest foundation. For two years, in 1925 and 1926, we have balanced our budget. We are looking forward to the future with a conservative but definite vision.

Because we have believed that a true college consists primarily of men rather than buildings, we have devoted the money raised so far to the building up of an efficient faculty and in equipping as completely as possible our present facilities. About $100,000 has been spent in equipment and in improving our existing property. No buildings have been added to those in use in 1919.

A SUMMARY OF OUR IMMEDIATE NEEDS

*Addition to Coxe Hall for Hobart Class-rooms	$ 40,000
New Heating Plant for the Hobart Gymnasium	10,000
New Reading Room for the Library	100,000
New Gymnasium for William Smith College	100,000
Total	$250,000

Already provided for and in course of construction.

Our further needs are a new laboratory building for Physics and Chemistry to cost $250,000, and an additional endowment of one million dollars, not for expansion in number of students, but for further increase in our salaries and to provide additional instructors, so that our students may receive the best training possible.

On the strength of our past achievement, we solicit the aid and interest of Church men and women who believe that religion should have its proper place in the education of our youth.

Additional information as to our needs and purposes will be gladly furnished.

President.

BUILDING FOR THE COMMUNITY

St. John's Church, Hartford, Connecticut

BY. REV. WILLIAM T. HOOPER

Rector of St. John's Church, Hartford, Connecticut

THE planning, designing and ultimate construction of a church for the community would seem to be the simpler part of the task. Far more difficult is it to learn the needs of a community than to win that community to provide for and use such facilities. Too often, perhaps, the Church through its ministry enters a community with its own predetermined and settled ways and then sits by to welcome an expectant multitude.

No matter what the particular situation the first step in building a church for the community is for the minister in charge to study every phase of the life of his group. This can only be done by personal and enthusiastic contact. If it be a new community then nothing will do but house to house calling. The spirit of cordiality and eager interest must be infused into a group of men and women who will in turn make this spirit known to the community.

There is a vast difference between a Community Church and a church for the community. The former is one of those colorless efforts which experience has shown has but little promise and less foundation. The majority of people very naturally turn to an institution with some assured establishment. Most American communities are made up of persons with various backgrounds of church life. For one church to win the group as a whole and then by right of possession to claim the right to minister to such a community means a definite policy of appeal and activity. There must be a willingness to recognize the validity of the heritage of any person who has affiliated with any part of the Catholic Church. A maximum of ministration and fellowship must be offered to such persons and this welcome must be genuine and sincere. To build an actual church building on this foundation is a task of great pleasure and satisfaction.

After a long and useful history as a downtown church, St. John's, Hartford, some years ago moved into an entirely new section of the city,—new in its civic history and new as a church community.

When the time arrived for the expansion and development of its buildings, an appeal was frankly made on the basis of the service the Church had rendered to the new community. A church school had been developed of approximately seven hundred children, fifty per cent of whom were from homes of non-Episcopalians. Here was the first "community" factor. The new buildings were planned with this in mind. The community at the outset had been carefully studied and the need of facilities for children immediately recognized. This, together with what must be called the "spirit" of this particular parish, proved a vital factor in raising the sufficient funds to complete the original plan for a beautiful and adequate group of buildings. A campaign was organized which included representative men of the community who were thoroughly convinced of the value of the church in the community whether they themselves were members of the church or not. Approximately one-third of the funds subscribed was given on the basis of this community appeal.

Naturally the completed buildings were shown to be adapted for the needs of the community. A parish house of great beauty is now in process of construction which will be followed immediately by an extension of the church building. The parish house will provide a kindergarten department comparable with public school standards; class rooms for competent and efficient religious instruction, attractive and adequate reception and guild rooms.

Careful study was made to adapt every room to various needs. No room except perhaps the kindergarten is restricted to but one use. Class rooms are so arranged that they can be used as extra space for auditorium or dining room. This is a vital factor for often enough two-thirds of a parish house may be so arranged that it is used but forty-five minutes per week during the teaching hour on Sunday. The whole plant may be so designed that the use of church and parish house may on all occasions be adapted the one to the other with easy approach or exit from either.

Such a group of buildings is now being built for the community chiefly as a result of the confidence established in the families and persons who are to use such buildings that they will form an integral and essential part of the life of the community.

CONFERENCE TO BE HELD SOON

Wawasee Conference is to be held at Lake Wawasee, Indiana, June 19th-25th. Bishop Gray is to be the chaplain. On the faculty: Rev. E. A. Douglass of Detroit is to lead the clergy conference. Following the adult conference one will be held for young people.

KEEP COOL

Let's Find Secret of Repose

BY REV. G. A. STUDDERT-KENNEDY

WHILE watching the Duke of York's wedding procession from a balcony overlooking a large crowd, I was witness to a very human incident, which struck me as having a far-reaching symbolic meaning. Standing immediately underneath me was an old gentleman with a long white beard. Next to him there was a fat and buxom maiden with her two brothers, also fat and well-looking.

When the Duke's carriage came round the corner, the crowd, moved by a natural impulse, closed up and craned their necks to see, and in doing so, pushed the buxom maiden and her stout young brothers on to the top of the Ancient of Days. He apparently lost his temper and started to "put it across the poor wench somefing 'orrid," as a Cockney witness put it.

"It's Easy to Talk"

I said to myself, as I looked down on the conflict from above—it's always easy and safe to talk when you are looking down from above — I said: "Well, old son, if you wanted to go for anyone, you should have gone for the driver of the Duke's car, or for the Duke himself, or for his bride, or for Cupid, who caused the wedding, or for God Almighty Who created Cupid, but it is no earthly use going for those two; they could no more help treading on your toes than you could help having toes to tread on."

Then it struck me that if anyone could get up into a balcony, high above the whole world, and look down on it from above, he would see that we were all behaving just like that old buffer in the crowd, losing our tempers, cursing, slandering, slaying one another, each of us hitting out at the parties that seem to hurt or hinder us, when, as a matter of fact, they can no more help bumping into us than we can help being bumped into.

We divide the world into friends and enemies, and proceed to fight each other, blind to the ultimate causes of our trouble which operate upon us all, friends and enemies alike. Hence the tragic comedy of life.

One of the chief ultimate causes working upon us all is the one that was the cause of our old friend's trouble—the crowd and the tendency of the crowd to act upon instinct and impulse rather than upon reason.

The most striking and significant social fact in our modern world is the unprecedented increase in the population of the earth which has taken place during the last hundred years. It is difficult, if not impossible, to get the figures through one's head, but, if we can even begin to enter into their meaning, we shall perceive that they lie somewhere near the roots of almost every modern problem, social, political, and even religious.

The single fact that the world population, a hundred years ago, was about six hundred million souls, whereas to-day it is well over sixteen hundred million, will bear a lot of thinking about.

Of course, when a man starts to talk in millions you don't understand what he means, and nor do I, nor does a Cabinet Minister, for the matter of that; he just turns his millions into units and counts in ones. We all do; a million human beings is a reality beyond the reach of our imagination. But there are simple ways in which we can realise some of the inevitable results of this tremendous change.

We need not enter into the great question as to whether or not the world is over-populated. Over-population is a dangerous word too often loosely used. We have first to fix a standard before we can profitably discuss what is over it or under it, and that is very hard to do in the matter of population. But beyond all question the world is much more thickly populated than it was, we are certainly much more crowded than we were.

Nations Lose Their Tempers

The consequences of this simple fact of over-crowding are complex and incalculable; it would need a book to set them out adequately. I merely want to emphasise the most obvious, and, for that reason perhaps, the least recognised consequences, namely, that it is irritating to be crowded, it gets on people's nerves and makes them say things they do not mean, and do things without thought of the result, simply as a relief to their pent up feelings.

When we are thinking of problems involving great masses of people, we tend to forget that the great masses are made up of extremely human individuals with nerves and tempers as sensitive and touchy as our own. If an individual man loses his temper because someone treads on his toes or gets on his nerves, the result is a comedy. He says and does ridiculous things, throws a cushion at the cat or a boot at his wife, and curses the universe.

It is a small matter, and though it may cause intense misery to the individuals concerned it does not make history. But when millions of men and women lose their tempers, and thy can and do, the results are tragic beyond description, cushions are turned into cannon, boots into bombs, and the smiling earth into a bloody battlefield.

Frayed Nerves of the World

And yet one of the root causes of the tragedy and of the comedy are the same, viz., human irritability. It takes a strong man to keep cool when someone treads on his toes. In a crowded world there are more toes to tread on and more boots to tread on them, and, therefore, more need of strong men, if we are to keep the world cool; and if we can't keep it cool it looks as if the whole show would go off in a spontaneous combustion.

Learned discussions of great social and political problems are precious little good if they neglect the human factor, and this business of boots and toes and tempers comes into everything. It brings us back to the need of inward peace and increased power of self-control, a need which in our modern life amounts to an absolute necessity.

We must discover or rediscover the secret of repose, of that positive rest which means not merely doing nothing, but getting into touch with the sources of renewed vitality.

We must learn to build within ourselves a place of retreat to which we can return at will, and in the waters of silence bathe our wounded feet and soothe our jarring, jaded nerves.

"We Must Find Rest"

It is this place of retreat which our religion ought to teach us how to build. Religion fails in its highest task if it does not teach men how to be still. In a crowded world there is more and more need of quiet places, and of quiet times, of temples and churches where men and women come not to be preached at, argued with and scolded, but come to be still, and in the stillness find His peace.

In a crowded world, too, we must learn to preserve and appreciate Nature's beauty spots, that we may return to find peace when the winds of God have blown the cobwebs from our minds and His moving waters have made our spirits clean again.

The God of the churches must be the same as the God of the everlasting hills, and men must learn to find Him present everywhere, if they would bear the nervous and the moral strain of a crowded and confusing world.

Either the Christ was a fraud or He can honor the promise He made to the men and women of every age: "Come unto Me all ye that are weary and heavy laden and I will refresh you, take My yoke upon you and learn of Me, and ye shall find rest unto your souls."

That is our most desperate and imperative need in the Western world, whether we know it or not—rest unto our souls. Only when we find it shall we be strong enough to keep cool when the world treads on our toes.

Young Peoples Column

By Rev. W. A. Jonnard

AFTER a long rest, here we are again. I am impressed with the fact that the title, "Young People's Column," is likely to be found a misnomer. My intents are three-fold in grinding out my four hundred words each week. Sometimes the column is for young people, sometimes it is about young people, and, again, it is primarily to help, aid and abet young people's societies. With this introduction, here goes:

Sometimes our "funny magazines" drive home a powerful lesson in their illustrated humor. I remember some time ago seeing a picture of a family gathered around the lamp on the center table in the living room. Mother sewing, father has evening paper, sister is looking over some music at the piano, brother No. 1 is smoking a cigarette, while brother No. 2 is playing with an "Erecto set" on the floor. Mother says, "Why, I declare, this is the first evening in months that all of us have been at home together!" "That's so," says father; "let's all go to the movies!"

This comment on our home life merely explains some of the problems that arise concerning "Youth in Conflict."

Another picture I remember is that of a beefy looking individual talking from behind a black cigar stub to some visitors at his plant where a long line of very young children are seen employed. He is saying, "You see, it keeps them out of mischief."

Somewhere between these two pictures should be a third. The question is how many of us are "artists" sufficiently equipped to paint it, or have we even the vision or the idea of what such a picture might be.

EXTRACTS FROM CORRESPONDENCE

This from a Southern Rector:

"I wish that you would get some opinion from the experts in regard to interesting the 'society' folk. I have not been able to do it here. The girls in our parish work in the Junior League, but not in the young people's society. Of course, the social feature would mean nothing to them. As a matter of fact, the social feature is a hindrance. I remember Karl Block saying at our convention here that such should not be the case. I agree with him, but it does not alter the fact."

But where are the experts? In my personal "travels" about the country I have met many so-called "society folk"; in fact, at the Racine Conference I think that a majority of those present could qualify, and in my own League, during the five years past, I have had as many as three debutantes in one season.

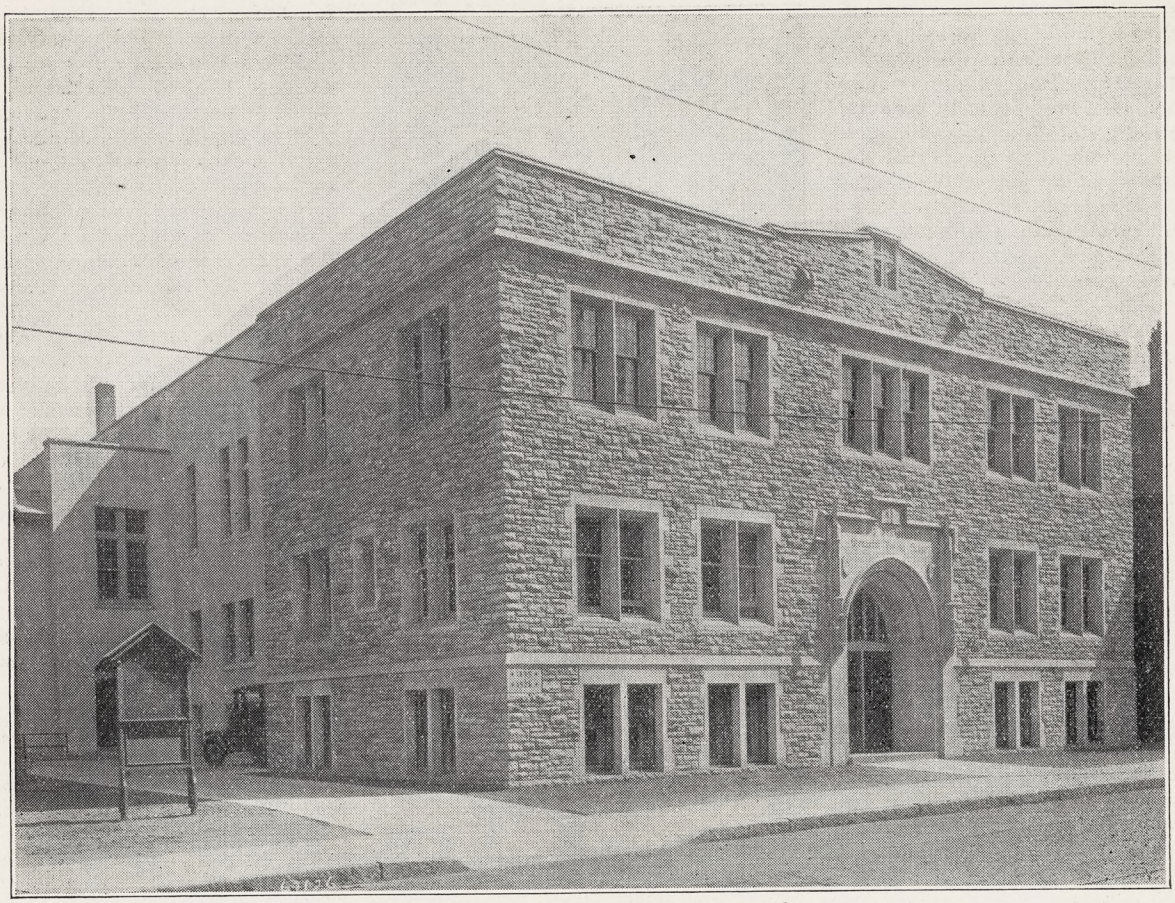
REV. THOMAS CASADY
Elected Bishop of Oklahoma

Let's Know

EARLY DEACONESSES

By Rev. Frank E. Wilson

IT IS not easy to separate the references in the New Testament to the ministry of women and distribute them under definite titles. "Widows," "virgins," "deaconesses" were not as clearly distinguished then as they were at a later date. Yet the ministry of women was an important factor in the apostolic church. Bishop Lightfoot states his opinion: "As I read my New Testament, the female diaconate is as definite an institution as the male diaconate."



In the correspondence between Pliny and the Emperor Trajan (110 A. D.) deaconesses are discussed as persons of recognized official standing. The Apostolic Constitutions (fourth century) have a good deal to say about them. They were set apart for their work by a special form of consecration. Their duties were clearly understood and carefully regulated. They were assistants to the deacons, performing a personal ministry of charitable relief and spiritual instruction, especially among women. In the early centuries they were delegated to prepare women for baptism, though as adult baptism became less frequent this particular function fell largely in abeyance. They were present in the churches at public worship and assumed the specific responsibility of keeping order among their own sex during the services. deaconess gives no blessing; she fulfills no function of priest or deacon." At the end of the fourth century there were forty of them on the staff of St. Sophia's, in Constantinople, alone.

The Council of Nicaea recognized the deaconesses as a matter of course and the Order held an important place in the life of the Church, both in the east and the west until the seventh or eighth century.

The same troubled conditions which promoted the monastic movement in the Middle Ages eventually caused a lapse in the Order of Deaconesses. Sisterhoods sprang up offering to spiritually-minded women a refuge from a rather stormy world and the more active ministry of women in the Church suffered an eclipse.

In the fifteenth century experiments were undertaken in various quarters looking to a revival of this primitive Order. The strongest single impulse came out of an institution for deaconesses established under the genius of Theodor Fliedner at Kaiserwerth, Germany, in 1836 About the same time Florence Nightingale and Elizabeth Fry, in England, gave great impetus to the idea through their noteworthy efforts in hospitals and prisons. Both of these women were in close touch with the Kaiserswerth Institution. The advent of the so-called "industrial era," with its great industrial centers and the attendant congestion, brought the Church of England face to face with the necessity of providing some form of very practical ministration to the women and children. So the Deaconesses may be said to have come back—at first by the action of individual bishops and more recently by resolution of the Lambeth Conference in 1920. As a result of that action the Convocations of Canterbury and York have put themselves on record in the following terms: "The time has come when, in the interests of the Church at Large, and in particular of the development of the ministry of women, the diaconate of women should be restored formally and canonically, and should be recognized throughout the Anglican Communion."

A Good Parish

Gethsemane, Minneapolis, Minnesota

BY BISHOP JOHNSON

IT WAS my good fortune recently to attend the dedication of the new parish house of Gethsemane parish in Minneapolis, of which I was at one time the rector.

I am sure that there is no sensation quite the same as that which one gets in returning after several years to the parish in which you have expended your best labors.

Parishes may not have souls, but they have atmospheres, which give them a very definite character. Gethsemane, Minneapolis, has had a wonderful spiritual influence over those who made it their spiritual home.

The Parish was founded in 1856 by David Buel Knickerbacker, who spent the first twenty-six years of his ministry in creating it. Minneapolis was a village when he came there as a young clergyman, and he saw it grow from a little village church into a large city parish. He was a pioneer missionary, and ministered to more than a dozen neighboring villages, driving in his buggy many, many miles to preach the Gospel to the isolated. One wonders sometimes why Ecclesiastical automobiles have seldom caught this spirit of missionary zeal.

Dr. Knickerbacker founded the Brotherhood of Gethsemane, sometime in the sixties, and for many years it did a work similar to that undertaken, later on, by the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

In 1882, Dr. Knickerbacker, elected Bishop of Indiana, was succeeded by the Rev. Anson R. Graves, a former assistant in Gethsemane, afterwards Bishop of Western Nebraska, and now living in Sonora, California. Bishop Graves had two outstanding aversions. He disliked idleness and hated debt. More than this he was a faithful pastor, who labored in season and out of season, for the good of the parish. The men whom he presented for Confirmation were the strength of the parish for more than a generation.

After Bishop Graves' elevation to the Episcopate, the parish called the Rev. John Jacob Faude to be its rector. He was a young man in his thirties when he came in 1890, and he remained there until his untimely death in 1901.

Dr. Faude gave to the parish the particular tone of reverence and devotion which it has since maintained under his four successors. Dr. Faude was a leader in the debates of the General Convention, and in the administration of the parish. He organized the present Altar Guild, which for nearly forty years has served with such continuous devotion that I have never heard of a single instance in which the altar linen, the priest's vestments or the appurtenances of the santuary were not prepared with immaculate care for the coming of their Lord. It is largely due to this guild that the spirit of reverence always pervades the church and its services.

At the death of Dr. Faude the present beautiful marble altar was erected as a memorial by his parishioners.

In 1901 the writer was called from the mission field in Nebraska to be the fourth rector. It was his one and only parish and the affectionate loyalty of the people of Gethsemane, then and for the years that have intervened since he left it in 1913, has been the most enjoyable experience of his lifetime.

During this rectorate Gethsemane changed from a church surrounded by the homes of its people to a down-town church, maintained by the loyalty of those who live in all sections of the city, but who give their support to the parish which they love dearly.

Since the writer left there have been three rectors, the Rev. Gilbert M. Foxwell, 1914-1915; the Rev. Stanley S. Kilbourne, 1916-1921; the Rev. Don F. Fenn, 1922-1927. Each of them kept up the traditions and added to the strength of the parish.

The new parish house is a memorial to Dr. Knickerbacker and is a modern building providing for the needs of a down-town parish, especially in its function of religious teaching and spiritual fellowship. It was dedicated by Bishop McElwain on May 1st, there being present Bishop Johnson, the Rev. S. S. Kilbourne, and the Rev. Don F. Fenn, while an affectionate letter of greeting was received from Bishop Graves. It was a happy reunion of a devoted family, and as one who spoke at the banquet, I was impressed by the bubbling, spontaneous, joyousness which permeated the audience. It made one wonder who perpetrated the stupid assertion that religion makes people solemn or funereal.

Like every parish, Gethsemane has its marked characteristics, of which I desire to mention a few. It has always paid its own way, never from its inception has it received a dollar in aid from diocese or General Church.

It has always emphasized the Sacramental and the supernatural as the fitting atmosphere of religious worship, and it has inculcated reverence, but not of that rigidly solemn character which sanctifies gloom.

It has always kept up the customs which it has accepted. It is slow to accept any innovation in worship; it is loathe to abandon a practice once established.

It has never used God's house as an ecclesiastical club to which was attached any social or secular inducements. "The People Had a Mind to Work," is the slogan of the parish and they work in God's house without any respect of persons.

It aims to meet every obligation placed upon it and regards the budgets of the National and Diocesan Church as obligations which must be met, even though it suffers from the drawbacks of a down-town church.

It has a penchant for calling young men to the rectorate. Dr. Faude was 36 when called, the present rector was 31, and the three intervening were about 35 at the time of their installation. It has proven an excellent post-graduate education for all the clergy who have been privileged to be its ministers.

It has a faculty of rearing young people who love the Church and are faithful to its obligations. After all there is no test of a parish more acid than the kind of young that it rears. I think I can truthfully say that they all love it as a mother and rally to its call.

The present rector is one who takes a wide interest in Diocesan and National affairs, giving much of his time to missions and crusades outside the parish, and the parish feels that in such works the parish is making its contribution through the rector to the mission work of the Church.

It is a parish which does not exist solely for its members, but in order that, through it, its members may minister to others.

It is a parish in which it has been good to live and which is held in affectionate remembrance by all who have ever lived therein.

On the Cover

WILLIAM THOMAS HOOPER, whose picture is on the cover and whose article is on page three, is the rector of St. John's Church, Hartford, Connecticut, where in a comparatively short time he has built up one of the strongest parishes in the east. Mr. Hooper was for a number of years a teacher at St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., leaving there to be an assistant at St. John's, becoming the rector a year later. The parish has one of the finest Church Schools in the country, and a plant now under construction, the total cost of which will be several hundred thousand dollars, the sum having been raised by a committee of laymen, with the cooperation of the firm of Ward, Wells, Dreshman and Gates of New York and Chicago.

About Books

By the Rev. C. L. Street

PRAYERS FOR DIVINE HEALING, by Sydney Coleman, St. Andrew's Vicarage, Peckham, S. E. 15, London, England. Price 2d.

This is a booklet of sixteen pages compiled by the Vicar of St. Andrew's Church in South London. It combines a real knowledge of spiritual values with a real knowledge of psychology. The directions for meditation are simple and practical (which is more than can be said of a lot of bigger books on the subject). There are suggestions for dealing with fears and worries and sleeplessness, and some beautiful prayers at the end. The book may be obtained from the author.

THE MINISTRY OF LAYMEN—A PLEA FOR LAY EVANGELISM, by Leon C. Palmer, B. D. Brotherhod of St. Andrew in the United States, 202 South 19th Street, Philadelphia. $0.25.

This little book, written by the Executive Secretary of the National Commission on Evangelism, starts into the world fortified by a foreword by Bishop Murray and a preface by Bishop Darst. It is worthy of both the foreword and the preface. Mr. Palmer sounds a ringing call for more lay participation in the business of spreading the Kingdom, and provides a lot of practical and helpful suggestions out of his own experience.

BUDDHISM AND BUDDHISTS IN JAPAN, Robert C. Armstrong, Ph.D. Macmillan; $1.25.

Buddhism came to Japan about the year 550 A. D. The hundred and forty pages of this book give a fascinating account of what has happened since. The early history of its spread, its internal dissentions and its sects, its theology, and its present effort to adapt itself to new conditions. The story is complete and at the same time condensed, and is written by a man who has lived in Japan and knows whereof he writes.

JESUS TEACHING FOR YOUNG PEOPLE, by Sidney A. Weston, Ph.D. Pilgrim Press; Cloth, 65 cents; Paper, 40 cents.

This book provides outlines for thirteen discussions on the social principles of Jesus, and their application to problems today. There are chapters on "The Place of Pleasure in Life," "What is Success," the Race Problem, War, and Immortality. A lot of good illustrative material is included, and the book should provide a really valuable text book for a class of young people.

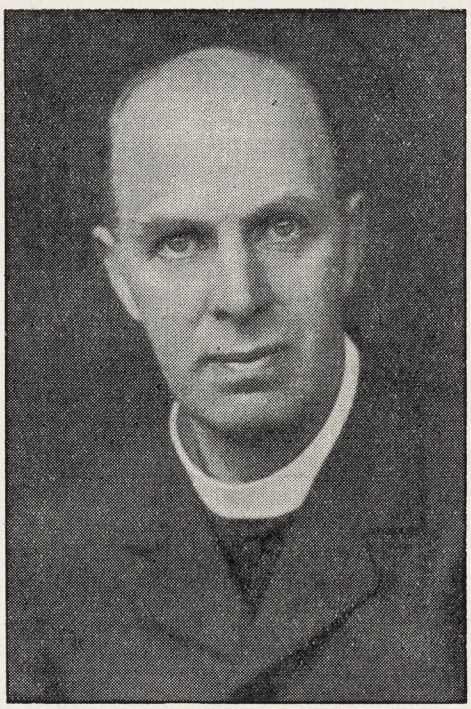
THE REVISED ENGLISH PRAYER BOOK

Bishop of Truro Makes a Speech

Edited by



A MANBY LLOYD

BY 327 votes to 16, the Conventry Diocesan Conference declared itself in favour of the proposed Revised Prayer Book. The debate produced a lively "scene," in which the Rural Dean of Kenilworth figured prominently, and at times the atmosphere was electric.

The Bishop of Truro (Dr. Frere) opened the discussion in a speech characterized by great wit and persuasive argument. Although a leader of the Anglo-Catholic party, so impartial was his analysis of the proposals, that he was complimented by all shades of thought on the moderation which he had shown on approaching a most complicated subject. When he resumed his seat after a model and brilliant speech lasting an hour a long and sustained outburst of applause bespoke the gratitude of the Conference.

Dr. Frere said there was nothing so conservative as religion, and it was one of those good things of which they could have too much. Of their religion nothing was so conservative as the devotional part, especially in regard to public worship. People got into regular lines; it was soothing. This was good in a way, but not altogether good; one really did not go to church to be soothed. Of all the people who were conservative about their religion were the people who did not go to church often. (Laughter.) There was very good reason for that. His lordship did not mean this as a jibe: on the contrary. It was their link, and for that reason they were very sensitive about any change whatever. Therefore, they deserved a great deal of consideration. It was very much the same feeling in regard to one's old school. The same old sentiment was awakened; one hadn't been there much, but one was fond of it, and for that reason one did not like it changed. If anything happened in the chapel it was an outrage! It was the same depth of feeling which possessed the man who comparatively rarely went to church. He was indignant to hear that things were going to be changed; he didn't know why they were going to be changed, but that didn't matter. (Laughter.) After 20 years people were beginning to find out what was happening.

Everything had been done to meet the conservative side, if there was going to be any sort of change at all. The bulwarks of conservation were extraordinarily strong. The parish priest who did not wish to have anything to do with the Revised Book need not have anything to do with it. In reality he was a petty Pope. (Laughter.) He could defy his parochial church council and his Bishop, and if that was not a papal position he (Dr. Frere) did not know what was. (Laughter.) Any parish could claim to have the old book "and nothing but the old book," and provision was made that without the good-will of the parochial church councils the innovations could not be made.

"I often wonder whether the conservative voice really means all it says," proceeded Dr. Frere. "I think they have forgotten what is in the old book and what is not. People think they are whole-hearted supporters of the old book, and I would ask them to read it through again, and ask themselves whether it is really what they want? We are legislating for the young rather than the old—(applause)—and the young have views of their own. They are the people we must not lose, and we are losing them largely. When you come to think of it, it is only by an act of toleration that we can have a children's service; it is only by an unauthorized revision of the Prayer Book that we have saved the situation as regards the children so far.

"There is another class to consider—the people who have already revised the Prayer Book to their own satisfaction. (Laughter.) It is an enormous class, and the difficulty is to find anybody who has not done it. There are those who would like revision which gets rid of controversy, but the difficulty is to get a definition of what is controversy and what is not. Take the Baptismal service and the marriage service—well, you know! (Laughter.) There you are! (Loud laughter.)

The Cambridge Union Society, by a vote of 310 to 184, has rejected a motion "That Spiritualism exists only in the Imagination" after listening to a lively debate between Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and Mr. J. B. S. Haldane, the well-known scientist. Spiritualism is rapidly becoming as unintelligible as metaphysics, the study of which has been likened to groping about in a dark room for a black hat which is not there. The phenomena of Spiritualism form a very mixed bag. They are partly physical and partly psychological. Professor Haldane was heartily sceptical of the former because they were so "fakeable." The production of small objects easily concealed on the person does not satisfy him—an elephant or a kangaroo, he admitted, suddenly produced at a seance, with or without Sir Arthur's red light, might secure his reluctant conversion.

The Bishop of London has given his approval to a scheme for preparing business men for ordination. Norman Stevens, secretary, says he interviewed the Bishop and four Surffragans on the matter. Already a large number of applications have come in. Two lectures will be given each night on three nights a week. This will be followed later by a period in residence for devotional training.

Dr. Darwell Stone, who has become the real leader of the Anglo-Catholics, has stated that over one thousand priests had written to tell him that they were going to "reserve" at all costs and will pay no attention to any prohibitions from bishops, assembly or House of Commons.

NEWS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH

In Brief Paragraphs

Edited by

WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD

THE Rev. H. Percy Silver, rector of the Incarnation, New York, elected Bishop of Wyoming on the second ballot to succeed Bishop Thomas, resigned; the Rev. Thomas Casady, rector of All Saints, Omaha, elected Bishop of Oklahoma, on the second ballot, to succeed Bishop Thurston. That briefly is the news of the meeting of the House of Bishops, when about half of the members gathered in New York June 1st and 2nd. Thirteen candidates were nominated for Wyoming and eleven for Oklahoma which make the elections on the second ballots in both instances significant.

A resolution was adopted on the Chinese situation; "Regarding the conditions in China, it is impossible at present to make any statement other than to record our conviction that there should be no thought of lessening the work in China, and to express our gratitude to God for the splendid fidelity and bravery manifested by our clergy and lay workers and our native Christians." A tribute was paid Bishop Creighton of Mexico when the House passed a resolution recording the high appreciation of the Bishops for the "distinguished and effective service rendered by the Bishop of Mexico, the Rt. Rev. Frank W. Creighton, during the troubled conditions prevailing in that republic."

In resigning as Bishop of Wyoming, which came as a surprise, Bishop Thomas stated that he wanted to take up the "work nearest to his heart" in connection with the Philadelphia Divinity School.

The ninth annual Synod of the Province of the Pacific, held at Trinity Church, Seattle, May 18 to 21, was remarkable for three things.

First, the remarkably efficient local organization, under which, by general consent, all the arrangements and proceedings worked out smoothly to an unusual degree.

Secondly, the ratifying of the following resolutions adopted at the previous synod:

Resolved, That the resignation of a Bishop within a Province be made to the House of Bishops of said Province, such resignation, if accepted, to become effective when approved by the Presiding Bishop of the Church.

Resolved, That if it so desire, the Synod of the Province within which a Missionary Bishopric has become vacant, may nominate to the House of Bishops one candidate for such vacancy. The method by which the nominee shall be chosen by the Provincial Synod should be determined by each Synod for itself.

Resolved, That if the Synod of a Province desires to take over the administration of any given field of missionary or educational work within the Province, the Province shall raise the funds for such work and receive credit upon the quotas assigned to the Province up to the amount appropriated on the Budget adopted by General Convention for the maintenance of said field.

Thirdly, the adoption of a resolution requesting the National Council of the Church to allow the diocesan bishops to submit a joint budget of asking similar to that presented by the missionary bishops. This last resolution was only passed after long and earnest debate, and was materially helped by the discussion of the subject in the House of Deputies, under the chairmanship of the Rev. E. F. Gee.

The presence and speeches of the Presiding Bishop of the Church were a great inspiration. Bishop Murray won all the western hearts by his courtesy and sympathy. Great regret was expressed, however, at his inability to remain for the mass meeting on the Friday evening attended by two thousand persons, with the music led by the combined vested choirs of the city and neighborhood and the combined orchestras of the leading high schools of the city. The Archbishop of British Columbia made a great speech at this meeting.

The president of the synod, elected for six years, is the Right Rev. Louis Childs Sanford, Bishop of San Joaquin, and the bishop of the diocese of Olympia in which the synod was held is the Right Rev. S. Arthur Huston. The secretary of the synod from its beginning has been the Rev. Alfred Lockwood, and the rector of the parish entertaining the synod is the Rev. Charles Stanley Mook.

The Women's organizations held most successful meetings as did also the Young People's Fellowship amongst whom Bishop Moulton of Utah was in great demand.

A pleasant trip to Tacoma by boat and a visit to the beautiful Annie Wright Seminary in that city were also greatly enjoyed.

The Rev. Frederick C. Grant, professor at the Berkeley Divinity School, has accepted election as the dean of the Western Theological Seminary, Chicago. Previous to going to Berkeley a year ago Dr. Grant was the dean of Bexley Hall, the Theological Seminary of Kenyon College. The Western has now been closed for several years, but plans to open shortly in new buildings close to Northwestern University, Evanston.

The Woman's Auxiliary, diocese of Western North Carolina, meeting in annual convention in Hickory, adopted a budget which shows a considerable increase over previous years, with generous sums voted for the support of various projects. The Rev. Louis G. Wood of the Field Department of the National Council was the guest speaker.

Addressing the women at the recent convention of the diocese of Montana, Bishop Faber said: "I know that you ladies are good housekeepers, and I ask you to carry this spirit of housekeeping into your church. When a glass is broken in your home you do not repair it with a piece of pasteboard, but sometimes this is done in church. Linen used on the altar should be the cleanest and the best available, and the vessels should shine. Strangers looking into our churches and seeing dead flies and dirt would surely get the opinion that our homes must be worse when we are so neglectful of God's House. Also let us have nothing cheap or tawdry in the furnishings. And let the outdoor setting be attractive, so that they will be eloquent of our affection. I ask you also to be careful in the way you get money to carry on God's work. Let not the Church lose respect. Let everything be consistent with good taste. Do not lower standards nor ideals."

Every clergyman has a library. I ask of them this question: what three books would you retain were you to be deprived of all others? Just one rule in this game—do not include the Bible or the Prayer Book—we will assume that you cannot get along, at least indefinitely, without them. Here are my three: "My Religion," by Tolstoi; "George Bernard Shaw," a biography by Archibald Henderson, and "The Way of All Flesh," by Samuel Butler.

to Tolstoi many years ago, which seems to indicate that the "young people problem" is not particularly modern: "It has always been clear to me that the ordinary methods of inculcating honorable conduct are not mere failures, but still worse—they actually drive generous and imaginative persons into a dare-devil defiance of them. We are ashamed to be good boys at school, ashamed to be gentle and sympathetic instead of violent and revengeful, ashamed to confess that we are very timid animals instead of reckless idiots, in short, ashamed of everything that ought to be the basis of our self-respect. All this is the fault of the teaching which tells men to be good without giving them any better reason for it than the opinion of men who are neither attractive to them, not respectful to them, and who, being much older, are to a great extent not only incomprehensible to them, but ridiculous—I think the root reason why we do not do as our fathers advise us to do is that we, none of us, want to be like our fathers, the intention of the Universe being that we should be like God."

The Bishop of Mexico has much difficulty and expense in connection with paying duty on packages sent to him. Recently he paid several times the value of the contents of a package on which there was not only duty but a fine because it had been sent first-class and not declared. It is best not to send packages. Money, which is always useful, is best sent as a United States check and not a postal money order.

A subscriber in Chicago wrote me a letter on asbestos in which he bawled out our government for the way the flood situation has been handled. "The United States can spend millions to protect the banana crop in Nicaragua, and send a half dozen flocks of marines to China to protect "missionaries" (?), but when millions of people who are raising the crops that feed America have life and property destroyed by a flood, the only thing the government is able to do is to panhandle through the Red Cross. It is a good thing the Red Cross is on the job, but for the life of me I do not see why the govment could not take care of the situation."

"There is a dissension in the Royal Family," writes our arch-cynic, Mr. George Bernard Shaw, whom the Royal Academy have refused to "hang" much to the regret of his enemies. "Prince Henry's proclamation that every artist should be a sportsman was promptly countered by the Prince of Wales' refusal, public and pointed, to attend the great bull fight in Spain. I think that Prince Henry must have meant that every sportsman should be an artist. He was probably nervous and put the boot on the wrong foot. Certainly the artist who paints the bird in its living colors, or stalks the living elephant or rhinoceros in its native liberty with a movie-camera, is a thousand times a better sportsman than the malignant idiot who shoots them and gets photographed sitting on the corpse."

Eastern Oregon's distinguished Churchman, Capt. Charles A. Schetky, U.S.N. (retired), celebrated his 100th birthday in March. He lives in Hood River. The officer in charge of the naval recruiting station in Portland was appointed special aide to Capt. Schetky for the day and brought a letter from Secretary Wilbur. Capt. Schetky remembers Bishop White, first presiding bishop of the American Church. As a lay reader the Captain has conducted many services and since his sight has failed he has stood by the lectern in his own church and recited long passages from the Bible. After adventurous years on sea and land, Capt. Schetky is known today as "a man of reverence, deep faith and consecrated spiritual insight."
