The fact of the Ascension of Christ is the basis of the Christian confidence that human nature can be radically changed and that Christian incentives in civilization are even more creative and effective in the building of institutions than are pagan incentives. Politicians and industrialists notwithstanding, acquisitiveness is not the one successful incentive to economic activity. The ideals and working standards of the army and navy and the professions are alone sufficient to prove it, without going further afield for evidence in socialized nations. Personal or national self-interest is not the creative motive for successful and joyous living. Mothers, lovers, physicians, "martyrs of science," genuine teachers, priests, missionaries are all witnesses to the contrary. Self-giving alone is truly creative. War and dependence on armed might is not the one successful method of defense against aggression and injustice. The life and accomplishments of Mohandas Gandhi are evidence of the effectiveness of another and better way. But all these Christian incentives require a profound change in the nature of the "Old Adam," the animal man, and in his institutions, before they can become successful, working forces in the world.

Today, as in all earlier Christian eras, every sinful human individual and every imperfect and unjust institution is a candidate for beneficent and radical changes by the power of the ascended Lord of life. But intelligent and devout Christians are of all men most fortunate in that they actually live in the very family and fellowship of

"QUOTES"

THE advance of civilization is measured by its self-imposed restrictions. Already today, such restrictions for the sake of the social welfare are thickening on every hand. In countless matters the enlightened conscience is limiting its prerogatives, in that spirit of joy which transforms sacrifice from mutilation to redemption.

Jesus, where they may know and touch the incarnate God, spiritually and sacramentally present with them, the same mighty God whose ascended life has power to transform the world. This ought to mean for all of us the privilege and duty of constant acts of will, in prayer and meditation and communion, whereby we shall grow both in knowledge (of his nature and our own) and in power (the power he has given us to become the sons of God) so that, in heightened awareness of our divine resources, we may do our part with him in turning the world upside down, in order that it may one day be set rightside up before his face.

The Cocktail Party

THE Nicene Creed makes a point of telling us that the Holy Ghost spoke through men who were not baptized nor confirmed—the prophets. This should bring encouragement to some of us who feel that the Holy Spirit does not speak with one clear voice through the Church, for the prophets were not notoriously of one mind with one another. It should also bring encouragement to all of us in these strange days when men seem to be listening for the word of the Spirit, but do not seem to care whether it is an orthodox word or not. The success of the sale of religious books and "religious" books (there is a difference) is one indication of this.

The success of Mr. Eliot's play, "The Cocktail Party," is another. It is being attended by a great many people who think they should, and their relief at finding that it is really rather good theatre is quite obvious. They are prepared for the pill without any sugar coating.

Outside of a rather dilletante discussion, over the cocktails and potato chips, of the crucifixion of one of the characters in the play, there are two bits of obvious unreality. One is when an amateur cook, having left for the kitchen to whip up something for supper out of nothing (and only eggs in the house, mind you; not a single mangoe or a single pinch of curry powder) appears two minutes later and indicates that the job is done. The other is when a psychiatrist straightened out three lives in three ten-minute interviews. We gather that he does it by means of informers, but the average psychiatrist will think he did it with mirrors, and will dread the possibility of people calling him up and expecting to get similar help in the time it takes to get a hair cut.

There is a refrain running through the play: "I'm not the same person I was twenty-four hours ago." This does not remind one of life as it really is. It does not remind one of St. Paul, whose "sudden" conversion must have been preceded by many uncomfortable attitudes, even though some of them were unconscious; and whose conversion was followed by some years of silent readjustment. It is rather unfortunately reminiscent of the time when college girls and junior leaguers were witnessing to the fact that this or than interview had so changed them they hardly recognized themselves.

There is no denying, however, that the play encourages, as well as commends, a serious view of life. Moreover it points up an idea that psychiatrists are beginning to consider with surprised approval: the idea that if we had more monasteries and convents we should have fewer mental hospitals.

The Holy Spirit speaks through strange media, even through a play called "The Cocktail Party." This we can remember. But we should also remember, lest we build false hopes and be disillusioned, that he works little by little, here a little, there a little, by gradualness, by growth that seems glacier-slow while it is happening.

Historic Christ Church

ARTICLES and pictures in this number tell part of the story of historic Christ Church, Alexandria, Virginia. But it is because the parish has more than a glorious past that we give space to it. Under the leadership of the Rev. B. B. Comer Lile and his associate, the Rev. Oren Chamberlain, together with an alert and hard-working congregation, the parish has had a remarkable growth all along the line. The parish house, now under construction at a cost of close to $200,000, is symbolic of this fact. A shrine, truly, and visited as such by thousands of Americans each year; but in addition, a large and growing parish with leaders who have the wisdom to provide for the needs of today and of the future.

We congratulate the clergy and people of Christ Church, and present the story as fully as our space will allow since we believe the Church as a whole will be inspired by this example of a historic parish squarely facing the challenge of present day opportunities.

FOR THE DAYS AHEAD

O GOD, who art the strength of thy people in every moment of need; Grant us so to pass through the coming days with faithful hearts and unfaltering purpose, that we may in all things prove worthy of the gift of thy Son, and bring the light of encouragement to our fellowmen; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Highlights In The First Century Of Christ Church, Alexandria

THE congregation of Christ Church, Alexandria, had its beginning sometime prior to 1752, which was three years after the establishment of the town. The minutes of the vestry of Truro Parish for July 1752 refer to the need of repairs for the church in Alexandria, which is an indication that the first building had been in use for some time, probably long prior to the founding of the town itself. In 1764, the vestry of Truro Parish, of which Colonel George Washington was a member, saw the need for the establishment of a new parish which would include the congregations of the Alexandria church and The Falls church. In 1765 the new parish, given the name of "Fairfax Parish" was established. At the first vestry election, Colonel Washington was among those chosen. However, due to the fact that his principal residence was in the bounds of the older Truro Parish, he never exercised his rights as a vestryman of Fairfax Parish.

In 1767 the vestry entered into a contract with James Parsons to build the present building of Christ Church at a cost of 600 pounds. The architect was James Wren, one of the vestrymen of the parish and a cousin of Sir Christopher Wren. Because of the business failure of Mr. Parsons and his inability to complete the church building, the task of finishing it was turned over to Mr. John Carlyle who completed the building early in 1773. On February 27th, 1773 the vestry accepted the church as "finished in workmanlike order." Since that day this building has been in constant and continuous use as a house of worship. General George Washington was one of the original pew-holders and paid the highest price that was paid for any of the pews, namely 36 pounds, 10 shillings. In the very shadows of Christ Church one Sunday morning in 1774, surrounded by the congregation, everyone of whom he knew well, Washington advocated withdrawing allegiance from King George and declared that he would fight to uphold the independence of the Colonies. Nine years later, after the independence had been successfully established, he returned to Mount Vernon on Christmas Eve. The next morning he was back in his accustomed pew in Christ Church to receive his Christmas communion and to hear his rector, the Rev. David Griffith, proclaim that peace and good will reigned once more in the land. It is said that no one in the church that morning bowed in deeper gratitude than did the great General as he thanked God for victory and peace.

On April 25th, 1785, George Washington and other prominent laymen of Fairfax Parish met in Alexandria and signed a contract binding "themselves, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns" to pay annually to the minister and vestry of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Alexandria the sum of 5 pounds for each pew assigned to them. George Washington's well known signature is appended to this original contract which is still preserved in the old minute book of the parish vestry. Christ Church is fortunate in having the minutes of all vestry meetings of the parish from August 26th, 1765 down through the most recent meeting which was May 8th, 1950. General Washington was very regular in his attendance at Christ Church from the time of the end of the Revolution until his death in 1799. During this entire time Pohick Church, Truro Parish, with which he had been closely associated before the war, was not open for services. The Rev. Thomas Davis, who was rector of Christ Church from 1792 to 1806, conducted General Washington's funeral at the request of Mrs. Washington at Mount Vernon on December 16th, 1799. Five years later, on April 12, 1804, George Washington Parke Custis, adopted son of General Washington, presented to Christ Church "The family Bible of General Washington used at Mount Vernon." This Bible is still in the possession of the church and is shown on special occasions.

Chaplain Becomes Rector

THE Rev. David Griffith, former chaplain in the Continental Army and an intimate friend and spiritual advisor of General Washington, became the rector in 1779 and served until his death in 1789. During this period he played a very important part in the establishment of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. In 1786, the clergy and laity of the diocese of Virginia elected him to be their first bishop, but because of the financially depressed condition of the Church he was unable to go to England to receive consecration. He died in Philadelphia in 1789 while serving as delegate from Virginia to the first General Convention of the Church.

The Rev. Bryan Fairfax succeeded Dr. Griffith as rector and served until 1792 when he inherited a seat in the House of Lords of the British Parliament. In 1793 he went to England and established his rights as the Eighth Lord Fairfax, Baron of Cameron. After six years in England he returned to Mount Eagle, the colonial residence of the Lords Fairfax, which is just outside Alexandria. Bryan Fairfax the Tory, and George Washington the leader of the Revolution, remained close personal friends in spite of their political differences. It is believed that the last time that George Washington filled a social engagement was when he had dinner with Bryan Fairfax a few days before his death in December, 1799.

The Rev. William Meade was rector from 1811 to 1813. His unbounded energy and evangelical zeal accomplished much for Christ Church and for the re-birth of the Church in Virginia. He was consecrated bishop in 1829. His great episcopate in the diocese lasted until his death in 1862.

The Rev. Reuel Keith was rector from 1825 to 1827. He was the first professor of the Virginia Theological Seminary in Alexandria and played an important part in the early life of this great evangelical institution which was founded and housed at that time only a few doors from Christ churchyard. It was the Rev. Dr. Keith who solemnized the marriage of Lt. Robert Edward Lee and Mary Custis at Arlington mansion.

Robert E. Lee

WHEN Robert E. Lee was three years old his family came to live at 611 Cameron Street in Alexandria which is two doors from Christ churchyard. As a child he played in the churchyard and in the rectory yard and was closely associated with the life of Christ Church. Lee was not confirmed during his youth. When he was forty-six years old, having attained the rank of Colonel in the U. S. Army and while serving as superintendent of the U. S. Military Academy at West Point, he received the Apostolic rite of confirmation at the hands of the Rt. Rev. John Johns, then bishop coadjutor of Virginia. At this service which took place in Christ Church, July 17th, 1853, Colonel Lee knelt between two of his daughters who were confirmed with him. A small silver plate in the communion rail marks where he knelt. While in residence at Arlington mansion, a few miles from Alexandria, General Lee regularly attended services at Christ Church. One Sunday morning in April 1861, Lee drove as usual from Arlington to attend the service at Christ Church. He had previously resigned his commission in the Federal Army. At the conclusion of the service he was approached by a committee of Virginia leaders from Richmond who offered him command of the Army of Virginia which led to his eventual selection as head of the Army of the Confederacy. Federal troops occupied Alexandria during the War between the States and Christ Church was used as the Post Chapel of the occupying forces. In 1866 the church was restored to its old vestry.

A significant fact about Christ Church is that the building has never been radically changed. The only exterior change is the addition of the tower in 1818. The only structural change in the interior is the addition of the gallery in 1786. However, the gallery was a part of the original plan. Beginning in 1820 the square pews were altered to face forward. George Washington's pew, No. 60, is the only pew which retains its original shape.

Almost every President of the United States has worshipped in Christ Church. Traditionally, the President sits in the Washington pew. Much could be written about the many great spiritual leaders and consecrated laymen who have served and worshipped here but space does not permit the telling of their stories. The doors of this church have been continuously open for 177 years and it is not an exaggeration to say that this house of God has been an influence and a witness for Christ to millions of people.

How Christ Church Raised Its Building Fund

IN inaugurating the building fund campaign, the vestry of Christ Church elected its senior warden, Mr. Gardner L. Boothe, to be the general chairman and Mr. Robert J. Johnson, a communicant who had proven himself to be an able leader in church promotion, to be the campaign director. The vestry itself served as the committee on plans and policy and appointed able members of the congregation to be responsible for enlisting workers, publicity, training workers, printing and listing, assignment of prospects and volunteer secretarial assistance. Leaders were also chosen by the vestry to head the four divisions of workers, namely: the special gifts division, the women's division, the men's division, and the church school division. Each division head chose three captains whose duties included enlisting canvassers.

The clergy, with the assistance of three communicants who are professionals in the fields of printing, engraving, photography, and layout, produced a twenty page brochure which set forth clearly the need of a new parish hall, described the proposed building, and the obligation and opportunity of the people to provide the answer. The goal that was set before the congregation was "At least 3% of your income for three years." Members were given the choice of making pledges payable on an annual, semi-annual, quarterly, monthly, weekly, or lump sum basis. The liberally illustrated brochure pointed out the opportunity for giving parts of the building as special memorials and described "The Book of Remembrance" in which will be recorded the name of every donor and the name of every person in whose memory a gift is made. This provision is appropriate since the building is to be called "Christ Church Memorial Parish Hall."

One hundred thirty canvassers were enlisted. They were trained in one week under the leadership of the campaign director in three evening sessions. The following week, division heads met their groups and the canvassers were given their prospect cards. Each worker was assigned to make four calls and to canvass a fellow worker as a practice call. The final workers' meeting was the "kick-off dinner" at which brief addresses were made by Bishop Frederick D. Goodwin of the diocese of Virginia, the clergy and the campaign leaders.

Most of the calls were made on a Sunday afternoon and that evening the workers reported to captains and division leaders who were assembled in the Parish Hall. Some follow-up was necessary for those who were not reached on the first day. When the campaign closed $108,000 had been pledged and the new Christ Church Memorial Parish Hall was assured.

How Parish Hall Was Planned

FOR many years the clergy and congregation of Christ Church have known of the need for a new parish hall. Three years ago their awareness of the need led the annual congregational meeting to ask the vestry to select a ways and means committee to plan and promote the building of a new and adequate parish hall. This committee was comprised of members of the vestry, representatives of all parish organizations, and experts in construction. They divided into sub-committees to study the needs of every phase of the parish life. Since only one appropriate building site was available in the churchyard, and the cost of adjoining property was prohibitive, it was very important that this building provide for the maximum needs of the parish in the foreseeable future. After six months of study the subcommittee pooled their findings. On the basis of this information, preliminary floor plans were drawn showing the proposed location of the various facilities and approximate dimensions.

These preliminary floor plans were then turned over to the architect, Mr. Milton L. Grigg of Charlottesville and Alexandria, Virginia, who used them as the basis for his preliminary drawings. The congregational meeting approved these plans in principle and they were then presented to all the various groups within the parish life, for specific suggestions and criticism. This was very helpful to the architect and the vestry in obtaining a better plan. Everyone in the congregation was then invited to a "last chance" meeting for the purpose of receiving all possible constructive criticism. Using the helpful suggestions which came out of this meeting, the architect drew the final plans.

Construction on the new building is well under way. The building committee is composed of Mr. Gardner L. Boothe, Mr. Erdman T. Stulz, Mr. Clarence J. Robinson, Colonel Presley M. Rixey, USMC, ret'd. and the Rev. B. B. Comer Lile, rector.

Gardening, God and Ourselves

By HUGH McCANDLESS

Rector of the Epiphany, New York

RELIGIOUS thoughts inspired by farm life run all through the Bible. The Jews had originally been a race of herdsmen without settled farms. When they settled in Palestine the change in their mode of living created a cultural and spiritual tension which made their religion one of the great religions of the world, although they were a very small nation and a poor one.

The message of the prophets and of some of the historians of the Jews might be summed up in the phrase "To the joy of the farmers' religion you must add the justice of the desert religion." Varied examples of this tension are numerous.

It has been said that the Bible is a book that begins with God walking in a garden in the cool of the day—the Garden of Eden—and ends in a city—the new Jerusalem in heaven. But the city it ends in is not a grimy mill town—"its gardens and its gallant walks continually are green, where grow such sweet and pleasant flowers as nowhere else are seen."

As we look about us the silent green life which surrounds us is telling us about the being who made it. It tells us about the quiet power of God. Life springs up everywhere, and its seemingly gentle force is irresistible.

Over there is an old rock. One would think nothing could grow on rock. But it is covered with a simple plant life called lichen. At the sides of the rock lichen has caught pine needles and bits of dust and straw and dead leaves, and so now even the grass has a foothold. Some day that rock will be covered with vegetation.

Even in the city, bits of dirt collect in the crevices of buildings, and sooner or later there is a bit of green in the most unlikely place.

The power of life is gentle, but it is indeed irresistible. You have all seen pictures of great rocks which have been split by saplings growing through them. Daffodils have been known to grow right through thin layers of asphalt. You know how soon paths become overgrown unless they are constantly tended. And time after time one must cut out trees if he wants to keep a view open. Otherwise everything is hidden with a veil of leaves. This shows the power of life, and the power of life is only a part of the power of God.

Revelation of Ourselves

ANOTHER revelation of God in gardening is really a revelation of ourselves. We like to create, we like to share in God's creation. That is why everyone likes to grow things, because it is one of our family likenesses with God our father.

Another revelation is in the mystery and complexity of life. Indian corn, for example, cannot go on living without the help of man. It cannot pollinate and reproduce itself. No one knows how it was that the people of Central America were able to domesticate some wild plant so that now it cannot live without its master. And yet great Mayan civilizations were built only on the wealth of corn fields, and no one knows the answer to the mystery.

A tree may seem a still and lifeless sort of thing when the air is still, and its branches do not move, and yet the tree is full of life coursing up and down its trunk. Each leaf is composed of thousands and thousands of minute square cells and each cell has at its edges a tiny waterway and little particles float continually around the cell. When you first see this under a microscope you can hardly believe your eyes.

Gardening also tells us some useful things about the growth of our own souls. One of these is the necessity for occasional destruction, if we want to create. If we want to grow flowers, we must uproot weeds. Even Albert Schweitzer, who carries "reverence for life" to an extreme point, describes himself as a mass murderer because as a doctor he must destroy many harmful germs. The gardener must destroy slugs and aphids and cutworms in order to create more useful life.

We must uproot and stamp out some things in our souls if we want better things to grow there. Life cannot always be merely the doing of things we want to do—sometimes we must weed out our desires and impulses.

Fertilizing a garden is no good unless you weed it too. And in the same way, our lives need not only opportunities to grow, but discipline in order to grow well.

Another thing we learn is the way weeds seem to imitate useful plants. Chickweed pretends it's carrots or marigolds, parsley can look very like petunias, portulaca, or nasturtiums!

Weeds are tough and versatile, and so are our sins. A bad temper can masquerade as a sense of justice; a mean streak cries out "Don't uproot me; I am a sense of humor." Laziness calls itself serenity, and idle curiosity sometimes claims to be friendly interest!

Another lesson is that the best and rarest plants take hard work. Petunias seem to jump up anywhere. But with a plant like Gerbera you have to prepare the soil for weeks. After trying to grow Gerbera you certainly get the point of our Lord's parable of the soils. (St. Matthew 13:3-23).

One last lesson was pointed out by Rudyard Kipling: "The best work a gardener does is done upon his knees."

Knock! Knock!

By PHILIP H. STEINMETZ
Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

PRAYER begins with God's knocking at our door rather than with our sending application for his favor. He shows us what is good and then we respond by seeking it. If God ceased seeking us, there would be no more prayer, just as there would be no color without light.

While it begins with God, prayer continues in our response. We have to answer the knock for a visit to take place. Otherwise all the caller can do is leave his card and go. We must drop what we are doing and answer and listen to God if we are to know real prayer.

Then things happen. We begin to learn that the big idea of life is not to be happy but to be devoted children of God. We slowly come to see how his children behave and we get a taste of the special joy he gives them. It is compounded of serenity and love. It is with us in suffering and through death. It eludes adequate description.

No one can keep it to himself. Immediately it pours out into action. It is like the heat you put into a pot of boiling water. There is no keeping it there. It has to escape in steam and, if there is food in the pot, into the delicious odors of cooking until the house and neighborhood is filled.

So God comes to us, knocking, flows into us and out through us into acts of service and praise, bringing with him joy and peace which last through the suffering and sorrow which are a part of every life.

Will you take time to answer the knocking at your door?

NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

DETROIT CONFERENCE URGES PEACE

The conference on the Church and war, held in Detroit and reported in The Witness last week, passed a number of timely resolutions on the closing day, May 11. The Churches were urged to completely repudiate war and "to repent their past involvements in the sins of national warfare." The Churches were urged to support demands for a U. N. world conference "to consider not only the outlawing of the atom and hydrogen bombs but to press for universal disarmament."

The statement declared that "Communist leaders have risen to power because they have linked their ideology with the drive for national freedom and economic betterment. A positive demonstration of Christianity in social and economic terms is the most effective answer to the appeal which Communism makes to desperate multitudes in all parts of the world."

In the economic area, the delegates favored a middle-way of private, public and cooperative ownership "which will embody both personal freedom and social justice, and which will incorporate the peaceful cooperative motive and method and eliminate the warring competitive motive and method which causes internal industrial conflicts and leads to international political conflict."

On civil liberties the statement declared that they must not "be abridged by legal or extra-legal measures such as special loyalty oaths, guilt by association, over-emphasis on secrecy, the chaining of scientific research to military ends, threats to academic freedom, Congressional immunity for unsubstantiated charges, or the attempt to proscribe political parties as such. Freedom for political and religious dissent and for the expression of unorthodox opinions must be protected both by laws and by an informed and courageous public opinion."

There were about 400 delegates, representing most of the Protestant Churches, attending the four-day conference.

RECOGNITION OF CHINA IS URGED BY MISSIONARIES

Early American recognition of China's Communist government was urged in a memorandum addressed to Secretary of State Acheson by 68 Protestant churchmen, most of them associated with mission work in China.

"Recognition of the People's Republic," the memorandum said, "would provide a way of carrying on relations between the United States and China without implying on the part of our country approval of the Chinese government's philosophy or ideology. This is in line with the principle already followed by our government in regard to certain other nations."

The churchmen declared that "reliable information indicates that a majority of American missionaries in China desire to have our country recognize the present government."

"It is evident that if the United States is to hold its place in Asia," the memorandum said, "we must be constantly aware of the longings and aspirations of the common people in all lands and shape our policy so as to aid in every proper way the fulfillment of these hopes. Recognition of the People's government of China would clearly show that the American government is not to be understood as opposing needed changes.

"Christian missions, which, in addition to evangelism, comprise a broad program of medical, educational, social and relief work," the memorandum went on, "operate within the framework of the People's Republic, but non-recognition tends to militate against the carrying on of such work by Americans."

Among the signers of the statement, which was also addressed to the chairmen of the Senate foreign relations committee and the House committee for foreign affairs, were Wynn C. Fairfield, secretary of the Foreign Missions Conference; Rowland Cross, secretary of the China committee of the FMC and J. W. Decker, a secretary of the International Missionary Council.

CHURCH-GOING STUDENTS FOUND MORE TOLERANT

A tendency for church-going college students to be more "democratic" than non-church-goers in their feelings toward other races is revealed in a survey just completed by two university psychologists. Several hundred students from Louisiana, Florida, and Alabama were studied by E. Terry Prothro, associate professor of psychology at the University of Tennessee, and John A. Jenson of the psychology staff at Alabama Polytechnic Institute. Purpose of the study was to determine whether there is any relationship between attitudes toward various minority groups and attitudes toward the Church.

The two psychologists found that there seems to be such a thing as an "anti-democratic personality." Students prejudiced toward one minority group were usually prejudiced toward another. Students favorable to one group were favorably disposed toward all.

The same attitudes are indicated among the minority groups themselves. A preliminary study of Negro college students suggests that church-goers tend to be more "democratic" toward whites and other races than those who stay away from church.

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

Christianity and Society. By Nels F. S. Ferre. Harpers. $3.75.

Nels Ferre has proved himself to be one of the most wide-ranging minds and one of the most devout thinkers among American Christians. This is the third volume in a series on Christian theology. It deals with the theological foundations of Christian social ethics. Ferre combines a radical Christian vision with unusual discrimination on concrete issues. He is drawn to both Christian pacifism and Christian socialism but he is not doctrinaire or absolutistic in discussing either. His theology is free from the tendency to emphasize discontinuities that is so common today and yet he recognizes real differences. He does justice to the level of creation which he identifies with "the Spirit of God" and to the level of redemption which he identifies with "the Holy Spirit." He seems to me to ignore some of the difficulties in relating Christian agape to the social order but he is moving toward a more realistic position on this matter. He has not made the reader's job an easy one but anyone who reads the fifth chapter on "The Distinctive Dimension of Christian Social Action" will come close to the heart of his thought and may be tempted to read the book as a whole.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

BISHOP PARDUE SPEAKS AT CIO CONVENTION

★ When the international convention of the CIO met in Atlantic City on May 10th, Bishop Austin Pardue of Pittsburgh gave the invocation and an address. Since becoming a bishop a little over six years ago Bishop Pardue has enjoyed close association with several CIO leaders, especially among the United Steel Workers. A great many communicants of the diocese of Pittsburgh are members of the CIO, and in a few instances the entire vestry of a church is made up of CIO members, or members of the United Mine Workers.

CHURCHES SPONSOR BENEFIT

★ St. Philip's, New York, joins with the Presbyterian Church of the Master in sponsoring a benefit theatre party at "Lost in the Stars" on Memorial Day. The musical, with its locale in South Africa, stars Todd Duncan, tenor, in the role of a South African Negro priest of the Episcopal Church. The money raised by the benefit will be used for youth work in the two churches, including its camps. St. Philip's maintains two camps, one at Burlington, Vt., and the other at Tunkhannock, Pa., where The Witness is published.

EAST CAROLINA HAS CONVENTION

★ The convention of the diocese of East Carolina was held at Christ Church, Elizabeth City, N. C., May 10-11. The Rev. Edgar R. Neff, field representative, explained to the delegates the expanded program of the National Council. The speaker at the convention service was the president of the University of the South, Boylston Green.

LARGE SCHOLARSHIP AT TRINITY

★ The largest scholarship bequest in the history of Trinity College, Hartford, exceeding $140,000, has been received from the estate of the late Rev. George M. Thompson. He was rector of Christ Church, Greenwich, Conn., from 1895 to 1924. The fund will provide ten full-tuition scholarships each year.

GLORIA DEI CHURCH CELEBRATES

★ Gloria Dei (Old Swedes) Church, Philadelphia, launches a year-long observation of the 250th anniversary of its church building with special services on June 4th. The historic building, oldest church in Pennsylvania, was built in 1700 on its present site, though the history of the parish dates back to 1642.

a clear agreement as to policies and procedures shall be made, and clergy and laity of the diocese shall be made available to assist.

It is hoped to make a minimum of four studies a year of dioceses or districts, and there will be provision for some local studies of cities, counties or small areas.

Mr. Wieland and the Rev. Clifford L. Samuelson head the administrative committee of the unit, the Rev. Almon R. Pepper and the Rev. Joseph G. Moore for urban and industrial; Pepper and the Rev. J. Arnold Purdie for social service institutions and parish social service; the Rev. Tollie L. Caution for Negro work, the Rev. Roger W. Blanchard for college work, and Miss Mildred Ashland as committee secretary. Assisting the field staff with the officers named, are the Rev. William B. Spofford Jr., and Mr. Samuel A. Lawrence, the Ven. Norman L. Foote, Prof. William V. Dennis, the Rev. Joseph W. Nicholson, and others.

CHURCH WORK AT POST CHAPEL

★ Bishop Goodrich R. Fenner of Kansas recently visited the post chapel at Fort Leavenworth, and returned filled with enthusiasm over the work our Church is doing among soldiers and civilians in that area.

Said the Bishop: "What an inspiring congregation! The church is always filled to overflowing and the choir under the direction of Miss Margaret Berry is always of the highest quality in presenting the music of the church. During the service, Chaplain Kenneth M. Sowers presented fifty-one persons for confirmation. The chaplain must conduct numerous services each week and direct the teachers and pupils of a church school that numbers about five hundred. After the service we went over to the Fort Leavenworth officers' club, where the newly confirmed and members of their families were entertained at dinner. There were one hundred and ten people who sat down to break bread. After the dinner, Chaplain Sowers called upon Lieut. General Eddy and me to make speeches. He introduced General Eddy as 'the leading communicant of the chapel,' and I should say he is, even though he entered an emphatic disclaimer."

ST. JOHN'S, STOCKTON CELEBRATES

★ St. John's, Stockton, Calif., marked its centennial May 4 at the concluding service of the synod of the Pacific, when 83 persons were confirmed simultaneously by five bishops at Bishop Walters' invitation: Campbell, suffragan of Los Angeles; Kinsolving of Arizona; Walters of San Joaquin; Rhea of Idaho; Gooden, retired of Los Angeles. The class was presented by Rector George F. Pratt.

Bishop Rhea was elected president of the province, succeeding Bishop Gooden.

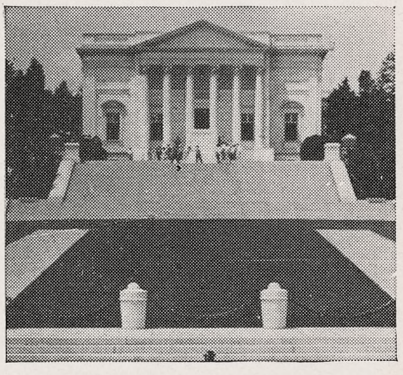
CONVENTION HELD AT FITCHBURG



★ The convention of the diocese of western Mass., was held May 17 at Christ Church, Fitchburg, with the Rev. A. Vincent Bennett the host. The preacher at the convention service was the head of the home department of the National Council, the Rev. George Wieland, and a missionary address was given during the session by Bishop Daniels of Montana.

CARILLONIC BELLS

Selected for National Evening Hymn Memorial Carillon at

ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY

"WHILE THESE BELLS RING, SAFELY REST. FREEDOM LIVES!"

So reads the Memorial Tablet commemorating this gift of a mighty electronic Carillon from the American Veterans of World War II to the people of the United States.

We, as the maker, are greatly honored that "Carillonic Bells" have been accepted by Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, The Congress, and other Government bodies for this soul-stirring memorial.

The ever-increasing number of "Carillonic Bell" instruments providing vibrant "Living Memorials" in churches, universities, and public locations throughout the world testify to the musical and mechanical superiority of this Schulmerich product.

Prices are amazingly low—No tower is required. For information, write . . .

PEOPLE

DEATHS:

MRS. MARY LILE ROGERS, widow of the Rev. E. Reinhold Rogers, died in St Petersburg, Florida on May 2nd, after an extended illness. The Rev. Dr. Rogers was for many years, the rector of the Boys Home, an institution of the diocese of Southwestern Virginia and the diocese of Southern Virginia located at Covington, Virginia. Before taking orders he had been a member of the faculty of the University of Virginia and headmaster of the Jefferson School in Charlottesville. Mrs. Rogers was born at Trinity, Alabama, and spent much of her early life in the home of her brother, Dr. William Minor Lile, dean of the law school at the University of Virginia. It was here that she met Dr. Rogers. She is survived by three sons, William Minor Lile Rogers of Marblehead, Mass., E. Reinhold Rogers Jr. of St. Petersburg, Florida and John Lile Rogers of Lynchburg, Virginia. The burial office for Mrs. Rogers was read in Charlottesville, Virginia on May 5th by her nephew, the Rev. B. B. Comer Lile, rector of Christ Church, Alexandria, Virginia.

ORDINATIONS:

GEORGE E. HAYNSWORTH was ordained priest May 10 by Bishop Carruthers at Holy Trinity, Ridgeland, S. C., where he is in charge. He also serves churches at Bluffton and Estill.

LAY WORKERS:

W. TED GANNAWAY has resigned as a member of the National Council since business requires him to move from the 4th province, which he represents. He was largely responsible for the presentation of the Church's program through laymen earlier this year.

CLERGY CHANGES:

H. R. COYKENDALL, formerly rector of St. Paul's, Hudson, Wis., is now assistant at Gethsemane, Minneapolis, Minn.

PAUL F. WILLIAMS, formerly vicar of Holy Communion, Liberty, N. Y., is now rector of St. Michael's, St. Michael's, Md.

JOHN J. McCARTHY, assistant at Tioga County Mission, diocese of Central, N. Y., is now a novice of the Order of the Holy Cross.

JOSIAH O. HOFFMAN JR., formerly rector of St. Luke's, Monrovia, Calif., is now vicar of St. Dunstan's, San Diego, Calif., and chaplain to Episcopal students at San Diego State College.

FREDERICK J. WARNECKE
Dean of Trinity Cathedral, Newark

The failure of the Church to raise the new budget so enthusiastically passed by General Convention should cause us to re-examine the bases of our Church giving. For the lack of success in the March 12th campaign cannot be ascribed either to general lack of assent throughout the Church to the new budget, nor to the department of promotion, nor even to our convenient scapegoat, the second province. The department of promotion went all out to provide materials, to train leadership, to make speakers available, and to implement the campaign. Failure nonetheless indicates once more that we have reached a dead end in the approach behind the every member canvass. In brief, that philosophy has been to insist that if we would educate the people of the Church in the needs of the Church, they would give to the budget.

But they haven't! Year after year, we have failed to meet the full proposed national budget, despite all kinds of education and promotional strategy.

I suggest that we turn to the Christian concept of stewardship. The process would then be straightforward and intimately connected with a man's personal religion. We would teach that every Christian is called upon by God to be a good steward of his time, of his talents and of his possessions. This demand is unrelated to parish budgets or missionary quotas. Every man personally has a responsibility to God to be a good steward.

This stewardship is, in part, fulfilled by proportionate giving of his income. The tithe is the traditional and biblical percentage. Why are we Episcopalians afraid to say this? Immediately it answers the question, How much should I give? We avoid the delusion of 'average' gifts. We solve the situation of a wealthy man in a small parish; as well as the need for the widow's mite.

Budgets would then be explained as reports of the stewardship of executives and leaders charged with expending our gifts. The great missionary work of the Church would be taught as the result of good stewardship, and not used as a lever to pry grudging gifts from reluctant people.

I have faith that if the Church taught Christian stewardship and tithing, far greater sums would be available for parishes, for dioceses and for the national Church. If Holy Scripture is not sufficient warrant for this, look at those Churches giving the largest gifts for missionary work! They are without exception those that have preferred to accept Christian stewardship and tithing to the tricks of modern advertising.

MRS. C. E. ROBERTS
Churchwoman of Dallas

Concerning "Morning Prayer in Modern English" (Witness, May 4) I fail to see any necessity for, or improvement in, Dean Warnecke's changes. Why is "schemes" better than "devices;" "fellowship of believers" better than "communion of saints"—to take two at random? If "redeemed with thy precious life" is better than "blood," will the communion service have to be changed to read, "this is my life?" The whole thing is so unnecessary.

Let the writer revise such hymns as "He who would valiant be" and "Once to every man and nation" and others. I smile to think of an Episcopal congregation "sharing the wretched crust." Why not revise Shakespeare?

I did enjoy "Life in a Wrecktory" by Mrs. Minifie and the letter in Backfire by James J. Joseph of Brooklyn. I also greatly enjoyed the adventures of Mr. Entwhistle and hope that there may be more to come.

Please Allow Two Weeks for Address Change, giving old and new address.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Episcopal Evangelicals Hold Meeting In St. Louis

Representatives of Twelve Dioceses Attend The Midwestern Conference

★ The Word and Sacraments" was the theme of the midwestern conference of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship held at the Church of St. Michael and St. George, St. Louis. The gathering was the first midwestern regional session since 1946.

Besides the clergy and many lay people from the diocese of Missouri, there were in attendance people from the dioceses of Arkansas, Chicago, Fond du Lac, Kentucky, Michigan, Ohio, Pittsburgh, Southern Ohio, Springfield, Tennessee and West Missouri.

Bishop Richard S. M. Emrich of Michigan, was the preacher at the opening service. He described the vocation of both Evangelical preaching and parish life as that of following the insight of John Wesley's view of his own ministry. He once described a sermon he preached as "I held Christ before them for three hours." Others taking part in the service were Bishop William Scarlett of Missouri; the Rev. R. Malcolm Ward, of Maumee, Ohio, secretary of the E.E.F.; the Rev. Augustine G. Jebaraj, of the United Church of South India; the Rev. Charles D. Kean, of Kirkwood, Mo., president of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship, and the Rev. J. Frank Sant, rector of St. Michael's.

Bishop Scarlett presided at the morning session on the following day, when the paper was presented by the Rev. Howard A. Johnson, professor of theology at the University of the South. Prof. Johnson said that "Because of our refusal to hear God's word of command we hear the word as condemnation. But in the Bible we also hear a word of promise. God's word is not only known as demand, but also as gift. God always supplies men with what he requires from them."

The discussion leaders were the Rev. Andrew E. F. Anderson, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Louisville, and the Rev. Oscar F. F. Seitz of Bexley.

The Rev. Charles F. Penniman of St. Louis, vice president of the E.E.F., presided at the afternoon session, when the paper was presented by the Rev. Clifford L. Stanley, professor of theology at the Virginia Theological Seminary. Professor Stanley said that "the Catholic age before the Reformation overemphasized the sacraments almost to the point of an exclusive emphasis." He saw a revival of the same tendency today. "I don't like the symbolism of a Church with a central altar around which all Church life flows, because it is deficient. In the early Church, the ambo was both pulpit and altar, and all Church life flowed around them both.

"The word was reintroduced at the Reformation, but Protestantism has tended to be as one-sided and ultimately as self-defeating as the Catholic age, by making the sacraments subserviant to the word, and products of it. The result is that modern man tends to be schizophrenic. He has sacraments in the Church and things outside. We cannot treat men as things on the outside and then go into the church and take bread and wine and make the body of Christ."

As a result of its double heritage, Stanley said, "The Anglican Church is like the child of divorced parents, who looks at both with love although they look at each other with hostility. And the effect is tragic."

Discussion leaders at this session were the Rev. John N. Hauser, rector of Christ Church, Springfield, Ill., and the Rev. Leonard F. Thornton Jr., director of the student YMCA at the University of Missouri.

Stanley was principal speaker at the dinner which concluded the conference. His subject was "Protestantism in America Today." Prof. Stanley said that the Reformation doctrine of "Justification by Faith" supplies the modern world what it needs in order to deal adequately with the problem of "an age where men are losing faith in their own selfhood, and where a society which has hoped too much now hopes too little."

The Rev. Augustine Jebaraj gave a report on conditions today in the United Church of South India today. Mr. Kean presided at the dinner.

INTER-COMMUNION URGED BY IRISH BISHOP

★ Bishop McCann of Connor told delegates to the general synod of the Anglican Church in Ireland that they were "in a rather paradoxical position" by voting for inter-communion with Old Catholics and refusing it to the United Church of South India.

DAVID RICHARDS ELECTED FOR ALBANY

★ The Rev. David Richards, assistant at St. George's, Schenectady, N. Y., was elected suffragan bishop of Albany at the convention held at Lake Placid, May 17. At the opening session that day the nominees who had previously been voted upon were withdrawn. Richards, who is not thirty until his next birthday, January 23, 1951, will have to wait until that date to be consecrated.

The election was deadlocked on the first eight ballots with the following clergymen receiving votes; Dean Kennedy of Albany; John Higgins of Providence; Allen Brown of Hudson, N. Y.; Bishop Viegeli of Haiti; H. Boardman Jones of Troy; Oliver Carberry of Albany; Michael Coleman of British Columbia; Charles Kennedy of Glens Falls, N. Y. Following the fifth ballot all names were withdrawn except Dean Kennedy and John Higgins. On the eighth ballot, with 96 clergy votes cast, and 49 needed to elect, Kennedy received 54 and Higgins 42. There were 72 lay votes, 37 being a majority, with Kennedy receiving 34 and Higgins 38. Bishop Barry therefore announced a postponement. The following morning only Richards was nominated.

In his address, Bishop Barry urged increased salaries for clergy, and asked for a committee to study diocesan organization which will make recommendations for any reorganization of diocesan affairs.

The Rev. Frederick Evenson of Gilbertsville proposed a canonical change to permit women on vestries, but the proposal was rejected.

Before the election of Richards as suffragan, the Rev. Frank L. Titus of the overseas department of the National Council, had told the delegates that Richards was to go as a missionary to Columbia, South America.

CONNECTICUT WILL HAVE SUFFRAGAN

★ Connecticut is to have a suffragan bishop, following the retirement next January of Bishop Budlong (Witness, May 25). Bishop Gray, in addressing the convention which met at Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, told of surveys being made in various areas for the possible establishment of new missions and he called for support of great opportunities for missionary work in the state.

CHOIR FESTIVAL IN ALBANY

★ Twenty-five choirs from churches throughout the diocese participated in a choir festival held May 20 at the cathedral in Albany. They sang under the direction of Everett Titcomb of Boston.

RECTOR RECEIVES AWARD

★ The Rev. Elden B. Mowers, rector of Grace Church, Detroit, was recently named the "distinguished alumnus" of Saginaw high school. The award has been made annually twelve times and this is the first time it went to a clergyman. His career was related by a student and included working with a road construction gang, wrestling, teaching, working with youth. It was in this way that he got his education, after which he served in the ministry in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Cuba and now back in his native Michigan.

DELAY ACTION ON WOMEN

★ The convention of Rhode Island, meeting in Providence, delayed action on a petition to General Convention which would so change the constitution as to permit women to serve as deputies. Two delegates expressed the fear that if capable women went to Convention, men would use it as an excuse to stay home. The resolution was tabled until next year.

Borrowing $37,000 for missionary projects was authorized, though the delegates set a $100,000 limit on borrowing for projects. The money authorized is for rectories and churches and for an expansion program which was launched three years ago.

DETROIT CHURCHES DEDICATED

★ Three recently completed buildings were dedicated in Michigan on May 14: St. Clement's, Inkster; St. Philip's and St. Stephen's, Detroit; St. Gabriel's, East Detroit. At Inkster the building is a parish house. The other two are churches, though the one at East Detroit will become a parish house when a new church, now planned, is built.

SPRINGFIELD HAS LARGER BUDGET

★ The diocese of Springfield at its synod in Pekin, Illinois, May 16 and 17, adopted the largest budget in its history for the coming year, $43,950. Of this amount $14,000 was voted to the National Council as an expectation for the missionary quota. This is more than triple the amount given three years ago.

Bishop Charles A. Clough, in his address, termed it "miraculous" that in the past year almost every one of the 43 parishes and missions reported many improvements to the material fabrics of their churches, rectories and other properties.

The Rev. E. Dargan Butt of Seabury-Western Seminary, was the speaker at the banquet. He called for increasing interest in and support of the town and country work of the Church.

SMEAR TACTICS DENOUNCED

★ Smear tactics in conducting Congressional investigations were condemned as a "violation of principles of American democracy" in a resolution passed by the convention of the diocese of Western Massachusetts, meeting at Fitchburg. The convention also went on record as opposing the exclusion of Russia from the United Nations. It recommended the release of surplus food supplies to needy areas at home and overseas and urged famine relief to China.

A recommendation that the United States grant de facto recognition to the Communist government of China was defeated by a close margin.

Resolutions opposing gambling, approving a study of pension plans for lay employees of parishes in the diocese, and favoring measures to combat racial discrimination were adopted.

The delegates voted to create a revolving fund to make loans or grants to parishes for building and capital improvements. Although no specific sum was named, it was suggested prior to the vote that the amount would total about $100,000.

In his annual address, Bishop W. Appleton Lawrence spoke of the "financial stringency" under which most clergymen operate and suggested that "an automobile is a required parish tool" and should be provided for in the parish budget.

BISHOP BOYNTON ACCEPTS

★ Bishop Charles F. Boynton of Puerto Rico has notified Bishop Gilbert that he accepts the election as suffragan bishop of New York.

COMMENCEMENT AT ST. AUGUSTINE'S

★ Langbourne M. Williams, layman of New York, gave the commencement address at St. Augustine's College, May 30th. The baccalaureate sermon was by the Rev. Henry J. C. Bowden, who is chaplain at the veterans' hospital, Tuskegee, Ala. There were 77 to receive degrees, largest in the history of the college.

MICHIGAN YOUTH MEETS

★ The convention of youth of the diocese of Michigan met at Saginaw, with two voting delegates from each of the 130 parishes and missions. Main speakers were the Rev. Charles D. Braidwood of Lapeer, who gave an address on "Storm troopers for Christ" at the banquet; Bishop Emrich and Bishop Hubbard.

CONFERENCE FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

★ Bishop Oliver Hart is to be the chaplain for the young people's conference, which will be held at Haverford College, June 25-July 1. The dean is the Rev. John Vander Horst. Bishop Armstrong and Bishop Remington are also members of a large faculty.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH CELEBRATES

★ Te Deum Laudemus was the theme of the services and events in the celebration of the centennial of St. Mark's Church, San Antonio, May 13-16. Five bishops who were former rectors of the parish were present. Bishop McKinstry of Delaware was preacher at the mid-day service on Sunday; Bishop Hunter of Wyoming at 9:30; the church was filled to overflowing at both services. Monday marked the twenty-fifth anniversary of the consecration to the episcopate of Bishop Huston of Olympia, now retired. He was the celebrant on that day at the corporate communion of the women of St. Mark's and speaker at the luncheon which followed.

Bishop Wright of East Carolina arrived just in time to be speaker at the banquet on Monday evening which was attended by a capacity crowd. The Rev. Harold C. Gosnell, rector of the parish, was toastmaster and a spirit of merriment mingled with seriousness throughout the evening. He read letters from many former assistants, and from boys of St. Mark's now in the ministry; from Bishop Juhan, once a choir boy there and from Mrs. Philip Cook, whose husband gave such great service to the parish in the past. Mrs. W. Bertrand Stevens, widow of the late Bishop of Los Angeles, beloved of St. Mark's, was present for all the events.

OPPOSE REVISION OF PRAYER BOOK

★ The convention of West Missouri adopted a resolution opposing revision of the Prayer Book. It states that "the controversial atmosphere which is heightened and emphasized during a period of revision" would cause "genuine distress among the laity." The expenses to parishes to purchase new books was also given as a reason for the opposition.

RACE RELATIONS IMPROVING

★ Charles P. Taft, Episcopalian, told the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church, meeting in Cincinnati, that steady and broad progress is being made in the matter of race relations in the United States. Contending that fewer and fewer people, even in the South, consider our situation as a caste system, Mr. Taft added that it is becoming "little more of a caste system than exists in many other situations not involving race at all."

E. WALTER CHATER RESIGNS

★ Rector E. Walter Chater has resigned as rector of Trinity, Fayetteville, N. Y., to become rector of All Saints, Harrison, N. Y. His resignation followed by two weeks the turning down by diocesan convention of the seating on his vestry of Mrs. Arthur Lambert, his former parish treasurer for some years. Mr. Chater had made the original ruling last January that Mrs. Lambert should be seated regardless of diocesan and Church canons, and had been a leader in the diocesan department of social relations move to force a change at the convention.

Since the convention, Mrs. Lambert announced to the press that she would continue "to sit and attend vestry meetings as I have done all year." The Central New York test case has been a very trying one for Mr. Chater, as his bishop, Malcolm E. Peabody, heads a national Church commission to investigate the status of women in the Church.

Vigorous efforts are reported to be planned to obtain Mrs. Lambert's resignation, and a diocesan lawyer said that "the coming of a new rector might clarify the situation, and she will resign in good faith." A spokesman for Mrs. Lambert said that the resignation of Mr. Chaters "was very sad, but the women of the church are in this fight to stay." Mr. Chater declined comment, saying only that "he was very happy to have accepted yesterday the Westchester County call."

OHIO WOMEN ASK FOR VOTE

★ Women of the diocese of Ohio, by a 3 to 1 vote at the Auxiliary meeting in Cleveland, May 24, urged that women be allowed to serve on vestries and as delegates to the diocesan convention. The resolution declared that "a fuller participation of women in the whole program and planning of the Church would increase its service" and that the Church has "vast opportunities for advance which can be fulfilled only by the truly united efforts of all its members."

JAPANESE-AMERICANS NOT SEGREGATED

★ The Church's work among the Japanese-Americans in Chicago was started in 1946 when Bishop Conking appointed the Rev. Joseph Kitagawa as chaplain to Japanese-Americans. As the relocated Japanese-Americans began to pour into the city, the first job of the chaplain was to interpret them and their new neighbors to each other. Every effort was made to avoid the development of "little Tokyos" and to integrate the newcomers into the normal parish life in the communities where they lived. At the same time the needs of the older generation, many of whom did not speak English, had to be met. For them services of holy communion in Japanese were held in several of the parishes.

It is estimated that today there are at least 17,000 Japanese-Americans who will become part of Chicago's permanent population. While the services in Japanese are being continued, the emphasis is on the work with the second and third generations. Among these are a large number of young people between 18 and 35, many of whom are unattached. To complicate the picture there are many young people who were born in America but who were visiting Japan before the war and were caught there.

Mr. Kitagawa in his report to the diocesan convention, said that to meet the needs of all these people is a rather large order. He expressed gratitude to the Church of the Redeemer, St. Paul's and St. Peter's Churches, Chicago, for their whole-hearted cooperation in welcoming the Japanese-Americans into the parish life.

Referring to the appointment of the Rev. Michael Yasutake as curate of St. Paul's, Mr. Kitagawa said: "As the rector and parish have made clear, Mr. Yasutake will be a regular clergyman, not confined to the work among Japanese-Americans. The fact that the Church is demonstrating a simple Christian act in this situation is impressing many persons of Japanese descent. Although many denominations claim they welcome Japanese-Americans, people just do not feel at home so long as they are regarded as guests, no matter how warm the welcome is."

He then contrasted the Episcopal Church's "Chicago-plan" of non-segregation with fact that there are already among Japanese-Americans in the city one Methodist, two Presbyterians, two Holiness, one Free-Methodist and two Congregational segregated church organizations.

CANADIANS URGE WOMEN DELEGATES

★ The executive committee of the synod of Toronto of the Church of England in Canada has issued a report urging that women should be eligible for election to synods, but not enough of them to outnumber the men.

THE REV. JOHN HOWARD MELISH sits for William Zorach, noted sculptor. The portrait, executed in clay, has been cast in plaster and is in process of being cast in bronze. Mr. Zorach is presenting it to the congregation of Holy Trinity Church, Brooklyn, as a gift in token of what the Rector's forty-six years' ministry has meant to the community. Tessim Zorach, son of the sculptor, is a vestryman of Holy Trinity ★ Dick French, president of the youth commission of Southwestern Virginia told the delegates at the annual meeting of the diocesan Auxiliary, meeting at Emmanuel, Bristol, of the work in colleges. Another headliner was an address by the Rev. Van Francis Garrett of Roanoke on the program of the National Council.

EXPANDED PROGRAM CONSIDERED

Bishop Phillips also gave an address in which he said: "What is needed to save our civilization from the destruction and the catastrophe of war is the generation of spiritual power to direct the lives of men and women. We know where we can get munitions and ships but where shall we find a spiritual reservoir unless in the churches of the land? Spiritual power can flow through the churches into the lives of men and women." "The great forces which we mustered during the last war, whether military or financial, were responses of individuals and if the Church is to meet its task of supplying spiritual power this must come from the individual."

INDIAN LAD ADOPTED

★ The Canterbury Club of Arizona State College has undertaken to sponsor a 14 year old Navajo boy who has been one of the "slave" shepherd children out near Tuba City. Tsosi, an orphan, was taken in by a family when he was small and has been herding sheep since he was big enough to go out with them. He was found by the supervisor in January. A horse had stepped on his foot and it was so infected he couldn't walk. He was skin and bones, and his eyes were very bad through malnutrition and filth. All the slave children get to eat is the leftover from the family meal. He is a ward of the Indian Service, by a court order, and is being sent to school for the first time in his life. $72 a year will buy his clothes and give him a bit of pocket money. This the Canterbury Club will raise through the Cafe Tsosi. They served supper in the parish house on the four Sundays in March. They were a success in every way, producing enough for two years for Tsosi. He has gained weight, has eyeglasses (though sight is very bad in one eye), is learning English—has been sent on to an off-reservation school for certain training, before going to his permanent one.

WITNESS GETS RESULTS

★ Some weeks ago a letter appeared in Backfire by William J. Barnds of Lincoln, Nebr., requesting photographs of several deceased bishops to complete his file. Attesting to the value of advertising in The Witness, he now reports that he has a complete set of pictures of all bishops of the Episcopal Church. He displayed his unique collection at the Nebraska convention, held in Kearney earlier this month.

DEMOCRACY PROMOTED IN WINSTON-SALEM

★ The Rev. James S. Cox, rector of St. Paul's, is the chairman of a committee appointed by the mayor to drive Communists from the city. The request for such a committee is said to have come from Negroes who warned that Communist agents were fomenting class hatred among Negroes. The 13-member committee, on which are four other clergymen, are asked to formulate methods of informing citizens of the dangers of Communism and of fighting its agents, reported to be at work in the city.

NO COMPETITION IS URGED

★ The Church "must not attempt to compete with other agencies for amusement and recreation" of the young people, Bishop Lauriston L. Scaife of Western New York declared in his annual message to the diocesan convention meeting at Buffalo.

"The YWCA, YMCA, Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts and other groups are better qualified to take over some aspects of the leisure time of our youth," Bishop Scaife said. "We must, however, insist upon Christian influence in the total life of our youth.

"Radio, moving pictures, television—these we must consider, not to dictate the programs or even attempt to put on programs of our own, but to influence the type of programs and material and subject matter, so some evidences of Christianity are to be seen and felt."

The bishop urged churchmen to "practice intolerance of everything that is opposed to Christianity."

TRYGVE LIE IS SUPPORTED

We Pray To a Person

THERE is a diagram which tries to clarify the doctrine of the Trinity. It represents a triangle, at the three points of which are three circles labeled "the Father," "the Son," and "the Holy Ghost." Along the sides of the triangle between these circles are the words, "is not" which is meant to show that the three persons are distinct. In the center of the triangle there is a large circle with the word "God" written in it. Short lines radiating from this to each of the outer circles each bear the single word "is," to show that each of the persons is God.

This tells a great deal to the man who would think this out. To the individual who wishes to pray, it sometimes seems to tell very little.

We must remember, however, that this diagram is merely the skeleton of our experience of the complex nature of the one God. God is greater than our doctrine, even our doctrine of the Holy Trinity. As St. Augustine said, "We say, three persons in one God—not because that phrase satisfies us, but because it is the best we can do."

Fortunately, the Church teaches us that we pray to the Father through the Son, and it is the Holy Ghost who helps us pray. "Through the Son" means that if we wish to have a picture of God we can do no better than imagine him as resembling God. The whole of the Gospel of John was written about this theme: "What is God like? Look at Jesus Christ and see."

We may try to imagine God less anthropomorphically—less in the image of a man—but the minute we try to imagine anything superpersonal we usually end up with something subpersonal. If we try to imagine God as a great reservoir of love, the nearest picture we get is that of a great reservoir of water, which is much less personal than a man. If we try to imagine him as a great force, the picture is usually like electricity or lightning, something sub-personal.

When we pray through Jesus Christ we are not afraid to picture a being with loving eyes, with loving hands, and the sympathy and experience of the life of Jesus Christ. Thus it is that St. Paul says, "Through Jesus Christ we have access to God." Each of us, in some way—in his own way—must echo that.

South India Chapel

Two years ago the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship undertook to raise $4,000 for a chapel for the Kerala United Theological Seminary of the Church of South India. This is the only theological school that teaches in the vernacular. As the school had been promised some gifts contingent upon their being able to raise additional funds, the authorities of the Church of South India felt that the most valuable help that the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship could give was to raise money for this chapel. Since then, the inflation has resulted in the cost of the chapel being increased to $4,500.

To date, the Fellowship has raised $3,000. Hence, $1,500 is still needed in order to complete the chapel. We hope that readers of this issue of The Witness who believe in the ecumenical movement, will be moved to make contribtions to help toward the completion of this chapel. Please send your checks to the treasurer of the Fellowship, Miss Elsie C. Hutton, 575 Park Avenue, New York 21, New York.

Layman Plus Clergy

THE department of promotion of the National Council intends to repeat and extend the training and sending out of key laymen to stimulate the annual every member canvass in the fall after the pattern followed this spring in the one world in Christ campaign. Since this latest effort to stimulate the missionary thinking and giving of the Church failed by a considerable margin in reaching the desired goal, even though notable increases were made, now is perhaps the time to share a typical letter received some weeks ago which may shed some light upon the less than 100 per cent response made by many parishes and dioceses.

"I wonder if you have been having these vestry meetings addressed by so-called key laymen on the one world in Christ campaign. As you probably know, each layman is given a little chart booklet which is stood up and each page flipped over as the layman talks. It is, I believe, a promotional method adapted by Mr. Gannway and committee—no doubt brought over directly from instructions to salesmen. I am hearing nothing these days but how frightfully boring these meetings are. One rector told me that after the meeting his senior warden was so mad that he, the rector, wrote to all of the vestrymen telling them how sorry he was to have dragged them out to such a dreadfully boring meeting. It took the key layman two hours to go through the dope and then he couldn't answer any of the simple questions that were asked. One layman, himself an advertising man, said, 'This is the technique used in getting people to change from Old Golds to Chesterfields.' One of the pages when flipped over simply says, 'The Episcopal Church is an institution.' The key layman read this in a very slow, impressive voice after everybody had read it. This made the meeting really exciting!"

The effort to train our laymen to spread the good news of the world-wide nature of the Christian enterprise is entirely proper. The men chosen for this task are to be commended for their efforts and obedience in doing as they were told. We raise the question, however, as to whether they were told enough. It is important to know the facts about the missions of the Episcopal Church, but it is vastly more important to be on fire with the spirit of missions given to us by the risen and ascended Christ. To communicate this spirit is the ministry to which all the clergy of the Church were ordained. If we fail in the missionary enterprise, it may be because we are asking our laymen to do that which the clergy ought to do—and have been trained to do.

We suggest, therefore, not that less effort be made to teach the laity the facts of Christian missions but that the clergy be re-converted to preach in season and out, the nature and reason for the Christian mission to the world, for lack of which we well may perish.

The Church of South India

By AUGUSTINE G. JEBARAJ

Presbyter of Diocese of Tinnevelly, United Church of South India

ON May 1, 1919, a group of fifty Christian leaders in South India, both lay and clergy, belonging to various denominations, met together at Tranqubar, a place of sacred memories to the Indian Church, since the first Protestant missionary work started there in 1706. The group consisted of one Englishman, Popley, and another, an American, Sherwood Eddy; the rest were Indians. They all had one great problem weighing heavily on their minds, namely, the division in the Church. They found that it was a great stumbling block to the propagation of the gospel. Non-Christians used to say to them, "You ask us to become Christians; but please tell us where Christ is. Is he in the Roman Church? Or, is he in the Episcopal Church, or Methodist Church, or Congregational Church, or Baptist Church? Where is he? Which is the true Church?" Thus the non-Christians were puzzled over the divisions within the Church. They could not understand why the Christians who preach about the same God, should go to different churches on Sundays. The Christian leaders who assembled at Tranqubar, felt sincerely that division in the Church was a great hindrance to the spread of Christianity. Therefore, in that conference they prayed, they searched the scriptures and discussed among themselves about this problem of disunion. They all felt that the spirit of God was urging them constantly to unite; but nobody knew how. At the close of the conference, thirty-three of them signed a manifesto which contained the following words:

"We face together the titanic task of the winning of India for Christ—one-fifth of the human race. Yet, confronted by such an overwhelming responsibility, we find ourselves rendered weak and relatively impotent by our unhappy divisions —divisions for which we were not responsible and which have been, as it were, imposed upon us from without, divisions which we did not create, and which we do not desire to perpetuate."

They then went on to propose a union on the basis of the four fundamentals laid down by the Lambeth Conference in 1888, known as the Lambeth Quadrilateral:

1) The Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, as containing all things necessary for salvation.

2) The Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed.

3) The two sacraments ordained by Christ himself—Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

4) The historic Episcopate, locally adopted.

On these main principles the union scheme was gradually built up. It took nearly three decades for the scheme to mature. Leaders belonging to the Anglican, Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational Churches constantly met, prayed, discussed and built up the scheme. The proposals were constantly referred to the parent missionary bodies as well as to the local churches for approval. Finally, on September 27, 1947, the union of the three major denominations, namely, the Anglicans, the Methodists and the South India United Church (Presbyterians and Congregationalists), was inaugurated, uniting thereby

1,000,000 Christians under one Church, called the Church of South India. Besides the five existing Anglican bishops, nine more bishops were consecrated to preside over the fourteen dioceses of the newly formed Church.

Sixteen years ago, I was ordained a priest of the Church in India, according to the Anglican rites. Since then, I have served in the diocese of Tinnevelly in South India, as a parish priest for seven years, as a lecturer in a theological college for five years, as the superintendent of evangelistic work for a year, and as bishop's chaplain for one year. Two years ago I was deputed by the diocese to study social sciences in Bombay. Last year, I was offered a fellowship by the Chicago Theological Seminary, which enabled me to come to the United States and study in the University of Chicago. With the knowledge and experience that I gather here in the United States, I intend to go back to India about the end of this year, and do my best, under the guidance of God, to help build up the Church in South India.

Church Is Progressing

I HAVE constantly been asked the questions "How is the united Church in South India? Is it progressing?" I can answer these questions in no better way than by quoting the impressions of the Bishop of Chichester, who paid a visit to South India very recently. In his diocesan leaflet for January, 1950, Bishop Bell writes: " . . . I am deeply impressed by the whole spirit and courage of that Church. The Church of South India as a whole presents a picture of remarkable concord, faith and stability. It is very much alive, and wisely and finely led. The episcopal, presbyteral, and congregational factors (to use the terms of an early Lambeth joint report) are all in their proper place. The new bishops (all of whom I saw) quite obviously commend the episcopal order to their flocks, and those who beforehand were confident that Indian Christians would welcome episcopacy and respond to the shepherding of fathers in God, are abundantly justified. I say this without hesitation, both of the bishops individually and of the bishops as a corporate body."

One serious financial consequence of the union, however, has very badly affected certain sections of the Churches which formerly belonged to the Anglican communion. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, one of the missionary bodies, which was supporting the work of the Anglican Church in South India, has stopped her grants to the extent of 15,000 pounds a year. The Bishop of Chichester, in his diocesan leaflet, continued: " . . . nearly the whole of the money which S. P. G. used to give for work in South India, a total sum of 15,000 pounds has been withdrawn, because of the union, and this in spite of the fact that the Lambeth Conference of 1930 encouraged the union, and the general council of the Church of India, Burma and Ceylon agreed to the union. Moreover the grants were withdrawn in a single stroke, at very short notice. This is a heavy blow. And, as some of the ex-S. P. G. missionaries put it to me, it strikes at exactly the type of Anglican churchmanship which S. P. G. seeks to support! Imagine the consequences for the clergy and laity, the schools, colleges, hospitals, and orphanages affected! Where are they to find the 15,000 pounds which they need so badly? S. P. G. has indeed expressed its readiness to receive gifts in a 'separate account' from those who desire to send them. But by October 31, only 3,000 pounds had been received in this way. Unless the work which S. P. G. used to support gets the indispensable 15,000 pounds it will cease, and from every point of view that would be a calamity. Therefore, I beg those in this diocese who are in sympathy with the Church of South India and do not want the Anglican contribution to be badly crippled, to give what they can afford, and send it now."

The Archbishops of Canterbury and York, in their statement regarding the former S. P. G. work in South India, have concluded by saying: "Unless the Church of England is prepared to fill this gap and also to maintain its former supply of missionaries and workers, its influence in the growth of the new Church will be greatly weakened."

But in spite of the financial and other problems that faced the infant Church, the gains made during the first two years of the life of the Church of South India are highly encouraging. The coming together of the different groups has given greater impetus to all activities of the Churches. Distrust and envy between Christians has largely given way to whole-hearted teamwork. The union of these three bodies in South India, has evoked a great desire in other church groups for union either among their own separated sections or in wider union. As the biennial report concludes, "The Church of South India is, in the providence of God, in a peculiarly happy and privileged position to give the word of God to the people of a new India. At the same time it is set as a glowing light calling on Christians all over the world to unite together and attain to that unity in Christ Jesus which is the will of God for his Church."

South India Church Grows Together

By GARDINER M. DAY
Rector of Christ Church, Cambridge

IN September, 1947, the Methodist, Congregational and Presbyterian Churches, together with four dioceses of the Church of India, Burma and Ceylon (Church of England in India) united to form the Church of South India (C. S. I.) The union of these Churches and their development is of the greatest significance because it was the first time that a union has been consummated which bridged the chasm between Episcopal and non-Episcopal Churches. Consequently, the Christian Church all over the world has been watching the development of the Church of South India with enormous interest and concern. Christians everywhere are eager for news as to how the diverse elements in the Church are getting along. Is intimate fellowship helping them to grow together or is it breeding contempt? We are happy to say the former is true. The different Churches involved in the union, on the whole, have been steadily growing in understanding and appreciation of one another through the union.

After the first general synod of the Church, Bishop Michael Hollis, the moderator of the Church and a former Anglican bishop, observed that there was a remarkable absence of any backward looking attitude such as might have been present so soon after union and on no major issue was opinion divided along lines of previous denominational affiliation. "We were truly united," Bishop Hollis said, "and the determination not to take decisions by weight of numbers but to show consideration for minorities and to reach agreement was most encouraging." Instead of decreasing, this spirit of unity has increased in the two and a half years of the Church's life. Bishop Bell of Chichester recently visited the C.S.I. as the official emissary of the convocations of Canterbury and York of the Church of England and in a most interesting account of his visit, for which we are indebted to The Living Church of February 26th, Bishop Bell says of his meeting with the Bishops of the C.S.I.: "Here was no joint committee of representatives of different denominations sitting together. I had a profound impression of bishops of the Church of God taking counsel as fathers in God; devout, modest, wise, and able, conscious of their pastoral responsibility for the whole C.S.I., and fully alive to the spiritual significance of episcopacy. There was no doubt of their recognition of 'the special responsibilities of the bishops for the safeguarding and formulation of doctrine' . . . I have said nothing so far about the orthodoxy of the Church. But as I reflect on my own close contact with its leaders, the wonder is that it should ever have been doubted."

Then Bishop Bell concludes his article with the following significant paragraph: "Three things made the main abiding impression on my mind: The reality and vitality of the Church as a Church, that is as 'part of the One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church, confessing the historic faith of the Church and seeking to proclaim that faith throughout South India'; second, its evangelistic enthusiasm; and third, the genuineness of the desire, frequently expressed, that the links with the Anglican Communion may be preserved and strengthened, and that the Anglican tradition may play its due part in these formative years of the Church's life."

Surely, not even the most ardent proponents of the union could have hoped that a visiting Bishop two and a half years after the inauguration of the C.S.I. would be able to speak in more encouraging terms.

Nandyal

OF course, the United Church has faced some severe difficulties. Indeed, one can hardly imagine four different Churches coming together with entire unanimity. One association of the Congregational Church did not enter the union and in the diocese of Dornakal the archdeaconry of Nandyal decided not to join the union. The archdeaconry consists of Anglican missions almost entirely supported by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (S.P.G.). A grant of 10,000 pounds from the S.P.G. which supports the work of the Nandyal archdeaconry is still being paid by the S.P.G. treasury. As Bishop Bell remarked, "The availability of this large sum to continuing Anglicans, but not of course to those who have thrown in their lot with the C.S.I., cannot be disregarded as an element in the general picture. Even so, half the Indian clergy support the C.S.I." This is quite in contrast to the attitude of the Congregational board of commission of foreign missions who decided that the grants of money should be given to the majority of Congregationalists who joined the union and not to the minority which insisted upon remaining outside. Unfortunately, as yet, no successful way of resolving the tension in the Nandyal area has been achieved.

To understand the second difficulty, and the most severe difficulty which the C.S.I. has had to endure, one has to be aware of the fact that the missionary work of the Church of England, unlike that of our own Church, is not carried on by a central official Church organization but by twelve voluntary societies, the largest of which are the Church Missionary Society (C.M.S.) and the S.P.G. The C.M.S. promised before the union to give, and have given, full moral and economic support to their missionaries who decided to throw their lot in with the United Church.

By January, 1947, four Anglican dioceses had not only received the encouragement of Lambeth and of the special Derby commission appointed by the Archbishop to study the plan but also had received the consent of the Church of India, Burma and Ceylon (C.I.B.C.) to enter the union. Four months after the decision had been made and four months before the inauguration was to take place, the governing board of the S.P.G., its standing committee, meeting in London, voted that the S.P.G. could not support its missionaries who entered the union nor continue the grants amounting to about 20,000 pounds to the C.S.I. This decision was made despite the strong plea of twenty-four of its own missionaries that they were taking the step in the belief that the union was being formed under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and that the action was for them the will of God as far as they could discern it. The S.P.G. finally agreed to continue the grants and salary payments for one year beyond the date of the inauguration. This actually resulted in the Anglicans entering the union as the "poor relations" in the United Church. They entered, as far as the S.P.G. work was concerned, with their personnel and their property but without the financial support they had been receiving after the first year. Hence, one of the first acts of the executive council of the Church of South India two days after the inauguration was to institute a thanksgiving fund for the union and appeal to all those interested in Christian unity to make contributions to the fund. The S.P.G. also set up a separate account to which its members interested in South India could give under very restricted conditions.

The result of this has been that during 1948 a large part of the Anglican work was supported by the S.P.G. special one year grant, while the work during 1949 was supported through special gifts to the thanksgiving fund and the separate account. But as the year 1949 drew to a close it was evident that these special funds had run dry. Consequently, in November, the bishops of the various dioceses received word from the treasurer of the C.S.I. that they would have to plan their budgets for 1950 on the basis of a two-thirds cut in their funds coming from England. This meant about 15,000 pounds or approximately $45,000. Bishop Newbigin stated, and his situation was typical, "We in this diocese can only meet this situation by closing down all the medical work (a fine 100 bed hospital and training school) and dismissing all our S.P.G. missionaries, or else dismissing two or three missionaries and dismissing a number of clergy and other Indian workers. Whatever is done, it would be a crippling blow to the work of the ex-Anglican work of the diocese."

Response in Time of Crisis

AN appeal was immediately made to Church authorities in England and in the United States in the hope that part of this sum, or about 5,000 pounds, might be raised from friends in England and 10,000 pounds from friends in the United States. An appeal in England was made by the Archbishop of Canterbury and a vigorous campaign was carried on by the Church of England Newspaper and Record. In this country Bishop Hobson in the diocese of Southern Ohio came magnificently to the rescue with an immediate gift of slightly over $7,000 toward the 1950 budget of the C.S.I. And in February of this year $15,000 was allocated from the unexpended balance of the 1949 Presiding Bishop's Fund for the C.S.I. plus $5,000 toward the continuing Anglicans in the archdeaconry of Nandyal. We can all rejoice and thank God for this aid to the C.S.I. in this critical emergency. If this experiment in the reunion of the Churches fails because of internal dissension, we might well conclude that the path of the C.S.I. was not the true path to reunion, but if it fails because of the withdrawal of financial support upon the part of one missionary society in one of the parent Churches, it would certainly not be a fair test of the union. Surely, not even those who do not believe in the C.S.I. would desire that it fail because of lack of funds, and particularly funds which it normally would have expected to receive.

C.S.I. and Anglicans

IT will be remembered that while the bishops of the Anglican Communion meeting at Lambeth, 1948, were not able to agree to give full recognition to the C.S.I., a majority of the bishops rejoiced that they were able "here and now to accept the C.S.I. as a living part of the One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church of Christ" and "to recognize bishops and presbyters consecrated or ordained in the C.S.I. as true bishops and presbyters in the Church of Christ." Owing to the lack of unanimity, however, the recognition of the C.S.I. was left up to the various provinces of the Anglican Communion.

There is reason for profound thankfulness that the C.I.B.C., the nearest province of the Anglican Communion to the C.S.I. and that to which the four Anglican dioceses formerly belonged, has recently accepted the position of the majority of the bishops of the Lambeth Conference, in recognizing the bishops, presbyters and deacons consecrated or ordained in the C.S.I. at or after the inauguration of the Church as true bishops, presbyters and deacons in the Church of Christ. While restrictions imposed by the C.I.B.C. in its relations with the C.S.I. leave much to be desired, nevertheless, in the words of the C.S.I., the C.I.B.C. has taken "a great step forward toward fellowship with them."

The houses of convocation of the Church of England have set up a commission to guide them in the forthcoming discussions of the relation of the Church of England with the C.S.I. Surely, it is to be hoped that the Church of England will follow the lead of the C.I.B.C. in accepting the position of the majority of bishops at Lambeth and recognizing the C.S.I. as part of the One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church. Let us similarly hope that at the General Convention in 1952 our own Church may formally accept the position of the majority of the bishops at the Lambeth Conference and enter into full communion with the C.S.I.

The Lambeth Hexagonal

THIS article would be a most incomplete account of the relation between the Anglican Communion and the C.S.I. if we did not mention the fact that in the past few weeks a formal reply has been made by the synod of the C.S.I. to the six questions concerning the C.S.I. originally raised by the "Derby commission" of theologians appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury in 1946 and reaffirmed by Lambeth in 1948. These six questions have been popularly dubbed the "Lambeth Hexagonal." The questions related to (1) the faith of the Church, (2) the sacraments, (3) confirmation, (4) the authority of the bishops, (5) the relation of the C.S.I. to other Churches not episcopally ordered, and (6) the status of non-episcopally ordained ministers in the C.S.I.

Summarized very briefly, the C.S.I. reaffirms its acceptance of the historic faith of the Church and of the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, and its belief that it has safeguarded the sacraments by insisting upon the celebration of Holy Communion only by ordained presbyters (in some Churches previous to union, laymen had been allowed to celebrate Communion). The C.S.I. declares that Confirmation, while not mandatory, is being increasingly used; that the responsibilities of the bishops for safeguarding and formulating doctrine are already recognized and that to open the question of synodical procedure and the authority of the bishops at this time would be a grave mistake. The C.S.I. reaffirms its desire to be permanently in full communion and fellowship with all Churches with which its constituted groups have had communion and fellowship in the past and that "it is not conceivable that in any reasonably foreseeable circumstances the C.S.I. should break off relationships with those parent Churches with which it now enjoys unrestricted fellowship." Finally, it gives a number of good reasons why further decisions relative to the status of non-episcopally ordained ministers in the Church should not be made until the end of the thirty year interim period, for this was part of the original agreement upon the basis of which the union was consummated.

We may close this article by quoting the magnificent words of one paragraph in the reply of the C.S.I. to the Lambeth Hexagonal:

"We are united in one Church; our parent Churches are divided. If it is now insisted that we state what our permanent relation with them is to be, we can only say that we can be content with nothing except that they should be united as we are. So long as they remain divided our position must remain anomalous from the point of view of any one of the divided Churches. But from the point of view of the historic faith of the Church we must surely judge that the real anomaly, the real scandal, is that the Church should be divided. We have promised at the end of thirty years to give equal weight to two principles; that our own ministry shall be one and that we shall maintain and extend full communion with our parent Churches. As things stand, these two principles are irreconcilable. They can only be reconciled when the parent Churches now divided are united. Our act of union is an act of faith in the Holy Spirit that he will bring this about. We cannot therefore say more than the constitution has said about what our successors will do in circumstances which we pray may be profoundly different from those in which we now are."

TODAY'S NEED

Evangelical Movement Today

By CHARLES D. KEAN
President of Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship

Copyright 2020. Archives of the Episcopal Church / DFMS. Permission required for reuse and publication.

THE Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship conceives of itself as bearing witness to what Paul Tillich calls "The Protestant Principle" in the life of the Protestant Episcopal Church. This principle is a permanent and abiding element of New Testament Christianity, without which the Christian faith ceases to be truly Christian and without which the Church becomes merely a more-or-less effectively organized group of people within history.

The Protestant principle is not an abstraction by any means. Yet it is hard to appreciate its significance except in the course of facing particular problems in the life of the organized Church. But no particular issue is itself the embodiment of the principle. It is merely the occasion for our rediscovery of its pertinence in our lives.

When Evangelicals are conscious of the underlying Protestant principle, they realize that more important than Church unity is our motivation in seeking it. That is not to say that the reunion of Christendom is not something to be earnestly desired and worked for. But it is to say that by our willingness to work for unity, we are prepared to subject everything about our own ecclesiastical life to the judgment of the living Christ —our own group's traditional liberalism as much as our Church's traditional institutionalism.

When Evangelicals are conscious of the underlying Protestant principle, they realize that our concern for the United Church of South India has deeper implications than simply the fortunes, important as they may be, of one particular experiment in our own day. Our concern stems primarily from our awareness that the spirit of Christ calls us to risk the institutional security of the organized Church in order that the gospel may be proclaimed to 20th century situations. And the risk involves not simply the possible loss of things which we do not hold as dearly to start with as those who are not equally persuaded of the value of the South India experiment. It involves our willingness to risk our own flexibility in order that the new brotherhood may have some stability.

"The Protestant principle contains the divine and human protest against any absolute claim made for a relative reality, even if this claim is made by a Protestant Church. The Protestant principle is the judge of every religious and cultural reality, including the religion and culture which calls itself 'Protestant'" (Paul Tillich, "The Protestant Era," p. 163).

The Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship stands for this principle in the life of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and finds it the motivation for participation in the struggle to accomplish particular things at particular times. But the principle is more important than the particular issues, and this must be made continually clear even when we engage wholeheartedly and without reservation in the battle for some immediate objective.

Because the ritual accoutrements and the traditional titles associated with what is called Anglo-Catholicism suggests placing the ongoing Church above criticism, these must be opposed, but the issue is not really one of ritual or nomenclature. Neither does it lead necessarily to conflict with those whose customs and manners, while different from what we are accustomed to, do not betoken any real denial of the Protestant principle in their own lives and work. As a matter of fact, a profound evangelicalism must be opposed to rigid low churchmanship on precisely the same grounds and again find that differences in liturgical habits mean little to those who share the same faith, for while those differ in essentials these differences symbolize a wall of partition.

The Evangelical movement in the Episcopal Church tends to crystallize on the eve of General Conventions around pragmatic issues— such as the election of particular people to particular offices or the enactment of certain legislation. While these issues rally men and women together, they also tend to becloud the centrality of the Protestant principle. Therefore, it is important to use the relative calm of the first year of a new triennium to focus our thinking on basic things so as to be able to distinguish between the immediate situation and the underlying faith.

Basic Things

PRAGMATIC issues within history are never so completely clear-cut as to embody unequivocally something as basic as the Protestant principle. Yet pragmatic issues demand that men and women decide and take their stands, even though the problem may be somewhat confused and somewhat at cross-purposes with their real interests. To postpone decision because the issue is not in ideal form is tantamount to making a negative decision. Part of the application of the Protestant principle in the practical affairs of the life of the Church involves the willingness to risk our theoretical purity in order that the Episcopal Church may meet an immediate question and keep on moving.

But during the first year of a new triennium, these pragmatic issues have yet to arise, and we can turn to basic things without running the risk of ivory tower detachment. We may use this period to sharpen our own consciousness of the fact that the Evangelical movement as just described is the 20th century embodiment of the Anglican Reformation, and stands today for what is truly central Anglicanism — not central in terms of compromise between extremes, but central in terms of the mainstream current of a river.

Probably one of the most fortunate and accidental coincidences in the life of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship was the coupling of the two addresses at the dinner of the past General Convention. Bishop Stephen Neill's paper "The Spirit of Evangelicalism" points to the underlying issue of faith, and Bishop Norman Nash's paper, "Evangelical Faith in Action" points to the pragmatic issues in which the faith must be applied. (Both papers are available at $5.00 per hundred copies from the E.E.F. secretary, 303 East Wayne Street, Maumee, Ohio).

Evangelical faith without reference to concrete problems tends to become abstract. People of diverse commitments may unite in loyalty to it, and remain united as long as they are not called upon to act. Evangelical action without reference to the principle becomes abstract, too. People may again unite here without giving the necessary thought to what they are doing and why they are doing it under the judgment of the gospel. But together they make the Evangelical movement a real movement—embodying the Protestant principle and also engaging in real issues.

America's Task

By WILLIAM SCARLETT

The Bishop of Missouri

IT is a curious day in which we live, a day in which this great and powerful nation seems to have a very bad case of nerves. And to peoples abroad this might seem to indicate a loss of faith over here, a loss of faith in ourselves, in our principles, in our institutions. And just in a day when we have every reason in the world to have the greatest confidence in ourselves, in the basic principles which underlie this democracy, especially when we consider the alternative which Russian imperialism offers to the world. But democracy needs defense in depth, someone has said. And apparently this is what we lack. And it is this which religion can supply. For the great principles by which this democracy was created stem from the great Jewish-Christian tradition. These principles are kept alive by this tradition. But severed from their roots they wither.

Much has crept into American life which is not in accord with these principles. Perhaps our shakiness, our nerves, stem from these contradictions between our profession and our deeds. We are strong only as we are just, only as equal justice undergirds our institutions, only as we recognize that we are members one of another, and that if one group, one class, suffers from injustice, sooner or later we shall all suffer with them.

It is to be hoped that we can quickly recover our peace of mind, close our ranks and get on with the main business which is the creation in this country of a richer, fuller life of equal opportunity for all our people and the assisting of the undeveloped peoples abroad to achieve a better life. We now live in a world where anyone should be able to see clearly that in order to save ourselves we shall have to save others also, and that this great and prosperous nation must lead the way toward a better world for all peoples if we ourselves would live.

The Big Lie

By JOHN ELLIS LARGE

Rector of the Heavenly Rest, New York

THE big lie! That headline should be spread across the front pages of our newspapers, now that President Truman has officially asked for a world-wide "crusade for truth." The Big Lie is the big news of this generation.

I'm not talking about folk-tales, such as the ones about the fabled Paul Bunyan and his fabulous blue ox. Tall tales are the gallant coinage of adventurous men symbolizing free enterprise. They are woven into the fabric of every forward-looking nation, and literary history would be the poorer without them.

And even though I've always resented the great hoax perpetually being perpetrated in the marijuana-dreams of America's ad men, I'm not talking about that kind of Big Lie either. True, the Chrysler Corporation has lately been spieling a type of doubletalk which is outlandish even in the Never-Never-Land of advertising. If a man wants to be taken in by goobledogook about cars which are paradoxically "narrower on the outside and wider on the inside, and higher on the inside and lower on the outside"—that's up to him. The worst that can happen to him is that he can have his intelligence insulted by the neatest trick of the year.

The Big Lie that I am talking about was shrewdly defined by Hitler when he frankly said, "In the size of the lie there is always contained a certain factor of credibility . . . since the large masses of people will more easily fall victim to a great lie than to a small one." It's the old idea of "throw enough mud and some of it is bound to stick." Throw enough exaggeration around on a wide enough front, and a grain of truth will show up. But when the barrage of muck comes thick and fast enough, everybody is almost hopelessly mired, and truth and falsehood are woefully confused.

Senator McCarthy has diabolically learned this Hitlerian technique of The Big Lie. I don't know whether he's out to ruin Truman, Acheson & Co., or simply to glorify McCarthy. But the Christian morality involved in separating truth from falsehood has seldom been so fantastically skipped as in McCarthy's indiscriminate mudslinging.

How dare we rail indignantly against Hitler in the immediate past—or against Stalin and Vishinsky in the immediate present—as long as we have men like McCarthy around? And how do we know where we stand when even a man of Senator Taft's integrity eggs McCarthy on to greater and wider mudslinging, in the hope that one wild charge will accidentally hit the target? Even the finest of men have a weak spot in their armor, but it's a sad day for the Congressional scene when self-seeking politicians will try to sabotage our foreign policy on that premise.

Laughter, in the face of absurdity, is a therapeutic exercise. And nothing will topple McCarthy faster than the sight of the American people laughing him out of court. Thank God, the sound of that laughter is already being heard throughout the land in a rising crescendo. May it echo splittingly in the ears of one Senator McCarthy? His intended victim, Owen Lattimore, may or may not be a Communist—but McCarthy still needs to learn the futility of The Big Lie!

THE BIBLE AND MODERN BELIEF

By LOUIS WALLIS

Bishop Francis J. McConnell, of the Methodist Church, writes as follows about this new book by Louis Wallis, The Bible and Modern Belief:

It captured and captivated me from the first paragraph. I don't know when I have read a book in which reason and imagination, learning and insight, discernment of facts, and power to reproduce historic tendencies have been so convincingly shown as working together. It has been a positive delight to read the book. Mr. Wallis has thrown light not only into obscure corners but over vast landscapes.

Not only are all the essentials of religion conserved, but the book shows that the moral and spiritual values of the Bible are enhanced by the new and relentless form of scientific criticism which is now being introduced into theological teaching. The Bible and Modern Belief shows for the first time what scholars have suspected—that "the Tabernacle in the Wilderness" is a priestly fiction. It emphasizes that the ancient Hebrew people never had a Bible; that the Hebrew nation passed out of existence, leaving only a single remnant, the tribe of Judah, from which is derived the name Jew; and that the foundations of our Bible were laid by Judaic scribes, working in the Babylonian Captivity and after.

With religion being constantly attacked by atheistic forces, as it is today, it is imperative that Christians understand their Bible; and it is only through knowledge of the origin and sources of this Bible that complete understanding can be achieved.

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

Early Christians of the 21st Century. By Chad Walsh. Harper. $2.00.

A professor of English at Beloit College has written a very interesting little book in two parts. Part one briefly characterizes certain aspects of contemporary western civilization which, according to the author, have all the ear marks of disintegration and impending death; part two prophesies the civilization of the next century as it might be if the Church were to make its proper impact on society now and in the immediate future. Here Mr. Walsh describes the following as they might exist in a "Christian" society: the individual, the "underloved," the nations, the family, education, the arts, and the Church.

The author claims to have no illusions as to the possibilities for good that exist in a "fallen" world. He often mentions original sin and so quite rightly never identifies a Christian society with the Kingdom of God; so that even in a twenty-first century in which Christian principles are brought to dominate all areas of life, there will still be imperfections, selfishness, injustice, suffering, etc. The significant thing would be that these would all exist to a lesser degree than they do now. The author tries to be realistic in this respect, but it does not appear to this reviewer that he altogether succeeds.

The book is far more important if taken as a judgment on present society than if read as a prediction of a future society. For as a prognosticator, the author is subject to the inherent limitations of all men who predict, viz., the impossibility ever to foretell the activity of God. History being a combination of both human freedom and divine necessity, no man can peer even into the next day—not to speak of the next century—and foretell its happenings with any assurance; and any such attempt is futile.

But that does not mean that what Mr. Walsh has to say about the twenty-first century becomes irrelevant. Far from it, what he says condemns our civilization and should spur Christians on to demand of themselves and of their institutions what Christian principles have always demanded. The book is valuable for its illumination of what the Church demands in various specific areas of life—in education, family life, asylums, factories, etc. The author dares to apply Biblical teachings and the implications of orthodox Christian doctrine to these institutions and relationships. He acknowledges that the applications he makes are not absolute—that there would be differences of opinion with regard both to the interpretation of the teachings and to their application—but he commits himself anyway and so opens up the possibility for discussion of concrete situations.

This is exactly, it seems to me, what Christians must do if the Church is to remain true to its Lord and if the teachings of the Church are to be any more than museum pieces. While one might not agree with everything Mr. Walsh says, one must commend him for having spoken; and the reviewer must commend him for having spoken, in the main, so well. — Burton H. Throckmorton.

The Church of England in the Twentieth Century, Vol. II (1919-1939). By Roger Lloyd. Longmans. $4.

In the 315 pages of this book, Canon Lloyd of Winchester has compacted an extraordinary amount of detail and yet a widely interesting account of the life and work of the Church of England in the critical years from the end of the First World War to the beginning of the Second. Disenchantment in the Nineteen-Twenties, Theological Principle in the Daily Life of the Church, the Church of England and the Social Order, the Search for Christian Unity—these are some of the chief subjects reviewed in the ten chapters. It is a hopeful and optimistic book, because with full recognition of the difficulties of the times, it nevertheless emphasizes the quiet pastoral work of the Church with community problems and, above all, what Canon Lloyd believes to be a submergence of ecclesiastic partisanship in the new devotion to the meaning and mission of the whole Church.—W. Russell Bowie.

Enroll in Support of These Principles

THE EPISCOPAL EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP PROVIDES A MEANS BY WHICH PROGRESSIVE LAYMEN AND CLERGY CAN TAKE POSITIVE STEPS IN BRINGING MORE VIGOROUS LIFE TO THE CHURCH. THE FELLOWSHIP INVITES TO MEMBERSHIP ALL WHO VALUE THE PROTESTANT NATURE OF OUR COMMUNION EQUALLY WITH ITS CATHOLIC HERITAGE AND DESIRE TO SHARE IN ADVENTUROUS ACTION UNDER THE GUIDANCE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

Some E.E.F. Objectives

To witness to the Gospel by interpreting it in contemporary terms and applying Christian ethical principles to every sphere of personal and social life.

To preserve permanently for our Church the positive principles of the Reformation and to provide encouragement, counsel and help to all seeking to forward the cause of Evangelical Christianity in faith, ethics and practice.

To uphold the doctrine, discipline and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church as set forth in its Book of Common Prayer, the Articles of Religion, and the Constitutions and Canons.

To further understanding and cooperation with other Christian Churches and to promote the cause of organic union, whenever possible, but particularly at this time with our sister reformed Churches.

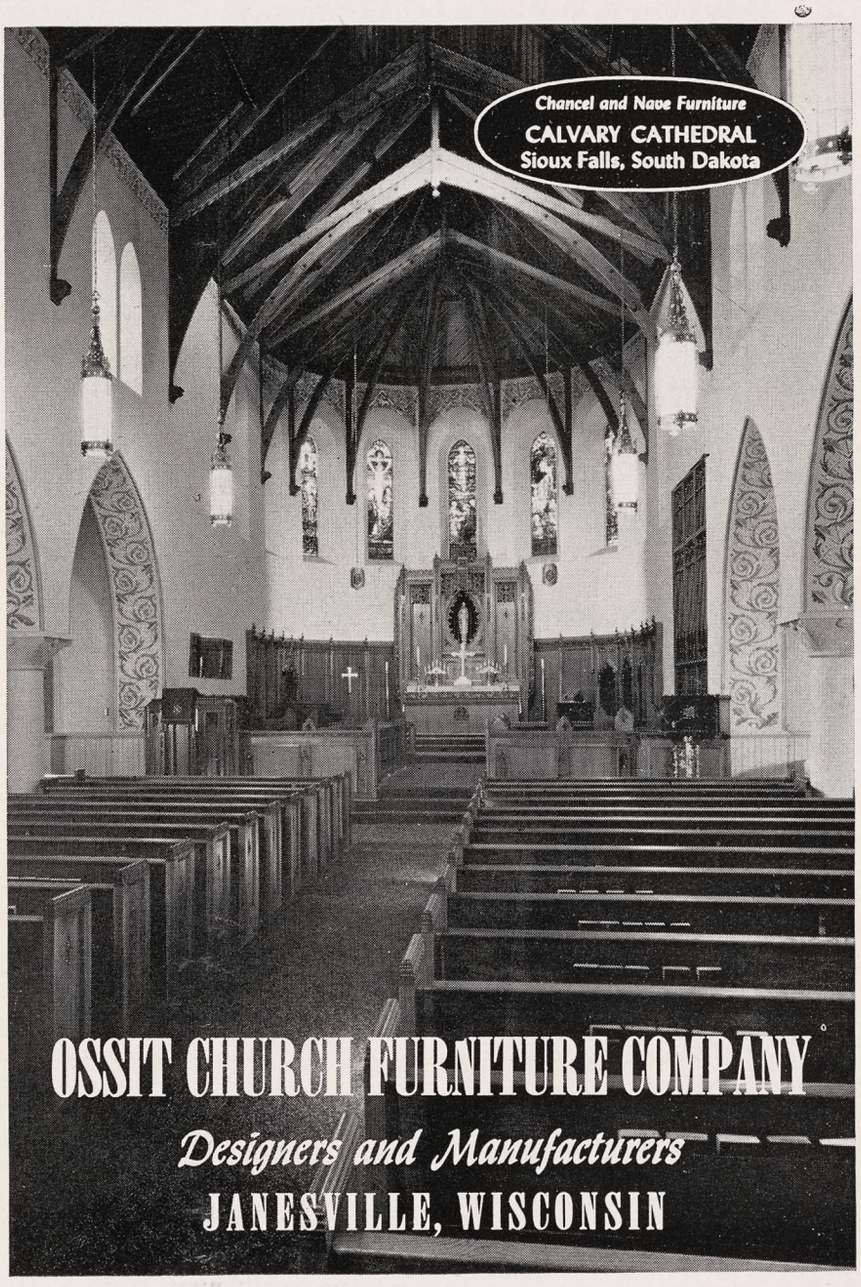
Youth of the Church



By JOHN BOOTY
Ex-Chairman of the National Youth Commission

IT is too easy for American youth and their leaders to forget that they are part of a world community. And time and time again Episcopalian youth forget their fellows in the Anglican communion. One of the youth leaders in the United Movement of the Church's Youth who has constantly striven to broaden our viewpoint as a movement is Bill Stringfellow, Episcopalian delegate to the Oslo Conference 1947, former member of the national youth commission and former chairman of the United Student Christian Council of the United States. Bill is now a student at the London School of Economics, continuing on the road toward becoming a Christian politician. When the national youth commission met in February, Bill sent us a letter from England. It is so good, providing so much challenge and so much good food for thought that I am turning the rest of this column over to quotations from this letter. Remember as you read that Bill has been one of the potent influences in the development of our movement. Bill writes:

"It has been my good fortune while I have been in England to attend some of the meetings of the Inter-Church Youth Fellowship—an unofficial ecumenical youth group springing from the enthusiasm with which British youth returned from Oslo and Amsterdam. The fellowship is entirely a youth affair and is now beginning to have an influence of national scope. What has impressed me most about this is that those who make up the national committee are young leaders from the various denominational youth movements in England who in fact have no articulate role in the affairs of their various Churches. All of the British Churches simply do not have national youth commissions —simply do not recognize the essential and distinctive contribution which youth themselves have to make to Christian youth work. And so it has been necessary for those among the Christian youth of England who have ecumenical insight and imagination to form themselves for the time being—as a group without official recognition of the Churches. Now this of course is unfortunate, but my inclination is to feel that it is a severe indictment of the British Churches and their conception of youth work and that there is cause for genuine thanksgiving that our fellow Christian young people in England have seized the initiative on the ecumenical frontier.

"My purpose in telling you of the national youth commission of this is threefold: it should help us to appreciate more fully the responsibility which our Church has placed upon us in the commission for Episcopal youth work; it should demonstrate what has been the repeated experience of Christendom in the past century—that Christian youth have rendered leadership which has been not only significant but unique in the Church and that when the Church is negligent, or obtuse, or reactionary, or secular there is occasion for Christian youth to speak with honesty and out of love to the rest of the community of believers regarding the Church's oversights, or failures, or sins. And moreover, what happens today in England is in some degree the result of the knowledge which young Christians here have of our struggles and experience in the American Christian youth enterprise. What you . . . do and decide at the present . . . can provide support and encouragement and indeed at least indirect leadership for Christian young people in England and elsewhere.

"I hasten to make clear that the situation which I have described in England is not one of antagonism between the new fellowship and the Churches. These relationships are most cordial, but the denominational leaders responsible for youth work are even today afflicted with the notion that Christian youth work can be carried out without the responsible leadership and participation of young Christians themselves. Time, and wise initiative on the part of those hearty souls who have launched, with a conviction so deep that it is a compulsion, the Inter-Church Youth Fellowship will remove, I trust, this affliction.

"I should add that the problem of the role of youth in determining youth work and service in the Church of England is outstandingly difficult, and much more distressing than in any other denomination in England, at least in my observation. It is a thing of particular concern to us in the United Movement of the Church's Youth—or should be so—that Anglican youth and students have no voice or responsibility in the Church of England youth council of significance.

"The problem in the Church of England is so acute that I am persuaded to offer the suggestion to the national youth commission that it advance the proposal that at each Anglican world laymen's congress (as proposed by Lambeth) there should also be convened an Anglican world youth conference. (Note: the commission went on record as supporting this and is urging that it be done. J. B.) Such an event would help considerably to give Anglican youth the opportunity to learn from one another of their problems and differences, and on the whole, strengthen Anglican youth work around the globe and thus make more enduring the Anglican youth contribution to the ecumenical movement on the youth level.

"Remember that you occupy a position of responsibility which few of your contemporaries in other parts of the world do. Remember that Christian youth, and particularly Anglican young people, around the world look to you for leadership and imagination and insight. Remember that in you is something of a reflection of the Church as it is to be—as a force in society—in the years to come. But remember before all else that he watches you—that he, in fact, is with you."

OVERSEAS NEWS

CLASH ON EUTHANASIA IN ENGLAND

The Archbishop of Canterbury and Dean Mathews of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, are at odds over voluntary euthanasia. The dean in a recent public address said that "love and compassion should lead intelligent Christian people to support voluntary euthanasia." This prompted a statement from Archbishop Fisher expressing strong disagreement with the dean's views.

YOUTH CONFERENCE IN AUSTRIA

Religion's place in social, political and economic life was stressed at a conference of youth held at Villach, Austria, attended by 58 delegates from 14 countries. Speakers described Church youth movements as having "hardening of the arteries" and being "too old fashioned" to serve the needs of modern youth. Edith Sewell, social worker of London, said that young people have two basic questions; sex and religion. Many, she said, avoid the Church which they regard as a "spoiler of fun."

ASKS SCOTS TO RETURN CATHEDRALS

Presbyterians of Scotland have been requested to return cathedrals to the Roman Catholic Church. Oliver Brown, non-Catholic, questioned the right of Presbyterians to retain churches and abbeys taken during the Reformation.

MRS. CLARENCE PARKER
Churchwoman of Chicago

The May 4th "Witness" gives hopes that "an angel" will make it possible for our Church to be on the air again. I wish to suggest that the committee in charge consider presenting Dorothy Sayers' "The Man Born To Be King."

Since a season's broadcast is usually in 13 units, while "The Man Born To Be King" consists of only 12 episodes, one period remains to be disposed of by the sponsor — announcement, explanations, etc. Or, it seems highly possible that Miss Sayers would prepare an additional episode if that were desired here.

Merely reading the book of these dramatic episodes on the life of our Lord is a soul-shaking experience. The matter presented is completely and easily understandable. What might such a series on the air mean to the people of the Church as well as the many who have little if anything to do with religion?

ROBERT B. CAMPBELL
Rector, Ascension, Hickory, N. C.

Thank you for the wonderful presentation of our work here at Ascension Church, Hickory (Witness, May 11). We are, indeed, most grateful. It so happened that the date of this issue coincided with our diocesan convention and my birthday, making it a red letter week for our parish in every way. We are hearing from places far and near; friends who have gone into many distant places, as a result of the wide circulation of The Witness.

WALTER MITCHELL
Retired Bishop of Arizona

I have a notion and an idea. Many a time you have told me, (sorrowing) that my notion at that moment was no good; but here is one with an idea attached and if it works, it should make money for a lot of people, including yourself—if you will cooperate and print this letter.

I am not a radio fan but every so often do endure listening to some "commercial," using the most unconscionable lies in the effort to sell their product. We are solemnly told that their tooth paste, or tobacco or soap or whatever has some new ingredient which makes all the difference in the world. Now, I have an idea and a notion that perhaps we can sell still another new ingredient to one or two or all such advertisers.

"HARMONIOPETHETHROPHEEL," Is that not a knock-out for a name? The new ingredient? I have not the sligh-test idea of what it is, which is where you come in. (Not that you are so much smarter than I am that I think you could supply the ingredient), but if you do your part properly, maybe some of those top scientists in the employ of some one of the many enterprises of the Du-Ponts might become interested and produce the ingredient. Of course, you and I would expect to be reimbursed handsomely. If they became difficult we could threaten to tell their bishop on them and that would make them behave.

Apply it to toothpaste. This ingredient would tune up the gums, hence the Harmonio part of the name; the "pet" would petrify the teeth, (put dentists right out of business, you see); the ingredients would heat up the entire body—thus the "het" and all of it would certainly make the user feel good. Why, for all we know, in addition to putting the dentists out of business it might even do away with the Church and all of us ministers. Think of the vested rights done away with there!

With this help you can easily go on and work out the reasons why this ingredient would do wonders for tobacco, soap, liquor, and goodness knows what else. And it would be as truthful as lot of present day advertising. What more should one want?

STORY OF THE WEEK

Fletcher Urges Foreign Policy Based On Christianity

He Speaks at Both Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, And St. Martin's Forum, New York

★ "The will of God is the will for peace" was the theme of two addresses made in New York by the Rev. Joseph F. Fletcher on May 28th. The professor of social ethics at the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, had just returned from Australia where he had been a headliner at a series of peace meetings sponsored by the peace council of that country. He also visited Jojokarta, capital of Java, where he met with leading Indonesian officials.

His first address was at the Whitsunday service at Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, and the second was before a capacity audience at the last of the Spring forums at St. Martin's, New York.

"As Christians we are expected to work for peace in a spirit of obedience," Fletcher declared. "We must ignore the attempts of the powers-that-be to make peace a dirty word."

Telling of a stewardess on the plane out, who took a third world war for granted, which neither she nor her brothers wanted, Dr. Fletcher said, "What a shocking expression of the evil mallaise that has gripped our times—this loss of faith in the democratic process. Christians must labor unceasingly to speak in the face of the powers of darkness, to advance the word 'peace' and to awaken the only viable principle of faith —the ability of the common people to control the actions of their leaders."

"Most western peoples," continued Fletcher, "have learned through their political associations, trade unions, churches and corporate efforts to make demands for minimum requirements of livelihood in domestic affairs. They must now learn that these will be all converted into sheer futility if they do not also demand minimum standards of life and death in foreign affairs."

"A foreign policy to earn democratic approval," he said, "must satisfy three conditions. First, it must offer a reasonable hope of maintaining the peace. To the Christian, peace is not just the absence of war; it is the presence of justice. Second, it must offer a decent cause worth serving. Our policy now presents us with havoc if the cold war should stop. Our whole economy is coming to be based on it. Through our military expenditures we are using the familiar pump-priming device of the New Deal days to keep a wobbling economy alive. The U. S. Journal of Commerce says frankly, 'Only an improved international situation can dim the business outlook.' U. S. colonial expansion is being used as a safety valve for American industry. This entire program is in direct conflict with the principles of the Christian ethic as well as human intelligence. It is no cause morally worth serving. Third, an acceptable foreign policy must at least offer a sporting chance to win a war, if we ever have to go to war. Yet the scientists tell us that atomic war means genocide and mutual suicide. Even the Red Cross has informed the capitals of the world that in the next war it must be counted out because under present conditions of war it can no longer function."

"On the other side of the world," said Dr. Fletcher, "I found that people who speak for peace are getting the same treatment that they get here. All over Australia the things we said were distorted in the newspapers. When I asked a representative of the Australian broadcasting system why this was so, he replied, "I cannot answer without being disloyal to my employer."

"A prominent clergyman in Melbourne said he was all for peace but asked how could he work with communists as a Christian, since they were humanists. It is not a question of cooperation," Dr. Fletcher said was his reply, "but the far deeper principle of Christian reconciliation. Jesus said, 'Love them that hate you.' Only that deeper ethic can overwhelm the secularism and lack of faith in masses of the people around the world who are utterly disillusioned by the hypocrisy and lack of creative leadership of the Christian fellowship. Anglo-American officials denounce our opposition to the cold war as a 'peace offensive.' Among Christians, the struggle for peace, both as a means and as an end, can never be an offensive ideal."

"How terrible it was," he continued, "for me as an academician to hear professors at the University of Melbourne, for example, speak of the same spirit of fear among intellectu-

A. C. U. DENOUNCES TWO BISHOPS

Proposals have been made that the House of Bishops investigate alleged breaches of Church doctrine by the bishops of New Hampshire and Washington, D. C., it was made known by the American Church Union. It charges that Bishop Charles F. Hall of New Hampshire violated "the doctrine, discipline and worship" of the communion by taking part in a "joint ordination" with a Presbyterian and a Congregational minister at Manchester, N. H., on April 24.

BISHOP HALL

It also announced that the Maryland branch of the clerical union for the maintenance and defense of Catholic principles has called on the House of Bishops to investigate the action of Bishop Angus Dun of Washington in "having denominational ministers (Lutheran and Congregational clergymen) officiate" at an Episcopalian service on Ash Wednesday. The group said Bishop Dun also invited "all Christian ministers of Washington, except those of the Roman Church, to 'join with us . . . by receiving Holy Communion'."

The Church Union condemned the action of Bishop Hall as "presumptuous, mischievous and irregular" and added that it was "the most flagrant breach of the Church's doctrine and discipline yet committed in the Episcopal Church throughout its history."

The Maryland group asserted that Bishop Dun's action "constitutes a flagrant disregard of the doctrine and discipline of this Church, a serious affront to thousands of loyal churchmen, and direct violations of the canons of the Church and the rubrics of the Book of Common Prayer."

Clergymen of New Hampshire have come to the defense of Bishop Hall. One of the first to speak was the Rev. Bradford Young where the ordination service was held. Affirming his "enthusiastic support" of Bishop Hall, Mr. Young lauded him for "his forward-looking act in permitting ministers and priests of other communions to be invited to take part in the ordination of the Rev. Marc A. Nocerino."

"The American Church Union," he said, "has shown its ignorance in calling this (the joint ordination service) 'unprecedented'."

"It is safe to predict," he added, "that neither the Presiding Bishop, Henry Knox Sherrill, nor the House of Bishops will give any more weight to this proposal of the Union than they have to similar attacks on other bishops in the past. Since ordination is to a universal ministry, it is appropriate that ministers in other branches of the universal Church should participate."

The Rev. John Henrickson, minister of Westminster Presbyterian Church, Manchester, who took part in the service, also praised Bishop Hall for his stand in the matter. "I think what Bishop Hall did was a very significant action in terms of recognizing the universal brotherhood of all Christians," he stated. "It is my personal opinion that in this step here and in everything else Bishop Hall represents a forward-looking and courageous leadership in the Episcopal Church. I was very happy to have participated in the service. In my experience it was the most impressive and meaningful service that I have witnessed."

The other clergyman referred to in the American Church Union resolution was the Rev. Whitney S. K. Yeaple of Concord, executive secretary of the New Hampshire Council of Churches and Religious Education who officiates at Sunday services at the Hillsborough, N. H., Congregational Church. Explaining that he was speaking as secretary of the council, Dr. Yeaple said he "enthusiastically supports Bishop Hall."

RECTOR SUPPLIES COUGH DROPS

★ The Rev. Clayton Melling, rector of All Saints, Johnson City, N. Y., is broadcasting the services there this month and last. He therefore gave a suggestion to his congregation in the parish bulletin: "Programs that sound good over the air are 'radiogenic,' and that word can certainly be used for All Saints last Sunday. The music was beautiful and both the choir and the congregation came through magnificently in making the service effective.—We could have improved matters slightly by muffling our coughs. Coughing over the radio creates the same effect as you get in the seal house at the zoo. Your rector has placed a box of cough drops in every pew this morning. If you get in trouble use them."

★ Stuart Hall, Staunton, Virginia, now in its 107th year, is one of the oldest schools for girls in the South. Behind the school lies a wealth of the best in Southern tradition. Within its walls have been educated many of the outstanding women of the country. Bishop William Meade and General Robert E. Lee, as well as a long line of prominent clergy and laity, have served as members of the board of trustees. The school of today is an outstanding college preparatory school, its graduates taking their places successfully in the leading colleges of the country. The plant is completely up to date, modern academic building, well equipped laboratories and library. A tiled indoor pool and thoroughly modern gymnasium and athletic field make practically all sports possible. The school is accredited by the State Board and the Southern Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools.

HONORARY DEGREES AT GENERAL

★ Doctorates were conferred upon the following at the commencement of the General Seminary: Bishop Armstrong of Pennsylvania; Bishop Quin of Texas; Bishop Street of Chicago; Bishop Vaill of Japan; Bishop Welles of West Missouri; the Rev. John Huess; the Rev. Albert J. M. Wilson; Dean Claude Sprouse; the Rev. Vincent F. Pottle.

There were eighteen men in the graduating class, representing thirteen dioceses.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA HOLD COUNCIL

★ Emmanuel, Covington, was host to the council of the diocese of Southwestern Virginia, May 23-24, at which Bishop Bentley of the overseas division was the headliner. Resolutions were adopted favoring the inclusion of lay workers in the social security set-up. An expense budget of $21,238 was passed; together with a missionary budget of $62,794. In addition $6,500 was voted for the building fund of St. James, Roanoke, a newly organized church.

OLYMPIA HOLDS CONVENTION

★ The convention of Olympia was held at St. Mark's, Seattle, with Bishop Bayne reporting excellent progress in every department of diocesan activities. A budget of $90,000 was adopted for 1951. Bishop Bentley, head of overseas division, and Bishop Yashiro of Japan were the speakers at the convention dinner.

PHOTOGRAPHER is photographed. Bishop Campbell of Los Angeles was just getting ready to sprint into place in order to get in his own picture when he was snapped by the Rev. Albert Jenkins of Whittier.

ST. MARTIN'S HAS BIG DAY

★ At St. Martin's Church, New York, ceremonies were held on June 5th in connection with the memorial carillon in the belfry of the church. A bronze tablet containing the names of 87 deceased members and friends of the church and a parchment scroll with 158 names was unveiled. These are the persons in whose memory the bells were given. The carillon was dedicated last December by Bishop Gilbert.

In the afternoon Kamiel Lefevere played the 2nd portion of his dedicatory recital. A student of the late Jef Denyn of Mechelin, Belgium, Dr. Lefevere has been decorated by the Belgians for his work in the field of carillon music.

Preceding the carillon recital there was a parade from the 32nd police precinct to the church. The police band of the City of New York led the parade. Participating were a number of high ranking police officials, the St. George Association, national guard units, fraternal organizations along with several hundred church members.

Preceding the carillon recital, the police glee club sang a number of selections.

The rector of St. Martin's, the Rev. John H. Johnson, is chaplain of the New York police, and in that capacity was the speaker at a meeting of the St. George Association held the previous Sunday at the Waldorf-Astoria.

CHILDREN PRESENT OFFERING

★ An estimated 3,000 children of the diocese of New York presented their missionary offering to Bishop Gilbert on May 27 at a colorful service at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. A vested choir of 1,000 in many hued vestments carrying banners marched around the Close and were reviewed by the bishop. The total offering was over $38,000.

FOREIGN POLICY—

als in Australia as in America, and to have them call it 'the American Thought Control Pattern'."

"Government officials in Indonesia told us that they and their people will have no truck with any policy that seeks to divide the world, or that smears every attempt of peoples' movements to achieve some independence and advancement for themselves. Our present foreign policy will succeed with no people on earth except the American people, whom many in Indonesia referred to as the most politically illiterate people in the world today."

"What a denial of the American democratic pretensions," concluded Dr. Fletcher, "when our U. N. representatives refuse to seat in the U. N. delegates from the largest body of people on earth! The Bible says, What a man sows, that shall he reap. It is equally true of nations. America today is sowing fear, hatred, militarism, discrimination, exploitation. These seeds will bear suitable fruit. People everywhere look on the United States as a great country, to which 150 years ago freedom-loving people fled to escape landlords, ecclesiastics and generals. Today it is fast becoming the country to which the landlords, the ecclesiastics and the generals flee to get away from the wrath of the people who are rising throughout the rest of the world."

GOES TO LIBERIA AS DOCTOR

★ Dr. Anna C. Jones, a resident of surgery at St. Agnes Hospital, Raleigh, N. C., is to go to Liberia next month to serve as a doctor under Bishop Harris. St. Philip's Church, New York, is to hold a dinner June 8th to raise $1,800 for her salary. She is a communicant of the parish.

ONE COLLEGE TO ANOTHER

★ It is not often that students and faculty of one college raises money for another. Hobart and William Smith Colleges however have contributed $250 to the restoration of the dormitory at Kenyon, destroyed by fire.

MEMORIAL DAY IN PARIS

★ The Memorial Day service was held in the American Pro-Cathedral Church of the Holy Trinity, 23 avenue George V, Paris, May 30th, conducted by Dean Sturgis L. Riddle. The Hon. David K. E. Bruce, Ambassador to France, presented three memorial flags to hang in the cathedral: the flag of the Episcopal Church, and the flags of the States of Minnesota and Wyoming. A distinguished congregation of high ranking diplomats, officials and clergy, American, French, British and others filled the cathedral. Following the service, the band of the Republican Guard led the congregation up the Champs Elysees to the Arc de Triomphe, where Ambassador Bruce laid a wreath on the tomb of the unknown soldier.

CALIFORNIA HAS LAYMEN'S RALLY

★ The first laymen's rally of the Priest Fellowship of California was held May 21 at the Good Shepherd, Belmont, with more than fifty attending. A similar meeting will be held in September looking toward the organization of a diocesan unit of the American Church Union. The speakers at this first meeting were Walter G. Swanson of San Francisco, who told of his "rich religious experience resulting from his first confession;" and Paul Brindel of Novato who urged a program of "Catholic action" in the diocese.

BISHOP J. T. HEISTAND REPORTS PROGRESS

★ Bishop Heistand, in his address to the convention of Harrisburg, meeting at St. James, Lancaster, May 23-24, reported progress as evidenced by increased church attendance, larger confirmation classes and the fact that fifteen men are now in seminaries. He also commented on the training of church school teachers in school of religion in the diocese, and the training also of lay leaders.

Dean John W. Suter of the Washington Cathedral was the banquet speaker and described the work of the liturgical commission and told of proposed revisions of the Prayer Book.

A committee was appointed to study and work out plans for a campaign to raise $350,000 in the next three years for advanced work in the diocese.

ARCHBISHOP STRESSES FREEDOM

★ Archbishop Philip Carrington of Quebec praised "the democracy present in the Anglican Church" in preaching to about 10,000 attending a service marking the centenary of the diocese of Montreal. "We represent a strange appearance sometimes with our modernist bishops and our Communist deans, but at least nobody can say that thought and speech are not free in the Anglican Church."

The service, held May 28th, featured a choir of 1,032 voices from 53 parishes of the diocese.

LOS ANGELES HAS LARGE OFFERING

★ The church school offering of Los Angeles, presented to Bishop Bloy at a service held in the bowl at Hollywood, reached a record total of $17,280. It is to be applied toward the diocese's $113,126 pledge to the general Church program.

Sharing Our Treasures

TWO bishops of our Church, Angus Dun of Washington and Charles Hall of New Hampshire, are being vigorously censured by some of their brethren. Bishop Dun's fault, it seems, was inviting Protestant ministers to take part in a Communion service in the Washington Cathedral. Bishop Hall's was permitting Protestant ministers to join in the laying on of hands in an ordination service in Manchester. Both men are being taken to task for breaking Prayer Book rubrics and acting contrary to the doctrine, discipline and worship of this Church.

We challenge the charge that the faith and practice of the Protestant Episcopal Church have been compromised or violated either in Washington or New Hampshire. Both services were entirely in the words and according to the intention of the Book of Common Prayer. Nothing was omitted or subtracted. Bishop Hall and episcopally ordained priests of this Church did make and ordain a new priest in the traditional manner. The fact that otherwise ordained ministers of Christ added their blessing in no way detracts from or contravenes the carrying out of the rubrical directions in the ordinal. Bishop and priests of this communion did lay hands on the candidate's head even as the Prayer Book prescribes. Did the addition of a Presbyterian or Congregational hand contaminate or nullify the work of the Holy Spirit? We think not. Was anything lost or given up of this Church's faith and order? We think not.

In Washington Bishop Dun was the celebrant at the great Ash Wednesday service which has also stirred up a vocal minority. Once again it was the Holy Communion word for word out of the Prayer Book and with all that that ancient service means therein. Did the fact that a Protestant minister read Holy Scripture that morning really violate the rubrics? Here, it might be argued, the rubrics are even more on Bishop Dun's side for they specifically say "the minister appointed shall read the Epistle, the Gospel . . ." This is the only place in the Communion service where the word minister is used rather than priest. If we are bent upon observing the letter of the law as the bishop's critics are, then something might be made of this particular rubric as allowing a minister, yes, a Methodist or any other minister of Christ, to read the lessons. And as for inviting "outsiders" to receive the Holy Communion, much has already been written refuting the closed-communion interpretation of the rubric at the end of the Confirmation service. This rubric was not intended to bar the way to non-conformists receiving the sacrament of the Lord's Supper in the Anglican Church.

But the real issue is not the legalistic one of analysing rubrics and construing them as literally as possible to defend this or that position. The real issue is this: are these others of the great Protestant communions valid ministers of Christ, or are they not? If we are going to take the position that the ministry of the Presbyterian, Methodist, etc. Churches is invalid, or split hairs about validity and regularity, let's be open and above-board about it and not invite them to any of our services. Then, too, let's stop all our talk about Church unity because it's impossible on those terms. Our position then is hardly different from the exclusive, true Church contention of Rome which makes abject submission the price of reunion. But if we agree that ordained ministers of the historic Protestant Churches are true ministers of Christ and his Church, and many of us do (by their fruits ye shall know them!), then the time is overdue for some expression of that conviction on occasions. How are we ever to come to know each other and draw nearer together if we must be forever scrutinizing rubrics and jealously suspicious of a Protestant in our chancels? It is not even courteous to invite outstanding representatives of these Churches to our ordination and consecration services, as we often do, and then condescendingly assign them a back seat in the choir or a pew in the nave. Is rubrical purity (which again was not essentially violated in either of the instances cited) more pleasing to God than the honest endeavors of good men to bridge the divisions of Christendom, to be hospitable and charitable to fellow ministers of our one Lord and Christ?

We of the Church are given glibly to advising the nations to give up a measure of their proud sovereignty for the sake of the peace of the world. But are we even half-willing to give up something of our own ecclesiastical sovereignty for the sake of the one, great Church which is the will of God? Actually nothing was renounced or lost in Washington or New Hampshire as far as we are able to see, nothing was given up, and yet what a hue and cry! The truth is that the opposition comes largely from clerical sources. The overwhelming majority of our laity are impatient to get on with the essential work of the Church. They earnestly desire Church unity. They would have no sympathy with all this agitation because Protestant ministers were invited to take part in Episcopal services.

We, too, love the Church of our membership and all her ways. But we do not believe in keeping her treasures to ourselves and putting fences around them lest they be lost. We believe in sharing them with others, and we are delighted when others want to enter into them in fellowship with us. We shall not be the losers thereby, but richer far.

Son of Consolation

BARNABAS is one of our less celebrated New Testament saints, but here and there in the Episcopal Church, in addition to parish churches bearing his name, he is remembered through chapters of the Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses. He is appropriately the patron saint of nurses for he was known as the "son of consolation." We can scarcely imagine a nurse choosing her vocation without something of St. Barnabas' spirit, the motive to minister and console. This is one human occupation where the choice could hardly be for the sake of an easy job or big money. To want to be a nurse is already to care for people and want to help them in trouble. This probably covers all nurses, Christian and otherwise.

But there ought to be a plus quality, a something more, about a Christian nurse, and, for that matter, any Christian in his work. St. Barnabas was a son of consolation because he had learned mercy and loving kindness from one whom he served as an apostle. If our true devotion is Christ and we aspire to have his mind in all things—then this is, or it should be, a different matter from having a worldly or humanitarian standard however lofty. After all, in the long run we become like what we worship.

It seems to be generally true that where there is no religious sanction and stimulus we humans soon become weary of well-doing. Service becomes patronage. People become cases. Self-interest takes over self-giving, and the springs of charity and caring for people, especially the difficult and unpleasant ones that sometimes lie in hospital beds, dry up. This is especially unfortunate when it happens to a nurse or a physician. Today we salute the St. Barnabas Guild for Nurses with its purpose of lending a Christian incentive as well as affording Christian fellowship to the women in white. We need more chapters of the Guild.

Fishing and Witnessing

By HUGH McCANDLESS
Rector of the Epiphany, New York

OUR Lord picked experienced fishermen as his first disciples, men who knew that if you wish to catch fish, you must learn to think as fish do. When you fish with dry flies, you know that bright flies seem to work best on dark days, and dark flies on bright days. Sometimes the day is hot and fish are not hungry, or stay deep in the coolest water.

Salt water fishermen know that the fish will change their feeding places with the changes of tide and wind or weather. The best bait is useless if the fish are somewhere else.

Sometimes you can catch fish even when they are not hungry. One old guide used to catch big trout in the late summer by looking for pools underneath waterfalls. He knew that usually only one big fish lived in each pool, driving away any other trout that tried to come in, as the pools were fine places to feed. This guide would cast a big silver lure into the waterfall; and the old trout, thinking it was a rival, would rise at it in a fury and get hooked.

Some people even study how things look to a fish. As you know, water bends the line of vision: if you hold a paddle at a slant in the water, it seems to be bent at the water line. The most conscientious fisherman I ever heard of used to submerge himself in the bath tub, while his patient wife threw dry flies on the water in order for him to get a fish-eye view of how the bait looked.

Our Lord did not mean that in catching men, his disciples should deceive them, as fishermen deceive fish, with false lures. Nor do I mean that. But we should understand them, in order to sympathize with them, in order to really help them, to lead them to Christ. Some fish want flies, others worms, others the challenge of a rival. Some of our friends need help from religion, others the challenge only Christianity can give them. Everyone can find what he needs in Jesus Christ. All that is required for us to do is to find out sympathetically and understandingly what they need, and point out how our Lord has it for them.

Some of us are not very skillful at this, but we still know we ought to do our part. In this case, it is up to us to fish for men the way unskillful people go after fish: by "chumming."

old fish heads and tails out of a bucket into the water. The awful stuff drifts pass the boat, and the boat bobs up and down, and people who are not used to it decide they are not very hungry and will eat their lunch later. But if there are any schools of fish at all near, they are attracted in great numbers, and it is very easy to catch them.

This has a great deal to do with attracting people to Christianity. The early Christians were not great speech makers and they were terribly persecuted. Thousands of them were killed just for being Christians. Their neighbors thought everyone should pretend to worship the emperor, by throwing a bit of dirt on a pagan altar, and the Christians refused. Anyone would have been sure that the Church would disappear. But the Christians were so cheerful and forgiving, and even their young boys and girls were so brave under torture, that they won over their persecutors. The main thing that made followers out of their tormentors was the way they loved each other. And so your actions and my actions, every day, are attracting people to church or driving them away.

The Bible is the word of God, and as we hear it God speaks to us. He calls us as he did his disciples—to be fishers of men. Of course we are not good enough, but we must not use that as an excuse: as big fish have been caught with bent pins as with imported fancy dry flies. God is saying to us in the Bible "I have called you to my service; that means you are good enough for me."

God's Census Taker

By ROBERT R. SPEARS JR.
Rector of Saint Peter's, Auburn, New York

IT was a very distinguished looking gentleman, conservatively dressed, who opened the door after a discreet knock and announced, "I'm the census taker."

"But the census taker was here just two days ago," I said, "there must be some mistake."

"I don't think so," he replied with a genial smile. "Let me show you my credentials."

We noted at once that the portfolio which he carried under his arm was beautifully embossed morocco leather and that the sticker on the outside had a wide gold border that flashed as he moved instead of the red, white and blue which we had noticed on the previous visit of the census taker. He explained with a smile that reflected a deep sort of inner joy one sees so seldom these days, "You see, this is a somewhat larger type of census. I realize that some of the districts are currently making a census too, but this is the census for the kingdom."

I must have been impressed! He went on, "Pleased don't be alarmed. You see we come only to the head of the families in the kingdom for this information and since you bear the title of rector of Saint Peter's parish you are the titular head of this particular family. Now if you will be kind enough to answer some questions I'll try to take as little of your time as possible."

He sat down in the chair opposite my desk, opened his portfolio, and, with a flourish, produced a very unusual looking pen. Accustomed to "P-51s" and pens that write under water, I think any of us might be surprised that such a modern looking gentleman chose to write with a feathered quill. To be sure it was a much more elaborate and ornate feather than any I had ever seen and it, too, looked as though it were made of burnished gold although it appeared to be as soft as down as he made a few preparatory flourishes.

"Now then," he said, "let me write the name of this family: St. Peter's parish. And how many members would you say made up the family."

"Do you mean baptized persons?," I inquired.

"Yes," he said, "Surely you remember that it is baptism which confers citizenship in the kingdom?"

"Yes," I said, a little embarrassed at having been caught in the same mistake which so many people make, "there are 1886 baptized persons in this family."

"Now then," he inquired, "how many of these have been confirmed?"

"About 1200," I replied.

"My," he said, "that means that you have 600 people or more in this family who have not yet been confirmed. What a wonderful start for a church school. How many are there in your church school?"

"About 250," I replied.

. . "And your average attendance runs around 250, doesn't it?"

"No," I said, a little embarrassed again, "I should say that 125 to 150 represented the average attendance on any Sunday." He didn't chide me at all but from the way the pen wrote those numbers down I knew that he had made the logical deduction.

"Now then," he said, "let's look at the 1200 people who are confirmed members in this family. How many people does your church seat?"

"About 800," I replied hesitantly, fearful at what was to come.

"Then may I write down that you have 800 people in church on Sunday?"

Copyright 2020. Archives of the Episcopal Church / DFMS. Permission required for reuse and publication.

"No," I said, "I'm sorry to say that you may not write that down for it wouldn't be so."

"Well, how many were there is church last Sunday?" he asked.

"If you count all three services," I said, "there was a grand total of nearly 1000 people."

"Oh, yes!" he said, "That was Easter day, wasn't it?"

"Yes," I said.

"Well, what constitutes the average attendance on a normal Sunday?" he asked.

"Not more than 500 people," I said, and again that look of concern flashed across his brow as he wrote down the number.

"Now," he said, "according to my form this family comes on a special line so I'll have to ask a few extra questions. How many hours a week would you say that this family worked for the kingdom?"

"I wouldn't have any way of knowing," I said hesitantly, "because, normally, that isn't the sort of question we Episcopalians ask of each other. It isn't genteel to be too personal about another person's religious practices."

"Then I'd just better put a big question mark in that blank hadn't I? Would you have any way of answering this question? How many of your people regard the Church as the most important activity in which they engage?" Again I had to admit that there was no definite way of my answering that question but that I hoped sincerely there were a handful, at least, in this family who looked upon their Church life as the most important thing in which they engaged.

"One or two more questions and we're finished," he said, smiling encouragingly. "If, as your answers would indicate, there is a considerable percentage of this family who never attend a family function and a considerable percentage for whom these family functions are definitely of a secondary importance, are the faithful, loyal members doing their best to correct this tendency, or are they just congratulating themselves on their own personal record and forgetting their responsibility?"

"Don't you think that that sort of question is one that the members of the family could answer better than I?" I said.

"Yes, I believe you're right," he answered, "And I think this is true of this last question. Does everyone in this family expect to go to heaven?"

"Oh! I can answer that question." I replied, "Of course, everyone in this family expects to go to heaven."

"I see," he said, as he wrote the final answer with a flourish and shut his portfolio with a decisive snap.

"By the way," I said, "when will these figures be published so that we can all study them?"

"Oh!," he said, "these aren't the sort of figures that get published. I'm afraid these figures are for a very personal file and one day you'll all be hearing about them." Just for a moment the atmosphere of the office resembled that of a courtroom, and he seemed to be a great and mighty judge.

He started toward the door, turned and, with that wonderful smile said, "Thank you so much for seeing me and I hope that we will be meeting again." As the door closed I felt a slight shudder go down my back and I devoutly hoped that I would never have to meet him again and answer questions on the basis of that census record.

Talking It Over

By W. B. SPOFFORD

SOME time back we had a piece here about the automatic kneeler, a gadget which bobs up and down so that people can pray with practically no effort. This mechanistic age has now produced a nickel-a-record juke box which plays hymns. One has been installed in a Los Angeles church; select your hymn by pushing a button, deposit the coin, and relax.

Bill Schmidgall, the rector at Tunkhannock, Pa., thinks this is just the beginning. A stack of sermon records will probably be on the market soon, which will be a great boon to the sermon-grouchers. Subjects can be listed on the juke box: "Pie-in-the-sky;" "Bringing up children;" "How can I keep from going to hell?" etc., so you can take your pick. Probably the last record to wear out will be the one on "Applying Christianity in your community."

Then too confessions can be made through the box—the routine questions for you to answer "yes" or "no," with a ticker-tape bobbing out of the machine at the end, giving absolution and your penance, if any.

Pastoral advice also can be handed out this way: "How can I get along with my mother-in-law?"; "What must I do to stop hating my wife?"; "Where can I get a job that will pay $100 a week?" I am sure anyone of our psychiatrist-clergymen could make up a long list of stock questions.

Then, to top it all and keep the parish solvent, slot machines can be installed to take the place of the collection—fifty cent machines for our rich parishes, down to nickels and dimes for the poorer ones.

Great possibilities in all this, though it is likely to put a lot of parsons out of work.

Prayer Book Loyalty

By GEORGE MORREL

Rector of Trinity, Redlands, California

I WOULD like to chat a bit about a subject which I think is of interest to the Church all over the country, and that is the matter of Prayer Book loyalty. Ever since the General Conference in 1946, there has been a growing feeling throughout our Church that there should be more consistency in the usages of local parishes, and that the only realistic way to achieve this is by following faithfully the directions and usages of the Book of Common Prayer. Such recent slogans as "Episcopalians united" reflect the rise of this attitude.

It is one of the splendid things about our Church that it is comprehensive and elastic enough in spirit to include more than one point of view. The Prayer Book itself has a broad and inclusive spirit, and such a thing as rigid uniformity has never been contemplated or desired in our Church. Nevertheless, the old adage about not going from one extreme to the other also applies, and many of our most thoughtful leaders have felt that the variations among us have been carried farther than our tradition really intends. It is confusing to the layman to go into one Episcopal Church and find "Solemn High Mass" being celebrated almost exactly according to the Roman Catholic rite, and then perhaps the following Sunday to visit another Episcopal parish in which an ultra-liberal type of rector edits and abridges the Prayer Book services in order to make them conform to his own private opinions. We do not want totalitarian uniformity, but then we don't want chaos and confusion either!

The most constructive way out of this difficulty is for all schools of thought to stick to the Prayer Book exactly as it is written, and after consulting the best scholarship available, to carry out its intentions explicity. We have canonical ways of revising the Prayer Book, if need be, but this must be done by the whole Church and not by individual clergymen and laymen acting according to their own whims and fancies.

This position of absolute Prayer Book loyalty sometimes carries with it the impression of legalism where the basic intention is anything but legalistic. We would all recognize the fact that the rubrics were made for man and not man for the rubrics, and yet we would also feel that the Prayer Book as it now stands it the fruit of many centuries of experience and wisdom, and we shall be wise not to override that well-tested wisdom too quickly. Where the Prayer Book is followed faithfully and loyally the worship and life of the Church are richer and more abundant, and the individual Christian is put into a more vital and helpful contact with the living God.

When You Move

By WILLIAM PAUL BARNDS

Rector of St. Matthew's, Lincoln, Nebraska

IN these times many people are moving from one town to another. There are many details connected with a move, such as transferring one's checking account, leaving a forwarding address with the Post Office, and making arrangements with various public utilities.

When you move, what about your parish affiliation? Some people have never heard of a letter of transfer. The Church provides that a communicant moving from one parish to another may take an official letter of transfer to his new parish. When this letter is accepted by the rector, the communicant's name is entered on the register of his new parish, and a receipt is sent to his former parish, and the proper notation made on the register of that parish. In this way the records of both parishes are kept up to date, and the status of the communicant himself is protected. Many people move without securing a letter of transfer and their names are thus carried on the record of some parish where they no longer live.

It is always courteous and thoughtful to notify the rector of any change of address on your part so the mailing list of the parish can be kept up to date, whether you move out of the city or not.

Are you officially on the roll of the parish Church where you attend? If not, ask the rector to write for your letter of transfer. Have you moved without notifying the parish office of your new address? If so, why not attend to it right now?

When you transfer from one parish to another you do not become a member of the Church all over again; you simply affiliate officially with the parish where you attend. If you have further questions, ask the rector and he will be glad to answer them for you.

EVERY OTHER WEEK

WITNESS for June 15 will be devoted to the Anglican Society. There will be no issue of June 22 since, as is our custom, we publish every other week from June 15 to September 15. May we urge readers not to make address changes for these few summer numbers unless your vacation is an extended one. Arrange with your local post office or a friend to forward copies. Your cooperation will be greatly appreciated.

NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

PRESBYTERIANS HOLD GENERAL SYNOD

Moves toward organic union of Protestant Churches were approved by the general synod of the Presbyterian Church, meeting in Cincinnati. Unanimous endorsement was given to the conference on union which was organized last December at Seabury House.

A budget of over 17 million dollars for 1951 was adopted after heated debate. $7,537,000 was designated for home missions; $6,030,000 for overseas missions; $2,225,000 for education. It was also reported that the fund for overseas relief and rehabilitation had reached over 25 million. The original goal was 27 million.

On membership, an increase of 71,713 in 1949 was reported, bringing the total to an all-time high of 2,401,849. Candidates for the ministry number 1,858, largest in history. Sunday school enrollment increased by 114,000 last year, causing the Rev. William B. Pugh, stated clerk, to declare: "You haven't been able to see a report of an increase like that in many, many years."

FLYNN BOOK AGAIN CONDEMNED

Attacks on Methodists in Reader's Digert and John Flynn's book, "The Road Ahead," were scored at the annual session of the N. Y. conference of the Methodist Church. Present tenseness and fear, which threatens civil rights, were also condemned. Welcome to DPs, continuation of the interracial policy and resolutions calling for the passage by Congress of the anti-lynching and anti-poll tax bills and the setting up of a fair employment practices commission were also passed. The conference also urged Church support of U. S. efforts, through the U. N., for maintaining ties with Russia and cooperating with Russia on relations with Germany, Japan and China.

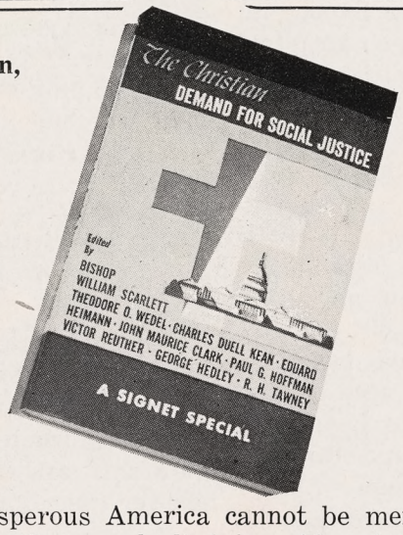
MYRON C. TAYLOR GETS AWARD

While most Protestant Churches are urging the President not to appoint a representative to the Vatican, the Roman Catholic's society for college work, Newman Club Federation, presented the retiring representative, Episcopalian Myron C. Taylor, with their first annual award. The award is conferred upon "a distinguished citizen who, in a special way, has contributed to the work to which the Federation is dedicated."

MISSIONARIES FOR LABOR UNIONS

Missionaries for labor unions were urged by the commission on peace and social service of the Methodists of Philadelphia, meeting in annual session. If 50 Methodist youth, especially trained, went into factories, mills and mines, with other Churches acting similarly, "in a short time this nation might truly be a Christian nation," the commission stated. It further declared that "the organized labor movement is a powerful force working for the social and economic welfare of employees in general. The basic principles for which labor strives are closely related to the brotherhood of man."

TALENT SCHEME PROVIDES NEW BUILDING



A Methodist Church at Columbus, Ga., has moved into a new Sunday school building after exploiting a 200-year-old idea. Following the parable of the talents, the pastor passed out dollar bills and asked them to increase them. The 205 original dollars grew to $1,500. One couple purchased a duck, formed a mythical corporation, Quacks, Inc., sold shares in the bird, and returned with $125. They promised golden eggs as dividends and have now placed the duck on a local pond where each shareholder may do his own collecting. Another enterprising woman mailed out pictures of George Washington ($1 bills) on his birthday, and asked in return a portrait of Abraham Lincoln ($5 bills) on his birthday. Another handed in the price of a steak dinner he went without; a young wife went without a maid for a week. The prize for the member who brought in the largest increase went to a woman who handed in her overtime pay. The new building, which will also be the parsonage, will cost $14,000 with the $1,500 serving as the down-payment.

MORMONS NUMBER OVER MILLION

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons) now has a membership of 1,200,000, and grew more in 1949 than in any year since its founding. The statement was made at a meeting of leaders in Salt Lake City by President George A. Smith. He said also that the building program had been accelerated and that there are now 5,000 missionaries at work. Total expenditures in 1949 reached a new high of $34,000,000, an increase of $7,500,000 over 1948.

NEWS OF CHURCHES OVERSEAS

UNITED CHRISTIAN SERVICE HELD IN CAIRO

Protestant and Eastern Orthodox churches were represented at a crowded united Christian worship service held at the Armenian Cathedral in Cairo under the auspices of the Fellowship of Unity, a voluntary organization of Christian churches in Cairo.

Founded 15 years ago by Anglican Bishop Gwynne, the Fellowship organized a united service each year in a different church in order to acquaint the various communities with the church customs and liturgy of each group.

Represented at this year's service were the Greek and Syrian Orthodox Churches, the Coptic Church, the Egyptian Evangelical Church, the Church of England, the American Community Church, the Armenian Gregorian Church, and the Armenian Evangelical Church.

Anthems and hymns in Arabic, Greek and Armenian were sung by Egyptian Evangelical, Greek Orthodox and Armenian choirs. Armenian Archbishop Mampre Sirourian gave an address and imparted the final blessing in his native tongue.

URGE SEMINARY STUDENTS SPEND YEAR AS WORKERS

Students for the Protestant ministry should spend a year as self-supporting industrial or farm workers before ordination, according to recommendations made in Germany by a conference of pastors and theological students.

The conference was held in the Evangelical School for Social Work at Friedewald Castle, an institution recently set up with the aid of American Lutherans to provide special training courses for Protestant clergymen and laymen engaged in all types of social activity.

A resolution adopted by the conference declares that a one-year term as manual worker would give prospective clergymen "a practical knowledge of the actual living conditions of the working class."

The resolution proposed that during the final examination, theology candidates should be required to prove a reasonable theoretical knowledge of political economy and the history of the trade unions and the political workers' movements.

Another recommendation was that pastors in active service should be invited to attend special courses and workshops to give them a thorough knowledge of social politics.

All participants in the conference agreed that an increased social indoctrination of theological students is essential for efficient handling of "the complex tasks with which clergymen are confronted today."

IRISH ANGLICANS URGE PEACE EFFORT

The general synod of the Anglican Church in Ireland urged a "new gigantic effort" for peace. The resolution said that governments should enter into negotiations once more to do everything in their power "to bring the present tragic deadlock to an end."

NO MOTORCYCLES FOR CLERGY

A layman's suggestion that young clergy of the Church of England in Canada be provided with motorcycles was defeated at the synod of the diocese of Huron. The idea was that it would cut down expenses. The layman has proposed a side car so that the parson could cart his bride around the parish with him, but the answer to this was "not practical in bad weather." Instead the synod voted $450 for travelling expenses.

JOHN M. KRUMM
Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral,
Los Angeles

This is a hearty second to Dean Warnecke's letter in The Witness of May 25, concerning the problems of financial support for our missionary work. I have often said that I was convinced that the early Apostles and missionaries did not go out to evangelize Europe because of study courses on "Life among the Barbarians." They went because of an undeniable impulse to share the saving gospel with others—which is what Dean Warnecke is talking about as the obligation of stewardship. Is it really impossible to convince our department of promotion of the importance of this approach or must we continue to print thousands of dollars worth of supposedly promotional material which hasn't promoted much except recurring deficits?

A. G. BUGBEE
Layman of Glendale, Calif.

For years I have taught in Bible classes that the two great commandments are basic to spiritual growth, explaining that they are not orders like military commands but laws in the spiritual world, similar to the law of gravity in the physical universe. The word "love" in this connection must be invested with a meaning different from that in ordinary usage. As such I have coined this definition: to love is to arrive at the utmost of one's ability at an intelligent, sympathetic and cooperative understanding with the object of one's love.

Sad to relate, my teaching gets nowhere. "How would you like to have your daughter marry a Negro? Or have a Jap or a Negro or Mexican or Jewish family move next door?" is the typical response. In a community which does not permit non-Caucasians (including Mexicans) to own or rent a house how can one teach pacifism on an international scale?

MRS. R. N. WILLCOX
Churchwoman of Dunkirk, N. Y.

The article "Hospitality of the Lord's Table" by Samuel Dorrance (Witness, May 11) has worried me not a little. Do theological seminaries teach the Church's ways or are priests today superficially taught? In my instructions and preparations we were to be given to hospitality—yes—to share, to be generous, etc., but no such thing was taught about the sacrament of the altar. To receive, not discerning the Lord's body and presence, was damnation to the soul. This means of reaching God, through Jesus Christ our Lord, was the precious gift of the Apostolic Church that we were to use after careful preparation and to guard, even to the sacrifice of our own life, as did our Lord on the cross.

Will someone more learned than I am explain and answer this. Somebody is mixed up somewhere or doesn't the Church teach any more, or is it all right to lead others into sin?

HANFORD L. RUSSELL
Clergyman of Minneapolis

Your managing editor of The Witness, Bill Spofford, was not born a triplet but he has all the talents triplets might contribute to the world. He is your business manager; Church-wide-wise reporter; alert article-securer and make-up editor. The combination gives us a model, comprehensive Church weekly.

"Swear not at all" so I merely affirm by St. Fortunatus that he is a virile tripleted man. I had eleven years of newspaper work in New York, have associated with many newspaper men, and I know of few that could have created and sustained the standard Bill Spofford has given the Church in the production of the informing, fair, inspiring Witness.

MISS ELIZABETH KRAEMER
Churchwoman of Grand Rapids, Mich.

My sister and I want to express our very sincere enjoyment of The Witness. We think we are getting a lot for our money and wonder how you can do it for that price. We want to say also that the report of the Detroit peace conference by W. B. Spofford Jr. was especially good.

STORY OF THE WEEK

How Anglicans Commemorated The Prayer Book Anniversary

Stress is Placed on Prayer Book Loyalty At Elaborate Service at Buffalo

By CHARLES E. HILL
Honorary Canon of All Saints Cathedral, Albany

★ A regional day for the American Branch of the Anglican Society was held at St. Paul's Cathedral, Buffalo, on June 9, 1949, the day the first Prayer Book of Edward VI was authorized for use in 1549. The whole day was carefully prepared for and enthusiastically observed with overflowing congregations.

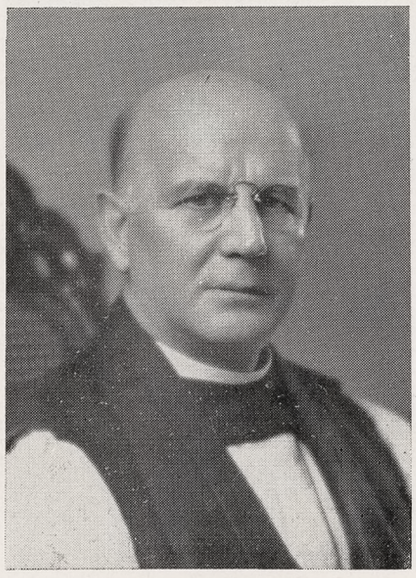
The president of the Society, Bishop Welles, was then Dean of the Cathedral and was celebrant, assisted by the Rev. L. Densmore Jacobs as Gospeller and the Rev. Arthur J. Rantz as Epistler. The Rev. Paul B. Hoffman acted as Deacon and the Rev. R. O. Liesinger as Sub-Deacon. The Rev. Frank S. Patterson was master of ceremonies, assisted by Rev. Robert R. Spears Jr. The Bishop of Western New York, Dr. L. I. Scaife, presided. The sermon was preached by Bishop Austin Pardue of Pittsburgh. The specially licensed order for the Holy Communion, commonly called "the Mass" in the first Book of Edward VI, was used.

Luncheon was served in the Cathedral House at which greetings were given by Bishop Scaife who presided. This was followed with a meeting with Dean Welles presiding. Fine addresses were made by the Rev. W. H. Dunphy, rector of St. Mark's, Philadelphia, on "The Forgotten Book—the Book of Common Prayer," and by the Hon. William R. Castle, formerly assistant Secretary of State, on "The Prayer Book and the Laity."

Illustrations in this number of The Witness show two different parts of the service; one shows the Celebrant, Deacon and Sub-Deacon at the beginning of the Nicene Creed; the other shows the "Great Entrance," the solemn bringing in of the Elements at the Offertory.

The whole service showed how elaborate a Prayer Book service may be in entire loyalty to Anglican tradition. There was no introduction of anything not prescribed; no confession with Celebrant and Acolytes before the beginning (for the confession is ordered said later in the service); no genuflections, because the earlier and more Catholic method of bowing was used; no wearing of birettas, for why should Americans wear Italian college caps, ugly as they are; no "tarping," for the consumption of what remains of the Sacred Elements is ordered after the blessing.

Certainly there is great need for more services of this kind, shall we say particularly in many parishes where a highly ornate ceremonial is in use?



THE GREAT ENTRANCE, the solemn bringing in of the Elements at the Offertory at the service at St. Paul's Cathedral, Buffalo, that marked the Prayer Book Anniversary

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

THE AMERICAN BRANCH OF ANGLICAN SOCIETY

★ After the formation of the Anglican Society in England in 1925, Bishop Oldham thought that here in the United States an American Society might be founded to do similar work. Convinced that our Prayer Book is a truly Catholic liturgy, and one of the best extant, he felt there was need for a deeper appreciation of it and consequent greater loyalty to it, both in letter and spirit; and that such loyalty would go far towards healing our own divisions and so enable us to present a solid and united front to the world on the basis of sound Prayer Book churchmanship.

Accordingly in the vestry room of Trinity Chapel, New York, in January, 1932, the Bishop, the Rev. J. Wilson Sutton, then vicar of the chapel, and the Rev. Charles E. Hill, then rector of Christ Church, Ballston Spa, New York, met and founded the Society, with Bishop Oldham as president, Dr. Sutton as treasurer and Mr. Hill as secretary. Later it was decided that we would not form a separate society but be the American branch of the already existing English Society, a very wise decision on more points than one.

BISHOP OLDHAM, Honorary President of the Anglican Sociciety

In the years that followed, the Society had real help from the late Dean Milo Gates of the New York cathedral; of the late eminent scholars, Dr. Henry R. Gummey and the Rev. Frederick W. Fitts, so long the rector of St. John's, Roxbury, Boston, who, while maintaining ornate services, conducted them on completely Anglican lines. A picture of the beautiful chancel he built at St. John's is pictured on the cover of this number of The Witness.

In less than a year the Society embraced seventy-five members, of whom six were bishops, forty-two were priests and twenty-seven were lay people. By December, 1947 the Society had grown to 277 members and by January, 1950 to 401 members.

The Society has published many leaflets and pamphlets which have been widely distributed. It has put out, first in smaller then in larger format, "The News Letter," now called "The Anglican" with this number of The Witness serving as Vol. VI: No. 2. The Society contributed much to the widespread observance of 1549 by emphasizing the importance of the anniversary in 1949.

Much remains for the Society to do. A lack of funds seems the greatest need the Society faces, for by and large, when once the aims of the Society are known, many, if not most, of our people gladly approve and become members.

JOHN HEUSS VISITS SEATTLE

★ The Rev. John Heuss, head of the National Council's department of education, was the preacher last Sunday, June 11, at St. Mark's Cathedral, Seattle, Washington.

SUMMER CONFERENCE IN CONNECTICUT

★ Three summer conferences of a week duration each are being held at the Girls' Friendly House at Canaan, Conn. In addition there is to be a weekend for young people of high school age. The first conference opens tomorrow, June 16, and they will run through July 8th. Serving on the faculties are the following clergymen: R. M. Hatch of Waterbury; Sewall Emerson of Norwalk; O. S. Barr of New Britain; A. M. Lambert of Hartford; Jay G. Seacord of Winsted; A. W. Burns of Bridgeport; J. P. Cuyler of New Milford; J. H. Esquirol of Southport; J. H. Findley of Thompsonville; J. L. Grant of Canaan; E. W. Grilley Jr. of Hartford; S. F. Hemsley of Stamford; J. S. Kromer of Meriden; R. H. Parkes of Pomfret; E. A. D. Phillips of Mystic; W. E. Traub of New Haven; R. R. Williams of New Canaan.

CHURCH MUSIC CONFERENCE

★ A conference devoted entirely to church music is being held this week, June 16-18, at Tacoma, Washington. Lecturers are the Rev. Walter Williams of St. Mark's, Denver; Canon P. H. Miller of St. Mark's Cathedral, Seattle; the Rev. F. P. Williams of Trinity, Seattle; John Boe, organist and choirmaster of St. Stephen's, Seattle; Eugene M. Nye, organist and choirmaster of Trinity, Seattle. One of the unique things about it is that the clergy of the diocese of Olympia voted to have services on the 18th music-less to permit church musicians to attend the conference.

DAVID RICHARDS TO WED

★ The newly elected suffragan of Albany, the Rev. David E. Richards, is to be married to Miss Helen Rice of Schenectady.

BISHOP W. R. BROWN GETS TRIBUTE

★ Members of the diocesan council of Southern Virginia stood in tribute to Bishop William A. Brown as he began his final report at Trinity, Portsmouth, Va. He retired in April to be succeeded by Bishop George P. Gunn. The retiring bishop expressed the hope "that we have diminished our parochialism and become more diocesan and Church-minded." He said that he believed progress had been made in that direction but then warned "against the dangers of a narrow concern with parish problems which can lead to neglect of the larger and more important things in the life of our Church today."

Bishop Phillips of Southwestern Virginia preached at a service held in honor of Bishop Brown. Following a reception was held at which he was presented with an automobile and a purse. Other bishops attending were Bishop Tucker, former Presiding Bishop; Bishop Goodwin of Virginia; Bishop Mason of Virginia; Bishop Powell of Maryland; Bishop Wright of East Carolina; Bishop Penick of North Carolina.

Bishop Gunn, in his address, said that he will effect no changes in the administrative policies of the diocese.

THE ALCUIN CLUB OF ENGLAND

★ The Anglican Society, and indeed the whole Church, owes a debt of gratitude for the very fine work of the Alcuin Club, whose scholarly labors it desires to further in every possible way.

The Alcuin Club — of which Dr. Walter Howard Frere was for many years the president— exists for the object of promoting the study of the history and use of the Book of Common Prayer. It encourages, by publications and other means, the practical study of the English liturgy with its ceremonial, and the arrangement of churches, their furniture, and ornaments, in accordance with the rubrics of the Book of Common Prayer, strict obedience to which is the guiding principle of the work of the Club. During the last half-century the Alcuin Club has issued some eighty publications —collections, smaller books, pamphlets, and leaflets—and members of the Club are entitled to the publications of the current year gratis, while associates are entitled to such of the smaller works gratis as the committee may determine. The subscription for members is 20s. per annum, and for associates 5s. per annum. Application for election and for the list of publications should be sent to the assistant secretary, Miss D. H. Daunt, c/o Lloyd's Bank Ltd., Chichester, Sussex.

Many know and use "A Directory of Ceremonial," parts I and II; "A Server's Manual;" "Liturgy in the Parish."

COMMENCEMENT AT HOBART

★ Bishop Dudley Stark of Rochester preached the baccalaureate at the commencement of Hobart and William Smith Colleges, held June 11th.

GLASIER FORMS OWN COMPANY

★ Louis F. Glasier, for many years the head of the ecclesiastical department of Black, Starr & Gorham, New York, has formed a new company to deal in memorials, stained glass and ecclesiastical supplies. It is located at 143 East 54th Street, New York.

PRESIDING BISHOP'S SON ORDAINED

★ Henry W. Sherrill, oldest son of the Presiding Bishop, was presented by his father to Bishop Nash of Massachusetts on June 2 for ordination to the diaconate. He is to go to Christ Church, Grosse Pointe, Michigan, to serve as curate under the Rev. J. Clemens Kolb.

INFIELD NEARLY COMPLETE

★ The Rev. and Mrs. W. B. Spofford Jr. have their baseball battery and only one lacking for the infield. Timothy was born less than five years ago and his triplet brothers, Mark, Andrew and Stephen are now three and a half. The fifth son, named Daniel, according to reports, was born on June 5th.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

THE WARHAM GUILD

★ The Anglican Society is greatly indebted to the Warham Guild whose work it gladly commends.

The Warham Guild, established November 11, 1912, consists of skilled workers who carry out the making of all "Ornaments of the Church and of the ministers thereof according to the use of the Church of England." Besides providing vestments, furnishing altars, and acting for craftsmen in wood and metal, the Guild is able to offer valuable advice and help, architectural and ecclesiological, in any work connected with the fabric of our churches.

Loyalty to the rubrics and canons of the English Church is the guiding principle of the Guild; and the designs are carried out under the directions of ecclesiologists and artists of repute.

The work of the Guild has steadily grown from year to year, and examples of altars, vestments, banners, specimens of embroidery and craftsman's work in metal and wood, can always be seen at the showrooms at 23 Margaret Street, London, W.1. A visit of inspection is cordially extended to those who are in sympathy with the Guild's aims.

The personality of the individual craftsman is not hidden by the Guild—in the case of original work of a special character the name of the designer is given in order that many good craftsmen now living may become better known. Besides these specially designed articles, inexpensive ornaments of good design and workmanship, but of simple character, are always kept in stock. If unable to visit, the Guild is always willing to send specimens of its work to intending purchasers.

CLERGYMEN DEFEND BISHOP DUN

★ It appears "quite improbable" that the Protestant Episcopal House of Bishops will censure Bishop Angus Dun of Washington, for inviting clergymen of several Protestant denominations to participate in a communion service at the Washington Cathedral on Ash Wednesday, five clergymen in Washington said.

The bishop was criticized for the action by a local branch of the American Church Union, which asked the House of Bishops to discipline him for "flagrant disregard" of Church doctrine (Witness, June 8).

Since the charges were made, clergymen of several denominations have voiced their support of the bishop in their pulpits and at public meetings. The bishop, one said, "deserves praise rather than blame, for he acted within the spirit of Christ."

Five Episcopal clergymen issued a formal statement on the subject. They pointed out that any group may petition the House of Bishops, but that whether the bishops take any action "depends upon the merits of the petition. Since the service conducted by Bishop Dun has abundant precedents, it appears quite improbable that any action of censure would be taken by the House of Bishops."

Signers of the statement were Canon Theodore O. Wedel, chairman of the standing committee of the diocese and warden of the College of Preachers; the Rev. Leland Stark, rector of the Church of the Epiphany and president of the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship; the Rev. E. Felix Kloman of St. Alban's church; Canon Charles Martin, headmaster of St. Alban's School, and the Rev. J. J. Ambler, rector of Pinkney Memorial church.

YOUNG ADULTS MEET AT RENO

★ Thirty young adults, belonging to the couples' supper club of Trinity, Reno, Nevada, met on Whitsunday at the Galilee conference center at Lake Tahoe, with National Council's west coast representative, the Rev. A. Ronald Merrix, giving the opening address.

A recent survey of work among young adults indicated that more than twenty thousand groups of young adults were associated with churches in the United States. Every major body, including the Roman Catholic Church, had distinctive organizations with published program material. Mr. Merrix suggested that this fact pointed to an aroused interest in religion. He hoped that young adult groups in the Episcopal Church would be led to seek direction of the Holy Spirit as they developed programs in relation to modern needs, problems and issues.

In the course of discussion on the values of a diversified and flexible program, those present expressed their particular interest in the psychology of satisfying marriage relations, a fresh study of the Church and young people and public school relationships, religion in every day business, juvenile delinquency, the pros and cons of a welfare state, what Communism is and stands for. The value of recreational activities, including dancing and picnics, was recognized by all. The question of baby sitters was debated at length. A young father said that if the church would provide a nursery school at 11 a. m. on Sundays it would remove the biggest handicap to the attendance of parents at services.

After supper, Mr. Merrix gave a second address, with reasons for a fresh interest in studies of the Bible and the Church. He pleaded for a new understanding of the Christian message in the light of present-day knowledge and in relation to the existing situation in the nation, the world and the Church, including the ecumenical movement.

The Rev. John T. Ledger, rector of Trinity Church, Reno, arranged the conference.

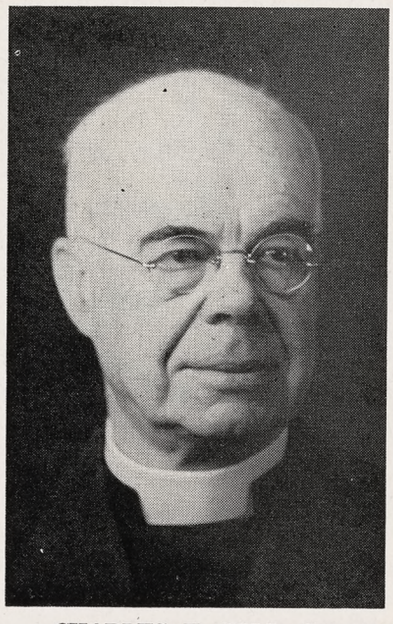
BEVERLY HILLS RECTOR IS HONORED

★ The Rev. W. W. Fleetwood, rector of All Saints, Beverly Hills, Calif., was honored by 350 members of the parish on June 1, which marked the 25th anniversary of the dedication of the church; the 50th anniversary of his ordination and also his 75th birthday. Addresses were given by Bishop Bloy and Bishop Campbell and by Clifford E. Hughes, formerly senior warden of the parish. Bishop Bloy in his address declared that the diocese of Los Angeles, comprising the eight southern counties of California, was destined to become the second or third largest in the country.

HISTORIC CHURCH SEEKS PARK STATUS

★ As a part of its 250th anniversary, Gloria Dei (Old Swedes) Church, oldest in Philadelphia, is bidding for Congressional sanction as a national park. The celebration began June 4 with the raising of an anniversary flag to fly the rest of the year. The church became a national shrine in 1942, with plans now being prepared by a committee headed by Congressman Hardie Scott to have Congress authorize purchase by the national park service of adjacent grounds for authentic restoration of the 273-year-old site. Restoration plans would call for the removal of a clutter of factories and crumbling houses that now hem in the city's oldest landmark.

WOMEN BARRED IN VIRGINIA



★ The convention of Virginia, by a vote of 89 to 83, refused to amend the canons of the diocese so as to allow women to serve on vestries.

ASSOCIATE PARISH IN TRENTON

★ Three Episcopal churches in the Trenton, N. J. area have formed an associate parish. The Rev. Gerald R. Minchin, rector of St. James, brought the vestries of St. Paul's and St. Matthew's, Pennington, together with his vestry to discuss the clergy shortage and the need for greater pastoral work in the city. Both of these churches have had part-time services of clergymen. The result of the conference is the formation of the associate parish, with each of the three churches contributing about a third of the increased budget. The Rev. W. Ernest Tilley of Oxford Mills, Canada, will become the associate rector, with direct pastoral care of St. Paul's and St. Matthew's. Under this plan St. James thus aids two congregations financially unable to attain full self-support.

ANGLICAN-ORTHODOX SERVICE HELD

★ "Solemn Vesper of the Feast of the Pentecost according to the Rubric of the Eastern Orthodox Church" was held at St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, Whitsunday afternoon. Several Orthodox choirs presented music.

BISHOP DUN HEADS COMMISSION

★ Bishop Angus Dun of Washington has been named chairman of a Federal Council commission to "study the moral implications of area bombing and the military use of nuclear bombs and other weapons of mass destruction."

In accepting the post, Bishop Dun said that the commission had been given an assignment "in which failure is almost certain." But he added that "to refuse the assignment would be to turn our backs on the responsibility which God lays upon us."

"We are supposed to be," Bishop Dun said, "a group with more than average capacity for thinking clearly about moral issues. We are supposed to be men and women who can bring the mind of Christ to bear on the truly dreadful issues which confront us. Whether we can rise to that level remains to be seen. We shall stand under the judgment of men and more inescapably under the judgment of God."

It will be the task of the commission, according to Bishop Dun, to "look with open eyes at the powers of mass destruction" available, now or in the future, to America or any other nation.

Also, the commission must consider, he said, the human, political, and moral results of the bombing methods used in world war II, or the bombing procedures that may be used in any future war.

Another job of the group, Bishop Dun pointed out, would be to "face the possibilities of international blackmail if one or more major powers possess weapons of mass destruction not available to others." The conditions and the price of international control of such weapons must also be considered, he said.

The commission will have to ask itself, Bishop Dun said, "what conceivable decisions or actions could be taken by Christian individuals or groups seeking in sincerity to do the will of the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ in our world today. A company of men and women faced with that task, we can without any false piety say to our brethren, 'Pray for us, that the God with whom all things are possible may grant us light even in this darkness'."

Members of the commission include: Prof. Reinhold Niebuhr of Union Theological Seminary, New York; William W. Waymack of Adel, Ia., former member of the U. S. atomic energy commission; Prof. Walter M. Horton of the Oberlin graduate school of theology, Oberlin, Ohio; President John R. Cunningham of Davidson College, Davidson, N. C.; President Benjamin E. Mays of Morehouse College, Atlanta, Ga.; and Chester I. Barnard, president of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Also: President Conrad J. I. Bergendoff of Augustana College, Rock Island, Ill.; Prof. John C. Bennett of Union Theological Seminary, New York; Prof. Robert L. Calhoun of Yale University, and Prof. A. T. Mollegen of the Virginia Seminary.

CENTRAL NEW YORK YOUNG PEOPLE

★ About 150 delegates of youth organizations in Central New York held a conference at All Saints, Syracuse, May 31-June 1. Bishop Peabody was celebrant at the opening service. Addressing the group was the Rev. Robert R. Spears Jr., rector of St. Peter's, Auburn, N. Y., who is a member of the national youth commission. Jack Pratt of St. Paul's, Syracuse, was elected president.

OTIC RICE LECTURES AT YALE

★ Among the six men added to the faculty of the Yale Divinity School is the Rev. Otis R. Rice, Episcopalian. He is the religious director of St. Luke's Hospital, New York, and is to lecture at Yale on pastoral counselling.

MOORE HEADS RESEARCH

★ The Rev. Joseph G. Moore of the Seabury-Western faculty has been named director of a unit of research by the National Council. It will study population trends on the parochial and diocesan levels throughout the country and assist in plans for expansion in those areas. Moore has been in charge of the department of social research at the seminary, which has now been taken over by the Council and absorbed into the unit. It is composed of division heads of the Council, with the Rev. George Wieland of the home department as chairman.

Under Moore's direction studies have been made in the dioceses of Chicago, Atlanta and Kentucky and one is currently being made in the diocese of New York.

Statistics of population, population movements, financial status of the groups being studied, the health conditions, education and recreational facilities and the standard of living within the area are gathered for a 10 to 30 year period. These are charted on maps and graphs and the neighborhood parish or parishes within the area, which has at the same time been studied statistically, is then measured in comparison to the study of the area through other graphs, maps and charts. Thus a sampling technique is developed which enables a parish within the area to determine whether its program has been geared to fit the neighborhood needs.

UTO SERVICE IN NEWARK

★ The annual service for the presentation of the United Thank Offering was held at Trinity Cathedral, Newark, for the women of that diocese. Bishop Washburn was celebrant, assisted by Bishop Ludlow and Dean Warnecke, and the preacher was the Rev. John H. Johnson, the rector of St. Martin's, New York.

Fear and Conscience

THE famous words of Franklin Roosevelt in his first inaugural: "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself" are important and significant for two reasons. First, because they were the trumpet-call that roused a stunned and demoralized nation to some measure of confidence and determination. Second, because they were the background of the mass of remedial legislation which was speedily forced through Congress.

We have too seldom realized what is the innermost nature and the basic cause of all fear—personal or social or national. Emerson, in his old essay, "Compensation," points it out with great clarity. "Fear is an instructor of great sagacity and the herald of all revolutions. One thing he teaches, that there is rottenness where he appears. He is a carrion crow, and though you see not well what he hovers for, there is death somewhere. Our property is timid, our laws are timid, our cultivated classes are timid. Fear for ages has boded and mowed and gibbered over government and property. That obscene bird is not there for nothing. He indicates great wrongs which must be revised."

Always, in every relation of life, we are afraid because we are aware, deep down in our conscience, that something is wrong that we could have set right and have not done so. Man, in his personal life, fears death, fears illness, fears poverty, fears the loss of friends and reputation. Each of these gnawing terrors would vanish if we devoted ourselves whole-heartedly to setting right the conditions that have inspired the fear. If, instead of thinking in terms of our rights, our just deserts, we concentrated our thoughts, feelings and energies on the full, unmeasured gifts we could bestow on our friends, acquaintances, neighbors and enemies, terror would dissolve like a morning mist out of our personal lives. This is, of course, precisely what the beloved disciple of our Lord meant when he declared that "perfect love casteth out fear." The devoted physician, working day and night during epidemic plague to bring healing or comfort, has no room in his mind and heart for fear of his own death or disease. The Christian missionary and the Christian saint find no time or strength to waste on apprehensions of what may happen to either their bodies or their souls. They are far too busy giving their all to those who, by the standards of the world, are quite unworthy of such sacrifice. "Perfect love," unmeasured self-giving, always and everywhere, casts out fear.

And what is so clearly true of the individual soul in relation to conscience and fear, is quite as evident—or ought to be—in relation to the corporate life of men and nations, as Emerson so clearly saw and expressed. Today we are having demonstrated for us on a world-wide scale, dramatically and convincingly, this principle of the connection of fear and a bad conscience. The whole world, east and west, is gripped by terror; and the whole world, deep down in its unconscious, has an awareness of dreadful evil that should have been, but has not been, either confessed or corrected. The people of America are scared today as they've never been scared before. They are scared of atom-hydrogen bombs and of Communism. The people of Russia and the "Peoples Democracies" are equally scared. They are scared of atom-hydrogen bombs and — Capitalism. And neither east nor west has yet confessed its sins and started to give of its best, without counting the cost or demanding a price for its giving. What concerns us as Christian Americans are America's sins—not Russia's or China's or any other nation's or race's or people's. We have, so far, permitted our political leaders to paralyze us with fear and to take our money to pile up armaments with which to force all the world to follow our way of economic and political life. Meanwhile, a thousand sins of our own national life and economy go uncorrected

WE cannot form an alliance on ideas without losing the only true unity which is inseparable with the common baptism, common communion and common fellowship of the household of faith. The only kind of Christianity which will ever profoundly influence human society toward righteousness is one which manifests that rare combination of definite conviction and kindly courtesy. The two are not interchangeable, but complementary. Without definite convictions religion has not force; without Christian courtesy it has no attractiveness. One need not lack the latter because he possesses the former.

America must give—not armaments, not threats—but her very best self in a great, priceless venture for peace, which can be implemented only by world-wide trade and by the noble risk of far-flung capital investment in the world's depressed areas, without guarantees or Scrooge-like conditions which declare "heads I win, tails you lose." Let this true American spirit, which we love, rise up and take control, that the America of today may with some reason be called Christian.

The Prayer Book As It Is

By G. ASHTON OLDHAM
Retired Bishop of Albany

ON Whitsunday, over four hundred years ago the National Church of a small island, containing fewer inhabitants than the present city of New York, used for the first time the Prayer Book in the English tongue. Today, a great international Communion comprising more than three hundred dioceses, some thirty-five million members, and extending over five Continents and the Islands of the sea is celebrating that event. And rightly so, because it is this Book of Common Prayer that unites our Church with the Christianity of the ages and with the various branches of the Anglican Communion throughout the globe.

It is not my purpose to dwell on the history of the Prayer Book, with which I assume you are tolerably familiar, but rather to consider the objectives of the reformers and the significance thereof for us today.

Their aim was threefold—first a return to the primitive Church and the Bible; second, simplification; and third, to produce a service which would enable man to worship God intelligently in his own tongue.

The preface of the first Prayer Book sets forth these primary aims in the following quaint language:

"So that here you have an order for prayer (as touching the reading of Holy Scripture) much agreeable to the mind and purpose of the old fathers, and a great deal more profitable, and commodious, than that which of late was used. It is more profitable, because here are left out many things whereof some be untrue, some uncertain, some vain and superstitious; and is ordained nothing to be read, but the very pure word of God, the Holy Scriptures, or that which is evidently grounded upon the same; and that in such a language and order, as is most easy and plain for the understanding both of the readers and hearers. It is also more commodious, both for the shortness thereof, and for the plainness of the order, and for that the rules be few and easy. Furthermore by this order, the Curates shall need none other books for their public service, but this book and the Bible; by the means whereof, the people shall not be at so great charge."

By coincidence or Divine Providence it so happened that at this time the Bible was translated by Tyndale—later burned at the stake for doing it—so that it was now possible for the ordinary man to read and study the Holy Scriptures in his own tongue. These two events, the translation of the Prayer Book and Bible, belong together and reinforce each other.

Loyalty to the Prayer Book thus means that we who have it should also be Bible Christians. The sequence of lessons, collects, epistles, and gospels together with the psalms and canticles constitute some four-fifths of the contents of the Prayer Book and if we are to be true to the ideals of the reformers, Anglicans should be most voracious readers and earnest students of Holy Writ. Are we?

Unlike the Reformation on the continent, there was no thought in England of starting a new Church. The personal and political quarrel of Henry VIII and the Pope provided the occasion for a reform in the Church, but Parliament asserted that it had no intention "to decline or vary from the Catholic faith of Christendom." Cranmer may not have been an heroic figure—though he proved to be at his death when he thrust first into the flames the hand that had written his recantation—but his very conciliating nature was used by Providence to secure for the English Church a reform and not a revolution. Something like 99 per cent of the contents of the Prayer Book was drawn from the ancient service books of the Western Church. It retained the ancient Creeds, the Apostolic succession of Bishops; the Holy Communion "commonly called the Mass" with the other sacraments, much of the ancient ceremonial and vestments but checked and modified by reference to the standards of the primitive Church and the Bible. Thus the Anglican Church represents a reformed Catholicism. It is no new body, but a continuation of the ancient Church of the land. Dean Swift's illustration is a good one here. A fair maiden is attired in a beautiful dress so over-laden with frills and ornaments that scarcely any of the material of the dress itself is visible. Some in their haste and impatience tear off the ornaments and with them destroy a large part of the fabric. Such are represented by the Puritans and Continental reformers. Others with more care and discernment remove the excrescences so carefully as to leave the fabric of the dress whole and entire. These are represented by the English reformers, who eliminated many complicated, useless and sometimes superstitious practices, but took care to preserve all the essentials of the Church of the fathers.

Simplification

IN addition to this return to the Bible and the early Church, the reformers aimed at simplification. At this time there were altogether nine different service books for regular worship, plus others for special occasions, so that it was impossible for any but an expert to use them. The laity for the most part knew little or nothing about them, and as the preface states even for the clergy it was "more trouble to find what should be read than to read it when found." These voluminous and complicated services were reduced, simplified and translated into English so as to produce for the first time in history a single and simple Book of Common Prayer.

What is the significance of this for us today? There is a possibility that this observance of the 400th Anniversary may come and go and leave little behind. It may be merely sentimental or worse, an insincere or partisan observance. It may consist of mere lip service, high sounding words of approval with no deeds to match. So I ask you to consider the Prayer Book as we have it today, our use of it and loyalty thereto.

First of all, we should come to know it better. Time was when each person had his own Prayer Book and carried it to church. Whether the present custom of the church providing Prayer Books in every pew is the result or cause of individual neglect is hard to say. Probably it is a bit of both. But the growing practice in the Episcopal Church of the priest telling the people the number of the page on which to find the psalms, the collect for the day and sometimes even the Creed and Venite, while useful for a congregation of strangers, is an unfortunate presumption of ignorance on the part of our people regarding the Prayer Book. In earlier days the churchman knew his Prayer Book well enough to find the place and to know when the parson was putting something over on him. It would be well if he had a similar acquaintance today.

In the second place we should make better use of it both in public and private worship. Mark Twain used to say he liked the Prayer Book because it "gave the congregation a chance to jaw back at the minister" and he was right; for this is one of the principal things aimed at by the reformers. Revolting from the mumbling of the Roman Mass during which the people sat idly by or indulged in irrelevant petitions, they could not, of course, have anticipated the equally individualistic modern Protestant service where the minister does all the praying and reading and talking for the people and a quartette most of their singing. The Prayer Book, however, was designed to give the people full participation in worship. An influential group in the Roman Catholic Church is today aiming at this same thing by introducing the "Dialogue Mass" while we who have this treasure ready made in our hands are in large part failing to use it. In the Church service itself the participation of the congregation is woefully inadequate. We begin with "O Lord, open thou our lips," and thereafter keep them sealed tight. When the parson says "Let us pray" it often means "Let me pray." We meekly acquiesce when the choir takes away from the people, the canticles and Creed which were meant for congregation participation, and mumble the responses and amens so softly that it is often difficult to hear any response at all.

By contrast, in England and the Colonies and Dominions, you may go into any little village Church and find not the choir alone but the whole congregation joining heartily in the canticles and even the singing of the psalms, whereas with us the canticles are usually sung to elaborate settings by the choir in which it is impossible for the congregation to join and if by chance the psalms are sung, as they should be, it never occurs to the average Episcopalian that he is even supposed to join in. What a departure from the ideals of the Prayer Book and what a travesty on worship! And this is chiefly the fault of the clergy, though organists have a large share of the blame.

Can Be Improved

THAT this condition among us can be improved I know by experience. In my last parish, with the cooperation of the organist and a good deal of training, especially of the young people we reached the point where on a Sunday morning the entire congregation sang not only the Venite but the Te Deum and Benedictus at Morning Prayer and the responses to the Sursum Corde and the Sanctus in the Communion Office, thus making worship a living and thrilling reality.

At the Lambeth Conference of 1930 the bishops were all invited to attend a rehearsal prior to the Sunday service and I shall never forget the effect in that great shrine, of the whole congregation singing the Merbeck setting of the Creed, Sursum Corde, Sanctus and Gloria in Excelsia. Not the most exquisitely trained choir could have produced the inspiring and uplifting effect of this fervent and joyous singing of those thousands of worshippers. So if clergy and organist care and will make the effort, it can be done.

At the occasional services, baptism, holy matrimony, and burials the situation is even worse. At the two latter a Prayer Book is rarely opened, responses are made timidly if at all, and the psalms in the burial office are read as a lesson by the priest instead of responsively.

We need a reform all along the line. We need to know our Prayer Book, respond audibly and so make our worship a dialogue, not a monologue, and thus exercise the priesthood of the laity and give more life and fervor to our church services.

We should also know our Prayer Book well enough to use it in private and family prayers. The loss of the old custom of gathering the family together for a brief recognition of their Heavenly Father, and this applies even to the families of many of our clergy, is a tragic loss indeed, since religion will never be strong and vital unless it finds its center in the home. Then, too, the opportunities for parents to review their doctrine by teaching the catechism to the young is of great value, while the special family prayers and annual round of collects provides one of the best manuals of devotion in existence.

Next, I come to the matter of loyalty to the Prayer Book. Far too many people believe in the Prayer Book as individually interpreted, not as it is. The result of their actions is to reverse the efforts of Cranmer and his colleagues who aimed at simplicity by removing the encrustations of the centuries and reducing the service to its essentials.

For some of us moderns this is not good enough. Take for instance the opening and closing choir prayers. Originally—and still in England—these are brief, quiet devotions for the choir alone before entering upon their solemn duties. Now, these prayers must be chanted for the congregation to hear and this has developed in some places so that the congregation actually kneels while the rector chants or shouts the prayer for their presumed edification! Likewise in the Holy Communion there is a preface indulged in sotto voce by the priest and two fidgety acolytes, often quite meaningless to the congregation, and at the close a devotion frequently said aloud as if it were part of the service. However helpful these additions may sometimes be, they are examples of a tendency of devotions originally said privately in the sacristy or silently in procession finding their way to the altar, so turning simplicity into complexity. This is precisely what happened during the middle ages and is one of the particular evils Cranmer set out to cure.

Interpolations

ANOTHER such tendency is the interpolation of all sorts of devotions from other and often foreign sources which is again to undo the work of Cranmer. Not that these are wrong in themselves but simply not appropriate to our rite. There are many beautiful and helpful devotions to be gathered from Rome or Orthodoxy—or even Protestantism—but they are not ours and frequently do not fit.

The story is told of an Anglo-Catholic of the Church of England who was talking with the Abbe Duschene, the great Roman liturgeologist who was anxious to learn precisely what it was that the Anglo-Catholics were aiming at. After a lengthy conversation, the Abbe turned to his visitor with a smile and remarked "O, I see now, you are trying to get into your Church many of the things we are trying to get out of ours."

Another equally great abuse is that of subtraction—the omission of various portions of the service either to accord with the individual's wishes or to save time. I know of metropolitan parishes where regularly are omitted the comfortable words, the prayer for the Church and the concluding paragraph of the prayer of consecration, and one parishioner told me that she simply could not get her rector to read the Church burial service. Instead was a selection of lessons and a collection of poetry and prayers which the rector thought more suitable! Well might we add a petition to our litany—"From all subversive and confusing additions and from all unwarranted and schismatic omissions, Good Lord deliver us."

The serious thing about all this is the underlying or implied assumption that our Prayer Book is inadequate and needs to be supplemented from without. Admittedly the Prayer Book can be improved but to assume such as a necessity is to cast doubts upon its Catholicity. This, I for one am unwilling to do, because I am convinced that the Prayer Book "as is" is thoroughly Catholic liturgy. Moreover, if changes are needed they should not be made by each individual on his own. What is the use of having a liturgical commission, or going through the long and tedious process of Prayer Book revision if each priest is to be his own reviser?

One of my brother bishops told me of a young and enthusiastic priest who in his first mission took all the Prayer Books and inserted all sorts of directions in red ink — truly and literally rubrics! His energy and enthusiasm were admirable but not his judgment in the eyes of his bishop who called him in for conference. After a good luncheon and a smoke, the bishop approaching the subject gradually asked him if he had ever been a deputy to General Convention to which of course the reply was "no." He then asked if he knew the method of Prayer Book revision and on this he was not very clear. The bishop then went on to explain the process of appointing a commission of learned scholars from both houses, who make serious studies, hold numerous meetings and then present their report to General Convention where it is received, considered and amended. If it is then approved, it must lie over to the next Convention. In the meantime having undergone careful consideration by the whole Church, it is again presented to the following General Convention for final action. Then concluded the bishop, "This long and careful process is the Church's way of revising the Prayer Book, and here you presume to do it on your own. You must destroy those Prayer Books and provide new ones for your congregation."

Proper Procedure

IF revision and improvement are desirable, there is a right and proper way of procedure. Certain experiments may presumably be made under proper authority but not by the individual priest. Normally, however, suggestions for revision should be sent to the liturgical commission which receives and files them all—it now has several hundred such—and at the appropriate time will present those deemed worthy to the General Convention. In the meantime let us have no individual tampering with the Prayer Book. No Roman Catholic or Orthodox priest would think of making any unauthorized changes in his liturgy. Cannot we show similar respect for our own formularies? The Prayer Book is like the manual of arms to a soldier—not to be modified or questioned but to be obeyed. And each priest at his ordination has solemnly promised so as to officiate in all things "as this Church hath received the same."

The Prayer Book "as is" is a wonderful document and has had a mighty influence in making converts to our Church. The most notable instance occurred at Yale University in September 1722, when the President, Timothy Cutler and six other Puritan divines announced their conversion to "the Communion of the Catholic Church; that is the Church of England in the American Colonies." The announcement of this, in the words of a contemporary "shook New England Congregationalism like an earthquake and filled all its friends with terror and apprehension!" This, with countless other less notable cases, was due primarily to a study of our Prayer Book just as it is and it still is a potent missionary influence.

The Prayer Book is also the bond of unity which holds together both our own body and the whole Anglican Communion. We have no Pope, nor does the Lambeth Conference have any control over the various parts of the Anglican Communion. Instead, the Anglican Communion is a fellowship of Churches bound together by a common faith, polity and sacraments all of which are enshrined in our Book of Common Prayer.

In one of Daniel Webster's orations is the picturesque phrase, "The British drum beat follows the rising sun around the globe." This is true of our beloved Prayer Book. Thanks to the world-wide expansion of the Anglican Communion there is not a moment of the Lord's day when worship is not being offered in essentially the same form as in our own land so that we may truly say that the Prayer Book follows the rising sun around the globe. By remaining essentially the same, may the Prayer Book continue to be the bond of unity and hold firmly together the various world encircling branches of the Anglican Communion.

Finally, the Prayer Book is recognized by others as one of the great books of all time.

Says Professor Harte in his "English Literature"—"As a specimen of English, it is unequalled by anything the language contains, except the English version of the Bible."

Says John Wesley: "I believe that there is no liturgy in the world, either in ancient or modern

A PRAYER FOR THE SOCIETY

Put forth by the English Branch

ALMIGHTY God, Who makest men to be of one mind in one house, vouchsafe we beseech Thee to accept, direct, and prosper the Anglican Society, that it may be an instrument in Thy hands to conform Thy Church in this country more closely to Thy Will, through Jesus Christ our Lord.—Amen language, which breathes more of a solid scriptural, rational piety than the Prayer Book of the Church of England."

It was a Roman Catholic who wrote: "I praise the English rite not merely for the tender loveliness, the austere grace of its unforgetable phrases, the lingering music of its perfect cadences, its sacred aloofness and wise reserve—it is characterized by austere grandeur, bracing and exalted, virtue, dignity and sovereign appropriateness. Happy, happy are the folk nourished on such spiritual manna!"

These quotations might be multiplied a hundredfold showing the esteem in which our Prayer Book is held by those without. Let not those within ironically be the only ones to belittle or disparage it either by neglect or feverish desire to improve it. Instead, let us magnify the Prayer Book precisely as it is.

This 400th anniversary may be merely lip service, or a mere emotional observance, or it may become the start of a new loyalty which will go far to mend the breaches and divisions which so paralyze our activity. I would plead, therefore, for the Prayer Book, as it is.

I would plead with the clergy to remember and observe their ordination vows to conduct worship "as this Church hath received the same" and to refrain from bewildering and upsetting our faithful laity by unauthorized additions or subtractions.

I would plead with fathers and mothers to teach the Prayer Book to their children and use it with them in restoring our too long neglected family prayers.

I would plead with the differing schools of thought in our Church to exercise such self-discipline and self-restraint as to forego individualistic experiments in revision for the sake of the whole body.

I would plead with all to magnify this book, to proclaim its treasures to all the world and lovingly and persistently use it to the benefit of our souls, the greater unity of our beloved Church and the glory of Almighty God.

NOTE: An Address at the General Convention of 1949.

The Anglican Society

By EDWARD R. WELLES
Bishop of West Missouri and President of the Anglican Society

I COME by my religion naturally and honestly. Grandfather, whose name I bear, was the third bishop of the diocese of Wisconsin and a close friend of the late great James DeKoven, one of the controversial figures in the churchmanship struggles of the 1870's. Grandfather, as far as I can discover, was the first bishop in the Church in this country to wear both cope and mitre. Seabury had worn a mitre, other bishops had worn copes, but no one prior to Grandfather's time had worn cope and mitre. During his episcopate the state was divided into the dioceses of Fond du Lac and Milwaukee and he remained at Milwaukee with Nashotah under his wing.

My father was a priest for almost half a century before his death in 1940, and was a valiant defender all his life long of the Catholic faith. In his Oxford days he had stayed at the early mother house of the Cowley Fathers, was diocesan chaplain of the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament for many years and was clear-cut and complete in his Catholic teaching and practice. I went to Kent School myself when it was operated by the Fathers of the Order of Holy Cross.

Having said this, I want to go on and say that it seems to me that in recent years the policy and thinking of some of the Catholic-minded clergy and laity in the Church has been too chip-on-the-shoulder. We have tended to be a mere party in the Church instead of having our primary loyalty to the Church itself. We were concerned and confident of our ability and duty to set the Church right, rather than being conscious that in the end the Church must keep us right.

A faith is concerned with the principles by which men live and which need to be understood. A party requires a program; whether a conservative and defensive program by which men can stand, or progressive as the basis of a movement. It must, above all, be accepted and asserted without qualification. The processes of understanding, weighing and criticizing undermine defenses and they also check the enthusiasm which gives momentum. Our tendency to identify Catholicism with our party program has greatly weakened our capacity to help the whole Church. We have been only a party in the Church instead of being a part of the Church—an integral part of the Church. A small section of us became a highly organized flying squadron, and by methods only too well known in politics took possession of all the leading Anglo-Catholic organizations. This little group was always ready with a list of nominations for every committee and resolutions for every meeting. This is the method of Trent or the Westminster Assembly or the Vatican Council. It's the method which for ten years appeared to have such great success. Some of you will recall that decade from the first Anglo-Catholic Congress (Wasn't it 1924 at Christ Church, New Haven? I was present) to the Centenary Congress held in Philadelphia with great splash in 1933. Seventeen years have passed now and outwardly at least we are weaker in our influence and strength in the Church than we were at that high water mark in 1933. But that is judging by externals.

Party Created Party

AT first the movement was boastful. "If Catholicity has been a despised thing, now it's going to carry all before it. It alone has the essentials, etc." I do not think God likes boastfulness. Certainly most men do not. Therefore, what happened is that party created party, and the anti-Catholic party became suspicious and became very active after a period of dormant existence. The more fierce the opposition is, the more it plays into the hands of extremists, and a section of men in our group used its opportunity.

There are many differences between Catholics and Evangelicals, but Christianity lies in the reconciliation of differences.

As I see it, the future joy and strength of the Anglican Communion rests in the reconciliation of the two, especially in the priests and laity who are able in their own lives and in their own practice to combine complete Catholicity with earnest and effective Evangelical enthusiasm for spreading the faith.

It is my profound conviction, after a good deal of thought, that there has continued to be a steady growth in the Anglican Church throughout the world and certainly here in the Episcopal Church in America, not only during recent years but stretching back to the days of Bishop Hobart in the early days of the last century, a growth amongst the rank and file, the obscure, average laity and clergy if you like, in understanding the Catholic nature of our branch of Christ's holy Church and a deepening realization of the practical implications and applications of that faith which is One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic. Some twenty-five years ago, a group of clergy and laity in the Church of England moved by convictions similar to those which I have just expressed, founded the Anglican Society. An American branch was started the year before the 1933 Catholic Congress by people in this country who felt misgivings about the extreme, and they felt disastrous, progress of events amongst Catholics over here.

This Society has never grown large in numbers. The reason that I'm willing to give some of my time to serve as its president is that it appeals to me as a very happy instrument for giving articulate expression to the sound faith and practice which I believe the vast majority of members, lay and clerical of our world-wide communion believe in and hunger to express in their lives. In the last few years I have had many conversations with fellow priests or devoted laymen, and so often the conversation has turned to just this point, that I do feel that the Anglican Society comes closest to providing a meeting-ground for the many of us who, in the words of the official aims of the Anglican Society, are devoted "to promoting and preserving the Catholic faith in strict accordance with the principles laid down in the Book of Common Prayer," and to a less imperative degree are concerned "to uphold and appreciate a truly Anglican use both in rite and ceremonial." (That is, that use implied implicity and explicity in the preface and rubrics of our Prayer Book). This use does differ in many ways, of course, from the Roman use, but is the use which is appropriate both ceremonially and doctrinally with the ancient rites of the Anglican Communion.

Leadership Lacking

ALTHOUGH I believe the great central portion of our Church's membership, and that includes the majority, are ever improving in the tone of their churchmanship, their faith and their practice, they are at present leaderless and inarticulate. Eloquent, impassioned, articulate leadership from either extreme may sway them into precipitous and hasty action on major issues. It seems to me that at the present time men of sound churchmanship, who are also gifted with eloquence and influence, are singularly rare.

On the contrary, I believe that there is a sprinkling of vocal and articulate leaders in the liberal membership of our Church whose eloquence and passion might quite conceivably sway General Convention to act hastily and harmfully in the next few years on such grave matters as reunion or a general relaxing of the Church's legislation about marriage. All of us yearn for reunion. Some of us readily appreciate the sacrifices that will be required before reunion can come to pass, but while it's quite desirable that we should be willing to sacrifice and indeed make sacrifices of our own mere personal likes and in matters of small importance, we have, it seems to me, an imperative obligation to resist steadfastly any sacrifice of the essentials of Christ's body. If we sacrifice those we may have reunion but we won't have a Church that is truly One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic and therefore, the body of our Blessed Lord.

The same is true in regard to the clear-cut teaching of our blessed Lord in the matter of marriage and divorce. All of us are eager to apply Christ's teaching to the serious problems that are developing with rapidity and increased difficulty in marriage in these post-war times, but we cannot compromise for example the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount if we are to remain Christian. The Anglican Society, it seems to me, affords an opportunity of making our own convictions more articulate and spreading the influence of sound churchmanship to the rank and file of laity and clergy in the Church and thus strengthening the Church to face these and other important controversial matters in the coming years, so that decisions which are made will be decisions for good and not for evil to the Church of Christ and the members thereof.

Beyond question the Anglican Communion stands firmly and unequivocally for certain fundamental principles; she presents us with a Prayer Book and in the nature of the case these principles must be set forth in this book—some of them in plain statements, and others by implication. These principles have to do, first, with the teaching of the Church, second, with her practice. She teaches the old truths that have always and everywhere been taught—what may be called the Catholic teaching of the Church. Quite clearly she means to keep on with them. They include, of course, the articles of the Creed, and the continuity of the Church's life through the sacraments and the historic ministry.

In both these matters of faith and practice it is evident that, at the Reformation (i.e. at the time of the framing of her Prayer Book in English) the Church was concerned with keeping on, not with starting something new. Certain new elements did indeed come in, such as freedom from papal domination, and the discarding of many bits of superstitious use that had crept in; but the old fundamentals of faith and practice she was careful to hold on to and to continue. Indeed she uses this very word "continue" in the brief treatise on the ministry, which makes up the preface to the ordinal (1551). That preface, after setting forth the fact of the historicity of three orders of the ministry, says, "to the intent that these orders may be continued," ordination by a bishop must always be retained. Note the word continued; here the Church states in the plainest language, and in a single word, what was her aim at the Reformation. She was concerned with continuing old essentials and we can see evidences of her care in this matter scattered throughout the Prayer Book. Said Elizabeth to the foreign princes who were proposing a union of the Church of England with the new continental Protestant sects, "There is no new thing made in England." And we are all of us aware that what we have in our mother Church is not a new contrivance, but the Church of the Apostles, retaining the old faith, the old sacraments, and the old vital link with our Lord and the Apostles, the three-fold ministry.

Catholic Character

THE Anglican Society stands in the first place for the clear teaching of this continuity of the Church with the past, for what may be called the Catholic character of the Anglican Communion. The Society feels that a firm teaching of this truth of continuity, or Catholicity, is greatly needed in our day; clergy and people alike need to realize it and to keep it in view in dealing with the many questions of policy and behavior which are constantly coming up. The teaching of this truth is the first principle of the Society.

But at the Reformation the Church was concerned not only with securing continuity in her sacraments and vital life, but also with continuity in the outward appearance of her services—the outward aspect which bespeaks the inward principle. In her ceremonial law, enacted only a few days after the setting forth of the ordinal, she says: "The chancels shall remain as they have done in times past," and "Ornaments of the Church, and of the ministers thereof, at all times of their ministration, shall be retained, and be in use." Note the words "remain" and "retained." Here, as in the preface to the ordinal, it is made clear that the Church was continuing ancient ways. She was ruling not only that her ancient life should continue unbroken, but that her outward appearance should continue unchanged. Continuity of life and corresponding continuity of aspect were ruled by her in plainest terms. If we were asked to state in one word the ruling principle of the English Reformation, we could find no word that better expresses it than this word continuity.

This continuity of aspect is largely secured by the content of the Prayer Book, and especially by the rubrics. The rubrics tell us how the Prayer Book is to be carried into action; they tell us what things are to be done, where they are to be done, and how they are to be done. These matters constitute what is known as ceremonial. But formal procedure was so well known to the priests of the Reformation period that a great deal of it was assumed rather than definitely stated. For instance, the first Prayer Book in a number of places leaves the priest to finish a prayer from memory, substituting an "etc." for the full termination. This brevity of directions makes necessary for us a reference to the older books, which had definite and minute directions for all the patterns of procedure. These directions constitute the "tradition" lying back of the Prayer Book services. This tradition has been fully preserved, it has been made the object of careful study by many scholars, and it is easily ascertainable. Now loyalty to the Prayer Book itself, and to the ceremonial tradition lying back of it, constitutes the second principle of the Anglican Society.

Two Great Principles

THE Anglican Society, then, sets forward these two great principles as the grounds of its effort and action:

1. The teaching of the Catholicity of our Church,
2. The promotion of loyalty to the Prayer Book and its traditions.

That the first of these principles needs emphasis we have already said. We see everywhere about us a tendency to forget and obliterate the age-old distinction between the Church and the sects. The lay people, who are entrusted with a large share in the legislation of our Church, are quite unaware of these distinctions, though they were well known to our fathers. Weakness in teaching and sometimes utter failure to teach are responsible for this growing laxity. There is need for the drawing together of loyal churchmen in a determination to teach the old truths; there is need for united action in maintaining the teaching of the Prayer Book.

The second principle, having to do with details of procedure, is also vastly important. It is discounted by some people as trifling and fussy; but this is a thoughtless overlooking of the real importance of ceremonial. Ceremonial rightly used has a sacramental character— it is the outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual truth. To misuse it is to teach wrongly. To leave it out is to fail in the use of one of the great tools of teaching, teaching through the eye which is largely used in every department of education today, as it has long been used by the Church. It is well known that things learned through the eye are longer remembered than things learned in any other way. And it is well known, too, that they are more easily comprehended. If the details of the service of the Holy Communion are minimized and sloppily handled, it is inevitable that the people should come to feel that the Holy Communion itself does not matter. Small regard for the outward ceremonial stimulates a small regard for the inner content. Simplicity? Yes. But that does not necessarily imply a drab absence of beauty in the accessories of worship, nor does it imply a studied carelessness in the matter of postures and gestures. The priest who assumes a casual air toward the whole service, who seems to loaf through it in whatever way requires least effort, suggests to the people in the pews a light mental attitude on the part of the minister. To surround the service with the cheapest, the plainest, the least beautiful appointments that can be obtained, can not but suggest a small regard for the sacrament itself.

The whole question of ceremonial has been complicated by the large importation of Roman ceremonial which has prevailed in many of our churches. Our people dislike and distrust this copying; worse than that, it is misleading and unnecessary. Our mother Church has a ceremonial of her own, largely neglected, through long periods forgotten, but rich, restrained, and above all harmonious with our Prayer Book. The following of this method of procedure would give to our Church an appearance and an atmosphere all her own. It would give us a unity of aspect that would symbolize the inner unity, which beyond question exists within our Communion.

It is for this ceremonial that the Anglican Society stands. In advocating and striving for it our Society is doing a unifying work. We visualize a great Church united in its teaching of the great fundamentals and united also in its outward aspects. Such a drawing in of both extremes toward a strong central unity would be the most constructive step that we could take. A united voice, a firm stand, an aspect of oneness, will attract thousands who are letting go their ancient moorings and floating about on a sea of speculation. Many signs suggest that the time is ripe for such a unifying movement within our own borders. You are urged to give your support to this movement by taking your place in the Anglican Society, and by using your personal influence to further its ends.

NOTE: The author of this article desires to express his sense of indebtedness to the Rev. H. H. Kelly, S.S.M. in his book "Catholicity" for many of the ideas and phrases used.

EVERY OTHER WEEK

There will be no issue of June 22 since, as is our custom, we publish every other week from June 15 to September 15. May we urge readers not to make address changes for these few summer numbers unless your vacation is an extended one. Arrange with your local post office or a friend to forward copies. Your cooperation will be greatly appreciated.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

ACOLYTES FESTIVAL IN PITTSBURGH

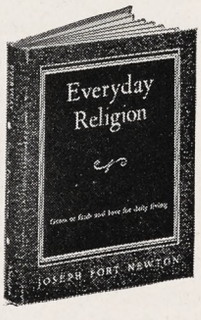
★ The annual festival of acolytes of the diocese of Pittsburgh was held May 27 at the Ascension, Pittsburgh. Bishop Pardue was celebrant and presented the bishop's award to the outstanding acolyte of each parish. The address was by the former rector of the Ascension, Bishop W. C. Campbell of West Virginia. And guess what the acolytes did Saturday afternoon —they were guests of the Pirates at a ball game with the Cubs.

PEACE RESOLUTION IN COLORADO

★ The convention of Colorado adopted a strong resolution, introduced by Dean Paul Roberts, urging peace and disarmament. It stated that "total war is a fair description of the danger of mankind; total destruction may be its outcome." Church people were urged "to exercise their responsibilities as Christians to pray and labor for a world at peace, in which through material and spiritual progress a world-wide human welfare may be increasingly achieved."

COLLEGE FACULTY INSTITUTE

★ An institute in theology for members of college faculties is to be held at Hamilton College, Clinton, N. J., June 18-25, sponsored by the committee of college work of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd provinces and the national division of college work. Lecturers are to be Chad Walsh of Beloit, Albert T. Mollegen of Virginia Seminary and T. R. Milford, chancellor of Lincoln Cathedral, England.



CONVENTION OF ATLANTA

★ The convention of the diocese of Atlanta, meeting at Marietta, Ga., passed a resolution expressing its determination to raise the full amount of its quota for the one world in Christ campaign. Bishop Walker also appointed a new committee to assist him in many aspects of administration details and in carrying out a number of projects.

DEPLORE CUTS IN BUDGET

★ Bishop Bloy and Bishop Campbell of Los Angeles during May addressed well attended meetings in the six convocations of the diocese at which they urged generous giving so that the diocese can pay its full quota to the National Council. They stated that in spite of the fact that the diocese is getting the largest influx of population in the country, they are convinced that by sacrificial giving they can pay their full quota and also carry forward the expansion program in the diocese.

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

The Salvation of the Nations. By Jean Danielou. Sheed and Ward. $2.00.

This is a study of missionary theology and spirituality, with the aim of promoting Christian missions. The author recognizes that "foreign" missions may lie next door, these days, since the great rivals of Christianity and the Catholic church are ubiquitous—Marxism, Materialism, Communism, Naturalism, and others. The book is by a brilliant French Roman Catholic scholar; though the language and outlook are somewhat foreign, Anglicans can learn from it. The author's sincerity and enthusiasm are obvious on every page.

Diary of a Dean. By W. R. Inge. Macmillan. $3.50.

Dean Inge has written 34 books. His Vale, designed to be his final volume, was number 25. Fortunate the person who "discovered" the Dean of St. Paul's early in the course, say along about number three, Christian Mysticism, or number ten, Speculum Animae, and then—as was inevitable—kept on reading him year in and year out, ever since! It must be acknowledged that the present volume will be more interesting to English readers than American; for it is full of notes on luncheons and dinners with the noble and the eminent in London society. But the reprinted lectures at the end of the volume are worth its price: The Idea of Progress (1920) and The Victorian Age (1922). The diary covers the years of his deanship, 1911 to 1934. His comments on World War I and events leading up to and following that holocaust are still relevant, now five years after War II. It is a pity more persons did not listen to "the gloomy Dean" in those dark years—dark, but not stygian, like the present.

Doctors Courageous. By Edward H. Hume. Harper. $3.50.

A fascinating account of medical missions, written with real insight and understanding by a doctor who has served for years on the missionary frontier. Well illustrated, and full of human interest stories—indeed, the whole book is a human interest epic from start to finish. The person who does not realize what missions really involve, and what the missionaries and doctors are doing for races and tribes still stuck in the morass of animism, ought to read this book. Let him open it anywhere, and he will go on; then he will go back to the beginning and read it all through! Though not a textbook, there could not be a better book for a course in missionary study, whether for adults or young people.

Poems of Edwin Markham. Sel. by Charles L. Wallis. Harper. $2.75.

Edwin Markham was an authentic poet—his lines have the music of the true poet in all ages, not the somber opacity and ugliness of much present day "verse and worse;" and he was the authentic poet of American social idealism. It is good to have this collected edition. In case our younger readers may not have made his acquaintance, take this for a sample:

We are all blind until we see
That in the human plan
Nothing is worth the making if
It does not make the man.

A History of the American Episcopal Church. By William W. Manross. Morehouse-Gorham. $5.00.

This is a second, revised edition of Dr. Manross' excellent history, first published fifteen years ago. The last two chapters, "Between the Wars" and "Toward the Future" bring the book up to date. The publishers have given it a very attractive format.

Man's Religions. By John B. Noss. Macmillan. $6.00.

An already vast and still increasing number of students are interested in the history of religions—this is the testimony of almost all college teachers today. A book which will provide an introduction to the huge but endlessly fascinating subject, which will keep the subject in right proportions (in this one, the beginnings of Christianity are crowded into 30 pages, its whole later history into barely over 100), and which will present the data fairly and objectively—such a book is a rarity. But here it is; and although the expert (experts always disagree!) will criticize some of the details, the general, over-all picture is accurate, and (best of all) presented interestingly. It is not only a textbook for the college course in its subject, but is sure to interest the general reader. It ought to be in every public library in the land.

Thirty-six Outline Sermons on General Subjects. By S. P. T. Prideaux. Morehouse-Gorham. $1.05.

Some preachers can use other men's sermon outlines. Some can not. Most men ought not to use other men's sermon outlines. Some men should. Every preacher should read all kinds of books—perhaps including sermon outlines! A few may perhaps find hints and suggestions in this little book.

Youth of the Church

By JOHN BOOTY
Ex-Chairman of the National Youth Commission

YOUNG Episcopalians are largely religious illiterates. This is not news. But we cannot passively accept this condition and hope for responsible and challenging youth work.

The problem is more than threatening. It is here. Young people 12, 13, 14 years of age are confirmed and "graduated" from church school. They "graduate" even before the adolescent crises of rehashing, rejection, questioning and searching. They fall prey to the nihilism and other creeds of our day, creeds which are convincingly preached in the secular classroom.

Those who lead the youth program of the Church have long realized the need for challenging Christian education. To help meet the need, the national youth commission provides, through the division of youth, educational units concerned with the Prayer Book, doctrine and evangelism. They have not been well received because the attitude seems to be that Christian education is dull. Even one unit written largely by a high school group was considered to be over the heads of young people.

A survey conducted recently among Episcopalian students at Princeton reveals that 30% believed that "the greatest ethical teacher who ever lived" best describes Jesus. Half of those polled seemed to accept pantheism. Almost a half of the students did not associate Paul with the famous experience on the road to Damascus. Two-fifths did not know where the Gospel of Matthew is in the Bbile. And these are future churchmen.

But what is being done? The biggest news is that the Church is producing a new curriculum. And for this we should give thanks. We should particularly give thanks when we realize that the people who are developing this new curriculum are alive to the problems and courageous in their attacks upon them. They know that the problem is greater than producing printed material. They realize there is a problem in the lack of skilled teachers. They know that one of the greatest tasks is to make the age old teachings of the Church alive and vital to the youth of our day.

Canon V. O. Ward, editor-in-chief of the new curriculum, sees great hope in the close working together of the church school and the youth group. Indeed it is here that we ought to focus our attention. Canon Ward is not only concerned with presenting the basic teaching of the Church to young people from kindergarten through high school, but is particularly concerned with making this teaching a living part of the individual. He is concerned with commitment.

Knowing Jesus is not merely a matter of memorizing a statement in a text book. Too many people do this. Knowing Jesus is also and most basically a matter of experiencing the Christ. And it is in the primary associations of the youth group with application and close fellowship that young people of the Church can intellectually and emotionally experience what they have learned by listening and memorizing. The youth group bull-session is the hidden key-point in all of our youth work. No matter how confused and inarticulate a crowd of young people may be in discussing the meaning of Paul's experience on the road to Damascus, it is real and vital because it has become a personal concern, and the young people have had to tackle with the experience without the aid of authority, or so called authority.

Not long ago a youth convention was held in the deep south. The delegates were junior high school and senior high school youth. One night, after the formal program, the convention adjourned and the young people decided to enjoy themselves. For a while they played games, sang songs, watched television. But then a few gathered about a fireplace and began to discuss some of the things which had been said at the convention. Before long many more had gathered with them. I sincerely wish that all of the clergy and youth advisors could have heard their discussion. They sought together to know what Jesus would say about war, about pacifism, about race relations. They would have alarmed conservatives and thrilled others. This too is education. For this group of young people, Christian education was neither dull nor vague. It was vital and pointedly personal. Many young people knew Christ for the first time that evening.

As the new curriculum is prepared, let the youth leaders of the Church back up every good and courageous effort of the department of Christian education. Let us send post cards and letters to the department at 281 Fourth Avenue, to let them know how we feel about Christian education. Let us seek in our own parishes to coordinate our high school church effort and our youth groups. Let us promote free discussions of the vital points of the faith.

There is hope for literate and committed young Churchmen and women. Let us bend our every effort to see our hope realized.

Church lighting as an art can be coordinated with church lighting as a science to improve the architecture, the general decorative effect, and at the same time help put the congregation at ease and induce attention to the service. Note, in the illustration, that (1) the Nave is lighted by lanterns giving general diffused light, (2) the choir stalls are lighted by open bottom lanterns which give excellent light downward, yet little light in the eyes of the congregation and, finally, (3) two opaque shields suspended over the Communion rail give ample and well distributed light on the Altar and in the Sanctuary generally. Send for our questionnaire and booklet, "Church Lighting Trends".

BACKFIRE

FROM THE VESTRY
Trinity, Fayetteville, N. Y.
(by telegram)

The article in June 1 Witness does serious injustice to our rector, William Chater, and to parish, Trinity, Fayetteville. Article implies Mr. Chater resigned post because of the turning down by diocesan convention of seating on his vestry of Mrs. Arthur Lambert. Seating of Mrs. Lambert not even mentioned at convention as this parochial matter was settled by official opinion of chancellor of diocese nearly two months before convention. With knowledge and consent of Mrs. Lambert, vestry sought opinion from Hon. Kennard Underwood, chancellor, which was as follows: "Any parochial election of a woman as vestryman or warden is illegal and void. In your case I see no reason for the lady to file any resignation as she holds no office from which to resign. Your vestry has power to fill existing vacancy."

Vestry and Mrs. Lambert agreed to accept chancellor's ruling. Therefore statement in The Witness about vigorous efforts planned to obtain Mrs. Lambert's resignation is completely inaccurate and is unfair to Mrs. Lambert.

Statement in The Witness that Mr. Chater had made original ruling that Mrs. Lambert be seated regardless of diocesan and Church canons is absolutely wrong. He deferred to wish of majority that this nomination from floor be made but definitely advised meeting that their action would be subject to ruling by diocesan authority. No person identifying himself a representative of The Witness or any Church or other paper has talked with Mr. Chater, Mrs. Lambert or officers of parish concerning his resignation. Mr. Chater resigned for simple reason he was given call that offered opportunities our parish cannot match. We respectfully ask full publication this telegram at earliest possible date.

ANSWER: We are of course sorry if our news story did anyone an injustice. It was received, we thought at the time, from our regular correspondent for the diocese of Central New York, a man who is exceedingly accurate and reliable. We have now learned that he was on vacation in New Jersey and that the news was sent us by a substitute correspondent.

Personally, I regret that the story did not report facts. Women someday will be on vestries; be seated in diocesan and General Convention, and when this happens it will be because they fight by every legitimate means for these rights. The news from Fayetteville read to me like women who were fighting and being supported by their rector. As news editor I was therefore delighted to print it and regret being obliged to take it back by publishing the above telegram.

As a matter of fact, the lot of a news editor on a Church paper is not always a happy one since he often gets perfectly accurate stories that he withholds for one reason or another. There is a story now out of St. Louis and another out of Albany which would make for a more interesting magazine. They are not printed, contrary to my own judgment, because I am advised by others not to "for the good of the Church." To me, the Church would best be served in the long run by printing them, but I defer to the judgment of wiser men. Nevertheless this whole question of what to print and what not to print would make for exciting discussion at a conference of editors.

—W. B. S.

ROBERT J. PLUMB
Rector, St. Mark's, Washington, D. C.

A man going under the name of Alvin Hansen or Clifford E. Douglas, after attending a church service, is presenting a generous letter of recommendation supposedly signed by me and saying that he is a friend of Bishop Dun of Washington. He is heavy set; has greyish hair; has florid complexion; is in his fifties and is usually chewing gum. May claim to be national director of the American Research and Writers' Association, an anti-communistic organization. Has been recently in Kansas and Colorado.

This man is not a communicant of the Church and his letter is a forgery. I will appreciate a warning of your readers.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Large Number of Missionaries Leave for Foreign Fields

Presiding Bishop Commissons at Service Which Is Held at Seabury House

★ A commissioning service for 32 outgoing missionaries of the Church was held at Seabury House on June 18th, following a conference of the group which started with the dinner hour the previous day. This is the largest group of Episcopal mission workers to be commissioned at one time since before the war. Presiding Bishop Sherrill was the commissioning officer, with Bishop John B. Bentley, vice-president of the National Council and director of the overseas department, assisting.

The service was brief, the missionaries being asked to reaffirm their allegiance to Christ, their sense of missionary vocation and call, to promise to give themselves unreservedly to the work they are undertaking, to maintain the faith and to "proclaim with fidelity the truth of the gospel."

The thirty-two missionaries will go to Cuba, Honolulu, Japan, Okinawa, where the Episcopal Church is just starting work, Liberia, and Nicaragua. They come from fifteen dioceses of the United States, and those who are clergymen represent six theological seminaries. They are graduates of nineteen colleges, including Oxford University in England.

The missionaries who will leave soon for their fields are: The Rev. Robert H. Coleman of Garrison, Md., former captain in the marines. He goes to Kyoto, Japan, for pastoral clinical work, following a summer of language study at Yale.

The Rev. Kenneth T. Cosbey, Wood Ridge, N. J., son of the rector of St. Paul's Church there. He too, is a former marine with rank of captain at the time of his separation. He will work in Hawaii, where he was stationed for some time when he was a marine.

Paul M. Daniel of Cincinnati, with experience in Boy Scout work and three years in the infantry and air corps, will go with Mrs. Daniel and their young son to head the new laboratory in the science department of Cuttington College, Liberia, West Africa. Mr. Daniel has been laboratory assistant in the department of zoology, Miami University, for the past year, and Mrs. Daniel is a bacteriologist, graduated from Miami University in 1948.

The Rev. William D. Eddy, who has been living at Tomas, Mexico. He was a naval officer during the late war, and will go to Japan to be on the faculty of the Monoyama Boys School, Osaka.

The Rev. Norman B. Godfrey has been for the past ten years rector of St. John's Church, Massena, N. Y. He, with Mrs. Godfrey and their five children will live temporarily in Honolulu until a home can be built for them on Okinawa. He is to open what is an entirely new mission field on Okinawa, where previously the Episcopal Church has not been represented.

The Rev. William R. Grosh of Philadelphia, has worked as a lay pastor in a Virginia prison camp, and in rural parishes and missions. He has specialized in clinical pastoral training, and will be located at Waimanalo on the island of Oahu, T. H.

The Rev. William C. Heffner, Richmond, Va., served in the navy during the war, has experience in young people's work and in pastoral clinical training. He will be located on Okinawa, to work with Mr. Godfrey.

Anna C. Jones, M.D. of New York, is a graduate of the Harlem Hospital school of nursing, St. Augustine's College, Raleigh, N. C., West Virginia State College, Meharry Medical College. She will join the staff of St. Timothy's Hospital, Cape Mount, Liberia.

The Rev. Judson S. Leeman, M.D., has been in charge of the church hospital at Pinedale, Wyo. He has his degree in medicine from the University of Minnesota, and in theology from the General Seminary. He has combined medicine and religious ministry in his work. He served as a naval chaplain during the war and will be on the staff of St. Luke's International Medical Center, Tokyo, Japan.

The Rev. Milton R. LeRoy, Atlanta, Ga., was in the infantry for three years, a first lieutenant at the time of his separation. With Mrs. LeRoy and their one son he will leave for work in Cuba in the very near future.

The Rev. Moultrie H. McIntosh of Summerville, S. C., is a baritone of considerable prominence. He served in the army during the late war, and for the past year and a half has been

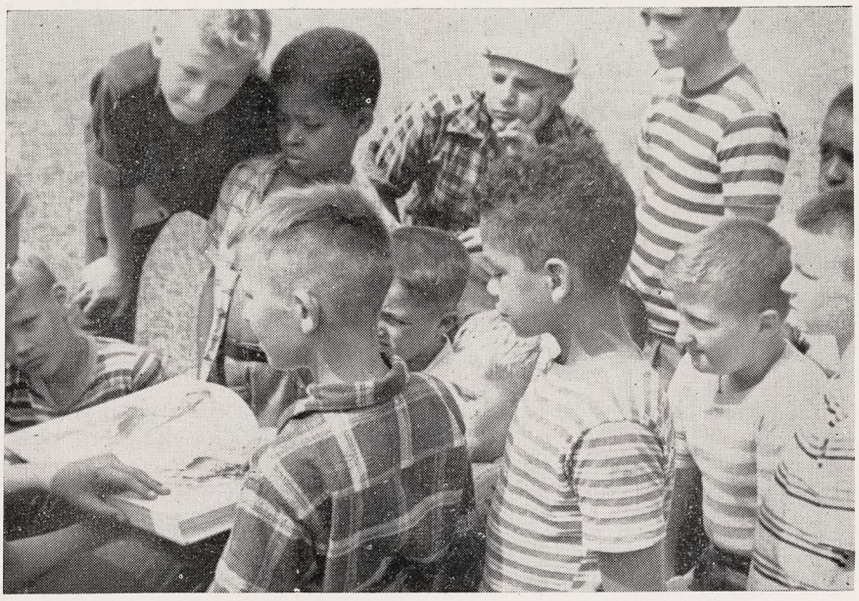
WESTERN CLERGY MEET

★ Clergymen of the four dioceses in Washington and Oregon held a conference in Tacoma, June 12-16, to hear and discuss plans for a revitalized program of education. It was the second of four such conferences held this month on the Pacific coast. Leaders from 281 were the Rev. John Heuss, Mrs. Dora P. Chaplin and Miss Charlotte Tomkins, and with them were Canon and Mrs. Theodore Wedel of Washington, D. C. and Prof. Reuel Howe of Virginia Seminary.

CONVOCATION MEETINGS IN MICHIGAN

★ A series of six convocation meetings were held in Michigan in May and June for the Auxiliary, at which the program of the diocese was explained by either Bishop Emrich or Bishop Hubbard.

PROGRAM ISSUES FOR ORGANISTS



★ The commission on Church music, meeting in Evanston, adopted a program to aid organists and choirmasters through a series of three pamphlets which will deal with music at weddings, funerals and services in small churches. An effort will also be made to produce records which will give examples of plainsong and some of the music for the communion service. The commission is also considering a school of music for next summer, which would be primarily for organists and choir directors.

BISHOP MITCHELL MADE CHANCELLOR

★ Bishop Bland Mitchell of Arkansas was elected chancellor of the University of the South at the four-day commencement, June 11-14. Other highlights were the laying of the cornerstone for a $300,000 dining hall; the conferring of 127 degrees—largest in history.

BISHOP CARRUTHERS APPOINTED

★ Bishop Carruthers of South Carolina has been appointed to the committee to arrange for the Pan-Anglican Congress of 1953, succeeding Bishop Pardue of Pittsburgh, resigned.

LADS LIKE THESE, representing many races and nationalities, are looking forward to this summer when they can go to Camp Chickagami, located in the northern part of the diocese of Michigan

CLERICAL UNION PROTESTS

★ A committee representing the Clerical Union of New York has issued a statement on behalf of the organization expressing "complete disapproval of Bishop Hall's lawless action in allowing ministers of non-episcopal bodies to participate in a service of ordination." The statement, which claims to speak for 200 priests with approximately 67,000 lay people under their care, "regards Bishop Hall's conduct as highly reprehensible" which it brands as a "capricious performance." The committee concludes with the statement: "For the peace, unity and well being of our entire communion, we earnestly hope that everything possible will be done to prevent the recurrence of any such distressing event, and to see that the offending bishop is properly disciplined."

Signers of the document are the Rev. Charles H. Graf, rector of St. John's, New York; the Rev. Thomas S. Bradley, assistant chaplain at St. Luke's Hospital, New York; the Rev. Herbert Brown, rector of Trinity, Cliffside Park, N. J.

GARDINER M. DAY PRAISES PAPER

★ Rector Gardiner M. Day of Cambridge praised the Boston Herald for an editorial which came to the support of Bishop Hall of New Hampshire, recently attacked by the American Church Union for allowing an ordination in which ministers of other Churches joined in the laying on of hands. Day stated in a letter to the paper that "the reunion of the Churches will be achieved only as the various Churches refuse to be guided by rigid and exclusive denominational rules and, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, move boldly along the paths of cooperative action and common worship."

ACTIVE BUILDING IN LOS ANGELES

★ There is great building activity in the diocese of Los Angeles, with Bishop Bloy reporting that "I have broken more ground and dedicated more buildings during the past two years than any other bishop in any other diocese."

Here are some activities of the past two months: All Saints Church, San Diego, dedicated a chapel on June 11, the first unit of a $45,000 building plan. All Saints, Beverly Hills, broke ground for a $500,000 church. Grace Church, Los Angeles, dedicated a $25,000 parish house. St. Stephen's, Hollywood, dedicated a $50,000 parish house. St. John's, Wilmington, is building a $10,000 parish house. St. Alban's, Westwood, is building an $85,000 addition to the parish house. Holy Trinity, Alhambra, is building a $50,000 parish house, part of a $135,000 program. All Souls, San Diego, dedicated a $35,000 church. Holy Trinity, Covina, is building a $35,000 parish hall. St. Paul's, Santa Paula, completed a $10,000 class room and rector's study, to be followed by a new church and parish house. St. Peter's, Santa Maria, has started a building program with the purchase of an $8,000 lot. St. Thomas, Hollywood, has announced plans for a new church.

WASHINGTON CATHEDRAL REAFFIRMS STAND

★ Washington Cathedral is sticking to its practice of inviting non-Episcopalians to join in the communion service. Bishop Angus Dun was recently attacked by a branch of the American Church Union for issuing such an invitation.

On a recent Sunday Dean John W. Suter pointedly issued a general invitation. Meanwhile Bishop Dun has been vigorously defended by a large number of Washington clergy, including the Rev. William Sharp, rector of St. John's; the Rev. Edward H. Pruden, new president of the Northern Baptists and the pastor of the First Baptist Church, where President Truman is a member; the Rev. Robert S. Trenbath, rector of Trinity; the Rev. Oscar F. Blackwelder, Lutheran, who declared in a sermon that Bishop Dun is "one of the most intelligent, matured and statesmanlike Christians that I know."

URGES POLITICAL ACTION

★ Rector Arthur S. Knapp of Trinity, Houston, Texas, has written an open letter to his parishioners urging them to take a more active part in politics. He branded the apathy of people towards elections as a "scandal." He also urged them to attend precinct meetings and to take a positive stand on issues and then stick by their position.

"What is the matter with us?," Knapp wrote. "Do we need pretty girls and a hillbilly band to incite us to do our religious and civic duty?" and went on to say that his people are concerned about the problems that face the nation as much as he is, but said: "What do we do about it? Complain, but anything else?"

He urged them to talk politics with neighbors and to discuss not only issues but personalities.

MISSIONARIES ARE PRAISED

★ Dr. and Mrs. Brank Fulton of the Yale in China Mission recently invited the St. Thomas Society, a student organization at Huachung College, Wuchang, to be their guests for one of the meetings. Afterward, one of the students, whose courage in writing English was greater than his experience with that language, reported the meeting. He wrote in part:

"Mrs. and Dr. Fulton are both kind, kind indeed. Phonograph, talk, laughter, all come before address; solemn, silent, pious, peaceful and calm, all are soon filling full of air as the speaker takes his place Dr. Fulton has really drown it out diligently. Who dare not in fact keep his admire for any more longer? After his excellent speech, Mrs. Fulton graciously delivers us cakes and tea. Dr. Fulton then changes his holy face and begins to make fun and joke people.

"On our way to school, a strong feeling strikes me: Love in Christ is immortal."

An undated letter from Dr. Fulton himself says: "Life has gone on quite smoothly with relatively few changes so far, of which the most interesting is the increase of student par-

We personally are finding that friendliness on the part of our colleagues and of the people in the street generally has if anything increased . . . Americans as individuals are being treated in a reasonable and friendly manner."

CONVENTION OF BROTHERHOOD

★ A convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew is being held this week, June 26-30, at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa. The chaplain is Bishop Barry of Albany, and addresses are being given by Bishop Spencer, retired, of West Missouri; Bishop Heistand of Harrisburg and Layman Paul Rusch of Japan. It is the first convention to be attended in that capacity by the new general secretary, Morton O. Nace.

The convention was for both the senior and junior branches.

student chaplain at the Episcopal High School. He has had two years of pastoral clinical training. He will be located at St. Mark's parish, Bluefields, Nicaragua, to work especially among the Mesquito Indians.

The Rev. Gale F. Miller of Endicott, N. Y., is a former U. S. marine, graduate of Syracuse University and the Episcopal Theological School. He will go to Liberia, to work in Episcopal missions in the interior.

The Rev. Christopher Morley Jr., Roslyn Heights, N. Y., is a son of the writer and was for a time assistant editor of The Witness. He served during the war with the army. He has been assigned by the Presiding Bishop of the Nippon Seikokwai (Holy Catholic Church in Japan) to join the faculty of the Central Theological College, Tokyo, Japan. He is a member of a team of three which will go, at the request of the Japanese Church, to head up the seminary staff.

The Rev. Shunji F. Nishi, New York, has been a fellow and tutor at the General Theological Seminary in New York, assistant chaplain at Columbia University, assistant at Christ Church, Cambridge, Mass., and field worker for the National Council's division of domestic missions. He will go to Japan to become dean of the Central Theological College, Tokyo.

The Rev. William B. Parsons Jr., New York, was a star member of the football team at Harvard. He served in the navy during the war, and has worked with the clergy school at Calvary Church, New York. He is a nephew of Bishop Peabody of the Diocese of Central New York. He will serve in Kobe, Japan.

The Rev. Max M. Pearse Jr., of Detroit, has been assistant at St. Columba's Church there. He will serve in Liberia.

Joseph F. Reed of Honolulu has been treasurer of the district of Honolulu for the past four years, following three years in the marine corps. He is now being placed under regular missionary appointment and will continue his work in Honolulu.

Miss Edith J. Sloan, member of the Church of the Heavenly Rest, New York, has been educated in this country and in Switzerland. During the war she was an officer in the WAC. She will be on the faculty of the House of Bethany, Cape Mount, Liberia.

The Rev. Robert MacL. Smith had been working as a lay missionary in Mexico prior to his ordination. He has been assigned to pastoral work in Kyushu, Japan.

Reed F. Stewart, Hyde Park, Mass., with Mrs. Stewart, will go to Bromley, Liberia, where he will be superintendent of Julia Emery Hall and Mrs. Stewart will be principal of Julia Emery Hall and a missionary teacher.

The Rev. Roger N. Whybray, New York, has been a tutor and instructor at the General. He was educated in England, and Mrs. Whybray was educated in France. After some further study in England they will proceed to Japan, where Mr. Whybray will serve on the faculty of the Central Theological College, Tokyo.

Mrs. Laura H. Yergan, R.N., will join the nursing staff of St. Timothy's Hospital, Cape Mount, Liberia. She is a member of St. Philip's Church, New York, a graduate in nursing of the Harlem Hospital school of nursing, and with a B.S. degree from Hunter College. She has worked with the Harlem Hospital, the Hartford visiting nurses' association and the New York department of health.

The Way to Peace

RECENTLY we submitted a few thoughts dealing with the connection there is between fear and a bad conscience. In the course of this piece we suggested that the only successful way for America to overcome her present hysterical fear of Soviet Russia was to take the Christian Apostle's statement that "perfect love casteth out fear" at face value and to proceed on a course of self-giving toward Russia, as we did during the late war, which, in economic terms, would mean taking down the bars against trade and sending her whatever she requires and will pay for.

We have been criticized for making such a suggestion, on the grounds that such a procedure was merely idealistic and was hopelessly impractical as a national policy in today's world. In personal relations, we were told, such idealistic action might be fruitful, but among nations it would never work.

Our answer to this criticism is two-fold. First,—it is the business of Christian leaders to set forth Christian ideals, for nations as well as individuals. Nations and individuals will probably not actually reach the high mark aimed at, but they will certainly come nearer to it than if the aim itself had been lower. In long-distance marksmanship one doesn't aim the gun straight at the mark, but well above it if he expects to hit his objective.

Second,—we venture the assertion that the present United States policy of throttling trade between the U. S. A. and the U. S. S. R. makes no sense at all, even from the severely practical standpoint of national health and strength. The reason given for this policy is that we must rigorously limit our exports to Russia lest we contribute to her war potential. As a result of this policy we sold last year to Russia, with her 200 million people, only one-twelfth of the amount that we sold to Sweden with her six million people. During the four years of war, we sent the Soviet Union eleven billion dollars worth of goods, but even that immense amount was but five percent of what she needed; the remaining ninety-five she provided for herself. Isn't it then, slightly absurd to believe that cutting down on our exports to Russia today (we sent her a bare eight million of goods in 1949) will make any appreciable difference to her war potential, with her productive capacity today far above her war and pre-war totals? Soviet planners are more realistic and intelligent than ours. They continue to sell us manganese and chrome ores freely, although they are well aware that we are stockpiling them for military purposes.

United States exports to the world at large decreased $500,000,000 in 1949, with resulting decreased income for labor, increased unemployment and lowered profits for industry and commerce. Normal trade with Russia and with the nations of eastern Europe would very much more than make up that deficit. The locomotives and freight-cars which Russia would buy from us, if we permitted her, would keep our plants busy for years. And because we will not sell her such goods as these, Russia is now naturally retaliating by cutting down her purchases of cotton (which we permit her to buy) and looking more and more to India and Brazil for her cotton supplies. Because of this impasse, our cotton warehouses are full, our farmers desperate for markets and our cotton acreage for 1950 is reduced more than twenty percent from 1949. Our political and military planners are, day by day, "biting off the nose to spite the face"! And the great newspapers of the country are doing their bit to suppress the hard economic facts of United States policy, so that the rank and file of our people will go along tamely without protest on the road toward war, accompanied by the childish hysteria of the McCarthys and Hickenloopers who rejoice in muddying the waters of truth and decency, while still an alternative of sound economic sense might be chosen, were American citizens allowed to know the facts of economic life.

I AM a little rusty on the various heresies but, as I remember it, the Jansenists were condemned because they said we must never be happy unless we are unhappy. This heresy seems to be attractive to bishops. We are tempted to feel sorry for ourselves because we have to work so hard. When the census taker came to our home, he asked the form question, "Were you working last week?" "Yes." "How many hours did you work?" "Seventy." "What? Forty is the limit."

No, we have no apology for having stated that present American fears - like all fear - are gripping us today because something is basically wrong, wrong with ourselves, our national leaders and national policies. And we are not ashamed of the Christian ideal that "perfect love casteth out fear" nor of urging it as applicable to men and nations. For love is not an emotion merely, but a way of life, the way of self-giving. The Christian citizenry of America needs to get this spiritual fact clearly into its head and heart and realize that its economic expression is trade and then more trade with potential enemies. Only by such a policy shall we escape from our fears, bred of sin and ignorance, and begin again to walk in the way of peace. Then we shall see at last determined and successful pressure brought on the present blind policy-makers in political, military and industrial high places, to the end that fear may be replaced by repentance and good sense and America's direction of travel be reversed from the Fascism and war road that it is now traveling to the highway of fearless democracy and peace which is the traditional way of the America we have loved and respected.

The Bishop and Pastoral Relationship

BY EDWARD L. PARSONS
Retired Bishop of California

THIS is not a discussion of the Melish case. It is or aims to be a discussion of some of the principles of ecclesiastical action raised by that and other cases. These are in general the nature of the bishop's responsibility towards the clergy and congregations of the diocese, the interpretation of the canons dealing with tenure and with the election of rectors and the wide and fundamental question of "liberty of prophesying" which means not only freedom of the pulpit, but freedom to follow what the priest believes is the guidance of God in his pastoral ministry.

The first question concerns the nature of the bishop's responsibility, and I am aware that a few paragraphs of what sound like rather dogmatic assertions do no more than open the subject. History if we cut it off at any one point could support almost any view. And yet if we follow down through the centuries from Ignatius' picture of what he thought a bishop ought to be to the office for the consecration of a bishop in our American Prayer Book there is one thread which runs through it all. The bishop's office in relation to his "people" is primarily religious, not ecclesiastical. Whatever be the theory of the episcopate, or in the particular case the impact of the burden he bears, whatever his importance in linking his people to the Church of Christ throughout the world, or, as the inevitable monarchical conception of the episcopate developed, whatever emphasis came upon his rule he is always the pastor, the chief pastor of his people. Although he must in some sense rule, his relationship to his people is not essentially administrative. "Feed my sheep" is its chosen expression. The touching words of the Orthodox prayer carry its deepest meaning: "Grant that this man now made a steward of episcopal grace may be an imitator of thee, the True Shepherd, giving his life for thy sheep, to be a guide to the blind, a light to those in darkness, a teacher of the ignorant, an instructor of infants, a lamp in the world."

Although fortunately (at least for us in the Anglican Communion) the monarchical episcopate is gone, the bishop must still be judge, administrator, policy maker and the like; but the point I am emphasizing is that these functions are all subordinate, mere incidentals to his primary function as chief pastor; judge at one time, administrator at another, he is always pastor. He is related to the boards and councils and vestries of his diocese as an administrator; but his real relationship, the one that takes precedence over all others is that of pastor to the members of those groups.

I begin with this statement because it means that if there is any question concerning the canons dealing with the bishop's responsibilities the primary emphasis in interpretation must be upon his pastoral function. Most canonical obligations are quite clear. The bishop cannot, for example, ordain without the prior consent of the standing committee. But there are canons which are not so definite in their meaning. Among them is that which has to do with the calling of a rector. It is appropriate therefore, that before we come to the vexed question of tenure we should look at its provisions.

On Calling A Rector

THE canon (47) is quite explicit concerning procedure. There is no doubt whatever as to the things which are to be done. When a vacancy occurs the wardens or other officers shall notify the bishop; the vestry then proceeds to canvass the list of persons suggested to fill the vacancy, and having made their choice notify the bishop. The vestry do this under the provision of canon 13 which makes them "agents and legal representatives" of the parish in all matters concerning "the relations of the parish to its clergy." There is nothing to prevent the vestry inviting the help of members of the congregation, nor submitting proposals to the parish, but when they have made their choice they must submit the name to the bishop giving him thirty days to consider the matter and presumably to tell the vestry what he thinks about it.

And then arises the question which needs to be cleared up. The canon says nothing about what the vestry shall do with the bishop's communication if he sends one in reply to their notification. It ignores it and goes on to say that the election shall be notified to the ecclesiastical authority and he if he "is satisfied that the person so chosen is a duly qualified minister and has accepted the office" shall direct the secretary of convention to record it, and that done the matter is completed.

Now there are two obvious inferences from this procedure: The first is that the initiative lies with the vestry. That does not mean that the bishop should not consult with the vestry, suggest names for their consideration and keep in touch with them during the whole procedure. It does mean obviously that the bishop has no authority to limit the field of the vestry's choice. If he should endeavor to do so by insisting that choice be made within a list which he presents, the vestry is entirely within its rights in declining to be so limited. The initiative lies with the vestry. Nor, it should be noted, has a diocese any right to legislate contrary to this canon.

And the second inference is that the canon does not intend to give the bishop an unlimited veto power. If that were the case it would not leave us up in the air about what happens to the bishop's communication to the vestry if he sends one after his thirty days consideration. It would not wait as it does until the vestry has completed the whole affair, has elected the person they wanted, has received his acceptance, and then notified the bishop. It is only when all that is done that the bishop can exercise the veto power recognized in the "duly qualified" clause.

THINGS BEGAN TO HAPPEN WHEN THE SEMINARIES WERE FOUNDED

Missionaries of the Church of England founded dozens of parishes before 1776 but the Church had an uphill fight. Fields were lost, never to be recovered. There were no American bishops, and there were no theological schools.

Organizing the national Church was a great step forward. The next was the founding of theological schools. After that the great missionary expansion started.

We have here a somewhat awkward arrangement. Even if the bishop disapproves he can do nothing officially until the call has been accepted and he is notified. It is obvious that the "duly qualified" clause which gives him veto power is not expected normally to come into use at all. It may be assumed that as their chief pastor the bishop has already given the vestry his judgment on the qualifications of the man they have chosen.

What then is this power of veto? What does "duly qualified" mean? It has, I think, been generally assumed that it means a man properly ordained and under no disciplinary action. That assumption is in the main correct, but the canonists (cf. Hoffman, White in loco) make clear that it goes further. It is based upon the English usage and must be interpreted thereby. To go into all the supporting details seems unnecessary. It is enough to quote the English canon of 1603, which if there had been any bishops in the Colonies before the Revolution would have governed their action. The man chosen to a benefice must in addition to his letter of orders bring the bishop a "sufficient testimony of his former good life and behavior if the bishop shall require it, and lastly shall appear upon due examination to be worthy of his ministry." There can I think be no doubt that that is the correct interpretation of the phrase. It means definitely not that the bishop can veto an election because he does not like a man's theology or his social views or his personality, or if he is outside the diocese, because he is not the kind of a man he wants in it. It is not, and this is vitally important, a question of whether the bishop thinks the man would not be well adapted to the particular parish. That is the vestry's decision, the apparent view of a New York Court to the contrary notwithstanding. The bishop must, to put it bluntly, be satisfied that the man ought not to be in the ministry at all.

Now if this is what the canon means and what the Church wants it seems that the bishop and the vestry should have clearer guidance. The vestry should understand that the bishop has full advisory rights in the matter of their choice and indeed as loyal churchmen they should welcome his counsel but that the initiative and final decision rests with them. The bishop may veto that decision only when he is satisfied that the person chosen is in character and education not properly qualified to be in the ministry at all. Everyone knows that there are men in the ministry who have never done anything which could warrant trial for "conduct unbecoming a clergyman," but whose whole professional career reveals precisely that they never should have been ordained. If this is what the Church means and wants, the canon could be clarified by adding a few words so that it might, for example, read "is duly qualified by ordination, faith, and character to serve in the ministry of this Church."

Finally it is clear that although the canon says nothing about it, the bishop as chief pastor and not as a mere administrator must inform the vestry of the grounds of his veto. Indeed if he is in such relationship with the vestry as he should be the substance of his judgment in the matter will be known. The veto, unless it has been fully anticipated in the previous conferences with the vestry, may be canonical but it certainly would not be what the vestry should expect from its chief pastor. Some of the grounds on which the bishop acts may well be confidential; but the main facts of the previous service of the clergyman in question on which the bishop's decision is based may properly be put in writing.

Meaning Not Clear

FINALLY I emphasize again the fact that while the canonical process is clear, the meaning of duly qualified is not. The veto should clearly be not a summary action, but the sequel to or result of the conferences implied in the thirty days allowed the bishop for consideration of the vestry's choice. The matter is really fundamental. The veto is to be exercised only if the vestry persists in calling a man whom the bishop has already told them he believes to be unfit for the ministry at all. To interpret the canon to mean that the bishop has practically an unlimited veto is contrary to the Anglican tradition both here and in England. It is important that the Church decide where it stands. Freedom of congregations to make their own choice, and freedom of movement among the clergy are involved. Implicit also is the question whether the Church wishes to make it not only possible but easy for a bishop to mould a diocese into his own way of thinking. The influence of his character and his thinking would be and should be great. He should be a leader and the way open for him to lead, but to be a leader is quite different from being a "boss". Finally let me say emphatically that the Church should not leave it to a secular court to decide what it means.

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the first of three articles on this important subject. The next will discuss the tenure and dissolution of the pastoral relationship; the third with the liberty of prophesying.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

COMMENCEMENT AT BERKELEY

★ Canon George W. Briggs of Worcester, England, author of six hymns in our Hymnal, was a headliner at the commencement of the Berkeley Divinity School. He has been the visiting lecturer there during the Spring term. The alumni preacher was the Rev. Elmer Horstmann of Christ Church, Bridgeport, Conn. It was the first commencement to be held in the rebuilt and enlarged chapel of the school. It was announced by Dean Urban that Bishop Burroughs, coadjutor of Ohio, and the Rev. G. Paull T. Sargent of St. Bartholomew's, New York, are the newly elected alumni trustees.

SERVICE FOR NURSES IN DETROIT

★ Uniformed graduates and student nurses of the major hospitals of Detroit marched to St. Paul's Cathedral on June 4 for the annual service of the Guild of St. Barnabas. Bishop Hubbard, who had been elected chaplain-general of the guild the previous day, succeeding the Rev. John G. Martin of Newark, was the preacher. The latter conducted all of the meeting at this biennial conference where plans were made to extend the program by setting up branches in provinces.

COMMENCEMENT AT CAMBRIDGE

★ A class of 26 graduated from the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, at which Bishop Powell of Maryland was the preacher. The Rev. Gardiner M. Day of Christ Church, Cambridge, was the preacher at the alumni service. Headliner at the alumni dinner was the Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes, former canon of Washington Cathedral. A member of the class that graduated fifty years ago, Canon Stokes said that the fundamentals for which the School stood then held true today: reverence and search for truth; supreme significance of the Incarnation; importance of Christ's summary of the law based on the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; the Church as an instrument for bringing in the kingdom of God.

THE HISTORIC FAITH AND A CHANGING WORLD

Religious Book Club Selection for July! by the Rev. W. Norman Pittenger, S. T. D.

Dr. Pittenger believes that the assumptions by which we Americans live are "dubiously Christian." He insists we need a "straight" Gospel of God's sovereign and redemptive power . . . that the new movements in theology can help, with qualifications. Above all, we must regard Christianity as "the saving Word of God" to man. A deep-probing book..

also spoke at the dinner, stressing particularly the contributions made to the school by the late Bishop William Lawrence.

COMMENCEMENT AT VIRGINIA

★ Commencement was held at Virginia Seminary on June 8 with 38 men graduating. Professor A. C. Lichtenberger of the General Seminary gave the graduation address, with Bishop Goodwin of Virginia presiding at an ordination service on the 9th, assisted by Bishop Dun, Bishop Peabody and Bishop Blankingship. Honorary degrees went to Bishop Clairborne of Alabama; the Rev. Richard H. Baker of Baltimore; the Rev. Charles Smith of Wellesley; Dean F. Craighill Brown of the seminary of the University of the South. The Rev. Darby Betts, formerly of Alexandria was awarded a masters degree.

DEDICATE CHAPEL IN BROOKLYN

★ A war memorial chapel of unusual color and beauty was dedicated at St. Paul's, Flatbush, Brooklyn, on June 11. Speaking at the service was the rector, Harold S. Olafson, who said that the chapel commemorates 350 men and women of the parish who served in the last war, of whom fourteen were killed.

JENSEN APPOINTED TO COMMISSION

★ The Rev. Philip J. Jensen of Owings Mills, Md., has been appointed to the commission to study the question of the placement of the clergy. He was appointed by Dean Sprouse, president of the House of Deputies, to succeed Bishop Campbell of West Virginia, no longer eligible to represent Deputies.

KENYON & GAMBIER COMMENCEMENT

★ Commencement at Kenyon College and Bexley Hall, theological seminary of the college, was held June 12 with 136 men graduating from Kenyon and 12 from Bexley.

ORDER OF JAMESTOWN HAS SERVICE

★ The 343rd anniversary of the establishment of the Episcopal Church on this side of the Atlantic was observed on June 25th with special services held at the Robert Hunt Shrine, Jamestown, Va. The preacher was the Rev. Arthur P. Middleton.

LOWELL RECTOR IN BERLIN

★ The Rev. Laurence H. Blackburn of St. Anne's, Lowell, Mass., is spending the summer in Berlin, Germany, at the invitation of Bishop Otto Dibelius of the Evangelical Church. He is to preach in the churches in the American sector, teach in the Evangelical Seminary and participate in youth conferences.

NEW TRUSTEE OF PENSION FUND

★ David E. Bronson has been elected a trustee of the Church Pension Fund. He is warden of St. Paul's, Minneapolis, chancellor of the diocese of Minnesota and has been a deputy to five General Conventions.

BACKFIRE

JAMES M. STONEY
Bishop of N. M. & S. W. Texas

I was very much intrigued by your account, in the June 8 issue, of the attack by A. C. U. on Bishops Hall and Dun. It seems that the smear campaign that has so enlivened the legislative branch of the federal government will soon find an echo in the Church. If the ecclesiastical Senator McCarthys really got to work, it will not be long before any of us caught at golf or at lunch or on the streets with Presbyterians, Congregationalists or Methodists will be suspected of being Protestant sympathizers.

This will not bother all of us, for we cheerfully admit that we are Protestant sympathizers. More, we are Protestants. The Prayer Book says so, and we are pledged to abide by that.

Maybe it was from this same group that I got handled rather unkindly some years ago. The question then was evening Communions which form a regular part of the procedure in this district. I never did see what the hands of the clock have to do with the consecration of the Eucharist, nor do I know which time belt determines the matter, nor whether the rule calls for standard time or daylight saving.

Anyway, I am all for Bishops Hall and Dun. If the matter had received publicity, I might have gotten it myself, two years ago, when I celebrated the Holy Communion for the State Council of Churches, and administered to clergymen of all the denominations represented.

How I wish that we could turn our attention to serving the Lord, rather than to wasting our energy arguing over what the Lord thinks about whom.

HARRY O. REX
Warden, Church of Our Saviour, Plainville, Conn.

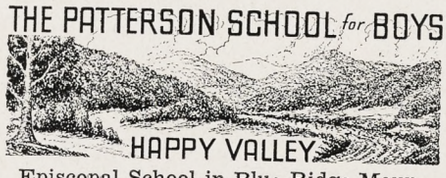
Your issue of May 25th devoted largely to items concerning the new Parish House of Christ Church at Alexandria, Va., is more than interesting, especially to one who has spent considerable time in Virginia.

However, in looking at the interior view of the Church, shown on page 4, I was interested in seeing the positions of the National Emblem and the Church flag, the former being hung at the left of the sanctuary as one faces the congregation, and the latter to the right of the priest as he faces the congregation.



During the early war years, we of Our Saviour were presented with a similar set of colors, and after due inquiry concerning their placement, we were informed that the National emblem should be hung at the priest's right as he faced the congregation, and the Church flag at his left. Consequently, these colors have been hung in that position ever since.

The point is that either we in Plainville are wrong, or else Christ Church in Alexandria has been wrongly informed. In either case, I feel certain that both churches would appreciate being informed officially which is the proper position for these colors. Possibly there be other churches elsewhere who may be uncertain on this subject.

Would you give this information in an early issue? Thank you.

ANSWER: Concerning the placement of the American flag and the Church flag in our chancel, we have the Church flag on the right of the minister as he faces the congregation because we have a primary allegiance to God which is above our allegiance to the nation and because we recognize the sovereignty of God to be higher than the sovereignty of the government. As far as I know, none but the totalitarian nations of earth have claimed a sovereignty higher than the sovereignty of Almighty God. —B. B. Comer Lile, Rector of Christ Church, Alexandria.

STORY OF THE WEEK

William F. Cochran Spent Life Giving Away Fortune

Fifty Years Devoted to Blotting Our Evil Of What He Thought an Unjust Order

By W. B. SPOFFORD SR.

★ William F. Cochran, Episcopalian of Baltimore, Md., died on July 2. He was one of two men of wealth I have known who aimed to die poor. The other was the late Bishop Robert L. Paddock. Both failed in the effort. Both made good tries.

Billy Cochran inherited a large fortune from his father which had been made in the manufacture of carpets through the firm established by his grandfather. After graduating from St. Paul's School and Yale, he began living the life of a man of wealth; parties and riding to the hounds. His conversion, as he related it to me years ago, was as sudden as St. Paul's. He was riding to the hounds when he suddenly drew up his horse and said to himself: "Why do I live as I do? What right have I to great wealth?"

He promptly wrote to Prof. Walter Rauschenbusch, in those days the foremost writer and lecturer on Christian social ethics, to inform him that he proposed to give away his money and sought his advice. It was promptly given. Rauschenbusch told him that if he, Billy Cochran, knew that his wealth should be shared, then he was the man best able to see that it was distributed wisely. Billy started in the early years of the century to give sums to what he called "unpopular causes." And he spent years discovering how difficult it is to give wisely. He was, on his own admission, a "sucker" for many organizations and individuals. And needless to say he got a lot of free advice, most of it completely selfish. But by-and-large he gave wisely and well.

In 1915 he spoke at a forum in Baltimore, where he lived, on "The Passing of the Idle Rich." At the end of the speech he asked two questions of the audience: "What is the quickest and best way in which I can grow poor?" and "Am I immoral from the mere fact that I am rich?"

He received a full measure of advice at the meeting and was then flooded with letters, including those from people who offered to take over the fortune along with any immorality that might be attached to it. One man informed him that he need not worry about getting rid of his money if he held on to it a little longer because the working people would soon take it away from him.

Billy later made it plain that his aim was not to give away all his money and thus merely reduce the number of multi-millionaires by one. "I intend to spend my money to help undermine the system under which I myself have reaped benefits and which gives some many millions and makes paupers of others. As long as there is a system that creates millionaires at one end of the social scale and paupers at the other there will be great unrest in the world. I shall devote the money I have to blotting out this evil."

To this end he established the Christian Social Justice Fund, with a committee of religious leaders meeting once or twice a year to dispose of large blocks of money. It was my priviledge to serve on this committee over a period of years. We would spend the day carefully reviewing requests for grants, and assigning sums to those we thought deserving. There was never unanimity on the committee, with everyone there, naturally, having their own pet charities. Likewise on occasions the majority voted to give money to organizations that were not approved by Billy. But never once do I recall him ever exercising a veto. The majority ruled, even in giving another man's money.

Billy Cochran was for a number of years a member of the mission board of the Episcopal Church, now the National Council. He was the treasurer of the Church League for Industrial Democracy from its founding in 1919 until three or four years ago when the League changed its name to the Episcopal League for Social Action. During most of these years I was executive secretary of the League and our friendship was deep. He was a communicant of Christ Church, Baltimore, which he attended faithfully and supported generously.

If our "Story of the Week" should be, as we think, an unusual one, then I think there has never been one which is more worthy of this space—the story of a Christian man of wealth who earnestly sought to die poor.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

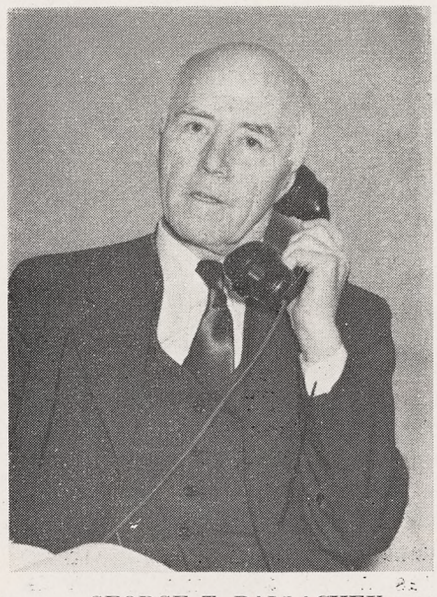
GRADUATE WORK IN NEW YORK

★ Paul Y. Chen and his wife Helene are completing a period of graduate study in New York and are soon to return to play their part in the social rehabilitation of China. He is the son of Bishop Robin Chen of Wan-gan, formerly Anking.

Seeking scholarship aid for graduate and special work in the United States, Mr. and Mrs. Chen joined in a statement of "Our motive, need and hope," which pointed out the post-war social problems certain to confront China. "The great mass of laborers call for men with interest and knowledge for services in mines and factories. The government is laying great emphasis on the importance of labor welfare and seeking for solutions to their problems. Social welfare and social insurance for the laborers should be taken care of immediately and everywhere all over the country. For this reason my favorite subjects deal with labor problems.

"Child welfare work is in its stage of infancy. This is of the greatest importance, for here lies the new blood for the future of China. Experiments have been made on great scales in orphanages, hospitals and children's recreation centers.

"China needs men and women to go to these fields to work and these are places where we, as young people, can help to lay the foundation stone for modern China."



Mr. Chen has been secretary for labor service in the Kunming district; hostel superintendent at various centers during the war; chief for social service, Chungking, New Life Movement Social Center, and junior secretary, division of general affairs, ministry of foreign affairs, Nanking. Mrs. Chen's experience includes work as junior secretary, division of social welfare, ministry of social affairs; secretary, Chungking experimental social relief administration; dean, junior public school for girls, province of Szechuan; secretary, national committee for the care and nutrition of children, Chungking headquarters; secretary, child welfare experimental center, under the auspices of Ginling College, and assistant, department of sociology, Ginling College.

Bishop Chen suggested an inquiry to the Rev. Almon R. Pepper, director of the National Council's department of social relations, who interested himself in seeking resources for Mr. and Mrs. Chen. The result has been that they were granted scholarships by the New York School of Social Work of Columbia University, aid was given by the U. S. state department, and further assistance was given through the Presiding Bishop's fund for world relief to complete the two-year post-graduate course.

Now they are ready to return to China, well equipped to bring to reality many of the plans they have in process, for the future development of the new modern China, along lines that are sociologically sound, and developed with Christian principles as a fundamental.

Mr. Chen has already secured placement as a social worker on the staff of the national Christian council in China, with headquarters in Shanghai. He will assist the director of the committee on Christian service and industrial relations, who wrote to him: "We are very anxious that a man of your training and Christian conceptions will be able to travel a great deal up and down the country helping Church leaders and Christian leaders in hospitals, educational institutions to orient their program toward working with labor."

Mrs. Chen expects to find her place in the child welfare program of the Church.

GEORGE T. BALLACHEY was recently honored at a luncheon in Buffalo for his outstanding contribution in diocesan and civic affairs

ST. PAUL'S CELEBRATES ANNIVERSARY

★ St. Paul's Cathedral, Los Angeles, celebrated its 26th anniversary on July 9, the service being conducted by Dean John M. Krumm, with Bishop Campbell the preacher. The offering went to a fund to purchase a new organ as a memorial to the late Bishop Stevens.

LAYMEN TO PRESENT CHURCH PROGRAM

★ Seventy-seven of eighty-seven dioceses already have set up laymen's training conferences in preparation for the every member canvass next fall. The missionary district of Honolulu also has set up a conference. The conferences are concentrated as to time, most of them over the weekend of September 16-17 and October 7-8. Approximately 2,200 men will be trained.

Robert D. Jordan, who will instruct the original group of men, who will train others, and the Rev. Arnold M. Lewis of the committee on laymen's work, expressed gratification at the interest and enthusiasm aroused by the training plans, all through the Church.

Thirty men of the quality often described as "big men," professional men, industrialists, high ranking officers in military and naval service, will meet at Seabury House September 8-10 to receive an intensive course of instruction by Mr. Jordan. These men will go out and train others, who will carry the message of the Church's program to every part of the Church through presentations at parish meetings. The training will employ audio-visual materials, and each of the trained men will be given a book, Facts, with detailed information about the Church, how to present the program, and the every member canvass, both philosophy and techniques.

Most of the parish meetings, when whole congregations will hear and see the presentation, are being set up for October 9 and November 11. Parishes everywhere are being urged by the National Council to start planning parish meetings now, and to develop plans to assure the attendance of the entire parish, men, women, children, to hear the presentation, which will employ methods that are entirely unique in this field, and that, National Council men declare positively, "will hold the interest, get over the information, and help to build the spirit of consecration which will result in sacrificial giving."

The parish meeting presentation will offer by transcription the voices and messages of some of the great missionary bishops, the voice and message of the bishop of the diocese will present the diocesan program, and colored films will show actual work, needs and opportunities. The speaker, one of the specially trained men, will explain parts of the audio-visual presentation, and the last fifteen minutes of the meeting are for a member of the parish to present the parish part of the program and budget.

NEW PARISH HOUSE IN KANSAS CITY

★ St. Paul's, Kansas City, Mo., recently opened its new parish house. It contains an auditorium seating 450, with fully equipped stage, address system, moving picture booth. There is a completely equipped nursery; 14 class rooms, a Boy Scout room. Rector Richard M. Trelease states that the cost of about $300,000 has been almost entirely subscribed.

STUDENTS GET WORK IN MICHIGAN

★ In accordance with the plan established by Bishop Emrich of Michigan some years ago, a group of young men and women, most of them from other parts of the country, went into various mission fields in the diocese on July 1st for two months' practical work and training. About twenty comprise this group, of whom several come from Michigan. Others lived in Massachusetts, Illinois, Kentucky, Connecticut, Vermont, Virginia and Pennsylvania. These workers are for the most part students for orders in the various seminaries, who welcome this opportunity to receive practical training in the missions of the diocese. They are paid a small scholarship which is provided from funds contributed in memory of the late Bishop Herman Page. The missions in which they work furnish board and room for the two months. The workers will engage in many activities during their stay in the mission field, including conducting services, holding vacation church schools, calling on parishioners, learning institutional work, and in some cases working on parish buildings and grounds.

The summer workers attended a meeting at Parishfield, the diocesan retreat and conference center, on Thursday, June 29-July 1. The Rev. Charles D. Braidwood of Lapeer (who planned their schedule in consultation with Bishop Emrich) and Miss Margaret Culley, diocesan field worker, led the conference, from which the workers entered their various fields.

ZABRISKIE RESIGNS AS DEAN

★ Alexander C. Zabriskie has resigned as dean of the Virginia Seminary, with the trustees accepting the action at a meeting June 28. The action, taken with great reluctance, was based upon reports of his medical advisors who reported that the dean's two recent attacks of illness were the result of extreme hypertension and that any attempt to resume the deanship could only result in a serious threat to his health. He has been granted a leave of absence as the head of the history department until such time as he is able to resume his duties in that capacity.

JOHN ELLIS LARGE, now rector of the Heavenly Rest, New York, will become a member of The Witness Editorial Board when meetings resume in September

Missionary Policy in China

OUR reporter at the April meeting of the National Council tells us that there seems to be developing a new policy regarding our mission in China. In a short debate concerning an allocation of $600 from Reconstruction and Advance funds to build a small church and rectory at Sing Tien, China, one bishop asked if such action would not be contrary to what he understood policy to be "that there would be no capital expenditures in China because we might lose them." No policy had been stated in open meeting, but when the Presiding Bishop replied, he did not deny that this was what was contemplated. He simply said that the sum was so small that if they could be built for that amount, it was worth the chance. Later information revealed that what we must do in China is spend our money, not on buildings, but in providing a living for technicians of all sorts who will be able to assist the people of China to develop a higher and better standard of living. This strategy was discussed in department meetings and executive sessions, but was not sufficiently formulated to become open and official policy.

When the Detroit conference on the Church and economic life was studying the role of the Church in the Point Four program for assisting under-developed countries, it came out with much the same plan. The American Church could do a real service by sending Christian public health and agricultural technicians, teachers and organizers of cooperatives, to China. The opportunity for witness to the Christian concern for the whole of man's life is great, and devoted persons could accomplish much for Christ and his Church in this way. We hope that this is what the National Council is seriously considering.

We hope they will also come out clearly for this and extend it further. Some members of the Council are of the opinion that the time has arrived when any financial aid that is given to the Church in China should be appropriated in a lump sum, and not earmarked by our National Council for any specific projects. The Chinese Church now has a completely native bishopric, and might well be treated by us as an autonomous Church. This would have two advantages. First, it is exceedingly difficult for us in this country to have complete information on what is transpiring in China, and the tenseness of the political atmosphere colors our judgment on what facts we do possess. Those in China cannot help but be aware of where the greatest need is, and where our missionary effort would be most effective.

Secondly, as long as our government refuses to recognize the present government in China even to the extent of allowing its representatives to hold the allotted positions in the United Nations, there is in the mind of many Chinese that America still supports the discredited Kuomintang regime. If a missionary is thought to be a representative of the American Church, it puts an obstacle in the path of dealing with the Chinese. However, if it were known that he is a representative of the Chinese Church, and sent by them, acceptance would be facilitated. The overseas department and others at 281 have an opportunity to exert real leadership in making a Christian impact on China by setting out on a course which they have apparently charted.

There are hundreds of Chinese who have finished graduate work in the United States, like Paul Chen and his wife (see page four), who are returning to their native land to help build the new China. Many of them, like these two, are devoted Church people. They will remain so if the Church does not make it difficult for them to do so, by refusing to accept the new situation in their native land. The program of this young Chinese couple indicates clearly what they believe the Church should be doing. It is also, we hope, what the National Council believes.

"QUOTES"

IT is no wonder that the behaviour of men who are nominally Christians — Christians in profession if not in practice—has checked and still checks the progress of Christianity. The missionary comes preaching the gospel of peace and love, but when the natives see the rapacity and injustice of men professing the religion which the missionary preaches, the preachings lose their power.

The Bishop and Pastoral Relationship

THE consideration of tenure can properly start not with the canon concerning dissolution of the pastoral relationship but with the tradition which has guided and governed the Church in the past, which goes back to the pre-Reformation Church of England and back of that to very remote times. Like that of the bishop to his diocese the pastoral relationship was regarded as something akin to that of the father in the family. It had in meaning (however often it lacked in practice) something sacred and beyond the reach of any canonical expression. To quote Hoffman: "It seems to have been felt that there was a nearness and sacredness of tie between such parties as admitted not of severance but for legal offenses or with the intervention of grave authority." (Page 332). And as one studies the grounds on which the tie may be broken in England one realizes that they are all either voluntary (a new benefice, ill health, etc.) or else the result of action for which the priest may be tried. There is no provision for dissolving the pastoral relationship because parishioners, few or many, do not like the incumbent or his ways. This is emphasized again when one turns to the proposed new code now before the Church of England for consideration. There is no provision whatever for dissolution of a pastorate.

Now English usage is not determinative. It is only interpretive. Neither English canon law nor Parliamentary statute (any more than the whole vast medieval corpus) tells us what we must do; but they give us the background of our own enactments and to some extent they enshrine the tradition in which we share. And there is no doubt whatever that the Protestant Episcopal Church at the beginning of its independent life accepted the traditional view. Bishop White believed there should be no severance of the pastoral tie except after trial for misconduct. The canon of 1808 dealing with the matter states "the Church designs not to express an approbation of any laws which make the station of a minister dependent upon anything else than his own soundness in the faith and worthy conduct."

But conditions in America were in two respects quite different from those with which the earlier canon law had to deal. In general and allowing for its survival for awhile in parts of the south, there was no such thing as a parish in the historic sense. The parish was a congregation, not an area and even where parish boundaries were recognized by the Church they had to do only with the relations of congregations and individuals. They had and have nothing to do with the relation of the pastor to other than fellow Episcopalians. As a result the personal relationship of the rector to his congregation assumes an importance quite beyond that which it held through the medieval period and still holds where the Church is established.

And the other factor lies in the steadily increasing mobility of American life. There are many long and happy pastorates. There was a larger percentage of such, no doubt, in the earlier days but the turnover through the Church at large is today very great. Clergy move all the time. Congregations do not I suspect ordinarily settle down nor do their rectors with the feeling "here we are for life." Incidentally the only possible ground on which the present policy of this Church against the translation of bishops can be defended is that the bishop is a stabilizing force. One might say he lives in a house; the rest of the population including the clergy in trailers. At any rate there is no doubt that the situation the Church in America has had to meet for over a century and a half differs from that envisaged by earlier canon law.

The Present Canon

THESE new conditions made new legislation necessary. Such legislation had to be experimental and the detail of the attempts to deal with the problem need not be studied. A summary is sufficient. In general and diocesan canons we find various provisions: the bishop and presbyters of the diocese—but that left it possible to ignore the rights of the laity in the final decision! The bishop and the convention—but that obviously became impracticable as dioceses increased in size! The bishop and standing committee—that protected the interests of both clergy and laity! But there again came the question as to whether the function of the standing committee was advisory or whether while the bishop quite properly was judge, his decision required the concurrence of the committee. There were many perplexing shifts in this whole matter, especially during the 60s and 70s, the years of the ritualistic controversies. In 1871 an arbitration board was proposed. But finally in 1904 with the general revision of the canons at that time, the structure of the present canon 46 was adopted.

Its provisions are well known. They may be summarized as follows: A rector may not resign nor a parish or its vestry or trustees "whichever may be authorized to act in the matter" remove its rector without in either case the consent of the other party. There is of course practically no likelihood that any parish would take canonical steps to prevent a rector resigning if he were determined to do so. That contingency may I think be ignored. But if the parish, its vestry or trustees desires a separation and the rector declines to accede the canon goes on to provide (Sec. 2) that the bishop may try to settle the matter "by his godly judgment." If that is not successful, the parish, its vestry or trustees may give notice to the bishop and he with the advice and consent of the standing committee and proceeding with its aid and counsel shall be the ultimate arbiter and judge. The judgment whichever way it goes shall be binding upon both parties. Then follow provisions concerning the execution of the judgment and the final section gives dioceses and missionary districts the right to deal with the matter in their own canons and notes that the canon shall not apply "in contravention of any right to any minister, parish, congregation or vestry under the law of the civil authority."

The purpose of the canon is clear enough. It is (1) to resolve impossible and destructive situations occasioned through one or more of the many causes for failure of a rector and parish to get along together and (2) somewhat indirectly to give the Church (represented by the bishop and diocese) a chance to intervene where the parish through inadequate leadership is steadily failing to do its work and is gradually disintegrating.

Heart of Matter

THE matter of tenure which lies at the center of this whole matter is so important that the principle behind it must be discussed in the concluding section of this paper. One cannot think of the matter at all however without realizing that it is only through security of tenure that the pastor can be free to carry on his work as God, rather than the vestry or the leading parishioner or the woman's guild, gives him guidance. The security of tenure for the clergy of his diocese, their independence and freedom of action must be as important to the bishop as his own. They with him are the leaders of the Church and leadership is an empty word for Christians unless leaders are free.

That being assumed we turn to the consideration of the canon as a whole and ask whether it safeguards sufficiently the interests of the parties concerned: the rector, the people of the congregation and the Church represented by bishop and diocese. There can be no reasonable doubt but that the interests of the Church are safeguarded. Not only is the bishop ultimate arbiter and judge; he is such under definite constitutional provisions, so that the consent of the standing committee which represents clergy and laity of the diocese is necessary to initiate any procedure and the committee acts throughout as a jury to get the facts. The rector is not so fortunate. He has every right to present his case except one. He cannot demand that his congregation be consulted as to their view of the matter; and ipso facto the congregation is deprived of the right to present its case if any large number of its members disagree with the vestry's appeal that the pastoral relation be dissolved. It is certain that ordinarily the vestry does represent the parish; but it is equally certain that at times it does not. Furthermore the question at issue is not what the vestry thinks but what the parish thinks. The parish, the particular group of Christians within the larger family of the Church, has chosen its own rector, has its place in diocesan convention, takes its share in the larger activities of the Church, and these people not the vestry constitute the body with which the Church is concerned. Indeed if the bishop is exercising his pastoral responsibility he must recognize that his relationship to the vestry is only legal or canonical. His essential concern is with the congregation.

It has been recently urged that because the vestry has been chosen to represent the parish corporately it can speak for the parish and act for the parish regardless of the views of the parishioners. What shall we say of such a position? Nothing but that it is pure legalism and has no place whatever in the realities of the Christian fellowship of the Church. It is true that the directors of a corporation can legally bind the corporation regardless of what the stockholders wish, and the stockholders usually get little chance to say what they wish. Indeed "big business" can hardly be run in any other way. It is true also that a vestry can commit a parish legally to this or that obligation, financial or otherwise, and have authority to call a rector without consulting the parishioners. But no one I think would contend that there is any inherent right in the matter. It is a matter of convenience, the obviously practical way of doing things. No vestry however which had any sense or any Christian feeling would e.g. call as rector a man whom they knew to be distasteful to great numbers of the congregation. The fact is that from the Christian point of view the legal authority of the vestry is purely for convenience. The Church is vastly "bigger business" than Westinghouse or Ford. It is altogether too big business to be tied down by a legal quibble. The matter it seems to me does not need to be argued at all. The Church is from the beginning concerned with people and that answers the question.

It follows that the canon is defective in not requiring that the position of the congregation should be ascertained. It should provide that after the vestry has presented its appeal for dissolution sufficient time be allowed for a dissenting group in the congregation to ask for a parish meeting at which the matter may be discussed and a vote taken. Provision should be made that both those who support the vestry and those who oppose be heard before the standing committee.

But what is to be done if the parish votes against the vestry? There are two reasons (much as I dislike such a conclusion) why the vote of the parish should not be determinative; but rather be treated as part of the evidence before standing committee and bishop. The first is that a majority, even a two-thirds majority opposing the vestry might be nothing more than the evidence that the parish is too badly split to warrant a continuance of the particular rectorship. The second is that there are cases as suggested above in which without any open dissension a parish is disintegrating so steadily as to warrant the bishop intervening if the vestry is willing to cooperate with him. It is the kind of case in which people will have simply drifted away instead of making trouble. Those who remain may most of them be friends of the rector. Their voice should be heard; but the Church as represented by bishop and standing committee should have the final decision.

Rector Has No Appeal

FINALLY there are three matters deserving comment in closing the discussion of the canon.

(1) The rector has no appeal within the canons to any Church court. The resource of General Convention is open to amend injustice in the canon; but it cannot well be invoked in the trial of a particular case. Various suggestions have been made for appeal boards. Within the diocese one cannot well have any body more likely to be just than bishop and standing committee if they have all the evidence including the views of the congregation. One cannot ask an outside arbitration board nor the Provincial Court of Review (which has been suggested) to convene at the call of any cantankerous rector (and there are such) who has fallen out with his congregation. Would the Church consider giving the president of the province the slight metropolitical authority to present the case to the Court of Review if he felt that serious injustice was involved? I raise the question.

(2) It seems indisputable that no diocese should be allowed to enact legislation which might on the one hand limit the bishop's responsibility beyond that which General Convention has recognized nor on the other hand imperil further the security of tenure which that body safeguards. The final section of the canon ought to be amended by omitting the permission to dioceses to make their own rules (save within the framework of the general canons).

(3) The third matter which this whole discussion must raise in people's minds is the extent of the bishop's authority as chief pastor. We have brought to us in that question a perfect example of the difficulty inherent in adjusting an age-old institution to a present day condition. The social ideals which made the monarchical episcopate inevitable are gone, we in America believe; yet actually in the social order they have come to new power in the Communist and Fascist dictatorship and in a part of the Christian Church. Nothing in the past has ever quite equalled the closely-knit organization of the Roman Church in which the dictate of one man is absolute and in those deep areas on which the life of the spirit depends is regarded as the infallible word of God.

We in the Anglican Communion however have looked forward not back and have met the problem of adjustment with more or less success by developing what the Lambeth Conference calls "the constitutional episcopate." Now the substance of the constitutional episcopate as we have developed it in America is that the Church including both clergy and laity acting for its divine Head confers upon the bishop those gifts and faculties which make him a bishop, and likewise the jurisdiction which enables him to exercise them. These are facts quite regardless of whether we hold a high or low or any other theory of the episcopate. In other words authority does not descend from him (as one civil court has held) any more than it descends from the President of the United States or the governor of a state. It is conveyed to him by the free suffrage of his people and the freely adopted provisions of General Convention. The Church determines who shall be a bishop and the limitations of his authority. There is of course a kind of no-man's land, an area in which the survivals of the monarchical tradition will or will not come into play much in accordance with the bishop's personal character and theological views. There is always behind him and with him the reverence of his people for the place he holds. He carries with him the atmosphere of more than fifteen hundred years in which his rule was actual and in which as today in confirmation and ordination he represented the deepest sources of the life of the Church. Today the whole trend of life has tended to centralize authority in the Church (witness the place of the Presiding Bishop's office as contrasted with a generation ago) and to put more responsibility and thus more authority in the bishop's hands. The Church must reckon with such tendencies. Authoritarianism is easy. Freedom is hard. Yes, freedom is hard. It is hardly won and hardly preserved. It is our precious Christian heritage. It belongs to bishops, other clergy, laity—all who have entered into the glorious liberty of the children of God. One of the points at which it focuses for us at the moment is the apparently small question of the tenure of the parochial clergy, but once threaten it successfully there, we take one more step toward authoritarianism. It is for that reason it it worth while to turn to the final topic.

Camping and Sharing

By HUGH McCANDLESS
Rector of the Epiphany, New York

THEY say you never know people until you live with them. There is no way you can live as close to people as by camping with them. When you don't have conveniences you need plenty of cooperation. The person who never lets his tent mates sleep because he wants to talk, or who never lets them talk because he wants to sleep, might seem all right if you were simply staying in the same house with him. You can't ignore the shirker when you have to carry everything, and you can't avoid the groaning grumbler when you both have to sit around the same camp fire.

J. M. Barrie wrote a play called "The Admirable Crichton" which describes this. Some very important people had a wonderfully handy manservant, who was very quiet, but very capable. They all took a trip, and were shipwrecked. A few of them managed to get to a jungle island, and there they had to stay. The servant, Crichton, did not mean to assert himself at all, but he had the best ideas on how to get food and make a shelter. It soon developed that he had more character and sense than the people shipwrecked with him and little by little he became their leader, and the others after a while obeyed him absolutely, because they knew he was unselfish and wise.

Perhaps the best tests of any camper or picnicker are these—does he leave the place in better shape than when he came, and does he leave the people in and about the place happier?

Our Lord came of a race of campers. They always remembered the forty years wandering under Moses, when their only church was a tent.

Even today the Jews have a festival in early fall, called the Feast of Tabernacles or the Feast of Booths—we might translate this the Feast of Tents. Then for a few days they spend all day out in the open in a little summer house made of bush and branches, and eat the simple food of their wandering ancestors. Occasionally they invite their Christian friends to join them, and if you ever get such an invitation, don't refuse it.

A great many pictures of our Lord show him draped in sheet-like garments, which of course is ridiculous. He wore clothes much better suited to working and walking. And he probably wore a headdress made of a kerchief held on the head with bands, and this he could use as an emergency pail, by lining it with leaves, or a rope, or a bandage or string, like the Boy Scout neckerchief.

THE story of the loaves and fishes tells of the time when a great number of people had followed Jesus around the Sea of Galilee to hear him speak. They were quite a distance from their villages, and the time came to eat. Everyone was afraid that there would not be enough food, of course. One hungry boy did not wait, but offered to share a few small buns he had and some fish about the size of sardines with anyone who wanted it.

Of course that was not enough for everyone, but it was much better for him to do that than to eat by himself and be embarrassed by his selfishness, or to steal away somewhere and eat by himself. He was not bragging about what he had; he simply said he would share it.

At any rate, Jesus stopped those who sneered that the boy's gift was not enough; he took it as if it were enough, and thanked God and blessed it as if it were enough. And it was more than enough.

Some people have what appears to be quite a good explanation of this story. It is that there were plenty of people there who had enough and to spare for themselves and some others. What our Lord did was not to change the amount of food but to change the hearts of these people by his prayer of blessing, and so they all began to bring out what they had, and to share it with each other.

Some say one thing and some say another, but it is just as much a miracle to change people's hearts as to multiply food. Whatever happened, that young boy helped do it.

The first Christians loved this story: it proved that there is always enough when people share. Any group of people may have very little to get along with—if they are friendly, it is enough. Another group may have a great deal, but it will never be enough, if they are not friendly. It's the campers that make a camp, not the number of cooks or canoes or councilors or diving boards or slides or riding horses.

When nations share the world will not be divided into armed camps as they are today. Babies won't share anything, not even a see-saw which they can't work alone! It is time for the nations to grow up.

The People's Bread

BY

GORDON C. GRAHAM

WHO provides the bread and wine for the Holy Communion in your church? The rector or the altar guild? Perhaps it may be some old parishioner who has been doing it for years; or it may be donated from outside the church as in the case of a local liquor dealer, who for his own reasons, business or political, sent wine gratis to all the churches in his community. In the simple economy of early Christianity the people of the congregation usually made the bread and wine themselves and brought them to the Eucharist as their offerings to God. In our specialized society this meaningful act is no longer feasible so that the bread and wine have to be bought from those who manufacture these things. Following the original practice of the Church, it would seem natural that the buyers of the bread and wine in our day should be the people of the congregation and not any one individual or private group. In other Prayer Books of the Anglican communion, except our own, this point is made quite clear by a rubrical direction which says—"The bread and wine for the Communion shall be provided by the curate and the church-wardens at the charges of the parish".

The people, therefore, should provide the bread and wine because it is their common and corporate offering. It cannot be stressed too much that this can only be real if these things are purchased from general parish funds. The point here is a real one because it concerns the reality of our part in the Communion service. It is, perhaps, not without significance that our Prayer Book directs that the collection be taken up before the bread and wine are offered on the altar. This, by the way, is seldom observed so that the presentation of the alms is turned into the climax of the offertory, when it should only be introductory. One wonders whether this is merely a convenience, or is the result of finance capitalism which puts the making of money before the production of goods and services. The reality of the offertory can be brought out practically by having the people make their offering in bread as well as in money. This can be done by putting a table at the door on which are bread and wine and a collection plate. As each person enters they put their money on the plate, take a wafer out of the bread box, and put it on the paten. At the offertory all these things can be carried to the altar by a procession of people, including of course, members of the vestry.

Real Worship

WORSHIP that is real must be first related to the world before it can be related to heaven. There can, in other words, be no Holy Communion unless the people first offer to God bread and wine. These commodities come from the earth through the workers of the world — farmers, processors, etc.—and they are used by congregations to express their offering to God. What could be more a part of life? Before we can appreciate the Church's worship or get others to realize its relevance we must insist on this principle of reality. There is much to Christian worship and, much more to the offertory act, than we are commonly inclined to realize but it all has first to be made humanly real. Bread and wine are not just beautiful symbols with emotional value but are actual commodities taken from every day life. They must be regarded for what they are—things of the world—used for the worship of heaven, thus establishing the reality of the relationship between life here and now and life eternal. Christian worship has too often been treated as something pretty, or high, or low, depending upon personal tastes. It is nothing of the sort; it is a very practical business in which b r e a d and wine have a very practical function. If this is what we want and what we need, it is for us, the people, to take the first practical step of seeing that the bread and wine offered in our church really belongs to us.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

URBAN CHURCH IS CRITICIZED

★ The urban church is "in a sorry way," for though called to preach the gospel its voice in the city "has become nearly mute." That was the opinion of a committee set up at a ten-day conference on urban problems, meeting at Evanston. The committee, headed by Prof. Joseph G. Moore of the Seabury-Western Seminary, stated that "the Church ministers to mobile millions, using techniques worked out for an English suburb. It has so failed to preach judgment upon contemporary culture that it seems a pleasant club rather than a loathsome and dangerous company. It forgets the divine love and promise under which it stands and so it falters."

In discussing specific problems faced by the urban parish, the committee pointed out: "We are not adequately informed about the influence of such phenomena as poor garbage collection and slum housing on the building of character. We too often play the part of fool in industrial relations. Nor are there any co-ordinated efforts to meet population changes for there is still over-lapping in some neighborhoods and no service in others."

The faculty at the institute were the Rev. Almon Pepper of the National Council; Jack Stipe of the National Council; Prof. Lichtenberger of General Seminary and the Rev. Ralph Higgins of St. Mark's, Evanston, with Moore as dean.

AUXILIARY MEETS AT EASTON

★ A conference of the Auxiliary of Easton was held June 20-22 at Port Deposit, Md., with the Rev. Donald Mayberry, rector of Trinity, Wilmington, Del., the chaplain. Bishop Allen Miller had a meditation at one of the sessions and there were addresses on the program of the Church by Mrs. William Taliaferro, former national executive board member and Mrs. Roger Kingsland, a member of the National Council.

URGE SOCIETY FOR FACULTY MEMBERS

★ Formation of a national association of Episcopalians on college faculties was proposed by a group of professors meeting at Utica, N. Y. There were 87 present at the conference from colleges in New York, New England, Pennsylvania and other eastern states.

CATCH-UP CONFIRMATION IN DETROIT

NEW BOOKS

An Introduction to New Testament Thought. By Frederick C. Grant. Abingdon-Cokesbury. $3.75.

New Testament scholarship, long concerned with problems of authorship, date and sources, is now turning increasingly to the questions which are uppermost in the minds of parson and layman: What does the New Testament mean? What ought I to believe about it? Dr. Grant's book is indicative of this trend; it is one of the first really meaty books on New Testament theology to appear in this country in this generation. The layman will be especially interested in the chapters on revelation and scripture, miracles, and the doctrine of Christ. The last-named chapter will help to put him—and his rector—straight on why the Christology of the creeds is important and what its New Testament basis is. Every part of the book is marked by common sense and sound judgment—take, for example, the chapter on ethics, which does not go overboard for individualism, and the one on the doctrine of man, where St. Paul's insight into man's sinfulness is appreciatively dealt with, but full weight is given to other elements. The book is written without footnotes, and the argument is usually easy to follow, yet the important questions are dealt with in full detail. This book is a "must."

HOLT M. JENKINS
Curate at St. Anne's, Annapolis, Md.

The editorial of June 8th in defense of Bishops Hall and Dun seems to me to be somewhat at variance with your excellent discussion of South India in the issue preceding. There is a wide gulf between the constitutional activity of a Church and individual gestures of well-intentioned clergy. I am concerned that we present some sort of united front to the world in the matter of Christian reunion.

Your editorial does not consider the following factors in the actions of the two bishops. First, in the matter of open communion, it seems natural and normal that guests should be treated as such and that visitors to our parishes be welcome at the Lord's table. However, I have had to deal with members of other denominations who have attended the Episcopal Church for years and received the sacrament without ever showing any desire to abandon their affiliation. Some of these people have steadfastly refused confirmation and made no effort to support or participate in the life of the Episcopal Church. Since we do have so many converts from other Churches, it seems to me that we need to make clear the difference between guests and parasites.

Secondly, while most of the members of other Churches who receive the sacrament in an open communion service belong to bodies which profess some belief in the sacramental nature of the holy communion, the invitation is generally extended publicly to all who believe in Jesus Christ. This is a rather broad statement and does not take into consideration the peculiar Christologies of some of the minor denominations. There are also certain groups which deny any sacramental character to the holy communion or else hold ideas which oppose the principle on which all sacramental belief rests. Cannot the invitation be less general?

Finally, in the matter of Bishop Hall's action, the question of representation is involved. If I am invited to take part in the ordination of a minister in another denomination, do I act for myself or am I acting on behalf of the Episcopal Church? Can I, as a priest, represent the Episcopal Church in the ordination of a minister in another body? I believe that any proposal for joint ordination would insist upon an official action by those who participated in the laying on of hands. To my knowledge, this was not true of the ordination in New Hampshire.

If we do not wish to appear before the world as irresponsible individualists and if we do not wish our relations with the rest of Christendom to vary from parish to parish, I suggest that we devote our energies to the activities of the General Convention and its commission on approaches to unity. The progress made in South India ought to show us the advantages of such a course of action.

E. LOUISE NOYES
Churchwoman of Santa Barbara, Cal.

I can not refrain from a thank you for two recent articles in "The Witness." Bernard Bell's article on "Churchianity" recently and your editorial "Sharing Our Treasures" in "The Witness" on June 8th are certainly tops on what ought to be said. I wish that both of them might be broadcasted to all Episcopalian churches in our country.

MRS. GEORGE W. MOORE
Churchwoman of Scarsdale, N. Y.

The editorial of June 8th reports with understanding the Christian hospitality of Bishop Dun of Washington and Bishop Hall of New Hampshire. They witnessed to their belief in the spiritual unity of all Church people. To many these acts will be steps toward the unity for which we pray.

STORY OF THE WEEK

World and Federal Councils Endorse Korean War

Opposed by Fellowship of Reconciliation And Number of Other Groups

★ The World Council of Churches, through its central committee meeting in Toronto, declared that the UN "has attempted to establish a free, united and independent Korea within the community of nations" and called for support of "a police measure which every member nation should support." The statement stressed however that "governments must press individually and through the United Nations for a just settlement by negotiation and conciliation."

Endorsement of the Korean war was opposed by two members of the committee; the Rev. Edwin T. Dahlberg of Syracuse, former president of the Northern Baptists, and Prof. A. I. Newlin of Guilford College, N. C., a Quaker.

On July 7 the Federal Council of Churches gave full endorsement of the UN's "prompt and vigorous action" in the conflict.

Intervention by the U. S. in Korea was scored however by other religious groups. The Fellowship of Reconciliation stated that the U. S. course in Korea is "a continued application of the Truman doctrine" which "has not proved a road to peace but one which has brought us to the point where all over the world Russia and the United States are locked in a conflict of power in countering military might with military might" and the statement concluded by calling for a policy of "mediation and persuasion." The statement was signed by a number of religious leaders, both Protestant and Catholic.

Likewise the Peace Information Center, 222 West 23rd St., New York City, continues to circulate the World Peace Appeal, the so-called Stockholm Appeal, which commits signers to:

"We demand the outlawing of atomic weapons as instruments of intimidation and mass murder of peoples.

"We demand strict international control to enforce this measure.

"We believe that any government which first uses atom weapons against any other country whatsoever will be committing a crime against humanity and should be dealt with as a war criminal.

"We call on all men and women of good will throughout the world to sign this appeal."

Dr. W. E. B. Dubose, anthropologist, who is chairman of the Center, stated in a lengthy letter to Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, on July 14th that the Appeal had been signed by more than a million Americans "and in the next few weeks several millions more will sign because the American people in overwhelming majority want peace."

To the charge made by Acheson, and likewise the committee of the World Council, that the Appeal is "Communist inspired," the Peace Center issued a letter on July 17 over the signatures of Dr. Dubose, the Rev. Joseph F. Fletcher of the Episcopal Theological School, and Fred W. Stover, president of the Iowa Farmers Union, that stated that "The World Peace Appeal is an unequivocal and simple statement calling upon all governments to outlaw atomic war. The question is not who first proposed it or last agreed to it, but simply, is it right? Is it civilized? Surely all of us who earnestly desire peace can agree on this, no matter how we may differ in our political or religious beliefs, no matter what our race and nation."

The letter states that "millions upon millions of men and women" throughout the world have signed the Appeal, and it lists a few of the more notable ones, including many Church leaders.

Also the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, 80 East 11th St., New York City, last week issued a document "Facts on the Korean Situation" which contains information not found in newspapers or heard over the radio. It is available for the asking.

World Council

In addition to the pronouncement on Korea, the committee of the World Council meeting in Toronto, took action on a number of other subjects. Opposition was expressed to "the exploitation of non-self-governing peoples and violations of human rights, discriminations or segregation on the ground of race or color." During debate on the matter however two Negro leaders criticized the Council for lack of leadership on this matter. Bishop Walls of the African Methodist Church asserted that "we either have Christianity to bring to bear on this situation or we have not. We can have Christianity or we can have segregation. But we can't have both at the same time." President Benjamin B. Mays of Morehouse College, Atlanta, said he felt the central committee was "too timid" and should make a stronger statement.

Governments were asked to make legal provision for conscientious objectors, the committee expressing the belief that "the conscientious decisions of Christians with regard to participation or non-participation in war are to be respected."

All practices by which governments, Churches or other agencies curb religious freedom were condemned in a series of resolutions. Members of the committee heard the Church admonished for failure to use the services of women. The address was by Sarah Chakko of India who is on a leave of absence from teaching to head the Council's commission on the life and work of women in the Church.

It was agreed that the second assembly of the Council, to meet in Evanston, Ill., the last two weeks of August, 1953, shall be composed of 600 delegates. In a departure from the procedure at the Amsterdam assembly, it was decided not to allow alternates. The theme will be based on the affirmation that "Jesus Christ as Lord is the only hope of both the Church and the world."

It was stated that the Council has 156 member Churches, with Bishop George K. A. Bell of Chichester, England, declaring that it serves as an instrument of "common action, common study and mutual support in the task of evangelism" for an estimated 160 million Christians in 44 countries.

A budget was adopted for 1951 which totals $365,000, which does not include $600,000 anticipated to aid refugees. $240,000 is expected from Churches of the U. S.; $75,000 from Churches in the other 43 countries; $50,000 from the Rockefeller Foundation.

WOMEN DO SERVE IN DELAWARE

★ With most of the news relating to women serving officially in parishes and dioceses being in the negative, we are glad to report that Mrs. Ernest May is a member of the vestry of the Cathedral Church of St. John, Wilmington, Del., and Mrs. Ellason Downs, communicant of Christ Church, Christiana Hundred, was elected a member of the executive council of the diocese of Delaware at the last convention.

MRS. WARNER W. PRICE JR.

Also for the first time in the history of St. Peter's, Smyrna, a woman, Mrs. Warner W. Price Jr. was elected to the vestry.

CONFERENCE FOR LAYMEN

★ The Rev. Paul T. Schultz of Westfield, Mass., led a conference on evangelism of 80 men of the diocese of Massachusetts, June 23-25, at the diocesan center at Meridith, N. H. Bishop Nash also took an active part.

FAITH AND ORDER PLANS

★ American members of the commission on faith and order of the World Council met in New York on June 28 under the chairmanship of Bishop Dun to discuss plans for the conference to be held in Lund, Sweden, in 1952. The Lund meeting will deal mainly with three topics: the nature of the Church; ways of worship; inter-communion. The American members also urge a special meeting to follow the Lund conference to discuss Church unity moves now under way among several of the "younger Churches," most notably in Ceylon, North India and Persia.

UNIQUE CONVOCATION IN PARISH

★ A fine evangelistic convocation was held recently at Christ Church, Martinsville, Va., arranged by Rector Charles C. Fishburns Jr. Running for a full week, the visiting lecturers were Prof. Reinhold Niebuhr and Prof. Paul Scherer of Union Seminary and Prof. C. H. Dodd of Cambridge, England. Prof. Edward D. Myers of Washington & Lee conducted the seminars; Bishop Phillips and Bishop Carruthers took turns presiding; the Rev. Charles J. Smith, provost of Roanoke College was the banquet speaker, his subject being "Why Can't We Behave Ourselves?"

CANON SMITH SPEAKS FOR MIGRANTS

★ Canon Robert D. Smith, head of social service of the diocese of New Jersey, deplored conditions faced by children of migrant workers in appearing before President Truman's commission on migrant labor at a hearing in Washington July 17. He said that action in New Jersey to improve conditions had been feeble at best, and he rapped Governor Driscoll for eliminating $75,000 from the state budget for welfare work among migrants.

Another speaker, the Rev. G. G. Higgins of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, told the committee that trade unionism in the agricultural field offered the best hope for improving conditions.

YOUTH CONFERENCE FOR 7TH PROVINCE

★ A conference for youth of the 7th province was held at Chichasha, Okla., with the Rev. Gerhard Stutzer the dean. Courses were given by the Rev. A. H. Benzinger of Coffeyville, Kan.; Bishop Quarterman of North Texas; Lynette Giesecke of Houston; Harriet Anderson of Claremore, Okla.; Don Jackson of Kansas City, Kan.

RETIRES AS HEAD OF GRADUATES

★ Miss Eliza Ridgway has retired as president of the society of graduates of St. Mary's Hall, Burlington, N. J., after serving for 20 years. She was the recipient of many tributes from people at the reunion in June, including those of Bishop Matthews, retired, and Bishop Gardner.

She is succeeded by Mrs. Henry G. Siegrist of Bordentown, N. J., one of whose daughters was in the graduating class.

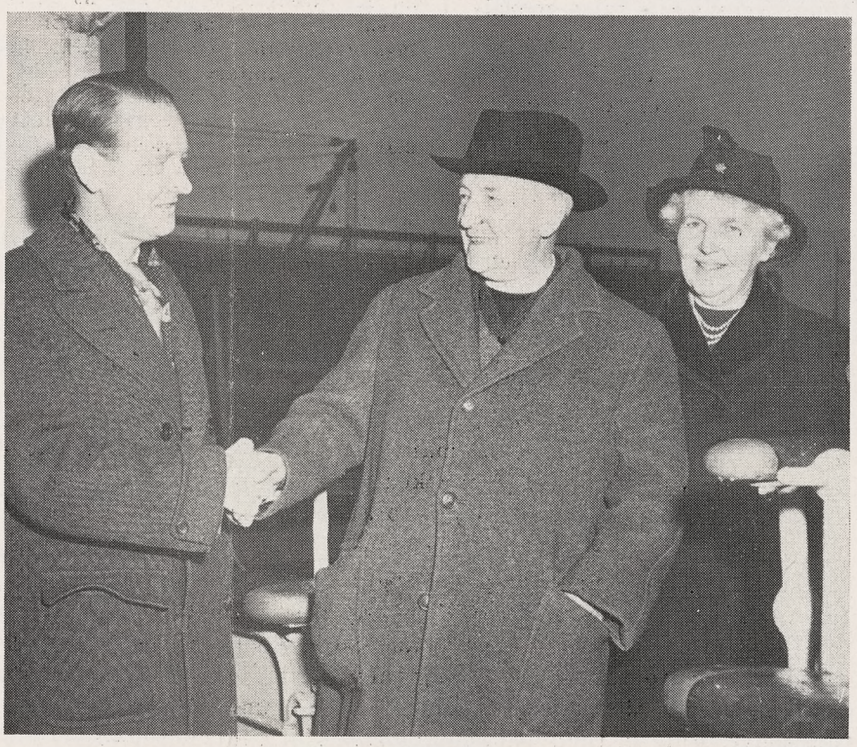
YOUTH CONFERENCE IN CENTRAL N. Y.

★ Young churchmen of Central New York closed their two-week conference at Manlius School on July 14, with a total of 241 junior and high school students registered during the period. Featured speakers were Bishop Peabody; Dr. Milton Kepler of Fayetteville, N. Y., who is to go to the Hudson Stuck Hospital in Alaska; Elizabeth Myers of Waverly, N. Y., who told of her experiences in youth hostels in Europe.

YOUTH CONFERENCE FOR BETHLEHEM

★ Youth representatives of 33 parishes of the diocese of Bethlehem attended the conference held June 25-July 8 at the summer camp of St. Stephen's Church, Wilkes-Barre, located at Tunkhannock, Pa. The Rev. Theodore T. Johnson of Sayre was the director, with courses given by the Rev. A. August Kuehl of Reading, Dean Webb of Bethlehem, the Rev. W. Paul Thompson of Reading, the Rev. Walter A. Henricks Jr. of Scranton, the Rev. W. B. Schmidgall of Tunkhannock, the Rev. Lyle E. Scott of Athens, the Rev. Fred W. Trumbore of Wilkes-Barre and Robert K. Chapman, organist of the cathedral in Bethlehem.

The featured speaker the first week was Virginia Atienza of the Philippines and the Rev. Tolle L. Caution of the National Council the second week. The chaplain the first week was the Rev. Arthur M. Sherman Jr., professor of religion at Lehigh, with the Rev. W. R. Williams of Dallas, Pa. serving the second week in that capacity. The address at the opening service was given by Bishop Sterrett and the second week began with a service at which the Rev. Burke Rivers of St. Stephen's, Wilkes-Barre, was the preacher.



RECTOR'S SON AT HENLEY

★ Paul R. Rouillard, son of the rector of Bethesda Church, Saratoga Springs, N. Y., sailed for England immediately after graduating from Dartmouth, to captain the college crew in the Royal Henley Regatta.

CHURCH CONFERENCE AT ASILOMAR

★ The annual Church conference of the Pacific coast will be held at Asilomar, Calif., August 4-9. The president is Bishop Walters of San Joaquin; the dean is the Rev. Willis Lamott

A Dead Religion

BY coincidence this year the eighth Sunday after Trinity follows after St. James' Day. Why the compilers of the Prayer Book failed to honor St. James by assigning to his feast day that magnificent second chapter of his epistle by which he is best remembered — "faith without works is dead"—is a great mystery. Could it be that such a forthright social manifesto was considered too strong meat for the powers-that-were and so discretely excluded from any of the Prayer Book epistles?

The gospel of the eighth Sunday after Trinity, in less pungent manner, stresses the same issue; "beware of false prophets." We need to remind ourselves that these false prophets were not heretics at all; they were the orthodox scribes and Pharisees. Under cover of their vociferous proclamation of their loyalty to the externals of their religion they practiced a false morality. So it is today; the most serious threat to the Church is not an external one (as from the sincere humanists); it is from those within who fail to carry out in their lives, perhaps do not even see the significance of, what they enthusiastically p r o f e s s with their lips. These are the practical atheists who expose us to the jibes of the sceptics. Wasn't it Samuel Butler who, with characteristic cynicism, remarked, "A Christian is one who is equally shocked at hearing Christianity doubted and seeing it practiced."

"Faith without works . . . beware of false prophets." One cannot help but be bewildered (dismayed is perhaps a better word) by those in the Church who berate the pride and possessiveness of the materialists, reminding them that the earth is the Lord's, and yet practice that same possessive pride in their particular branch of the Church—which is no less the Lord's. It is the utmost presumption to bid men share their material wealth and at the same time fail to share freely and unstintingly, without qualification, the spiritual wealth of the Church which we possess. False prophets is mild word for such parochial narrowness; if materialism is false, this is both false and blasphemous.

Why must certain groups feel they must guard too jealously the privileges with which they are blessed in Christ's Church? Analysis would probably disclose two reasons; the same compulsions in the material and the spiritual realm. One is a deep-seated sense of inferiority, a sort of guilt feeling, that must needs be allayed by achieving an artificially inflated self-confidence. The other is a lack of confidence in God's greatness; a mistaken buttressing of one's faltering ego by doughtily coming to his aid. As if he were dependent on our protective efforts for his existence!

The answer to this is a dual one; to feel oneself as a son of God possessing a measure of his spirit—to be as freely and generously shared as he shared it and continues to share it. And, concomitantly, to gain that deeper sense of God's majesty and munificence which Jesus felt so acutely and so humbly. Or, in St. James' words, "God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble. Submit yourself therefore to God."

"QUOTES"

AS the Pope said two years ago, no one with a true sense of humanity can approve the use of modern weapons which strike indiscriminately at soldiers and civilians, and which blindly spread death over areas that daily grow wider and wider, with man's increasing scientific knowledge. For our part we condemn them with all our strength, as we had no hesitation in condemning the mass bombings during the last war, which, in attacks on military objectives, killed old men, women and children at the same time. We are convinced that mankind will be disgracing the intelligence God gave it, if it perverts to evil ends scientific knowledge which could so fruitfully be used for good.

Tax and Spend

THE American pocketbook is beginning to show the strain. Taxes are on the increase especially for the middle income group. The proportion of the national income received by churches and charitable institutions is an indication of how much the taxpayer is being pressed as only 1% of what our people have spent has been given away. Yet we are told that never before has there been so much prosperity and the national economy on such a sound footing.

There are those who, in the face of this strain, advocate measures of economy. They would cut down the post office requirements for example, and in various ways clean out a large number of government employees particularly in the welfare services. If this group is sincere in its zeal for cutting the taxes it is strange that it should not mention the amount of money that is being spent on wars, past, present, and future. There is where the national income is being spent. Our prosperity, therefore, is an artificial prosperity based on the manufacture of arms and the giving of huge grants to the European nations for the same purpose so they may buy in the United States. The situation has reached a point where we dare not cut back this type of spending for fear of wrecking the national economy. Despite our vaunted prosperity the fact is that the majority of our people, in relation to the cost of living, are unable to maintain our national industries by their own purchasing power. It is a situation that can only lead to a shooting war which will destroy so much goods that industry may have a further market. The pump may be primed by various devices but it is usually necessary, at the last, to dig a new well in order to keep the water flowing. This is the history of the first and second New Deals and yet when national defense was proclaimed no Republican had the courage to call it the third New Deal.

It is this sort of thing that is the background of our current insecurity. On the one hand, it is felt that the American economy may blow up at any moment, or, on the other, it will plunge itself into an even greater destruction by leading to war as the only solution. There seems to be no way out of this dilemma except by changing our so-called free enterprise system and this we have been efficiently conditioned to avoid at all costs. If our policy makers think that they are stopping a planned economy by this kind of insane spending and taxing they are in for a rude awakening. They are simply playing into the hands of one of the chief Marxist dogmas which is that capitalism contains inner contradictions which will ultimately bring about its own ruin when subjected to sufficient strain. That strain is now being provided and our economy is leaping toward it with suicidal glee. This would all be very interesting and perhaps amusing if it were not finally to be written out in human lives. Things being what they are we do not know the solution but we think it is the function of the Church to point out the obvious fallacies of the course we are taking. The last absurdity is that most of our Church people in the United States do not even see the writing on the wall, let alone pausing long enough to understand its true meaning.

On the Liberty of Prophesying

By EDWARD L. PARSONS
Retired Bishop of California

THE technical questions of the bishop's relation to the parish priest as set forth in the canons concerning his call and his tenure are important. They are indeed vastly important because the Church, while it must possess recognized codes of procedure, must have such codes always under review. New conditions of life must be met justly; the great Christian values must be preserved. The canons are made for the Church; not the Church for the canons.

Now one of the great fundamental Christian values involved in all this matter of call and tenure is that of the "liberty of prophesying." I have used the phrase which Jeremy Taylor made familiar. The more common phrase, "freedom of the pulpit," covers only part of the freedom which belongs or ought to belong to the minister's office, whether he is bishop or priest. He must be free to interpret his priesthood in the light of his call to prophesy. He cannot forget that in a sense his whole life is prophetic. Hosea revealed God in his relations with his faithless wife; Isaiah when he named his sons.

Jeremy Taylor was, it is true, using the term especially in reference to preaching and in preaching especially to its doctrinal content; but his wise words, a bit ponderous one must confess, are well worth re-reading in these days. Although it is not theological heresy about which most American Christians are concerned, but social heresy, the principle is the same. A good word for Russia; a suggestion that Communism has something to tell us; a suspicion that once upon a time a man or woman had been associated with a so-called subversive organization—that is the kind of heresy which today terrifies many good Americans and that is the kind of heresy for which the Church, if it is to protect its prophetic task, must find room. If that is so it needs no argument to prove that whether the liberty of prophesying has to do with theology or with the impact of the Christian faith on social conditions,

"tenure" is of vital importance. There is not, there cannot be, that free and joyous acceptance of the guidance of the spirit of truth, where at any moment the fiat of a superior (even his godly admonition) or the unchecked judgment of the congregation has authority. Tenure I say is of vital importance to both bishop and priest if there is to be liberty of prophesying; and liberty of prophesying is essential.

Prophets Are Essential

THE immediate grounds for that last assertion lie in the two complementary facts that on the one hand the growth and vigorous life of the Church, on the other the Christianizing of the world depend upon it. The Church can go on living, existing, bringing consolation and help to individuals in worship, in sacrament, in teaching with little or none of the prophetic spirit. It is bringing God to men through the formal channels of his grace. That the Holy Spirit comes to men in these accustomed ways the Church has always made clear; but it is equally clear that when the emphasis changes from the charismatic ministries to the feeling that the gifts of the Spirit in baptism or confirmation or ordination are the only vital things, something happens to the very life of the Church. Prophets are essential. It is the prophets, not the bishops and priests, whom the Te Deum couples with the apostles and martyrs. It is the prophets to whom the word of the Lord comes to lead, to be disturbers of the peace, to find new ways to meet new conditions, to reach out to the pagan world with the message of the gospel.

It seems unnecessary to remind ourselves that the greatest of the prophets, our Lord himself, was a disturber of the Church of his day. The righteous of his people, the good, the respectable, the hierarchy brought him to his death; but of his death and life the new Church was born. So Paul in his time shocked the first disciples as he broke the barriers of narrow Judaism. So Athanasius stood against the world; and Francis brought new life to the vast ecclesiastical structure of his day. So Wiclif and Hus and later Luther stirred men's hearts in days when the freshness and new life of the gospel had been so widely forgotten. And what of Wesley and what of the circuit riders who followed the pioneers to the west here in America? But I need not go on with a catalogue. It is "the goodly fellowship of the prophets" which stirs the moribund Church to life, which points its way in new conditions, which proclaims the word of the Lord where the Church has grown cold or indifferent or complacent in accepting the standards of society. One must remember too that while the Church, to use one of the cliches of today, stands in judgment over against the "world" and the "world's" social order, it makes that judgment effective for the most part only through those clergy and laity to whom God has vouchsafed the prophetic charisma, the men and women whose hearts are stirred, whose minds are open, whose courage is unwavering. Men do not become Kingsleys and Maurices and Dollings, Rauschbusches and Williamses through the gift of the Spirit in ordination. It is the Spirit, coming as the wind, which sweeps them along. They are helpless (to change the figure) when the flame from heaven rests upon them. They must speak. They come, these prophets, from all kinds of Christian bodies; small marginal groups of whom most of us have never heard, great historic Churches, Roman, Orthodox, Anglican, Catholic, Protestant. The wind bloweth where it listeth; the Spirit where God elects.

But if it is true that the immediate grounds for the liberty of prophesying lie in the fact that on the one hand the dynamic life of the Church, on the other the Christianizing of the world depends upon it, the fundamental ground lies in the very nature of the Christian faith. The New Testament breathes from first to last this spirit of freedom. It would be far beyond the scope of this paper to enter into a discussion of what such freedom means—the glorious liberty of the children of God. It is enough to suggest that God comes to men whether in or through the Church or in the wider context of the world (the light that lighteth every man) always ultimately in a personal relationship. The "divine — human encounter" however mediated must always partake somewhat of the uniqueness of the individual. And thus St. Paul emphasizes the diversities of gifts in the same Spirit. And, thus from generation to generation the interpretation of the gospel is enriched by new emphases, new experiences, new revelations of its adequacy to the infinite variety of human needs. When there is no vision the people perish, the Church becomes the slave of its traditions, the mouthpiece of a system of doctrine. Its arteries harden. It is no longer what the Body of Christ should be, living, growing, adventurous. The letter killeth; the Spirit giveth life.

Liberty Is Not Anarchy

OF course this liberty is not anarchy. It is not license. It is exercised within the great affirmations of the historic faith of the Church. It is exercised in this Church by the clergy with loyalty to the vows taken at ordination. It is exercised with a deep sense of the responsibility of the bishop or priest to the total life of the Church and the Church's mission to the world. But it is likewise exercised with full recognition of the wide and generous spirit of the Church, the diversity of interpretations and of emphasis everywhere acknowledged; but most important of all with recognition that the ultimate responsibility of the minister is to God in Christ, the head of the Church. The bishop as chief pastor (himself secure in his tenure except for causes which would warrant a trial) has of course the duty to advise, to give guidance, to warn. His "godly admonitions" (if we speak of those modern social "heresies") will properly warn enthusiastic young liberals to be sure of their facts and still more sure that their prophetic message finds warrant in the gospel. But understanding how vital this freedom is to the Church and to Christianity he will realize how much it depends upon that tenure which for him is so secure. There are I think few congregations which, if assured of their rector's good faith and given a full opportunity to understand what this liberty of prophesying means, will not be ready to accept it. It is one of the chief pastor's opportunities. But he will always be himself a man under authority and that the authority of the Lord of the Church. He will never forget that his essential relationship is not to the boards and committees and vestries which represent his people for purposes of common action, but to his people themselves. He will never forget that the canons are made for the Church and not the Church for the canons. He will never forget the apostolic precept, "quench not the Spirit" nor the apostolic word that "where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty."

NOTE: My attention has been called to the fact that in discussing the election of a rector (June 29th issue) my use of the phrase "made their choice" in connection with the vestry's notification to the bishop of the man they want to elect, is slightly confusing. I should have used the phrase in the canon "purpose to elect." For this is the point in the procedure at which the bishop enters officially, with thirty days to consider the qualifications of the man the vestry desires. It is not the final action of the vestry in sending to the bishop word that the candidate has been elected and accepted.

Preceding all this formal action is the bishop's pastoral conference with the vestry on the whole matter. It is only if they persist after he has disapproved that the possibility of a veto, which is fully discussed in the paper, would enter in. Really the most important part of the whole procedure is the informal pastoral conferences between bishop and vestry concerning possible choices.—E. L. P.

Garden Variety Faith

By WILLIAM P. BARNDS

Rector of St. Matthew's, Lincoln, Nebraska

LATELY I had my garden ploughed and I have planted potatoes, peas, radishes, lettuce and set out some onion sets. The whole prospect is pretty uninteresting looking at the moment—just dark, rough, ploughed ground. But in the light of past experience in a few weeks the garden will be covered with green plants, and it will be a struggle to keep the weeds from choking the plants. Then in due time I will dig the potatoes and gather the tomatoes and other vegetables.

Gardening is a kind of parable of faith. There are many times in life when the outlook on the face of it is dull, uninteresting, and monotonous. We are beset with the sameness of things and we become discouraged. But the situation does not always stay the same. There are hidden possibilities of change, like the seeds planted in a garden, which need but time and work to grow and come to fruition. When we do something, expend a little effort, and cultivate our lot in life we find that life is on our side. Things begin to blossom and in time the harvest comes. So if life is monotonous and hard, have faith, do your part, and you will see that your faith and work will be justified. The garden will grow!

Let Freedom Ring

By PHILIP H. STEINMETZ

Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

FREEDOM comes in four styles. First there is the freedom of slaves which lacks some of the features of other styles but has the most attractive characteristic of including freedom from responsibility. When we say "they" instead of "we" in talking about our family, church or nation, we are bidding for this style.

Then there is the freedom of soldiers. It offers more personal rights while still keeping a lot of freedom from responsibility with plenty of room for "passing the buck." When we accept orders or laws without thinking whether they are right and just, we buy this style.

The third style available is freedom of sinners. This style involves accepting the responsibility for our acts but recognizes no rule superior to our own desires and needs. The trademark is "I'll do as I please."

The final style is the freedom of saints. Here we come back toward the first style for we have to give up our own will in order to have it. But we give it up to God and not to other men or to our government. In return God gives us wide open opportunity and full power in his service together with really great joy.

Slaves, soldiers, sinners and saints are all mixed up in each of us, in our country and in the world. We move toward higher freedom as we think and pray and see just where we stand each day and refuse to be satisfied with any substitute for style 4.

QUINCY OPPOSES REVISION

★ Prayer Book revision was opposed at the synod of the diocese of Quincy on the grounds that it would create a controversial atmosphere "causing genuine distress among the laity"; the present book is satisfactory; expense for new books; absence of any general demand for revision.

The resolution was nearly identical to those which have been presented at a large number of diocesan conventions.

CANADIAN INDIANS VISIT DETROIT

★ The choir and many parishioners of St. John the Baptist, Walpole Island, Ontario, visited St. Andrew's, Detroit, on a recent Sunday. The congregation is composed of Indians of several of the Algonquin tribes. In the summer, vacationers to the island attend the services at St. John's but in the winter when they are alone they use the Ojibway hymnal and at St. Andrew's they sang several numbers in their own tongue.

On June 11th the visit was returned, with Rector Albert R. Marshall, choir and members of the parish going to Walpole for a service, picnic, ball game.

DAGWELL PLEADS FOR SEXTONS

★ Fair play for the church sexton was urged by Bishop Dagwell of Oregon in a new letter to people of his diocese. "Too many of us take our sextons for granted," he wrote. "We rarely give them much thought except when the church is cold or dusty or a fuse blows out during the singing of the offertory anthem. We want them on hand 24 hours a day and believe they can do without vacations. As for their ultimate retirement on a definite pension, such thought smacks of radicalism in many quarters. Anything that dignifies their position and their estimate of themselves as workers for God in his temple is greatly desired."

SEMINARY RECEIVES CONTRIBUTION

★ The School of Theology of the University of the South has received a gift of $10,000 for its building fund. It was made by a member of Dean F. Craighill Brown's former parish. It is planned to erect a building to contain an assembly room, class rooms and dormitory to take care of the 75 students entering this fall, which is practically double that of any year prior to 1945.

SUNDAY SCHOOL BUILDING AT DAYTONA BEACH

★ St. Mary's, Daytona Beach, Fla., is to have a $50,000 Sunday school building, it has been announced by Rector C. W. Fleming. The edifice will be so constructed that it will be in harmony with the new church, planned for the future. It will also be so built that it can be connected with the church.

UNIQUE GIFT TO LIBERIA

★ A new flagpole in the form of a ship's mast has been presented to St. John's School, Robertsport, Liberia, by John Lewis Jones, English designer of ironwork. It is in appreciation of the kindness shown him when he was shipwrecked in April with his wife and two children. The flagpole is the mast of his yacht.

Good Parsons Don't Grow On Trees

Usually a Christian home is somewhere in the background.

Probably a faithful parish priest took an interest in the growing boy.

Perhaps a college pastor recognized the right stuff for the ministry and kindled the spark.

But a seminary was the last link in the chain, giving three years of special education and conviction of vocation.

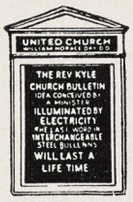
NEW BOOKS

I Want To Live! By J. N. Thompson. Morehouse. $2.10.



Convinced that many young people today, cut off from religion by indifferent parents, are interested in the Church but too shy to ask questions, the Rev. J. N. Thompson, vicar of Hampden, New Zealand, has written this book as the Christian answer to their cry for life. He sets forth simply and plainly the faith and practice of the Church. Although somewhat stilted, it is a good book to give to those groping for the Church.

ingly affected by modes of thought that are not favorable to the realization by man of his highest possibilities." These words define the setting in which Dr. Nixon develops his redefinition and defense of an intelligent, forward-looking, evangelical Christian faith.

The new and unfavorable "spiritual climate" is interpreted in terms of the displacement of an idealistic outlook by the dominant naturalism of today; this is the thesis of the introductory diagnosis. Subsequent chapters set forth the Christian alternative through a vindication of the Christian belief in God, an examination of the significance of Christ, and a plea for "a new apostolic age."

The themes are not new, but they are fundamental. And the presentation is fresh, clear, engaging, balanced and convincing. No less important, it is always held firmly within the context of the contemporary lay mind in language in which that mind is at home. Dr. Nixon has read widely and well. Here is a book to stimulate and satisfy the intelligent layman, and to confirm the minister harboring half-confessed misgivings.—Henry P. Van Dusen.

The Gospel in Hymns. By Albert Edward Bailey. Scribner. $6.00.

This is the story of public praise of God in the English language. As such, it begins with the first English translation of the Prayer Book, and the accompanying publication of the psalms in English. High Church and low, the developing social consciousness and the revived classicism of the Church in the several periods have found expression in the hymns. The author has a particular bias, as all writers must have, but he is eminently fair in presenting the positive contributions of each school. After reading this volume, one feels that by reading Church history or trends in theological development, he has missed the real meaning of recent movements in Christianity. And once the reader starts Mr. Bailey's valuable work, he will find it difficult to put down. —Sidney A. Temple Jr.

The First Book of Maccabees. English Translation by Sidney Tedesche; Introduction and Commentary by Solomon Zeitlin. Harpers. $4.00.

This is the first volume of a series called Jewis Apocryphal Literature which is to appear under the auspices of Dropsie College. If the rest are anything like the first, the series deserves wide and constant support. This volume contains the Greek text of I Maccabees, with a clear and idiomatic translation and valuable historical notes. To understand the New Testament one must know something about the Maccabaean period. In this volume we find the best historical narrative of the time. Zeitlin argues that chapters 14-16 were added later, but Thackeray's suggestion still seems relevant: the reason Josephus used only the first 13 chapters is that his manuscript was incomplete. Critical questions like this do not detract in the least from the value of this book, which we highly recommend.—R. M. Grant.

Preaching in the Great Tradition. Neglected Chapters in the History of Preaching. By Ray C. Petry. Westminster Press. $2.00.

Dr. Petry's book is a companion volume to his anthology of sermons (No Uncertain Sound), published two years ago. Here he enunciates those basic principles of great preaching which have characterized the Christian pulpit in all ages—its teaching quality, its relation to the common life and to Christian worship, but above all, its central proclamation of the gospel. Though many are prone to forget it, the period since the Reformation has had no monopoly on pulpit effectiveness; and this fact Dr. Petry makes abundantly clear in his exposition of patristic and medieval sermons and sermon technique. Such a book as this helps to give us a just sense of perspective upon one of the primary duties and privileges of the Christian ministry.—Massey H. Shepherd Jr.

"Do you need money for parsonage furnishings? Here's how to provide a steady flow of funds"

A story of the "young married" group of the Evangelical—United Brethren Church at Muncie, Indiana

"SOME time ago," (says Mrs. Achson Smith, of the Corinth Evangelical-United Brethren Church, Muncie, Indiana) "the sixteen couples in our 'young married' group undertook the responsibility of 'keeping up' the church parsonage.

"We needed a dependable source of funds—a plan that would bring money in regularly. After trying several things with indifferent success, someone suggested the sale of greeting cards. We were skeptical. Three church groups in our community were already offering cards. But when we learned of the Doehla Money-Raising Plan, and saw the beautiful Doehla samples, we knew we could meet competition.

"We sell Everyday cards the year 'round, chiefly to members of our congregation, and to school teachers, who send 'Get Well' and Birthday greetings to pupils. Then, at Christmas, we make our big drive. Soon we'll be starting our third year with Doehla. It is by far the most satisfactory money-raising program we have ever tried. To any group seeking 'something to sell' we say, Try the Doehla Plan!"

Does your church need money? Here's a way to raise it, easily and with dignity . . . through the tested and proven Doehla Money-Making Plan.

It's so much easier to raise money for your church when you and your church group can offer an excellent value in something which people need, want, and have to buy ANYWAY. And they do buy greeting cards, stationery, and gift-wrappings all year 'round.

The Doehla assortments therefore not only meet a definite need; they are also more beautiful and much more reasonable in price. So it is not surprising that folks love to look over these lovely Doehla assortments and are glad to order several boxes each.

The Doehla Money-Making Plan has been especially designed for church groups—both large and small—by one of America's leading experts on community money-raising methods. Whether the goal is $50, $500, $1,000, or as much more as is needed, this Plan can help you and your group reach that goal more quickly. A complete manual of operation (which will be sent free and without obligation) shows how to organize committees, delegate duties to each member, set up individual quotas with strong incentives to extra sales. It shows point-by-point and step-by-step how to develop a successful year-round money-making procedure.

Folks always enjoy looking over the cards, admiring the glowing colors, attractive designs, clever novelty features, and heart-warming verses.

Money For Your Church — Deep Satisfaction For You

You'll feel a deep sense of personal satisfaction when members of your group say to you, "THIS plan really works—it's going to produce the money we want for our church work."

Mail the coupon now, without obligation. In addition to the "Doehla Money-Making Manual," you will receive free samples of the new 50 for $1 "name-imprinted" cards and lovely Petal Script stationery. Also a few sample boxes of other popular Doehla assortments—on approval—and details of generous profits, extra cash bonuses. Harry Doehla Co., Studio WR 10, Fitchburg, Mass.

STORY OF THE WEEK

World Council Needs Support In Call For Peace

Church Leaders Being Requested to Endorse Pronouncement By Witness Editors

★ The central committee of the World Council of Churches called upon governments to "press individually and through the United Nations for a just settlement by negotiations and conciliation" of the war in Korea. Those of The Witness editorial board who could be reached in these vacation months, six of the ten members, are strongly of the opinion that efforts should be made to secure wide endorsement by Church leaders and Church groups of this appeal. We have every reason to believe that the other editors, if they could be reached in time for this issue, would share this view. But time of course is of the greatest importance in this crisis.

We have sent a statement to a considerable number of Churchmen, with a request for their endorsement. We hope too that readers will send us a postal or letter to Tunkhannock, Pa., our office of publication, approving the statement. A form below is for your convenience. The document, together with the names of those approving it, will then be sent to the proper authorities in Washington and the U.N. at the earliest possible time. Likewise we will keep readers informed on the results of our effort. It is, we are fully aware, a feeble one since The Witness reaches but a tiny handful when stacked against these agencies bent on creating a war psychology. Feeble or not, we speak for peace, confident that Almighty God will bless the effort.

The Statement

The World Council of Churches in a statement issued on July 13 called on all governments to "press individually and through the United Nations for a just settlement by negotiation and conciliation" of the hostilities in Korea.

We Christians, ministers and Church members, recognize the challenge to Christian leadership at this crucial point in world history. We favor every effort in the direction of peaceful settlement in Korea, such as the proposals of Premier Nehru which include the recommendation that the representative of the Chinese People's Republic be seated in the United Nations in accordance with the charter, and other steps necessary to restore the United Nations as an effective agency of mediation.

The moral atmosphere of our land today is dangerously pessimistic and war-like. A positive effort by the American people on behalf of reconciliation among the nations is needed to create a climate which will constrain our government to give fuller support to attempts at peaceful settlement in Korea.

The United Nations is our great modern act of faith that conflicts like that in Korea can be settled by means other than war. If we do not will the means, we do not will the end. As men and women of the Church, we pledge our active support of the World Council's call for negotiation through the United Nations to bring peace to Korea.

PRAY FOR PEACE IN TRENTON

★ The churches of Trenton, N. J. united last Sunday in praying for peace—the day being the fifth anniversary of the dropping of the atom bomb on Hiroshima. The call for prayer, issued by the council of churches, also urged that the atom bomb be not used in Korea. The statement also supported the pronouncement of the World Council of Churches which called for negotiation and conciliation in Korea. It was signed by the president and six vice-presidents.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

ALABAMA WITHHOLDS CONSENT

★ The standing committee of Alabama unanimously withheld consent to the consecration of the Rev. David E. Richards to be suffragan bishop of Albany, in action taken July 25th. The letter to the standing committee of Albany stated that the action was taken "in view of the arbitrary manner in which, according to our information, the suffragan bishop-elect was nominated. It would appear that this was not a 'free and untrammelled' election in the Church's best interest. In no wise do we wish to reflect on the character or ability of the suffragan bishop-elect, but we cannot consent to his consecration under the circumstances."

STUDENTS TRAINED AT HOSPITALS

J. OGDEN HOFFMAN is now chaplain at San Diego State Teachers College and vicar of St. Dunstan's

NORTHERN MICHIGAN HAS NEW CENTER

★ Bishop Page dedicated the new conference center for the diocese of Northern Michigan at a service held in July. The tract had a frontage of 3000 feet on Little Lake when purchased last year, but since then 800 feet has been sold and another 1200 will be sold later. A chapel was moved to the property last year, and a large house on the property is being remodeled, and log cabins, each capable of housing eight people, have been erected. The first actual use of the center will be Sept. 21-24 when a conference for clergy and laymen will be held.

TOPEKA CATHEDRAL PARISH HOUSE

★ Dean John Day broke ground in July for a new $150,000 parish house for Grace Cathedral, Tokepa, Kansas. It is being constructed at the south end of the cathedral and extends to the south end of the present guild hall. The building, to be ready in March, is the first unit of a building program.

VACATION SCHOOL USED PUPPETS

★ The vacation Bible school of Middletown, N. J., in which the Protestant churches of the community joined forces, used puppets to great advantage. Episodes in the life of Christ were portrayed with dolls made and operated by Mrs. Richard (Gay) Coblenz, the organist at Christ Church. The school met in Leeds hall, the new parish house of Christ Church.

HOLLYWOOD RECTOR IS HONORED

★ The Rev. Neal Dodd observed the 43rd anniversary of his ordination on July 30th at a service at St. Mary of the Angels, Hollywood. Bishop Gooden, retired suffragan, was the preacher. During the 31 years he has been the rector of the parish Mr. Dodd has officiated at more than 700 real weddings and has "officiated" at about 300 motion picture weddings. He is said to be the only clergyman in the world to have a card in the Screen Actors Guild.

JAPANESE DOCTORS ARE BAPTIZED

★ Six doctors on the staff of St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, Japan, were baptized last month after a long period of instruction by Chaplain Peter Takeda. Several more doctors and a number of nurses are now under instruction and it is expected that they will be baptized and confirmed in the fall.

LOS ANGELES HOSPITAL EXPANDS

★ Bishop Bloy of Los Angeles last week announced plans for a $3,000,000 building and expansion program for the Good Samaritan Hospital in Los Angeles. The first new unit will be a wing, a memorial to the late Bishop Stevens, which will increase bed capacity to 500.

BURROUGHS PREACHES MEMORIAL SERMON

★ Bishop Nelson Burroughs, coadjutor of Ohio, preached August 6th at the memorial service for the late Frank F. German, rector from 1916 to 1937 of Holy Trinity, Middletown, Conn. Burroughs attended the parish when he was a student at Wesleyan and the Berkeley Divinity School, then located in Middletown.

LOS ANGELES HAS FINE CAMPS

HOW TO BUILD A CHURCH

★ The best way is to do it yourself. Vicar Elvin W. Smith of St. Simon's, San Fernando, Cal., put willing parishioners at work evenings, with each one making about 50 adobe bricks at each session. It will require about 21,000, each weighing 55 pounds, to complete the 5,200 square foot structure, which will be in early California style, seat 250, cost about $42,000. Mr. Smith and adobe bricks are not strangers since he used them in building the rectory.

Vicar Smith also used a chain letter scheme to raise funds. He mailed a letter, in the form of a verse, asking the person to buy a brick for a dollar. He also enclosed three similar letters which he asked the person to send to three friends. He has raised more than $8,000 in this way, receiving donations from as far as Guam and Florida.

When the church is completed the congregation will cease meeting in a four-car garage and storage room, which is waggishly known in San Fernando as "St. Simon's-in-the-garage." The vacated garage will then be used as a parish house until one can be built.

BALTIMORE RECTOR TO RETIRE

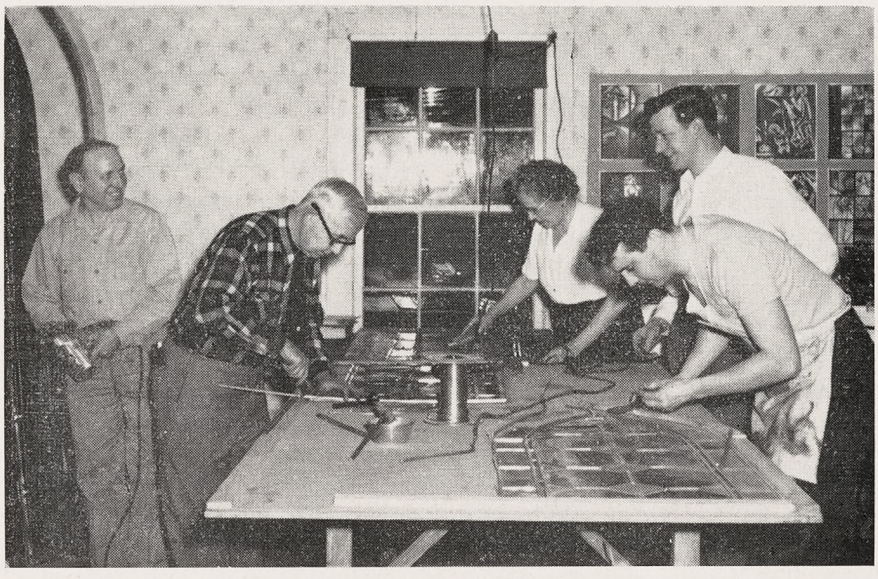
★ The Rev. Hugh W. S. Powers has resigned as rector of Holy Nativity, Baltimore, effective January 1st, a date marking the 40th year of his service to the parish. The vestry has made him rector emeritus and voted him a pension.

With the exception of five years in country work following seminary, Mr. Powers has devoted his entire ministry to Holy Nativity. When it was established under his leadership in 1910, on the outskirts of the city, there were fifty communicants worshipping in a portable chapel. Today the parish serves an area of several square miles, has about 800 communicants, a rectory, large parish house and an unusually beautiful church, with a side chapel, seating 500 persons.

SOCIAL RELATIONS CONFERENCE

★ A conference on social relations will be held August 13-15 at Backsteep Manor, the training center of the diocese of Western Massachusetts. The director is Mrs. Benson Harvey of Easthampton, field worker of the social relations department of the diocese. A featured speaker will be the Rev. Alfred B. Starratt, rector at Stockbridge, who was formerly a missionary in China. Mrs. Muriel Webb will be present as the representative of the national social service department.

CITY COUNCIL THANKS RECTOR McNAIRY



★ The Rev. Philip F. McNairy, rector of Christ Church, St. Paul, Minn., was called before the city council last week to receive public thanks for his work in the city. The resolution pointed out that McNairy, about to leave to become the dean of St. Paul's, Buffalo, has been a founder and president of the city's council on human relations.

ELSA CONFERENCE TO BE HELD

★ About 50 members of the Episcopal League for Social Action have been invited to a weekend conference that will be held at Seabury House, Greenwich, Conn., over the Labor Day weekend. It is planned to discuss the various social and international problems that face the world and, if possible, to determine a united course of action for the League.

CHURCHES ISSUE VOTERS GUIDE

★ A unique service has been rendered to San Antonio voters through a Voters Guide, put out by the council of churches of the city. For the past seven years it has been prepared and distributed by the 72 churches of 16 denominations that are members of the council. The information is specific as to the qualifications, training, program, affiliation of all candidates for office.

Prayer Book Studies

IT is to be hoped that the first number of Prayer Book Studies recently published by the Church Pension Fund will be widely and sympathetically read throughout the Church. The publication of these studies by the standing liturgical commission was authorized by the last General Convention, and others are to follow the one now in print.

The initial booklet deals with baptism, confirmation and the liturgical lectionary or the epistles and gospels for the Sundays and other days of the Christian year. Tentative revisions of the services and the lectionary are put forward, not for use, but for comment and criticism. Out of this, it is hoped, will come a general understanding of and participation in the official revision of the Prayer Book which must come within the next decade or two, not too soon for many churchmen!

A first reading of the booklet at hand leads to the conclusion that the commission has labored patiently and diligently to do a service to the Church. How difficult to have a meeting of all minds on something so hallowed as the Book of Common Prayer, to satisfy all tastes and opinions! There will always be those who resent and resist any change whatsoever. And there will be those others who would go to the opposite extreme if they could. But this is what makes a democracy, and ours is such a Church. Slowly but surely we shall arrive at the necessary compromise and agreement, for revise the Prayer Book we must in every generation. For it must not be a static thing, and much as we all love it, neither is it perfect and beyond improvement.

Almost everyone will welcome especially the section on the service for holy baptism. Who is there that does not often feel apologetic, even embarrassed, when he reads or hears the service as it now stands in the presence of a congregation of young parents and sponsors? We have no doctrinal quarrel on the score of the meaning of holy baptism, but the order and wording of our rite is frankly unintelligible, obsolete and long-winded. One reason for not having baptism at the main service of the church according to the earlier and better custom is the very fact that in its present form it is simply bewildering to the average layman. The suggested revision is a conservative one, but distinctly an improvement over the 1929 version!

There is not the same unhappy feeling about the confirmation service although as the study points out there is some little confusion as to just what confirmation itself means. The commission proposes, in particular, an introduction to the service consisting of an opening sentence, a psalm, a lesson, and a collect, all coming before the actual presentation of the candidates to the bishop. As a matter of fact, the majority of clergy are already given to improvising some introductory matter when confirmation takes place, as it usually does, of a Sunday morning with the full congregation present. Sometimes the creed is said, or parts of the offices of instruction used, especially that section which refers to confirmation itself. It is generally felt that to begin immediately with the presentation to the bishop without any other preparation is too abrupt. The standing commission has tried to deal with this criticism by suggesting an introductory rite. As we read it over it struck us as making far too much getting up and down. The congregation is standing for the opening sentence and the psalm, then sitting for a very brief lesson from Ezekiel, then on its knees for a single collect, then up again for a hymn and the presentation of the candidates. Too much! We would like to see the beautiful prayer of self-dedication from morning family prayer adapted (by the changing of a single word, another, to this) and used in such an introductory service.

This first issue of Prayer Book Studies is taken up even more with a careful survey of the epistles and gospels appointed for the Christian

"QUOTES"

THE people of our nation tend to glory in our political and military might, and while we maintain that there is no imperialism in our paternalistic money-lending and lend-lease and other forms of largesse, it is a simple fact that the other nations feel our power and cringe before it. They feel they have no way of being sure that we shall use our power in terms of justice and righteousness. Whether this impression is fair or not, it is there. Can the Church so add to the acts of statesmen as to convince the world that America has no sinister motives?

year. And, as the booklet points out, how much confusion has entered into the choice of many of these scriptural passages. As a result, the Church does not always put its best foot forward in the lessons read in the Holy Communion. We feel that particularly in Lent, on Easter Day, and on those Sundays approaching Whitsunday. The commission takes up the Church seasons successively, gives something of the history of the liturgical lectionary, recording many criticisms and suggesting more than a score each of possible new epistles and gospels.

Prayer Book Studies will undoubtedly meet with a mixed reception. It is not meant to be a final statement, merely a preliminary report, an invitation to general study and comment. The Church is indebted to the commission for a work well begun. We shall look forward to further studies leading up eventually, but not too distantly, to an actual revision and enrichment of the Book of Common Prayer.

THUMBING through the newspaper the other morning we came across a feature story about a series of church buildings which the diocese of New York is erecting in strategic places of new growth. On the same page were pictures of one such church just completed, interior and exterior, simple in line and economic in cost. A good idea, we thought, and reading further we were enlightened to learn that, in the architect's words, these new church buildings can be converted into factories or warehouses within two or three days should their neighborhoods change from residential to industrial ones. This is certainly nice to know and must be very reassuring to the board of missions!

In the same newspaper, but not on a back page, there was a prominent headline assuring the great American public that its manufacturing plants will be converted into war factories much more quickly than last time. This, too, is very reassuring. It may be that the New York churches will be converted sooner than their architect imagines.

The newspaper carried more about conversion. There was an ad of a sofa which can be converted into a bed, a sewing machine into a desk, pictures for the walls into lamps at night, a clothes-pole into a beach umbrella, etc. We're actually a clever people, we Americans of 1950! A people of quick conversions. Every kind of conversion but the one which is most needful of all!—conversion from self-righteousness to humility. Conversion from fear to faith. Conversion from mammon to God. It is of the spirit, this kind of conversion, and oh how urgent in this day of reaction and national hysteria.

The Lessons of Extinction

By HUGH McCANDLESS
Rector of the Epiphany, New York

PROFESSOR EINSTEIN once said "God is a scientist, not a magician." In other words, Einstein expects the world to make sense, because there is a divine mind behind it all.

As a group, scientists, especially biologists, are among the most thoughtfully religious men of today.

If God made the world, and if God's law applies in the world, then that law applies just as much to our lives as it does to the weather. It does not matter where we look for truth—if we look sincerely, we shall find that truth in one thing is truth in another. We can learn from the Bible, from history, from science, from nature, or from life. The basic truths we learn from one will apply to all the others.

We are thinking much about extinction today. What can we learn from nature about our chances?

Take the Dodo. We know the phrase "As dead as a Dodo." Well, the Dodo actually existed, once. It was a bird that lived on the island of Mauritius, in the Indian Ocean. It had lots of food and no enemies. You might think that this environment would produce a wonderful animal, but it didn't. The Dodo didn't have to swim, or run, or fly, to get at the shellfish it ate. It had no enemy to swim or fly or run away from. And so it forgot to swim, lost the power of flight, and could just waddle around, after centuries of this easy living. Also it became helplessly stupid. About three hundred years ago, the first sailors landed on Mauritius. They were looking for fresh water, but they must have been delighted when they found fresh meat. They found the nearest thing to a "Shmoo" that ever existed! The dodoes didn't even run away when the sailors started killing them, they were just too stupid. More ships landed at Mauritius later, and after a hundred years or so the Dodo was dead indeed.

All of us tend to look for an easy life. We would like an easy school, an easy job—everything easy. Especially we would like an easy religion. But that is the way to become spiritually extinct. The Dodo bird was killed because its life had been too easy.

Jesus says to us "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me."

Another extinct animal is the Trilobite, but this disappeared thousands of centuries ago. It was a small shelled animal, built like a church with aisles, or perhaps I should say it was built like a Quonset hut with two small Quonset huts on each side. Thus it is called the Trilobite—the three lobed creature. It was from about one to about four inches long, and crept along the bottoms of oceans which disappeared a long time ago. The strong shells of the various kinds of Trilobites made them immune from most of their enemies, and the race lived a long time. Other kinds of sea animals appeared and disappeared but the Trilobite kept on living happily on the muddy sea floor. We find numerous fossils of this animal in strata of rocks which were laid down hundreds of millions of years apart. But suddenly the successful Trilobite disappeared. For a long time the scientists could not guess the reason, but now they think they know. The last Trilobites began to have very fancy shells. Their shells were covered with projections and curlieques which served no purpose at all; in fact they got in the animal's way.

Human Families

THIS very same thing happens so often in human families: we all know of pioneers who came to this country and lived very simply. Generations later we sometimes find that their descendants must lead such complicated lives that living takes all their time, and they have no time for families or children. Aristocracy has always tended to die out, except where it has made the effort to keep its life simple. And you and I can become so encumbered with slavery to possessions, and luxurious habits, and sophisticated pleasures, that living gets to be such an effort that we have no time for the real things in life, for religion, and friendship and charity. The Trilobite died out because its way of living became too fancy.

As Jesus said in another place "The cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful."

Another extinct animal is the Irish Elk. It is an animal that did the wrong thing and did not know when to stop. It had two weapons: its sharp front hooves, which it used against the wolves; and its wide spreading horns which it used against other elk. As this elk developed its horns grew bigger and bigger until they became the biggest antlers any animal ever had. Some have been dug up from the Irish bogs which measured more than twelve feet across. So the elk was getting better and better at destroying his own kind. At the same time, the weight of the veritable forest he was carrying on his head made him less and less able to use his hooves against the real enemies of his race, the wolves. And so the race died out. Between the wolves and the other elk, no individual elk had much of a chance. This surely ought to be a warning for men and nations today. If we are going to use all our science and strength in destroying one another, instead of destroying our real enemies, we shall simply be helping our real enemies destroy us. Our real enemies are disease and famine and poverty and ignorance. Against them the atom bomb is of no more use than the horns of the Irish Elk were against the wolves.

Our Lord said in Gethsemane "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

Bread of the World

BY

GORDON C. GRAHAM

WE are in the season of nature worship. People say that they can find God in the country, by the lake and in the hills. They even say that the golf course gives them a feeling of communion with the divine. Our churches are bereft of their congregations as they rush out into the country for their weekend recreation. Yet the Incarnate God when he was upon the earth did not identify himself with the beauties of nature. He talked about the flowers and the wheat but he always coupled them with the activity of people. On the night on which he was betrayed he took bread and said "This is my body."

Bread (and wine) is an economic commodity. It comes originally from the earth but it does not grow automatically. The wheat is sown and tended by human hands. It is harvested and shipped by workers to where it is made into flour. It is baked and marketed for sale far from the place where it was grown. All kinds of people have taken part in its production and distribution. It carries in itself the mark of the whole economic system. Good men and bad men have taken part in its manufacture. Their conditions of employment have been wholesome and they have been unhealthy. It has been produced to feed men and it has been sold only to make profit, especially for those who have had nothing actually to do with its creation. All sorts of related enterprises have gone into its production, either directly or indirectly, such as transportation, advertising, banking, and education. It contains, therefore, both good and evil. It is a sample of our society. It is the bread of the world.

Bread, also, as does any other article of human making, represents the personalities of the members of the society from which is has come. We are known by what we produce, be it a pie or a symphony. When we have turned out some article, such as a dress or an engine, we feel that part of ourselves has gone into its production. We are pleased or hurt personally by the judgment of society on what we have done. This is not just subjective feeling. It is part of the definition of any object. The worker is a part of the thing that he has made. Every artist knows this and it is one of the difficulties that is at the heart of the modern industrial system: ownership is not just a matter of putting up money, it is a matter of labor.

Part of Us

THE bread of the world, therefore, is part of us. This is realistically true when it is bought with our own money because money represents our goods and services. When we present our offerings of bread and money at the offertory we are putting something of ourselves on the altar. We are doing even more than that—we are offering samples of our whole social system. St. Augustine said that when we made our offertory in the Eucharist we should say—"There am I on the altar." If we realize this we shall find a practical meaning to the offertory act. It is not just bread by itself, but our bread representing us, as we bring to the altar in it all "ourselves, our souls and bodies," our accomplishments, our goodness, our shortcomings and our sins. This is true not only for ourselves, who are actually in the church at a particular service, but for our whole society. We may present the bread but the world has produced it and it bears the marks of the good and evil of our economic and social relationships. We can say really and truly, in a sense of oneness with the human race, that this bread of the world is "my body." The question that arises immediately when we think of God's goodness and our sins is whether our offertory is worthy of being placed before him who would have us be perfect because he himself is our Father in heaven who is perfect.

A Two-Fisted Faith

By CORWIN C. ROACH

Dean of Bexley Hall

AS boys we used to declare belligerently that we could lick Tom, Dick, or Harry with one hand tied behind our back. Of course we couldn't. In any honest to goodness fight we need both hands. Many a boxer has lost the decision because he did not know how to use his left. So the Church has sometimes lost out because it did not use all the weapons God has given it. We need an ambidextrous Christianity, a two-fisted faith in the eternal conflict against sin, the world, and the devil. The early Christians won out over the Roman Empire because they used all the weapons. They outthought as well as outlived their great rival. We see those weapons being forged in St. Paul's letters. With a sacrificial spirit he coupled a bold, inquiring mind. Not only must we love God with all our heart and with all our mind, we must fight for him with the same weapons. Sometimes in the Christian conflict we are called upon to lead with our head!

Note the change in the reading from the standard translations, weapons for armor, in II Cor. 6:7 "With the weapons of righteousness for the right hand and for the left." The latter is the normal rendering of the Greek but occasionally, as here, the former translation is to be preferred. Moffatt incorporates both in his translation "with the weapons of integrity for attack or defense." Too often, however, the Church has stressed armor to the neglect of arms. The best defense is a good offense. We were not meant to protect ourselves from sin and its evil results but to defeat and destroy it. We were meant to be the Church militant and that demands an all-out, two-fisted attack.

Morbus Sabbiticus

By PHILIP H. STEINMETZ

Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

AN attack of Morbus Sabbiticus comes on suddenly. No symptoms are felt on Saturday night. In fact the patient is often in high spirits just before the onset.

There are eight peculiar features of this disease:

1. It attacks church members.
2. It makes its appearance only on Sunday.
3. The symptoms vary, but never interfere with eating or sleeping.
4. It never lasts more than 12 hours.
5. It generally attacks the head of the house and continues until everyone in the family is affected.
6. No physician is ever called.
7. It always proves fatal in the end to the soul.
8. It is becoming fearfully prevalent, and is sweeping many into spiritual weakness every year.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

PARISH STARTS MOVE AGAINST HYSTERIA

★ Members of Christ Church, Oswego, Oregon, have launched a movement to combat war hysteria, hoarding and profiteering. A pledge, issued by the church, was later adopted by the local chamber of commerce. Those signing it pledged "That we, the members and friends of Christ Episcopal Church, as practicing Christians, protest in every possible manner all profiteering, scarce-buying and hoarding; that we renounce all individual gains which must be had at the expense of general security; that we pledge ourselves neither by word nor deed to contribute to fear or hatred, being aware that the present emergency challenges our moral, as well as our physical courage; that we as Christians will meet this challenge with the courage and fortitude which belongs to our glorious Christian heritage; that we invite all like-minded citizens to join us in this resolution."

ANGLICAN EVANGELICAL GROUPS MERGE

★ The Church Association and the National Church League, evangelical organizations of the Church of England, have merged with the new name of Church Society. Among the objectives are "to maintain the doctrine and worship of the Church of England as set forth in the Thirty-Nine Articles and the Prayer Book" and to "uphold the supreme and exclusive authority of Holy Scripture as containing all things necessary to salvation." The new society will "resist all efforts to reinstate in the Church of England the sacrifice of the Mass."

WORK CAMPS HELD IN JAPAN

★ The National Christian Council of Japan is sponsoring work camps this summer, with students living together for some days for study in the meaning of Christianity in action. They also help folks in need, make playgrounds for children, aid repatriates.

Another project has been meetings on the family where many serious problems were brought up for discussion. Some listed were the difficulty in being a good church member when others in the family are non-Christian; in-law conflicts; the shortage of men for husbands; concubinage; conflicts between youth and their elders because the former are more and more adopting western ways. Divorce also is a serious problem and is often linked with financial difficulties. Likewise suicide is great, particularly among young people who see no way ahead.

CHURCHWOMAN IS HONORED

★ Dean Artemesia Bowden of St. Philip's Junior College, San Antonio, was recently honored by the Council of Pan-American Relations for her outstanding contributions to the youth of the city in the field of education. Bishop Jones, out of the city at the time, wired her: "I rejoice with you in the great honor that has been accorded you. This is a well deserved tribute for your long and unselfish service to your people and to our community."

ASCENSION FESTIVAL ANTHEM CONTEST

★ The Rev. Roscoe T. Foust, rector of the Ascension, New York, has announced a fourth anthem contest, continuing the efforts of the parish to add to the repertory of significant church music. The contest is for the best setting for the Te Deum, and the winning composition will be sung at the festival to be held at the Ascension May 3, 1951. The prize is $100, with the winning work published on a royalty basis. Details may be had from the secretary, 12 West 11th St., New York 11, N. Y.

CHURCH CARRIES ON IN CHINA

★ The Rev. Charles P. Gilson of Shanghai, writing of the ongoing work of the Church in China, reports "just one of many examples:" A man of sixty years, who has been on the mission's office staff for thirty years and had never become a Christian, was baptized on Easter Day, and not alone; with him were baptized his wife, son, two daughters, daughter-in-law, son-in-law, and two grandchildren.

"It takes courage and conviction for a non-Christian Chinese to make such a decision now," Mr. Gilson says, "and they are doing it by the hundreds. Anyone who says Christianity is finished here is either pathetically ignorant of facts or just a subversive Christian. Christianity was never more alive than now, and there never was a time when we needed the support and backing of the folks at home more than we do right now.

"We have had no disruptions of our normal daily routine lately, for which we are all thankful. Things are going along much the same as usual. Each day brings new problems, ideas, regulations, etc., but we all continue to keep healthy and happy."

MILLION TO MICHIGAN FROM MRS. FORD

★ Mrs. Henry Ford has given a million dollars to the diocese of Michigan for the erection and maintenance of a church. Bishop Emrich, in making the announcement on August 3, said the church would be built on a site, deeded to the diocese, which surrounds the old Ford family cemetery in Detroit. Mrs. Ford's husband, his parents, and 60 others of the Ford family are buried there.

RADIO & TELEVISION WORKSHOPS

★ Radio and television workshops are being sponsored by the Protestant radio commission. National network officials will instruct Church representatives on how to use these means of communication on the local and diocesan level. One will be held in Philadelphia, August 6-31; Des Moines, Iowa, October 21-28; Syracuse, N. Y., November 12-17, which is devoted exclusively to television.

PEACE VIGIL IN TEXAS

★ A vigil for peace started in the diocese of Texas on August 6 as a result of a call by Bishop Quin. The schedule was worked out by a diocesan committee so that prayers are being offered in at least one church in the diocese each hour of the day and night until the cessation of hostilities in Korea.

THE NEW BOOKS

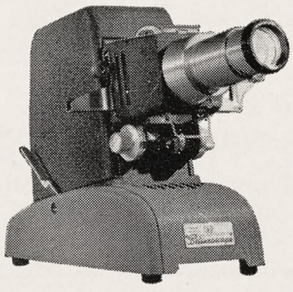
FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

Renewing The Mind. By Roger Hazelton. Macmillan, $2.50.

Roger Hazelton, clergyman and philosopher, has presented in this volume a remarkable and timely explanation of the Christian function of faith and reason. As Christians we hear a great deal about faith; as human beings we are constantly aware of reason. Seldom do the two dwell peacefully and creatively in our minds. The irrationality, confusion, and despair of our day (symptoms of the sickness of our minds) cry out for mental health. This can be achieved only by understanding the conditions of Christian faith which, when met, will consecrate and renew the life of human reason. What this way of renewal means is clearly stated and one will find it unusually helpful.

—C. L. Willard

The Classical Tradition. By Gilbert Highet. Oxford University Press. $6.00.



This is a survey of the influence of Greek and Roman culture upon Western literatures. It is fascinatingly written, by an author who seems to have read all European literature, and who possesses a fine sense of literary values. Not only that, but he is also aware of the place of Christianity and the Christian church in the emerging civilization of Northern Europe since the Classical Age. This is no mere "history of classical scholarship," but a study of the living impulses, fertilizing ideas, and literary forms which exercised a creative influence upon the literature and thought of the North and West. The story is carried down through the Dark and Middle Ages, the Renaissance and Reformation, to the present day. It is a book to be read and re-read—and remembered.—F.C.G.

Parish Worship on Community Occasions. The National Council. 25c.

It is good to see the National Council sponsoring pamphlets of this sort, which presents the ideals of the Liturgical Movement from a non-partisan point of view and with a very practical concern and application. The three essays are: "Community Life in parish worship" by Edward R. Hardy; "Community life in Morning & Evening Prayer" by Hugh McCandless; and "Community Concerns and the Holy Communion" by Charles S. Martin. The theme of all three essays is the offering of life and work of modern men and women through the common liturgy of the Prayer Book. The corporate worship of the Church is thus made relevant to the larger community of occupational and social concerns of the Church's present day membership. There is nothing doctrinaire about these essays. They are first and foremost practical, and parish clergy will find many good suggestions for making their Sunday services more meaningful — without departing from the established liturgical law of the Church.—M. H. Shepherd Jr.

The Conducting of Retreats. By James Wareham. Morehouse - Gorham. $1.50.

A sound little book, entirely inside the Anglican tradition.

JAMES R. SHARP
Secretary, diocese of Tenn.

There may be some question about who did write the Epistle of St. James, but it is quite certain that the St. James commemoriated on July 25 did not, unless he did it before the events related in Acts XII. This refers to the first sentence of the editorial "A Dead Religion" (Witness, July 27).

MRS. C. E. ROBERTS
Churchwoman of Dallas, Texas

Just a word of appreciation for your articles "Prayer Book Loyalty" by George Morrel (June 8) and "The Prayer Book As It Is" by Bishop Oldham (June 15), which struck a responsive chord in my heart as being the true middle ground on which all loyal members of our Church should be able to agree.

L. F. ELLSBREE
Layman of Brighton, Mass.

Many congratulations to you on your publication of various issues of The Witness in order to present the purposes of such organizations as the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship, the American Church Union, and the Anglican Society. These issues are certainly aids to understanding within the Church.

May I comment on the claim of the "five Episcopal clergymen," unnamed, in the issue of June 15th? They say that "since the service conducted by Bishop Dun has many precedents, it appears quite improbable that any action of censure would be taken by the House of Bishops."

There are "precedents" good, and "precedents" not so good. The crucial point here is whether the precedent alluded to is in accordance with the catholic nature, teaching, and sound practice of the Episcopal Church, and in relation to the same nature, teaching, and sound practice of the whole Catholic Church?

Certainly, the undivided Catholic Church—that Church which we confess we believe in, when we recite the creeds — never permitted those who had separated from its fellowship and communion, and who had also set themselves up into rival organizations, to assist in the ordination of priests or to receive the holy communion, unless they had first, repentant and forgiven, been received back into the Church. If this Church (or individual members of it, acting on their own initiative) does to the contrary of that custom, the "precedent" would seem to be out of line with the traditions to which the Anglican Communion appealed at the Reformation and to which we are firmly bound.

CHARLES E. STEELE
Layman of Romulus, N. Y.

Concerning the placement of the American flag or any other national emblem in a church of God—the place for it is not inside the church at all. During the first world war many of our churches had their smaller altars decorated with the flags of our country and of our allies. This altar, dedicated to the Prince of Peace, at one period had the Japanese flag in and the Russian out. Then when we got mad at the Japs, out went their flag. Then when the Russians double-crossed themselves and everyone else, in went the Russian flag.

Our Church is too universal for any one particular flag, especially in the chancel.

British Humanitarianism

Essays Honoring
FRANK J. KLINGBERG
Edited by
SAMUEL CLYDE McCULLOCH
Rutgers University

Publication No. 32 — The Copy $4.00

[Pages x, 254]

THESE TEN ESSAYS by ten professional historians, former doctoral students of Professor Klingberg, illuminate the work of the Anglican Church, through the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (commonly called the S.P.G.), as the motivating power in the growth of British humanitarianism. This volume is a striking corrective of that school of historians which ignores religion and the Church in their historiography.

A Bishop of the Great Plains

By GEORGE ALLEN BEECHER
Bishop of Western Nebraska
1910 - 1943

[Pages 218 plus 24 pages of illustrations]

BISHOP BEECHER is one of Nebraska's "First Citizens." His entire ministry of 51 years was spent within the boundaries of the State of Nebraska—a unique record. He was the pastor to a generation whose manner of life is largely unknown to the present generation, but ruggedly interesting. He was the friend of many people, some famous such as Buffalo Bill and Willa Cather, but all interesting. The West of the pioneer comes alive again.

The Catholic Movement in the American Episcopal Church

By
GEORGE E. DeMILLE
Author of "A History of the Diocese of Albany"

Publication No. 12 — The Copy $3.00

[Pages ix, 219]

A NEW, REVISED, and enlarged edition of the standard work on the subject.

"A more fair-minded and judicious history of this very controversial question could not be written . . . He gives lively—and by no means hagiographic—pictures of such leaders as Seabury, Hobart, Doane, Whittingham and John Henry Hopkins. Taking the whole record into account . . . it does not appear to the author, or to this reviewer, that the 'Catholic movement' is a Romeward movement or likely to become one."—THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY, the leading Protestant journal.

The Province of the Pacific

By
LOUIS CHILDS SANFORD
Late Bishop of San Joaquin
1911 - 1942

[Pages xiii, 187]

"THIS is an accurate account of the development of the Episcopal Church in the West by the one best qualified to write in terms of the province, of which he was president for many years. Following a brilliant essay ["Provinces: Ancient and Modern"] by Bishop Parsons, there is the story of the way in which the Church in the West was organized . . . Because of the large geographical area and the circumstances of Church life in the West, the Province of the Pacific has had a significant influence . . . and has attempted to increase the prestige of the provincial system . . ." DR. RANDOLPH CRUMP MILLER in The Churchman.

• A copy of THE HISTORIOGRAPHER, 1950, the Society's organ, will be sent with our compliments upon request. Stowe, president and editor of publications.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Churchmen Throughout Country Endorse Peace Appeal

Nearly 500 Signatures Received in a Week In Response to Witness Statement

BY
W. B. SPOFFORD SR.

★ The statement calling for support of the World Council's call for "a just settlement by negotiation and conciliation" of the hostilities in Korea, published in our issue of August 10, had been signed by 440 people up to August 15. Endorsements continue to be received with every mail, making it necessary for us to report more fully in our next issue. It can already be said however that this is a remarkable response, representing a 25% return to letters we sent out by 4th class postage in the middle of the vacation period.

Signers represented 27 denominations from 39 states, with Methodists leading the list with 158 signatures. Episcopalians were second, naturally since this is a magazine of the Episcopal Church, with 77 signing. Space limitations prevent us from publishing all the names, but we do present the names of some of the most prominent of other Churches, with the names of all the Episcopalians so far to have signed.

Methodists

There were 158 who stated that they were Methodists. Being away from our office as this is written our facilities for identifying the signers is extremely limited, but we wish to present some of the more prominent, without meaning any slight to others: Bishop Marshall R. Reed of Detroit; Mrs. Fred B. Fisher, the chairman of the World Day of Prayer Committee of the Council of Church Women. Mrs. Fisher is the widow of Bishop Fisher who served his church in China for many years. There are two district superintendents: the Rev. Dillon Wesley Throckmorton of the Sacramento-Nevada district and the Rev. Owen J. Beadles of the Seattle district. Mark A. Dawber, until recently the head of the Home Missions Council; Prof. Clyde R. Miller of Columbia; Willard Uphaus, director of the Religion and Labor Foundation, and Bill White, vice-president of the youth fellowship of north central region are other Methodists to sign. Also the signature of Bishop John Wesley Lord of Boston has just come in.

Baptists & Congregationalists

The Rev. Joseph C. Hazen, secretary of the American Baptist Convention, heads a list of 49 Baptists from widely scattered parts of the country, most of them pastors of churches.

The Congregational-Christian Church is represented to date by 47 signers, among them being the Rev. Albert Buckner Coe, president of the Massachusetts Congregational Churches; Prof. Arthur L. Swift Jr. of Union Seminary; Mrs. Erminie Lantero, assistant editor of "Religion in Life"; Ivey J. Shuff of the Pennsylvania Council of Christian Education, and Prof. Jerome Davis, author and lecturer, formerly of the Yale Divinity School.

Friends & Presbyterians

Editor Richard R. Wood of "The Friend," one of eight Quakers to sign, writes: "I am delighted to be able to share with you in the current effort to introduce a much-needed constructive note into the consideration of the trouble in Korea. I hope that you receive a great response and that from mere fear of war people turn to the available means of doing something toward a peaceful settlement of the conflict."

One of the 29 Presbyterians to sign adds a bit of color by stating that he, the Rev. Raymond H. Rosche, is the pastor of the Church of the Covenant, New York, which he describes as the "church nearest to the new United Nations headquarters." Another well known Presbyterian to sign is the Rev. Philip P. Elliott, pastor of a large church in Brooklyn.

Unitarians & Disciples

Prof. Alva W. Taylor of Nashville and Dr. Kirby Page, author and lecturer, are among the seven Disciples, while there are eight Unitarians, among them the Rev. John Howard Lathrop of Brooklyn, and the Rev. Stephen H. Fritchman, now the pastor of a large congregation in Los Angeles and formerly the editor of the official magazine of that Church.

Evangelical & Reformed

The fourteen members of the Evangelical and Reformed Church are led by Dean David Dunn of the seminary at Lancaster, Pa.; H. Stanley Dunn, a professor at the same institution and Dr. John N. LeVan, their director of united promotion.

There are eight members of the African Methodist Episcopal

Zion Church on the list, headed by Bishop Cameron C. Alleyne of Philadelphia and Bishop G. W. Taylor of Virginia, and Mrs. Abbie C. Jackson, the head of women's branch, the Church's missionary society.

Other Churches

Other Churches represented are: Reformed in America (4); Evangelical United Brethren (4); Missionary Baptist (6); Community (3); Lutheran (2); Church of the Brethren (2). A few Churches are represented by but one signature, but in a number of instances the signature is that of a distinguished person. Jenny A. Johnsen is the editor of "The Friend," organ of the Independent Lutheran Church; Archbishop William H. Francis is the head of the Old Catholic Church, while Pierre van Paassen, the noted author, is the sole member of the Dutch Reformed Church to send in his endorsement.

Other denominations represented are Churches of God in North America; Commandment Keepers; Federated Baptist-Methodist; United Presbyterian; Zion Baptist; Universalist. There were also eight people who sent in endorsements without identifying themselves by denominations.

Incidentally there were but nine persons who were sufficiently opposed to our statement to write to say so.

Episcopalians

We will state first that eight of the ten members of The Witness editorial board have endorsed the statement, with the other two, Dr. Foust who is in Europe and Mr. McCandless who has not yet been reached, having had no opportunity to sign. Five Bishops have signed: Bishop Lawrence of Western Massachusetts; Bishop Dagwell of Oregon; Bishop Parsons, retired of California; Bishop Walter Mitchell, retired of Arizona; Bishop Gooden, retired suffragan of Los Angeles.

At least three to sign the statement which calls for the seating of the People's Republic of China in the Security Council of the UN, are former missionaries to that country: Mrs. Daniel T. Huntington, widow of the Bishop who served in that country for so long; Miss Marjorie True Gregg and the Rev. Alfred B. Starratt, now rector at Stockbridge, Mass.

Six clergymen connected with theological schools signed: Professors C. A. Simpson and W. Norman Pittenger of General; Joseph F. Fletcher of Episcopal Theological School; Oscar J. F. Seitz of Bexley Hall; Dean Fleming James, former head of the seminary at the University of the South; also the Rev. Frederick C. Grant, professor at Union Seminary and former editor and now book editor of The Witness, who comments that in signing he is lining up with Trygve Lie and Premier Nehru.

Others to sign: Rev. Charles B. Ackley, New York; Rev. Melvin Abson, East Syracuse, N. Y.; Mrs. J. D. Andrey, San Antonio; Rev. Shelton Hale Bishop, New York; Rev. Roger W. Barney, Ashland, N. H.; Miss Hannah L. Batty, Hardin, Mont.; Rev. W. Carroll Brooke, Staunton, Va.; Mrs. H. M. Burke, Long Island City, N. Y.; Eliza Polk Cochran, Middletown, Del.; Florence Converse, Wellesley, Mass.; Mrs. James G. Cooke, Los Angeles; Harvey A. Cox Jr., Thomasville, N. C.; Dean John W. Day, Topeka, Kan.; Rev. Gardiner M. Day, Cambridge, Mass.; Rev. John F. Davidson, New York; W. H. Duncanson, Detroit; Rev. Thaddeus Clapp, Worcester, Mass.; Page C. DuBois, Clearfield, Pa.; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Fawcett, Annapolis, Md.; Mrs. P. M. Ferguson, Dixon, Ill.

Also Miss Elizabeth P. Frazier, Philadelphia; Rev. John Gass, St. Augustine, Fla.; Charles C. Haney, Brooklyn; Rev. Homer R. Harrington, Grand Forks, N. D.; Rev. Charles Havens Jr., Stamford, Conn.; Mrs. H. N. Heflin, Kewanee, Ill.; Rev. Clarence H. Horner, Providence, R. I.; Rev. Canon Richard Lief, Los Angeles; Rev. Frederick W. Lighfoot, Maspeth, N. Y.; H. M. McMillen, Minneapolis; Rev. Benjamin Miller, Columbia, Mo.; Rev. Jules L. Moreau, Chicago; Mrs. W. J. Mosenthal, Upper Montclair, N. J.; J. Muir, Stormville, N. Y.; Rev. Robert M. Muir, Roxbury, Mass.; Rev. Samuel J. Martin, Chicago; Rev. William H. MELISH FILES AN APPEAL

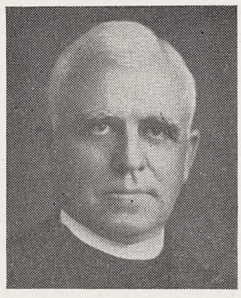
★ The Rev. John Howard Melish filed an appeal in Albany on August 10th with the Court of Appeal, against lower court decisions which upheld his ouster as rector of Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, by Bishop DeWolfe in April of last year. The appeal calls the lower court ruling "an unwarranted intrusion of the civil power in a Church controversy contrary to the freedom of religion" guaranteed by the federal and state constitutions.

DISCUSS WELFARE OF DEAF

★ The Rev. Robert Fletcher of Birmingham, Ala., represented the Episcopal Church at a three-day conference held at Raleigh, N. C. to consider the moral, social and religious welfare of the deaf. It was one of the first conferences of the kind to be held in this country. Speeches were interpreted in sign language, enabling them to be "heard" by the 150 deaf persons attending.

OUTLAW BOMB IS URGED

★ Bishop Dagwell of Oregon, Bishop Moulton, retired of Utah, Dean Paul Roberts and Emily Greene Balch, Nobel prize winner for 1946, are Episcopalians to join with about 600 others in calling for the outlawing of atomic warfare and the setting up of a system of strict international control. The statement was issued August 14 by Dr. W. E. B. DuBois, anthropologist, who is the chairman of Peace Information Center, New York. Besides the many Americans to sign the appeal, the statement listed a number of international figures, including Bernard Shaw; former President Cardenas of Mexico; Madam Sun Yat-Sen; Vitterio E. Orlando, premier of Italy in world war one; Alvaldo Aranha, former president of the UN security council.



The release, incidentally, was ignored by the two largest papers in New York, which is itself news.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION CONFERENCE

★ The Rev. Victor Hoag, the Rev. Donald W. Crawford, Mrs. Dora Chaplain and Mrs. Louise M. Gridley were the official delegates of the Episcopal Church at the conference on religious education, held August 7-9 in Toronto. There were also members of the youth commission attending the youth section of the conference: Mary Brace of the National Council's division of youth; Nancy Miller of New Hampshire; Beverly O'Dwyer of Rhode Island; Lindley Hartwell of Vermont; Kurt Fish of Ohio. Directors of education attending were Ruth Gill of Christ Church, Wilmington, Del.; Florence Hissey of Trinity, Binghamton, N. Y.; Muriel Wood of Holy Trinity, New York. The total registration for the conference was close to 1,000, including 62 members of the Church of England in Canada; seven Anglicans from Asia, with but one Anglican among the delegates from England.

BISHOP DAGWELL, GARDINER M. DAY, BISHOP MITCHELL are also endorsers of The Witness appeal

PHILIPPINE CHURCH WINS CASE

★ Bishop Isabelo de los Reyes, leader of the majority group of the Philippine Independent (Aglipayan) Church, has been declared by the Court of Appeals to be the denomination's legitimate head. The decision was the latest in a series of court rulings on his dispute with Bishop Juan Jamias, leader of a minority faction, who claims to be the ruling head of the Church.

The court granted Bishop de los Reyes' request that the Rev. Santiago Fonacier, retiring bishop of the minority faction, hand over to him the accounts of the Church's funds and properties. The minority faction had accused Bishop de los Reyes of renouncing the Philippine Church and joining the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States because he accepted consecration at the hands of Episcopal bishops and arranged for inter-communion between the two bodies.

Recognition of Bishop de los Reyes' authority by the Court of Appeals is expected to bring the Church into closer relationships not only with the Anglican communion, but also with Evangelical denominations in the Philippines and abroad. Bishop de los Reyes a few months ago informed representatives of the International Missionary Council and the Foreign Missions Conference of North America that if his authority were confirmed by the courts, he would strive to identify his Church more closely with the Federation of Christian Churches in the Philippines and the World Council of Churches.

He also expressed his intention of visiting Christian groups abroad to enable him to give the Philippine Independent Church a more progressive and vital Christian leadership.

The Aglipayan Church was formed in 1902 by priests and laymen who broke away from the Roman Catholic Church.

EDITORIALS

To Be Read In a Hammock

THE weather may be somewhat warm when you receive this copy of The Witness, so instead of giving you another editorial to read, we shall tell you a story. It is about real people, and it has what some consider a happy ending.

It was a year ago last spring. There was a diocesan convention in an eastern diocese which has had great difficulty in even approaching its missionary quota. The delegates were in a mellow mood, and the time seemed ripe to persons interested to ask for the allocation of diocesan funds to the establishment of two new commissions: one for college work, another on work among elderly people.

Certain clergy stirred uneasily. They were the ones who found it difficult to face their vestries when they were raising their quotas, and even more difficult to face themselves if they didn't. Some of these men rose to point out that the college work commission would overlap other work to some extent, and that the geriatrics commission would not be able to do anything but announce a problem everyone knew existed — namely, that there were not enough homes and other ghetto or jim-crow arrangements for old people.

These opponents knew they were playing an unpopular role. They would be accused of unfiliality, cold-heartedness, and that senile mentality which sees no future in anything but hoarding. Thus they made their remarks in a conciliatory tone, but they stuck to their position and almost won out.

The proponents of these measures spoke with infectious and attractive enthusiasm. Finally they announced that one of these commissions would cost nothing, and the other would be allowed to use only a few dollars left over from a previous survey in which the old people had overwhelmingly stated that they would not mind being in old folks homes if they were located in their own neighborhoods. So the two commissions were made official.

One year passed. The new budget of the diocese was placed before the delegates. There were two new items, one for each of these heretofore gratis commissions. The combined cost was now to be almost eighteen thousand dollars. This time there were no questions, no opposing voices.

This sum would keep a dozen or so old people for a year. It would keep up quite a few mission stations. But how insignificant and parochial that would be! A commission tackles problems from a much loftier point of view. It evaluates, tabulates, enumerates, corresponds with other commissions, visits the field in good weather, sends out reports, and does a hundred other chromium plated improvements on works of mercy or of evangelization.

If we were Mr. John T. Flynn, we should see in all this a vast plot. Being depressives rather than paranoiacs, we see it simply as a trend. Taxing and spending is in the air, and the resultant atmosphere makes it as impossilbe to kill commissions when they are aborning as when they are completely fossilized. Building a bureaucracy is in the blood, and it seems to infect Republican lay-delegates quite as much as Socialist members of Parliament.

If this is a trend, we wish the Church would take the lead in reversing it.

"QUOTES"

WHAT we are doing is to make it easy for the Russians to induce the Chinese to adhere to the Kremlin, and we are identifying ourselves with armed opposition to the great masses of Asia and to most of their intellectual and spiritual leaders. Against the advice and judgment of our European allies and of the strongest and the best of our disinterested friends in Asia, we have made it impossible for ourselves to take the only course by which we could hope to reduce the fearful odds against us. That is to refuse to regard China as a Russian satellite and to treat the government in Peking as if it were, so that it may have the chance and the reason to become an independent Chinese government.

—WALTER LIPPMANN

On The Assumption

WE hope all our readers were wise enough to go swimming on August 15th, because this is an infallible way of preventing any kind of illness for the next twelve months. We ourselves know it is so, for we were told about it by a girl who was majoring in biology at a Roman Catholic college. August 15th is the feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

This teaching of the Roman Church was this year made a basic tenet of their faith: it is no longer to be considered just a nice thought, but a necessary doctrine. Some of us will regret this, as being just another barrier to reunion between Rome and the rest of Christianity. But it is easy to see what brought it about. It is the latest step in a long process of the human mind which constantly attempts to disassociate God's love from his justice.

At first, the ignorant feared God the Father, but they loved Jesus! When the Church insisted that Jesus Christ was God, and revealed God, people attributed to him the harsh vindictiveness and irritability they had pictured God the Father as possessing. Thus we have such Advent hymns as the fearful and unhappy "Dies Irae" (468). The result was that people turned to the other members of the Court of Heaven for favors, to many saints, and to Mary the Queen. ("She is a woman, she will understand, she will speak for us.") It was very much like the approach to a worldly court.

Once the Blessed Virgin had assumed the role of mediator, it was only natural to give her a sort of Virgin Birth—the Immaculate Conception. Now the process has gone to full length in giving her a sort of Empty Tomb—the Assumption. The pleasing old Eastern feast of "the Falling Asleep of the Virgin Mary" was changed into a bodily disappearance.

Need we assume that we require a mediatrix between the Mediator and the flock he came to save? Need we say that it is repugnant to think that the body of the Blessed Mother should become a prey to worms; that he who was tempted in all points as we are would have assumed her body to the heavenly mansions to prevent this? Need we assume that the best answer to the materialism of the Communists, who pickled Lenin's body, is the Church which promulgates this very unspiritual doctrine? Does this add one iota to our gratitude and respect for the unassuming Virgin?

Our ancestors used to say, of the claims of Rome, that they were presumptions. At present we feel some of her doctrines are assumptions.

Why People Are Irreligious

BY
JAMES M. MALLOCH
Dean of St. James Cathedral, Fresno

PEOPLE who are indifferent or opposed to religion may be classified loosely as follows:

1. Traumatic (injured) Personalities. They are the religiously injured. Religion for them is associated with some injustice, persecution, extreme boredom, embarrassment, or other bitter experience. "They have become fixated on the trauma," as one psychologist puts it, "and have never matured in this region of their lives beyond the shock." "Preachers kids," retired ministers, and widows of clergymen are apt to be victims of remembered religious injuries. Many Protestants develop a sense of church dissatisfaction which is sufficiently characteristic of Protestantism to be called the "Protestant Peeve." Some of them are pathological demanders or pronounced introverts and get frustrated and infuriated when their demands are not promptly, fully, and constantly met.

Temporary relief from traumatic dislike of religion is often secured through praise, a pastoral call, election to a church office, coaxing and coddling, or some other form of flattery well known to Protestantism. A permanent cure can be had generally only through maturation, including the facing of life as it is. Sometimes it can be had by psychological substitution, such as the joining of a church like the Christian Science which eliminates "personal contagion."

2. Overoccupied Personalities. They are unreligious, because they find no time in their lives for religion. The machine age and overorganized materialistic society leave little room for the things of the spirit. Religion becomes indefinitely or permanently sidetracked. The cure for overoccupation is revaluation, resulting in the putting of first things first, and thereby recognizing the primacy of religion in life.

3. Confused Personalities. They are people who are left bewildered by the complexity of religion itself or by the sectarian and social competitiveness of Protestantism and Speculative Fraternalism. Failing repeatedly to make up their minds about religion, they finally drop the religious quest altogether and forget it. Mixed marriages are a prime source of religious confusion. Protestantism in general expects too much of run of the mill humanity and offers it virtually no simple religious devices comparable to the rosary in Rome for example. It expects everybody to be a judge of good preaching. Pentecostal sects meet the situation by noise, jazzy hymnology, excitement, and repetitious ejaculations which become practically as fixed in wording as rosary petitions. The only permanent cure for confusion, however, is the elimination of confusion.

4. Atheistic Personalities. They are against the gods and religion. In his book "Psychology of Religion," Paul E. Johnson of Boston University lists four motivations of atheism: (1) jealcus revolt or the Oedipus complex, a jealous desire to overthrow and supplant the father; (2) egotism, the overflow of the Freudian "Id"; (3) projection, the blaming of God or the universe for ones misdeeds or misfortune; and (4) rationalization, the victory of desire over reason. Atheism may be wishful thinking or evasion of pronounced order. In his book "The Individual and His Religion," Gordon W. Allport of Harvard points out that a militant atheist is a "reactive doubter" and perilously close to being religious, because he puts vehement emphasis upon the same focus of interest. Negatives shift into positives very easily. That is why Communism may be regarded as a religion.

Cures for atheism must be as varied as its causes. They generally lie in the realm of the emotions. Unlike people who suffer from traumatic conditions, atheists who are cured at all are almost invariably cured permanently.

5. Secular Personalities. They are religiously insensitive, just as some people are tone deaf or color blind. They have little capacity for religion. A distinguished psychologist calls them "non-religious personalities" by temperament, and says that they do not seem to require an absolutely embracing value or philosophy of life. For them matters are easily compartmentalized. They are incurious, content with a limited conception of the good. "Proximate values, not ultimate values, are what they sigh after."

Secular personalities can become at least mildly religious and often wholly cooperative with churches through an aroused sense of duty to themselves or to society. They usually have some rudimentary religious longing which can be used as the basis of moral appeal.

FIVE qualifying points must be noted: 1. Many people who say they are not religious really are religious. They simply do not know the philosophical and psychological meaning of the term religion. Everybody believes something and in something. People who say they have no religion often have a lively set of superstitions. It must be admitted that philosophers and theologians have not succeeded in defining religion beyond a vague and abstract discussion of its psychological correlates, their possible synergy, and their object in ultimacy. Possibly we can hope for better results from the work of psychologists in the field of religion.

2. Irreligious people, that is people who are violently opposed to religion, are usually in psychologic or psychiatric conflict. The cure for irreligion as a mental abnormality lies in the field of psychosomatic medicine and beyond the scope of this article.

3. Many people are only ostensibly unreligious or irreligious. They are just keeping up with the Joneses. They are slaves of the religious pattern or mores of their group. Strange as it may seem, this is often true in academic circles. The cure for this lies in the development of a sincere, genuine, conscientious personality and moral integrity. Some people apparently are just too lazy and procrastinating to be good church members. Maybe vitamin therapy is what they need!

4. Some people undoubtedly are just too ignorant of religion to be functionally religious. They have no language or other means by which to express their religious impulse. The only cure for religious illiteracy is the improvement and extension of religious education.

5. Many people are religiously inhibited by the essentially unreligious idea found in non-Roman Catholic Churches that it doesn't matter whether a member attends church or not. The cure for this unnatural reaction lies in the bringing of the Protestant philosophy of the Church into conformity to a normal psychology of organized religion.

Swimming and Praying

BY

HUGH McCANDLESS
Rector of the Epiphany, New York

ONE of the most important things we shall ever learn to do some summer is learn to swim. It will mean a great deal to us in later summers—and winters—for our peace of mind, our safety, and our pleasure.

One of the most important things—probably the most important thing—we shall ever do in our lives is to learn to pray. It will mean a great deal to us in good times and bad times, for our peace of mind, our safety, and our joy of living.

There are marked similarities in learning to swim and learning to pray.

When a little fellow is learning to swim, we say to him "Do this with your hands and this with your feet, and the water will hold you up." He may not say so, but he will probably think that sounds ridiculous. Everything else that holds you up is something you can cut with a knife or move with a shovel.

The same is true of praying. We say, "Clasp your hands and bend your knees," but it seems like the weakest thing in the world, and the poorest way to get things done.

We are used to air as an atmosphere. Water is a strange medium for us to live in.

Prayer also seems a strange atmosphere. (Just "saying your prayers" is like doing swimming exercises on dry land.)

In order to prove that people do stay up in the water, the instructor usually gets in himself and shows what happens.

The people who are best at teaching us to pray are those who tell us what it has done for them. They do not need to be great prayer-makers, any more than the best swimming teachers are great swimmers, but they do need to share their experience with us.

If a person has been around water and swimmers from an early age, he usually finds it easy to learn. The same is true of a person who wants to learn to pray.

Swimming and praying are both quite discouraging at first. Very often the swimming student is tempted to say: "Oh well, I'll be able to swim if I really have to." This may be true in some cases, but it may not. Not everyone who is thrown in the water learns to swim that way. Remember the king in "Hamlet"; he wanted to pray, he needed to pray, but he found he was not able to pray really, no matter how many prayers he said.

Or, the pupil may say: "Oh, I'll stick to bridges and boats." Boats are like the prayers of the Church, and bridges are like the prayers of others, but they are not always there when you need them.

Or, he may say: "Oh, I'll never go out over my head." That is something you can't prevent. Sometimes people find themselves way over their heads in some predicament, and the only way of praying they know is to say "Now I lay me down to sleep" or "God bless grandmother." You can't always live your life in shallow water.

Our Own Prayers

OR, the pupil may say: "I'll always wear a life belt." Wearing a life belt is a good gradual way to learn to swim; first you depend on it entirely, then you do a bit of swimming with it, and then—a terribly hard thing—you are able to give it up. It is like the prayers we learn to say by heart. First we learn to say them, then we learn really to pray them, then we finally are able to say our own.

When some one learns to swim, at first he does a great deal of splashing and hitting at the water, and doesn't get very far. Some people try to pray that way. They pray "God make me better; God give me the things I want; God make everyone happy, Amen."—without giving God a chance to say anything. And then they wonder why they don't get very far. When you start swimming or praying, the first thing to do is to relax.

Some instructors at girls' camps say, "Don't forget the water; just pretend you're a water lily and do a gentle slow dance, and you will find yourself swimming." I have always taught boys, and I never imagined that an invitation to do a slow dance like a lovely water lily would be attractive to boys, so I have suggested that they don't hit at the water, but treat it like a big strong teammate.

The same is true of prayer. Rufus Jones advised: "Let go—and let God." When we start to pray we should think about God thankfully and trustingly, and let him help us pray.

When you float in the water, you can just feel your body being buoyed up, and you realize that water is a friendly element. When you relax in prayer, you feel the spiritual forces about you, and you realize that the spiritual world is not so strange after all.

Many swimming teachers ask their pupils to sit in shallow water, to learn to put their heads under, to learn to open their mouths and eyes under water, and so forth before they begin to learn to swim. This gets them to realize what water is like. Then perhaps they have them hang on the side of a pool or swimming dock, or lie on a board, and kick their feet to see how the water acts when you move in it.

For the same reason, the Church teaches us a great deal about God, and then it teaches us to hang on to some definite duty and relate that duty to God.

By going to church and hearing the Bible we learn that God is not some one who will give us anything we happen to want whether it is good for us or not. He is not a magician who will change the laws of the universe to suit us. But he is our great Father and Companion and he desires our companionship.

We swim usually not to get to a distant point (walking or boating would be better) but for the pleasure of being in the water. So we should pray, usually, not to get anywhere or anything in this world, but to be with God.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

CONFERENCE ON HELPING AGED

★ Episcopalians Frances Perkins, the Rev. Beverly M. Boyd, officer of the Federal Council, and Canon Richard Williams of Washington Cathedral, played leading parts in President Truman's conference on aged, held in Washington August 16. Mrs. Perkins said that churches should do their utmost to play a major role in care for the aged rather than leave such care entirely to secular authorities with their often impersonal approach.

Canon Williams told the delegates that "too often grandmother stays at home as babysitter. Older persons are shunted aside in our own programs and left to their own little circles. We have to begin by changing our own attitudes toward the aged."

★ Artist Kenneth George Gilson, British war veteran, is putting the finishing touches on murals showing birth and crucifixion of Christ, as the vicar, Esteban Cladera, looks on. The murals were recently dedicated at the Mission of the Holy Family, North Hollywood, by Bishop Bloy.

ARCHBISHOPS HIT NEW DOGMA

★ The Archbishops of Canterbury and York issued a joint statement on August 17 condemning the new Roman Catholic dogma of the Assumption. The doctrine teaches that the body of the Virgin Mary was preserved from corruption and assumed into heaven shortly after her death.

"We profoundly regret," the Archbishops said, "that the Roman Catholic Church has chosen by this act to increase the dogmatic differences in Christendom." (see editorial, page six)

ANNOUNCE PROGRAM FOR SYNOD

★ The synod of the province of the mid-west will be held at Kenyon College, Sept. 11-13, under the presidency of Bishop Ivins of Milwaukee. Bishops of the dioceses comprising the province are to report on various phases of work, with Presiding Bishop Sherrill featured with an address on the national work of the Church.

GERMAN PARISH GIVES THANKS

★ The National Council has received from Wiesbaden, Germany, a grateful letter telling of the resumption of worship in the Old-Kathol Parish church, made possible in part by the Episcopal Church's contribution through the Presiding Bishop's fund for world relief. The service was conducted by Bishop Steinwachs with assistance by Priest Eder of the local parish. At the opening, Eder "thanked with hearty words the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, for through its help it was only possible to restore the church. It would be absolutely impossible to restore our church as it looks now without the brotherly help of Protestant Episcopal Church."

During the service the Bishop offered prayers "for the benefactors which found a lively echo in the hearts assembled at the church."

CHURCHMEN ASK FOR PRAYERS

★ Clergymen and lay people of different denominations in Atlanta, Ga., have called upon President Truman to set a time for special prayers over the Korean war. They ask for a 15 minute all-network broadcast to be conducted by a Protestant minister, a Jewish rabbi and a Roman Catholic priest. Dean de Ovies is participating in the campaign.

In Oklahoma City Protestant churches united on August 11th for a 24-hour prayer vigil for world peace and justice.

LOS ANGELES HAS NEW GUIDE

★ A curriculum guide for the diocese of Los Angeles, embracing the eight southern counties of California, has been prepared by the division of Church instruction and has been released by the department of Christian education, it was announced by Miss Margaret Brown, assistant director. The 26-page guide has been prepared as a further response to Bishop Bloy's call "to know the faith in its wholeness, to practice the faith in its completeness, and to propagate it with vigor and with zeal." It also is a tool to be used during the new interim period when "we are preparing for the new curriculum, the family-parish program of Christian education," according to the foreword.

BENTLEY PREACHES IN CANADA

★ Bishop John B. Bentley, vice-president of the National Council and director of the overseas department, has accepted the invitation of the primate of the Church of England in Canada to preach at a service to be held in connection with the annual meetings of the House of Bishops and the executive Council of that church. The service will be held in St. Luke's Pro-Cathedral, Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, on Wednesday evening, September 6.

JOSEPH McGEE OFFERS A PRAYER

★ Joseph E. J. McGee, verger of the Cathedral Church of Christ, Philadelphia, believes that stockholders meetings should be opened with prayer. He travels to Hoboken, N. J. each year and there requests of the chairman of the stockholders meeting of United States Steel that a prayer be said. It is becoming traditional for Mr. McGee to be asked to do the praying. He is 82 years of age.

NEW CHURCHES IN MICHIGAN

★ Ground was broken July 20 for a new church for St. Martin's, Detroit, where the Rev. James H. Morris is rector. Also a new church was dedicated by Bishop Emrich on July 23 for All Saint's, Houghton Lake.

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

The Earth is the Lord's. By Abraham Joshua Heschel. Henry Schuman. $2.50.

A beautifully written and wonderfully illustrated account of Eastern European Jewry, bringing out its profoundly religious character, but at the same time its intense loyalty to traditionalism. It is the record of a precious human—very human—kind of life, indeed a wholly unique type of civilization, which has now, thanks to Hitler and his hellions, completely passed away. It seems to me that it is somewhat of an exaggeration, however, to say that this "was the golden period in Jewish history."

A Pictorial Gospel. By Eliot Hodgkin. Macmillan, $3.50.

Truly "good news" is this presentation of the gospel narratives in picture book form. The collector has included all of the recognized masters, which makes of the book the enjoyable experience of walking through a familiar gallery, but, in addition, there are delightful drawings from breviaries, codices and old Bible histories rarely come upon. Some of the pictures from private collections like "The Hireling Shepherd" of P. Breughel and Blake's "The Soldiers Casting Lots" are significant. The two pictures by Hans Fries from Fribourg suggest a startling XVth century parallel in lively biblical depiction to the current "In Our Image." The plan is right with the story (A. V.) on the left-hand page and the illustration facing it; the format is attractive. This is a superior "gift book," but you will want to keep it for yourself.

—Jean H. Johnson

Thanking God. By Olga P. Burton and Joan Gale Thomas. Morehouse. 30c.

A cunningly illustrated little book for little children, teaching them the art of thankfulness and of thanksgiving to God.

NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

FEDERAL COUNCIL URGES ECONOMIC IDEALS

Science and a free economic system fail to solve the problem of society unless they are accompanied by the practice of Christian ideals, according to the annual Labor Sunday message issued by the Federal Council of Churches.

"Despite all our resources," the statement said, "we have not been able to meet even the basic needs of many people at home and of millions throughout the world. Unless we continually seek to make the convictions we hold as Christians operate in the work that is our livelihood, we invite moral decay."

The message warned against allowing the national economy to become habitually dependent on "artificial supports" such as military expenditures. "We must strengthen and improve those elements in our economic system," it said, "which will enable us to maintain continued high levels of employment and productivity without such supports. To do this we must declare unremitting war on poverty, ignorance, greed, and prejudice."

The message declared that "the Christian can never accept the doctrine that unemployment and hunger are inevitable any more than he can accept the doctrine that war is inevitable."

Intended to be read in churches throughout the country on the first or second Sunday of September, the statement was approved by the Council's executive committee and issued through its department of the church and economic life. Church people were urged to familiarize themselves with the problems of wage earners and with organized labor's contribution to industrial progress and harmony. They were encouraged to correct injustices in the social order and to oppose abuses of economic power by labor as well as by management and other groups.

MACKAY SEES NON-RECOGNITION OF CHINA A MISTAKE

Failure of the United States to recognize Communist China was "a very decided mistake," Dr. John A. Mackay, president of Princeton Theological Seminary and chairman of the International Missionary Council, said at a Lutheran conference at Northfield, Minn. Although the Korean war has made the situation more difficult, a way still should be found to give recognition to the new Chinese order.

Dr. Mackay, who is also president of the board of foreign missions of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., said "the present danger is that we alienate entirely the Chinese people and risk the tragic possibility of war with China."

ARTHUR A. SWANSON
Methodist minister, Lundy's Lane, Pa.

Please add my name to the other names which come into your office for the settlement of the Korean dispute by reconciliation for a just settlement. This Bath of Blood so soon after the last horror of bloodshed and suffering is wholly uncalled for, costing precious lives and outlay, which and because of which, the neediest and poorest on earth are compelled to do without and further adds to still greater suffering. It's so shocking and awful that unscrupulous heads of nations plunge millions and themselves into pitfalls and death.

Layman of Little Falls, N. J.

On a business trip this week to one of our largest cities I noted the following: In the heart of the business district stands a Methodist Church. A sign board — dignified but large enough to be read by passersby in a car—announces the preachers for the two summer months—a prominent clergyman each Sunday, some of them nationally known. Two blocks away is an Episcopal Church, about the same size as the Methodist—its bulletin board announces the service for the following Sunday, with sermon by the curate.

A mile or so from downtown on one of the main arteries is the Cathedral of the diocese—its bulletin meekly announces that the preacher next Sunday will be a member of the Cathedral staff. This thoroughfare rolls on, the neighborhood becomes distinctly residential and we find an especially handsome Episcopal Church —sermon by the curate. Exactly one block behind is a Disciples of Christ Church. It has a sign announcing summer preachers—prominent names —and one of them no less than an Anglican bishop — and an Episcopal Church only a block away!

All this strikes me as an example of the so-called "Protestant bodies" using the summer months as an opportunity to put their best foot forward and the Episcopal Church using them as an opportunity to coast along and do the minimum.

Does our Church not have sufficient top-flight preachers among its bishops and other clergy so that during the summer the key parishes in large cities could provide a program on a par with that of neighboring Protestant churches? Or do these fellows have such a strenuous winter that they must vacation all summer, perhaps preaching, occasionally at some St. Juniper's-by-the-sea.

It may be argued that preaching is not important in the Episcopal Church. If so, it should be abolished altogether. A poor sermon can be just as long as a good one.

I do not mean to pass judgment on the young men who do our summer preaching. Being confined to my own organ bench even Sunday, I seldom hear them.

JEROME DAVIS
Author and Lecturer

On my return from a trip to Europe where I have been studying the cooperative movement I find your letter about signing the statement on the Korean situation. I am of course happy to do this. More power to you in the great work you are doing.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Prayer Book Studies Praised By Witness Book Editor

Says Work of the Liturgical Commission Is Outstanding Performance

BY
FREDERICK C. GRANT
Book Editor of The Witness

★ The standing liturgical commission of the General Convention has been receiving suggestions for the improvement of the Prayer Book almost since the adoption of the latest revision in 1928. This does not mean that the new Prayer Book is unsatisfactory, but the opposite—or almost the opposite! The new book is so great an improvement over the 1892 revision that it has inspired the widespread hope that an even greater improvement can be achieved. In spite of opposition to further revision observable here and there (some dioceses have even adopted resolutions opposing any revision), there is no way to prevent those who love and constantly use this book from desiring to see it made more perfect. In fact it would be very unwise to forbid that desire, and to insist that what is now "good enough" should not be tampered with. "Let well enough alone" can be a disastrous maxim in spiritual matters. Here certainly the better may be the enemy of the best.

The commission has very properly assembled all available suggestions, analyzed and evaluated them, and in the light of sound historical research has proceeded with various proposals which ought someday, after thorough discussion, throughout the church, to be presented for adoption. This is a much better way than suddenly to rouse from our slumbers once in thirty or forty years (not like a giant refreshed) and indulge for a decade in feverish Prayer Book revision—and then lapse back into somnolence. A living Church, with a living liturgy, requires a constant and continuing "liturgical movement." We are very fortunate, in the Episcopal Church, in the thorough scholarship, the balanced judgment, the deep religious convictions of the men on our standing liturgical commission. What they propose deserves the most thorough and careful consideration by every one of us, from the oldest and wisest bishop to the youngest confirmation candidate. For the Prayer Book is first of all our common book of prayer, full of contemporary relevance, and secondly it is the current representative of the Church's great liturgical tradition, now nineteen centuries old, a tradition with a certain fundamental and inalienable character which must be preserved as long as the Church continues to pray and to stand for that specific, world-wide, catholic, historic religion known as Christianity. What binds together these two features of the Prayer Book's current and contemporaneous relevance with its historical continuity and fidelity is the profound reality, even realism, of its whole tone, outlook, and theology. For the Anglican Prayer Book is something more than a well-chosen collection of prayers, of the kind it happens that Anglicans like to say: it is our standard of theology, and it means to us all that the long catechisms and confessions of other reformed Churches mean to them. Hence the commission is also wise in declining to approve any proposal that might destroy the existing theological balance and proportion of the Prayer Book. It is no partisan book that they have in their hands, but the Prayer Book of the whole Church. It would be the greatest tragedy if any one party or group made off with it and fashioned it "nearer to the heart's desire" — whether Anglo-Catholic or Evangelical, Pro-Roman or Modernist. It is and must remain the great book of common prayer.

Baptism and Confirmation

The present volume of studies first deals with the history of the rites of Christian Initiation, and then proposes a revision of the services of Baptism and Confirmation. The historical chapter is very important, and should be read carefully by everyone who feels called upon to make any comment on the proposals for revision! Here in brief compass is more information upon the history of the two rites than is to be found in most essays or articles of twice its length. As to the proposed revision itself, the leading features are a reduction in length of the service (for example by the omission of the silly question, "Hath this child been baptized, or no?"—a question no longer important, since repeated baptism is not now believed to ward off measles or whooping-cough!), a better scripture lesson for adult baptism, a better presentation of the contents of the creed, a question to sponsors ("Wilt thou undertake to set him an example by the faithful exercise of the duties of a Christian?") and a better form of the question, "Wilt thou endeavor to bring this child . . . to the bishop . . .?"

Prayer Book Studies. I. Baptism and Confirmation. II. The Liturgical Lectionary. Church Pension Fund. $1.00.

The leading features in the revision of the Confirmation services are the expansion of it, especially at beginning, into a short independent service of worship (since Confirmation often stands alone, as a service apart from Morning or Evening Prayer), a good lesson (from Ezek. 36:25ff.), a reformulated prayer, "Send into their hearts . . . thy Holy Spirit," and a better formula of administration, "Confirm, O Lord, this thy Child . . ." (instead of the old "Defend, O Lord . . ."). Provision is also made for a wonderful service in which adult baptism can lead on directly to the order of Confirmation. I should like to attend such a service—it sounds perfect!

WILFORD LAYTON

Organist and choirmaster at St. Paul's, Flint, Michigan, he is now also a priest and assistant to Rector Franklin Bennett

Speaking only for myself, as one reader of the proposal but one who was long a parish priest, I would like to say that I think the commission has performed an excellent work of revision, and one that I hope will be adopted. Getting back to the fundamental New Testament doctrines which we Anglicans profess means getting quite a long way behind Luther and Calvin—and even Cranmer—as well as behind Trent, not to mention 1552 and 1549. It takes genuine scholarship to go back to the Fathers and learn anything, and back of them to the New Testament; and our commission has shown good evidence of sound theological scholarship. My only criticism concerns something that they are not responsible for: I still think it would be clearer and simpler to have two baptismal services, one for children, one for adults. It is my experience that combining the two is no advantage. But many of the clergy hold the opposite view!

The second part of the book, far the longer (pp. 39-117) deals with the Liturgical Lectionary. Here the Epistles and Gospels of the liturgical year, the seasons and their sequences, the fixed holy days, occasional services, repetitions, and the text of the liturgical selections are all dealt with in detail. A careful reading of this section will make clear at once the immense amount of labor that has gone into this part of the proposed revision. Again, the historical introduction is of paramount importance, and no reader should skip it. There already is a system in the liturgical sequences and selections found in the B.C.P. — though it results now and then in poor or inappropriate choices. The commission proposes no new system, but only the improvement of what we already have—of what the Western Church has been trying to say, liturgically, since the 7th century! The proposals are relatively few, and are summarized on pp. 108f. On the whole I believe they are all an improvement over the present Epistles and Gospels. The reasons for rejecting many of the proposed changes are sound, even though they may strike some of us as too conservative. It is noteworthy that the suggestions contained in Professor Easton's and Dean Robbins's book, "The Eternal Word in the Modern World" (1937), have had great and deserved weight with the commission. That book was one of the most important liturgical works ever produced in the Anglican Church.

Finally, the proposed revision of the text, not going the full length of the R.S.V. (whose value is noted) or other modern versions, is most excellent. "Weapons" is surely better than "armour," "food" than "meat," 'cause to sin" than "offend," "reverence" than "worship," "grain" than "corn," and so on —in most passages from the Bible. And the words proposed are not new-fangled but old and venerable and both accurate and clear. Once more, the last word should be with scholarship: What does the New Testament mean? But not the only word, perhaps: for any revision of the B.C.P. should keep the Prayer Book what it is, neither wholly up to date nor wholly archaic, but in the traditional (but well understood) language of Christian devotion.

We greet this first of the "Prayer Book Studies' with enthusiasm, and hope that it will have a widespread and favorable reception and discussion. Whenever revision again takes place, be it in ten years or in fifty, let us hope it will be guided by the same conscientious, loyal, devout, and thoroughly critical scholarship that characterizes this magnificent little volume.

WITNESS PEACE STATEMENT

★ The statement calling for support of the World Council's call for "a just settlement by negotiation and conciliation" of the hostilities in Korea, published in The Witness of August 10, has to date been endorsed by 565 churchmen. Methodists lead with 208 signers, mostly ministers, including another district superintendent, the Rev. J. Clyde Keegan of Wyoming.

Since the report in our August 24 number there have been 32 of other Churches besides Methodists and Episcopalians to sign, including Prof. Henry N. Wieman of the University of Oregon; the Rev. D. B. Cloward, an executive of the Baptist Convention; the Rev. T. Chipman Day, associate in religious education of the Massachusetts Congregational Conference; and Dean R. C. Snodgrass, a Disciple, who is head of the Brite College of Bible at Texas Christian University.

As for Episcopalians, a note arrived from Bishop Moulton, retired of Utah, after our August 24 issue was off the press in which he says: "I did not receive your call for peace in time, otherwise I should have been the first to sign. Please sign me. The world's mind is on peace, not war." Others to endorse the statement, in the order in which they were received, are: Mrs. Henry Hill Pierce who has been closely identified with the World Council since it was organized; the Rev. Charles Martin, rector of St. Albans School, Washington; the Rev. George Easter of St. Louis; the Rev. George A. Taylor of Baltimore; the Rev. Allen F. Kremer, chaplain to Episcopal students at the University of Pennsylvania; Agnes M. Chambers of Houston, Texas; Jeanne F. Clark of Houston; the Rev. C. R. Peck of Boston; Walter Hood of Charlestown, Mass.; the Rev. E. Jerome Pipes of Rapid City, S. D.; Frances C. Norton of Winsted, Conn.; the Rev. and Mrs. W. B. Spofford Jr. of Parkville, Mo.; Mr. Henry C. Ibbotson of Brooklyn; Lulu Pann and Alice P. White of Riverside, Cal.; Marjorie P. James of Long Beach, Cal.; Carolyn Herndon of San Francisco; Mrs. Alice Kamp of Jamaica, N. Y.; Margaret Munsterberg of Boston; the Rev. Kenneth deP. Hughes of Cambridge, Mass.; the Rev. F. V. Carthy of Cranford, N. J.; Mr. W. Kenneth Frederick, vestryman at Cranford, N. J.; Edith M. Douglass of Asbury Park, N. J.; the Rev. Peter H. Paulsen of Los Angeles; Miss L. B. Hugus of San Francisco; F. L. Kershaw of Spokane; Mrs. Barclay H. Trippe of Easton, Md.; E. Margaret Brown of Philadelphia.

Also, just as we were to go to press with this number, we received the endorsement of the Rev. Guy Emery Shipler, editor of our contemporary, The Churchman.

NEED TO PRACTICE CHRISTIANITY

★ Communists as evangelists make Christians look sick, Rotarians of Walla Walla, Wash., were told by Churchman Paul Rusch, formerly a colonel on General MacArthur's staff in Japan. He added however that the Christian world can outstrip the gains of the Communists in the Orient, by demonstrating through the practice of Christian brotherhood in all walks of life, that it is preferable and more workable.

MISSIONARIES IN JAPAN

☆ The army post office facilities (APO 500) that have been extended to all missionaries in Japan for the past year or more were discontinued on September 1. Letters to them must now be sent through regular channels.

PAYMENTS REPORTED VERY GOOD

★ Treasurer Russell E. Dill of the National Council reported that payments to the Council are excellent. As of August 1 last year payments equalled 108% of the amount due. This year payments on that date were 114%.

Destination Moon

THERE is a new motion picture entitled "Destination Moon." As the title indicates it is a science-fiction adventure film of a trip to that planet. The picture, we are told, "follows the indications of the latest works and discoveries of today's top scientists." There is a space ship, and magnetic shoes to keep the adventurers standing when the lack of gravity in the intersteller spaces would have them floating about. The cast of characters includes a retired army general, an atomic scientist, an important industrialist, and a guy from Brooklyn. All this and technicolor too. "Destination Moon" is good clean entertainment. It is colorful, authentic, and of course as exciting as a trip to the moon could be. For earthbound folk it is really a thrill, and, of course, we like thrills once in awhile.

Nevertheless in "Destination Moon" there is another indication of the tempo of our times. New worlds to conquer. New worlds to explore and to control. One of the characters points this out when he says that whatever country controls the moon as a defense outpost will control the world. Those in authority in the military, atomic and industrial fields, as represented by the characters in the picture, are seeking new worlds to conquer and to control. But no effort is being made to conquer and control the one region which can bring peace—the heart of man. Centuries ago God spoke to his people through Jesus Christ. "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God," and "the Kingdom of God is within you."

After all, the causes of conflict between nations are lust, fear and anger. These have their origins in the hearts of men. We hear much of our national prosperity and that we must preserve it. This is good enough, but what is called national prosperity may be confused with the lust for the satisfaction of our primitive appetites. We hear much of national security, but national security may be confused with fear. We hear much of patriotism, but patriotism may be confused with anger.

Perhaps the nation which controls the moon will control the world. Nevertheless we feel that the industrialist, the retired army general and the atomic scientist are all going in the wrong direction. First there must be removed the causes of war—lust, fear and anger. These things are not found in seeking new worlds, but in the hearts of men. This we were told centuries ago.

You will enjoy "Destination Moon." It is good entertainment, but remember that it is an indication that those involved are headed in the wrong direction. If western civilization is on its way to the junk pile of history it would pay us if we sought the real cause of the troubles, the lusts, the greeds, and the angers which ferment in the hearts of men.

"QUOTES"

I DO NOT despair in this dark hour. On the contrary, to me it is the darkness of the thunderstorm just before the skies clear and the glorious sun bursts forth. I feel so partly because of the sheer necessity of mankind finding the true way. I feel so also because of the substantial degree of enlightenment we have achieved, because of the resources we possess, because of the common fear of international suicide from atom warfare that forces us to refuse to die by our own hand. I feel so finally because there are great spiritual forces at work in the world with a burning desire to achieve the good life for mankind that will not be denied.

New Editors

THE picture of Chad Walsh has been on our cover before, but we are so happy to announce that he is now a Contributing Editor of The Witness that we run it again. As we are sure most of you know, he is a priest who is on the faculty of Beloit College, and is the author of a number of books which have won him a large following, both within and outside the Church. The first of two articles on the Holy Communion will appear in our issue of September 21 when we return to our every week schedule.

We are likewise happy to announce that Hyatt Howe Waggoner, professor at the University of Kansas City, is also one of our Contributing Editors. Dr. Waggoner is a new-comer to the Church and is to present the viewpoint of a recent convert in three articles that will follow the two by Chad Walsh. The title of his articles is "What's Wrong with the Episcopal Church," with this footnote on the first page of his manuscript: "I should like to forewarn the reader that these articles present only one-half of the whole subject. The other half is "What's Right with the Episcopal Church." It is our hope to persuade our contributor to deal with this latter subject also, again from the point of view of a new-comer.

We know that our readers will share our delight in welcoming these two distinguished scholars to the staff of Witness writers.

The Value of Travel

By HUGH McCANDLESS

Rector of the Epiphany, New York

ALTHOUGH Jesus lived most of his life in a country about the size and shape of the state of Vermont, he was a great traveler. Good travel does not consist of going far, but of observing closely and sympathetically. You will see more of any city, foreign or American, by taking a walk or riding on a public bus, than you will by taking a sightseeing car.

Our Lord spent his early childhood as a displaced person in Egypt. The high point of his later childhood was his trip to Jerusalem where his parents lost him in the temple. As a preacher he wandered in Galilee. And the last journey he took was again to Jerusalem where today you can follow his last walk of all—carrying his cross out of the city to the hill of crucifixion.

Christianity has been spread over the face of the earth by travelers. St. Paul was the first; he was converted on the Damascus Road, let over the walls of a city at night in a basket, and shipwrecked while he was in chains. His adventures are all the more remarkable because he was a sick man. Part of our Bible consists of letters he wrote to friends he had made in various cities.

St. Paul was followed by other great travelers —the early saints, like Patrick, who journeyed back to convert the Irish people who had kidnapped him, and others whose names I have not time to mention, much less their adventures. St. Francis' friars and the Lollards in England, and the Jesuits who opened up Canada, and the Methodist circuit riders, and Bishop Tuttle in Ohio, who did all his reading on horseback, are only a few of the people who carried on in St. Paul's footsteps.

Pilgrimages have always played a great part in our religion—you remember the search for the Holy Grail, and Chaucer's Canterbury Pilgrims, and you know perhaps people who have gone to see the Passion Play at Oberammergau. Phillips Brooks wrote "O Little Town of Bethlehem" while on a trip to the Holy Land. The year 1950 is seeing a great pilgrimage of Roman Catholics to Rome. One of the great classics of Protestant religious literature is Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," in which life is pictured as a journey, and from Bunyan's writings is taken the poem "He who would valiant be."

One thing we must remember as we travel—in everything we say or do, we are either missionaries for Christianity or missionaries against it. Our actions will either make our Church, our country, and our way of living more admired or less admired by the people among whom we journey. No one who ever leaves home can avoid this responsibility.

Types of Travelers

LIFE is indeed a journey and all of us are only passing through this world.

The parasite travels because he spoils for himself every place he lives in. The gypsy must get along before people have found that he had been a thief and a cheat. Many people travel through life that way, and their lives are never richer for it.

The pioneer makes the world a better place as the parasite makes it a worse one. When his journey of life has ended, he is remembered with gratitude by those who follow.

The prodigal spoils things for himself by being selfish and wasteful. He can have only what he can buy; his friends are usually false and soon forget him, when he passes on to the other world.

The expatriate has forgotten his true home in his enjoyment of this life on earth—he has forgotten his own native language. Such people think death an awful tragedy.

The provincial is the opposite. He thinks everything is better at home. Show him the Parthenon, and he will say that South Station is bigger. In the journey of life, this attitude is right, because everything in our true home, heaven, is much better than it can be here. But the things of heaven, beauty, truth, and goodness, can also be found here.

The pilgrim is the best traveler of all on the road of life. He knows where he is going, but he can still enjoy the things that happen on the journey. Most important of all, he does not encumber himself too much with the baggage of this earth, and thus he is less apt to faint when the road is long and hard, and less apt to lose his way back to his heavenly father's home.

PUTTING ON A SHOW

THE phrase, "Putting on a show," can be used to describe what human beings do when they try to give expression by signs, sounds and actions to what is more than the biological needs of their animal natures. Dancing, painting, speaking, music, all come under this head—so does religious worship, which is a sort of combination of all of these. Animals do not worship, and man according to anthropological evidence, ceased to be an animal when he began to worship. Worship, therefore, is a sign of man's evolution. This is equally true when we compare man with the modern machine. Machines show increasing signs of doing almost everything that man can do—except to worship. Perhaps anthropologists of the future will say that mechanized man was saved from becoming a machine by the revival of religious worship.

Human evolution can only be maintained, therefore, by developing the reality of religious worship. This reality means first of all what is physical and human so that worship must be frankly regarded as a kind of show. There are, of course, many sorts of shows in life but they are only "make believe" and serve chiefly to provide pleasure and escape. The Christian religion, in its worship has a "holy show" to offer which is both humanly and divinely real. It can be expressive of all of life both in this world and "as it is in heaven." It must, however, be real in the sense that it rests upon a content of physical, social and spiritual action that actually does exist. Worship must be a worthy performance, not just while the show is on, but both before and after.

The holy show of Christianity is, of course, the Holy Communion Service, also called the Holy Eucharist or the Holy Mysteries. It is the show because it displays all the characteristics of universal and living drama—purpose, progress and ordered structure. From this point of view, (as well in keeping with other articles in this series) the most descriptive title of the Christian holy show comes from the New Testament — "The Breaking of the Bread." An uninformed observer from outside would witness actually just this, in five acts. (For convenience reference to the wine is omitted.) First, the bread is prepared—a process which begins long before the particular performance starts. Second, the bread is taken up and put upon the altar by all those who are taking part. Third, the bread is "spoken over" and broken. Fourth, the bread is distributed to the people for their consumption. Fifth, these people are dismissed into the world from which they came.

Christians understand this holy show to be an expression of the whole drama of the divine redemption of the world. Primarily, it exhibits to Christians what God is doing by his incarnation, death, resurrection and the coming of the Holy Spirit. The catechism says that "the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was ordained for the continual remembrance of the sacrifice of the death of Christ, and of the benefits which we receive thereby." The meaning of "The Breaking of the Bread" is clear but it does not work its impression by any magic or merely technical skill. Just as there can be no Bread of Life given to the people unless they first bring to the altar the bread of the world; so they can only learn from this drama in proportion to what they express by the bread which they bring.

Office of a Priest

BY

GEORGE I. HILLER

Rector of Trinity Church, Miami

IF you ask the average Churchman about the duties of the priest, you would at the best get a rather vague reply. In fact some of us who have had the office for many years would be long put to it to describe the job. The first inclination would be to go to the language of St. Paul and try to describe the "care of all the churches" and the trials, etc. of the administrative office.

Certainly the priest is expected to be an executive. Many of us are not, and that is a measure of the criticism which is leveled at us. A goodly knowledge of business and the methods of administration on a business basis, is required if the parish is to be kept in the middle of the road. Knowledge of music, ability to handle people in the various relationships in which they must work; a long memory, a length of sympathy and understanding, a knowledge of psychology, and infinite patience, beyond that with which the human being is endowed, are required.

He should of course, be able to preach and write with a knowledge and understanding which in itself requires years of reading and study. He should be available at all times for a round of duties having to do with details and administration. He should be a scholar and student—but also a business man.

He should dress and conduct himself with decorum and dignity, and at the same time he should be a good fellow and meet everybody on his or her own ground. He must not be a "stuffed shirt"—nor yet a play boy.

He should have a conviction, based on knowledge, about the social and political issues of the day. If he expresses any such conviction he is a bigot to those who disagree. If he does not express conviction of such issues he is spineless and incapable of thinking.

Now the Prayer Book says "the office of a priest, is to minister to the people committed to his care; to preach the word of God; to baptize; to celebrate the Holy Communion; and to pronounce absolution and blessing in God's name."

In the average parish it seems to me these are the things which the people least expect of a priest.

Sheep and Chickens

By PHILIP H. STEINMETZ

Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

SHEEP and chickens run a close race for the prize of stupidity and general incompetence. When Peter compares us to sheep (I Peter 2:25) and Jesus refers to us as chickens (St. Matt. 23:37) they are pointing to our need for someone to look out for us. We cannot be trusted to do what is best.

The good shepherd or chicken farmer tries to keep his charges out of trouble. But he often finds that they get into it just the same and have to be rescued. He needs to be a man of saintly character and infinite patience.

Fortunately the "shepherd and bishop of our souls," the Lord, Jesus, is saintly and patient, persistent and loving. He not only gives us ample warning of what to avoid and clear directions on what to do but he also comes after us when we get into trouble and walks with us through suffering and death.

If you have tried to correct a fault in yourself or to help a child or a neighbor or your pastor or anyone to see some simple truth and be guided by it instead of by habit and prejudice, you know how very much we do resemble sheep and chickens.

As far as I can see there is not much to be done about our helplessness except to recognize it and give thanks to God that we have a Good Shepherd. God does not expect us to be different from the way he made us but he does expect us to realize our short-comings and to heed the voice of the one who has charge of us.

Do You Like to Go to Church?

By WILLIAM PAUL BARNDS

Rector of St. Matthew's, Lincoln, Nebraska

THE Psalmist who wrote "I was glad when they said unto me, we will go into the house of the Lord" was expressing a true religious emotion. Certainly the people of God should enjoy worshipping their Heavenly Father. Some people go to church from a sense of duty, and that is sufficient reason for going, because it is our bounden duty to worship God every Sunday in his church. Some go from force of habit, and church going is an excellent habit to form. Some go only once in awhile—perhaps because of sentiment, notably at Christmas and Easter.

Whatever may be the reasons which cause people to go to church, those who go have missed a real Christian experience if they have never really been happy about going to church, and genuinely enjoyed worship. To be sure moods vary, and a devout person will sometimes have times of spiritual dryness and perhaps depression, but basically we ought to enjoy being in church and find a fine delight in Christian worship. The person who never has this feeling needs greatly to take stock of his spiritual life, because something is not as it should be.

Apparently there are many who do not like to go to church, for if they did, they would go. Taking into account individual notions and pet peeves on the part of some, it is still a serious problem that only a minority of Christian people worship God regularly in church. Surely among Episcopalians, where we have such a magnificent Prayer Book, which provides a means for worship which appeals to spiritually alert people, and which has developed throughout centuries, there is some spiritual lack in the person who does not like to go to church.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

BISHOP DEFENDS PREACHER

★ The right of a minister to preach that war is un-Christian was defended by Bishop Penick of North Carolina, who acted in reply to complaints about sermons of the Rev. David W. Yates, rector at Chapel Hill. Declared the Bishop: "We believe in freedom of speech. Mr. Yates is a man of conviction and intelligence who has the courage of his convictions. He is entitled to speak the truth as he sees it."

Members of the congregation had protested two sermons by their rector on "why a Christian cannot go to war." He also, according to reports, announced at services that he had blanks for conscientious objectors and would be glad to assist any members who wished to file such papers with their draft boards.

DENTAN TO LEAD CONFERENCE

★ Prof. Robert Dentan of the Berkeley Divinity School is the headliner at the Connecticut teaching institute, to be held Sept. 9-10 at Hartford Seminary. Other leaders are the Rev. Lincoln Taylor, O.H.C.; Mrs. Guy O. Howe of St. James', West Hartford; Miss Mary Hyde, Christ Church, Greenwich; Miss Elizabeth Wynkoop, Trinity, Hartford; Mrs. Helen Prange, director of children's section in the Stamford library; Canon Clinton R. Jones of Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford; Rev. Douglas H. Loweth, Christ Church, Norwich.

RIGHT TO SPEAK FOR PEACE

★ A number of prominent citizens, including religious leaders, issued a statement August 28 scoring attempts to interfere with the rights of people to speak for peace as they see it. They called upon the mayors in 192 cities and upon President Truman "as sworn defenders of the U. S. constitution, for the sake of our country's good name, to act at once against those who seek to interfere with the right to petition, speak or act for peace."

Episcopalians among the seventy to issue the statement were Bishop Parsons, retired of California; Emily Greene Balch, 1946 Nobel peace prize winner; Dean Wilbur G. Katz of the Chicago Law School; Stringfellow Barr, former president of St. John's College, Annapolis; the Rev. Fleming James, former dean of the seminary of the University of the South; Vida D. Scudder of Wellesley.

EPISCOPAL HOUR TO START

★ A network of 140 stations covering the south and southwest will launch the Episcopal Hour of October 1, at 8:30 a. m. The speakers for the five Sundays in October are Bishop Louttit of South Florida; Bishop Dandridge of Tennessee; Bishop Wright of East Carolina; Bishop Henry of Western North Carolina; Bishop Clairborne, suffragan of Alabama.

BOSTON CLERGYMAN IS SILENCED

★ The Rev. Robert M. Muir has been serving Christ Church and St. Chrysostom's, both of Quincy, Mass., during the illness of their rectors, the Rev. Chester A. Porteus and the Rev. John F. Kolb. He was dismissed however because of his support of the so-called Stockholm peace appeal. Senior Warden Rubric G. Balcom of the former parish said that he had told Mr. Muir not to come back, adding "I have received many calls from parishioners objecting to his preaching. I feel that he is not a communist but has been misled by communist fronts." Rector Kolb of St. Chrysostom's said that he ordered Muir not to return because "I felt he was a communist sympathizer and that he was using the Church for communist propaganda. In his arguments he talks like the communists do—he takes every fact that you put before him and twists it to his own end."

Muir is associated with the Rev. Warren McKenna, rector of St. John's, Roxbury, Mass., where the two young clergymen are carrying on a unique experiment in a depressed area under a set-up called "Workers of the Common Life."

SOUTH INDIA MODERATOR VISITS HERE

★ Bishop Michael Hollis of Madras, moderator of the Church of South India, arrived in New York on September 2 for a two months stay. He will meet with Church leaders and mission officials, and will speak in churches and seminaries in the east and middle west. He is British born and went to India in 1931 as a missionary of the Society for the propagation of the Gospel. He was appointed Bishop of Madras in 1947, the year the Church of South India, a union of Anglican, Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational Churches, was established.

CLERGY CONFERENCE IN NEW JERSEY

★ The Bishop of Ely, Harold E. Wynn, is to be the leader of the clergy conference in the diocese of New Jersey, meeting at St. Mary's Hall, Burlington, Sept. 17-20. His theme will be the pastoral ministry. Bishop Wallace J. Gardner will preside at all of the sessions.

CONNECTICUT CLERGY TO MEET

★ Clergy of the diocese of Connecticut are to hold a conference at Avon, September 11-12, with Canon Wedel of Washington and the Rev. Victor Hoag, head of religious education in the diocese of New Jersey, the leaders. They are to deal with the new curriculum of the National Council's department of religious education.

NEWS OF CHURCHES OVERSEAS

MOSCOW RADIO ATTACKS ARCHBISHOP

The Archbishop of Canterbury was attacked by the Moscow radio for his opposition to the so-called Stockholm Peace Appeal. He was accused of supporting "wholesale murder" by atomic bombs. "Hitherto prayers alone have not succeeded in stopping the war preparations in the USA and Britain," the broadcaster said. "The warmongers can only be stopped by active participation in the movement for peace. This is precisely what the Archbishop has no wish to do. What is more, he has instructed the entire English clergy not to sign the Stockholm appeal and to induce their congregations to do the same. The Archbishop has thereby proved that he opposes the prohibition of the most savage weapon for annihilating human beings."

SOUTH PACIFIC CONFERENCE PRAISES MISSIONS

High tribute to the educational work of Protestant and Roman Catholic missionaries was voiced by leading delegates to the South Pacific Conference which concluded two-week sessions at Suva, Fiji Islands. The conference—first of its kind ever held—brought together native delegates and Christian missionary observers from 16 island communities for discussion of social, economic, health and educational questions. It was presided over by Sir Leslie Brian Freeston, Governor of Fiji.

In a typical comment, a delegate from French Oceania declared that "both Roman Catholic and Protestant missions are doing valuable work in education and they must be encouraged."

Dr. John W. Burton, former president of The Methodist Church in Australia and its general secretary of Overseas Missions for many years, told the conference:

"The missions have been first in the educational field. For some generations there have been only mission schools in native territories. Now the policy of member governments is to embark on a much wider scheme of education while still maintaining co-operation with the missions."

PRIEST WAGES CAMPAIGN FOR FILIPINO LABOR

Filipino labor has an ardent supporter in Father Walter Hogan, a 37-year-old Jesuit priest from Philadelphia, who wants to see wages for unskilled workers increased from two pesos to 12 pesos—or $6—a day.

In trying to raise the workers' standards, however, Father Hogan has been meeting with considerable opposition. Some newspapers have been unfriendly. Business leaders have branded him as an interfering nuisance. Even some labor leaders have denounced him in public statements. And only recently, the Philippine secretary of labor threatened to have him deported.

Undaunted, Father Hogan maintains that he is merely living up to the injunction of Pope Leo XIII's Encyclical on the Condition of the Working Classes: "Every minister of holy religion must throw into the conflict all the energy of his mind, and all the strength of his endurance."

In the Philippines since 1933, Father Hogan has been on many picket lines, but only on a recent occasion, he asserted, has there been a "fuss."

That was when he took his place beside four dismissed workers of the Philippine Airlines forming a picket line at Manila's big international airport. The four workers were labor leaders who had been fired, according to Father Hogan, because the management considered them undesirable.

ASKS DRIVE AGAINST ROMAN CHURCH

A call for a new drive against the Roman Church in Hungary was sounded on June 6 by Joseph Revai, education minister. The continued existence of 12,000 monks and nuns belonging to 63 religious orders was unnecessary, he said, since the demand for them in schools and charitable organizations "has ceased." He also labelled them "agents of imperialists and spreaders of war hysteria."

MARC BOEGNER RESIGNS AS PRESIDENT

The Rev. Marc Boegner has resigned as president of the national council of the French Reformed Church. He made the announcement June 6 at the synod meeting at Nimes. Pressure of work occasioned by his post as co-president of the World Council of Churches was given as the reason for his resignation. Pastor Pierre Maury of the Protestant faculty of theology in Paris was elected to the post.

ARCHBISHOP TO VISIT DOWN UNDER

The Archbishop of Canterbury will leave England on September 22 for a three-month tour of Australia and New Zealand. Highlights of his tour will be the centenary commemoration of the Australian board of missions and the celebration of the centenary of the Canterbury diocese of New Zealand.

WANT FRENCH SCHOOLS NATIONALIZED

A plan for nationalizing all schools in France is being prepared by the League for Teachers for submission to the government. It is sure to be opposed by Roman Catholic leaders.

MANY THOUSANDS VISIT ROME

An estimated 350,000 pilgrims from all parts of the world had visited Rome up to the middle of April to gain the holy year indulgence.

G. BROMLEY OXNAM
Bishop of the Methodist Church

It seems to me hardly fair to quote the World Council of Churches in connection with the Korean situation without quoting the entire document. It is true that the phrase you quote appears in the resolution adopted by the World Council. It is also true that the World Council endorsed the action taken by the United Nations in seeking to end the aggression by the North Koreans. The World Council did not link the proposal to seat the representatives of the Communist government in China with this resolution at all. It seems to me that this communication (Witness Statement of August 10) is likely to mislead our people as far as the World Council is concerned.

ANSWER: Three or four others have written similarly. The Witness Statement appeared in our issue of August 10. Our issue of July 27 had previously stated, in the largest type we have, on our first news page as The Story of the Week, that the World Council and the Federal Council supported US and UN action in Korea.

It is the judgment of the Witness editors, in which we have been joined to date by 565 churchmen (including 208 Methodists), that the best proposal so far offered for "negotiation and conciliation" is the one by Premier Nehru, in which he is supported by Trygve Lie. We think also that the World Council is obligated to spell out what they mean by "negotiation and conciliation," otherwise our Church leaders can be charged with using empty words.

WILLIAM J. GORDON JR.
The Bishop of Alaska

It has been called to my attention that a man who calls himself Norman or Norton Mills, and he may be going under any other name, claims to be a member of the Episcopal Church at Kotzebue, Alaska, and has been obtaining money from various clergy and Church people under false pretenses.

I do not know this man, nor is he a member of the Church in Alaska. He has been particularly active in California in recent months and caution is advised in dealing with him. I will appreciate it if you will run this notice in The Witness so that Church people may be protected from his activities.

REV. & MRS. HENRY WIESBAUER
Chicago, Illinois

We are already subscribers to The Witness, but with this letter we are sending you a check which is a symbol of our appreciation for your magazine.

What we like about The Witness is that over and over it lives up to its full name—The Witness for Christ and His Church. In our opinions, it is the only Church publication which in these days of fear and reaction permits full expression of opinion. It is one of the few publications giving content to the profession of freedom of the press—not just freedom for certain points of view, but comprehensive freedom on a profound Christian level.

We wish we could send more cash to help you in these days of high prices. The two editorials in the issue of July 27 are worth more than money can pay for.

Keep up your splendid Witness.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Western Massachusetts Tries Christian Friendship

Adopting German Parishes Bring Results That Astonish Even Themselves

BY MARY HEILNER

★ As the darkness grows deeper in the world and we seem to be living in a time like that which the New Testament describes as "the last days" when men's hearts are failing them for fear, we hear many voices calling us to some particular form of salvation. Among these are Christian voices, which with a desperate urgency, call us to become "ecumenical," and to take our faith more seriously. They urge the layman in the Church to become more educated in his religion, to realize his place and responsibility in the world-wide fellowship of Christ, so that he may be able to withstand the forces of atheism or secularism. Most ordinary church goers hear these cries—many listen intently. But the word "ecumenical," and the reality of the Christian world community often seem unreal to people as they go to their parish churches on Sunday.

In the post-war years Church people have done a tremendous ecumenical work through the Church World Service. However, the fact that many of these people now say, "Why must we send any more? Why can't they stand on their own feet now?" shows not only the isolation of Americans from the experience of the rest of the world, but also a misunderstanding of the meaning of what they have done, and indeed of the nature of the Church. The same kind of misunderstanding, assisted perhaps, by the attitude of many Americans, prevails on the other side of the Atlantic, "Why," I was asked by a young European, "Do Americans send CARE packages?" It was obvious to him, as it is to most of us, why Americans are spending billions of dollars on the Marshall Plan, the Voice of America, and the Atom Bomb. All of these have a political purpose, they serve our national self-interest, they are weapons in the "cold war." Are CARE packages, Church World Service, and ecumenical relations more of these weapons? Are they expressions of our compassion for a suffering world? For Christians they are obviously not the first, and they are something much more than the second.

In the diocese of Western Massachusetts we have had an experience of the Christian community and of ecumenical action which can only be described with humility, for it did not come about through our own efforts but by the grace of God.

Aid to Germans

Two years ago, under the leadership of Bishop Lawrence, and at the instigation of Mrs. Henry Walter, then C.W.S. chairman for the Springfield area, 50 parishes in our diocese "adopted" 50 Evangelical parishes in Berlin. Mrs. Walter, who had studied in Heidelberg before the war, had learned through a friend who was a church-worker in Berlin, of the desperate spiritual and physical need in Germany. Encouraged by Bishop Lawrence, Mrs. Walter obtained the names and addresses of fifty pastors scattered throughout the four sectors of Berlin and its immediate environs in the Russian Zone. These pastors were members of the Confessing Church, and some were refugees from East Germany who had lost everything. Plans were made for packing fifty packages of food. Merchants in Springfield donated sugar, coffee, lard, and fruit.

On a December afternoon our fifty clergymen gathered in the diocesan house and were presented with empty cartons, cans of food, and paper and string. Thus far the plan had gone well, but let no one think that there were no difficulties. The confusion and anguish of fifty Episcopal clergymen engaged in packing food for overseas shipment can scarcely be imagined! The box sent to each German pastor was preceded by an air letter from his American brother. This somewhat hectic beginning in no way foretold what was going to happen. Our outstretched hand was grasped by our German brethren in a manner we hardly expected. It was not the food which the hand contained which was grasped, but the hand itself, and with a Christian joy which put us to shame. The first letters from the Berlin pastors gave thanks, but not to us. Surrounded by man-made barriers for more than ten years, they expressed amazed and humble thanks to God for the Christian family which knew no barriers of distance, nationality or hatred, saying that this was the meaning in which our gifts were accepted.

Then there began to grow up between pastors and people here and there, real friendships through correspondence. Church school children, youth groups, and adults exchanged letters, gifts, and even recipes for apfelstrudel! At Christmas time Advent-lamps, stars for the Christmas tree, and transparencies, all hand made, arrived from the German parishes. Songs and carols in English and German were exchanged along with the reports on the Churches' life and work. Simultaneous services with the same prayers and hymns were held on both sides of the Atlantic, and one parish recently recorded its morning service, including three greetings spoken in German and the singing of, "A Mighty Fortress" (also in German), and sent it as a Whitsuntide gift to the adopted parish. Language has presented us with few difficulties for there are many in our parishes who can translate when necessary, and many of the Germans can write in English.

Visit to Berlin

Almost from the beginning of this venture, I had corresponded with Miss Hanna Reichmuth, the pastor's assistant in our adopted church. When I was preparing to go last year to the Ecumenical Institute in Celigny, Switzerland, the bishop suggested that I apply for a permit to enter Berlin and visit the fifty parishes. I did so, and spent a month there, living with Miss Reichmuth, and visiting parishes, youth groups, and as much else as could be squeezed into twenty-four hours of every day. Mrs. Walter visited Berlin at the same time, and both of us were astonished at the way we were everywhere received. We never felt like foreigners or strangers. We were welcomed in every Christian group as, "Unknown, yet, well known," as members of the family. The frankness and openness of our conversations with the Berlin Christians was in striking contrast with the suspicion and distrust of people for each other in the world of material and spiritual ruin outside the Church.

Living with our German friends as we were, rather than in American occupation buildings, we experienced at first hand the physical destruction in which the Berliners lived. There was no hot, running water, although plenty of water from the interminable rain ran into the houses and churches through the holes in the bombed roofs! There was, indeed, nothing which we had taken for granted in our life at home. We saw people living in the mountainous rubble like animals in caves, we heard the bitter dispairing words of those young people who had been raised to believe that they were the master race, and we felt daily the tension in this divided city. Far worse than the physical ruin in Germany is the spiritual ruin, and so it was a never-ending source of surprise and joy for us to enter a Christian group. It was like entering another world. We were told again and again that our relationship with them had come as a light in the darkness, that it was a symbol that God had not forsaken them and that not only did it give them new hope and courage, but the reality of our Christian fellowship had brought some people back to the church.

After we returned home, Bishop Lawrence invited Miss Reichmuth to visit us during this past winter. She came and stayed five months and spoke and visited throughout our diocese. She created a profound impression and many said that they realized for the first time the true meaning of Christian community. Again and again, she begged us to remember that our gifts were important only because they were sacramental, because they were outward and visible signs of our inward and spiritual bond in Christ. She said many times, "Our prayers for each other are the most important thing. New walls are always being built around us, and every man-made bridge over them can be broken, but the bridge of prayer can never be broken." We have experienced the truth of this in our diocese. No amount of preaching would have accomplished what these "adoptions" have accomplished. We are convinced that they are the work of God and that he has given us these relationships as an opportunity to let ourselves be used as instruments of his peace. It is certain that what has grown out of the project was not intended or planned by us, and we hope that other American parishes will wish to enter into a similar contact with German Christians. If you are interested in doing so you are invited to write me at Church of the Atonement, Westfield, Mass.

LARGE ENROLLMENT AT SEABURY-WESTERN

★ An orientation program for 35 new students entering Seabury-Western Seminary will be held tomorrow, September 22. In addition 45 former students will return for classes which begin September 26th.

LOS ANGELES YOUTH IN CONVENTION

★ More than 125 young people of the Santa Barbara, San Bernardino, Pasadena and Long Beach areas of the diocese of Los Angeles held a training conference at St. James, South Pasadena, September 16. There were sessions on program planning, with workshops to consider techniques and available materials for religious services and recreation and study programs. The director was the Rev. Robert A. Tourigney of Pasadena, director of youth work in the diocese. Other leaders were Bishop Campbell; Rev. Hiram B. Crosby of Lakewood Village; Rev. Edward McNair of Studio City; Rev. Gilbert P. Prince of Van Nuys and Rev. Elvin W. Smith of San Fernando.

E.E.F. DEFENDS TWO BISHOPS

★ Nine bishops are among the 63 Episcopalians who signed a statement of the Episcopal Evangeline Fellowship defending Bishop Dun of Washington and Bishop Hall of New Hampshire whose actions in holding services where clergymen of other churches participated have been criticized. The former had been attacked for inviting two ministers to read the Epistle and Gospel at a service of Holy Communion, and had also invited ministers who were attending the services to receive communion. Bishop Hall was criticized for asking ministers of other Churches to join in the laying on of hands at an ordination.

The statement of the E.E.F. says: "The attacks are attempts of a minority group within the Protestant Episcopal Church to change the traditions of our communion and to transform us into a 'closed communion' sect. The whole religious world must be shown that what the bishops stood for, and not what the attacks made upon them represented, truly manifests the spirit of the Protestant Episcopal Church."

The bishops to sign were Barton of Oregon, Gibson of Virginia, Hobson of Southern Ohio, Nash of Massachusetts, Parson, retired of California, Scarlett of Missouri, Stark of Rochester, Tucker of Ohio, Walker of Atlanta. Also signing the statement were two seminary deans and six seminary professors.

CLERGY MEET AT LENOX

★ Clergy and lay workers of the diocese of Western Massachusetts held a conference at Lenox School, September 11-15, with the national program of religious education the chief topic considered. Leaders were Rev. John Heuss, director of the national department; Prof. Reuel L. Howe of Virginia Seminary; Canon Ted Wedel and Mrs. Wedel of Washington; Canon Vesper O. Ward, Miss Charlotte C. Tompkins and Mrs. Dora P. Chaplin, all of the national department.

Being a Good Samaritan

THE "Good Samaritan" figure of our Lord's parable is so familiar that the two words have become one of our commonest metaphors for human kindness, giving emergency help. "John Smith," we say, "is a Good Samaritan; he lent me a fiver when I was broke" or "helped pull my car out of the ditch."

But if we read the old story carefully, we will realize that our common notion is quite unfair to the hero of our Lord's parable. He was very much more than an emergency man; he was that much rarer person—a clear-thinking chap who saw to it that his act of mercy should produce permanent results. He took the sufferer to an inn, made a down-payment and said: "Take care of him and when I come again I will repay thee." He was a man who was not content with the emotional release of a momentary spasm of kindness, but followed through on his job.

Our world today is not unlike the Jerusalem - Jericho highway — a notorious, brigand-infested road. All manner of cruelties, violence and greed surround us. War, hatred, revenge pollute the very air we breathe. No one can escape it. It affects the quality of our thinking and action, not alone in public affairs, but in intimate personal and family concerns. It makes for instability in all relations of life. We find it easier than ever to start good works, to respond to appeals for help, but astonishingly hard to follow them through steadily and intelligently.

Parents may well ask themselves if they are successfully following through with their children. Have they settled down happily to a lifetime job of patiently and lovingly understanding them, as they meet the stress and strain of these difficult times, or are they passing the buck to some outsider who, they hope, can be a truer Good Samaritan than themselves — doctor, psychiatrist, priest, boarding-school, camp? An age of specialization such as ours makes it temptingly and dangerously easy to "let George do it," instead of following through on problems that belong to us to solve. We imagine too that many grown-up children are having a difficult time these days in their relations with parents whose ways are not their ways and whose outlook on the world and on life in general is that of the older generation. They are not likely to change, but they long for the loyalty and affection of their children. The temptation for grown-up children is not to be bothered; to content themselves with seeing that parents lack nothing material that they need and to drop in on them now and again, with cheery greetings or to show off the grandchildren and let it go at that. All of which is too much like pouring oil and wine in the wounds of the sufferer, but not thinking of taking him to an inn and caring for him. What parents—and other oldsters—most need from the younger generation is understanding through devout, active imagination, a steady patience and affection. Following through in situations like this is always hard and constantly challenges the ingenuity and devotion of youth.

"QUOTES"

I MIGHT pluck a rosebud off a tree and it would be a rosebud and no more. The one I love best in all the world might pluck a rosebud off a tree and give it to me and it would be a rosebud and a great deal more. The substance of it would be changed because she gave it to me. I will go to the altar next Sunday morning and take bread and wine, and it will be bread and wine, and a great deal more. The substance, the meaning or the sense of it, will be changed because he gives it to me. He gives it to me. That is the root of the matter.

The Church Should Speak

THE Episcopal Church—along with the majority of the non-Roman communions—would do well to search its corporate soul by meditating on the significance of the Good Samaritan's quality of carrying his good work through to a fruitful finish. During the 1920's, when the reaction against war was strong and the realization of the merger good results of World War I was growing, our Church — through the House of Bishops — was frank and forthright in declaring its belief that war in itself was a denial of the Christian religion and that it was rooted in the sins of an acquisitive and greedy society which we should take steps bravely and drastically to reform. This mood of the Church continued into the early '30s. We tried, so far as words could, to pour oil and wine into the wounds of a maimed civilization. And then we stopped short, for the war fever was rising fast in Europe and infecting the thinking of America. The New Deal gave place to preparation for war. And the Church fell into line. No more brave declarations on peace and social reform were heard from the House of Bishops. And as the holocaust in Europe raged, we were catapulted into World War II, from which we awoke to find that we had got ourselves a new enemy in militant Communism. All thought of social and economic reform went into the discard and America began backing reactionary and corrupt regimes around the world in a desperate attempt to stay the progress of Communism. And the Episcopal Church remained—and remains—officially silent. And so we are now at war again, backing a reactionary and corrupt outfit in Korea and in Formosa. Does any intelligent person who knows the world and its struggling millions of underprivileged think that it will be better off and our civilization headed toward health when we have won our military victory in Korea? The World Council of Churches seems to have remembered that there is, even now, an inn where the suffering victim of the Jerusalem-Jericho road may be taken, if we have the sense and good will to do it. Nehru of India has glimpsed it down the road too, and the sign-board on it reads "Arbitration Hostel."

It is time, we believe, for our House of Bishops to speak out and follow through, as the Good Samaritan did, on its brave words in the earlier pastorals and declare again for social and economic reformation and peace without fear or favor—fear of Communism or any other devil nor favor to any stubborn defenders of the status quo. The time is short. The war fever is rising fast. Our political leaders are caught in a swirling eddy of fear and hatred. If the Church expects ever to hear its Master's "Well done, good and faithful servant," it had better speak out now for righteousness and peace and say, as Farragut did, "Damn the torpedoes"—of hysteria and fear that will undoubtedly be launched at those who presume to speak bravely in the spirit of the Christian Master.

Talking It Over

By W. B. SPOFFORD SR.

THE WITNESS statement urging church people to support the call of the World Council of Churches "for a just settlement by negotiation and conciliation" of the hostilities in Korea has so far been endorsed by over 600 people. Many have taken time to write notes commending our efforts. We thank them, and now turn to the task of answering a few critics.

The name-calling by Doctor Morehouse of the Living Church, and his man Friday, Peter Day, can be ignored. In the name of Christianity, that journal in an editorial called "No Peace in Our Time," declared for total mobilization, including universal military training and gag laws. So one hardly expects these men to approve Witness efforts for "Peace in Our Time."

It has been nice to discover too that our peace statement finally got the Living Church and the Southern Churchman to agree on something. They have been scrapping all summer on whether Baptists, Methodists and other Protestants are members of the "Church of God." But now Editor Ribble goes along with Doctor Morehouse by calling our statement "strange," and by comparing it with the World Peace Appeal which, he says, must be approved by one or more of our editors. It just happens that I received in this morning's mail a printed document which lists hundreds of Americans who signed this appeal. None of the ten men that comprise our editorial board are on the list. That of course includes me. But since Editor Ribble urges us to come clean, I'd like to say for myself, that I see no reason why I should not sign it. This is the World Peace Appeal:

"We demand the outlawing of atomic weapons as instruments of intimidation and mass murder of people.

"We demand strict international control to enforce this measure.

"We believe that any government which first uses atomic weapons against any other country whatsoever will be committing a crime against humanity and should be dealt with as a war criminal.

"We call on all men and women of good will throughout the world to sign this appeal."

What's wrong with that? And the answer of most people is "Nothing"—at least that was their answer until word went around that the Appeal was "Communist inspired." So when that happened a lot of Christians, including most of the members of the central committee of the World Council of Churches, decided to drop the word "Peace" from the Christian vocabulary and turn it over to the Communists. Not me. I like the word "Peace" and insofar as I am able I do not propose to let the Communists, or anyone else, steal it from the Christian Church. Hence our statement which deals, not with the atom bomb, but with hostilities in Korea, and in which we support the proposals of Premier Nehru, who is in turn supported by the Secretary-General of the UN, Trygve Lie.

Letters have also been received from three distinguished Churchmen: Methodist Bishop G.

Copyright 2020. Archives of the Episcopal Church / DFMS. Permission required for reuse and publication.

Bromley Oxnam; Episcopal layman, Charles P. Taft; the Rev. Douglas Horton, minister of the General Council of the Congregational Christian Churches. They all point out that our statement failed to say that the World Council endorsed the action of the UN in seeking to end hostilities in Korea by military action. That is correct as far as our statement of August 10 is concerned. But what these men do not know, apparently, is that The Witness on July 7 reported with a two column, bold face head, on our first news page: "World and Federal Council Endorse Korean War."

It was the central committee of the World Council that first called for "a just settlement by negotiation and conciliation" of the hostilities. We merely echoed this appeal and urged Church people to support it. We said also that we believe Premier Nehru's formula the best so far offered to this end. Leaders of the World Council may have a better one. Certainly they must have had something better in mind than the laying waste of the whole of Korea, north and south, when they called for "a just settlement by negotiation and conciliation."

Let them spell it out and so save the Christian Church from again being charged with using beautiful but empty words.

All Life is Meeting

BY

By HUGH McCANDLESS
Church of the Epiphany, New York

THE most important thing in our lives next to our relationship with God is our relationship with other people. If we meet other people in a disdainful way, it makes us feel bigger, but it really makes us smaller. If we meet other people modestly and appreciatively, we shall learn something useful from everyone, and we shall become bigger people all the time.

This makes our summer vacations particularly important, because we usually leave home and spend the time with people whose way of life differs from ours. If, for example, we are going to act as if all country people spoke—and thought—like Mortimer Snerd, they in return will consider us ignorant city slickers, and the experience of meeting them will be an unfriendly one, from which both sides learn nothing.

Since our natural tendency is to be rather pleased with ourselves, we are in the wrong at least half the time when we despise other people.

Sometimes we despise them for being better at something than we are. There was an old mountain guide in the Carpathians who insisted that English travelers must be the dirtiest people in the world: they had to take baths every day!

Sometimes we despise people for being exactly the same as we are! In "Kilvert's Journal" the young clergyman describes a trip he took to Land's End. He and five or six friends walked out one day along the shore to see a huge rock, which was balanced on another rock in such a way that you could tip it with your hand. On the way out, they met a party returning, and looked down their noses at them. After they passed, the other group began to titter, so they looked back and glared. They all became quite worked up about the incident and when Captain Somebody in Kilbert's party gave it as his opinion that a "good kicking might tend to mend their manners," everyone agreed.

Mr. Kilvert went home and set all this down in his journal, with a long condemnation of the manners of the typical British tourist. It never occurred to him that nothing had happened; that his friends had been just as rude (in a better bred way) as the others; and that he, too, was a typical British tourist!

THE attitude of people toward you is frequently a reflection of yours towards them. If you walk home past a country store with an empty creel, or if you have trouble with a rented horse, or if you tip over a sail boat or have trouble with an outboard motor, some country people will quietly help you do better. Others will stand and laugh at the ignorant city slicker. You will immediately think how stupid the latter group are, and you may be right, but you are also reflecting their attitude.

Country people will reflect your attitude if you just think them quaint and peculiar, even in a kindly way. Once there was a famous lady novelist who wanted to write a story about life on a Maine island and she visited with the people for a year, with a little black notebook in her hand. She would write down their strange ways of speech, and would put down notes about interesting characters, right in front of them. It made them quite self-conscious, and kept her from being as popular as she might have been. In revenge, some of them invented very stranger mannerisms and ways of speaking, all of which she picked up with delight, and recorded faithfully in her book.

To lump other people together in "types" is a way of preventing yourself from learning things and growing.

Country people know so much that we don't that we ought to be ready and anxious to learn whatever they will teach us. You can't learn from a "type," you can learn only from a person.

Some psychologists tell us that our personalities are the sum total of all our personal relationships. The more personal relationships we have and the more varied they are the deeper our personalities are going to be. You won't have many varied personal relationships if you laugh off people who may be different from you, if you dismiss them as "types," or scorn them in some other way.

All life is meeting. When our Lord was on earth, some people recognized him for what he was, the Son of God. Others just classified him for a troublemaker, or a crazy prophet, or a revolutionary.

How would we have judged him, if we had lived in those days? It is hard to tell, but one way we can guess is by noticing whether we "classify" the strangers we meet, or recognize each of them as a special child of God, as an incarnation of a divine spirit in a human form.

Dramatis Personae Of the Eucharist

BY

GORDON C. GRAHAM

Push button amusement and mechanized recreation are the order of the day for the average citizen and they represent the amount of effort and activity that he has to exert when he feels the urge to have fun. The same is true when the average churchgoer (usually a different person than the above) finds himself indulging in religious worship. He has come for a spiritual diet which he can most easily digest when it is served up to him in the form of a pill that calls for little or no cooperation on his part. Full participation in the Church's worship is as rare as it is in a movie or television audience.

In the drama of Christian worship all of the people (not just the minister or the choir) in their whole personalities, which includes all their relationships—physical, social and spiritual, must function together as an integral organism. There is no absolute distinction between officiant and congregation. The action of the drama is carried out by the body as well as the soul, the intellect and the emotions, and the material as well as the spiritual. The "holy show" is also the "wholly show"!

In the breaking of the bread everybody gets into the act, so that the cast, or dramatis personae, is by no means confined to those who are in the church at any one service. As a matter of fact the most important members of the cast are not there, in the sense of being "after the flesh" as St. Paul would put it. They have come before or they live elsewhere but it is their work in providing the bread that links them to the actual drama. Everybody is represented by "the bread of the world." It is only the unseen audience that makes the Holy Eucharist important. This is a salutary thought for those clergy and laity who tend to think pridefully of themselves for attending church.

The unseen members of the cast, also, make the drama comprehensible. Essentially, what goes on is very simple—people bring food and drink, which are offered, blessed, and consumed, and then the people go away. This has some obvious meaning but it is not satisfactorily self-explanatory. It does, however, suggest and point to something beyond itself. We have to be told the answer and given the key because it is not magic. It is an expression of the life and work of Jesus. He is the hero of the drama; he it is who began it and he it is who carries it on. "This is my body, which is given for you. Do this for the recalling of me." He came proclaiming the Kingdom of God, he offered himself for it, and was put to death in accomplishing it, but he triumphed over evil and death by living on and transmitting his life to his followers whom he sent out to carry on as his agents.

The Supreme Opportunist

BY

CORWIN C. ROACH

Dean of Bexley Hall

THE devil is an opportunist. He will not take no for an answer but is continually looking for new occasions whereby he can turn his old defeats into victories. The devil does not rest upon his laurels and it is dangerous for us to do so. The devil never takes a vacation. He does not weary in ill-doing. He takes advantage of every opportunity and his opportune times are those which would appear to us as the most unlikely. He came to our Lord with his subtle temptations at the moment when Jesus had experienced the greatest exaltation of his spirit in the baptismal experience.

The time of highest achievement is also the time of severest provocation. Witness our national debacle in the first years of so-called peace. The devil's chief lieutenants are man's complacency and self-satisfaction. When we are most convinced of the security of our spiritual defenses, then the devil is most active. Pride is the postern gate which is most easily breached.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

SOCIAL SECURITY FOR CHURCH WORKERS

★ About 100,000 lay workers employed by churches, religious organizations and institutions will be eligible for federal social security coverage beginning January 1 under the bill recently signed by President Truman. The Church Life Insurance Corporation, subsidiary of the Church Pension Fund, is to send a summary of the new provisions to all clergy of the Episcopal Church.

Under the original social security program enacted in 1936 all employees of non-profit organizations and institutions were excluded from coverage. Non-profit institutions were defined as those enjoying tax exemption under section 101 of the U.S. internal revenue code. This included churches, colleges, hospitals, and all charitable organizations. This exclusion has now been repealed, except that ordained ministers of the gospel and members of religious orders will continue to be excluded.

All other employees of religious institutions are eligible for coverage, provided two steps are taken. First, the church body employing lay workers must indicate to the federal security administration its willingness to pay taxes and make wage reports on those of its employees desiring coverage. Second, all eligible employees must be polled and two-thirds must express a desire to participate.

If a two-thirds majority approves, participation will be granted, but those employees who vote against participation can remain out, if they so desire. Unless two-thirds of the employees do approve, none can participate in the social security program.

Once employees of a given religious institution or organization have voted to come into the social security program, all new employees taken on will automatically be covered. Thus, there will be a tendency in the end for all employees of a given organization to be covered, even if, at first, some stay out.

The first step in security coverage must necessarily be an offer of it by the employing body. There is no way under the law whereby employees of an eleemosynary institution can bring pressure to bear in this matter, since Congress did not feel it necessary.

Church bodies or church-related institutions desiring to offer coverage to their employees can take this first step immediately, although coverage would not begin until January 1. The requisite application blanks are now being prepared by the government printing office. Inquiry should be made at the nearest social security district office. Its address can be obtained from the local postmaster.

VIGIL OF PRAYER IN WASHINGTON

★ The Church of the Epiphany, three blocks from the White House in Washington, was the scene of a seven-day, around-the-clock vigil of prayer for peace which started September 15th. It coincided with the opening of the assembly of the UN in New York. The Rev. E. Stanley Jones, missionary, visited President Truman and informed him of the event. He did not reveal what had been said in his conference with the President, but he did tell reporters on leaving the White House that he thought the U.S. should listen to the voice of Premier Nehru of India (see Witness statement for peace, August 10 issue).

CANON RAVEN SPEAKS AT CONFERENCE

★ Canon Charles Raven of Cambridge, England, was a leader at the annual conference of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, meeting at Evanston, September 12th. He urged the delegates, as Christians, "to take Jesus Christ seriously—to act on the belief that love, not might, is the ultimate reality; that suffering, not sovereignty, is the way of salvation; that the cross of martyrdom is the only road to peace on earth."

Other speakers urged the UN "to stop dropping bombs over Korea, but instead to drop leaflets promising a unified government, and to drop relief supplies because most Koreans are hungry."

TRAINING CONFERENCE FOR LAYMEN

★ Thirty laymen met at Seabury House, September 8-10, for training in presenting the Church's 1951 program. They in turn are to train 2,300 others who will then present the program at parish meetings. One of the features was a carefully staged specimen "parish meeting" duplicating in detail how it is to be done. It is estimated that the plan will take the Church program to 1,600,000 persons before the every member canvass.

ST. MARK'S CATHEDRAL ON THE AIR

★ St. Mark's Cathedral, Seattle, was on the air September 3 for the Columbia church of the air broadcast. Dean Watson was the preacher, and the cathedral choir supplied the music.

PRIEST RECEIVED FROM ROME

★ Bishop Conkling of Chicago announced on September 7th that he has received the Rev. Edward Malindzak, formerly a Roman Catholic priest in Pittsburgh, into the Episcopal Church. He is now studying for Episcopal orders. He was noted as a preacher in the Pittsburgh area and is credited with having made 300 converts to the R. C. faith. He is 34 years of age.

WAR CAUSES MANY CHANGES

★ Five clergymen of the diocese of Harrisburg are now serving as chaplains: Earl M. Honaman, rector of St. John's, York; Donald C. Means, rector of St. Luke's, Altoona; Charles P. James, rector of St. Paul's, Columbia; William H. Weitzel, vicar of St. Mark's, Northumberland; Donald B. Kline, rector of St. Luke's, Mount Joy.

J. Daniel Stover, rector at Lock Haven, is to be in charge of the York parish; Randall H. M. Baker of the Redeemer, Baltimore, will be locum tenens at Altoona; W. Ross Baley Jr. of Tioga is in charge at Columbia; while the services at Northumberland and Selinsgrove will be taken by neighboring priests, and those at Mount Joy by Elmer Witmer, lay reader and postulant.

CENTRAL NEW YORK LAYMEN MEET

★ The election of a suffragan bishop for the armed forces, as authorized by the last General Convention, was urged by the laymen of Central New York attending the annual conference of their association, meeting at Manlius, September 9-10. They also asked for a national commission to study the Korean situation and related events in order that Church people may have guidance on the international problems facing the

CONSECRATION OF DEAN SHIRES

★ Dean Harry H. Shires, formerly the head of the Church Divinity School of the Pacific, is to be consecrated suffragan bishop of California at Grace Cathedral, San Francisco, September 29th. Bishop Sherrill will be the consecrator, with Bishop Block of California and Bishop Gooden, retired suffragan of Los Angeles the co-consecrators. The bishop-elect will be presented by Bishop Walters of San Joaquin and Bishop Rhea of Idaho. Bishop Parsons, retired bishop of California, will preach. Bishop Bloy of Los Angeles will be litanist and the attending presbyters will be the Rev. Henry M. Shires of Alameda, son of the bishop-elect, and the Rev. Mark Rifenback of San Jose.

SYNOD OF PROVINCE OF SEWANEE

★ The synod of the province of Sewanee will be held at St. Andrew's, Tampa, Fla., October 10-11, with the meeting of the Auxiliary held at the same time. Speakers will be Canon T. O. DELAWARE CLERGY TO MEET

★ Bishop McKinstry is to entertain all of the Protestant ministers in Wilmington and vicinity at a luncheon on October 4th, held at his home. Bishop Oldham, retired of Albany, will give a meditation and an account of the meeting of the central committee of the World Council of Churches, held this summer at Toronto.

COLLEGE OF NURSING HAS FULL ROLL

★ The Bishop Johnson College of Nursing at the Good Samaritan Hospital, Los Angeles, has a full enrollment of 50 for the three year course which started September 11. Director Martha E. BISHOP OF ELY AT BERKELEY

★ Bishop Harold Wynn of Ely, England, is the lecturer from that country at the Berkeley Divinity School this fall. His course is on the English Reformation. He is also lecturing and preaching at a number of clergy conferences and churches in various parts of the country. He is to deliver the Kingsbury Lectures at Berkeley on November 20th on religious education in England. He is to return home in December.

★ Stewart A. Cushman, business man of Chicago, arrived in Honolulu September 13 to conduct conferences for clergy and laity on the national work of the Church.

CHAD WALSH WRITES NEXT WEEK

★ The first of Chad Walsh's articles, announced for this week, has been postponed until the issue of next week. The reason is that circular announcements are now in the mail to the clergy and others, and we want to give them time to get their orders back.

In addition to these articles by the Beloit professor, other unusually fine articles will be presented this fall.

We solicit the cooperation of the clergy, and others, in giving them as wide an audience as possible.

NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

SEES BASIC FREEDOMS THREATENED

Basic freedoms, including that of religion, may disappear until Americans wake up, was the warning of the Rev. Harold A. Bosley, Methodist of Evanston, Ill., and former dean of Duke University, in an address to ministers of Ohio. Declaring that the country has the worst case of jitters it has ever had, he said that the fears of many "forces them into what amounts to a curtailment of freedom in order, they say, to preserve it." Referring to widespread criticism of the Methodist Federation for Social Action, the speaker declared: "I have read several resolutions (hitting MFSA) and confess that I am appalled by their meaning. The Caesars asked no more of the early Christians than some of these resolutions ask of our Church. They ask us to forswear the right of fundamental criticism of our social order, to preach the gospel within the limitations imposed by that social order—but not to challenge those limitations. A Church that will accept such an ultimatum, even when delivered by friends, is not worthy of the name Christian Church. We need not worry unduly about freedom for such a Church, it will not need freedom; it will not want freedom; it will soon lose all sense of freedom—it will surely die."

NIEMOELLER WARNS AGAINST AMERICAN 'SUPERMAN'

If America is to avoid the pitfall into which Germany fell when Hitler rose to power, it must see men as men and not as supermen, Martin Niemoeller told the Junaluska Assembly meeting in North Carolina.

The German Church leader said: "The feeling in America today is what it was in Europe 20 years ago: that this is the time for a strong man. Perhaps you, as I, have wondered how in a country like Germany—90 per cent Christian—a man like Hitler could come into power. It was that he pretended to be a superman. It has not yet happened in America, but it could when we see how the times are calling for a superman to bring civilization under control."

Pastor Niemoeller warned against considering any nation or all mankind as a race of supermen, citing the "terrible" experience of his own nation during the past two decades. Men who believe themselves supermen, he declared, soon try to replace God, not only legislating what is good or bad, but also judging who is good or evil.

"Superman puts on the scrap heap those he thinks are useless to him," Niemoeller said. "That is why Hitler had six million Jews murdered. But when Hitler disappeared, superman did not, nor did the human scrap heap. It still grows. In Western Germany from nine to 14 million German people were made homeless after the war was over; four million died from famine." He called these Germans "human scrap heap material."

Today's problem, he stated, is "how to go from superman back to man, to the human being who is a creation of God. Here is the great opportunity for the Church."

PROPOSES UN TAKE OVER OUR FOREIGN POLICY

President Truman should turn over foreign policy on Korea and the Far East to the UN, Paul Hutchinson, editor of the Christian Century, told 500 Methodist ministers meeting at Delaware, Ohio. "Nothing but a revolution in American foreign policy, by which the UN would fix the terms of American intervention in the Far East, can rescue this nation from the mess it is in in Korea and Formosa." He also suggested the formation of a new UN commission made up of foreign ministers of all its Pacific base member states except those with permanent seats on the Security Council.

ARCHBISHOP DEFINES CHRISTIAN DUTIES

Greater social justice, prayers for peace, resistance to "atheistic Communism" were called the Christian's duty by Archbishop Garbett of York, writing in his bulletin for September. "He will acknowledge with deep penitence that often in the past the Church has failed to strive for social justice. He will resolve that in the future he will try to make amends to those who have been left too long in poverty and ignorance. But he will also determine that out of a love of truth and freedom he must take his stand with those who resist aggressive communism."

SENATORS WARY ON VATICAN MINISTER PLAN

Members of the Senate are exceedingly wary of comment on President Truman's suggestion that a permanent Minister with regular diplomatic status be sent by this nation to the Vatican. The Senate would have to confirm such an envoy were he nominated by the President. Leaders of Protestant organizations who opposed the previous mission of Presidential envoy Myron Taylor have already indicated that they will wage a determined battle to prevent Senate confirmation should the President make such a move.

ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY SPEAKS ON CHINA

The Archbishop of Canterbury, in addressing his convocation in London on September 12, said that the people of China are better off under Communism than they were under the government of Chiang Kai-shek. He also called for new spiritual faith in the West, since the building up of a defense is not enough to combat Communism. He asked for sympathy for Christians in China "who, while quite uncertain how things may work out in the future, acknowledge that the present regime is morally and socially preferable to the corruption and inefficiency and exploitations of the regime it replaced."

FREDERICK C. GRANT

The Dilemma of the Idealist. By David Bryn-Jones. Macmillan. $3.

The author, who is both a clergyman and professor of international relations at Carleton College, has written a well-balanced, readable and informative discussion of the relationship between Christian ethics and political decision. He begins with absolute pacifism as the most crucial example of the general problem of how ideal standards are to be brought to bear upon actual events. He then traces in an illuminating manner the history of the Church's attitude in connection with other problems, such as slavery, private property and obedience to the state. He concludes with a judicious examination of the strengths and weaknesses of (a) refusal to compromise and (b) compromise.

Concerning the absolute pacifist (and the "uncompromising idealist" generally), Prof. Bryn-Jones shows that his witness is so valuable in keeping vision and moral sensitivity alive that the Church should always expect to nurture this sort of heroic protest, and should heed it carefully. He also shows, however, that such a position excludes the idealist from being a wise guide in framing policy, and illustrates how the intransigeance which goes with perfectionist conviction often leads to disastrous results. The personal solution for which the author is groping is a doctrine of compromise which will lead toward the ideal (instead of repudiating it), while remaining within the sphere of the feasible.—David E. Roberts.

The Art of Real Happiness. By Norman Vincent Peale and Smiley Blanton, M.D. Prentice Hall, $2.75.

This is a sort of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde book in that the psychiatry is good and helpful, and the religion abominable. It is the same old utilitarian, "cart-before-the-horse" type of religion. If you want peace and happiness, try God and religion. When will we learn—or will we not learn before the world blows up—that God is not a compliant nurse-maid to neurotic man, and that genuine peace and happiness come only when man loves God with all his heart for what God is (and not for what man can get out of God) and submits himself to God to be God's instrument for carrying out His, not neurotic man's, will and purpose?—Lane W. Barton.

ALBERT W. KAUFFMAN
Minister, Congregational Church,
Vernon, Michigan

I cannot tell you how happy I am to receive your petition on the present crisis (Witness, Aug. 10). This is a time when we must act to save our nation and our world. The people who have habitually prayed "Thy kingdom come on earth as it is in heaven" should not fear to undertake this task of at least maintaining a status of peace. With sincere prayers that together we may carry out the will of our common Lord and Master in giving the world his peace.

ROBERT O. REDDISH
Curate at St. Stephen's, Sewickley, Pa.

I read Mr. Tredway's letter (Aug. 24 Backfire) and wept with him over the plight of Episcopalians who, come summer, are subjected to the sermons of us curates. I cannot, however, refrain from referring to the words of Jesus: "Yea, have ye never read, out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise?"

DAVID C. HUNTINGTON
Clergyman of Grand Rapids, Mich.

Hopkins Adams' article "Old Age, I spit in its eye" is very suggestive as to the ability of many elderly people to render service and earn a living for their families, if not restrained by unreasonable legislation. In our Lord's time anyone saying it was "corban" or "a gift" to take care of their parents was condemned. Nobody ever thought of turning them over to the state, or to the corporation or the Church to take care of them. Aren't we getting too far away from the patriarchal system and tribal government which centered authority in the father or grandfather. This was the strength of the Roman Empire and was never questioned ever by Emperors.

Probably one pensioned by the generosity of the last General Convention ought not to have any opinions, but it would be a crime, I think, to force rectors to resign at any specified time. If this is done, should not the charge of the bishop on page 541 of the Prayer Book be changed which says, "Ye ought to forsake and set aside all worldly cares and studies." Then too a course in theology ought to include instructions in some trade so that the consecrated pastor who has given away all he earned to the needy of his congregation might be able to earn a living for his family.

The idleness of the pensioned is not bliss. The Church spends fortunes in educating ministers, why deprive itself of the service they might render by setting a time limit to that service? Because one man is senile at 68 or 72 does not prove that 99 others are senile. Has anybody, now-a-days, ever studied logic? You can't generalize from particulars.

Old men are honored in two of the most successful institutions we have —the Roman Catholic Church and the Masonic Fraternity. Both are conducted wisely in consequence. We are told that the panic of 1929 was started by someone throwing 40,000 shares onto the market all at once. I have always wondered if it was not a young man who did it.

Of course we need the energy and initiative of young men in business and the Church, but is not the experience and wisdom of older men just as valuable?

STORY OF THE WEEK

Fair Employment Practices Promoted By Church

Diocese of Oregon Has William Van Meter As Enforcement Officer of Law

★ The completion this summer of a year of fair employment practices in the state of Oregon is proof that Christian people with continued application of their Christian principles can successfully take and hold a stand for social justice. In 1946 under the chairmanship of Bishop Benjamin D. Dagwell, a committee was organized to marshal public interest in the introduction of a fair employment practices bill into the Oregon legislature. Bishop Dagwell was supported in his action by a resolution favoring such legislation which had been passed at the diocesan convention. The committee, composed of representatives of Church groups and civic organizations, was able to get only a weak statement of policy, without enforcement penalties passed, in 1947. By reorganizing on a broader basis and adding to their number from a wide variety of Church and community organizations, including the League of Women Voters, the Roman Catholic archdiocese of Portland in Oregon, the Anti-Defamation League, and the major political parties, they continued their work during the 1949 session of the legislature and were successful in getting the present acceptable bill enacted. Since its inception the law has been administered by Rev. William S. Van Meter, former vicar of St. Mary's Mission, Woodburn, Oregon, now acting as the deputy commissioner of labor in charge of the fair employment practices division of the Oregon bureau of labor.

Oregon's fair employment practices act rules that it is unlawful to engage in practices of discrimination in employment because of race, creed, color, or national origin. The FEP division of the bureau has two functions: first, to prevent and eliminate discrimination by employers, labor organizations, employment agencies, and other persons, and, second, to develop a positive educational program in the field of human relations. Failure to comply with the law after reasonable consultation and conciliation carries the possible penalty of a year in jail or a $500 fine following an unfavorable decision at a public hearing before the labor commissioner. It has not been necessary to invoke this penalty. Oregon's successful experience in reaching satisfactory settlement through voluntary methods parallels that of other states where FEP legislation has been effective during the past five years.

Barriers Removed

An important result of this legislation has been the removal of the psychological barriers to full participation in community life held by many minority group members. Negroes need no longer limit themselves to searching for employment in areas in which Negroes have traditionally been employed. Young people are now training themselves for positions for which they feel they have a vocation without reference to previously held attitudes toward color, creed, or national "suitability." This conclusion is supported by the fact that while in the nation as a whole 24 percent of all high school graduates apply for college admission, and when, in June, 1950, 25 percent of all graduates of Portland public high schools applied for college admission, 64 percent of the Negro Portland high school graduates asked for higher education. The Urban League of Portland, an agency engaged in integrating Negroes into the total life of the community, reports that since the passage of the FEPA it has placed 40 Negroes in jobs which had previously been held by white persons. For the first time a Negro saleswoman has been employed in a downtown Portland department store and for the first time the largest chain grocery in the Pacific Northwest has employed Negroes in sales positions. Within present memory, the first Negro family to live in Salem, the state capitol, moved in recently when the father of the family found employment in a city that prior to passage of this act, actively discouraged members of minority groups from becoming its citizens. None of the cases cited was the result of an adjusted complaint. In these instances the employer took the initiative, but it required the passage of the law to uncover that initiative.

Few Complaints

The flood of complaints envisioned by opponents to the bill has not materialized. To date only 21 affidavits charging discrimination in employment have been filed in the labor commissioner's office. To their credit, the minority groups of the state have not used the law to vent their aggression against employers or society as a whole, though they would have had legal basis for so doing. The atmosphere has been one of cooperation and not conflict. Although there is no organized opposition to the law, in general employers have fulfilled only the letter of the law. Not all employers yet understand the implications of the law or what a wholly integrated employment policy would mean. The majority of complaints filed has been on the basis of color, though religion and national origin have also appeared as reasons. This may be attributed to the fact that much work has been done with the Negro citizens of Portland and they are better informed concerning their rights and duties under the law.

Two lessons are to be found in this Oregon experience. First it was necessary to begin and maintain action over a period of years on a long-discussed program, in spite of what seemed like initial failure, and second, it was necessary to call in and cooperate with other like-minded groups. The results of a year's operation of the Oregon fair employment practices act are evidence of the wisdom and feasibility of such procedure. The Episcopal Church played a part in the initiation and administration of this legislation which gives reality to the Christian principle of the brotherhood of man. This should give courage to other groups desiring to make a Christian mark in our society.

PARISH DAY SCHOOLS

★ Two more parishes of Los Angeles, St. Matthew's, Pacific Palisades, and St. Mary's, Hollywood, open day schools this fall. It brings the number of such schools in the diocese to nine.

CONFERENCE ON COLLEGE WORK

★ College work clergy of the second province met for a three-day conference at Seabury House, September 6-8. The purpose of the conference was expressed in the keynote address by Miss Katharine Duffield, secretary for college work in the province, who discussed plans for the coming year. Miss Duffield called the delegates' attention to the fact that "college work involves the welfare and perhaps the very existence of our Church in the nation," since (to quote John Coburn of Amherst College) "the majority of students know nothing about God." The nature of college work, as stated by the provincial committee on college work, "is to deepen and strengthen the Christian faith among students and faculty." "College work," said Miss Duffield, "is not merely an interesting experiment; it is one of the most essential missionary jobs in the Church."

The second speaker, Rev. Roger W. Blanchard, director of the division of college work of the National Council, explained the organization of college work on the national scale, naming the existing committees and their areas of work. In the same way he reported on the student organizations and the plans for the forthcoming national student conference to be held at Cranbrook School, Michigan, in December, for the purpose of establishing a national Canterbury movement. In reviewing the work which is being done among faculty people, Mr. Blanchard applauded the efforts of the second province, citing in particular the successful faculty institute in theology held last June at Hamilton College. Elsewhere in the country faculty groups have been formed on a regional basis rather than on individual campuses, reported Mr. Blanchard. Commenting on his recent trip abroad to attend the international inter-faith conference in France, Mr. Blanchard went on to consider the ecumenical endeavor in this country, describing the efforts of the United Student Christian Council and where Episcopal students are coming to know students of other faiths and understand something of those faiths through these friendships. Communication, in Mr. Blanchard's opinion, is the greatest problem facing college workers at this time, a situation which the National Council is working to alleviate through the publication of pamphlets and through publicity in various media. In closing, Mr. Blanchard noted areas for future development — e.g., work among graduate students, the need for more curates, lay ministers and women workers, new plans for training women workers and plans for the appointment of future committees.

Speaking on the subject of work with faculty members, the Rev. George M. Bean, chaplain of Lehigh, suggested three approaches to faculty members, the first of which is personal contact and individual conversions; the second the formation of cell groups for faculty people who know something about religion, but ought to know more. "It comes as a surprise to many people that Christianity can be intellectually exciting," said Mr. Bean, who has used the cell idea successfully. One of the reasons that faculty people are hard to reach, Mr. Bean feels, is their total indifference to Christianity, regarding which they have no vantage point and live in a vacuum. "Christians have been so concerned about being impartial that they have bent over backwards as no other group has . . . liberal rationalism is taking over on the campus because no fight is being made there for the maintenance of the Christian heritage. If this thing is to be headed off, we must start with the faculty, developing lay theologians among them." A third effective means, Mr. Bean finds, is to build a library of books to lend to the faculty, "books which will jolt the faculty members out of their lethargy." Mr. Bean cautioned the conference that faculty people, specialists in their own fields who constantly endeavor to keep abreast of the progress in their fields, expect the clergy to maintain the same standard in their specialty, and recommended that clergy keep up on current theological books.

In the first of his two lectures at the conference the Rev. Charles R. Stinnette considered the role of the chaplain as counsellor, particularly where psychological problems are involved. Pastoral care or counselling, said Mr. Stinnette, involves the establishment of a genuine relationship between counsellor and counselee. The clergy can do an important job by making people understand that no stigma should be attached to people who are mentally ill. Mr. Stinnette recommended books which would be helpful to the chaplains in preparing for counselling and described in some detail the specific techniques of counselling.

In his second lecture Mr. Stinnette discussed the place of the Church in health. "The Church is limited because it participates in the ambiguities of this age. The question is, are we willing to take seriously what our Christian faith demands of us? So many of us do not know what we stand for and on the college campus this translates to the students." What can the Church do? According to Mr. Stinnette, the Church is defined as the community of the forgiving and the forgiven; therefore, the ideal of the Church should be to realize this definition.

Miss Virginia D. Harrington, assistant professor of history at Barnard College, gave two talks. Speaking first on the nature of man and how man considers the nature of man as evidenced by history, Miss Harrington described and traced the various historical concepts man has had of himself from the Renaissance concept through the Calvinist predestinarian concept and the enlightenment doctrines of inevitable progress and the essential goodness of man, to the new predestinarian doctrine (both secular and scientific). "These are things people thought about man. The testimony of history, however, tells us two things about man—first of all, power corrupts and that absolute power corrupts absolutely, and secondly, that man likes power and gain, and as a result constantly creates new problems for himself while he thinks he is solving old ones."

Miss Harrington's second address considered the influence of the doctrine of man on political ideas, and more specifically as applied to our American democracy. Democracy as a form of government really stems from the enlightenment concept of man. It depends on the enlightenmentalist's view of the abilities of man. "Democracy," stated Miss Harrington, "as an answer to man's problems, was at its height just before the Civil War." It depended on three faiths—a faith in democracy, a faith in a world governed by divine law, and a faith in the free individual. "The decline in faith in democracy started after the Civil War and came into full flower about 1930." When people began to lose their faith in God, they created new faiths, e.g., humanism, stoicism, faith in progress, faith in science, etc. According to Miss Harrington, all these faiths have suffered body blows in recent years, most notably science with the development and subsequent use of the atomic bomb. "Along with these declines in faith in God and in democracy, came the rise of dictatorships in the world," she observed. There is a connection between the two, she pointed out, because the philosophy which motivated both the Nazis and the Fascists was that the minority should solve the problems of the majority. The growth of this idea gave rise to Communism which sprang up and was embraced. "It is interesting to note that at the same time we are trying to revive an interest in democracy, even to the extent of fighting for it, there is a simultaneous revival of interest in religion," said Miss Harrington.

MIDWEST PROVINCE HAS SYNOD

★ The synod of the midwest province met at Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio, September 11-13, with about 200 delegates attending, including 16 of the 18 bishops of the province. Business was minimized so that workshops of the entire membership could be held on various phases of Church work. Leaders were Rev. E. E. Piper of Detroit on religious education; Rev. Almus Thorpe of Columbus on college work; Rev. Samuel N. Keys of Waynesville, O., on town and country work; Bishop Street, suffragan of Chicago, on social relations; Rev. Percy Jones of Niles, Michigan, on promotion and publicity.

There were four addresses: Bishop Emrich of Michigan presented a program for future work of the province; Professor Salmon of Kenyon gave an interpretation of the work of Bishop Philander Chase, one of the great leaders of the Church more than a century ago; President Chalmers of Kenyon who spoke on higher education in which he pointed out the neglect of the spiritual side of life. The Presiding Bishop also addressed the synod on the national and overseas work of the Church.

Bishop Ivins of Milwaukee ended his two terms as president, with Bishop Page of Northern Michigan elected to serve for the next three years.

INTERFAITH STUDY ON WAR HELD LIKELY

★ An interfaith study dealing with the moral implications of modern warfare was seen by Bishop Angus Dun of Washington, as likely to develop from the first formal meeting of the commission of Christian scholars. The commission was appointed last March by the Federal Council of Churches to deal with the moral perplexities of Christian conscience in modern war. Bishop Dun is chairman of the twenty-member group.

In a statement issued at the close of the two-day meeting, Bishop Dun said: "If principles mutually agreed upon are discovered in interfaith consultation, the commission has been empowered by the executive committee of the Federal Council to issue its findings jointly with similarly appointed scholars of other faiths, presumably meaning of the Roman Catholic Church and of the Jewish community."

Bishop Dun also stressed in his statement that "the Korean struggle and the threat of a global war give a new urgency" to the aims of the commission.

"Under United Nations' auspices we are engaged in a bloody struggle in Korea which we seek to maintain as a police action," he said. "The weapons we feel compelled to use are bringing ruin to the very people we seek to rescue from aggression. The dread of a global war darkens the lives of men in Europe and Asia and the United States. In that situation there will be many who will feel that the hard political realities overshadow and render almost irrelevant the question as to what weapon we shall use or make ready to use in the ultimate eventualities. Yet our situation only faces us more actually with the searching moral issues which have been referred to us. It also gives urgency to our search for any word which may be granted us."

tion was based on the dictatorial way in which the nomination is reported to have been made and does not reflect upon the character or ability of Mr. Richards. Similar action was taken some time ago by the standing committee of Alabama.

PACIFIST FELLOWSHIP HAS MEETING

★ Canon Charles E. Raven of Oxford, England, was the headliner at the meeting of the Episcopal Pacifist Fellowship, held at Seabury House, September 12-15. "Europe," he declared, "is not in a position to stand six weeks of global war." No one in Britain, he said, has a notion of what the U. S. is going to do but they do know that the future of the world depends on the U. S. He also expressed the opinion that another full scale war would likely see all of Asia against the West.

Canon Raven's advice to Americans was not to be morbidly concerned about what other peoples think of us. Our fear of Communism, he declared, cannot justify the remedies we tend to employ, and he also expressed the opinion that another global war will communize Britain.

Other speakers were the Rev. John Nevin Sayre, director of the Fellowship of Reconciliation; Rev. William K. Russell of Brooklyn; Rev. John Yungblut of Terrace Park, Ohio; Evelyn Eaton and the Rev. John F. Davidson of New York, with the Rev. Bradford L. Young of Manchester, N. H., serving as chaplain.

YOUTH LEADERS MEET IN HARTFORD

★ Officers and advisors of the young people's fellowship of the diocese of Connecticut met at Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, September 23rd to discuss the national youth program. In addition to round table discussions, there was an address on the work of the Church Army by Cadet A. T. Patience who has just finished field missionary work in Montana.

TEACHERS CONFER IN DETROIT

★ Fifty teachers and workers in the public schools of Detroit were present at a communion service at St. Paul's Cathedral, September 16th. After the service they had breakfast, with an address by Bishop Hubbard in which he stressed the opportunity they have to advance programs in Christian education, particularly by serving as teachers in Sunday schools.

EXCHANGE VISITS COME TO END

★ Canon Arthur H. Hayden of Warwick, England, sailed for home on September 14, after having been in charge of the Church of the Holy Cross, North Plainfield, N. J., since March. On the same day Canon Robert Gribbon and his family sailed from England after serving the Coventry parish as an exchange with Canon Hayden.

Both men found the experience very pleasant and profitable.

"I've never once felt like a foreigner," the Canon told reporters, "and it has been quite easy for me to drop into the life of the Episcopal Church. Gribbon has written many times that he found the same friendliness in Warwick that I have found here."

He added that his wife and twenty-three-year old daughter found housekeeping in the U. S. much easier than in England.

Y. C. S. SECRETARY IN LONG ISLAND

★ Mrs. Charles S. Monroe is the acting executive for the Long Island Youth Consultation Service, loaned by the national office. She is the daughter of the late Archbishop Derwyn T. Owen of Toronto. Her job is chiefly to work with the board on long range planning. Two new staff members are Miss Rose Lawrence, recently with the home service of the Red Cross, and Mrs. Annie Humphries who has worked with children and adolescents in various agencies.

MISSIONS ARE HELD IN RHODE ISLAND

★ A one-week mission in nearly every parish of Rhode Island is being held September 24-October 8th. Bishops from other dioceses taking part are the Presiding Bishop, Lawrence of Western Mass.; Scaife of Western New York; Sawyer of Erie; Ludlow of Newark; Mallett of Northern Indiana; Demby, retired suffragan of Arkansas.

VARIOUS MISSION fields were represented when these young ladies staged a pageant at St. John's, Tallahassee, Florida

CONFERENCE ON YOUTH WORK

★ Thirty clergy and young people from the dioceses of New York and Albany participated in a special experimental conference at Peekskill, September 6-8. Under the auspices and general direction of the division of youth, young people who serve as members of the national youth commission guided the discussions and sessions of this experimental conference.

Since the needs and concerns of young people are of primary concern to the Church it was felt that some pattern might be worked out where young people and clergy in conference together could plan for youth work in their own parishes and missions. The chairman and secretary of the national youth commission, Lindley Hartwell of Burlington, Vt., and Nancy Miller of Dover, N. H., Alma Schelle of New York, provincial representative and Harold Wright of Boston, member-at-large, led the sessions and panel discussions with the Rev. Meredith Wood, member of the National Council's division of youth, the Rev. Robert R. Spears of Auburn, N. Y., provincial adult representative on the national youth commission and Miss Mary Margaret Brace, acting executive secretary of the division of youth, acting as adult consultants.

After an introduction to the conference by Miss Brace, Lindley Hartwell acted as chairman of a discussion of the united movement of the Church's youth and its accomplishments and needs in the dioceses involved. A panel discussion led by Harold Wright discussed the problems and needs of youth. A lively discussion followed which brought to the fore many of the most common areas of tension between youth and adults. Separate discussion groups met with youth chairmen to discuss program materials and how they are useful in parishes of varying sizes. Reporting showed that much can be done in consultation with young people themselves to develop and enrich the average youth program.

The Rev. John Heuss, director of the department of Christian education, who is responsible for youth work in the Church, directed a final evaluation session.

VISITING DELEGATES FOR CONVENTION

★ According to a statement from the National Council offices, the Episcopal Church is entitled to 203 visiting delegates to the constituting convention of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U. S. A., to be held in Cleveland, Ohio, November 28, 29, 30 and December 1, 1950. Such "visiting delegates" will be entitled to attend all the sessions, but will have no voting privileges. Each will pay his own registration fee of $5.00.

A member of the Episcopal Church who desires to be certified as a visiting delegate should send an application to the Rev. C. Rankin Barnes, secretary of the National Council, 281 Fourth Ave., New York 10, N. Y., enclosing therewith a letter of recommendation from his rector, which must include a specific statement that the applicant is a member of this Church in good standing. To such applicants Barnes will then mail the proper credentials with instructions as to where to send the registration fee.

THIRD PROVINCE SYNOD

★ The synod of the province of Washington is to be held at St. Matthew's, Wheeling, W. Va., October 17-19. Prof. Norman Pittenger is to speak on the Church's opportunity; Bishop Hart of Pennsylvania, on inter-Church cooperation; Bishop Pardue of Pittsburgh on spiritual development and evangelism. Also a feature of the meeting will be a joint session of the various organizations attending when Prof. George F. Thomas will deal with the same subject he presented in his Witness article in Lent: "The challenge to Christianity of humanism, secularism and communism."

The address at the banquet will be by Ted Gannoway of New York, and at the final session a number of speakers will deal with various subjects connected with marriage and the family, with Judge Charles P. Wilhelm of the judicial circuit of West Virginia presiding. Bishop Cameron J. Davis, chairman of the committee on the marriage canon will report on how the present canon is working; Chaplain Robert Morris of the Episcopal Hospital, Philadelphia will speak on the Christian family; Prof. Reuel Howe of Virginia Seminary will deal with preparation for Christian marriage, and Bishop W. C. Campbell, coadjutor of West Virginia, will speak on the holy communion prior to the ceremony.

★ When the new parish house of St. Gabriel's, East Detroit, was dedicated earlier this year it featured a large cross. The cover picture is of the youthful rector, John Porter, hanging it. Modern prefabricated techniques, modified and adapted to the assembly line method, were used, and a large part of the labor was given by men of the parish and other parishes of the diocese, notably Trinity, St. Clair Shores and Christ Church, Cranbrook. The total cost was about $37,000.

CENTRAL NEW YORK LAYMEN MEET

★ Vestries of the 139 parishes and missions of Central New York attended one of a series of ten meetings that started September 17. At each either Bishop Peabody or Bishop Higley presented the problem and needs of the diocese and of the national Church. Meetings were held at Watertown, Rome, Utica, Oswego, Syracuse, Elmira, Binghamton, Moravia, Auburn and Norwich.

EDITORIALS

Win the War Now

IN "Thus Spake Zarathustra" Nietzsche wrote, "To stand in the midst of this sorry scheme of things and not to question, not to tremble with delight and desire in questioning—that is what I call contemptible." He was right, and we offer in this editorial an issue which we should all be questioning. Interest in world government gathers momentum and adherents in many parts of the world each day. But whatever may be our opinion of it we are sure of this one thing: to think is not enough. If we believe in peace the time has come to act. It is up to those who oppose world government to offer an alternative way out of our tragic difficulties — and act on it. Those who are convinced that world government is the only solution are acting. It is trite to remark that we all "believe" in peace of course! But Jesus did not say, "Blessed are the peace-wishers" or even "Blessed are the peace-pray-ers." His words are a challenge that cannot be dodged: "Blessed are the peace-makers." Every avowed Christian should not only be thinking about peace, wishing for peace or praying for peace; he should be working actively for peace. As Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas, vice-president of the United World Federalists recently stated, "We are the soldiers of the next war; if we win now we will not have to fight."

Jesus' mandate, taken from the Old Testament, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" has, in our generation, moved from its tacit acceptance among Christians as a desirable ideal to a sine qua non of existence on this planet. There is no doubt that he promulgated it as the inflexible law of life: throughout the ages his followers received it as a pious aspiration, not denying its validity but doing little to accede to it. Only a few saw it as the relentless and absolute order of the universe. Within recent years it has received dramatic and inescapable emphasis as the latter through two related happenings. The first is the shrinkage of the earth because of the increasing interdependence of its inhabitants, due to the growth of modern communication and commerce. The second is the incredible and diabolic power that man has developed for mutual destruction.

In spite of this obvious demonstration of the compulsion of the second commandment (and the last two "world" wars were devastating proofs of its validity) there are still many people who are reluctant to acknowledge it. They fail to see that "one world or none" is but a paraphrase of his words. Strangely enough, professed followers of the prophet of Nazareth (and adherents of the Hebrew Scriptures) are largely unaware that they are engaged in an abortive attempt to refute him. World government is, basically, a religious issue.

Sovereignty

THE main charge brought against it by its opponents is that it would mean the sacrifice of our "sovereignty" as a nation. The answer is—complete agreement. With the further assertion that no progress, either in the individual or in the group, has ever been made except sovereignty has been sacrificed.

So prevalent is the objection, and so obtuse are those who set it forth, that one must reduce one's reasoning to the simplest terms. Sovereignty is defined by the dictionary as "the state of exercising or possessing supreme jurisdiction or power." In other words, the right to do as one pleases.

The baby attempts to exercise sovereignty but he soon, if he is wise, learns that it is futile. Some adults never learn and we say, pitingly or disparagingly, that they suffer from adult-infantilism. But the vast majority of human beings find by trial and error that they must give up their individual sovereignty if they are to live in this world with any degree of satisfaction—or even to live. Indeed the great majority of those who read these lines are alive today because they, and their forebears, have given up a large degree of sovereignty. We are familiar with the process in history, so grudgingly and hardly learned. From the family through the village, the tribe, the city-state, the nation, the undeviating story has been the same: relinquish your sovereignty to a larger group or your chances for survival are almost nil. Yes, we are familiar with the re-iterated saga, but we face the next and inevitable step—the sacrifice of national sovereignty—with the same doltish lack of vision that was the mark of many of our ancestors. But, fortunately, not of all—or we would not be here. Some did learn and act on the law; that there is no assurance of freedom, of security or even of life save through the law of definite circumscribing of sovereignty. As Emery Reves in "The Anatomy of Peace" has put it so well, "The day the first legal imposition was forced upon man was the greatest day in history: that day freedom was born."

One could go on to demonstrate this in every area of life. If we had been born, for example, two hundred years ago perhaps less than a third of us would have survived to maturity. Most would have died at birth; the others would have had only a comparatively few years of existence. Plagues, pestilences and diseases now conquerable would have swept them away like flies. The science of medicine, with its increasing knowledge of sanitation, of bodily processes, of the germ theory of disease emerged gradually and bit by bit took away man's sovereignty. It discovered laws, the ruling power enforced them; men were denied the right to do as they pleased and, in return, were given—life.

A Religious Problem

WHAT should not have to be made clear is that, be it in man's own soul or in his relationship with other men, in giving up his sovereignty he is not surrendering without return; he gains a far greater good, he achieves something he did not possess before. So Christ insisted.

One further thing needs to be pointed out. Those who passionately rush to defend their nation's sovereignty, the right to possess armament and to declare war (which is the only issue here considered) are curiously blind to the fact that they are exercising themselves to defend something that is non-existent! There has been no more tragic illusion and myth than that of the self-determination of nations. For we, as a nation, are subject not only to our own will but to the wills and determinations of other nations. Can one be so credulous as to imagine that our decision to enter the last war was formulated in Washington—the decision of a sovereign nation? Alas, the decision was made some time before in Berlin and Tokyo—with the resultant chain reaction. Does anyone really believe that out of a budget of billions we are eagerly spending a very large part for destructive purposes simply because we have decided to do so of our own uninfluenced free will? Far from it; we are forced so to waste our substance because, rightly or wrongly, those who control our national destiny are themselves controlled by what happens in Moscow.

World government is basically a religious problem on at least two counts. One because it is a realistic attempt to find a solution to this world's immediate and appalling problem of sheer survival. If it is not realistic then Christ was a silly, deluded and impractical dreamer—and he should be rejected as such, frankly and finally. Second, because it accepts, as did the founder of Christianity, the fundamental unequivocal premise of the unity of the world; "that ye all may be one, as I and my Father are one." Jesus stated in effect; Thou shalt love thy neighbor equals the sacrifice of sovereignty, equals the achievement of security, freedom and peace.

Such is the law. "The moving finger writes; and, having writ, moves on." Inexorable it is and glorious we can make it.

Going Off Half-Cocked

BY

CORWIN ROACH

Dean of Bexley Hall

Render account for every careless word.—Mt. 12:36

THE tongue is a trigger. It is a human failing to go off half-cocked, to talk carelessly and thoughtlessly. The world's worst excuse among men who use firearms is to say, "I didn't know it was loaded." The first thing a novice is taught is to handle weapons with care, for more people have been hurt by guns that were not loaded than the reverse. Similarly, more damage has been done by careless words than by speech which was meant to be malicious. Every word we utter is loaded. It has power to do good or evil. There is no such thing as an "idle word" in our ordinary modern sense of that term and our new translation has rightly changed the qualifying adjective. Words are like bullets. They make their impact whether we mean them to or not. They are boomerangs which bring back the blessing or the curse with which we dispatched them on their way. The next time we are tempted to go off half-cocked, to be quick on the trigger, let us stop and consider the high potency of the weapon we are using. Jesus tells us we shall be asked to give account for the way we have handled it.

Holy Communion Is Sedition

PART ONE

THE very abnormal period of history in which we are living began as long ago as the Renaissance. It is clearly mirrored in Shakespeare's tragedies, where such ruthless and lonely characters as Macbeth defy heaven and earth in order to fulfill their ambitions. Century by century the philosophy of rugged individualism and devil take the hindermost continued to develop, until it reached its full flowering in the nineteenth century.

It is true that the unsavory pill was skilfully sugar-coated. We were assured by the philosophers of rugged individualism that it would all be for the best; that if everyone looked out for Number One, the earthly paradise would automatically arrive. Today the jig is up. History has taught us the hard way that every-man-for-himself leads not to Utopia but to anarchy, and anarchy leads to tyranny—whether of big business or big government.

The world is at last waking up to a fact it had forgotten during several centuries of hectic looking out for Number One. This fact is that each of us is dependent on everyone else; that no one can live completely for himself without ultimately transforming society into anarchy.

Some of the remedies are worse than the disease. Fascism and Communism, for all their differences, try to cure the evils of irresponsible individualism by abolishing the individual. The individual becomes part of a jelly-like mass, with no meaning apart from society. He loses his soul, and by the time the propagandists get done with him they have also pocketed his mind.

The Fascist and Communist solutions are wrong, but the problem remains—how to get rid of unbridled individual selfishness without abolishing the individual. If the problem isn't solved in the right way, the Fascists or Communists will solve it their way.

One can see this quest for a solution most clearly in England and the Scandinavian countries. Unbridled capitalism of the old-fashioned dog-eat-dog and charge all-the-traffic-will-bear variety is obviously dead there. But the masses of the people do not want Communism. They want some system that will insure the good of society while leaving the individual an individual; that will make it possible for individuals to cooperate freely for the good of society without becoming regimented sleepwalkers.

Discovering the Church

WHAT has all this to do with Holy Communion? Very much indeed. Nothing in Christianity is a neat flower garden, hedged off from the crude realities of life. And I believe that the political tendency I have just mentioned—the quest for a solution that is neither rugged individualism nor totalitarianism — is closely connected with two trends now discernable in many Christian denominations.

The first of the trends is a rediscovery of what the word "Church" means. During the individualistic nineteenth century, religion often degenerated into private piety. "The flight of the alone to the Alone" was a favorite phrase. The Church was commonly thought of as a voluntary association of nice people who, for no particular reason, met to pay their respects to God, when they could just as well have worshipped God in the privacy of their own living rooms.

Today the leaders of almost every denomination are rediscovering what St. Paul meant by the word "Church." They are finding that Christianity was social from the beginning, and that the Church, as pictured in the New Testament, was much more than a voluntary association of people who think it nice to meet together once a week—that it was more than an organization to finance missionary activities, find funds for the minister's salary, and provide facilities for guild meetings. The Church—the real Church—can be describe only in the language of biology. It is not an organization but an organism. It has a life of its own which is greater than the combined lives of its members. Christ is the head of the Church, and each of us is a "member" or organ of it. We are, so to speak, the legs and arms and nose and mouth of the mystical body of Christ.

In the Church, as thus conceived, we have one place where we get some faint idea of how individualism and the needs of the group can be reconciled. The hand and the eye have very different functions, but they are not competitive: each complements the other. And the hand and the eye do not lose individuality by being parts of the same body—rather, they would lose their individual functions if separated from the body.

The second thing that is being rediscovered in many denominations is the supreme importance of Holy Communion. In the Episcopal Church, this rediscovery began a little over a century ago. The liturgical movement in the Roman Catholic Church, led largely by the Benedictines, is beginning to get results; "mass without communions" is becoming less frequent than formerly, and in many parishes the people are being encouraged to receive communion as often as possible.

Even in the Protestant Churches one finds here and there strong indications that a new appreciation is developing, and a realization that the rule of four times a year is a starvation diet. There is a liturgical movement among the Lutherans of Sweden and Germany, and in Scotland the Iona movement of the Church of Scotland advocates Holy Communion as the usual Sunday service.

It seems clear that the new appreciation of Holy Communion is closely linked with the renewed understanding of the nature of the Church. Holy Communion is at the same time the most effective symbol of the nature of the Church, and one of the most powerful aids toward nourishing the life of the Church and making it what it should be. In other words, Holy Communion is both a symbol and a means—a means for changing the symbol into a reality.

The Social Implications

FOR my present purposes I shall not concern myself with the theological minutiae of the sacrament. I assume that all schools of thought would agree that in Holy Communion Christ is as objectively present as if we saw him with our own eyes, and that in receiving the sacrament we are given spiritual strength that defies the power of logical analysis. But here I am thinking mainly of the social implications.

If you were a native of some South Sea island, and were being initiated into Christianity, the sacrament of Holy Communion would strike you as an odd thing. It would seem much ado about very little. This feeling would be accentuated if someone explained to you that bread and wine were the common food and drink among the Jews in the time of Christ—that he had deliberately chosen the most commonplace things.

The implication is clear. Holy Communion signifies that Christ is interested in the most everyday things of life. He is interested in the activities of the butcher, the baker, the assembly lines worker, the banker, and the farmer. And he does not turn up his nose at the material world. Instead, he transforms it by using it for his own purposes. This banishes any idea that Christianity is a purely "spiritual" religion; it is as spiritual as God and as concrete and material as the physical universe of stars, planets, human bodies, bread, and wine.

The next thing to note about Holy Communion is that it is an abbreviated meal. Very abbreviated, it is true, and not sufficient to keep body and soul together. But the bread and wine at least symbolize a whole meal. And we do not ordinarily eat meals with people we hate, or whom we hold in contempt. Therefore, when we go to the communion rail and receive our tiny portions of bread and wine we are sharing a meal with the other people in church and with Christians everywhere. By implication we are saying either that we regard our fellow partakers as friends, or at least that we know we ought to regard them as friends.

In any parish, there will be some people who are relatively wealthy, others who are relatively poor. There will also be a wide variety of occupations. Ideally (though, alas, rarely in the Episcopal Church) there should also be a wide variety of races: Negroes and Chinese kneeling beside Anglo-Saxons and Italians. But all these differences, which loom so large on the city streets, are swallowed up in the simple act of sharing a meal together.

This is a meal we do not receive as a right. We receive it as a privilege. The privilege is granted us not because we are wonderful people but because God is merciful and loving. No wonder that we kneel to meet him. Rich or poor, stupid or intelligent, black or white, we kneel in token both of our weakness and our sinfulness.

But before we kneel at the rail, we all join in the general confession—"We acknowledge and bewail our manifold sins and wickedness . . ." It is noteworthy that the rubrics of the Prayer Book give us no option about saying the confession.

This raises an interesting point. If mankind were divided into two classes, the invariably good and the invariably bad, it would be dishonest and hypocritical for the good people to kneel and confess sinfulness of which they are not guilty. However, the authors of the Prayer Book were shrewd psychologists as well as sound theologians. They knew that no human being can go a single day without committing sins of either commission or omission, and that—in addition to specific sins—there is constantly in each of us a rebellious spirit toward God which results from original sin. The danger of hypocrisy seems purely theoretical.

Therefore, when the members of the Church come to Holy Communion, they have at least two things in common. They are partaking of a meal together, which is a symbol of friendship and love. And they are sinners and say so.

All of this has a strong bearing on the problems of society, as I hope to make clear next time.

Authority of the Bible

BY

LOUIS WALLIS

THE Bible is authoritative for us because it is based upon the moral law, which is an expression of the universe just like the law of gravitation. If the Bible merely told us about God as a kind of abstract person or power without any relation to morality and social justice, it would not have the authority and prestige that it actually does have. And thus the true approach to the subject is given by the Psalmist: "Clouds and darkness are round about him. But justice and righteousness are the foundation of his throne."

In the days when the Bible was being written, the world was ruled by big, wicked cities which were surrounded by high walls of stone. Some of these places were Babylon, Ninevah, Damascus, Tyre, and Sidon. They were centers of immorality and social injustice which found a symbol in the gods of heathenism. Specially interesting to readers of the Bible are two of these ancient cities. One was called "Shechem"; and it lay in a valley among the hills of central Canaan. The Hebrew clans that entered the country from the desert had to destroy Shechem in a torrent of blood and fire before they could form a simple backwoods monarchy under Saul ben Kish.

The other city was in the hills of southern Canaan; and we read about it with something of a shock in a very ancient source which is unfamiliar to most Christians and Jews. "As for the Jebusites, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the children of Judah could not drive them out. But the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah at Jerusalem unto this day." That the influence of this unconquered pagan city was very corrupt, is pointed out by the prophet Ezekiel: "Thus saith Jehovah to Jerusalem, thy birth and thy nativity are of the land of Canaan. Thy father was an Amorite and thy mother a Hittite." Ezekiel condemns Jerusalem for every kind of sin, including the practice of immorality, unjust treatment of the poor and needy, and the worship of heathen gods. Jerusalem appears in the book of Luke as a city that killed the Hebrew prophets and stoned those that were sent unto her.

Jerusalem in Hebrew History

THE children of Judah, led by a chieftain, David ben Jesse, forced their way into Jerusalem by secret passage and captured a fort called "Zion," overlooking the city. Going out from there, David subjugated the nearby peoples of Edom, Moab, and Syria, all of whom became slaves to the house of David. And in the meanwhile, the Hebrew clans in the central Canaanite hills, once ruled by Saul, passed under the yoke of Jerusalem. David allied himself with the great, heathen cities of Tyre and Sidon; and presently the people of Saul's old kingdom were levied upon for labor-gangs to construct a series of huge, expensive, and sumptuous buildings in Jerusalem.

But in time the central highlands rose in rebellion, saying, "What portion have we in David? And there was none that followed the house of David but the tribe of Judah only. And the cause was from Jehovah, that he might perform his saying which Jehovah spake by the prophet Ahijah." A war party soon arose, however, in the central hills, and built a great, fortified city called "Samaria." The military party followed the policy of David in making alliance with heathen, Baal-worshiping Tyre and Sidon. So there were now two Hebrew kingdoms in Canaan —the little kingdom of Judah in the south, ruled by Jerusalem, and the big kingdom in the center of Canaan, ruled by the great, walled city of Samaria.

Prophets Against Metropolitan Corruption

THE prophets were mostly from little country villages. Their standpoint was that of the clan-brotherhood in bitter antagonism to city corruption, immorality, and social injustice. The wealthy classes in Jerusalem and Samaria reached out and absorbed the houses and lands of the peasantry in the rural districts. And so the prophets were against the capitals of both Hebrew kingdoms. Thus, the book of the village prophet Micah is headlined as follows: "The word of Jehovah that came to Micah concerning Samaria and Jerusalem: What is the transgression of Jacob? Is it not Samaria? And what are the heathen altars of Judah? Are they not in Jerusalem?

Jehovah was the god of the poor and needy. His worship centered originally in the wilderness and in rural villages. The prophets of Jehovah opposed Baal-worship, not primarily because Baal had no physical existence, but because of what Baalism represented or symbolized. Baal and the other heathen gods, whose cults flourished when the Bible was being written, were the gods of the wealthy in the walled cities. And unless we understand the opposition between the big cities and the country villages, we cannot fully grasp the meaning of the Biblical struggle against immorality and social injustice.

The moral law runs like an invisible thread through Hebrew history and the Bible. It resembles the mysterious "radio-beam" which is available to the driver of the air plane as a guide through darkness and storm. He can find the beam by searching for it with his instruments; and we can likewise find the moral law running through the Old Testament into the New Testament. Sociological and economic research illuminate the Bible, and bring the sacrifice of Jesus into still clearer light.

Spirit in the Inner Man

BY

JOSEPH WITTKOFSKI
Rector of St. Mary's, Charleroi, Penna.

AN honest survey of Christian history must show that the Church has contributed much to the welfare of humanity but the same outline must likewise confess the fact that the Church has generally failed to infiltrate the abysmal depths of human personalities. The failure of Christian people to behave like Christians is the most baffling problem which we find in the past two thousand years of history. It is true that from time to time we do meet a person who is completely Christian in thought, word, and deed, but among the countless millions of Christians, these people are probably numbered among the thousands. There is an urgency today which demands an answer. Why have Christian people largely failed to live up to their profession?

In his discerning letter to the Colossians, St. Paul tells us that God "hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath transplanted us into the kingdom of his dear son." Actual experience, however, demonstrates that the average Christian has not been transplanted, or at least is totally unaware of any such transplanting. On the whole, our Church people are as worldly minded as are their neighbors who do not go to church. In our distant mission fields, it is often said that the greatest obstacle to the advancement of Christianity consists in those Christians who have contact with the natives. Now that the whole wide world has again become a vast missionary region, it is obvious that Christians themselves are often the impediment in the way of the Church's general progress.

The most pressing need of our times is the real and genuine conversion of all Church people. Upon careful analysis, it cannot be said that the vast numbers of Christian people are not intelligent nor do they possess ill wills. Very many strenuously endeavor to reach the stature which our Lord intends but very often they make miserable failures of their lives. They study and after a fashion they pray but they cannot fully develop the mind of Christ within themselves. They may even become very intelligent Christians but they cannot make their Christianity take complete possession of their personalities. It appears, in many of these cases, that the higher part of the human brain, or the cortex, may be somewhat influenced and transplanted, but the lower level of the brain, or the thalamus, remains largely unregenerate.

The thalamus, situated at the base of the brain, is a very important way-station for the reception of the impulses from our senses. The impressions may be integrated in the thalamus, or the sensations may be passed on to the more conscious cortical brain. As a result of a hurried thalamic integration, on the spur of the moment, we may be unkind to people. When we take time to consider our actions, or our response is reviewed by the cortical brain, we are usually sorry. The law recognizes this fact when it makes a distinction between deliberate murder and killing in which there was no premeditation. Our ladies also appreciate this distinction. By instinct, they know that people do not refer their sensations to the cortical brain. For example, they use perfume to give the impression of sweetness and of daintiness. If we refer the sensations that we perceive in the presence of these lovely ones to the cortex, we readily see that there is no real connection between a little bit of perfume and sweetness and daintiness. Since we commonly permit the integration of our sensations to take place in the thalamus, we fall victims to the feminine wiles.

It would likely be correct to say that many followers of Christ are cortical Christians and at least in a measure they are thalamic pagans. In their fully conscious activities, these people may earnestly strive to live their religion, but the subliminal faculties below the cortex remain untamed. Since the thalamus is usually the culprit in human personalities, the great work of the Church in the modern world is the transplanting of the lower human faculties from the power of darkness into the present moment of eternity.

Christian Virtues

THE Christian behavior pattern, outlined by our Lord, is in large part based upon the proper conditioning of the human thalamus and of the related subconscious faculties. The reasoning of the human cortex does not necessarily have an abiding effect upon personality, but the orientation of the sluggish thalamus produces a lasting change. Jesus constantly placed his major emphasis upon the conditioning of the heart which we have come to interpret as the lower brain faculties. In the Sermon on the Mount, the disciple of Christ is described as one who is poor in spirit, who mourns, who is meek, who seeks after honest living, who is full of mercy, who is pure of heart, who strives for harmony in the world, and who is ready to suffer for his convictions of the right. All of these qualifications refer to basic attitudes in a human personality.

Christian behavior begins in poverty of spirit. Inborn human pride is the foremost obstacle against the formation of an enduring Christ-mentality. We are prone to assume that our good qualities arise from ourselves. Any degree of such pride will fast close the doors to the development of a complete Christian character. Pride is like plantain in a lawn. Unless the plantain is continually rooted out, it will destroy the whole lawn. In all of his teaching, our Saviour endeavored to inculcate the necessity of humility. We have come forth from God, we exist by his present power, and our eternal destiny remains in the Godhead. As we assimulate these truths, we begin to become poor in spirit.

The Christian must be able and willing to share the sorrows of all other people. We usually cannot bear the little unhappiness and disappointments in our individual lives. To avoid sharing the afflictions of other people, we go out of our way. But there is no possible isolation for the sincere Christian.

Meekness is often confused with humility. As humility consists in poverty of spirit, so meekness is a confident dependence upon God. The human organism that has been totally transplanted into the new-eternity is aware that God will completely care for it. Such a one does not place his security in his own efforts. He understands that he possesses a security above his deserving.

The pursuit of wholesome and honest living should be the goal of all Christian activity. Fundamentally, this is an attitude of never taking unjust advantage of others. A basic evil in the worldly social pattern is that damnable cleverness which is often considered to be smart business. Society continually finds itself infiltrated with various forms of cheating. In business, in politics, and in other social activities, right and honest action often has very little opportunity when placed over against expediency.

Mercy is often considered to be a type of feminine weakness. In the letter to the Ephesians, St. Paul urges his readers to "be kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another." Among the multitudes of Christian people, there are really very few who have a sincere pity for all of their neighbors. Mercifulness is usually considered to be impractical and unintelligent.

Pureness of Heart

Pureness of heart is a little appreciated attribute of human living on the higher plane of existence. In the strict intellectual and prevalent Christianity, some slight emotional affection may be found for God. This, however, is limited by the selfishness of the creatures. Ordinarily, human hearts are divided, that is, their affections are mixed or impure. The heart of man must completely rest in God and, through him, it is obliged to love his creation. A continual checking is required to develop this necessary purity of heart.

In dealing with others, the Christianized personality strives to create peace and harmony in the world. In the purely natural life apart from God, it pays the individual to keep the world around him in a turmoil. If every one else can be placed in a disordered state, it is possible to concentrate better upon the building of one's own interest. This often becomes the strategy of rugged individualism. The concept of the mystical body of Christ requires that each Christian recognizes that he is part of the one whole.

Finally, the Christian pattern requires a willingness to suffer for the sake of his convictions. Christian people are often fearful of ridicule. They are even ready to forfeit the gift of God if they can obtain a measure of popularity in the world of time. There can be no compromise, however, between the world of darkness and that of redeemed mankind. The Christian must be ready to suffer persecution from those who have not reached or who may never attain the kingdom of heaven.

Our Lord disdained and despised a purely intellectual and rational religion. More than the human cortex must be converted. For this reason, Jesus did not come into the world as a mere philosopher, but he also brought with him a technique to train the subliminal faculties of his followers. Intellectual activity may satisfy human pride but by itself it cannot order the functioning of the human heart. The lives of countless thousands unhappy Christian people bear witness to this fact. The Church will really come to life again when human organisms are wholly conditioned by that cosmic apprehension which brings about the inversion of selfish personalities. In other words, humanity must find its unity in Jesus Christ who has purchased the kingdom for himself. As he is permitted to take full possession of his own, mankind will find that destructive selfishness tends to diminish.

Christmas in September

BY

PHILIP H. STEINMETZ

Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

A NEW idea, breaking the habits of our thought and making a real and lasting change in our life, is a rare event. When it comes, we may not be pleased, since we often prefer the familiar to the new.

That Christmas is a day in which our very best effort should be given to showing Jesus our great love for him and our joy at his birth may be such an idea to you.

When it really takes hold of you, it makes you dissatisfied with the usual ways of celebrating the day. What one woman did about it when it hit her is told in a leaflet published by The Witness, "Make Christmas Christian." September is the time to think and pray over what you are going to do about it. To make any change in the usual round of personal and community events takes a lot of doing and must be planned long before the event.

I suggest that you think over the following questions and make your plans in line with your answers to them:

1. Which of the special Christmas events in town really express our joy over the birth of Christ and which are just parties.

2. How much of the money we spend for Christmas cards, gifts, extra food, etc., is spent in order to bring joy to the one whose birthday it is?

3. What are you going to do about it in this Year of Our Lord, 1950?

Now In Autumn

BY

WILLIAM P. BARNDS

NOW that autumn has come church activities will be making a fresh start. Some guilds will resume their meeting after a summer recess. The Church schools will take a new lease on life. The every member canvass is just around the corner. Many secular activities are getting steamed up anew. Schools are starting and the usual routines connected with them. Football and hunting seasons will soon be upon us. The international situation causes us some concern, and is affecting the plans of many people.

What will be the church's claim upon our lives this autumn? Each of us has only twenty-four hours a day of time—no more no less. Some of these hours are of necessity occupied in our work, but we all have some time which we can use as we choose. As church people we ought to give church matters first place in our free time. The Christian religion is vital and in it we believe is to be found salvation for the individual's ills and for those of the whole world. There is no organization or activity more important than the Church.

Therefore when you are asked to do a church job this fall, think carefully and pray sincerely before you decline. It may be a God-given opportunity for you to serve him. What a mighty impact the Church would make upon every community if its people, each and every one, would with conviction and enthusiasm take part faithfully and intelligently in the Church's work! However, if you are enthusiastic don't load yourself with so many jobs that you can't do any of them well. If you are one who has been shirking and letting others do all the work, get in there and do your part. You'll enjoy it, your conscience will be clearer, and you will be taking part in the greatest enterprise in the world!

Make Christmas Christian

What one Churchwoman did to that end is set forth in a leaflet, together with the story of what was accomplished by her gift, written by Bishop John E. Hines of Texas. This leaflet should be sent to parishioners now in order to be most effective.

NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

METHODISTS OUST FEDERATION

Eviction of the Methodist Federation for Social Action from its tiny offices in the Methodist Building in New York was unanimously voted by the denomination's board of publication, owner of the building. The Federation, headed by the Rev. Jack McMichael, has been attacked in recent months as being too far to the left. It has been as vigorously defended by leaders and organizations of the Methodist Church. McMichael said he had learned of the action only through press reports and that the Federation has not been given a hearing. The offices have been occupied since 1919 when the secretary was Prof. Harry F. Ward of Union Seminary.

The action was taken at a board meeting of the publishing company, held in Dallas, with 50 of the 59 members present. It was also reported at this meeting that net sales for the fiscal year ending May 31 were $13,533,309, an all time record. It was also announced that a $1,500,000 expansion of the agency's printing plant in Nashville would soon be completed.

URGES EXPANSION OF WELFARE PROGRAMS

Social welfare programs must attempt to meet the total needs of the communities instead of serving only the lower income groups, it was agreed by those attending the conference of Lutheran social workers, meeting at Buffalo. It was agreed that the idea that Church welfare work is confined to handing out food and clothing is antiquated; that skilled professional workers are called upon today to do pastoral counseling, educate people in family life and child welfare, and deal with the problems of alcoholism.

A resolution directed to President Truman was passed calling upon national leaders to "establish and maintain peace in our time," with Ambrose Herring, head of the Lutheran Welfare Council of New York, stating that "we realize that it is the welfare agencies that do the work after the fighting ends."

URGES JUSTICE FOR NEGROES

Bishop W. P. Walls, Chicago, of the African M. E. Zion Church, said in Richmond, Va. that he walked the streets of this city as a "half-slave" in his own country, and called upon Negroes to seek God's help in their continuing fight against injustice. The bishop sounded the keynote for the general convention on Christian education and general assembly of Christian youth of the African M. E. Zion Church.

Bishop Walls said that for more than a century America "stood in the ranks with oppressed minorities. She was against imperialism and colonialism and fought for all the oppressed. Now for a quarter of a century or more, America has been moved into a position with strange and strangely acting allies, who have exacted of her that she defend always stagnant oppressions or new usurpations. She sheds her blood and spends her money, and when the battles are over and her friends made secure, they put the quietus on her demand for justice for small peoples . . .

"Someone says if America would only start a revolution of her own for defending the oppressed so that they could join her to aid themselves in throwing off the yoke of their oppressors, she would lift her name again into that noble tradition of helping weaker peoples to democratic freedom. She cannot do this and live forever under the scare that paints all efforts of freedom's search as Communism."

Another speaker, President Rufus E. Clement, of Atlanta University, accused the churches of being the hotbed from which the seeds of prejudice and bigotry are taken to be transplanted into all other avenues of American life.

NEWS OF CHURCHES OVERSEAS

SOUTH INDIA CHURCH ADDS NEW DIOCESE

The Church of South India, inaugurated on September 27, 1947, with the union of former Anglican, Presbyterian, Reformed, Methodist and Congregational churches, enters its fourth year with a significant step forward. The third anniversary will mark the inauguration of the new diocese of Coimbatore and the installation of A. J. Appasamy as its bishop.

About 30,000 members will be added to the Church by the creation of the new diocese, 23,000 of them Congregationalists and the rest Anglicans and Methodists. As a result, the Church will represent by far the biggest single concentration of Christian forces in India. The Church has a total of 1,100,000 members served by an ordained clergy of 575 nationals and 145 foreign missionaries. Altogether it forms more than a fifth of the entire Protestant community in India.

When the Church was formed three years ago the North Tamil Church Council (Congregationalist) voted not to join. This decision was reversed by a large majority of the Council in February of this year. As a result the new diocese of Coimbatore will be created. The diocese will be inaugurated on September 27 at the Brough Memorial Church, Erode. Bishop Frank Whittaker of Medak, acting moderator of the Church will preside over the ceremonies. Bishop Lesslie Newbigin of Madura will preach the inaugural sermon. All the bishops of the Church, together with the presbyters of the new diocese and representatives of other diocese, will be present.

Following the inaugural ceremony in the morning the installation of Bishop Appasamy will take place in the evening. On the following day, the new bishop will preside over the first diocesan Council. Bishop Appasamy is perhaps the best known Indian Christian scholar at home and abroad. He studied for three years (1915-18) at the Hartford Theological Seminary, and spent another year at Harvard University where he received Masters degree. From there he went to England where his thesis on mysticism earned for him the Ph.D. degree of Oxford University.

MARRIAGE PROPOSAL IS DEFEATED

A proposal to ban the celebration of marriages by Anglican clergymen on Ash Wednesday and between Palm Sunday and Easter eve, except for reasonable cause, was defeated, 66-58, by the lower house of the Convocation of Canterbury. Canon F. N. Didsbury of Coventry said that he was told there was a sudden rush of marriages before April 6 because people wedded prior to that date were allowed an income tax deduction for the entire year. "We should be extremely unpopular," he said, "if we made a man pay a fine by way of income tax for the whole year by refusing marriage on a certain day."

One factor in the clergy's unwillingness to perform marriages during Holy Week was said to be the knowledge that large numbers of those who request such rites are out of sympathy with the Church and merely have religious ceremonies for convenience.

ROMAN BISHOP HITS ANGLICAN STATEMENT

Much more than the dogma of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary keeps the Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church apart, the Most Rev. Cyril Cowderoy, Roman Catholic Bishop of Southward, declared in addressing members of a pilgrimage of the Knights of Columbus at Canterbury. Bishop Cowderoy challenged the recent statement by the Anglican Archbishops of Canterbury and York that the forthcoming proclamation by Pope Pius XII of the new dogma would deepen the rift among Christians. He said that such "protestations" did not "come with grace from the Archbishops of Canterbury and York."

It seems possible, the bishop said, to belong to the Church of England and at the same time to doubt such truths as the bodily resurrection and ascension of Christ, his virgin birth, and his divinity.

Anglicans could claim to be Christians, he added, and yet be able to accept divorce, justify artificial conception, and "speak with tolerance, if not favor, of the murder of the innocent under the name of enthanasia."

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

The Old Testament in the Church. By Joseph Woods. Macmillan, $1.75.

People often ask why lessons from the Old Testament are read in church. One obvious answer is that the New Testament is full of Old Testament quotations and allusions; another answer is that the mission of Jesus was understood both by him and by his disciples as the fulfillment of the message of the Old Testament. "The Gospel is a new thing, yet its connection with the religion of the Old Covenant is inescapable." The basic unity of the whole Bible lies in the self-revelation of God which joins both testaments together.

Mr. Woods' little book is a call to recover the importance of this central theme. "We are playing with fire if we treat the stories of Genesis as less important than our science." Undoubtedly this is a timely warning; but unless it is heeded judiciously and cautiously it can lead to the darkness of ignorance rather than to fire or light. "True criticism . . . is concerned with matters which at the very most are mere preliminaries to proclamation . . ." "The 110th Psalm yields the meaning which Jesus gave to it, whether it was written by David or not." Such statements skip lightly over basic theological, philosophical, and historical problems. This book should be read, but it should be read with care.—R. M. Grant.

The Gentle Infidel. By Lawrence Schoonover. Macmillan, $3.00.

This is a historical novel whose setting is the fall of Constantinople in 1453, when that great city ceased to be the capital of the Eastern Roman Empire and became the capital of the Osmanli Turkish Empire, and thereby in a sense the political capital of Islam. It is still, after five hundred years, a Moslem city, but it is also still the seat of one of the Eastern Christian Patriarchates.

A hundred years ago John Mason Neale, the hymnologist and ecclesiastical historian, wrote a similar story, Theodora Phranza or the Fall of Constantinople, writing it from the point of view of those within the doomed city. Mr. Schoonover writes his story from the point of view of the attacking Turkish army. His hero is an Italian youth, the son of a Venetian merchant who had established himself on the Turkish side of the Strait. By guile the youth is impressed into the corps of the Janissaries, brought up as a Moslem, trained as a soldier and presently as a commander in that elite corps, and takes part in the assault on and capture of the city. There he learns of the fraud by which he was impressed into the Turkish army, meets again the Anglica of his boyish love, returns to the Christian fold, and escapes to Europe among the few who got away during the sack of the city.

Dr. Neale had an intimate acquaintance with the Byzantine historians and a profound knowledge of the religious life of the eastern Mediterranean at that time. Mr. Schoonover obviously has little knowledge of either the language or the religions of the people with whom his story is concerned, but it is an interesting enough story, pleasantly told, which has a message if it reminds us of the tragic apathy among Christian nations which made possible the city's capture.—Arthur Jeffery.

Will Our Children's Children Owe to Us The Debt We Owe to Our Forefathers?

The greater part of the cost of educating our ministry is being met by the gifts of those who have gone before.

Unless Church people in our own day make their gifts and leave their legacies to our theological schools we shall not pass on our inheritance in Christ.

Youth of the Church

By JOHN BOOTY
Ex-Chairman of the

I was sitting in the snack bar of a large metropolitan university chatting with two friends when it happened. In the middle of the room two men began struggling. Soon a mob gathered and more struggle began. At the venture of the vortex was a Communist youth, a Young Progressive youth and a member of a university gang known for its unthinking violence in defense of "Americanism."

The struggle started when a member of the gang stole a number of petitions the Communist and the Young Progressive were circulating in support of a debate between an ousted Communist professor and a faculty member. The Communist and the Young Progressive sought to retaliate.

I sat on the side lines watching with my friends. Violence, anti-democratic methods, the fascist right and the radical left swirled before us in a dark nightmare. What were we to think? What were we to do? Could we close our eyes?

This overt physical struggle is an extreme example, but it is representative of the challenge which Christian youth face in our day. It is the challenge which most Episcopalian youth chose to ignore. We try to ignore it or else unthinkingly align ourselves with the status-quo, the rigid conservation of the right.

But it seems to me that if we really believe that Christ is the Lord of all life, we cannot avoid the challenge. We must face it with our faith. And if we believe that Christ is the Lord of all life, then the Christian faith is not only concerned with individual salvation but also with the transformation of the social order. But this is meant human social justice as a reflection of God's righteousness.

All social ills, all moral and political disputes, are of vital interest to the committed Christian. This does not mean that the Church must be affiliated with one party or another, but it does mean that the Church must stand for its avowed principles and its people must enter actively into the wider struggle. It seems fair to state that if the Church had been more concerned with its right participation in the world struggle for justice. Communism might not have captured the imaginations and the spirits of the Chinese.

What is needed in our youth movement and in Christian education is more concern with justice. We need to heal the seeming split between Christianity and social concern. We need to emphasize this now and act with vigor. This may call for social action emphases within the United Movement of the Church's Youth. It may call for the immediate establishment of a youth section of the Episcopal League for Social Action.

But whatever is done it must not be done wildly. It must be done with careful concern for our faith. It must issue out of faith. Many of us who grow more and more alarmed as we watch the world struggle and see its effects upon Christian thought and see the struggle within our own country, look and pray fervently that God may fill us and show us what to do in our dark but challenging days. We have seen the tremendously wonderful effects of Christian youth participating in the struggle. One example was seen at the Christian youth conference in 1948 when Communists met us on street corners and tried to convert us. Young people in their teens met these youth and found new strength and meaning in the Christian faith. These young people also met bigoted, narrow minded representatives of the extreme right and were less effective. Also at this conference a Negro delegate was refused a haircut in a YMCA barber shop. No one saw an Episcopalian come to the defense of this boy.

Methodist youth are attempting to do their part in the struggle for justice. The United Christian Youth Movement strives to uphold the principles of Christian youth in Washington. But the Episcopalians in the United Movement of the Church's Youth are largely unaware of what Bob Tesdell and UCYM are doing. Will we continue in the way of lethargy? Will we continue to deny that Christ is the Lord of all life? I pray not. William Temple's prayer concerning this might well be used by every youth group as a beginning in understanding and participating in the social adventure of the Christian Church.

"O God, the King of Righteousness, lead us, we pray Thee, in the ways of justice and of peace: inspire us to break down all tyranny and oppression, to gain for every man his due reward and from every man his due service; that each may live for all, and all may care for each, in the name of Jesus Christ."

Readers are encouraged to comment on editorials, articles and news. Since space is limited we ask that letters be brief. We reserve the right to abstract and to print only those we consider important

H. J. MAINWARING
Layman of Wollaston, Mass.

Bishop Stoney says (June 29 Witness), "We are Protestants. The Prayer Book says so, and we are pledged to abide by that."

This is curious news, and important if true.

I have carefully looked through the Prayer Book for any such statement. Where is it? On what page or pages?

In looking, I find that the legal title of the Church is "The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America," and that our ecclesiastical title is "the holy Catholic Church," and that we are required to say, at every service, that we (I) believe in "the holy Catholic Church" or "One, Catholic and Apostolic Church."

Furthermore, I find that we pray that we may "die" in the communion of "the Catholic Church." (Page 317).

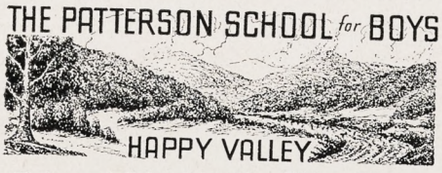
Besides all this, the Offices of Instruction (P. 291) in defining the Church, to which both Bishop Stoney and I belong, never once mention the word "Protestant." Instead we are taught there that "The Church . . . is Catholic; . . ."

Bishop Stoney seems to be reading into the Book of Common Prayer a notion which is not in it.

WILBUR L. CASWELL,
Rector St. Paul's, Yonkers, N. Y.

Thank you for rescuing the Good Samaritan from its usual use as a trite admonition to help anyone we happen to meet on the road. May I humbly add a suggestion of its chief purpose, which is usually overlooked? The Samaritan had not only to walk across the road, but to leap over a deep and wide abyss of racial prejudice. Did you hear of the Methodist minister in Georgia who told the story in modern terms, of a traveling salesman rescued by a mulatto, after a Methodist bishop and a Baptist deacon had passed him by, and paid his board at the best Atlanta hotel from which the mulatto was excluded as a guest?

JOHN B. LYTE
Rector of All Saints, Providence, R. I.



A chap, purporting to be a Mr. James Curry of All Saints', Providence, is making a tour of New England soliciting financial help from some of our clergy. During the past few days I have heard from four of the "brethren" who have been taken in.

His story in brief is that his wife died last May leaving three small children who are now living with his wife's mother in Providence. Unable to find employment in Rhode Island he claims to be seeking work wherever he finds himself to help bring the family together in that particular community. Then comes the "touch" due to his dire financial straits and the difficulty in getting employment because of failing eye-sight. He claims further to be a member of All Saints' Church and a dear personal friend of mine, telling of the great lift I gave him, financially and otherwise, when his wife died. He has been working churches both in New Hampshire and more recently in Massachusetts.

To save others, as well as myself, future embarrassment, could you give a few lines in The Witness branding this chap as a fraud and unknown to me, either as a friend or a member of All Saints' Church, Providence.

GRACE E. FRENCH

I agree with The Witness statement published in Zion's Herald, calling for negotiation through the UN to bring peace to Korea. I hope that this can be done very soon.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Episcopal Delegates Appointed For Cleveland Meeting

Convention Will Create a National Council By Merging Ten Large Agencies

★ When the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U. S. A. is constituted in Cleveland, November 28-December 3, the whole Episcopal Church is vitally concerned. Presiding Bishop Henry Sherrill said recently: "The formation of the National Council of Churches in a time of world confusion and strife, is a hopeful event of vital importance. Here is proof of the great underlying spirit of cooperation among the Churches and a promise that in action together we will face the great issues and opportunities of our time."

There are 29 regularly appointed representatives of the Episcopal Church to the constituting convention, and ten alternates. In addition, the Episcopal Church is entitled to 203 visiting delegates who may witness the convention events but who are without vote. The officially appointed representatives are: Bishop Sherrill; Bishop Karl M. Block of California; Bishop Charles C. J. Carpenter of Alabama; Bishop Henry W. Hobson of Southern Ohio; Bishop R. Bland Mitchell of Arkansas; Bishop William Scarlett of Missouri Bishop Frank W. Sterrett of Bethlehem; Bishop Harwood Sturtevant of Fond du Lac; Bishop Beverly D. Tucker of Ohio; Rev. John M. Burgess of Washington, D. C.; Rev. Gardiner M. Day, Cambridge, Mass.; Rev. John S. Higgins, Providence, R. I.; Canon G. Gardner Monks, Washington, D. C.; Dean Claude W. Sprouse, Kansas City, Mo.; Dean Frederick J. Warnecke, Newark, N. J.; *Mr. John Nicholas Brown, Providence, R. I.; Mr. W. A. Cochel, Parkville, Mo.; Mr. Peter M. Day, Milwaukee, Wis.; the Hon. Hubert T. Delaney, New York; Mr. Scott N. Jones, Dallas, Tex.; Clark G. Kuebler, Ripon, Wis.; Mr. Thomas B. K. Ringe, Philadelphia, Pa.; Dr. Spencer Miller, Jr., Springfield, Mass.; Mr. Charles P. Taft, Cincinnati, O.; Mrs. Francis O. Clarkson, Charlotte, N. C.; Mrs. Clifford C. Cowin, Lakewood, O.; Mrs. Edward G. Lasar, St. Louis, Mo.; Miss Nancy Miller, Durham, N. H.; Mrs. Harper Sibley, Rochester, N. Y. (*Executive committee alternate, Executive committee).

Alternates are: Bishop Stephen F. Bayne Jr. of Olympia, Wash.; Bishop C. Avery Mason of Dallas; Rev. John E. Large, New York; Canon Bernard C. Newman, New York; Archdeacon Anthony R. Parshley, Providence; Rev. Thorne Sparkman, Bryn Mawr, Pa.; Canon Donald H. Wattley, New Orleans, La.; Mr. Paul F. Good, Omaha, Neb.; Mr. R. O'Hara Lanier, Houston, Tex.

Among the visiting delegates will be many of the official staff of the National Council. Bishop John B. Bentley, Rev. Charles H. Long Jr., and Mr. J. Earl Fowler will go from the overseas department. Rev. George A. Wieland, Rev. Clifford L. Samuelson and Rev. Tollie L. Caution of the home department will attend. Others who will go are the Rev. John Heuss Jr., Miss Mary Margaret Brace, Miss Charlotte C. Tompkins and Canon Vesper O. Ward of the department of Christian education; Rev. Almon R. Pepper and Rev. J. Arnold Purdie of the department of Christian social relations, and from the Woman's Auxiliary will go Mrs. Arthur M. Sherman and Miss Avis E. Harvey, as consultants for the Missionary Education Movement, Miss Ellen B. Gammack, a visiting delegate for the Federal Council, Miss Edna B. Beardsley, a visiting delegate appointed by the Foreign Missions Conference, and Miss Dorothy Stabler, a consultant for the Home Missions Council. The Presiding Bishop will head the Episcopal group, he having been a member of the committee on program and procedure since its organization.

The forthcoming constituting convention has been described as "the most important gathering of non-Roman Christians in the history of the American Church." It marks the organization of an agency that will serve the interests of 27 Church bodies, including a number of the Eastern Orthodox Churches. The combined Church membership represented is over 26,000,000. There will be coordination of the activities of the various Churches in certain work in foreign and home missions, Christian education, evangelism, race relations and national and international affairs. Actually ten national agencies now in existence in the United States, serving some 50

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

Communions, will become departments of the new agency, including: the International Council of Religious Education, the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, the Missionary Education Movement, the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the Home Missions Council, the Protestant Council on Higher Education, the United Stewardship Council and the United Council of Church Women.

At the Cleveland convention, an attendance of over 6,000 is expected, with 1,200 official delegates and 5,000 visiting delegates, probably the most widely representative Church gathering ever held on the North American continent.

On December 3, the Sunday following the Cleveland convention, nation-wide services of rededication, to express thanksgiving and support for the National Council of Churches, will be held in conjunction with services in thousands of churches.

It has been pointed out by the planning committee that this new body is in no sense a merger of denominations, but that it does represent a "deliberate policy" of cooperation, which will have the effect of bringing Churches closer together. It is believed that a wider recognition of women's work in the Church will grow out of the new Council, as well as a stronger voice for laymen in Church affairs. The Council will serve as a clearing house for information and exchange of views to forward the development of a sound strategy on key issues. It is believed, too, that local churches will benefit, through increased influence in the community through relationship to a national body united for Christian service and action.

The Council first was conceived as an idea nearly ten years ago at a meeting of interdenominational agency leaders at Atlantic City. Since then the plan has grown slowly but inevitably and has been studied carefully by the agencies and the various Church groups. Under direction of the planning committees headed by Dr. Luther A. Weigle, dean emeritus of Yale University Divinity School, the Council will take form and substance at the Cleveland convention in November.

CHURCHMAN AMES IS FIRED

★ The resignation of Winslow Ames as director of the Springfield, Mo., art museum for the last three years, was accepted by the trustees on September 21 after Ames, who is an officer of the Episcopal Pacifist Fellowship, informed the members that he had written the government that he would withhold that part of his income tax going toward war purposes. Ames, who was a conscientious objector in the last war, told reporters that he and his wife would continue to live in Springfield with their five children.

GERALD BURRILL A BISHOP

★ The Rev. Gerald Francis Burrill was consecrated suffragan bishop of Dallas on September 29th at St. Matthew's Cathedral, Dallas. The consecrator was the retired Presiding Bishop, Henry St. George Tucker, with Bishop Moore, retired of Dallas, and Bishop DeWolf of Long Island the co-consecrators. He was presented by Bishop Scaife of Western New York and Bishop Quarterman of North Texas. Litanist was Bishop Jones of West Texas and the sermon was by Bishop Mason of Dallas.

ARMED SERVICES BISHOP IS URGED

★ Laymen of Central New York, meeting at Cazenovia, September 23-24, urged the election of a bishop suffragan for the armies forces and deplored the fact that no Episcopal chaplains were serving in Korea. Three weeks ago at a laymen's conference held at Manlius School a resolution was also passed urging similar action.

THE ASCENSION, Sierra Madre, Calif., has a parochial school for children from kindergarten through seventh grade. This is the class of second graders

RIGHT OF BAIL UPHELD

★ Justice Robert H. Jackson, associate of the Supreme Court, in a decision September 25, upheld the right of bail for those whose appeals have not been ruled upon by all the Courts (see editorial this issue). The ten convicted Communists had appealed to him for a ruling since he administers the 2nd district. His eight page decision stated that he acted to safeguard the right of all Americans to "equal treatment before the law," even though the Communists' pleas were "hypocritical" and "their motives evil." He said that the rights of all to equal treatment "is wrapped up in the same constitutional bundle with those of these Communists. If, in anger or disgust with these defendants, we throw out the bundle, we also cast aside protection for the liberties of more worthy critics who may be in opposition to the government of some future day."

He added: "The very essence of constitutional freedom of press and of speech is to allow more liberty than the good citizen will take. If the government cannot get at these utterances by direct persecution, it is hard to see how courts can justifiably reach and stop them by indirection. I think courts should not utilize their discretionary powers to coerce men to forego conduct as to which the Bill of Rights leaves them free."

COMMUNISM THEME OF CANVASS

★ Laymen of the diocese of Los Angeles, being prepared for the forthcoming every member canvass, were told that they should make it a campaign against "the fanatical evangelism of atheistic materialism." One of the leaders declared that "we are fighting against the infiltration of Communistic godlessness into the very life blood of this diocese and our nation."

AUXILIARY MEETING IN LOS ANGELES

★ The first of four general meetings of the Auxiliary of the diocese of Los Angeles is to be held October 10 at All Saints, Pasadena. The main topic will be social relations with Canon Richard Lief, director of the social relations department of the diocese, heading a large list of speakers.

RECTOR WALLACE BRISTOR of Our Saviour, Joliet, Montana, baptizes Toshi and Mary Hashisaki. Sponsors are Mrs. Laura Burris (center), Mrs. Josephine Bell and Mrs. Motomu Hashisaki

BETHLEHEM CLERGY IN CONFERENCE

★ Clergy and Auxiliary members of the diocese of Bethlehem meet this week at Mount Pocono, the clergy, October 2-4 and the women the three days following. Dean Hamilton Kellogg of Christ Cathedral, Houston, Texas, is giving four lectures to the clergy on pastoral care and the Rev. Arnold Purdie of the National Council's department of social service is delivering two lectures on church institutions. Layman Byron S. Miller spoke on Tuesday evening on the work of laymen and the Rev. M. M. Moore, head of promotion in the diocese, lead a discussion on the Church's mission.

Leaders at the Auxiliary conference are Mrs. Wray Congdon of Bethlehem who speaks on education; the Rev. Walter A. Hendricks Jr. of Scranton is giving meditations; the Rev. W. Francis Allison of Montrose presents visual aids. Barbara Arnold of Christ Church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; Mrs. Henry McP. Pinner, head of the Auxiliary in the province and the Rev. Arthur M. Sherman Jr. of Lehigh University, are others on the program.

CARILLON RECITALS AT ST. MARTIN'S

★ Rector John H. Johnson of St. Martin's, New York, announced last week that a series of carillon recitals would be given each Sunday evening at 6:30 through October 29th. The forty bells will be played by Carillonneur Kamiel Lefevere, world famous for his mastery of this art.

CANTERBURY PRESIDENT RESIGNS

★ The Rev. Douglas R. MacLaury has resigned as president of Canterbury College, Danville, Indiana, effective November 1st. The announcement was made on September 23d by Bishop Kirchhoffer of Indianapolis who is president of the board of trustees.

SEABURY-WESTERN OFFERS COURSES

★ "The problem within the Church is not that we have stupid clergy but that we have many clergy who cannot communicate their knowledge to the people," was the opinion expressed by the Rev. Francis W. Voelcker, who has just been made head of a department of religious education at Seabury-Western Seminary. The four courses offered by the new division are sponsored jointly by the Seminary and the department of education of the National Council.

LARGEST ENROLLMENT AT PACIFIC

★ The largest incoming class in the history of the Church Divinity School of the Pacific swelled the enrollment to a record high of 70. Three ex-Roman Catholics and seven ex-Baptists are in the new class. Prof. Charles F. Whiston led the quiet day that opened the term, with orientation lectures the following day by the former dean, Henry H. Shires, who became suffragan bishop of California on September 29. Other lecturers were Prof. Randolph Miller, Prof. Whiston, Prof. F. A. Schilling and the new professor of Church history, the Rev. Samuel M. Garrett.

No successor for Dean Shires has yet been announced.

DORA CHAPLIN is on the staff of the national department of religious education

YOUNG PEOPLE NEED COUNSELING

★ The need for greater Church participation in premarriage and post-marriage counseling was indicated in questionnaires turned in by the young people attending a conference of young married couples sponsored by the diocese of Western Massachusetts and held at Lenox School. The questions and answers:

Did you receive any counseling from a clergyman before you were married and was it helpful? 16 "yes"; 20 "no."

Had participation in Church life been of help in your marriage?

30 "yes" none "no."

What are the most common sources of tension in your home?

19 said fatigue; 17 impatience; 9 in-laws; only one said sex.

What questions regarding your family should the Church answer?

23 said the relationship of God to family life; 20 asked for more religious education; 16 said personal counseling; 15 urged marriage and sex education.

Bishop Lawrence and Chaplain John Coburn of Amherst College were the leaders.

E. P. F. URGES PEACE IN KOREA

★ At the annual conference of the Episcopal Pacifist Fellowship held at Seabury House, Greenwich, September 12 to 15, the following resolution was unanimously adopted and sent to the Secretary of State, the Hon. Warren Austin and the Hon. Trygve Lie of United Nations:

"As Christian citizens of the United States who believe that the basis of democracy is the right of every human being to freedom and justice and that the will to peace creates its own opportunity to achieve peace, we earnestly appeal to you to demonstrate the will for peace of the United States by persevering in your efforts to end the conflict in Korea.

"Specifically, we urge you to support India's proposal for the appointment of the six nonpermanent members of the Security Council as a committee to receive all proposals and formulate a plan for:

"1. A peace settlement of the Korean conflict.

"2. The establishment of a unified and independent Korea."

ALL SHARE IN COMMUNION

★ The Holy Communion service as a living and dynamic symbol of the way the atonement works through "the family of God" was made the central experience of the diocesan youth conference of the diocese of Missouri by a project in appreciation which involved the entire 97 young people and 24 staff members in attendance.

The service to conclude the conference, which was held at the Lake-of-the-Ozarks State Park, August 20 to 30, used vestments, vessels and elements made by the members of the conference with the exception of the chalice, patten and communion wine. The cruets and ciborium were made of pottery and the traditional vestments for the service were made and decorated by a committee under the direction of Miss Genevieve Albers, parish worker, at St. Stephen's Church, St. Louis; and the altar bread was made by another group working with Mrs. A. Malcolm MacMillan, wife of the rector of the Church of the Ascension, St. Louis. The altar and a hanging cross were also their manufacture.

Mr. MacMillan was the director of the whole project and the celebrant at the service. The Rev. W. Murray Kenney, rector of St. Mark's Church, St. Louis, and dean of the conference was the preacher. The young people also provided a choir which was directed by Benjamin Harrison, organist and choirmaster of the Church of the Ascension, St. Louis.

When the procession of the elements took place at the offertory, this communion service represented the act of a conference group which felt itself thoroughly identified with the service. The service completed the conference theme, based on the third paragraph of the Apostles' Creed, as outlined by the leader, the Rev. Edward T. Adkins, rector of St. Paul's Church, Overland.

SUMMER SCHOOLS IN OKLAHOMA

★ The Redeemer, Okmulgee, Oklahoma, has completed a summer program of education with success; first a vacation school in June and then a religious story hour in August. Vern Jones, student at General Seminary, arranged and conducted both programs, assisted by a number of college students who were given hospitality in the home of parishioners. Rector G. C. Stutzer reports that the programs were not only valuable for the large number of children who enrolled but that the college students gained valuable experience in teaching.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION PROGRAM

★ The diocese of Western New York opened a series of meetings for Church school leaders at the Good Shepherd, Buffalo, on September 18th when the Rev. Donald Crawford of New York City was the leader. All of the meetings, to be held every other month through May, have been planned by Mrs. Eldon F. French, who is the chairman of the program committee.

At each meeting there will be a round table discussion panel composed of the following clergy of the diocese: Rev. Kenneth Hallett, canon of St. Paul's Cathedral; Rev. Richard B. Townsend, rector of St. Mark's Church; Rev. John W. Talbott, rector of St. Andrew's Church; and the Very Rev. Samuel N. Baxter, archdeacon of the diocese. The moderator will be Mrs. R. Howard Smith of the Church of the Good Shepherd.

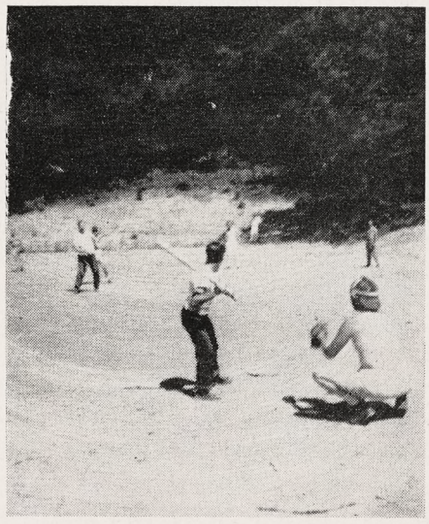
This will be followed by a workshop, divided into four distinct groups. Visual education under Mrs. Kenneth Whittenberger of St. Mary's, and Miss Loretta Seibert of St. Matthew's Church. "Knowing the child" will be the theme for Miss Edna Evans of Trinity Church. "Teaching Techniques" will be taken up by the Rev. Harry J. Vere, rector of Trinity Church, Fredonia. An open forum for clergy will consider "Child Development" under Dr. Maurice H. Fouracre, professor at State Teachers' College. There will be a different phase of these subjects taken up at each meeting.

The visual education group will take up "Its place and how to select and use it"; slides and films, seasonal handwork, and the flannel-board.

The group "Knowing the child" will think through, "Does knowing the child make a difference."

TYPHOON HITS ORPHANAGE

★ One of the Japanese Church's best-known institutions, the Widely Loving Society of Osaka, which grew out of work started nearly ninety years ago by Bishop Channing Moore Williams, was badly damaged in the typhoon of September 3. The orphanage has been caring for 300 children, 2 to 18 years, mostly orphaned in the recent war. The greater number are aged 5 to 10.



They fled to the building of the Bishop Williams Memorial Church where fortunately all were safe. Following the high wind, a tidal wave sweeping up the river from Osaka Bay, flooded the orphanage grounds and also cut off the electric power for four days. Relief work was carried on from rafts, and in total darkness at night. Three homes, dispensary, primary school and meeting hall were severely damaged, and elsewhere roofs, windows, doors, and walls were "deadly injured," in the words of the director, the Rev. P. T. Yabumoto. He adds that Mrs. K. Kobashi, the president of the Widely Loving Society, and all the staff "are exerting for recovery with faith in God and courage."

OPPOSE RECOGNITION OF CHINA

★ The Rev. Samuel Shoemaker, rector of Calvary, New York, is among the 300 persons to address a communication to the U.S. government urging that the People's Republic of China be not recognized. Americans who profess friendship for the Chinese people can best express this sentiment, the statement declared, by giving military support and medical and food supplies to the Nationalists on Formosa.

LARGE ENROLLMENT AT VIRGINIA

★ Virginia Seminary opened with an enrollment of 178, the largest in its history. There are 74 new students, also a record. One is from Cuba and three from Japan.

BASEBALL is a favorite pastime at all Church conferences. This game is at the Cathedral Domain of the diocese of Lexington

The Right to Bail

A DOZEN or more years ago there was a young clergyman and his wife doing a fine job in directing welfare institutions of the Presbyterian Church in Albany. As so often happens with people who run orphanages, old peoples homes and relief agencies, he soon asked himself what was wrong with a society that made such agencies necessary. This inquiry brought him into active membership in the United Christian Council for Democracy, an inter-church organization which aimed at discovering and curing, insofar as it could, evils that exist in our society.

The Rev. Richard Morford soon became the executive head of the UCCD where he did a remarkable job on very limited resources. When it folded for lack of funds, he was elected the director of the National Council for American-Soviet Friendship. This was in those days when Secretaries of State, Generals, Admirals and Bishops considered it an honor to speak at the mass meetings sponsored by the Council. But the young clergyman continued to be an ardent worker for peace, based on American-Soviet friendship, after such efforts no longer had the approval of the administration in Washington. So he was eventually called before the Committee on Un-American Activities where he was asked to produce the records of the Council, including the names of all those who had contributed anything whatever to its work. This he refused to do, knowing that to do so would work hardships on these people in these days of hysterical witch-hunting. He therefore was cited for contempt of Congress and convicted. For months his case has been before the courts, and is still to come before the U.S. Supreme Court. But whether the highest court of our country finds him innocent or guilty, Morford will have already served his sentence, since he is now serving a three months' term in a federal prison.

This is a contradiction and denial of the traditional American legal procedure of due process, since denial of bail and imprisonment, before his case has been reviewed by the Supreme Court, are part and parcel of the whole current process of suppression of free speech and intimidation. That the courts are not unaware of the threat to traditional Constitutional guarantees can be seen in the action of the Federal Court of Appeals in San Francisco in rebuking the Attorney General for attempting to deny bail to Harry Bridges on the ground that he made statements unsympathetic to the war in Korea. Said this Court:

"However hard and disagreeable may be the task in times of popular passion and excitement it is the duty of the courts to set their faces like flint against the erosive subversion of the judicial process . . ."

The general proposition that a man charged or convicted of a crime may be denied bail on the ground that he opposes a policy of the executive branch of the government, said the Court, is "without precedent in the history of the Republic and is "as startling as it is novel."

The importance of bail, we are sure, will be obvious to every reader. Its origin is integrally connected with the presumption of innocence until proved guilty, the very cornerstone of our system of law. If a man may be imprisoned without bail before the conclusion of his rights of appeal, he may serve a sentence, only later to be found not guilty. Certainly it is a mockery to say that one is presumed innocent, and has a right of appeal, if one must nevertheless languish in jail before conviction or during appeal. Even more serious, how does it conform to our American concepts of freedom of speech and thought to deny bail and put a man in jail because he disagrees with a policy of government?

We believe that those who propose to fight for our basic rights should write the Attorney General in Washington asking that he use his office to defend, rather than to attack, the traditional American right to bail.

"QUOTES"

ALMIGHTY GOD, who hast created man in thy own image; Grant us grace fearlessly to contend against evil, and to make no peace with oppression; and, that we may reverently use our freedom, help us to employ it in the maintenance of justice among men and nations, to the glory of thy holy Name; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Holy Communion Is Sedition

BY CHAD WALSH
Contributing Editor of The Witness

PART TWO

HOLY COMMUNION is sedition. It is a symbol and means of revolt against individualism (of the rugged sort), collectivism (of every sort) and practically every other ism. The Russian commissar and the weightier members of the N.A.M. have equal reason to be suspicious of it.

In my first article we saw that when the members of the Church kneel at the communion rail, they have two things in common: they are partaking of a meal together, which is a symbol of friendship and love; and they are sinners and have said so before they go to the rail.

Viewed from the perspective of the communion rail, an ideal society would be one in which every individual had, at least potentially, a relationship to every other individual. There cannot be any hidden reservations, any categories of mankind that are relegated to outer darkness. No man who has caught the implications of the common meal shared in Holy Communion can say to himself, "I'll love everybody except the Negroes," or "I love all humanity except the Jews," or "Every man is my brother except the capitalists," or "Every man is my brother except John L. Lewis." We dare not be more exclusive than God. His heaven has no restrictive clauses, and we humans write them into our real estate leases at the risk of slamming the door on God as well as on the particular ethnic groups we want to keep out.

Another thing we learn from Holy Communion is that the basis of a good society can never be the virtues and righteousness of its members. It helps if there are some virtues floating around, but there are never enough to justify complacency. A tolerable society is not an association of virtuous men, but rather a community of people who know all too well how unrighteous they are, and who can therefore humbly work together to help one another.

Nothing is more divisive than a feeling of righteousness. If anyone doubts this, let him look at the current tug of war between America and the Soviet Union. It is hard to say which nation behaves more like a self-righteous Pharisee. Nothing would promote peace between the two countries more effectively than the simple recognition on the part of each that it is selfish and guilty of disgraceful social conditions. But instead, each one focuses its telescope on the other, and draws careful diagrams of the other's sins.

Three Relationships

LET us return now to the Communion service and look at it from another angle. The service involves three different relationships.

The first is the individual and God. There is a private corner of each person's soul which is known only to God. The individual makes the general confession, but God reads his mind and knows the specific sins that he is repenting. And when the individual goes to the rail, he individually gives himself to Christ and individually receives Christ.

The second relationship is that of the Church and God. By the Church I mean the true, universal Church, whose visible unity has been destroyed by schisms, but which is visible enough to God and probably also to the Devil. The Church as a whole—the Christians, living and dead—are united in a relationship with God. When each of us goes to the rail to receive Holy Communion, he receives it not only as an individual but also as a member or "organ" of the Church.

In the third place, there is the relationship of each individual communicant to the other communicants. This is a relationship that would not exist if it were not for God. If God, in the person of Christ, has not established the sacrament, there would be no Holy Communion. If God were not always present to work an unseen change in the bread and wine, we would be the most deluded and silly of people to go through the elaborate ritual. We share in common the faith that what we receive is more than any other bread or wine—because God is at work in and through it.

All of this is an elaborate way of saying that God is involved in every relationship that exists in Holy Communion. He is the initiator; he began the whole business; he keeps it going; without him we would be the most deluded of men to keep up the custom.

It is the same way in society. With God left out of the picture, human relationships deteriorate. Demonic impulses spread on a mass scale.

Men change from men into something less attractive and more dangerous than wild animals. People begin going off on demented tangents, and soon such moral aberrations as enthanasia and the torture chamber are taken for granted.

I need hardly point out how the history of the last hundred years has substantiated this generalization. When God goes out the front door, the demons swarm up from the cellar.

This means that a secular, humanistic society is, in the long run, an utter impossibility. It has only its own resources to draw on, and these are not enough. Bit by bit, it drifts off on perverted, violent tangents. Men cannot create the Kingdom of God without God, but they can easily create the Kingdom of hell. In fact, they have already done so over large parts of the earth.

Anglo-Catholics

A SOCIETY that hopes to endure must therefore be religious. And here we come to what is one of the most important aspects of Holy Communion. If society is going to be Christian, it can only be so if its members are Christians and trying to live a Christian life. This is one of the most difficult of all accomplishments. We can receive spiritual strength and wisdom through prayer, through obedience to God, and through many other channels we only half recognize. But Holy Communion stands somewhat apart—it is a completely objective, even physical, channel of strength and understanding. It is a means of imparting grace to humans who are both spirit and animal. The experience of literally millions of Christians for nearly two thousand years has shown its crucial importance in the Christian life.

It is clear that Holy Communion is a complex thing. It is a symbol of right relationship—of a society united in devotion to God, united also in a humble individual awareness of sin; a society in which no barriers of race or class are permitted to stand between men. It also points toward a society which is neither atomistic nor collectivistic, but one in which men freely choose to serve the common good because they love God and therefore love their neighbors.

But Holy Communion is more than a symbol—it is a supernatural source of strength and understanding, created by Christ to aid the individual Christian. In the long run, the individual—thus strengthened and enlightened—is better able to work for the kind of society implied by the sacrament itself.

I cannot help thinking that all factions in the Episcopal Church badly need to rethink—or at least think through—their attitudes toward Holy Communion. If this were done, I believe the sacrament would become a meeting place and bond of unity between the Anglo-Catholics and the Evangelicals, rather than something to argue about, as it too often is today.

What is the characteristic mistake of the Anglo-Catholic, when it comes to Holy Communion? Surely his greatest temptation is to spend so much loving care on the trappings—incense, sanctus bells, and all the rest—that the service quietly degenerates into ritual for ritual's sake, and its mysticism evolves into magic. There is also the ever-present danger that the individual communicant will be so overwhelmed by the personal significance of the sacrament that he will seldom be aware of its corporate, social meaning.

I do not say that these false emphases are characteristic of Anglo-Catholicism. From my own observation, the opposite is decidedly true. A relatively small percentage of Anglo-Catholics really value the icing more than the cake. But the temptation is constantly there, and some Anglo-Catholics do fall ker-plunk into the trap.

Evangelicals

WHAT is the characteristic mistake of the Evangelical? He decides that whatever the Anglo-Catholics like must be wrong. He views the frequent celebration of Holy Communion as the first step toward rosaries, "Father" instead of "Mister," and the jangling of sanctus bells. As a consequence, he stolidly pushes his way through the dignified placidity of Morning Prayer three Sundays out of four. In so doing, he takes a service which is admirable for private devotions and forces it into a public role for which it is eminently unsuitable. The reposeful cadences of Morning Prayer are not likely to arouse anyone to a deepened concern for society, nor can Morning Prayer compare with Holy Communion as a direct source of spiritual strength. (After all, Holy Communion is prayer plus something else!)

But actually, need the matter be argued? Holy Communion was the usual public religious service of the primitive Church, and it is the only one specifically established by Christ himself. The Episcopal Church will not be fully obedient to the plans of its founder until it returns to the practice of the primitive Church: the Eucharist as the normal mode of Sunday worship. But the cake is more important than the icing. I personally like a moderate use of the trimmings—candles, vestments, etc.—but it is far more in accordance with the will of Christ to have a service of Holy Communion with the priest dressed in a cassock and no candles on the altar, than to offer, Sunday after Sunday, the most elaborately dressed up versions of Morning Prayer.

But perhaps most important of all—Episcopalians of every sort need to wake up to the meaning of the sacrament—not just its individual meaning, but what it implies about society. This should be frequently hammered home from the pulpit. It should be hashed out in study groups. It should be a part of confirmation instruction. The more clearly this is understood, the less danger there is of turning the service into an esthetic binge. Rather, it will become an act of revolt against the shallow assumption of a dying, secular world, and at the same time a source of strength and reconstruction and new life—not only for the individual, but for his world.

Agent of a Foreign Power

BY
CLAUDE C. WILLIAMS
Clergyman of the Presbyterian Church

The following letter was sent to the President just prior to the passage of the Wood-McCarran bill.

President Harry S. Truman,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.

ATTENTION: The Department of Justice

HONORABLE SIR: In light of certain legislation pending before the Congress, and of its implications to the religious freedoms and civil liberties of our country; in light of the Kingdom of God teachings of the Scriptures, and of their implications for peace and happiness to the world; I, Claude C. Williams, as a colonist of the Kingdom of Heaven wish to register as a representative of a foreign power.

I am a member of the WAY: the Way of Righteousness as set forth in the Bible, the Way "persecuted even unto the death" by Saul of Tarsus. "This Way" is the oldest underground movement of history, and the most effective; the most effective because it has been and is an uncompromising fight with the people against subjugation and oppression and a fight with them for freedom and justice. Its most worthy work in our own country was done with the Underground Railroad when sold and bought people in the South were helped to freedom.

My Commission, Sir, from the Captain of This Way is to "Preach the Gospel in every nation, to proclaim Good News to the poor of all nations and peoples and kindreds and tongues."

Our program, Sir, is Peace on earth, good will toward all men everywhere.

Our goal, Sir, is to conquer the world. Our method is peaceful penetration. Our weapon is Love. And our slogan is, "Obey God rather than men."

THIS Way pre-dates any political or non-political system of the present-day world. It has never been nor can it ever be incorporated under any political state; neither has it submitted its conscience to the decree of kings nor to the legal opinion of courts. The world charter of this movement was given to Abraham, reaffirmed to Isaac and confirmed to Jacob. Its beginning was as a slave uprising in Egypt, a rebellion of subjugated people against tyranny and a struggle to have their own religion, land and government.

Whenever people have sought these inalienable rights, from Egypt through to Rome, Germany, England to our own America, oppressive forces have "outlawed" the movement as being subversive, condemned its members as heretics and imprisoned its leaders as criminals.

The beasts of Babylon have always sought to "devour and break in pieces, and stamp the residue with their feet." But today the peoples of the whole earth are rising up, rising up to throw off the yoke of oppressors and to have their own land and government and religion free from outside interference. This is the Way, Sir, "and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

I am proud to be a witness for This Way. My membership in it is voluntary. My work with it is from conviction.

NOW I do not know where the Kingdom of God is. But the current morality of your government clearly shows it is not here.

I shall pray and continue to work for its coming upon all the earth, which work will most certainly be considered subversive by your present Department of Justice. Moreover, it seems clear to me there are agents of Mammon within your government who would even now "Shut up the kingdom of heaven against men; who will not go in themselves, neither permit those who would enter to go in;" and who, unless their plan is opposed quickly and effectively, will surely make it a political offense to preach the Gospel of the Kingdom of God in the United States of America. This I suspect is the real purpose of, and am sure will be a use made of, the so-called anti-communist bill which was passed in the Senate today by a vote of seventy to seven; and which bill you yourself have expressed some fear of being misused.

I am personally convinced such "wickedness in high places" must be opposed by every person who "knows the truth and by the truth has been made free." And to oppose this wickedness in every way conscience will permit, to respectfully ask you, Sir, to oppose it with every means of your high office, and the hope of enlisting other persons to oppose it, are reasons I feel it is my religious duty to register as an agent of the Kingdom to which I owe and as a minister of the Gospel have vowed allegiance.

In the name of Him who was called the Prince of Peace and who said, "The field is the world," I am,

Sincerely yours,
(Rev.) Claude C. Williams

"Service"

BY

WALTER LOWRIE
Former Rector at Rome, Italy

IN the last revision of the American Book of Common Prayer the liturgy was aptly restored to its Catholic form, but unfortunately the attempt to introduce prayers for the dead resulted in a formula which is anything but Catholic. In the liturgy we are now required to pray that those who depart hence in the Lord may "continue to grow in love and service," and in the burial office that they may "go from strength to strength in the life of perfect service, in thy heavenly kingdom." Perhaps even so brief an expression of care for loved ones departed, natural as this is in itself, and supported as it is by ancient tradition, could not have been introduced into our Prayer Book in the face of an inveterate prejudice, if it had not been couched in a form peculiarly congenial to our American activism which combines the idea of progress with that of active service.

About the evolutionary philosophy which underlies the notion of continual growth and progress I say nothing here except to remark that progress belongs to time, not to eternity, and that growth in "strength" prolonged to infinity would result in infinite power.

I am more concerned about the word "service." Traditionally, and from the very beginning of the Christian religion, heaven was regarded as a place of rest and refreshment, as the end of a toilsome journey. "Eternal rest" and refrigerium is the Catholic expression of this cheerful hope.

It is true that service is enjoined upon Christians during their earthly life. But this is a precept of interim ethics: we serve here, but we shall reign with Christ in heaven. Extravagant as this hope is, it is confirmed by St. Paul, and he merely generalized the promise Jesus made to his twelve apostles.

We Are Presumptuous

BUT our notion of service as applied to the earthly life is sometimes presumptuous, implying that God stands in need of our help. Our American optimism, which could be quenched only by two world wars, did not express our faith in God but was founded (far less securely) upon the belief that with man all things are possible. This belief was not diminished by the first war, and in the interval between the two wars it was expressed in the most offensive form by the highest authority of the Episcopal Church, that is, by the National Council, which in sending to all the children mite-boxes in which they were to make their Lenten offering printed upon them this proud inscription: "God has no hands but our hands." Perhaps no words more injurious to Almighty God have ever been uttered by men who profess and call themselves Christians, for the Bible speaks emphatically of God's omnipotent hand and of his stretched-out arm. Alas, this is what many people mean by "service."

Closely akin to this is our notion that God's kingdom on earth can be brought about only by human effort. It is even more intolerable when this notion of service is associated with the "heavenly kingdom," for it is notorious that in heaven God is adequately served by myriads of angels.

Although our optimism about man has by this time been only too thoroughly discredited, one can hardly venture to hope that the Satanic notion of heaven now expressed in our liturgy will soon be eliminated—the notion Satan expressed by the saying, "Better to rule in hell than serve in heaven." Yet perhaps this might be accomplished by a slight change of words which not many would notice. Instead of saying "perfect service" we might write "perfect obedience," with the understanding that obedience to God is perfect freedom. Even on this earth, as Samuel said to Saul, "to obey is better than sacrifice"—better, that is, than any sort of meritorious service.

God himself had need of rest after the six days of creation. How much more his frail creature man after perhaps three score years and ten, during which he labored for a while as the servant of sin, then bravely withstood this cruel master who pays no wages but death, and then, for I don't know how many years, has borne the meek yoke of Christ, verifying the promise that it is "easy," though it gave him no rest. I am fain therefore to believe with the author of the epistle to the Hebrews that "there remaineth yet a rest for the people of God."

Facing Intellectual Difficulties

BY

WILLIAM H. MARMION
Rector of St. Andrew's, Wilmington

AS we watch our young people go off to college, many of them for the first time, we are reminded of the recent statement of one of our student pastors as to the state of religion on the campus. The undergraduate attitude toward religion, he said, is this: "Polite skepticism mixed with wistfulness." One of the reasons for this is that for the first time many of our young people find themselves in an atmosphere of free and open discussion where no subjects are barred. In the classrooms and especially in the informality of their bull sessions they find their most cherished beliefs subjected to the harshest and most brutal scrutiny.

Those of us who have come through our periods of intellectual doubt are not bothered by these matters any more. We don't have all the answers about religion and life, but at least we have thought things out and we have won through to a certainty of faith which is intellectually respectable and spiritually satisfying.

Not so the youth who finds himself at a loss to answer the myriad of questions his professors and fellow students ask him about his faith. Too often he falls an easy prey because of his ignorance of the facts of Christianity. Such comments as: "You can't believe in evolution and still be a Christian" or "That man is a hypocrite because he goes to church" show an utter confusion about what Christianity is and what the Church is supposed to do.

Also, a college chaplain reminds us, "the naive student is victimized by a distortation of the true scientific method that states that the only things that count are the things you can see and touch and examine. This distortion denies the existence of trust, honesty, remorse, guilt, faith, love. Yet it is upon these intangibles that all human relationships exist and flourish." Truth is arrived at not merely by the scientific approach but by the artistic and the religious as well. This is something to remember as we face intellectual difficulties, especially those connected with the literature of the Bible.

The gospels are full of stories of miracles performed by our Lord. St. Mark especially presents Jesus quite simply and naturally as the supernatural Son of God, whose power to work miracles is taken for granted by himself and others. St. Mark didn't have any trouble believing these miracles, but many people today do have trouble believing them, and in this scientific and philosophic age we must face this trouble and discuss it frankly. In Apostolic days the belief that Jesus worked miracles was part of the basis of faith in him as the supernatural Son of Man. Today the miraculous element in the gospels cannot possibly have the same value or meaning for us.

I do not mean to imply in any way that we are justified in throwing out any accounts of miracles. That would be foolish, because there is a reason for these accounts and they convey much truth. I simply mean that we should recognize the difficulty these stories present to the modern mind and that we in the Church must deal sympathetically with those who are asking questions about them.

Theory of Evolution

ONE question which is a perennial with students in college has to do with the theory of evolution. These students want to know what the Church teaches. Was man created by God or by some scientific force? Is man descended from the ape or not? What about the story of Adam and Eve?

I have always answered these students by saying that the Episcopal Church accepts the assured results of science and scholarship. One of these is the doctrine or principle of evolution, namely, that all life is the results of growth including the life of mankind on this earth. This does not mean, however, that we are committed to any particular theory of evolution or that we have to believe that man is descended from the ape. And it certainly doesn't bow God out of the picture. On the contrary, we believe that the power behind this universe as Creator is a beneficent, superhuman being whom we call God and that he is also imminent in the world as Holy Spirit. Science gives us information as to the method of creation and thus makes a contribution to our knowledge of the ways of God. The Genesis story of Adam and Eve is a beautiful story in the form of a myth which gives us many spiritual truths about the frailities of human nature, but it certainly is not to be taken as a scientific account of the creation of man. Rather, its purpose is to teach us about God's dealings with human beings. Look at it this way, Shakespeare's Hamlet is a classic of literature giving many insights into personality, but it is not necessary for us to expect it to be an accurate history of Denmark. So with Genesis, its truth is poetic, spiritual, moral; not scientific, yet it is truth nevertheless.

As for man being created by some scientific force, how can the creature be greater than the creator? If man is the product of evolution, which we believe he is, then the power behind evolution must at least have the same qualities as man, such as intelligence, personality, spirituality. That rules out mere scientific force, which is impersonal, and points definitely to a supreme being who has many of the attributes of man, though not man's limitations.

Life After Death

ANOTHER question often asked refers to life after death. As one person wrote, "It is impossible for me to comprehend that when I die I will go to heaven or hell, as the case may be. The Catholics claim that your soul leaves your body, and that it has eternal life. This seems too wonderful but I just can't understand it. Is there anything that you could tell me that would make me see this and believe it?"

Well, in regard to eternal life, we know that the human race, though not all individuals, has consistently refused to believe that death ends all. Plato said that an eternity is required for a person to realize all his possibilities. Admittedly, it is difficult for us to conceive of life after death. It can neither be disproved nor proved. But it is consistent with our belief in a God who created us, and loves and cares for us. It is a corollary of the belief in the infinite worth of the individual person. Why should God take many billions of years to produce a spiritual being like man, only to snuff him out after three score years and ten? Our universe shows order, regularity, intelligence. It is rational. It's not a madhouse (even though men, themselves, may go mad). We can trust the power behind our world for so many things—winter and summer, seedtime and harvest—then why not with our human destiny?

As for heaven or hell, they are spiritual states, not places. Heaven is where God is, and hell is where God is not. If you are close to God, here or hereafter, you are "in heaven." If not, you are "in hell." And the terms are relative, too. We need not worry over these matters as long as we believe in God, love him and trust him. Neither should we bother over much about the details of a future life. Who knows about it? Do the scientists know any more than anybody else?

The Miracles

ONCE more, there is the question of the miracles of Christ. They don't seem to fit in with scientific conceptions too well either. What can we say about them?

By definition a miracle is an alleged event that does not fit into the known laws of life. I believe we should attempt to account for every "miracle" first by the operation of natural law if we can. Thus, we speak of the "miracle" of production in the U. S. in the war or a miracle operation performed by a great surgeon. I believe many of the so-called miracles of Jesus were in this category, great acts performed by a great person. But how about the raising of Jairus' daughter from the dead and Jesus' walking on the water? I don't think we can be dogmatic one way or the other about these matters. But in line with my suggestion of seeking natural explanations first I would point out that Jesus said in regard to the "dead" girl, "She is not dead but sleepeth"—either a poetic allusion to death or a factual diagnosis different from the others. If the child actually was dead, I must admit I don't know how she could have been brought back to life and that goes for the raising of Lazarus, too. Still, we don't have all the details of the incidents. What appeared a miracle to the ancients might be explained easily today by our scientifically advanced minds. But I would not rule out miracles. Dr. Alexis Carrel, a scientist, claims he saw a cancerous sore shrivel up before his eyes and says he cannot explain it except as the result of prayer. As for the purported incident of Jesus' walking on the water, I can see no reason at all why that should have happened. Even if true, it adds nothing to the moral stature of Christ. Our Lord himself consistently refused to give "signs" or perform "wonders" just to make people stare. All kinds of great acts were attributed to great persons, and I believe this is such a case. Or perhaps the disciples, in the mist-covered sea, thought they saw Jesus walking on the water when he was actually walking on the bank. Anyway, a story like that is naturally heightened or embroidered on as time goes on and that may account for the miracle. However, I do not say dogmatically it did not happen. Who can say that? It's still true that "there are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

Finally, as to the miracle of the resurrection, I believe that unreservedly, not because I can explain it, or because it is easy to believe, but because I can't explain the long life of the Christian Church without it—because I can't believe Christian heroes and martyrs and saints and philosophers have been duped all these years by a myth.

Christ himself is the greatest miracle. Can anyone explain him by natural laws? Has anyone ever done it? Many have tried to analyse Christ. They scientifically dissect him, so to speak, and neatly label everything he did as this and that, and think they have captured Christ. But Jesus eludes them. He is greater than all our explanations of him.

Professor Frederick Grant of Union Seminary and Witness book editor questions the wisdom of trying to argue people into Christianity by setting forth the claims of a pre-critical age. He doubts if they ever converted a single skeptic. Those claims were all right for an earlier day, but we today have other claims which are just as valid and are more persuasive because they are more congenial to the mind of the twentieth century. As my conclusion I leave with you this statement of Professor Grant:

"Unless the Christ of the gospels himself speaks to us, unless the miracle of his person—not merely of his deeds—captures our imagination and devotion, fires our enthusiasm, inspires our wills to response and obedience, unless we recognize that he, and he only 'has the words of eternal life,' then our time will be wasted in trying to prove or to disprove the 'claims' men later made for him in his name. But I believe the modern approach to the gospels not only clears the way to a better understanding of their origin and to a clearer view of the Lord whose records they enshrine, but really leads us to the affirmation of faith."

A Holy Show in Five Acts

BY

GORDON C. GRAHAM

THE drama of the Breaking of the Bread is an expression both of something human and something divine. Looking at it first from the human viewpoint shows it to be a play about what happens to some bread. First the bread is prepared by being manufactured and brought into the church. This is accompanied by prayers and lessons to teach the people the meaning of what they are about to do. It is the act of preparation, extending from the introit hymn until after the sermon. Secondly, the bread is offered on the altar, together with the money and prayers of the congregation. This is the offertory act and it goes from the actual presentation of the gifts up to the preface. Thirdly, the bread is blessed by the words of Jesus that link it with his death on the cross, by which it becomes a worthy offering. It is the act of consecration and finishes after the Lord's Prayer. Fourthly, this consecrated bread (and wine) is fed to the people. It is the act of communion and is over immediately after the people have received. Lastly, there is the act of dismissal when the people are blessed and sent out again to their life in the world. It is a drama in five acts founded upon the function of bread in expressing human values which may be made worthy of being offered to God.

The Eucharist as a divine expression goes back historically to the life of Christ, showing what he did. It, too, is a drama in five acts. In his preparation our Lord was getting ready for bringing in his kingdom by teaching the people and making ready his followers. It is the longest part of his life. Our Lord's offertory was the Last Supper when he presented his body and blood as a sacrifice for the sins of the world by the act of breaking the bread and pouring out the wine. By this act he pointed to his coming death and invested it with its sacrificial significance. "This is my body," he said as he broke the bread, "Do this for the recalling of me." It was by his death that he redeemed the world; so it is the act of sacrifice or consecration and the crisis of his life. God, however, was not to be defeated and our Lord was raised up to give new life to his apostles. The resurrection is the act of communion as on the road to Emmaus "He was known to them in the breaking of the bread." The last act, the act of dismissal, is the ascension when he gave his missionary charge to his followers to go and teach, be witnesses, and feed the flock.

The drama in five acts is double-sided working in two ways—the human approaching the divine, the divine approaching the human, and both working out towards the world. There is the human preparation of the bread, and our Lord getting ready for his kingdom. This is followed by the offering of the bread as the expression of the people's life, and our Lord designating, also, the bread as "his body." Then, both are united by his sacrificial death which is re-presented in the consecration and the risen life of his redemptive grace is given in Holy Communion. The conclusion takes the life and work of Christ into the world as the participants are sent out by their Lord to carry on what he began.

How Could You?

BY

PHILIP H. STEINMETZ

Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

HAS your wife (or husband or parent) ever asked: "O how could you?" after a particularly selfish or stupid move on your part? It is the natural question of a person who loves you and is saddened by your failure to see and do what is right in love's sight.

The answer is that we could because we were looking only at what we wanted and not at the effect of our act on others. How would you be angry at your son and hurt him so that he cried? Because he came in and tracked mud over the floor you had just cleaned or raced through the living room and smashed your favorite pipe. Over and over you had warned him about muddy boots and running in the house. Looking at the wreckage your patience ran out and you blew your top.

For the same reason we continue to offend God, to ignore his love, to feel that it is too much effort to get to church or that we are justified in suspecting or hurting some one of his children even though we know such conduct holds him on the cross. How could we line up with others to crucify the Lord? Simply by keeping our own desires constantly in sight so that we do not notice how we hurt God.

But there is another question over which I wonder. How can God love us and find it in his heart to forgive us again and again and always to leave open a way of reconciliation and even to come to meet us on the way, hanging in our sight and saying: "Father, forgive them . . ." Only God knows how he can love us but we can thank God that he does love us.

A Hurricane Lamp

By CORWIN C. ROACH

The Dean of Bexley Hall

IT was with right instinct as well as sound scholarship that the recent revision took "The darkness has not overcome it"—John 1:5, out of the margin and put it into the text. It should be put into the text of every Christian's faith. The light of Christ is a hurricane lamp which no darkness can put out. The author of this gospel verse was writing at the close of the first century. He had witnessed the persecutions of Nero and was now writing, perhaps in the midst of those of Domitian. Yet he can say that with Christ a new light has come to man which all the powers of evil have not been able to extinguish.

Sometimes, in the centuries since, that light has been obscured and hidden. We think of the Dark Ages of Europe but more immediately of the blackout of civilization in our own day. We echo the sad words of the English statesman who saw the lights of Europe going out one by one and hardly to be relit in his lifetime.

Yet if those lights are ever to be rekindled it must be from that one torch which has never gone out. That light shines still in the darkness, and the darkness has not, nor ever will, overcome it. That is the Christian faith. It was made a fact in the first century because men were willing to die to make it come true. What are we willing to venture in our century that the eternal light of Christ may lighten a sin-darkened world?

Make Christmas Christian

What one Churchwoman did to that end is set forth in a leaflet, together with the story of what was accomplished by her gift, written by Bishop John E. Hines of Texas. This leaflet should be sent to parishioners now in order to be most effective.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

MISSOURI PARISH STARTS BUILDING

★ Christ Church, Rolla, Mo., launched a building program this summer consisting of a new church and the rehabilitation of the parish house. The church, begun eighty years ago, ministers also to the students of the Missouri School of Mines so that the parish house will also serve as a student center. It is expected that the new plant will be ready for consecration in the spring, announced the Rev. O. V. Jackson, now in his 20th year as rector.

GUARD FREEDOM SAYS LAYMAN

★ President C. H. Greenewalt of the DuPont Co. told laymen of Delaware at a conference that "the Church is freedom's watchdog, first and foremost. It is the duty of every Christian Church in every community to watch for any infringement of personal freedom and liberty and to deny promptly and vigorously the validity of any such betrayal of individual dignity."

CONSENT WITHHELD ON RICHARDS

★ Another standing committee has voted not to approve the election of the Rev. Mr. Richards as suffragan of Albany. By a unanimous vote, the standing committee of Central New York, which borders on Albany, voted to withhold approval of the election, which has caused considerable comment in local circles. Central New York newspapers, because of the closeness to the Lake Placid election scene, carried full reports on the disputed election.

BROOKLYN CHURCH CHOIR ON RADIO

★ The rector of the Church of St. Luke and St. Matthew, Brooklyn, announces that he has completed negotiations with the Protestant Radio Commission whereby the choir of the parish will provide the music for a national program during October. Each Sunday in October from 1:30-2:00 p. m. this choir will be heard over WJZ, New York, and one hundred other radio stations in the country.

The choir is one of the oldest and most famous in Brooklyn and has maintained a distinct religious tradition of high standing for many years. It will be under the direction of Mr. Grant McK. Smith, organist and master of the choristers.

The rector, the Rev. George Boardman, has just completed a nine week religious program on radio which has been going out to about 200 hundred stations in the United States.

FREEDOM SUNDAY OCTOBER 8TH

★ Clergymen throughout the country have been asked to mobilize their people this coming Sunday in the Crusade for Freedom. General Lucius D. Clay, chairman, sent a special message to 80,200 pastors and rabbis, describing the effort "as a spiritual offensive designed to mobilize all Americans to combat Communist propaganda through a dramatic demonstration of a belief in freedom."

Robert D. Jordan, head of the promotion department of the National Council, is the national director of the Church program.

DEAN WATSON HITS HYSTERIA

★ Dean Richard S. Watson of St. Mark's Cathedral, Seattle, recently hit at the hysteria that is sweeping the country. Writing in his weekly bulletin he said: "Many of us are becoming increasingly concerned over the easy habit we have fallen into in our national and local life of name calling. When a person disagrees with our opinion he is apt to be at once a 'pink' or a 'red' or a 'communist'. Let anyone whisper a question about another and immediately he may be labelled. Reputations are kicked around without benefit of even a casual investigation as to the truth. Organizations and individuals exist at their peril.

"Two groups with which I am associated have been so attacked recently. I am close to their inner workings. I know their objectives and the philosophy under which they work. I am convinced through personal knowledge and experience that these groups are sound.

"Yet one comes along with no such personal knowledge and eagerly passes along a vicious opinion, making no effort to check the truth.

"We have reached a point where we have lost sight of objectivity in disagreement and taken refuge in the cowardly retort of the calling of names. In the ruthless process innocent victims are being stripped of reputation with careless abandon. For shame!

"I quote a man who, in 1839, put it in these words: 'Freedom of opinion, of speech and of the press is our most valuable privilege, the very soul of republican institutions, the safeguards of all other rights. If men abandon the right of free discussion; if, awed by threats, they suppress their convictions; if rulers succeed in silencing every voice but that which approves them; if nothing reaches the people but what would lend support to men in power—farewell to liberty'!"

CHURCH PAPERS BOOSTED

★ The weekly bulletin of St. Paul's Cathedral, Buffalo, recently gave a boost to Church papers. "Most people read the newspapers everyday," says "The Chimes." "In fact they depend on them so much that if the paper boy is late they are apt to become impatient and perhaps irritable. They don't want to miss out on reading the

LIVING THE CREED

A Study of the Apostles' Creed
By CARROLL E. SIMCOX

CHAD WALSH says: "In many ways, Dr. Simcox's treatment of the Creed is unique. Not only does he explain with great clarity the 'outside' of the Creed—its strict theological meaning—but he also makes clear the devotional and personal implications of each clause. I can think of very few better books to give a friend who is taking the first tentative steps toward Christian commitment, or who has long gone through the motions of religious faith and now wants to know what the motions mean."

FIVE MINUTES TO TWELVE

By WILLIAM E. PURCELL
Illustrated by Arthur Wragg

FIVE MINUTES TO TWELVE pulls no punches. It is urgent, forthright—even frightening—in discerning the signs of the times. But like the early prophets, it points the way to save civilization and our souls.

"The thing I like about FIVE MINUTES TO TWELVE is that it puts religion in the present tense."—The Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, Trinity Church, Boston.

WORK IN MODERN SOCIETY

By J. H. OLDHAM
(Published for the Study Department World Council of Churches)

The present paper is the outcome of preliminary discussions in a small group which met in Switzerland under the auspices of the Ecumenical Institute in April, 1949, and was composed of those actively engaged in industry and by sociologists and theologians. In relating Christianity to the secular life, it has considered the nature of modern society, including modern attitudes and incentives to work, the Christian approach to the meaning of work, and the source of a Christian doctrine of work.

news and looking at the cartoons in the newspaper. The newspaper tells us what is going on in the world and we need to read it to help us keep up on current events.

"Now there are many current events taking place in the Church. Missionaries are working in different countries, preaching the good news of the gospel. New churches are being built in various places. Men are being ordained to the ministry. Dioceses are holding conventions. Prominent Church people are making important statements. Many interesting things are happening in the Church.

"There are Church papers that give us this news. Some come out once a week; others only once a month. Every Church person should read some Church paper regularly in order to keep up on what is going on throughout the Church as we read the newspaper for what is going on in the world generally."

YOUTH TAKES SERVICES

★ George H. Bowen, eighteen years old, works in a factory five days a week, but on Sundays he takes services and preaches at Grace Chapel at East Rutherford, N. J. A year ago when the Rev. Vernon Losee, pastor, was ill, the young man stepped in as a licensed lay-reader to help out. He did so well that this summer he was asked to take services while the vicar was on vacation.

His zeal however cost him $50 for one Sunday he was a bit late in getting started from his home in Park Ridge and was nailed speeding through Hackensack. A cop stopped him and demanded, "Where do you think you're going?"

"To church," Bowen replied.

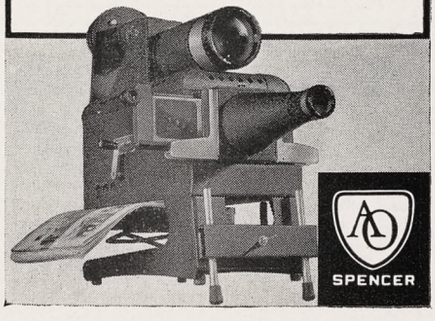
The cop was a skeptic, pulled him in and he was fined fifty.

Young Bowen is at Trinity College, Hartford, on a scholarship with some factory work on the side. He figures on going to theological seminary upon completion of his college course.

GOLD RUSH PREACHER IS HONORED

★ Services honoring the 50th anniversary of the ordination of the Rev. Benjamin Darnielle, famed Nevada gold rush preacher, were held recently at Trinity Church, Los Angeles. The sermon was by Bishop Robert B. Gooden, retired suffragan, and Mr. Darnielle was guest of honor at a reception afterwards.

Mr. Darnielle achieved wide fame at the turn of the century when he went from Washington, D. C., to Delamar, Nevada, when there were more saloons than ministers and no churches worth mentioning. Rip-roaring days followed, with Mr. Darnielle, long interested in prison reform and rehabilitation of criminals, serving on the board of chaplains of the Nevada state penitentiary for four years. His sagebrush missionary work among the miners took him to each new gold strike. He was at Elko in 1901-02, Carson City from 1902 until 1905, Arcata, California, from 1905 to 1907, and in Napa and McCloud the following year. He followed the gold strikes down across the blistering desert to Goldfield and Tonopah when these lid-raising towns were rich in gold, deep in whiskey, and wide open 24 hours a day.



When Mr. Darnielle wasn't trying to calm down and cool off miners he was up in the hills in lumber camps, which were only a shade more respectable than the desert settlements of clapboard and tarpaper.

NEWS OF CHURCHES OVERSEAS

CANADIAN CHURCH URGES KOREAN PEACE

Immediate efforts to end the conflict in Korea were called for by the general council of the United Church in Canada, meeting at Toronto. Action should be taken, the resolution said, through a committee of the UN on which major representation should go to countries of Asia.

Action was also taken whereby all property in China and India is to be donated to the native churches in those countries.

THE BISHOP OF BIRMINGHAM APPROVES MERCY KILLING

Birth control and mercy killing were endorsed with qualifications, and atomic bombing was condemned, by Bishop Barnes of Birmingham in addressing the British Association for the Advancement of Science. He said that the danger of overpopulation in the world required men to face the question of preventing the increase of "tainted human stocks," and that "only the most reactionary" in the Churches now oppose birth control. The doctrine that human life is sacred, he asserted, applies only to a man "made in the image of God, a good man, healthy and strong." He added that this implies the acceptance of the principles of eugenics and euthanasia. He denounced the "mass extermination" of atomic warfare, saying that "the use of such weapons might empty an overcrowded world but it would bring suffering that God, as revealed by Christ, would not approve and no human being can lightly excuse. He cannot, to protect himself from enemies fancied or real, approve methods of mass murder and mass mutilation. If the alternative be a pacifism willing to endure and to suffer, let us choose that pacifism."

ARCHBISHOP REBUKES BISHOP BARNES

The Archbishop of Canterbury in a statement disassociated the Church of England from the private utterances of Bishop Barnes of Birmingham and Dean Johnson of Canterbury. Bishop Barnes was rebuked for his statement found elsewhere on this page; the Dean of Canterbury for his alleged pro-Communist utterances.

ALL ANGLICAN BISHOPS IN CHINA RESIGN

All Anglican bishops in China have resigned, the Church Missionary Society announced in London on Sept. 7. This action was taken to fulfil a promise made to leaders of the Chinese Church when the Communist conquest of the country began. They were also hastened by government restrictions on the movements of foreigners and insistence upon Chinese Church leaders that it was a prerequisite to governmental recognition of the Church. The only exception is Bishop Ronald Hall who is to remain in Hong Kong, a crown colony.

POLISH PRIESTS SIGN PEACE APPEAL

CHURCH DECLARATION FROM CHINA

Reformation of the Church in China is underway as the result of a declaration drawn up by representatives of the Churches. It calls for the unification of the various denominations and the end of financial support from abroad. The document was signed by 1,527 religious leaders, including pastors, students and teachers in Christian schools and leaders of the YW and the YM.

The Churchmen agree to "purge imperialist influence" and to educate their followers against the evils of "imperialism, feudalism, and bureaucratic capitalism."

The declaration is said to be the work of 40 representatives of Churches in China and was issued with approval of the government.

It states that imperialists "will attempt to make use of Christianity to carry out provocative agitation activities and develop reactionary power." Consequently Churches must "rid themselves of all imperialist influence" and guard against imperialist intrigues, especially from the U. S.

The statement also calls upon Church leaders to "encourage Christians to take part in the movement for peace and educate them to support the government's land policy."

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

The Living God. By Armaud Pierhal. Harper, $1.75.

In this little book the well-known French author Armaud Pierhal, a former unbeliever recently returned to the Catholic Church, attempts as a self-confessed amateur to give his reasons for his new faith. The value of the book clearly lies in its witness to a strong faith, and to this reviewer this is its sole appeal. The arguments for the Christian faith are confusing and scattered in their order; I found myself throughout more in sympathy with "the Objector" than with the proponent. But more serious to my mind was the nature of the view presented in these arguments. Its philosophical basis was clearly a strict dualism of matter and spirit: "he (man) was fated to sin, because of the imperfection of his double nature, carnal and spiritual" (p. 25). Consequently God is finite in the philosophical sense, i.e., He is "the resultant of the forces of good, within us and without, fighting against the resultant of the forces of evil" (p. 80). The result is, of course, that such a God is primarily known in so far as he does us good. In prayer, for example, "God pays cash" (p. 73). He stills stormy waters when a man "experiments" with this benevolent power (p. 66), and he even wakes up the author, who had a sore throat at the time, to tell him he needs to take an aspirin (pp. 101-2). At this point I stopped, thinking that Houdini and Thurston were a more interesting and less harmful brand of magic.—Langdon B. Gilkey.

The Study of Christian Doctrine. By A. E. J. Rawlinson. S.P.C.K. 1 sh.

A lecture by the Bishop of Derby setting forth the Anglican position relatively to Rome, the East, the influence of St. Augustine, and the Churches of the Reformation. There are tensions within Anglicanism, but (and this is perhaps the reason) the Church of England "never at any time became either a Calvinist or a Lutheran Church. Its most characteristic appeal, next to the appeal to Scripture, has been to sound learning. It has believed in reason, and it has made its appeal to the general tradition of Christendom, and especially to such traditions as could be shown to go back behind both the Reformation and the Middle Ages to the period described as the Undivided Church." —Would that we heard more of this sound doctrine on our side of the Atlantic!—F.C.G.

Mary. By Sholem Asch. (Tr. by Leo Strindberg). Putnam, $3.50.

This book, following The Nazarene and The Apostle, is a romance of the life of Mary, the mother of Jesus. To those who have already read and enjoyed the former novels it will be of further interest, and yet it may stand alone as an imaginary portrayal of the meaning of her son's life to the woman set apart in Israel. While not cloying the reader with sentimental devices, the author has interwoven the gospel story with Jewish lore and Christian apocryphal legend, the use of this latter material being, perhaps, the one detraction to an otherwise reverent treatment of the subject.—S. F. Terrien.

F. C. HAMMOND
Vicar of All Souls, San Diego, Cal.

Please add my name to The Witness Statement calling "for a just settlement by negotiation and conciliation" of hostilities in Korea. I realize that this will make me in all probability a Communist—or at least a sympathizer—in the eyes of many good but deceived and deluded people, among them many who profess to be followers of the King of Peace, who gave his cheek to the smiters and when he was reviled, reviled not again; who in the supreme hour of his agony prayed for his enemies.

Personally I am more afraid of gag-rule than I am of the Communist threat. Your stand of Korea and other questions of our day is indeed commendable.

JOHN F. DAVIDSON
Ass't. St. George's, New York

My real gratitude goes to you and Bishop Lane W. Barton for his excellent broadside at the kind of religion preached in the book by Peale and Blanton (Witness, Sept. 21). This "happiness" brand of religion is making a horrible and all too successful drive to win men's hearts and allegiance today. To be quite honest, I could not read the book referred to. And I did try. Bishop Barton's analysis is crisply helpful in that he clearly shows that any religion worthy of the name puts God first, and not puny man and his so-called "happiness."

MRS. J. R. LONG
Churchwoman of Marion, Ala.

Thank you so much for the editorial on Being a Good Samaritan (Sept. 21). I have been waiting and praying and listening for someone in our Church to say those words. I am still hoping and praying that our Church will begin praying for our enemies. I can find no prayer for that in our Prayer Book. Please add my name to The Witness Peace Statement.

MR. & MRS. BERNARD STANDING
Quakers of Earlham, Iowa

We most heartily endorse the statement drafted by The Witness and reprinted in The Friend of Eighth Month, 24th, appealing for popular support and government action in efforts to achieve a peaceful settlement in Korea.

ANSWER: The Witness statement of August 10 was reprinted in Zion's Herald, Methodist, and The Friend, Quaker, and a very large number of endorsements have been received as a result. The total number so far to have endorsed the statement is approximately 700, with additional endorsements received daily.

KATHLEEN HANSTEIN
Churchwoman of Philadelphia

I am glad to endorse The Witness statement on negotiation and conciliation of hostilities in Korea and would have done so earlier except that I wanted to get others to sign it. Several are enclosed.

It seems to me it's high time for the Christian Churches to take a positive stand regarding peaceful solutions of the world's problems. Too often they have given active support to war as a method of handling international difficulties. It has always seemed to me that unless they both preached and practiced the way of peace there was no validity in their calling themselves Christian.

STORY OF THE WEEK

E.L.S.A. Holds Conference To Consider Program

Various Aspects of League Work Dealt With By Outstanding Leaders of Church

★ By invitation, thirty-one persons, clergy and laity, gathered at Seabury House, Greenwich, Connecticut, over a recent weekend to discuss the implementation of the program of the Episcopal League for Social Action. The group was representative of many shades of opinion ecclesiastically and socially, as well as coming from different sections of the country—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, District of Columbia, Virginia, North Carolina, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Missouri.

Van Dyke Leads Off

The executive committee of E.L.S.A. last May formulated five areas in which it decided the league must pursue study and action. The conference time was divided so that there could be discussion of what must be done, and how it might be done, in each of these areas. The opening session was concerned with the function of the League in the area of democracy. Introductory talks were given by the executive secretary, the Rev. A. M. Van Dyke, and the Rev. Louis H. Berry, rector of St. Philip's Church, Newark, N. J.

Mr. Van Dyke suggested that the democratic way of life was the endeavor to achieve a balance between freedom and order. Referring to Samuel and John Adams, he said that our democratic system grew out of a definite religious belief that sinful man had to be controlled from the tyranny and exploitation of which he was capable, by a rule of law, but man-instituted law itself must have in it checks and balances so that man's essential dignity and freedom is not abridged. To have democracy the balance between executive, judicial and legislative branches of government must be maintained. Examples of the imbalance growing in the political field because of encroachments by one into another's proper field were cited. These instances point to a growing tyranny in which criticism of governmental policies is more and more being silenced by one or another branch, without recourse to others. This is the road to fascism. In the economic realm the increasing dependency of industry, transport, the press, and agriculture on government subsidy gives a sense of an overpowering stake in the maintenance in power of a particular set of political figures. The corporate state has rapidly evolved in our country. The list of individual incidents of the budding police state is frighteningly large, and E.L.S.A. has a duty to give aid and comfort to its victims. A fundamental job also should be stimulated which would study the numerous cases with a view to showing how each one is related to constitutional liberty so that in publishing the findings, the American people might be aware of what is happening to our heritage of freedom.

The Rev. Mr. Berry spoke feelingly of racial discrimination, particularly as it is practiced in the Episcopal Church, and many of its institutions. He mentioned a few constructive steps that had been taken, but at the same time revealed the vast gulf that exists between practice and the idea of brotherly fellowship.

In discussion which followed on strategy, it was felt that the League should cooperate with other groups concerned with social action, but that as a Church group it must always maintain a position that expresses the uniquely Christian viewpoint.

Moreau Speaks

The next morning the Rev. Walter Welsh, assisted by the Rev. Frank Carthy, celebrated the Holy Communion. The first session of the day dealt with social change. The Rev. Jules Moreau, instructor in New Testament at Seabury-Western Seminary, presented a background for the subject out of the Christian theological position. He affirmed that the gospel call to repentance was addressed to Israel as community. To repent means to change radically, and our Lord's message to the nation means a demand for radical social change. A theology which states that all creation is under the sovereignty of God has in it the imperative of social change. Following the talk given by Miss Mary Van Kleeck, printed in this number, there was extended discussion. Most of those present were of the opinion that a recognition of the revolutionary social change going on in the present world, and an adaptation of our thinking to this fact, are necessary prerequisites to dealing with other areas of concern. Standing for the "Christian duty of accepting and promoting social change" became the primary task of the E.L.S.A.

The area of peace through international cooperation was to have been introduced by the Rev. Joseph Fletcher of Episcopal Theological School, but he was not able to be present at the last moment. General discussion ensued on the topic, and its relation to social change. Most of the group felt that the United Nations would be an effective organization for peace when our government pursues the course advocated at the annual meeting of E.L.S.A. of recognizing the de facto government of China, and also utilizes the United Nations agencies more in its dealings with other countries, pursuing less a unilateral policy.

On the subject of livelihood, the speakers were Mr. Harvey A. Cox Jr., district secretary of the United Furniture Workers, CIO, of Thomasville, N. C., and the Rev. Dillard H. Brown, rector of St. Luke's Church, Washington, D. C. A part of Mr. Cox's remarks are printed on another page. His presentation brought discussion and a re-thinking of the League's historic interest —organized labor. Guides for action in this area must be developed anew.

The Rev. Mr. Brown spoke of the need for the League to be concerned with the problem of housing, and in particular for those of the middle-income group. The statistics given illustrated the deplorable domestic situation, which is increasingly forgotten as minds are turned towards foreign affairs. Mr. Brown also discussed what the lack of home rule in the nation's capital was doing to education and recreation facilities, as well as to the minds and souls of people.

Work in Church

The session that evening centered about the League's work inside the Episcopal Church. The Rev. C. Kilmer Myers of Grace Church, Jersey City, explained the way in which he and two other priests are working in the field so much neglected, the church in the slum areas of our cities. He stressed that such activity must never be conceived of as an "experiment," but the natural extension of the mission of the Church which will build a real parish family in communities which have no actual center of life.

The Rev. Massey Shepherd's talk in part, on "Liturgical Change" appears in this issue. His stress on using the many opportunities in our present Prayer Book to their fullest advantage complemented what Mr. Myers had told of the practices in Jersey City in making worship the expression of community.

The Rev. W. M. Weber, rector of All Saints Church, Littleton, N. H., presented aspects of the Church's economic and employment practices which were more in harmony with the ideals of our own economic order than they are in harmony with historic Christian faith. Among the matters considered were salaries and pensions of clergy and lay employees, diocesan investment trusts, the Episcopal Church Foundation. He spoke also of methods of money-raising and the need for more and more emphasis on the idea of Christian offering and the right use of this world's goods given to us by the Creator.

At the beginning of the conference, a findings committee was named, consisting of the Rev. Robert Dentan of Berkeley Divinity School, the Rev. W. Carroll Brooke, rector of Trinity Church, Staunton, Virginia, Miss Mary Van Kleeck and the executive secretary. Their work was to discover "the sense of the meeting" and to report it for discussion at the close. On the back page is printed what finally evolved after the conference had worked over it, and it was subsequently criticized through correspondence. This statement represents what the conference believes should be the direction of the E.L.S.A.. The study and action commissions now being set up in each of the fields will fill in the details.

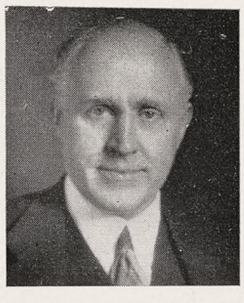
Inter-Faith Commission Meets In France

BY
CHARLES W. LOWRY
Rector of All Saints, Chevy Chase



☆ The commission on intercommunion of the World Council of Churches (faith and order section) held a final and vitally important meeting at Bievres, France, last month. In attendance were seventeen members of the commission, including the chairman, Prof. D. M. Baillie of St. Andrew's University, and the secretary, Prof. John Marsh of Nottingham, England. Three American representatives were present: Dean A. T. deGroot of Texas Christian University, Dr. Oscar T. Olson of Cleveland and the writer. In addition, the theological secretary of faith and order, Prof. Leonard Hodgson, and the general secretary, the Rev. Oliver Tomkins, were present and by way of counsel and liaison played a significant part.

The first task of the commission was to put into final form its report which will be the basis for discussion of the great problem of intercommunion at the 1952 Lund Conference on Faith and Order. The report adopted contains nothing startlingly new. Indeed the commission was keenly aware of the severe limitations imposed upon it by the facts of division and divergence of conviction among the Churches, and a strong expression of guilt and penitence in the face of this stubborn and at present irreducible barrier was written into the report.

A large proportion of the report is taken up with the analysis of the principal relevant facts as regards the divergent traditions of Christendom on intercommunion. The analytical section will be found to be informative and comprehensive. The heart, however, of the report and the focus of greatest interest is in the section dealing with the specific problem of intercommunion in the ecumenical movement. What is to be done at ecumenical conferences or other meetings with regard to Communion services? The draft of the report with which the commission began at Bievres was weighted heavily in favor of the second of three solutions so far proposed: 1) Separate simultaneous services; 2) Non-simultaneous services with non-communicating attendance where such is required by the laws of Churches involved; 3) Sacramental fasting. In the final draft of the report (2) was still favored as among the three clear possibilities, but doubt was indicated as to its adequacy or finality. This revision was the direct result of the latest thinking and struggle of soul in relation to the problem in the World Student Christian Federation as communicated to the commission by the WSCF representatives, Bill Nichols (an English Anglo-Catholic) and Keith Bridston (an American Lutheran). The report brought to the commission indicated that in the WSCF there was now a conscientious inability to accept any static pro tem solution but a disposition rather to weigh the problem afresh at every meeting or conference, made a profound impression and is, in the writer's view, the news of the Bievres meeting.

Another outstanding feature of Bievres was the celebration of the Holy Communion on Sunday according to the newly authorized optional rite of the Church of South India. The celebrant was an Anglican, the Rev. T. S. Garrett, Bishop Newbegin's alternate for the commission sessions. The rite, which is shortly to be published, is of extraordinary interest as bringing forth "things new and old." For Bievres it was a solution of the immediate problem of the Holy Communion for all present except the Orthodox.

Several sessions were devoted to the discussion of papers on different phases of the intercommunion problem and prepared with the forthcoming volume of the commission in mind. Among these were papers by Fr. Hebert, Prof. Zander (a distinguished Orthodox theologian) and the three American representatives (all attending the commission for the first time). Quite a little interest was expressed in a paper by the present reporter on "The Impact of Protestantism on American Culture," and it was widely felt that this presentation of the over-all American picture paved the way for a more sympathetic reception of Dean deGroot's essay on "Intercommunion in the Non-Clerical Tradition" and Dr.

Olson's summary of the American Methodist tradition. It should, however, be emphasized that there is a wide gulf between the old world and the new on this whole question. Even the English Free Churchmen hardly talk the same language as the American Protestants. They approach the problem as a very real one, theologically and historically. The Americans (in general tendency) do not see that there is any problem.

Special tribute should be paid the British members of the commission. One had the feeling not only that they were an island of mediation in the work of the commission but that without them the work would have been impossible. Prof. Baillie's leadership in guiding the many sessions and in communicating to all his faith and Christian simplicity, was outstanding. He was closely seconded by Prof. Marsh, who impressed all by his sincerity, good humor and earnest Congregational high churchmanship. Dr. Hodgson's wisdom and learning were ever available but never thrust on the commission. The Rev. Oliver Tomkins made me understand why the British civil service has played the role it has for three centuries or more. The World Council is fortunate in having in its secretariat a man of his ability and vitality.

The one serious lack at Bievres was the absence of both the German members of the commission. It is perhaps news that the Swedish representative, Prof. Ragnar Askmark, was scheduled to attend on his return trip home a meeting of an Evangelical Synod at Fulda, Germany, and to address the Synod at the request of its Bishop on the Apostolic Succession. Prof. Askmark was, however, consistent in expressing at Bievres the standpoint that for Lutherans this succession is not a doctrinal question and that the important thing for them is doctrinal agreement.

Canadian Action Group Holds Meeting

BY

JOHN PEACOCK

Rector at Cowansville, Quebec

★ Three miles from the tiny Laurentian village of Arundel, Quebec, on Bevans Lake, is the summer home of Dr. J. C. Flanagan where the Arundel conference is held every August. This conference is sponsored by the Anglican Fellowship for Social Action, Montreal unit, and has as its purpose the consideration, by lecture and discussion, of basic Christian principles and doctrines as they relate to present day historical settings and action.

The conference leader at the 1950 sessions was the Rev. William Howard Melish of Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, N. Y. Mr. Melish gave the main lectures, ably supported by the Reverends S. L. Pollard, J. C. Kirby, W. R. Coleman and John Frank.

The Korean situation was the topic of the Rev. S. L. Pollard. He gave an excellent and concise exposition of the whole sad affair, its historical background, the facts of the "invasion" as gleaned from sources other than the American and British press (which latter show the capitalist philosophy bending the will of the people towards a "preventative" war), and the probable course of the war and its conclusion.

A paper on liturgics was given by the Rev. John Kirby, who demonstrated a complete "volte face" in the matter of the Eucharist being celebrated in the evening. Basing his argument on the latest studies in Britain and the United States, Father Kirby reached the conclusion that the Eucharist, especially as a social action of the Church militant, is fluid and vibrant in its form and use, not static. He maintained that the original liturgy was short and spare of form, not overloaded with words and phrases. It was poignant and meaningful to the historical setting. Thus the present service form ought to be such that it has clear, instructive meaning in social action to the participating Christians. The time of day or night was no longer a matter for furious debate or schism, but of secondary importance to the "times and circumstances" wherein the Eucharist takes place.

The Rev. John Frank of Toronto gave an interesting talk on his experiences in England where he had spent his sabbatical year, exchanging posts with an English cleric. He not only gave interesting highlights of parish life in the old land, but also some insights on trends and philosophies as he noticed them.

Dialectical Materialism

Dialectical materialism and Christianity was the theme of the paper by the Rev. W. R. Coleman, dean of the faculty of Divinity, Bishop's University. This paper evoked a great deal of discussion. After giving in some detail the historical setting of Marxism, its philosophical, sociological and religious bases, Professor Coleman summed up his position, and in his opinion the position of every thoughtful Christian, in these words, "To the Marxist there is no God, because the ultimate reality is matter and not mind or spirit . . . the Marxist is not under the judgment of God, but the Christian is. I can never be a Communist because I believe that I stand under God's judgment, and all that I am, think, say and do, is under his judgment."

The Rev. William Howard Melish gave seven lectures. There was general agreement among the conference members that the personal experiences of the speaker were not the result of accidental clashings between clergy and vestry members, but the result of fundamental differences between Christian belief and action on the one hand, and contemporary reactionary materialism on the other.

The lectures started with an historical review of the now famous Melish case, wherein he gave a complete story and word picture of his own and his father's life. That this history was necessary for the hearers was obvious, for it not only traced the lives of these two men, but the story of a liberal-social "Pilgrim's Progress" within the Anglican Church in the United States. This story runs the full gamut of toleration, wonderment, opposition and persecution by a congregation, a vestry and a bishop of those who dare to live the Christian truth as they see it. It tells the further story of the truth of the words from the New Testament, "and the ordinary people heard him gladly," for the rank and file of the members of Holy Trinity congregation decided to follow their leaders in their Christian stand.

From all this came an unfolding of the world position today. The situation at Holy Trinity is the Capitalist-Communist-Christian situation in embryo. What is the Christian's attitude and stand to be in the face of opposition and persecution? This is what each must answer. The witness of Mr. Melish and his father, by word and deed, seemed to conference members to be sufficient and clear answer.

The Anglican Fellowship for Social Action has four units, and one in the process of being formed—Montreal, Toronto, New Jersey, Nova Scotia, Vermont. It is concerned primarily with the reform of the Church from within, that it may be a witness to the world of basic Christian teachings. The Arundel conference has been operated by the Montreal unit for eight years in succession, and in addition it has held two seminar sessions. A variety of leaders have been at the conference, among them the Reverends Joseph Fletcher, F. H. Hastings-Smythe, Gordon Graham and Gilbert Cope. This last leader in the succession, the Rev. Mr. Melish, was fully qualified to rank with the best of them, and left an impression which will last long, long after the decision is made whether the multitude will be heard and justice overcome prejudice or not.

SOCIAL RELATIONS IN NEW JERSEY

★ The Rev. James Pike, chaplain at Columbia University, was the keynote speaker at the annual conference of the Auxiliary of New Jersey and the diocesan department of Christian social relations, held at Trinity, Princeton. Pike spoke of the Christian answer to problems in the international, national, home and individual spheres. He insisted that the so-called American "way of life" could not be the necessary antidote to Communism as a religion. In Korea, he stated, we see how Communism can convert other peoples so that they will fight, but the U. N. fight for freedom is carried on by forces from outside. The only way of solving all difficulties in this age and any other is when people have a supreme loyalty to the all-sovereign God, and this faith must be instilled in us at home and everywhere.

Canon Robert Smith, director of social relations of the diocese, addressed the conference on the diocesan program of social service and action, particularly stressing in the latter area the need for a real Christian concern for strengthening interest in the affairs of the UN. Mrs. George F. Prestwich, chairman of social relations for the Auxiliary, planned the discussion groups into which the conference was divided. The Rev. Frank Carthy of Cranford led the section on worship; Mrs. A. M. K. Maldeis, W. A. diocesan president, had study; the Rev. A. M. Van Dyke, executive secretary of the Episcopal League for Social Action presented action; Mrs. John Pierce of Philadelphia directed fellowship. The devotions at the conference were led by Bishop Banyard.

WHAT PROSPECTS FOR PEACE?

★ A number of Churchmen have joined with others in sponsoring a forum tomorrow evening, October 13th, at the Philadelphia Academy. The general subject is "What Prospect for Peace?", with Sir Benegal N. Rau, head of the Indian delegation to the UN, speaking on the Nehru Proposals; Roy Reuther on the Reuther Plan; James P. Warburg on a Business View and Clarence E. Pickett on the Quaker Proposals.

TERCENTENARY OF VIRGINIA PARISH

★ Ware Parish, Gloucester County, Va., will celebrate its tercentenary on October 22.

BRITISH CANON HERE FOR LECTURES

★ Canon C. B. Mortlock of London arrived in New York on the Queen Mary, to cover a speaking itinerary under sponsorship of the committee on interchange of preachers and speakers of the Federal Council of the Churches.

Canon Mortlock is canon treasurer of Chichester Cathedral, an office which has no concern with finances, but which carries the responsibility of seeing to the care and preservation of the art treasures of the diocese. He has lectured widely and is a member of the standing committee of the central council for the care of churches and of the council of management of the National Buildings Record. "I am glad," Canon Mortlock said recently, "of opportunities of discussing matters of ecclesiological concern, and particularly the care and use of ancient churches." He lectures frequently on this subject, using slides to illustrate the lectures.

"The Bible and the Spade," the general title of thirteen articles in The Daily Telegraph, and which was published simultaneously in the United States, is perhaps his best-known work here. Commenting, Canon Mortlock said, "I find there is very great interest in the results of Biblical archeology on account of the evidence it supplies to support the historicity of the Scriptures. As archeological correspondent of The Daily Telegraph, I have twice made an extended tour of all the sites under excavation in the Holy Land. As secretary since 1934 of the Palestine Exploration Fund, the pioneer of archeology in Palestine, I have had first-hand information and am well acquainted with the leading archeologists and their work, including those concerned with the latest discovery of Hebrew scrolls 1,000 years older than the earliest existing manuscript of the Old Testament."

At Kings College, London, Canon Mortlock succeeded Prof. Percy Dearmer, lecturing there on ecclesiastical art. He is at present scheduled for lectures to architectural students of University College, where he is chairman of the board of studies in architecture, his topic being the liturgical arrangement of churches. He has the following engagements here: Washington Cathedral and College of Preachers over the October 1 weekend; Philadelphia Divinity School the 5th; English Speaking Union, New York, 7th; Trinity, New York, 11th; the Advent, Boston, the 15th and the Cathedral that evening; New England Catholic Club the 16th; General Seminary, 21st to 27th, with Grace Church the morning of the 22nd and St. James at four. St. Luke's, Evanston, 29th; University of Chicago the 30th; Seabury-Western, 31st, with an address that evening to the Canterbury Club of the diocese of Chicago.

His November engagements are the Chicago Catholic Club the 1st; Cathedral of St. John the Divine on the 5th; St. Paul's, Richmond, the morning of the 12th and the Epiphany that afternoon. On the 19th he is at St. Martin's, Providence, in the morning and at St. John's Cathedral in the afternoon. On the 26th he is at Trinity, Buffalo, with other engagements in the city the two days following.

ELSA SECRETARY QUOTES BISHOPS

★ The Rev. Andrew M. Van Dyke, secretary of the Episcopal League for Social Action, discovered that there are forty-five Senators and Congressmen who are members of the Episcopal Church. He therefore addressed them a communication relative to the gag-laws which subsequently were passed over the President's veto. Wrote Van Dyke: "The House of Bishops of the Episcopal Church, meeting in Winston-Salem about the time that agitation was growing for the original Mundt-Nixon Bill three years ago, said: 'As Bishops in the Church of God we call upon the people of our churches to be on guard lest an hysterical fear of Communism shall lead us to fight that danger with weapons destructive of the treasures we seek to guard.'

"The Episcopal diocese of Massachusetts, Newark, Western Massachusetts, and others, have taken strong stands in their conventions against legislation of the Mundt-Nixon type. Individual bishops have publicly stated their opposition to those kind of laws which threaten the civil liberties of our citizens.

"The Episcopal League for Social Action has consistently opposed acts, which though endeavoring to protect the nation against danger, have within them greater danger for our ideal as Christians that a man's color, class, creed or political belief cannot be a basis for denying him the advantages we want for ourselves. The immigration and naturalization features of the bill before you seem to deny this ideal. We are aware that these days make your choice a difficult one, but we appeal to you to allow the foregoing to be a factor in your final opinion."

CHIEF'S SON STUDIES IN AMERICA

★ Augustine Jalla, the son of a tribal chief in Liberia, is now a student at the University of Bridgeport. He is the product of the schools of the Church in that country, where his achievements won for him a scholarship from the government for four years of study abroad, with the U. S. his choice.

He was at Southern University, Baton Rouge, La., last year but was not particularly happy there. When he received a letter from the Rev. Ralph T. Milligan, rector of St. John's, Bridgeport, who had formerly been a missionary in Liberia and knew the boy's father, arrangements were made for transfer to the Connecticut institution.

EDITORIALS

Christian Duty and Liberty

THIS was written to Christian people: "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law." It had little meaning outside the flock. In the police-state countries it has not been true, for it has been unlawful to show love and gentleness to any who oppose those in power. There was no law against love, kindness, faith in our own land until ten days ago. Then the Congress passed, over the veto of President Truman, the "Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950."

This bill states that the thoughts and beliefs of some persons and groups make such persons and groups unclean. Hence, they are to be shunned, put out of their jobs, excluded from entering our country unless they can prove themselves blameless, and placed in concentration camps in the event of a declaration of war or invasion of the United States or its possessions, or civil insurrection in aid of a foreign enemy.

The Old Testament ethic demanded that the stranger be loved. The foundation and growth of our country was the result of loving and showing kindness to those strangers who had found conditions intolerable in their native lands. Love is not simply a part of the Christian ethic, it is the very essence of the Christian life. In the Johannine epistle there is the severe warning that "He who says I love God, and hates his brother, is a liar." Yet this law says that association or fellowship, without which love is impossible, with persons who are in designated Communist action organizations is a crime. To them there is to be shown no consideration, no love, no kindness, and as it is working out in the actual situation in our country today, no gentleness.

The faith so strong in the Christian tradition, and out of which grew the religious and civil liberties we have in this land, has been that no person, nor small group of persons shall decide what must be believed. The Episcopal Church looks back to the great Councils of the Church, as well as to representative assemblies in these days, for the determination of its doctrine, discipline and worship. Such practice comes from the experience that no one man can be trusted to rule absolutely, for on that road lies tyranny. This faith is denied in the new law. A board of five persons is now to decide whether or not certain persons' thoughts, speeches and writings shall bring upon them the condemnation of the law. A few feeble gestures are made to put the proceedure in harmony with classic judicial process, but it works out as the desertion of the tenet that "one is innocent until he is proved guilty." The burden of proof is on the accused. The rulings of this small board will define what is American, and it has always been the glory of Americanism that it was undefined and undefinable.

Premium on Dishonesty

THERE are many similarities between the situation now developing because of this law, and that attempt through the 18th amendment to legislate a particular way of thinking. Both put a premium on dishonesty. And it will make it so that the big operators are never caught, just the little ones. The homebrew artist, and the ones who happen to have some convictions which also are held by the Communist party, are the ones to suffer. The Justice Department is already beginning to worry about neighbor's suspicion of neighbor resulting in complaints too numerous to handle. What this does to peaceful living together in communities is horrible to contemplate. It may be that one of the most conservative of radio commentators, Buckhage, was overstating it when he said, "Look out when this bill is law for anyone you ever beat at golf or bridge, or for the next-door neighbor who doesn't like you—they can turn you in." This may be extreme, and maybe not.

The supreme threat in the bill to Christians, though, is what it does to the faith and practice

"QUOTES"

THE Gospel of the Kingdom is of and in itself a social message. We believe that an outstanding and pressing duty of the Church is to convince its members of the necessity of nothing less than a fundamental change in the spirit and working of our economic life. This change can only be effected by accepting as the basis of industrial relations the principle of cooperation in service for the common good, in place of unrestricted competition for private or sectional advantage.

—Pastoral, House of Bishops, 1922

of prophetic religion. It was the work of the Old Testament prophets, of our Lord, and of the early disciples to condemn the sins of Israel in order that the nation might fulfill the task given to it by God to be a blessing to all nations. Lately the epithet of 'Communist' has been thrown at every person who dares to point out mistakes in foreign policy, and in many local situations the same condemnation falls on one who questions anything in the status quo. This treatment is not new in history, but the virulence of it recently has caused a great silence to fall upon many a liberal prophet because of fear. It is the role of the Church to be the conscience of the state, but in these times the conscience is becoming still. Biblical religion is full of examples which show that when there is not an unequivocal "yea" or "nay" in the land from the prophets, the nation rushes on towards terrible judgment. This law can make any dissent a crime, and even before its passage, the shadow of it was forcing many to become either false prophets, blessing things as they are, or retreating into quietness.

President Truman's veto message spoke so clearly of the impossibility of administering the law, as well as its dangers to our liberties, that it is possible that the law can be repealed as soon as the worst of the hysteria is over. Church people must become disturbed about the action of Congress, which was condemned sharply beforehand by such papers as the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, and the Washington Post. The conviction and courage of such splendid men as Senators Lehman, Douglas, Langer, Kefauver, Humphries, Kilgore, Graham, Chavez, Green, Leahy and Murray is something for us to take to heart. Between now and the time Congress reassembles, we must let our representatives know that we see in this law a denial of Christian principles, as well as American. Enough of us working on this could accomplish its speedy repeal, and a return to the time when people can speak unafraid of any earthly terrors, and with the prayer that it is pleasing to God.

Social Change in the World Today

BY

MARY VAN KLEECK

Retired Director of Industrial Studies,
Russell Sage Foundation and Vice-President of E. L. S. A.

UNLESS we are willing to accept social change in our own nation and in other nations along lines desired by the groups and peoples needing it most—specifically by improving conditions of livelihood and status for all workers—we shall have neither democracy nor peace in our time. Acceptance of social change to meet the needs of the neediest would, in contrast, lead the United States and the world out of its present crisis to a new era of peace and abundance for all mankind. But our present governmental administrators have actually enunciated exactly the opposite policy. They have gone so far in resistance to social change in other lands that we as a nation are left confused and frustrated, facing the heavy, sacrificial responsibility laid upon us by a foreign policy which commits us to support by our own armed force any government anywhere in the world promising to resist so-called "communism." Formulated in the Truman doctrine of 1947 as applicable to Greece and Turkey, and now developed into a plan to apply it over the Pacific Ocean confronting the peoples of Asia, our emerging American program of military action surely calls for examination of what it is we are resisting.

Whether the present war goes on or comes to a speedy end, meeting the needs of the neediest by accepting and cooperating in their own national efforts for social change, remains the inescapable task today. To it Christians have a special contribution to make. The universal Christian prayer, "give us this day our daily bread," is echoed in every genuine people's movement in every nation in our century's history. Understanding these movements is an obvious Christian duty. To explore their history and their current developments in a study-for-action program is the new work proposed for the Episcopal League for Social Action. This conference has been called to discuss and clarify such a program.

Such concern is no new departure for the League. From its beginning as the Church League for Industrial Democracy, it has had as its explicit, central aim a democratic status for American workers. The League has always supported the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively in their trade unions. In specific strikes it has interpreted conditions to League members and the public, and has been able not infrequently to encourage Episcopal employers to use their influence toward a just settlement. Friendly relations with trade unionists and workers within and without the Church have given the basis for a "realizing sense" of conditions of life and labor in our country. The foundation has been laid for the League to continue this work now in the United States, while also seeking to understand in other nations the necessity to improve conditions of livelihood.

The Nature of Social Change

THE prime mover in social change in this century is not ideology but technology. Electrification, and now atomic energy, fundamentally alter the relation of man to his tools. Not the human hand but a cosmic force supplies the energy for production. As a consequence, a man can no longer earn a living independently of others. Work must be organized in sub-divided processes involving many workers, with energy provided by electricity, and with performance more or less completely automatic, depriving the individual worker of initiative or control even of his own motions or speed, giving rise to the new fatigues of frustration. The individual worker regains some measure of freedom only by association with other workers in trade unions and shop committees.

The same technology which gives rise to the changed relation of man to his tools calls for centralized administration to relate different industries to each other, from raw materials to processing with the new apparatus and equipment and, finally, to the completed product and its distribution. The independent business gives way to a corporation, which in turn becomes a unit in a system of corporations. The source of power affecting them all more or less directly is highly centralized in finance capital, in ownership of patents and in agreements which establish monopoly. The resulting influence over government threatens to change and weaken political democracy. The small farmer, though seeming to be independent, must buy his machinery and materials for his work and his own living from corporations and sell his produce to incorporated processors, with whom he is as unequal a bargainer as the individual workman in industry. Nor are the professions unaffected by the process of organization which increasingly transfers all workers to the status of employees for wages or salary, subjecting them to the centralized power for which technology creates the necessity. The all important question is, who shall control the centralized power which controls the means of livelihood?

In colonial areas and in other countries not yet industrialized which supply raw materials to the highly industrialized nations through international corporations, the problem of control has the added aspect of foreign ownership of the nation's resources. Capitalism becomes imperialism when capital uses its own government to strengthen by war, if necessary, its command over the resources and means of livelihood of the people in other nations.

Such in briefest outline is the nature of the problem of social change, directed today toward utilization of the world's abundance, immensely enhanced by science, for the living standards of the people throughout the world. In the United Nations, through the Economic and Social Council, all members are obligated to take measures jointly and separately towards raising living standards everywhere. When this work begins effectively and sincerely, the Security Council will be confronted with fewer instances of international aggression.

Varieties of Social Change

THE evidence for such a statement of the problem of social change must be derived from current history. The League's program is planned to stimulate study of needs and aspirations as expressed in people's movements throughout the world today. The missionary work of the Church has opened the way for us to explore as Christians how cooperation in the ways of peace may supplant war. Through study and firsthand contact we shall discover that the common problem of livelihood takes different forms in different countries. Calling every movement of the people today "Communist," and attributing it all to the direct intervention of Soviet Russia, can only cloud understanding, especially as the word "Communism" is erroneously used by officials in high places.

To attempt a definition, and thus to point the way toward more widespread study of this phase of the social sciences, becomes necessary for the American people if we are not to make grievous and disastrous mistakes. The first and the outstanding example of thoroughly revolutionary social change so far in the 20th century is the Russian Revolution, whose leaders were and are communists. What is Communism? Clarity demands that four phases be recognized:

First, it was a new methodology in the social sciences as they were in process of development in the mid-nineteenth century. Inspired by the theory of evolution and the scientific method which revealed it, Mark and Engels sought to apply the methods of science to society; assuming also that social change is constant, that each situation contains its opposite, and that the trend can only be understood by the dialectical process of thinking from thesis to antithesis and synthesis. Moreover, not the idea but the material reality constitutes the dialectical process.

Second, Communism was a critique of capitalism, with further development by Lenin in the stage of imperialism.

Third, Communism has a theory of revolution. The law of revolution is two-fold: The moment for it comes only when existing conditions are intolerable and the prevailing system has broken down. Thus a revolution is historically conditioned in each country and differs from nation to nation. A significant example is the relation of Churches to a Communist-led revolution. The Church in Russia supported the Czarist regime and oppressed the people, keeping them in ignorance and superstition. The revolutionists opposed both the Church and the Czar. In China, Christian missionaries have a record of constructive, educational work, and many Christian leaders support the new government, advocating its recognition by the United States; at the same time the Chinese government tolerates and encourages colleges and other institutions established by Christian missions.

Fourth, Communism after a revolution becomes a new social system administered as a planned economy. Eventually, according to Communist theory, government as a police force for the defense of one class against another class becomes unnecessary, as the exploitation of man by man comes to an end with the socialization of land and all means of production.

Here it must de noted that nowhere in the world today does a Communist system exist. Soviet Russia is socialist. The countries of Eastern Europe and China are at various stages of emergence from feudalism, retaining capitalism where it seems expedient but always insisting upon the necessity to eliminate foreign ownership and control. At this point, of course, the social change which is the goal of all these new popular movements runs counter to the interests of international corporations which seek to continue control of the resources of these nations.

The Truman Doctrine

IT would appear then that the Truman doctrine and more recent pronouncements committing the United States to prepare for war against so-called "Communist imperialism" should more properly be called a committee to oppose any movement against foreign ownership. We ourselves in the American Revolution cast off British control, but we are now in effect telling nations seeking economic independence from international corporations that their aims are an unwarranted interference with the right of American business to own and control natural resources in other countries. Such a policy is not really consistent with the interests of the American people, nor even of the majority of American businesses whose existing capitalist system as a whole would be benefited by trade with other countries as they succeed in raising living standards through industrialization of their own interest.

Small wonder, however, that it is so difficult for Americans to understand these conditions which differ broadly from ours at present and are too far removed for personal observation or experience. The United States has no present revolutionary movement, nor has it happened here today that conditions have become intolerable for a large section of the people and that the existing system has broken down. It may even be possible, since history does not always repeat itself, that if our political democracy can be maintained, we may achieve a corresponding industrial democracy through peaceful political action. It is, however, disturbing that the year of enunciation of the Truman doctrine against social change in other lands was also the year of passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, which is recognized by the trade unions as seriously undermining the rights which had been assured them in the Wagner Act of 1936.

In Korea the United States was given the responsibility jointly with the Soviet Union to aid Korea in establishing its own new and democratic government after 35 years of subjugation to the rule of Japan. It may be well to note that this was not the first occasion of American intervention in Korea's history. In 1905, after presiding over the signing of the treaty at Portsmouth, N. H., which ended the war between Czarist Russia and Japan, President Theodore Roosevelt, in pursuit of a policy of balancing powers in the Far East but knowing that he could not hope for Senate support for an open alliance with Japan and England, sent a secret emissary to Tokyo. Not until nearly 20 years later, in 1924, was the secret convention made known whereby, according to our American historian Beard (in The Rise of American Civilization v. II, p. 497): "Japan on her part undertook to respect American dominion in the Philippines, while the President of the United States agreed on his part to accept the establishment of Japanese domination over Korea by force of arms."

Japan completed this task and took control of Korea in 1910. Thirty-five years later the responsibility came to the United States to share in the recovery of Korea. Now, three years later, after the United States and the Soviet Union had failed to carry out jointly their commitment to create a united Korea, the United States, under the auspices of the United Nations, sends troops to defend the government established in the South against armies of the government which had subsequently been established in the North. Unhappily Korea has long been coveted as an important base for any nation seeking to dominate and exploit the Far East. As a subject people, its minerals and natural resources, which are considerable, supplied materials for Japan's war industries. Food and other consumer's goods were produced in the interest of the exploiting nation rather than for the benefit of the Koreans. Whatever may be said as to the responsibility for the present war, it seems clear that the social change, which could have been constructively planned at the moment of liberation in 1945, will remain to be developed when the war is over.

Korea exemplifies an inescapable conclusion concerning our present foreign policy: the hope of averting another war and establishing a just and constructive peace rests today in a wholehearted declaration by the United States that we will accept and cooperate in movements throughout Asia for national independence, in order that each nation may achieve control of its own resources, and with international cooperation use them for the welfare of the people.

Need of Liturgical Revision

BY

MASSEY H. SHEPHERD JR.

Professor at Episcopal Theological School

IT is not strange that voices should be raised from many quarters desirous of fresh revisions and enrichments of our liturgical heritage, especially among those who are particularly sensitive to the revolutionary changes of our society which have taken place within the short space of two decades since our last Prayer Book revision. To tell the truth, our Prayer Book, as we know it today, has been molded and remolded through a succession of revisions, each of them coming in the wake of upheavals and changes which profoundly altered the social environment of the Church's witness both in worship and in work. In England both the Reformation period, which gave us the first Prayer Books, and the Puritan Commonwealth, to which the 1662 revision responded, were eras of fundamental reorientation of society. And in America, our first Prayer Book of 1789 was necessitated by the results of the American Revolution; our 1892 revision by the economic and cultural changes produced by the War Between the States; and our last 1928 revision by the experience of World War I and its aftermath. Is it so strange then, that a new demand for review should emerge again after the evolutions and revolutions of worldwide depression, a second world war and its appalling aftermath?

Specifically, there are three areas where our Prayer Book formularies need careful review and rewording. Foremost are the prayers having to do with the political order. The new material introduced in 1928 gives the direction along which we should proceed, such as, for example, the alternative prayer for the President in Morning Prayer and Bishop Parsons' collect for Independence Day. But the relics of the Tudor and Stuart outlook have long since become an anomaly for worshippers in the present day and age. And the sooner they go the better prepared we shall be as a Church to bear witness to God's judgment upon the political situation of our own time. This applies not only to the specific intercessions for rulers and magistrates and our national legislature, but also to the prayers having to do with war and peace. We have good, modern prayers for the army and for the family of nations, but alongside of these we carry an archaic prayer for the navy and some totally antiquated (because they are so totally nationalistic) prayers and thanksgivings for times of war and tumults and of deliverance from our enemies. Basically, of course, these contradictions are the result of a change in theological perspective. The recovery in our own day of a truer interpretation of the eschatological nature of New Testament and early Christian thinking makes the Erastian flavor of some of our received inheritance not only distasteful but definitely poisonous.

A second area where something needs to be done and done soon is a more realistic concern for the needs and claims of our rural society. The farmer and his welfare ought to have a place in the Prayer Book; for our Rogation prayers spend much more time on the relief of our necessities and wants than they do on his. There is not a prayer in our book about fruitful seasons and good weather and all that which is not inadequate or irrelevant to modern ears, both from a theological and a practical standpoint. It is small wonder that the rural mission of our Church struggles for support and development. We need a modern commentary in our Prayer Book on "Give us this day our daily bread."

Obsolete Services

THIRDLY, there are those offices in the Prayer Book which, though they are primarily individual in their reference, are nonetheless concerned with the healthful integration of the individual in communal relationships. Two of these offices have become so obsolete that they have fallen out of general use: the Churching of Women and the Visitation of the Sick. They have ceased to be used for the very reason that they are negative in character. The former concentrates upon the deliverance of the woman from childbirth pains. Instead it should be a service built around the positive possibilities of a Christian home and family—surely a thing most needed in our society, full of broken homes and disintegrating families. The second office (including, of course, the propers for Communion of the Sick) still carries the totally unacceptable idea that illness is a visitation of God for sin or for the trial of a man's patience. Again, it should be set with a definitely positive frame of reference and be a means of restoration and of healing. One might make similar observations respecting our Penitential Office—which is, in fact, not a rite of penitence but of remorse. Without sacrificing the deeply personal and inward aspects of penitence and forgiveness this office could be given a much more explicit social reference, an end, at least, with some note of positive hope.

Likewise our initiation rites — baptism, instruction, and confirmation—need further underscoring in their positive elements; that is to say, the conception of nurture and growth in the fellowship of the Spirit can be strengthened, without losing sight of the important emphases of remission of sin and defense against evil. The recent publication of the Liturgical Commission, "Prayer Book Studies" (Church Pension Fund, 1950), is a step in this direction. It is very much to be desired that both the clergy and laity will receive these and such other studies for what they are—bases for study and discussion, so that we shall have a clearer mind, when the formal process of revision does come, of what we want to do. It is senseless to cut off all debate on the subject before any evidence is laid before us, as some dioceses have already done, simply on the grounds that revision is expensive or that people sometimes show partisan frenzy when discussing Prayer Book revision. If the need is sufficient then we shall surely find the means to meet it. And if we cannot discuss the improvement of our liturgy with restraint and open-mindedness then we are, indeed, in a very bad state of spiritual health.

But all idea of revision aside, there is an enormous opportunity for the more fruitful use of the very excellent liturgy which we now possess. Some very good ideas on this score can be found in the pamphlet of the National Council, "Parish Worship on Community Occasions" (reviewed in The Witness, August 10, 1950). Within the latitude granted by our general rubrics ("Concerning the Service of the Church") some controlled experiments with supplementary services or liturgical forms can be tried. But above all, the fundamental social implications of our liturgy, in particular the Holy Communion, can be taught in season and out. And not only taught, they can be exhibited if we have a mind to work creatively on ceremonial, with such things as the offertory procession and other features of what is commonly called "the parish communion." Surely the parish eucharist is the focal center around which all else must be built and towards which all else must be directed. Whatever the situation of the parish—urban, suburban, collegiate or rural—it is the social action of the Eucharist which gives relevance and makes necessary the social action of the Church.

Organized Labor Today

BY

HARVEY A. COX JR.

District Council Secretary, United Furniture Workers, CIO

Copyright 2020. Archives of the Episcopal Church / DFMS. Permission required for reuse and publication.

I TALK to you today not as a representative of the national CIO nor of my international union, the United Furniture Workers, but as a furniture worker, an Episcopalian and an E.L.S.A. member. It would be a big order for me to give a complete report on where organized labor in America is heading. I could not presume to do that. This will have to be more just telling you about the current problems of workers, and what we are trying to do about them.

I live in a small southern mill town which is a furniture manufacturing center, nationally known for its products. Thomasville, N. C., is not unlike many other towns in the industrial Piedmont section of the upper south. Let me tell you a little about the history of the struggles there. During the depression years there were various concerted efforts on the part of the workers, in furniture and textiles, and a number of strikes were carried on in that period. But these efforts and these strikes nearly all ended in failure. The bosses generally won, and the workers went back to work on the bosses' terms.

In 1945 the first serious attempt was made to organize furniture workers in Thomasville. The United Furniture Workers organized the largest plant in town, employing about 1500 persons. A strike for a contract was called in 1946. The workers struck and won. It was a strike in which a real unity, never seen before in this area, was demonstrated. White and Negro workers struck side by side, picketed side by side, ate in the commissary side by side. This unity paid off not only in dollars but also in a contract signed by a company that had boasted it would never recognize a union in its plant.

That was in 1946, the year when the CIO was winning such tremendous gains for its members, and at a time when the CIO was still a united, fighting organization for the workers. Shortly afterwards the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, and all labor was placed on probation, hamstrung and insulted. Only twenty-five percent of the American workers were organized, and Congress decided that the American labor movement was too strong!

Some of the leaders of the American workers proposed a boycott of the National Labor Relations Board, thereby making it defunct. The Taft-Hartley Act would have been a dead letter if they had refused to sign the non-communist affidavits, and refused to publish financial statements, these being required to qualify for the "services" of the board. John L. Lewis proposed this, and others agreed. However, some unions did comply with the requirements right away and then began raiding non-complying unions. This was the beginning of the terrible split in the CIO. The harmony and the united fighting that won gains for the workers went out the window when the orgy of red-baiting and stool-pigeoning began. Now this is led by the leaders of the CIO themselves!

Split in CIO

UNDER the cry of fighting Communism, the Murray-Reuther-Carey majority of the CIO leadership ordered all affiliated unions to "comply." This meant that those unions which opposed any policy, economic or political, which was adopted as CIO policy, were subject to expulsion, raiding and dismemberment. This all happened after Murray had reaffirmed the autonomy of all affiliated unions as late as 1946. Indeed it had always been the source of the CIO's strength that unions, and individual leaders of varying economic and political views were united under the banner of the CIO for the purpose of winning gains for the workers. When, in the 1948 CIO convention, a number of unions voiced opposition to the Marshall plan, they became "communist-dominated." Almost overnight Murray and Carey discovered that there were millions of slave laborers in Russia (though the bearing that this has on the conditions of American workers is hard to understand), and proceeded to brand many tried and tested leaders of unions as agents of a foreign power.

As this orgy of red-baiting was carried on by the "respectable" right-wing leaders of the CIO, it was aided very generously by the bosses' press and radio. It was not long before every worker who was a member of the CIO was on probation now not only before his government, but the CIO leadership as well. What was once a body of militant fighters for labor's rights to which workers by the millions rallied became a body dominated by its leaders. They made the CIO a part of the Democratic Party, and the party dominated the CIO.

Excerpts from an address given to the Conference of the Episcopal League for Social Action at Seabury House, September 4, 1950

This process is not, and has not been good for the American working people. It spreads suspicion and fear. It discourages any kind of criticism among the rank and file, and that is most necessary for the growth of any organization. What is shaping up for the organized labor movement in our country? I believe we are living under a shadow. The shadow is fascism. Organized labor is being molded into a Labor Front, in which the workers are not able to decide their own fate, but are placed more and more on probation before a self-perpetuating hierarchy that hands down policy. The workers used to formulate their own policy, and not in an atmosphere of fear. Now it is this same atmosphere of fear that keeps the policy-making leaders of the CIO in power.

Turning the Tables

BY

PHILIP H. STEINMETZ

Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

IN some gambling joints the tables have tops which turn over in an instant, hiding all the game equipment and changing the room into a legal restaurant when a raid threatens.

Some of the changes we make are like that turning of the tables. Our faults are hidden and we appear to be entirely all right. But we have not given up our wickedness. We have simply hidden it.

When he was tempted, Jesus made another kind of turning. He turned his back upon the evil. "Get thee behind me, Satan." Instead of hiding the evil thoughts which plagued him, he called them by name and turned away from them.

Since we belong to him and look to him for orders, we should practice turning our backs on the Devil and avoid trying to turn the tables when we are threatened with some disclosure of our thoughts or acts.

In order to do so we need to learn to recognize Satan when we meet him. That is where moral law and the advice of other people can help us.

But we also need to turn our backs once we recognize who faces us, for Satan never gets behind us on his own initiative. When he is there, it is because we have turned away from him. And we can expect that he will move around and try to deceive us again.

Turning the tables is the way the world deals with evil. Turning away is the Christian's method. Remember that when Satan comes your way again today.

Uncut Wood

BY

WILLIAM P. BARNDS

THERE lived near us sometime back a retired Methodist minister. He was about 80, and he took his exercise by sawing and splitting wood. He had his equipment and his logs on a lot nearby. One summer while on a little vacation trip, he died. On his lot were left some great logs which he had not finished cutting and which now he would touch no more.

Musing on this unfinished task, it occurs to me how people do leave many unfinished tasks when their last earthly hour comes. It may be only some uncut wood left by a man who had lived out more than his three score years and ten, or it may be a family of children left by a young mother. Many, many unfinished tasks are left by those who answer the call of death. In some cases it seems tragic that some people are not spared to fulfil more nearly certain important responsibilities; in other cases the unfinished work is no more important than was Mr. Moore's uncut wood for the body is old and the spirit welcomes Paradise.

It is fine to live so that one does leave some undertakings uncompleted, for that means living with an attitude of expectancy and hope for the future. Sad indeed is the lot of the person who does not welcome a new day. And if we live fully and well each day, God blesses our efforts and enfolds us and our work with his eternal love.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

WASHINGTON SURVEY ON PUBLICITY

★ The technique of reporting news of parish activities to the newspapers is outlined in a survey issued today by the department of promotion of the diocese of Washington. Entitled "Parish Public Relations: The Press," it includes a list of possible news items. The list ranges from the selection of a new clergyman and the building of a new church edifice, down to next Sunday's sermon topic.

The importance of getting the news to the newspapers in time is stressed—by Wednesday for the Saturday church-news pages.

Double-spaced typewriting is advised—"(triple-spaced is better)"—with name and telephone number of the sender at the top, so the editor can verify or amplify the information given. At least a quarter page of blank space comes next, the survey says, for the editor to write a headline and instructions to the typesetter. "Never write your own headline," is the warning. There is a bibliography on news techniques for churches.

The editor needs news that he considers interesting to a large number of persons. What that is can vary from editor to editor, and a good editor is always enriching his concept of desirable news.

A check list of elementary news subjects in a parish follows. All are handled as news of future events, as announcements of happenings to come. Except for the news of women's organizations, all are suitable for the church pages.

1. Selection of new clergyman, whether rector or assistant. With photo.

2. His arrival or first functioning.

3. Resignation of clergyman, and his plans.

4. His final service.

5. A guest clergyman.

6. Celebration of anniversary of parish, of clergyman, or any organization.

7. Building or remodeling of church, parish hall or other structure for parish use. Creating a game room in basement, etc.

8. Ceremony of burning a mortgage or its equivalent.

9. Talk by outside speaker to any parish group.

10. Rector's vacation, with plan for services in his absence.

11. Rector's return from vacation, with topic of first sermon or other program.

12. Church school: new director; any change in general approach or curriculum; beginning of school year; any special services; end of school year with awards.

13. Men's club: beginning of club year, with any special program for year; any special speakers or projects during year; election of officers; closing of season.

14. Women's organizations (address "Society Editor" or "Woman's Page Editor" instead of church editor, and give names of women who make up committees, as well as of leaders. Send these items in for any day, not just for Saturdays): Date and general plan for bazaar; more detailed plans for bazaar as its date approaches; final bazaar announcement on day before or morning of its date; start of organization's season, with any special program for year; any special speakers or projects during year; election of officers; closing of season.

In general: Don't slight any paper, even if you disagree with its editorial policy. Don't expect to make a perfect score with your news—nobody does that.

15. Sermon topics do not rate high as news, but are worth submitting if available in time each week. Put all church editors on mailing list for your published bulletin, if any. It will arrive too late for the current week, but may suggest future items.

Church lighting as an art can be coordinated with church lighting as a science to improve the architecture, the general decorative effect, and at the same time help put the congregation at ease and induce attention to the service. Note, in the illustration, that (1) the Nave is lighted by lanterns giving general diffused light, (2) the choir stalls are lighted by open bottom lanterns which give excellent light downward, yet little light in the eyes of the congregation and, finally, (3) two opaque shields suspended over the Communion rail give ample and well distributed light on the Altar and in the Sanctuary generally. NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

URGES WEST ADOPT NEW POLICY ON EAST

Let's quit making the United Nations "a cockpit for the capitalist-Communist struggle," Colonel M. Thomas Tchou, former secretary of China's nationalist president, Chiang Kai-Shek, urged in Cleveland. It should be transformed into a representative world government "by and for the citizens of the world with powers for maintaining peace and justice," Colonel Tchou told members of the inter-racial Church of all Peoples.

The colonel, who is a leader of the World Citizenship Movement, said the "West has failed to understand the problems and aspirations of the East. While the people of Asia want above all is political independence and economic betterment the West keeps preaching to them of the blessings of political democracy . . . and the benefits of the capitalistic system which has hitherto meant for them heartless exploitation."

"The West tells them about the evils of Communist totalitarianism, forgetting that the people in Asia are not interested in such isms," he continued. "To them, anyone who will support their demand for political independence and economic betterment is their friend, whether he be Communist or capitalist."

Colonel Tchou said, "Western governments have unwittingly undermined their own case by supporting inefficient and corrupt puppet rulers, such as Bao Dai."

These puppets are looked upon as "tools of the new imperialism," he asserted, "thus supplying the Communists with the opportunity to champion the cause of the people."

FEDERAL COUNCIL LAUNCHES ECONOMIC LIFE STUDY

A three-year study by American scholars in the social sciences on the relation of Christian ethics to economic life was launched last week by the Federal Council of Churches. The main topics to be studied are (1) the goals of economic life; (2) the value criteria which people use and the problems of conscience they face in economic decision-making; (3) the social responsibilities of individuals in economic activity; (4) the place of organized economic groups in modern life; (5) the standard of living as related to the content of consumption in modern society.

The study was launched with a $100,000 grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

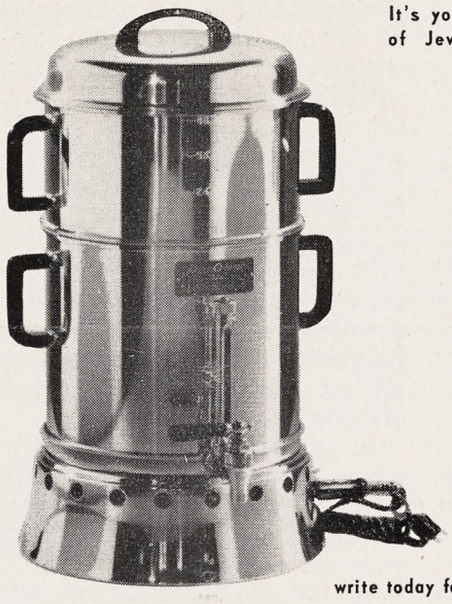
ARMY OF SPECIALISTS SAID TO BE NEEDED



Frank C. Laubach, missionary, asked a Dallas audience to contribute five per cent of their income to help finance a plan to save the world from Communism. He said that the plan would require 50,000 specialists and about two billion dollars. Stating that the U. S. is losing the cold war in Asia, he said that he knew why. "It is a reason that ambassadors and army generals will not know because they do not mingle with the masses of those countries. It is because those masses are hungry, miserable, sick, destitute and desperately unhappy—ready to rob and murder."

Laubach's cure for situations in China, India, Burma, Africa, is to send in specialists to teach agriculture, health, hygiene, journalism and other subjects, making it clear to the people of these countries that they can be prosperous like the people of the U. S. if they will only adopt our ways.

NEWS OF CHURCHES OVERSEAS

JAPANESE LEADERS EMBRACE MORAL REARMAMENT

A group of "changed" Japanese are now crusading in their country under the banner of "Moral Rearmament" which they believe is the answer to Communism. Included in the group of 42 are Diet members, the mayors of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, labor leaders, business tycoons and provincial governors.

For three weeks they absorbed MRA in the rarified atmosphere of Caux sur Montreux, a Swiss mountain resort. There they heard talks by Frank Bauchman, 72-year-old MRA leader and by visitors from around the world.

Lest MRA seems too much a matter of morals and too little of armament, Chojiro Kuriyama, Diet member, declared that if Russians land in Yokohama: "We will fight; we can't be sissy pacifists in a crisis."

Mrs. Yasutane Sohma, whose husband is president of Koshin Co., said about the atom bomb: "If you're going to have war you can't restrict the weapons of war. What does it matter if a man is killed in ten seconds or ten minutes."

Tokutaro Kitamura, also a member of the Diet, expressed the belief that MRA and democracy can convert the countries around Russia and contain Communism ideologically. One way MRA can help is by promoting cooperation between management and labor so that production will increase, Mr. Kitamura said. Greater production will raise Asia's low standards of living, a primary reason why Asia's people now readily absorb Communism.

"Our great desire is to make amends for our mistakes of the past by constituting our country a trusted partner of the United States in building a regenerated Asia," they said. "We came to the West in search of a new ideology which might fill the vacuum of belief among our non-Communist countries of the East. We believe MRA is a key to the future of Japan and to a new era of comradeship between Occident and Orient in the task of remaking the world."

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

Ordeal by Slander. By Owen Lattimore. Little, Brown & Co., $2.75.

This is a personal history of what can happen in America in these hysterical times. Included in the volume is a chapter relating the experience of Prof. Lattimore's wife, as well as what he himself went through from the day he heard of Senator McCarthy's charges until the end of his appearance before the Tydings' committee. The final chapter is an excellent analysis of the meaning of freedom. The anti-intellectualism, so characteristic of witch-hunts, is spread out before the reader's view. There is little self-pity in the book—it is more an endeavor to tell others what they will face when and "if your turn comes."

—A. M. Van Dyke

The Religion of Ancient Egypt. By Samuel A. B. Mercer. London. Luzac. £2-5-0.

This magnificent account of ancient Egyptian religion is not intended as a "history" (for the time has not yet come to write the history; it may never come, for the details of personalities and movements may never be fully focussed), but is a factual account of the gods, the rites, the theological systems, the mysteries, popular magic, and morals—which were of a remarkably high order. The final chapter deals with the influence of Egyptian religion outside that country during the Greek and Roman periods. Finally there is a good chronological summing-up, which many readers will wish to read first, and then go on to the volume as a whole. Dr. Mercer is one of our most eminent scholars, and has had many years experience as a teacher (Western Seminary, Chicago; Bexley Hall; then Trinity, Toronto, where for many years he has been head of the department of Semitics and Egyptology in the university). He is an expert popular teacher; accordingly the layman will find this book as interesting as the clergyman. And who can resist the spell of Ancient Egypt?

—F.C.G.

Jesus, Son of Man. By George S. Duncan. Macmillan, $3.50.

A carefully worked out thesis, by one of the leading Scottish New Testament scholars, that our Lord did not think of himself as Messiah but as Son of Man. The book is full of good things, though a bit dogmatic in tone on matters of controversy: for example, "In the century or two before Jesus came a darkness had fallen on the faith of Israel" (p. 31); "It is futile to look for the roots of this conception (of the Son of God) elsewhere than in the religion of Israel" (p. 108). The author would have done well to read and ponder certain obvious modern works before making such drastic statements! Thanks to the "iron curtain" that surrounds Britain—where it is illegal for a British subject to subscribe to foreign periodicals, and where American books and journals are almost unknown—the author perhaps did not have access to such a work as George Foot Moore's "Judaism"; but he should have known the German works (these are apparently admitted to Britain) that relate to his subject—such as those by Lohmeyer, Gressmann, Bousset. No Ph.D. candidate in America would be permitted to turn in a thesis which did not take account of the works on the subject by such eminent scholars.

White Witch Doctor. By Louise A. Stinetorf. Westminster, $3.00.

In fictional form Miss Stinetorf has written an interesting and informative account of the work of medical missions in Africa. As a child she traveled with her father in Africa, and in later years spent vacations there, and so has an abundance of first hand information for the background of her story. Since we are told in the foreword that many of the incidents are based on fact, she must also have had access to records of African medical missions. The story recounts the experiences of Sister Ellen, called to take over, in an emergency, the work of an older missionary. She has not only routine nursing to do, but has to shoulder a rifle and produce fresh meat for the hospital. When operations are needed, she has to act as surgeon. Her only assistants she has to train herself. One of them, an old pagan woman, she teaches to read Rausa, and even English—even medical books! Though slightly exaggerated, the story is intended to make the characters human and lovable, and in this she has succeeded admirably. Here is a true picture of life on a mission field—narrow in some ways, yet resplendent with the single motive of helping a pagan community to find a better way of living.—Elsie Jeffery.

Youth of the Church

By JOHN BOOTY
Ex-Chairman of the National Youth Commission

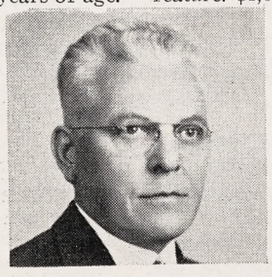
Fellowship is one of the simplest goals to achieve in our youth groups. Bring together a group of normal young people and they seem to easily adjust to rather lively group activities. Dances, games, picnics, skating parties, jaunts to the local juke box joint after meetings—these are all familiar aspects of the Church youth group. And because this happens conspicuously and seems to progress more easily than do the study, worship and service emphases, they tend to let fellowship take its own course. Indeed, the cry resounds, "Too much dancing, too much juke box. Not enough Christ centered Christianity." And we strive to study, work and pray as if in opposition to the fellowship emphasis.

To a degree the serious young Christian leader is right. Often the lament concerning too much fellowship is justified. For if fellowship is defined as merely dancing, coke and dating bureaus it seems to me to be suspect. In my travels around the country I have seen that far too many young people believe that matters concerning Christ are the boresome price to be paid for the parent-approved, interesting social fellowship. And I believe that if our youth groups are to contain this spirit and this emphasis, they might as well join the Ys or some school social club or fraternity. After all the secular groups' social activities are perhaps better prepared and more successful than ours. They have more money to work with and they don't seem to have Christ to slow down and impede their fellowship.

But I choose to define fellowship differently. In the church fellowship is communication and interaction first between man and God and secondly between man and man. The Church is the fellowship of believers. And according to this definition both the anti-fellowship attitude and the teen-talk, social butterfly attitude are dangerous. According to this definition the weakest part of our whole youth program is found in the area of fellowship. Fellowship ought to be the center and core of our work, the goal and aim of youth leaders.

The disease of this age in western civilization is the disintegration and splitting up of all of life. We compartmentalize and divide at every turn. We set up emphases and cafeteria line thinking. It is all false and immensely dangerous to Christianity. Actually fellowship is the core.

Either we believe in God or we do not. If we believe, we seek to know him. This means prayer, worship, Bible study. This means faith on our end meeting the Grace of God. This is the meeting of powers more potent and more devastating than any others.



And if we believe in God we must believe in all men whom he has created, and love all men and seek them out and serve them! This means loving our neighbors and our enemies. This means joining with our fellows at the altar throne of the King of Kings. This means joining in the army of the Almighty.

This is the true, the worthy fellowship emphasis. And this emphasis lays down the strong foundation upon which our friendship, loves and comradeships are built. With this attitude and viewpoint, no one need concentrate with heavy brows upon the ponderous problems of how to promote dances and games. Fellowship born of faith in God, finds fellowship with men, the necessary and natural expression of love.

The United Movement of the Church's Youth will devote a year to the promotion and definition of fellowship in the Church. The new plan is out and for sale. It is called "He in us and we in him." Here is a challenge for all of us. I am convinced that it is not so much that plan has been too difficult to use in the past, as it has been our own weakness and timidity in trying to deal with the fundamental concepts of our faith. The United Movement of the Church's Youth challenges all of us to discover or re-discover the power of Christian fellowship for ourselves and our fellow young people. Get your copy of PLAN! Send copies to those whom you know need it. (PLAN is twenty-five cents, available from the Division of Youth, 281 Fourth Ave., New York 10, N. Y.) And watch this column for hints on how the program can be used.

New Hospitalization No Time Limit Policy On Hospital Room and Board... Pays As Long As Doctor Tells You To Stay...Costs 3c A Day also Pays $1,000 or $5,000 For Accidental Death —Many Other Features For Accident Or Sickness

Here's news about a new hospitalization policy. In case of sickness or accident, it helps protect you and your family to meet financial problems that follow hospitalization. You are eligible from birth to 70 years of age. Costs only 3c a day and as low as 1½c a day for children under 18. We pay you even if you have other hospitalization insurance, including workmen's compensation. You need this extra protection because hospital costs have all gone sky-high. If you are hospitalized because of sickness or accident, it is comforting to have this new MUTUAL PAY-MASTER POLICY to help pay the bills. We pay you at the rate of $150 a month if hospitalized from sickness or accident (sanitarium and rest homes excluded). You are paid as long as your doctor tells you to stay. THERE IS NO TIME LIMIT.

We also pay at the rate of $100 extra per month for loss of wages while hospitalized for accident, in addition to all other benefits. THERE IS NO TIME LIMIT. Children under 18 years of age are not included in this feature. $1,000 or $5,000 is also paid for accidental death.

There are many other benefits. Provision for Infantile Paralysis too. Maternity at a slight extra charge. You select your own doctor or hospital anywhere in the U. S. A. We pay you direct.

Get all the facts of this extraordinary policy and learn for yourself that here at last is the hospital plan that pays the most for the least money. All this information is free with no obligation. NO AGENT WILL CALL. Everything will be sent to you by return mail absolutely free. Just send your name and address to: E. J. Becker, President Mutual Hospitalization Insurance Co., Dept. 7210, Wilmington, Delaware.

LINCOLN FIGART
Layman of Briarcliff Manor, N. Y.

In the last war I served my time; and although never saw action, I was prepared to. As then, and as now, I was loyal to my country and willing to fight for it. But today my ideas of how to fight are different. No more do I feel that the decency that the good part of my country means can be defended by the immorality of the bayonet and the degeneracy of the impartial bomb. I cannot feel that a Christ attacked would feel impelled to defend himself if it meant the murder of children, of women, of the innocent; nor that the Apostles would have put a faith in arms and force above trust in God.

If a great war should start again, how then can I and others who feel as I do avoid the necessity for serving with guns and yet show that they are not using pacifism to cover their fear. Of course, the answer (and other religious sects have reached this conclusion) lies in the willingness to serve in positions of danger while following the concepts of Christianity in caring for the sick and wounded.

It seems to me, that now is the time for us to prepare ourselves for this and that The Witness can start the movement. Let us form companies of men along the line of National Guard units which train one night a week with added home study. Give training and education for the men to become good medics, and build these groups on sound Christian ideology. Let us be serious, determined, and dedicated; let us perhaps be a little fanatical and pledge ourselves to peace; let us proclaim our faith. Let us pledge ourselves to administer to all men of all beliefs; let us have a loyalty only to Christ and his principles.

If the numbers of men who were interested were large, we could build the units with men in the same draft classifications. Thus, if the situation became bad, the unit could go in together. Intensive training could be given to those who might be called up quickly, for instance seventeen-year-olds.

However, these are details to be worked out, what is needed is a program for those of us who believe in a loving God, and perhaps a program that its meaning may spread and strength may grow into more than a means for us to follow Christ, but into a force for peace in the world.

I wonder if The Witness and those who read The Witness might feel that this is a worthy program to work for?

F. C. HAMMOND
Vicar of All Souls', San Diego, Cal.

A dangerous little sheet appeared in my mail, called "Christian Economics." I say dangerous because it attempts to tie Christianity up with a partisan—I'd say N.A.M.—view of economics. There is no such thing as Christian economics. We may have, ought to have, and I hope some day will have, an economy, world-wide, based upon Christian motivations and standards. But this sheet to my mind is a deception and a delusion. As long as it is N.A.M. economics why not title it that. It seems that the N.A.M. drive to indoctrinate the clergy and make them disciples of their particular views is working well. Could we have a word on this new organ from, say, Joseph F. Fletcher of E.T.S.?

A Statement of Purpose

The Gospel of Jesus Christ is the promise of human redemption. It begins with the demand for radical social change—"Repent." The way of salvation for the whole of creation is "Newness of Life." The imperative for radical change is rooted in the doctrine of the sovereignty of God, under whose judgment (and mercy) the Church and all human society constantly stands. It is manifested by the Holy Spirit in the reality of history, namely that for each generation, the decisive time is always "at hand." For our generation, it is NOW.

In this period of history

The Episcopal League for Social Action

STANDS primarily for the Christian duty of accepting and promoting social change to meet the needs of the neediest in our own nation and throughout the world — recognizing that the crucial needs to be met are in the realm of livelihood and the status of all workers;

REAFFIRMS its concern for industrial democracy, and continues to support the right of workers to organize and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing;

PLEDGES active work for peace through international cooperation;

VIGOROUSLY SUPPORTS civil liberties and democratic race relations;

LABORS unremittingly within the Church for a clearer and more general recognition of her mission of social change.

We invite all members of the Episcopal Church who share such convictions and intentions to join with us in study and action.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Fund of a Million and a Half Set Up By the Council

Fund Was for China But Bishop Sherrill Said It Cannot Be Used There Now

BY
ANDREW M. VAN DYKE

★ Routine reports of the departments and divisions took up most of the time of the meeting of the National Council at Seabury House on October 11th and 12th. The remainder of the sessions provided some lively issues.

Outstanding was the announcement of the Presiding Bishop that the money in the Reconstruction and Advance Fund totaling $1,661,000 allocated for work in China "cannot be wisely expended at present." He spoke of his recent visit to the 8th province and his talks with the bishops of the Pacific Coast where they are trying to meet the needs of millions of people who have recently come into the section. Bishop Sherrill stated that he hoped the Council would make a "great and thrilling move." He proposed that $1,500,000 of the amount not yet used in China be set up as a fund from which it would be possible for all dioceses and districts in the whole Church to borrow for capital expenditures in new work. The resolution introduced required that application for such loans should come from the bishop, standing committee or council of advice, and the executive committee of a diocese or missionary district. The president, treasurer and director of the home department of National Council would approve the loan, which would be without interest, and would be paid back at the rate of 1/10th each year for ten years.

Mitchell Asks Question

Bishop Mitchell asked if such "isn't freezing the China situation?" The Presiding Bishop explained that it was not using all the funds right away, and there would be $150,000 returned each year. In answer to other queries he said that "Reconstruction and Advance Funds are not a trust fund, so we could give all where we wanted to." No interest would be charged because there would be little expense involved in administering the money. He was firm in answering the suggestion of Bishop Dun that it was not always good to invest funds in the family, adding that the money would be "conserved" for China. Bishop McKinstry asserted that he was sure that if the Communists were thrown out of China tomorrow, Church people would be so thankful that they would give to another fund for that country. Bishop Hobson insisted that neither previously, nor for the future could a final commitment be made as to where the R.&A. money was to be spent. Conditions existing at a given moment determines that.

Bishop Block Speaks

Bishop Block wanted it known that originally the diocese of California had wanted to handle its own needs itself, but it had been found necessary to join with Los Angeles in raising a capital fund of three million for Church hospitals. He pointed out that when there was an emergency, "we don't ask where, we go." We are a national Church, he said, not an amalgamation of dioceses, and in the last few weeks he has started two missions and could start 18 more tomorrow, which would be profitable for the whole Church for they would soon be supporting it. The resolution was passed, with enthusiasm.

China Situation

Treasurer Russell Dill spoke of the situation which faced the Church in China. He said that the financial representative of the Church in the Shanghai area had informed him that the tax levied by the government would be about $50,000. It would be paid in order to avoid "confiscation of property or maltreatment of missionaries." The Council authorized the sale of certain properties which are not at present utilized in order to cut down the tax burden.

Chaplains

After the report of Chaplain Hall of the Armed Forces Division, Bishop Sherrill made a most empassioned and moving talk. Mr. Hall pointed out that in April we had 66 chaplains on duty, now there were 94, and that by next June they would probably number about 150. He was greatly disturbed by the erroneous report in the Living Church that there was only one Episcopal chaplain in Korea. Actually, there were three with the infantry, two with the navy, two with the air forces, and two on hospital duty in Japan. Since Episcopalians, on a numerical basis have a quota of only 3% of the chaplain's corps, our representation in that sector was quite high. Bishop Sherrill, in

BISHOP DEPLORES MASS MOVEMENTS

★ Modern emphasis on mass movements and mass causes rather than upon the individual will not work in the Church, 6,500 of the Rhode Island diocese were told by Presiding Bishop Henry K. Sherrill. To be vigorous, he said, religion must be personal, not second-hand. Bishop Sherrill preached to more than one-fifth of the confirmed membership of the Church in Rhode Island at the closing service of a two-week mission sponsored by the diocese.

The climax to the first statewide evangelistic effort in the diocese in 14 years was preceded by a solemn procession of more than 1,200 persons. Taking part in the service besides Bishop Sherrill were Bishop Granville G. Bennett of Rhode Island, and three bishops from other dioceses who remained on for the final event after conducting missions in individual parishes. Missions had been held in nearly all of the 78 parishes of the diocese during the two-week period.

Bishop Sherrill contrasted the personal appeal of Christ in his day to the modern emphasis upon mass movements. "Today we have mass industry, mass propaganda, mass education and sometimes mass hysteria," said the bishop. "We think we have accomplished something if we have a program, committees and a large organization."

But in the Church, he said, "these things have no meaning unless they are related to the pastors and to the people in the pews. There is the hope and the strength of the Church."

"Even in this great and inspiring congregation," he told the nearly filled Rhode Island Auditorium, where the service was held, "each of us cannot escape standing alone in the presence of the Master talking directly to you and to me."

BISHOP CONKLING VISITS MacARTHUR

★ Bishop Wallace E. Conkling of Chicago, who is now making a six weeks' visit to Japan and the Philippine Islands, had a 45 minute private interview with Gen. Douglas MacArthur on Sept. 25. The bishop reported that Gen. MacArthur spoke at length and "most earnestly" for the abolition of war as a means of solving international problems, and quoted the general as follows: "War is outmoded as a solution of our problems. The people of every land—millions of them—are against war. Our leaders must find the way to bring relations between the nations up to the higher plane on which the people now are."

Bishop Conkling said his interview with the general also included a discussion of the spiritual problems related to the military occupation of Japan and to the rehabilitation of that country.

The bishop arrived in Japan Sept. 22 and on the same day met with the House of Bishops of the Japan Episcopal Church. On the following Sunday he administered confirmation to a class of candidates from the occupation colony, including several officers on Gen. MacArthur's staff. Mrs. MacArthur and her son were members of the congregation at this service.

Bishop Conkling also inspected St. Luke's hospital in Tokyo, which the Episcopal Church is enlarging as part of its missionary program. He reported that the normal capacity of the hospital is 600 but it now has about 1,700 patients.

The bishop talked with several American soldiers wounded in the Korean campaign, and reported that they are getting the best of medical care. He said he also visited a small ward filled with North Korean wounded prisoners, who appeared to be "practically children, about 16 years old."

Bishop Conkling is scheduled to return to Chicago Oct. 31 and will tell of his trip at a series of meetings throughout his diocese. The first of these meetings, for the clergy, will be held at 1 p. m. on Nov. 2 in the Furniture club, 666 Lake Shore Drive.

EFFICACY OF PRAYER TESTED BY RECTOR

★ The Rev. H. Hamilton Aulenbach, rector of Christ Church and St. Michael's, Philadelphia, who has a flair for publicity, got a story in the papers by offering a prayer for the success of the Phillies at the service the Sunday before the world series. According to one paper "the rectory phone has been buzzing since with delighted fans who say the Rev. certainly provided a prayerful assist to Eddie Sawyer & Co."

The managing editor of The Witness, who stuck a sign the size of a silver dollar on his shirt announcing "I'm for the Yanks," claims that his bit of magic was more effective than the parson's prayer.

AUXILIARY HEARS UN SPECIALIST

★ Mrs. Iva G. Sprague recently addressed the auxiliary of the Syracuse area of the diocese of Central New York on the work of the United Nations. She was one of six U. S. delegates to attend the meeting last year of the U. N. commission on the status of women which was held in Beirut, Lebanon. She has also been an official of the U. N. in Germany, working on relief.

The meeting was preceded by a celebration of the holy communion by Bishop Peabody, assisted by Bishop Higley.

BAY VILLAGE HAS NEW CHURCH

★ The cornerstone of St. Barnabas Church, Bay Village, Ohio, was laid recently with Bishop Tucker, Bishop Burroughs and the Rev. William S. Brown, minister-in-charge, officiating. The stone is a historic one since it is a relic of "Old Kenyon," the dormitory of Kenyon College which burned two years ago.

The church was made possible by the will of Dr. Clara Gillard of Pt. Clinton, Ohio, who left about $65,000 to the diocese for a church to be built at whatever location the bishop and diocesan council decided. Members of the mission are now raising funds so that the $78,000 church may be free of debt when it is completed this winter. The mission was founded four years ago and the congregation has been holding services in the high school.

SCHOOL FOR CHURCHMEN IN LOS ANGELES

★ A school for churchmen is being held on three Tuesday evenings this month at St. James', Pasadena, Calif., arranged by the Rev. Benson Bellis, associate rector of the parish. Lectures are being given by the Rev. Edward E. Hailwood of Altadena; the Rev. Herbert V. Harris of La Crescenta and the Rev. David Scovil of Alhambra. The purpose is to instruct the laymen on the work of the Church overseas, in the nation, in the diocese.

NEWARK CLERGY EDIT CANVASS MATERIAL

★ The clergy of the diocese of Newark, at a recent meeting, discussed at length the material being sent from national headquarters for the every member canvass and decided that it has a negative emphasis—too much setting Christianity over against "materialistic atheism." A committee was therefore set up, under Bishop Ludlow, which has deleted a number of paragraphs in the material sent by the National Council.

THEATRE MANAGER HONORED

★ The movie, "No Way Out," dealing with race prejudice was banned in Chicago. But not so in Syracuse, N. Y. due to Harry H. Unterfort, manager of a chain of theatres. He was cited for his action by the Syracuse branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People whose president is Mr. William G. Rushing, a vestryman of St. Philip's. Present at the ceremony was the Rev. Walter P. H. Parker, vicar of St. Philip's.

BISHOP OF ELY IN SEATTLE

★ Bishop Harold E. Wynn of Ely, England, was the preacher at St. Mark's Cathedral, Seattle, October 1. His western tour included preaching at Grace Cathedral, San Francisco; taking part in the consecration of Bishop Henry Shires as suffragan of California; conducting a conference for the clergy at the School of the Prophets, San Francisco.

ALBANY RADIO PROGRAM RETURNS TO AIR

★ The Episcopal Hour, weekly radio program of the diocese of Albany, returned to the air for the winter over an Albany station on October 6 and a station at Malone on the 13th. New plans include broadcasts from various communities at a dinner or parish meeting. The Rev. Dudley J. Stroup, director, is now negotiating with other stations for similar programs.

RECORD ENROLLMENT AT GENERAL

speaking of the subject, said that he was getting tired of hearing that if we only had an heroic Presiding Bishop or an heroic suffragan bishop for the armed forces then every Episcopalian in the military could have communion every Sunday. He pointed out how impossible it was because of the realities of our quota, which is more than met, for chaplains, and affirmed them to be fair realities. He knew that the department of defense in Washington could not quite understand these ecclesiastical and theological points, and that the matter was not going to be solved by sentimental suggestions, but by working with the general chaplains commission.

The Woman's Auxiliary has published a new brochure called "Inside 281." The treasurer of National Council, Mr. Dill, again delivered himself of the situation in the headquarters, where he insisted that "lack of space breeds inefficiency." No more employees can be accepted because there is not room for them. Storage space has had to be found in various parts of New York City, and being decentralized is expensive. A million dollars is needed for a new building, and it will have to be done before long.

RUSSELL E. DILL tells National Council of the situation that faces the Church in China

Treasurer Dill also spoke of the effect of inflation on salaries in "281," both of secretaries and officers. Of the former he declared that even with the 5% cost of living increase, a top secretarial salary in New York is $60-70, and we are paying $52. Four employees of value left two weeks ago because of inadequate salaries.

Promotion

Bishop Hobson, in reporting for the department of promotion, commended both the Rev. Arnold Lewis and Mr. Robert Jordan for the splendid leadership training program for the laymen. He also gave a plug for the movie produced by the department called "Window on the Sky" at a cost of $10,000 which is to be liquidated by rentals and sales. The movie is of the work among the Navajo Indians at Fort Defiance. Mr. Jordan also displayed a sample of the new roadside sign for Episcopal churches. It is of porcelain enamel over steel with a Church shield in the center and lettered "The Episcopal Church Welcomes You," and then room for a personalized message at the bottom. Complete with pole and arm, it will sell for just under $30, and will soon be available.

The department of Christian Education introduced new members of the staff including the Rev. Walter Williams, Mary Rhees Villerett, Eleanor Snyder, Marian Parsons, Dr. Florence Jennings. The adult division said that a new course on the hymn book is nearly ready. In preparation are also study pamphlets in cooperation with the Woman's Auxiliary and the department of Christian social relations.

Roanridge

The Rev. Gresham Marmion reported on the progress made on the buildings for the Rural Training center at Roanridge. The town and country division gave training to 209 students this summer, including 22 women. Mr. Marmion announced the appointment of the Rev. William Spofford Jr., as working with the unit of research and field study at Roanridge, pastor of Union Chapel at Parkville, Mo., and head of the department of sociology at Park College. This prompted the remark from Bishop Sherrill, "What does he do with his spare time?"

There were reports on college work by the Rev. Roger Blanchard; displaced persons by the Rev. Almon Pepper; World Council of Churches, with Bishop Dun presenting a report by Mr. Charles Taft in which The Witness was branded as "dishonest" for urging support of the World Council's call for "conciliation and negotiation" of the hostilities in Korea.

BISHOP ROBERTS SPEAKS ON CHINA

★ Bishop William Roberts, until recently the Bishop of Shanghai, addressed meetings at St. John's, Laceyville, and St. Peter's, Tunkhannock, Pa., on the evenings of October 9 & 10. He also talked informally with the clergy of Tunkhannock at a luncheon meeting. He gave a vivid and first hand account of conditions in China, which he left as recently as July.

TEACHERS INSTITUTES IN NEW JERSEY

★ The department of religious education of New Jersey, under the direction of the Rev. Victor Hoag, is sponsoring sixteen teachers' institutes in various parishes this month.

Citizen of the Kingdom

THE letter written by the Rev. Claude Williams, which appeared in this paper October 5th, should make us all wonder about the effectiveness of our Christianity. The writer of this letter, as a follower of "the way of righteousness," lists himself as an "agent of a foreign power" whose aims are diametrically different to those exhibited currently by the United States. Such a line is certainly far from that taken by most ecclesiastics of our time who are going all out to show that the aims of their organizations are almost indistinguishable from those of the United States at home and abroad, often even going the government one better. Such ecclesiastics, we need hardly add, are in high and respectable places, and receive powerful approbation.

Is Christianity subversive of the status quo, or is its function to support unthinkingly the powers-that-be? For us the question is whether the Kingdom of God is ultimately identifiable with capitalist democracy as found in the United States, or is the former something more than, and also something over against, the latter? If this question is raised in terms of the Kingdom and communism there is no doubt about the answer, but at home it would seem to be that the American way comes before the way of righteousness. Communist countries can, of course, be criticized from the Christian point of view, although that criticism would not necessarily condemn them for the things that capitalist propaganda does. Capitalist countries can be criticized from the Christian point of view but in America the Church has, with few exceptions, sold out its prophetic office.

The proof of this is that Christianity in America is not being persecuted; on the contrary, its members are held up as the staunchest defenders of the status quo and surest antidote to subversion. The Church in the U. S. occasionally chastises a few individuals but it does not condemn the world, except as it exists outside the borders of the U. S. and its satellites. The Church has ceased to stand in judgment on our society, except of course, on that section which lies behind the Iron Curtain. If Christians were taking a stand against the things in our own community and nation which are un-Christian, they would now be persecuted, smeared, shunned, or even called communists. The early Christians were not put to death for saying their prayers, burning incense, or preaching platitudes about the Pax Romana. These are all harmless activities and do not account for the bitter hostility of the status quo against the new movement. The only tenable conclusion is that the Roman powers-that-be considered the Christians to be the subversive agents of a foreign power.

"QUOTES"

THE Churchman will come to church at least every Sunday.

He will come to church on time, kneel for prayers, sing the hymns, say the responses.

He will receive the Holy Communion with regularity.

He will say his private prayers morning and evening every day.

He will ask God to bless his meals.

He will read his Bible.

He will make a regular contribution to his Church according to the local plan of giving.

He will also make a regular contribution to the missionary work of the Church.

An Unruly Member

GOVERNOR DEWEY'S blast against the Russians at the dinner at which New York City was host to all members of the United Nations has received general condemnation as an inexcusable breach of good taste. But it was more than that; it did a grave disservice both to this country and to the world. For these are days in which we must guard that "unruly member," the tongue, if we really desire peace. The governor's act was, unfortunately, typical of many who supposedly guide the destinies of mankind. We seemed to recall a warning in the Book of Proverbs and there, in the eighteenth chapter, we found these words: "Death and life are in the power of the tongue." Obvious though it be, we need to remind ourselves that in this world of modern communications the power of the tongue for good or evil has been magnified to the nth degree.

It is true that the Russians have practiced the art of abuse to a high extent—sometimes to the point of absurdity. But should that persuade us to follow their examples? Must we both roll in the same gutter? As a friend of ours put it the other day in deploring the unrestrained, wasteful and dangerous ranting that goes on among the United Nations; "It seems as if God ought to appear in the midst of them and say, 'Shut up, all of you; you sit here and you sit there and you stand in the corner and listen to me'!"

Let's air our views by all means; but let it be clean air—after listening to God.

The Episcopal Church — What's Wrong?

BY

HYATT HOWE WAGGONER
Professor at Kansas City University

SAID Mr. X in response to our request for money, "Yes, I'll give you ten dollars. I don't come to church very often. I'd like to come more than I do. Dr. Y's sermons are real interesting. I don't care what a man believes or what church he goes to, as long as he's a decent man. I go to hear Dr. Y's sermons. There's always something in them you can profit by."

Mr. X went on for some time in this vein while we fidgeted on our chairs and calculated the number of calls we had still to make that afternoon. We got the money finally and departed. I mentally tallied up another person listed on the books as a communicant who hadn't the faintest notion, apparently, what Christianity in general and Episcopalianism in particular are all about.

Only a few days later I had another communicant say to me, "No, I don't get there as often as I'd like to. I'm usually pretty busy on Sundays. But I like to go. Dr. Y is sure on his toes. He always makes the service interesting and worth while."

One final example. (I've been keeping notes on little conversations like these for some time. I'm interested in finding out what Christianity means to Christians.) This person, a communicant of another parish, a regular church-goer, an admirable character, and a person of more than average education, was asked in my presence about a point of doctrine. "Goodness!" she said. "Isn't that what you call theology? I wouldn't know anything about it. Our rector never mentions those things. Of course I guess there's something about it in the Prayer Book, but . . ."

These are among my favorite illustrations of a point I want to make. And what do they mean? Well, many things no doubt, but the central essence of their meaning can be summed up under one general heading: the weakening, the watering down, the sentimentalizing of the faith, and the secularization of the Church. They mean that there are vast numbers of people in the Church who neither understand nor feel, nor would accept if they were brought to understand, the historic faith. They mean that very large numbers of Episcopalians are merely nominal Christians. They mean that before the Church can expect to be very effective in winning over the pagans outside the Church, it must convert the pagans in the Church. How our Church compares with others in this respect is not my topic; and anyway, I think it would be well to look to the beam in our own eye and not try to find comfort in the thought that certain other Churches may be even more vulnerable to this charge.

Bernard Iddings Bell has said that while the Church is always trying to win over the world, the world, in its turn, is always trying to assimilate the Church; and he has added that in recent years the world has been making rather the better progress in the race. Now this of course is not a pleasant idea at all. Many of us no doubt have already thought of half a dozen answers: how the Church as a whole is growing, how a certain parish we know of confirmed over a hundred adults at Easter, how another parish met with ease a budget 15% larger than last year's, how the Church appeals to so many of "the better sort of people" in town, how the Church is really doing a lot of good.

But are these good answers? Do they really meet the issue? If the world in our time ex-

NOTE:—I should like to forewarn the reader that the articles that follow present only one-half of the whole subject. The other half is "What's Right with the Episcopal Church." But this other half is not the subject on which I was asked to write. I should also like to ask the reader to believe that though in what follows I have naturally had specific examples in mind to support my generalizations, I have deliberately refrained from picturing in recognizable form any specific parish, rector, or communicant.

presses its age-old hostility to the Christian way not by attempting to destroy the Church but by taking it over, then the very answers I have suggested (and I have heard them, or ones like them, from the lips of many) may give our case away rather than strengthening it. Indeed I am convinced that the answers that the average communicant would make to the charge of the secularization of the Church would be adequate evidence of the essential validity of Dr. Bell's judgment.

Typical Parish

TAKE for instance a typical large-city parish. It lists, let us say, 2500 communicants. A very large proportion of these do something toward supporting the church—some give very generously—so that it does not need to struggle in poverty. It makes generous budgets and meets them. But in a church seating, say, five hundred, there is a mere scattering, except at Easter, at early communion, and a full church only at eleven. Few come to mid-week services unless those services are tied in with meetings of clubs and organizations, which are in a very flourishing condition. Somewhat more than a fifth of the communicants, in short, attend church regularly. If any parish has reliable figures which show this estimate to be untypical, I should like to see them.

But supposing the percentage were even as high as a half—what then? How much dedication, how much devotion, how much understanding is there even among those who come regularly? I do not mean by "understanding," a knowledge of the finer points of theology but a simple grasp of the fundamentals of Christian doctrine. How much knowledge of the Bible do all these well-dressed and—in terms of the national average—well-educated people have? How much faith? How many can, or would, except in church (where they are protected by anonymity and the fact that the repetition of the words of the Prayer Book is a "mere form") say that they believe, really believe, the creeds? How embarrassed they would be if that question were asked across the table at a Chamber of Commerce luncheon! If my conversations and observations have not led me completely astray, the answer must be: a very tiny fraction.

But, some of you are undoubtedly answering me at this point, everyone knows that there are more professing Christians than real ones. What's new about all this? And what has it to do with the Episcopal Church? Is it more true of us than of others?

Yes, I fear that it is more true of us than of some. And perhaps less true than of some others; but that is not the point. There is small comfort in being better than the poorest in any scale of judgment. The peculiar weakness of the Episcopal Church, it can hardly be doubted, for all the soundness of its official doctrine and the catholicity of its traditional practice, is that it contains unusually large numbers of merely nominal Christians. Hence it is that a friend of mine who is a priest in the Church calls the Church a "sleeping beauty." A beauty, yes, with everything in doctrine and liturgy and tradition that a true Church should have; but asleep, deeply asleep.

Here is the paradox: a Church which, if one were to judge simply by reading the Prayer Book or studying its chief theologians, is doctrinally one of the most conservative, traditional, and pure of the Churches; yet also a Church which, if one were to judge by private conversation with a cross-section of a typical congregation, or even, I must admit, with a good many of the clergy, is high on the list of those denominations which are "successful" today because they have learned to conform to the ways of the world, to be "well-adjusted" to their environment. When this has meant, and it usually has, giving up that which was foolishness to the Greeks, they—and we—have given it up. This is the paradox, and a very sad one it is: the official doctrine is to be found in the Prayer Book, and the Bible, but the living doctrine of many if not most parishes is to be found in the pages of the Reader's Digest.

Why Such a State?

I COME then to what I think is the chief reason for this state of affairs in our Church. Why should a Church which has so much—which has, in fact, everything needful and right—be in a state that, however flourishing it may appear to the merely external and quantitative view, is really in something like its condition in the 18th century, when it was so soundly asleep that not even the Wesleys could wake it up?

There are, no doubt, many partial reasons, including those that are threatening the inner life of all the other Protestant Churches; but there is one special and peculiar reason, and it is to this that we should look. The Episcopal Church is fashionable. It appeals to more than its share of the "better people" in every city and town. There is a certain prestige in middle-class circles connected with being an Episcopalian that is not connected with, say, being a Baptist or a Nazarene. If any who belong to these Churches read this, I hope I shall not be misunderstood: what I am saying will, if it is true, tell in the last judgment against the Episcopalians, not against the others. Episcopalians are in general better dressed, more stylish, better educated than most of the congregations of the other Churches. If the Unitarians can claim the largest number of listings in Who's Who in America in proportion to their numbers, we can probably claim to be the most solidly and perfectly upper-middle class.

And what does all this mean? It means that, since the world has been very good to most Episcopalians, we are not at all inclined to be dissatisfied with the world. One does not bite the hand that feeds, or rock the boat in which one has such a large stake. It means that, respectable and prosperous as we are—and respectability is largely a function of prosperity—we find it very hard to think of anything to repent of. The Prayer Book is so unreasonable in parts. As a clergyman once said to me, "You can't expect people to take all that seriously in these days." Nothing can be really wrong, we are sure; there is no deep-seated trouble. Nothing is amiss that a little larger annual subscription will not set right. I remember the very negative comments I once heard on the substance of a splendid and deeply inspired sermon on the text from St. Paul, "Be ye not conformed to the world."

Now this complacency, this pervasive extreme Pelagianism, is nothing more nor less than pride. For pride need not manifest itself as offensive vanity or overt conceit. The world recognizes, and disapproves, such pride, and it has its own penalties for it. So pride takes a subtler form, a form which the world not only does not punish but actually applauds: an easy satisfaction with things as they are, a belief in the certainty of "progress," a belief in the natural goodness of human nature just as it is, a firm conviction that there is nothing really radically wrong—except of course with the "criminal classes," with gangsters and crooked politicians and sexual perverts, all of whom make the chief targets in sermons against vice: it is so easy, and even in a way comforting, to deplore the wickedness of those who commit the grosser crimes; it never irritates anyone in the congregation to hear sex murderers denounced in the strongest terms. All this is a manifestation of pride.

And pride, I should not have to tell Episcopalians (but judging from the ones I know, I do have to), is, by good and scripturally founded Christian tradition, considered the most deadly of the deadly sins. I know a good many nominal Christians, including some Episcopalians, who do not believe in sin. They are really relativists and naturalists, whatever they may call themselves. But Christians believe in it, and I shall not here argue with non-Christians. Could it be that the swank that attaches to Episcopalians, and the general prosperity and stylishness of Episcopalians, actually work to breed in us the worst of sins? I fear so; and if so, what a frightful thing this is! Episcopalians who are also Christians should get down on their knees every day and pray to be delivered from this sin to which everything tempts them.

Average Episcopalian

BUT this matter of the complacency which is a manifestation of a subtle pride is not all. Who is that prosperous, respectable good citizen, this pretty-well-educated and pretty decent average Episcopalian I have been talking about? Well, he is the epitome of what might be called, in American terms, the upper-middle and upper classes. He is the average business man, lawyer, doctor, bank cashier—or his wife. He is a member of the Rotary, the Kiwanis, the Republican party (except in the South), the Masons. He reads the newspaper and the Reader's Digest; his wife sometimes reads a book of the month. He is, in fact, that superficially heartening specimen, the typical modern man at his non-Christian best: half educated, educated beyond folk culture but without anything to put in its place except synthetic mass-culture, rootless, optimistic by training and conviction, though he may have ulcers from worry and suppressed unhappiness, full of ideas that have seeped down to the mass man from the intellectual currents of the Romantic movement—like Swinburne's "Glory to man in the highest, for man is the master of things," and Henley's "I am the captain of my soul." All this he is, this typical Episcopalian I have been talking about.

Now this makes very unpleasant reading, I am sure; and I am sorry to have to write it. But it seems to me to be true, and to have a very important consequence, which is this: that today at least, if it has not always been true, the class least open to persuasion to the Christian faith, least able, naturally, to give their whole hearts to the Saviour, to become as little children, to believe, is this half-educated, prosperous middle class. For not only their prosperity but their ideas—which are diluted and half-baked versions of those held by intellectuals of the last century, when it seemed that science and a rising standard of living had made Christianity both untrue and unnecessary — put very nearly insurmountable barriers in their way.

The poor, the unfortunate, the unsuccessful, the sick—these are not tempted to feel that they do not need God; and the ignorant do not have to overcome the resistance of a secular "climate of opinion," for they do not share the climate of opinion, never having been educated upto scientism and naturalism and relativism. These people do not share fully in the benefits, some real and some not, of our secular culture and so are not likely to be positivists or pragmatists. For positivism and pragmatism are notions which have been promulgated by popular education, which is not only non-religious but usually actively anti-religious (the influence of John Dewey and the gospel according to Teacher's College); and the poor and the ignorant have not been deeply affected by education. They do not know enough to know that science has ruled out the supernatural, that Freud has declared God to be a delusion originating in the father-complex, or that most of the "better minds" are today scientific humanists. There is a chance for them to become and remain Christians without coming sharply and painfully into conflict with our mass culture.

The Intellectuals

AND there is another class which finds it possible to have faith without too much conflict but for the opposite reason. I mean the upper reaches of the "intellectuals." Unlike the poor and the ignorant, who have not yet grown up to a share in our culture, this class—very small, but very influential—includes many who have moved, as it were, through and beyond our culture to a point where they can criticize it. Knowing many cultures, they have a choice: they are not helplessly bound by the "climate of opinion" of our age, by that pervasive set of unquestioned thought patterns that are always assumed, not proved, because they seem as obvious as common sense. There has been a rather vigorous revival of Christianity among this class of late. A rather high percentage of our best writers and critics, for example, confess the Christian faith—a significantly larger percentage than did thirty or forty years ago. The two greatest poets writing in English today, for instance, T. S. Eliot and W. H. Auden, are both Christian converts (Anglicans); and two of the best of our American critics, Allen Tate and R. P. Blackmur, are Christians (Anglicans).

But in between these two classes, in between the poor and the ignorant on the one hand and the intellectuals on the other, there is a great class which finds it much harder to become and remain Christian. This is the great non-intellectual middle and (as the term is used in America) upper class. And this, unfortunately, is the very class which is the "strength" of the Episcopal Church. This class, which finds it so hard to believe and so nearly impossible to repent, is the very class which makes up the bulk of any typical parish. How can we expect these people to believe in what is as foolish to the pragmatists, including the "educationalists" who teach those who teach our children, as it was to the Greeks? Knowing a little—just a little—literature, this class knows that most of the best literature for the last century and a half has been either non or anti-Christian. Knowing a little science, it knows that only that which can be proved by scientific experiment is true. Knowing a little—a very little—philosophy, as that seeps down into the popular magazines and best-selling books, it knows that if man will only use his mind and be a good scientific pragmatist, he will solve all his problems.

Knowing a little of all this, how can this class say "I believe"? Faith that goes against the best that one knows cannot be a working faith, or a secure one. Yet what the average middle class American today "knows" conflicts squarely with the heart of the Christian faith. Of the Church visible it may be safely said that it cannot be much better than the class from which it chiefly draws its support. The question then is not why there are not more really dedicated Christians in the Church, but how there can be so many. A Church which depends for its success as a going institution upon a class which more than any other finds belief difficult is in a dangerous situation. And that is precisely the situation of the Episcopal Church today.

WATER

By PHILIP H. STEINMETZ

WATER is so common that we may forget its importance. And it seems so weak standing in a pool that we may forget its strength. We may even resent it when rain spoils a party or floods wreck our home.

But water is supreme on earth. Nothing lives without it. Nothing stands up against its steady wearing. Nothing equals its beauty for every scene is more beautiful if it includes a lake.

The power of water is in its character rather than its shape. Its strength is the strength of meekness.

The secret lies in its steadiness. It is not with the thrust of violence but with the push of pressure that water works.

And it works no matter what bounds restrict it for it is not changed in character by outward restrictions. It is constant.

So are those who are truly meek. They continue to be loving under all conditions and no matter what external forms may be forced upon them. Their resistance to evil is the resistance of the Cross in contrast to the sword, seemingly weaker yet never conquered, bent and twisted and yet never destroyed.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

CHICAGO HAS PROGRAM ON FAITH AND ACTION

★ A program on faith and action started in Chicago on October 9 when the first of seven meetings, on successive Mondays, was held at St. James Church. Its purpose is to take the people where they are and teach them about the faith of the Church in terms they can understand so that they can apply it to their daily lives. There has been wide interest in the plan with 140 persons from 38 parishes attending a preliminary meeting. The director is the Rev. Irwin St. John Tucker, for many years a newspaper man who has a gift for dramatizing the teachings of the Church. It is hoped that these first meetings will be so popular that parish sessions will follow.

RECORD ENROLLMENT AT BERKELEY

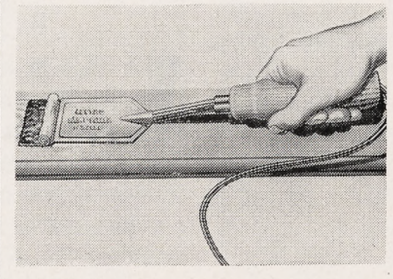
★ The Berkeley Divinity School opened with a record enrollment of 84, representing 29 American dioceses, Hankow, Hong Kong and the Greek Church. Bishop Wynn of Ely is the English lecturer and the Rev. Sydney Barr and the Rev. Joseph A. Johnson are fellows. Mr. Barr will also assist in the New Testament department.

PHILADELPHA HAS BIG ENROLLMENT

★ The Philadelphia Divinity School reports a record-breaking enrollment of 96, representing 31 dioceses. There are also students from the Ukrainian Orthodox Church, the Patriarchate of Jerusalem, the Greek Archdiocese in North and South America, the United Lutheran Church and the United Brethren.

NEW ENGLAND TO HAVE SYNOD

★ The synod of first province is to meet at the cathedral in Providence, October 24-25, under the chairmanship of Bishop Budlong of Connecticut. Bishop Nash of Massachusetts is to be the preacher at a missionary service the first evening. After a presentation of the function of the province by the executive secretary, the Rev. John R. Wyatt, delegates will break up into a number of committees to consider different phases of work. These will be presented to the synod the following morning.



Bishops of the province are to meet the day previous to the opening of the synod, and the council of Church Women will also meet that day.

MARYLAND STRESSES THE CANVASS

★ A pastoral letter by Bishop Powell launched the every member canvass in Maryland when it was read in all the churches on October 8. From that date through November 4 congregational meetings are being held at which national, diocesan and parochial needs are being presented. Each week during the period a piece of literature presenting some outstanding need is being mailed to the people.

MISSION PAYMENTS OVERPAID

★ Treasurer Russell E. Dill of the National Council reported on September 30 that total payments to that date were 104.3% of amount due.

PEEL PAINT TO BARE WOOD WITH ONE EASY STROKE

NEW ELECTRICAL TOOL removes 1 to 10 or more coats of paint from any wood surface as easy as cutting butter with a hot knife. No scraping, cutting, burning, sanding, or chemicals. AUTHORITY of the BIBLE

By Louis Wallis
(Reprinted from the Episcopalian "Witness")

This free pamphlet suggests a new method of studying and teaching Hebrew history within the terms of modern scientific scholarship. Its purpose is to show how the authority of the Bible comes from the God-centered history that the Bible tells about.

The pamphlet is for clergymen, collegiate instructors, adult Bible class teachers, and laity. Will be sent for a three cent stamp to cover first class postage. L. Wallis, Box 73, Forest Hills, Long Island, New York.

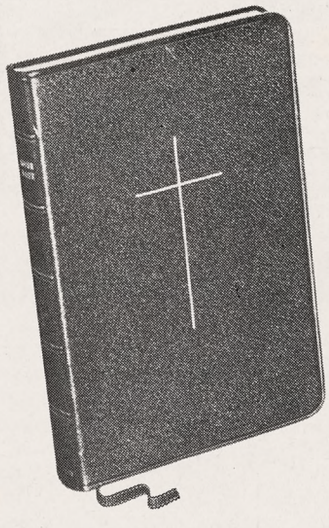
THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor



Theology of the Old Testament. By Paul Heinisch. The Liturgical Press, Collegeville, Minn. $5.00.

Dr. Paul Heinisch of the University of Nijmegen published this work in 1940, as the first supplement volume to the "Bonn Bible." The present publication is more than a translation—it is a new edition, the author having furnished the additions and changes to the American editor, the Rev. Wm. Heidt. The work is a magnificent example of modern Roman Catholic Biblical scholarship, and ought to render the coup de grace to those fanatics who still maintain that the Roman Church forbids its people to study the Bible. It is a systematic exposition of Old Testament Theology—not a "History of the Religion of the O. T." Such a work is most valuable; for there are students who can tell you what P, J, E, and D stand for, or what Jeremiah taught, but who have not the faintest notion (apparently) what the Old Testament as a finished work teaches, or what the O. T. doctrine of angels, or the life to come, or sacrifices, really contains. The divisions of the work are clear: God (his nature, attributes, and the preparation for the mystery of the most Holy Trinity); creation (the spirit world, the world, man); human acts (morality, divine worship, man and God's commandments); life after death; redemption (judgment, the new Kingdom of God, the Messiah). There is a most valuable extensive bibliography at the end.

A further advantage of the work is that being Roman Catholic no apology is made for the use of the "Apocrypha"; nor is the work left hung up in the air with the last of the canonical O. T. books. We have only one complaint: why do not our Roman friends use the traditional English transliterations for O. T. proper nouns? Itaias and Jeremias are strange (they are of course Greek, not Hebrew forms); so is Tenoch. A concession is made in the use of the term Chronicles (instead of Paralipomena); we hope that eventually the other forms of proper nouns will follow suit. The rest of us will be thankful if this is done—we can use Roman books much more intelligibly! But it ought to be considered by Roman scholars anyway. The crudity of the Douay version is no longer tolerated in some circles, and the barbarous, un-English forms of personal names ought to be exchanged for the traditional ones, familiar throughout the history of English literature—though of course not exclusively used by all writers even since (let us say) Elizabethan days.—F.C.G.

J. HOWARD W. RHYS
Assistant at Trinity Cathedral, Trenton

In your issue of September 21, you report a statement circulated by the Episcopal Evangelical Fellowship in defense of Bishops Dun and Hall, whose recent actions have been subjects of controversy in the Church. Having read the full statement, of which the signatories include not only the nine Bishops and eight members of Seminary faculties, but also some members of The Witness staff, I think it necessary to point out that the situation is not correctly represented by the statement.

First of all, there is some question whether Prof. James Muller's study of "The Confirmation Rubric" will be accepted by all competent historians as the last word on that matter. More serious is the fact that the confirmation rubric is not the principal ground for complaint against the bishops. In the preface to the ordinal, page 529 of the Prayer Book, it is stated: "no man shall be accounted or taken to be a lawful bishop, priest, or deacon, in this Church, or suffered to execute any of the said functions, except he be called, tried, examined, and admitted thereunto, according to the form hereafter following, or hath had Episcopal consecration or ordination."

The reading of the gospel at holy communion is and has been a function of deacons or higher orders of ministry in this Church. The laying on of hands at an ordination of a priest is and has been restricted to those already so ordained. The ministers of other communions, who acted at the invitations of the Bishops in Washington and in New Hampshire, made no claim to possess "Episcopal ordination," however valid their ministry in God's sight. This obvious fact should not have escaped so many leaders of our Church.

If we desire to make the "treasures of our Church available to all Christian people who share in the faith of the New Testament," that aim is noble. But if bishops of this Church disregard legality and constitutional procedure in their efforts to make our privileges more widely available, other Christians may well come to believe that we have no treasures to share.

CHARLES E. L. STEELE
Layman of Romulus, N. Y.

Since when has our great Church taken orders from our military as to how we must conduct services? I quote from a letter of June, 1950, from the Armed Forces Division of the National Council: "—whenever it is the custom to use a funeral pall the American flag takes precedence over the funeral pall at the burial service of a deceased veteran.—Joint Resolution 303 pertaining to the rules and customs in regard to the use of the American flag—passed 15th July, 1942, Section 3 (n). P.S.—I asked Army to send me material on the above."

When it comes to dealing out death, destruction, wilful waste and woeful want, our Brass Hats have proved themselves supreme and since the cessation of our last military operations, when they took it upon themselves to produce "a Lasting Peace," they have not been so hot. Now, lo and behold, they are reaching out to run things spiritual. To the writer the most shocking thing is that our Church has not raised one word in protest, as far as I know. There is a great principle here involved and some person or persons far more able than I should take up the cudgel over this.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Bishop Hollis Calls Disunity A Witness Against Christ

The Bishop of the Church of South India Wants Christianity Demonstrated

★ "It costs very little to have unity with people on the other side of the world. My own feeling is that the real challenge is in the concrete here and now, where the scandal of disunity exists on the local scene," Arthur Michael Hollis of Madras and Moderator of the United Church of South India, told the clergy of the diocese of Missouri at the annual fall clergy conference, Oct. 2-4.

On Bishop Hollis' visit to Missouri, he preached at the morning service on Oct. 1 at Christ Church Cathedral, and at an evening service at the Church of St. Michael and St. George. His wife, a former missionary herself, addressed the fall conference of the Auxiliary.

"The whole Anglican Communion is in communion with the Old Catholic Church, but there is not one Anglican in a million for whom it makes the slightest difference. They never see an Old Catholic and they never will. It is not that this intercommunion is unimportant, but that the real problem is communion with one's neighbors in the same village. We do not want to forget the world and have narrow national Churches, but the real danger in denominational ecumenicity is that it provides a good excuse for nobody ever going anywhere.

"If the Church of South India had had to wait until the Episcopal Church of Scotland and the Presbyterians had been able to forget the history of the past 300 years, we would never have achieved our union. But it is quite evident that we in South India are helping those in Scotland, for example, to see that the problem of unity is not quite what they had thought it to be."

Bishop Hollis declared that the position adopted unanimously by the convocations of Canterbury and York with reference to the status of clergy and communicants of the Church of South India when in England probably went further than some of the members thought they were going. To admit that a bishop or presbyter, ordained in the United Church, might celebrate the holy communion when permitted so to do by a diocesan bishop was equivalent to saying that he was capable of celebrating, anywhere. Bishop Hollis objected strongly to the proviso that such permission was granted only on the understanding that such clergymen would not celebrate in churches of other communions.

The keynote of the success of the United Church of South India is the awareness that "the Church should meet as God's elect people in the power of the Holy Spirit, where we corporately may discover God's will and God's choice."

Bishop Hollis was also the headliner at the annual Old Barn Conference of the diocese of Southern Ohio, held at Camp Miami, Germantown, Ohio. He presented the task of the Church in the Far East and outlined the organization and work of the newly formed united Church.

He later visited Kenyon College where he addressed the faculty and students of Kenyon and Bexley Hall. Emphasizing that existing divisions among Christians in India are entirely "imported," and that none of the divided Churches alone could hope to Christianize that vast sub-continent, Bishop Hollis spoke of disunity as a "witness against Christ." The difficulties of translating the gospel into languages which lack many of the right words can only be overcome, he insisted, by translating it into life and action. The people of India, tragically torn by bitter religious conflicts between Islam and Hinduism, demand a demonstration that Christ can unite his own followers, and such a demonstration is now being given.

YOUNG PEOPLE MEET AT NEW HAVEN

★ Young people of the diocese of Connecticut met last weekend at St. Paul's, New Haven, with Rector Warren Traub giving the opening address. Richard Hayward of Watertown, representative on the New England youth commission, was the speaker Saturday afternoon, with Bishop Gray also a speaker. Bishop Budlong was the speaker at breakfast following the early celebration Sunday morning. The preacher at the later service was the Rev. Robert L. Curry, headmaster of Lenox School. At the dinner ending the conference the speaker was Lindley Hartwell, student at the University of Vermont, who is chairman of the national youth commission.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

CHURCH HOSPITAL CHANGES STATUS

★ After nearly 100 years as a Church hospital, Episcopal Hospital, Philadelphia, has severed ties with the diocese of Pennsylvania, by a change in the constitution and by-laws making it a non-sectarian institution. The move was taken by the board so that the hospital would be free to receive state aid for the care of indigent patients.

For years the Thanksgiving Day offering in churches of the diocese has been given to the hospital to help meet the deficit. The salary of the chaplain was paid out of general hospital funds. Discounts to patients who are clergy or members of their family, as well as special patients sent from diocesan institutions and parishes, were taken care of by the hospitals.

The yearly offering has ranged between $25,000 and $41,000, with a special offering one year which came to $100,000 in honor of the 80th birthday of the late Bishop Taitt.

Bishop Hart will continue to appoint the clergyman to be chaplain, and he will be paid by the diocese.

One of the major benefits to the hospital under the new set-up will be the allocation of $75,000 a year from state funds. The hospital has received many bequests and gifts during its long history so that its present endowment is about $3,250,000, one of the largest in the city.

ROBERT FROST HONORED BY KENYON

★ Poet Robert Frost was honored over the weekend of October 7 by Kenyon College when a conference on the poet and reality was held. Distinguished men and women in various fields of activity attended to listen to addresses by scholars, writers, journalists. Among them were J. Donald Adams of the New York Times; Prof. Kenneth Murdock of Harvard; Prof. Marston Morse of Princeton; Novelist Walter Havighurst, who is also professor at Miami University; J. Frank Dobie, author and professor at the University of Texas; Editor John H. Crider of the Boston Herald.

Also attending and lecturing was L. A. G. Strong, British novelist and poet, who flew from England to be present.

CHRIST CHURCH, Dover, is one of several quaint churches in the Dioceses of Delaware

COUNCIL SPONSORS SEMINARS

★ The Rev. Russell Dewart, Episcopalian, hospital chaplain for the Council of Churches in Springfield, Mass., arranged a program whereby clergymen in the area could learn how to make their ministry to the sick and aged more effective. The meetings started October 16 and continue for five Monday mornings. Doctors, surgeons and social workers lecture on the crippled, cancer, hospital social service, obstetrics, child guidance, the aged and handicapped, the care of those dying. Following the morning program the clergy dine together and confer with the doctors and social workers.

BISHOP WYNN VISITS HARTFORD

★ Bishop Wynn of Ely, England, special lecturer at the Berkeley Divinity School, was the guest of honor at a tea on October 21 given by Bishop and Mrs. Budlong. The clergy of the diocese and their wives were guests. On Sunday Bishop Wynn preached at Christ Church Cathedral.

BISHOP HINES SPEAKS IN SOUTH CAROLINA

NAVY IS ACCEPTING SEMINARIANS

★ The navy has announced that it is now accepting applications for probationary commissions in the naval reserve from seminary students. They can apply for the commission and then on completion of their theological training they will be commissioned lieutenants in the chaplain corps.

SYNOD MEETS IN NEW YORK

★ The synod of the 2nd province was held at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, October 17-18, with Bishop Malcolm Peabody of Central New York opening the sessions with his address as president. College work was the special subject under consideration, with addresses by the Rev. Robert N. Rodenmayer of St. John's, Northampton, Mass.; Katherine Duffield, secretary of college work in the province; Mrs. Reinhold Niebuhr, on the faculty of Barnard; Canon Vesper Ward of the National Council's department of religious education. There was also a panel of the colleges' answer to the challenge of religion in which five leading educators took part.

The synod closed with a luncheon on the 18th at which the Presiding Bishop was the speaker.

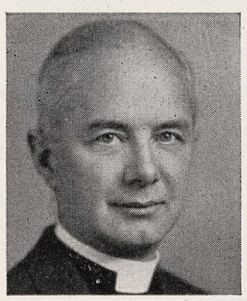
CAMBRIDGE PARISH ADOPTS HOME

★ The Rev. Gardiner M. Day announced that the Church Service League of Christ Church, Cambridge, voted to adopt the Central Deaconess House in Berlin, Germany, which means that the organizations of the parish will assume as a special project responsibility for supplying some of the serious needs of the House. The House is a hospital of over 400 beds, established by the Lutheran Church in 1847. With the hospital is a Deaconess House in which the nurses, who are called "Sisters," are trained. The head of the hospital is Pastor Langer, who holds services in the hospital chapel and administers to the patients. Two hundred and fifty nurses live in the Deaconess' House. Not only do the nurses work in the hospital, but over one hundred perform their duties in fifty-three branch hospitals or clinics, thirty-three of which are in the Soviet sector or zone. Since the hospital stands exactly on the line of division between east and west Berlin, it is in a particularly strategic position to help patients in the Soviet zone as well as in west Berlin.

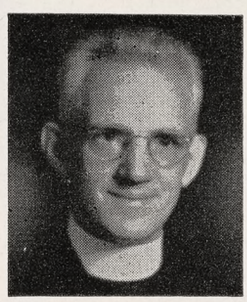
During the war the hospital lost all its household linen, such as bed linen and towels. The result, Pastor Langer writes, is that frequently the admission of patients to the hospital depends upon whether they can bring their own bed linen. As people also lost most of their bed linen during the war, this means that frequently seriously sick people cannot be received. In addition, the hospital is lacking clothing, undergarments, and uniforms for the nurses and has a continual struggle to secure enough other types of clothing, soap, and even food.

DECONSECRATE BEFORE WE MOVE IN

★ St. Thomas, North Syracuse, N. Y., which was started last spring in the veterans' room of the post office, now is conducting services in the former Roman Catholic Church, St. Rose's. The Church was deconsecrated before the Episcopalians were allowed to move in. The Rev. Paul Miller is in charge.



HOLY COMMUNION IN SPANISH



★ The service of holy communion in Spanish is being celebrated each Saturday morning at All Saints, Syracuse. Rector Frank Titus states that the program is aimed at reaching at Porto Ricans, many of whom are moving to upstate New York.

WOMAN'S AUXILIARY BOARD MEETING

★ A demonstration of the training conferences which are being held in many centers by the department of education of the National Council was a feature of the meeting of the board, held at Seabury House, October 5-9. In five sessions lectures, meditations and discussions were given by members of the department's staff; the Rev. John Huess, Prof. Reuel Howe, Canon Theodore Wedel, Canon Vesper Ward and Mrs. Dora Chaplin.

It was reported that the United Thank Offering for 1950-52 is more than $100,000 ahead of the offering at the same period in the last triennium. Appropriations were voted for a chapel for Easter School, Baguio, Philippines; St. Mark's, Honolulu, where members have been making hollow-tile bricks in their free time to aid in building a church; Centennial church at Ningpo, China, for the finishing of the interior. The church is so named because it was founded in 1848, although the diocese of Chekiang, now presided over by Bishop Kimber Den, was not organized until 1872. Appropriations were also made toward repairs of the children's home at Bella Vista, Panama; for the furnishing of a room at Delhi School of Social Work, India; completing parish house and rectory for St. James, Payette, Idaho; rebuilding a church at Dragertown, Utah; a small truck for the Navajo reservation at Fort Defiance, Arizona.

Dom Gregory Dix Leads Liturgical Day

BY
HUGH McCANDLESS

★ Dom Gregory Dix of the Anglican Order of St. Benedict was the leader of the liturgical day on October 12th, sponsored jointly by St. Ignatius' Church and St. George's, New York, and held at the latter church. A solemn liturgy and holy communion was celebrated in the morning, with the noted visitor the preacher. Following luncheon there was a demonstration of the early Christian liturgy by the Prior.

He spoke from the pulpit and as a part of his exposition a small group demonstrated in the chancel what a service of holy communion was like in the days of persecution. The participants wore modern dress, with the clergy distinguished only by stoles since there was no difference between church vestments and street clothes in these early days. Each person made his own offering of bread and wine and, in the demonstration at least, took home enough of the consecrated bread for daily private communion in the safety of his own home.

The simplicity and brevity of the service held by the very small group of "unimportant people" who in those days constituted the Church was in marked contrast to the austere magnificence of the service held in the morning, at which over 600 people had received communion.

After this demonstration, evening prayer was sung enthusiastically by the whole congregation, led by the General Seminary students under the direction of Ray Brown. At this service the lessons were read by Basil Rathbone. His diction was faultless and his sincerity obvious. However, someone had neglected to pick out lessons more suitable to the occasion than those for the day; to warn him not to begin with a few remarks, however felicitous, on the relationship of the theatre and the Church; and to teach him the formula with which to introduce and end his reading.

With this exception however the liturgical day was a masterpiece of imagination, discretion, and intelligent and friendly compromise. It lifted and united the more than one thousand church people of all groups who attended.

TRAINING GIVEN TO BISHOPS

★ From October 16 through the 20th, 24 bishops received intensive training at the College of Preacher at the hands of the staff of the department of religious education of the National Council. They were exposed to the same courses previously supplied to younger clergy at various intensive conferences.

JOHN HEUSS tackles job of teaching bishops

Bishops attending were: Armstrong, Pa.; Barth, Tenn.; Burrough, Ohio; Clairborne, Ala.; Gibson, Va.; Gunn, Southern Va.; Hall, N. H.; Henry, Western N. C.; Hines, Texas; Hubbard, Mich.; Jones, West Texas; Jones, La.; Louttit, So. Fla.; Mason, Dallas; Quarterman, No. Texas; Sawyer, Erie; Scaife, W. N. Y.; Sherman, L. I.; Smith, Iowa; Stark, Rochester; Street, Chicago; Welles, W. Mo.; West, Fla.; Whittemore, W. Mich.

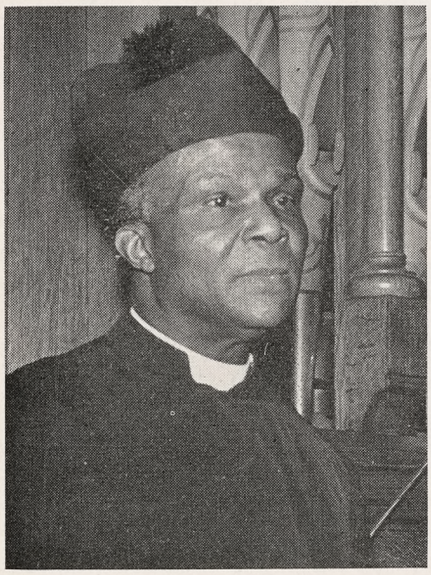
Courses were given by the Rev. John Heuss; Canon Vesper Ward; Prof. Reuel L. Howe; Mrs. Dora Chaplin; Canon Theodore Wedel; Miss Charlotte Tompkins; Mrs. Theodore Wedel.

CANVASS CAVALCADE IN NEW JERSEY

★ A canvass workshop was held at Trinity Cathedral, Trenton, as the kickoff for what Bishop Gardner hopes will be the most efficient canvass ever to be held in the diocese. This dress rehearsal, at which laymen were instructed on how to present the program, is being followed with suppers in nine centers, called the Canvass Cavalcade, at which officers of departments will present phases of Church work in brief talks.

Writes Bishop Gardner: "Canvassers, properly trained this year, will seek much more than pledges. They will stress the needs of the Church and we can assure parents everywhere that there is no greater need than that which can be answered by priests who will promise, in the sight of God, to do all that he asks them for his people."

MORTON O. NACE AT BERKELEY



★ Morton O. Mace, general secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew will address the faculty and students of the Berkeley Divinity School on October 26th on parochial administration and laymen's work.

He recently became head of the Brotherhood and has elaborate plans for expansion.

BISHOP E. T. DEMBY ISSUES WARNING

★ Bishop Demby, retired suffragan of Arkansas, speaking in Buffalo, said that Negroes in the United States are turning to the Mohammedan religion.

OSMOND H. BROWN is honored by St. Philip's, Buffalo, where he has served as rector for many years

He attributed it to the failure of the majority of Christians to live the ideals they profess. The 81 - year - old Bishop was the preacher at a community service in honor of the Rev. Osmond H. Brown, rector of St. Philip's.

SUPREME COURT TEST ON MELISH CASE

★ The Rev. John Howard Melish announced on October 18 that he will carry the fight to be reinstated as rector of Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, to the U. S. Supreme Court. The statement was signed by Dr. Melish and Lewis Reynolds, senior warden.

"Our decision," said the statement, "is something more than that of one injured pastor or of a congregation deprived of its fundamental rights. It is, we believe, the expression of the religious community's concern that a principle essential to the very fabric of the democratic structure of the Protestant Episcopal Church and the United States of America itself, is here at stake. We believe that the right to preach the Christian faith itself —its vitality, its freedom, its opportunity—all are involved in this case. Under God, humbly and prayerfully, we take this action in the faith that it will help contribute to the integrity and the vitality of true Christian witness within the United States and before the eyes of the world."

CHILDREN'S CHAPEL AT SEWICKLEY

★ A unique kindergarten chapel was recently dedicated at St. Stephen's, Sewickley, Pa., by the rector, the Rev. Benedict Williams. It is a memorial to Charles Thompson, and was given by his parents. The dedication culminates a year of work and planning and the result is one of the finest hand-wrought projects of its type in the country. Everything was built to kindergarten scale; the altar, the benches, railings, archway.

The building of the chapel carries an interesting story of imagination, creation and persistence on the part of the donors. Shortly after their son's death the Thompsons began thinking of some sort of memorial which would be lasting and which would tie closely to Charlie's age group. While in Maine, they talked with the Rev. Leverett Davis of Christ Church in Exeter, N. H., who told them of a children's chapel in his church. That started the process and Mr. Thompson immediately began drawing up a set of plans. He had no model nor pattern to follow—all of the work is based upon original ideas. He set about finding the wood for the job and located some 20 year old cherry —wood that had been originally intended for pattern work. He later had to supplement his stock with some specially treated cherry that he found would match the original quantity.

Moving the wood into their basement, Mr. and Mrs. Thompson began the long arduous job of cutting, fitting, sawing, sanding, and planning. It took all winter and most of the summer.

The little altar had to be a perfect fit. Mr. Thompson tested the benches on children of kindergarten age to see that they were the right size. The work went on. From time to time, amateur helpers dropped in, notably Warren Wadsworth, and the project was finally completed very late at night before the deadline.

At either side of the altar are two of the loveliest stained glass windows ever seen in such a chapel. One depicts Moses being found in the bullrushes, and the other the Nativity scene. The Thompsons visited Boston and personally worked out the details of the windows. A permanent organ for the little chapel will be given by Mrs. Charles A. Painter, Jr., who is Mrs. Thompson's mother.

Mrs. Thompson has ordered material for vestments for a "two-man" choir or servers group and similar robing for a crucifer.

IMPORTANT DATES IN NEW YORK

★ There are four important dates coming up in the diocese of New York. On October 28th at 4 there will be a service of thanksgiving at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine for the leadership of Bishop Gilbert. On the 30th a dinner will be held in his honor. Bishop Donegan will be installed as the Bishop of New York on November 18. On the 27th the annual clergy quiet day will be held.

NEW YORK SCHOOL OF RELIGION

★ The board of religious education of the diocese of New York is sponsoring a school at General Seminary on Monday evenings from October 16 through November 20th. The chairman is the Rev. Leslie Lang and courses are offered by the Rev'ds F. C. Leeming, Robert S. Bosher, Richard L. Harbour, J. Willard Yoder, Paul Moore, Paul C. Weed Jr., Hanford L. King Jr., John D. Wing Jr.

Souls and Saints

WHO wants to be a saint? "Heaven forbid," says the average modern whose ideas on the subject are not apt to be very flattering. One reason for this general bias is the all-too-familiar fact that the Christian measure of a man has been replaced by the American success standards in terms of Cadillacs and mink coats. Our real treasure today is elsewhere than Christ. But it is also true that no one wants to be a saint because some of the so-called saints in our churches are not very interesting or exciting. We have not sold the world of our day on the heroic and contagious quality of the Christian life at its best. Hence it is that many people are prone to think of saints as anemic souls living outside the main stream of human existence. And yet nothing could be more false.

The gospel and epistle picture of a saint certainly contradicts some of our contemporary illusions. There the saints were men and women who turned the world upside down. They defied emperors and cruel death out of convictions that were worth dying for. Like their Lord before them they claimed the world for the reign of God on earth. And there have been others like them in every day and age since, heirs of Christ, the saints of God, lights of the world, and the salt of the earth in their several generations.

In the New Testament we are all called to be saints, that is, devoted followers of Christ. In brief, to be a saint means the imitation of Christ. God helping us, it is to have more and more of his mind who is the supremely good and the world's salvation. And this, says the gospel, is the Christian calling for all mankind, this is really the life. Hence our Church is on the right track when it remembers all the faithful departed on All Saints' Day. All who have gone before us as well as we of this generation are called to this vocation.

To be sure, some have excelled exceedingly in becoming saints. Their names live on, and there are other names too, lost in time but written in eternity. These were not always canonized by the Church—but they were known to God, they were the pure in heart, the peacemakers and the merciful. Indeed we would question Rome's claim to canonize at all: in truth who but God himself can do this? Nor would we always agree with the Roman definition of a saint, an example of which was given the world this very summer. Instead we would offer as candidates giants of character like Schweitzer and Kagawa, yes, even one who while not a Christian was not far from the Kingdom, the saintly Gandhi. In our own time we can point with pride to great souls like these who represent something of the fullness of Christ and are examples of the possibilities of human life in him.

"QUOTES"

I PLEAD with you for all that makes strong citizens. First, clear convictions, deep, careful, patient study of the government under which we live, until you not merely believe it is the best in the world, but know why you believe. And then a clear conscience, as much ashamed of public as of private sin, as ready to hate and rehate and vote down corruption in the state, in your own party as you would be in your own store or church; as ready to bring the one as the other to the judgment of a living God.

And then unselfishness. An earnest and exalted sense that you are for the land, and not alone the land for you; something of the self-sacrifice which they showed who died for us from '61 to '65.

And then activity; the readiness to wake and watch and do a citizen's work, untiringly, counting it as base not to vote at an election, not to work against a bad official, or to work for a good one, as it would have been to shirk a battle in the war.

Such a strong citizenship let there be among us; such knightly doing of our duties on the fields of peace.—PHILLIPS BROOKS

Faith and Works

THE other day, in the window of a Roman Catholic book store, we saw a poem, suitably framed, entitled "The Father of a Nun" which fascinated us. We wish we could remember the whole, but we quote the last two verses which sum up in a devastating manner much which passes for Roman Catholic thinking today. The author, stating frankly that he was no better than he should be, ended with this revealing conclusion:

"And since to err is human,
There's a lot that's on the slate
That I'll have to account for
When I reach the Golden Gate.

"But I am not a-worrying
About the things that I have done;
I'll just whisper to St. Peter,
'I'm the Father of a nun.'"

Aside from wondering how surprised St. Peter would be at this information we began to consider how this negated St. James: "Faith without works is dead." Our impish impulse was to send a copy to The New Yorker but aside from dubiety about its publication came the realization that this was far too serious a contribution to that weekly.

Sometimes we are accused of criticizing the Romanists too strongly; we offer this in extenuation. Can it be possible that a biological function is a passport to heaven? We doubt if it is as simple as that. Possibly good propaganda—but can Roman Catholics be so desperate as to offer this sort?

Charles Kendall Gilbert

Rector of St. Paul's, Yonkers, N. Y.

IN an essay directed against the English dissenters, Matthew Arnold coined a phrase to describe some of their ecclesiastical officials which, I fear, might aptly be applied to a few—fewer now than ever before—of our bishops. He called them decorative inutilities. The phrase occurs to me because it is so directly the opposite of a great Bishop of New York who retires from active service on October 28th. The Right Reverend Charles K. Gilbert could probably not be called decorative even by his most devoted admirers, and the ornaments which appertain to the episcopacy have never interested him. And from the day of his ordination he has been an active prophet of righteousness, never content until he had made some effort to bring his prophetic utterances to some practical conclusion. He believes that the preacher of the Christian gospel must strive to make its principles effective in every department of human life. One is almost tempted to apply to him Samuel Crothers' characterization of Sir Philip Sidney: "Every time he heard of a good war, he went to it."

Those of us whose memory includes the past thirty years of the history of the diocese of New York have not forgotten his courageous leadership as secretary of the diocesan social service commission. In those days it took courage to offer a Christian protest against the witch-hunting hysteria after the first world war, to support the demands of labor for the many rights it did not then enjoy, and to insist upon some necessary reforms which most conservatives regarded as socialistic. Influential clergy and laymen, devoted to the status quo, were among his violent opponents. The social service commission had a voice which was heard throughout the city and diocese, for its secretary never forgot that we are taught to pray that God's Kingdom may come on earth, and he knew that Christian men and women in the hands of God are the chief instruments for the fulfillment of that prayer.

As Bishop

SINCE his becoming the chief diocesan of New York he has achieved much that has not been publicly attributed to him or to his leadership. He has never been interested in public praise, and is content to know that things are done, whoever may get the credit. And obviously the function of a spiritual pastor of a diocese is radically different from that of a secretary of a social service commission. But Bishop Gilbert has never tempered his prophetic demand for civic righteousness and social justice, though he has not sought for it head-line publicity.

He has always been truly a "bishop of the Church of God" more concerned over the interests of that great Church than over the promulgation of the particular tenets of his own denomination. Always a loyal Episcopalian, he believes that he is most loyal by cooperating wherever possible with other Christians who share his religious and social ideals. Many years ago Coleridge warned Christians against a sin which perhaps by their very position is a special temptation of bishops. Frederick Robertson borrowed Coleridge's words for the eloquent conclusion of a great sermon on "The Religious Non-Observance of the Sabbath," in which he said that if England were punished by God, it would not be because trains ran on Sunday, or working-men were permitted amusement, but "because we are selfish men, and love our party more than our Church, and our Church more than our Christianity, and our Christianity more than truth, and ourselves more than all." Once again, as in my first sentence, I have ventured to describe the Bishop of New York by asserting what he emphatically is not.

He has always been interested in the New York Federation of Churches, and his election as president of the Council of Churches, into which the Federation has developed, is an indication of how his fellow Christians appreciate and value his ecumenical spirit.

He has followed the custom of his predecessor, Bishop Manning, in authorizing the use of the Cathedral for special services of an interdenominational character, with officers of the Council of Churches or other interdenominational agencies in the chancel and the pulpit. Reformation Sunday, for instance, is usually so observed. And on Labor Sunday there is often in the pulpit a layman who proclaims the Christian principles which must govern the Church's attitude toward labor.

On the other hand, Bishop Gilbert has realized the importance of recognizing the kinship between our Church and the Eastern Orthodox Churches. Many of them are affiliated with the World Council of Churches, and with us, they are Protestant in the truest sense of the word, though they do not wish to use the term. Bishops and priests of those Churches have frequently participated in the Cathedral services, and Bishop Gilbert has cooperated with them in the raising of necessary funds for some of their impoverished churches. The Serbian Church has awarded him its highest honor, the Order of Joanikie.

Diocese Well Organized

IT would be impossible to enumerate the accomplishments of Bishop Gilbert during his brief service as diocesan. One of the most important is his inauguration of the "Cornerstone Campaign," the purpose of which is the raising of funds for the economical construction of "pre-engineered" —not exactly pre-fabricated—churches and parish houses for missions that have long been struggling with inadequate accommodations for their members. While the entire amount required has not yet been raised, several satisfactory buildings have already been erected, and those who see them will wish to continue and complete this work as rapidly as possible.

Much constructive work has been done to the Cathedral structure. The window of the sports bay has been installed, and the old synod house, which must remain until it is possible to construct the southern bay of the Cathedral, is under reconstruction to make it a really attractive building. A private residence has been contributed to the diocese as a retreat house. A commission for the study of the needs of the aged has been organized, and is now at work, as well as a commission for work among the college students, never adequately organized in a city with so many institutions of learning. Surely Bishop Donegan, his successor, inherits a finely organized diocese, and has in his hands efficient instruments for the expansion of diocesan activities—religious, charitable, financial.

New York is a large diocese, with both extremes of churchmanship well represented in large and influential churches. But there has probably never existed the unity of spirit which has been evident during the episcopate of Charles Gilbert. He is distinctively an "Evangelical" in every sense of the word. But he appreciates and values the contributions which may be, and are made, by those of other types of thought and practice. He believes that the Church can advance most effectively by complete loyalty to the spirit of the Book of Common Prayer, which however must always be regarded as a living, vital, sincere expression of the religious aspirations of the people, and never permitted to freeze—to mix a figure—into a chain of bondage. And he insists that the faith of the Church is dead indeed if it is not manifested in effective work for the children of God.

Every Churchman must be deeply grateful for these years of Bishop Gilbert's episcopate, and for the abiding influence which they must have upon the future of the diocese of New York and the whole Christian Church.

Talking It Over

BY

W. B. SPOFFORD SR.

THIS is a memorable week in the diocese of New York. This Saturday afternoon a service of thanksgiving for the leadership of Bishop Gilbert will be held at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. On Monday evening a dinner in his honor will be held. I do not want the occasion to pass without underscoring all that Wilbur Caswell says about my friend of many years.

When the editorial office of The Witness was moved to New York we were given space in the old diocesan house on Lafayette Street. On another floor was the dreary office of the social service commission, but while the office was gloomy it was brightened by its secretary, Charles Gilbert. He was, indeed, a forthright champion of unpopular causes who was never deterred from his Christian witness by men in high places, some of whom were on his board. The strike of paper box makers comes vividly to mind. It was in those days when labor had to fight inch by inch, with few outside friends. These particular workers—men, women and children—were working for low wages under terrible conditions—more of them than not in sub-sub-basements with no light or sanitary facilities. Three of us went to work; Charles Gilbert as the official representative of the diocese of New York; James Myers as the social service secretary of the Federal Council of Churches; myself as the secretary of the Church League for Industrial Democracy. We investigated; we issued reports and releases to the papers; we were a factor in the winning of a long and bitter strike. Through it all tremendous pressure was placed on Charles Gilbert, which he met, more often than not, by converting his accusers by his unheated presentation of facts.

Another little incident revealed the man. The C.L.I.D. in those days sponsored forums at General Conventions. When plans were announced for the 1937 Cincinnati convention, an organization came into being, headed by Merwin K. Hart, with the sole purpose of preventing these meetings. Bishop Manning—without I am sure knowing too much about Mr. Hart and what he stood for—was enlisted as the spokesman for this group and for months not only the Church magazines, but the secular papers as well, were filled with the controversy. The forums were held, with Bishop Gilbert, then Suffragan of New York, the chairman of the meeting at which the speaker was Norman Thomas, in days when this leader of the Socialist party was not as popular with people in power as he now is. It took courage of the first order for the Suffragan of New York to defy the Diocesan of New York, but there was not the slightest hesitation on the part of Charles Gilbert.

Many similar instances of his courage, springing from his deep religious convictions that make him the champion of the least of the brethren, could be given but perhaps these two give the caliber of the man.

Another side of the man was revealed to me by the summers when we were neighbors at Dell-in-Heath, Mass. This resort center, now so popular with many of the Churches, was discovered by Dr. Howard Robbins. One of the first to go there was Bishop Gilbert. The story of his accomplishments as a builder has been presented in this paper before, so will not be repeated beyond saying that he bought an old tumbled down grist mill; went to work, single handed, with a sledge hammer, saw, hammer and nails and built what is now one of the show places of the colony. What is more, he furnished it with tables, desks, chairs, made with his own hands in the workshop which is his pride and joy. That shop, and his garden from which, in the late summer, comes the corn, the tomatoes, the potatoes that are roasted over the grill beside the brook that feeds the lovely pond beside his house. And it is this Charles Gilbert, I suspect, that is the real one rather than the champion of unpopular causes. But that a man who, above everything, loves simplicity and peace can be a militant fighter for the underprivileged puts him, in my book, among the great leaders of our day.

The Episcopal Church — What's Wrong?

BY
HYATT HOWE WAGGONER

THERE is an article in the April issue of The Hibbert Journal that I think every clergyman in the Church ought to be asked to read, and to reread, and to comment on from the pulpit. Called "How the Roman Catholic Church Makes Converts," the article is a masterly summary by a Presbyterian of the weaknesses in the various Protestant Churches that drive so many of the highly educated and thoughtful into Romanism. And what are those weaknesses? There are many, as the author, Prof. H. L. Stewart of Dalhousie University, makes clear; but they are all aspects of one great, pervading weakness: secularization, loss of the inner meaning, loss, in short, of faith. It is this loss of the Church's very reason for existence that has reduced most of modern Protestantism to futility and inanity, a mockery and an empty shell, supposedly dedicated to a purpose in which it no longer believes, and searching desperately (look at the ads on the church page of the paper any Saturday) for some new reason to justify its existence. Seeking to protect their jobs, ministers become popular lecturers, amateur psychologists, amateur sociologists, scanners of the headlines for currently interesting topics on which to preach.

To the extent to which this indictment by Prof. Stewart is true of any Church, it seems to be clear that that Church is already spiritually dead and ought to be allowed to die naturally: it does not deserve our support. Social service work can be and is done more efficiently by organizations especially equipped for it, and adult education can be better carried on by the universities and their adult education programs. We do not need the Church if it is just one more service organization. And we shall need it even less in the future, if I read the signs of the times aright, for government is increasingly going to see to it that everyone is indoctrinated with the dogmas of the secular religion — nationalism, democracy, pragmatism, progress.

Now I do not think that this indictment—that the Church is becoming merely one of the state's propaganda arms, an instrument for the dissemination of the doctrines of the popular culture which is our substitute for the Christian religion that gave unity and purpose to the civilization of the Middle Ages—I do not think that this terrible indictment applies as much to our Church as to some others. But who is to say that it does not apply at all? And if it does apply, what are the peculiarly Episcopalian features of this pervasive secularization, this creeping death in Christ's Church?

Conformists

WE all know, do we not, the high-powered preacher in the large-city parish who week after week preaches just what the congregation wants to hear? And what is it that Episcopalian congregations want to hear? Well, being what they are by and large, they want to hear, in this year of our Lord 1950, how evil and selfish labor is. So it is, in a sense, and so is capital: all men are sinners before God. They want to hear attacks on Communists. I for one am sure the Communists deserve most of the attacks; but if, as one of our bishops recently said, the Church must dedicate itself to defeating Communism, then again it has become an arm of the state, for the announced purpose of our government is to defeat Communism, so that Church and state do not differ in their aims. They want to hear attacks on Mrs. Roosevelt. Perhaps she ought to be attacked at times, but it would convince me that the attacks were motivated by an attempt to interpret Christian doctrine rather than an attempt to please a conservative congregation if, just once in a while, I could hear such an attack followed by another on, say, Senator Wherry or Senator McCarthy. They want to hear attacks on Roman Catholics, who are, it is said, both "superstitious" and "dangerous to democracy." But if Episcopalians had more of the "superstition" of our Roman brothers, the Church might not be the adjunct to the Rotary Club that it too often is. And which is finally more important to Christians anyway, Christianity or our capitalist democracy? Christianity has already outlasted several different social systems, and I think we are safe in assuming that it will outlast all those that we now know. To deify any particular social arrangement is to be guilty of idol worship. They want to be indirectly flattered by hearing the more violent sins strongly denounced. For from these they are quite safe, and being told to feel strongly about them has the effect of stimulating a pleasantly self-righteous glow. How many Episcopalians are in imminent danger of committing murder or rape, and how many Episcopalian gangsters have you heard of?

The priests who take this line—and each of us could name some—are of course usually enormously successful if they are effective speakers and have pleasant personalities. Most frequently in my experience—though I confess that my experience on this point may be untypical—they are either broad Church or low Church or both. Sunday after Sunday they say what the very best people in the community want to hear. Sunday after Sunday they praise democracy, education, and modern drugs; attack superstition, ignorance, and poverty; denounce gangsterism and arson; and recommend good will and larger pledges for the new parish house or what-not. They are inclined to make radical reinterpretations of the creeds when they talk to confirmation classes or to individuals, though they repeat the familiar words without change of expression every Sunday. They are apt to be either entirely unacquainted with the new theology—the new orthodoxy as it is sometimes called—or they know just enough about it to know that they disapprove of it. They lean heavily on popular magazines, newspapers, and second-rate sentimental literature for sermon material.

Now I think I may have laid myself open to serious misinterpretation at this point. If what I have been saying seems to imply that the rectors who preach out of The Reader's Digest and so please the big butter and egg men in their congregations would be doing much better if they preached out of, say, The Nation and so said what our left-wing liberals want to hear, I have expressed myself poorly. The Christian religion was not designed as a bulwark for any political party, or for any particular form of government, or for any special social arrangement. It cannot be a tail on any kite, radical or conservative, and be true to itself. It offers no detailed blue-print for society; rather it prescribes certain general ends. There may well be legitimate difference of opinion between Christians about how best to achieve those ends. It is, I take it, not only inevitable but even desirable that Christians should differ among themselves in their politics: no political party has a monopoly on the truth or ever completely lives up to Christian principles. To take one example—as Christians, we must be concerned about housing for the poor; but how best to achieve better housing for them is not specified in the gospels or in Church tradition.

The True Purpose

ALL that I am saying, really, is that the subordination of the Church's proper message and function to some worldly, though often good, end is very common in our parishes; and it is fatal. The proper end of the Church is to preserve and spread faith in Christ as the way, the truth, and the life; and when this faith is not kept where it belongs, in the very center, the Church becomes spiritually dead and socially non-essential if not useless; for apart from guarding and spreading the faith and providing the direction and means of worship, there is nothing that the Church does that cannot be done as well or better by some other organization. Clergymen who do not believe this should get out of the Church and into some more congenial work—social service, or fund-raising for the community chest; or they should get out of the Episcopalian Church and join the Unitarians, who officially welcome non-theistic members and who look upon Jesus of Nazareth as just another inspiring moral teacher.

But what, you may say, of the growing High Church movement? Surely what you have been saying does not apply there? No, perhaps in part it does not. But even here we Episcopalians have no grounds for complacency—though in my personal view there are perhaps grounds for hope. For to what extent, would you say, is the High Church movement a largely aesthetic thing, or a movement merely toward Rome rather than back to the great traditions of our own Church, with its central position between Romanism and Protestantism? To what extent, would you say, do the forms of worship become more important than the content they symbolize in many High Church parishes? A remark I have very commonly heard after a very High Church service is not, what one hears after a Low Church service, "Wasn't the sermon interesting?" but "Wasn't it a beautiful service?" Both remarks are almost equally beside the point. The High Church movement attracts too many effeminate young men, too many aesthetes who are more aesthetic than Christian, too many formalists.

And so I say that what is wrong with the Episcopal Church as far as the clergy is concerned can be summed up under two headings. First, among the modernist, liberal, social gospel clergy, subordination of the Church's true and essential function to some other end, either, most often, to flattering the prejudices of the well-to-do, or, often at the same time, working for popular "good causes." Second, especially among some of the High Church clergy, subordinating the spirit and intent of the Gospel to the semi-aesthetic requirements of a "beautiful service"—or even losing the spirit entirely in a sort of mechanical ritualism. In both cases the thing the Church exists for is lost or weakened.

Happy Associations

BY

WILLIAM P. BARNDS

ONE of my early childhood memories is that of my mother reading to us children from a book of Bible stories called "Happy Sundays With the Bible." We enjoyed those stories and looked forward to them.

It is very important that both children and adults form happy emotional attachments for religious practices. One sometimes hears a person say that he had to go to church as a boy and got fed up with it and now does not want to go. Assuming that what he says is true (one often wonders!) it is unfortunate that his early associations with religion were not pleasant. Had they been he might still enjoy the Church.

Some people have such a limited contact with the Church that they connect it with the sad and gloomy because they go only when a funeral is in progress. If they were deeply imbued with the spirit of the Church and really loved the Church, even the burial service might have for them a solemn, poignant joy.

So go to church when you are especially happy, on joyful anniversaries, and form pleasant associations with the Church's practices and observances. Help the children to enjoy the Church and in later years they will be all the more happy in it and can honestly sing "I love thy kingdom, Lord."

Remembrance of a School Board

GEORGE L. CADIGAN
Rector, St. Paul's Church, Rochester, New York

THE school board consisted of six duly elected members with the mayor, ex-officio, serving as chairman. The mayor had been mayor for several years, and there seemed little likelihood that his office would be occupied soon by another. He never could have measured up to the pattern of a one-time New Jersey mayor, but he was reminiscent of him and he had a good machine. He was a hot-headed son of Erin with limited intelligence and an avowed hostility for the more cultured persons of the city. Naturally, he was strongly liked and disliked. I liked him too until we got into the fight. He had many enemies and he always remembered them.

The school superintendent was a graduate of Teacher's College in New York. He was an admirable person. In the later times of deep tension he bore himself with an amazing serenity. It was perhaps more difficult for his family who later were subjected to much crudeness and cruelness. The superintendent was a progressive and thoughtful leader in his field. It is a mystery how the board came to choose him. He did have an Irish name and perhaps his election can be explained by a remark once overheard, "with that name we thought he was one of us." Under the city charter the superintendent was not a member of the school board.

One member of the board was an outstanding doctor, an ear, nose and throat specialist. He was a Vermonter and had much of the kindliness and toughness of the Yankee.

A second member was a brilliant, affable young lawyer. He was Irish too, and with much intestinal fortitude. He had to have it to stand out against the rest. Both these professional men were to comprehend personally the cost of a struggle for truth.

A third member was an attractive young mother, a daughter of a first family and a member of the parish where I served. These first three were individuals of mature disinterestedness whose chief concerns were the children and the school system. Therefore, they labored for the educational policies advocated by the superintendent.

NOTE:—The occurrences in this paper, while based upon actual happenings, have of necessity been abbreviated; and all of the details, because of the limits of space, have not been included. All quotations used are not an attempt to repeat exact statements but do relate the substance of the thought as they are remembered. Written from the point of view of a clergyman, the facts stressed have particular reference to his responsibility to the community.

The other three members voted solidly together against the superintendent. In this group was a medical man who was not on the staff of the local hospital. A second member was a young man who, the mayor constantly reminded us, was "a graduate of the greatest university." He had also served as an officer during the last war. Some years previously he had been convicted in the criminal court on a charge involving race booking operations. He was clever and therefore the more dangerous. The forebears of both these men were from the old country. My own father came from County Cork and perhaps that is why I happened to get mixed up in this thing. Last of all there was a French-American who was an insurance agent. The mayor decided all issues by casting his ballot with this second group. This was the school board who were directly and indirectly responsible for the moral and intellectual welfare of our children.

I am given to think of myself as a rather quiet person chiefly interested in the pastoral ministry. It was a little awing and a little terrifying also, to find myself suddenly plunged into a maelstrom. I had known very little about the situation until I attended a school board meeting at the suggestion of the lady member. There were about a dozen other spectators present. Visitors to the meetings without previous permission could not speak from the floor. I understood from the beginning why I had been urged to attend. Every policy or issue that seemed to have merit was defeated 4-3. Once the mayor rose to exclaim, "Mr. superintendent, I have no confidence in you whatsoever, and I am going to get you out of town." The superintendent did not reply and I thought of his wife and children. Earlier that day I had visited his eleven-year old daughter confined in the hospital with a malignancy of the bone. The superintendent advocated a measure to encourage further study for the school faculties. It was defeated 4-3. The superintendent advocated a measure to increase teachers' salaries. It was defeated 4-3. The "university graduate" minus tie and coat, rose to move that the city borrow several thousands of dollars to increase the seating capacity of the high school football stadium. The motion was carried 4-3. The insurance man said, "I did not get elected to this board for nothing. I would like to write the fire insurance for all the public school property." The scheme was put in a motion by the doctor, the one not on the hospital staff. It was seconded by the former bookie, the "university graduate," and the vote was 4-3 in favor of the motion. The same doctor then moved that a vocational training school teacher be replaced by a man who was a good friend of his.

The superintendent said, "Does your friend have any scientific training?"

The doctor said, "No, but he can learn electricity rather quickly." The accredited teacher was replaced by the doctor's friend. The vote was 4-3. I was inclined to think that all this was a dream, but afterward I was sick to my stomach.

Ministers Take Action

A FEW days later the ministers' association, whose membership included all the Protestant clergy in the city, held its regular meeting. It happened to be my year to serve as president. I spoke of the school board meeting and queried as to what we might do to serve the superintendent. Two of us were commissioned to write the mayor a letter, but I knew it would not be enough.

We wrote the letter setting forth our concerns and grievances. It was a documented manuscript inasmuch as we had discovered that the minutes of the school board were available for public study. The letter also regretted that the school board was not above political concerns, that the educational standards of the school system were low, that the actions of the school board were demoralizing to faculty, students, and parents and that it was our considered opinion that the superintendent of schools was a competent and praiseworthy individual who should be retained for the good of the entire community. A special meeting of the ministers' association was called and the letter was signed by every Protestant clergyman in the city. I suggested that we make an appointment with the mayor and read him the communication, rather than mail it to him. With much difficulty the appointment was made, for the mayor wanted to delay seeing us until after the coming election.

Prior to the hour of the meeting with the mayor the clergy met and discussed further implications of our intentions. Only one clergyman had "another engagement." My admiration for all these men was great. I knew that my people would back me up. It was not that clear for these others and as the affair was dynamite some of them could have been required to resign their pulpits. After we had prayed together we walked in a body to the city hall. I remember that we were rather quiet and somehow I found myself thinking of Martin Luther.

As president of the group I read the letter to the mayor. Because he is deaf I had to shout. He heard me to the end and when I looked up at him his hand was still cupped over his ear, but his face was almost purple. Then he lost his temper and said many things which a shrewd politician never says. In the midst of his outburst he called upon Christ to witness to his integrity. He even opened his journal and showed us a notation to tell the insurance agent not to solicit the public school business. We wrote it all down afterward and if we had ever used it against him it would have been his death warrant as a politician. The meeting ended with our demanding a reply within three days to the charges written, or else the letter would be published. He did not commit himself as to his intentions but said, "I am in the midst of a political campaign."

The Newspapers

WE did not hear from the mayor. The Unitarian minister and I spent one hour with the city editor urging him to print our letter with all our names attached.

He was reticent to touch it.

I said, "If you will not publish it as news, will you permit us to buy space and print it as an advertisement?"

The city editor said, "I will have to refer the matter to the staff and owners and I will give you an answer within two days."

I said, "If it does not get in your paper we will give the whole story to the newspaper in the next city." I wondered as we left his office if I should have made that remark. Neither of us believed the letter would be printed, but I remember feeling a little afraid lest it should be.

The third day after, the Unitarian minister called me on the telephone. He said, "Have you seen the paper?"

I said, "No!" and was already on my way downtown, as I could not wait for the regular delivery. I bought a paper and did not have to hunt for the item. It had made two headlines in the front page. My heart jumped. I knew it was wrong to underestimate the mayor's machine and that the fight had just begun.

In the next few days I learned the pain of receiving anonymous letters and telephone calls. There were rewards too, the greatest being a visit from a group of high school students who were members of the national honor association. Their spokesmen were a Colored girl and a Jewish boy, the latter the class valedictorian. They wanted to help. The Jewish boy had already gained permission from the school board to address publicly its next meeting. They could not have known what he wanted to tell them. He asked me if the school board had power to keep him from graduating.

The next Sunday most of the clergy preached about this community problem. I chose as my text these words of the Psalmist, "Unless the Lord keep the city, the watchman watcheth but in vain." Before Sunday lunch was over the city editor had me on the telephone to say that they were going to print the entire sermon. They did and again it was on the front page. My respect for the paper was increasing. The following days and nights remained charged with tension and with fear and joy all intermingled. We learned what a scandalous weekly paper could print by way of defamation and we were warned that the clergy should remain at their altars and keep out of civic affairs.

The next school board meeting came, but now the spectators were not sparse. The hall was jammed. People sat in the window sills and stood along the walls and in the aisles. A squad of police were present. The meeting began quietly enough, although it was the quietness before a storm. Routine matters were dispensed with quickly and as part of the routine the Jewish boy was given leave to speak. He spoke from a manuscript and beautifully. Later I was accused of having written the speech. I wished I might have claimed it, but it was all his own. He represented the thinking students of the high school and you could sense his personal longing for sound teaching and learning. Suddenly he was interrupted by the "university graduate," the former bookie, still coatless and tieless.

He said, "How long do we have to listen to this stuff?"

The mayor said, "Let him speak."

The crowd would not have permitted him to stop. The boy resumed but now he had discarded his manuscript and spoke extemporaneously, passionately and more beautifully than before. He finished and sat down shaking all over. The crowd roared approval but I was worrying about his diploma.

The mayor rose. His face was flushed. He was very angry and I do not think he knew what he was saying. There was much noise and confusion. But suddenly we heard him calling upon Christ again. Then referring to the Jewish boy, I thought he said, "If this young man were of a different faith, he would not talk like this." Another remembers it this way, "Those people who are putting you up to this do not worship at the same altar that you do."

But behind me the young Colored girl was on her feet almost screaming above the din. "Mr. Mayor! Mr. Mayor! Is there no religious freedom in this city?"

The meeting, threatening to become a mob scene, was abruptly adjourned. The police moved into the room and we walked out into the dark to let the cool night air chill and still the fiery dust of the brain. I knew that if I had witnessed all this on the stage or in the motion pictures I would have thought, "This is good drama, but it is overdrawn."

The next week the local elections took place. The mayor was defeated.

The moral to this remembrance: the forces of evil never sleepeth and once you stick your neck out you have to leave it out.

Easy Street

BY

CORWIN C. ROACH

Dean of Bexley Hall

The way is easy.—Mt. 7:13

PICTURE a wide boulevard with no restrictions. It has no white lines, no traffic lights, no warning signs. A motorist is free to drive as he pleases, at any speed, in any direction. He need make no signals nor observe any rules. That would appear to be a very easy road to drive on but at second thought it would task the powers of the most experienced motorist. Such an "easy street" would prove a death-trap for any driver foolhardy enough to venture upon it.

Yet men who would not drive their own cars under such conditions are willing, even eager, to lead laissez-faire lives, devoid of any economic, social or moral restraints. They want the boulevard wide and easy and they do not heed Jesus' warnings that such a road can lead only to destruction. Because men wanted to get on easy street we had the depression of 1929 and the world war a decade later. How long will it take humanity to learn the lesson of safety first in the things of the spirit, that the hard way, the road which is restricted and regulated, is after all the easy and the safe way?

GREAT SCENES FROM GREAT PLAYS

★ The National Council at its recent meeting (Witness, Oct. 19 for report) voted a second appropriation of $6,000 for the work of the Protestant radio commission. The department of promotion also reported that plans for the radio program "Great Scenes from Great Plays" had not been advanced due to the pressure of other work. For it to be of value, it was reported, 350 parishes will have to participate enthusiastically and the matter will be pressed in the near future.

NEW CHURCH AT RICHLANDS

★ Construction was started October 5 on a new church for Trinity, Richlands, Va. A community house was built there in 1922 and has served well for many years. Conditions changed so that this property was sold in 1945. Services were continued however and now a church is being built in a more suitable location. The Rev. Thomas L. Ridout is rector.

EDITORIAL PAGE QUOTE

★ We are indebted to our friend, Arthur K. Hunt, churchman of Brookline, Mass., for the quote on the editorial page. In sending us the passage from a sermon by Bishop Brooks, Mr. Hunt writes: "I feel strongly that it is the duty of every eligible person to vote. Unfortunately some are indifferent, some lazy. I wonder if you would be willing to print the enclosed in a fall issue. It is authentic."

MODERN BUSINESS IN MICHIGAN

★ The use of modern business methods in the Church is one of the main projects this fall in Michigan. Initiating the program was Mr. Dean Coffin, Bloomfield Hills, a staff member of a Detroit advertising agency, who led a conference of fifteen picked laymen, selected for their special aptitudes in various fields in the business world. These men are now leading eleven meetings held in various centers, called "business methods clinics."

CANON RAVEN AT SWEET BRIAR

★ Canon Charles E. Raven of Cambridge University, England, lectured on "the present position and prospect of liberal theology" at Sweet Briar College on October 20th. He also conducted an informal discussion on current religious matters the following evening and preached last Sunday in the college chapel.

VIRGINIA PROFESSOR VISITS DETROIT

★ Prof. Clifford Stanley of Virginia Seminary was the leader of a conference for the clergy of Michigan, held October 9-11 at Pine Lake. His subject was "relevant aspects of the doctrine of creation." During the meeting the Rev. Howard Harper, rector of St. Paul's, Jackson, chairman of promotion in the diocese, presented plans for the every member canvass. Bishop Emrich also spoke on tithing and standards for the diocese.

WELCOMES STAFF OF FACTORY

★ Recently the New Matic tube factory of Detroit, moved to Utica, N. Y. The Rev. Stanley Gasek, rector of Grace Church, Utica, and member of the department of promotion in Central New York, won the admiration of his fellow clergy, by showing what could be done to win new members for the Church, and not lose any old ones. Soon after the factory transfer was announced, Gasek obtained a list of the 175 executives and supervisors who were being moved to Utica. He mailed copies of this list to 65 clergy in the Detroit area, asking them to mark their own communicants, so that he could welcome them to Utica.

The young former paratrooper chaplain then mailed a letter of welcome to all of the 175 executives, inviting those that had no Church affiliation to make Grace Church their spiritual home in Utica. He also offered to assist them with personal moving problems. The parish has already several new communicants through this method of evangelism.

DEAN SUTER LEAVES WASHINGTON

☆ Dean John Wallace Suter has resigned as dean of Washington Cathedral, effective Jan. 1, to become rector of St. Andrew's, Hopkinton, N. H., and a master at St. Paul's School, Concord. Since 1942 Dean Suter has been the custodian of the Book of Common Prayer. He is a contributing editor of The Witness and for a number of years conducted a column for the magazine. In discussing reasons for the change he said that he is anxious to return to parish work and is particularly happy to combine it with some teaching.

URGES AN AMERICAN CATHOLIC CHURCH

★ Bishop Wallace E. Conkling of Chicago, speaking at a dinner of the National Federation of Orthodox Clubs, urged the formation of a "National American Catholic Church" through the union of the Episcopal and various Orthodox Churches.

Such a Church he said would owe allegiance to no ecclesiastical authority outside the United States. He predicted that such a Church would be formed in two or three generations.

RICE JOINS STAFF OF COUNCIL

★ The Rev. Otis R. Rice, director of religious work at St. Yuke's Hospital, New York, has been named executive secretary of the department of pastoral services of the Federal Council of Churches, succeeding the Rev. Seward Hiltner who is now on the faculty at the University of Chicago.

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

Out of My Later Years. By Albert Einstein. Philosophical Library, New York. $4.75.

This volume contains 60 essays dealing with manifold subjects, such as personal convictions, scientific issues, public affairs, memorials and Zionism. The essays, written between 1933 and 1949, are unfortunately not ordered chronologically, not even within the groups of special subjects. All the various writings show the intellectual greatness, the personal vigor, the emotional discipline and the human wisdom of the author. However, it is to be regretted that the fame of Einstein covers his opinions even if they are either merely individual or amateurish, as they are when he writes on religious, political, or philosophical matters. He is the typical representative of the age of enlightenment, living in the most unenlightened twentieth century.—Richard Kroner.

Parables of Crisis. By Edwin McNeill Poteat. Harper, $2.75.

A brilliant homiletical exposition of sixteen of our Lord's parables, taken from the Gospel of St. Luke, on the theory that they were the last of his parables, and were used by him during the forty days before his crucifixion. They were all uttered under the strain and tension of the approaching crisis, and are to be interpreted accordingly. The parallel with the crisis of the present day is obvious, and helps the author to interpret the meaning and make the application relevant to our needs. But it is a question if he has not read too much of the modern crisis into the ancient; and if the parables were all delivered during these final weeks of strain and stress. Moreover, it is a still larger question whether or not one can reconstruct the teaching of our Lord exclusively from his parables. One would hesitate to do that with any other teacher's illustrations! Often the story is remembered but not the point it was made to illustrate. In a word, one cannot do without the whole gospel tradition, in attempting to interpret the mind of our Lord.—F.C.G.

Winnington-Ingram: The Biography of Arthur Foley Winnington-Ingram, Bishop of London 1901-1939. By S. C. Carpenter. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

The biography of one of the most influential of England's modern bishops, by the Dean of Exeter, who is well known in this country as special lecturer at Berkeley Divinity School. Winnington-Ingram was a good man, if not brilliant; an earnest Christian, though scarcely inspired. As in much recent ecclesiastical biography, one has the impression that the Church is still rolling on its 19th century momentum. Some readers must wonder if it has the stuff it takes to meet either the challenge of modern scholarship or that of the vast world-wide levelling movement in social relations, industry, politics, and economics. What the world needs now is men on fire with conviction, ready to pioneer on new frontiers, not just able guardians of the past and defenders of its heritage.—F.C.G.

About the Gospels. By C. H. Dodd. Cambridge University Press. $1.00.

Four broadcast addresses by the eminent Cambridge New Testament scholar and theologian who visited this country again last year and taught at Union Theological Seminary in New York. The point of view is that of modern critical study of the Gospels, but the contents are replete with religious meaning. The beginnings of gospel writing are traced in the Gospel of St. Mark; the "living tradition" is the Church's testimony which lies behind Mark; the development of gospel writing in Matthew and Luke is the work of the Church in missionary propaganda and in religious teaching; the final "interpretation" of the gospel is the work of the fourth evangelist, St. John.

Clergy who are looking for an up-to-date book on the gospels, brief and easy to read, which they can place in the hands of adult groups—or even the whole congregation—as they conduct a course of Bible study, will find this book well adapted to their needs. Profound a scholar as Dr. Dodd is, he speaks the plainest and simplest prose! And there is a depth of spiritual illumination about everything he writes and says which makes the book worth re-reading again and again.

—F.C.G.

These Sought a Country. By Kenneth Scott Latourette. Harper. $1.75.

Six lectures on outstanding missionaries: William Carey, Samuel John Mills, Hudson Taylor, Timothy Richard, Joseph Hardy Neesima, and one lecture in conclusion.

Humanist or Christian?

THE CHRISTIANITY OF MAIN STREET

Theodore O. Wedel

Idealistic moralism or the Christian gospel of salvation—which is the Christianity of main street? In this straight-forward book, the two alternatives between the message of God's love and the worship of men and their works, are presented in an endeavor to help each individual to make the intelligent choice for himself. The author, Canon of Washington Cathedral and Warden of the College of Preachers, Washington, D. C., points out that the Christianity of ideals is not enough and that the great motivating force of God must be brought back to our faith. Religious Book Club selection. $2.00.

NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

WORKING TOWARD UNION

The Disciples, meeting in convention in Oklahoma City, voted to have their 1952 convention in Chicago at the same time as the Baptist convention, looking toward long-range merger plans. At least four joint sessions will be held.

Addressing the delegates, Prof. M. Searle Bates of Union Seminary, New York, said it was time for America to quit trying to make Westerners of Orientals, adding that the West had lost face with millions of Asians who no longer look upon Western civilization as superior.

Announcement was made that the denomination now has 1,800,000 members in the U.S.; over half of the three-year goal of $14,000,000 for missions, education, evangelism, social service, has already been donated by 4,341 churches; 3,200 young people have volunteered for the ministry or missions as a result of the three year program which ends next February.

PRESBYTERIAN PROGRAM HAS NEW HEAD

Clarence S. Johnson, corporation executive of St. Louis, has been named director of the five-year "program of progress" of the Presbyterian Church, succeeding former Mayor Roy LeCrew of Atlanta, now in the army. The program, to be completed in 1952, aims at 500,000 new members and $7,500,000 for expansion of work.

LOTTERY PROPOSALS ARE FOUGHT

The Mass. Council of Churches is fighting the proposal for a state lottery. Posters and fliers have been sent to 2,000 churches stressing the evils of gambling. Clergymen in Springfield as well as Boston and other cities have vigorously denounced this proposal and also the one which would bring back dog and horse racing.

LUTHERANS HEAD TOWARD MERGER

Without a dissenting vote, the American Lutheran Church, at its convention at Columbus, approved the first step toward a proposed three-way merger with the Evangelical Lutherans and the United Evangelical Lutherans. The other two Churches have already approved the step, which calls for a joint union committee, with nine from each Church. The convention also voted for intersynodical Lutheran cooperation in mission work; to turn its Negro work over to the National Lutheran Council; approved in principle the establishment of a national Lutheran Council division on Latin American work; to encourage missions in India and New Guinea to work toward a single Lutheran Church in each country.

BAPTISTS ISSUE STATEMENT ON RACE RELATIONS

Equal rights for all racial and minority groups is urged in a statement adopted by the joint committee on public affairs of the Baptist Church. The committee represents four major conventions, including the Southern Baptist, and is composed of both white and Negro representatives.

SOCIAL GOSPEL PREACHING APPROVED BY LAYMEN

It is not often that laymen have anything good to say about the preaching of the so-called "social gospel." However laymen of the Universalist Church, meeting in Washington with no clergymen allowed, stated that they are for it. In so doing, they stated that in any presentation of social, economic and political issues "the pulpit should emphasize the moral and religious aspects." One group at the convention even argued that preaching on such matters should be more forceful.

METHODISTS CAMPAIGN FOR PASTORS

Plans for recruiting 5,000 men for the ministry of the Methodist Church, over the usual 1,200 each year, were made at a conference of 507 district superintendents meeting in Indianapolis.

NEWS OF CHURCHES OVERSEAS

RELIGIOUS LEADERS MEET IN MOSCOW

High dignitaries of virtually all religious groups in the Soviet Union assembled in Moscow last week as delegates to the national conference of peace partisans. They occupied the first two rows in the large hall, dressed in ecclesiastical robes. Metropolitan Nikolai of Krutitsky, head of the delegation from the Orthodox Church, sat on the presidium platform with Sergei Vavilov, president of the Academy of Sciences. Others attending were leaders of the Armenian Church; archbishops of the Lutheran Churches in Latvia and Estonia; head of the Baptist Council of the USSR; chancellor of the R. C. archdiocese of Lithuania; the chief Lama of the Buddists and three ranking Moslems.

ESTABLISH NEW CHURCH IN SOUTH AFRICA

Rev. I. D. Morkel, Negro pastor of an impoverished congregation in the Cape Flats area of Cape Town, is leaving the Dutch Reformed Church to set up a new native Church, to be called the Christian Church of South Africa. Mr. Morkel has been an outspoken opponent of the government's policy of racial segregation. He is supported in his move by 80% of his congregation.

At Port Elizabeth about 1,000 natives packed a movie for a youth rally and heard President J. S. Moroka of the African National Congress advocate an all-Africa national Church.

MORE BAPTISTS ARRESTED IN QUEBEC

Four more Baptist evangelists have been arrested in Quebec for street speaking, bringing the total to 31 in recent weeks. Meanwhile the Presbyterians of Montreal and Ottawa, meeting in synod, decided it would "serve no good purpose" for them to take sides in the controversy, in spite of an urgent request from the Baptists.

ENGLAND OBSERVES UN SUNDAY

This Sunday, Oct. 29, is UN Sunday for the Church of England, following a call by the Archbishop of Canterbury for prayer "that mankind may be spared another war." Similar appeals were issued by the head of the Free Churches and the heads of the Presbyterian and Anglican Churches of Scotland.

CONGO NEGROES SEEK TO BECOME JEWS

Dr. Levy, chief rabbi of the Belgian Congo, arrived in Jerusalem last week to confer with leaders of Israel concerning a Congo Negro sect whose members seek to become Jews.

NEW VICAR GENERAL IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Ladislav Hronek, a pro-government priest of Czechoslovakia, has been made vicar general of the R. C. diocese of Hradec Kralove. His nomination is said to have been made by 81-year old Bishop Moric Picha, one of the most outspoken critics of the government. The new officer was one of the first to sign the appeal to the clergy for Church-state cooperation, opposed by the Vatican.

PROTESTANTS MEET IN SOUTH AFRICA

A Protestant congress of one day duration is meeting October 31 in Pretoria to discuss "the danger which the Roman Catholic Church holds for the people and the country."

Is There a Good Doctor in Your Town?

If there is, it is because there are good medical schools in this country.

Good medical schools need able teachers, laboratories, libraries.

You can not have the kind of ministers the Church needs without having "schools of the prophets" as well manned and equipped as our best medical schools.

A. F. GILMAN
Layman of Chicago

I must take issue with Chad Walsh when he says: "A relatively small percentage of Anglo-Catholics really value the icing more than the cake." My own observations are that it is later than he thinks. He does not realize how the temptation grows and how the second generation adds to the folly of its predecessor. You have but to follow the course of the Roman Catholic Church down through the years to see the end to which the icing leads. You have but to go to a diocese where Anglo-Catholicism has long been predominant to see the results, particularly among the younger clergy.

The only reason morning prayer becomes unpurposeful and uninspiring is because of the mediocre caliber of the clergyman conducting it. Christ said wherever two or three are gathered together in my name there am I in the midst of you. There is too little thinking among the clergy and too much following what somebody else tells you to make either morning prayer or holy communion an inspiring experience. After all it is what we do in our lives, not what we do in church, that counts.

WILLIAM L. GRIFFIN JR.
Rector of St. Paul's, Paterson, N. J.

In the Rev. Massey Shepherd's article on Liturgical Revision (Witness, Oct. 12) there occurs an amazing statement to the effect that the prayer for the army in the present Prayer Book is good and that the one for the navy archaic. It would appear to me that the exact reverse is true. The army prayer assumes that we are engaged in a holy war and that all we do is ask for strength and obedience. The navy prayer turns our thoughts to the purposes for which war might justly be engaged in. Either prayer should be greatly improved, but surely it is the army prayer which is most greatly in need of change.

WILLIAM PAYNE
Retired Priest of San Francisco

A word of appreciation to the Rev. Mr. Marmion for his article on facing intellectual difficulties (Witness, Oct. 5). This frank approach to the questions raised in connection with the teachings of the Church is exactly what so many of our young people, beginning their college careers, have been looking for.

The next question the young people will be asking is: "Why cannot the creeds be expressed in language that would make them more easy for us to grasp the current conceptions of their real import?"

Ask any average churchgoer what he means when he sings such phrases as: "Here I raise my Ebenezer"; "The Stem of Jesse's rod"; "The wormwood and the gall," and he either gives you a blank stare or says: "Isn't my face red!"

After all, religion is for everybody and not a select few and the Christian faith should be expressed in a language that the man in the street can comprehend or our young people should be given a course in "ecclesiastical vernacular."

BRITISH HUMANITARIANISM

Essays Honoring Frank J. Klingberg

Edited by SAMUEL CLYDE McCULLOCH of Rutgers University

Handsomely Printed and Cloth Bound $4.00 the Copy

THE YEAR 1951 will be the 250th anniversary of the founding of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (commonly called the S. P. G.) Its charter was granted on June 16, 1701. "Under God, the S. P. G. saved the Episcopal Church in America from extinction," said the Rev. Dr. E. Clowes Chorley, late Historiographer of the Church. More than that, it was the motivating and sustaining power in the development of British humanitarianism. It is still doing a great work all over the world.

A REVIEW from THE CHURCH TIMES, London

In December 1907, J. Franklin Jameson, in his presidential address to the American Historical Association, pointed out that ecclesiastical records are at least as important a source for modern history as for the mediaeval period. Charles M. Andrews, a great American historian of the first British Empire, discerned that the records of the English missionary societies were indispensable to the study of the expansion of England. But to Professor Frank J. Klingberg of the University of California, who had studied under Andrews and also under F. J. Turner, belongs the credit of organizing the scientific exploration of the massive archives of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

To mark his retirement, ten of his former students have presented to him this collection of essays on topics within his field of work. The two main themes are the SPG and the abolition of slavery in the British Empire. These are linked together in the opening essay on "The SPG and Emancipation": the policy of the Society was complicated by the fact that in 1710 it had accepted a bequest of the Codrington sugar plantation of Barbados with the slaves thereto appertaining.

Other aspects of the anti-slavery movement are illustrated by essays on the Rev. James Ramsey, author of "An Essay on the Treatment and Conversion of African Slaves in the British Sugar Colonies" (1784), which aroused England as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was to arouse the United States; and on attempts made between 1781 and 1833 to modify chattel slavery in the British Empire.

An historical outline of the ecclesiastical government of the Anglican Church in North America before 1688 is followed up by three essays describing the variety of work performed by the SPG in Colonial America: one writer describes the assistance given by the Society to the foreign settlers: two others contribute biographical sketches of two notable SPG missionaries, Matthew Graves (who worked in Connecticut and encountered opposition from Dissenters), and the American-born Thomas B. Chandler of New Jersey, a powerful agitator for the establishment of an Anglican episcopate in America.

Other topics include the relations between convicts and colonists in Australia from 1800 to 1850: Early Factory Legislation in England (which drives another nail into the coffin of the legend that William Wilberforce was interested only in the woes of Negro slaves): and children's hymns in eighteenth-century England.

These ten essays are of singularly even quality. None of them is of outstanding brilliance, but there is not one of them that is not useful and informative. All are carefully documented. In addition, the volume contains a select list of books and articles by Professor Klingberg. This Festschrift covers a wide field of historical investigation, and the component essays have the singular merit of being concerned with broad topics of general interest, and not with the minutiae of technical historical scholarship.

WHY DOES THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEED SCHOLARS?

By WALTER H. STOWE and SPENCER ERVIN

Publication No. 34 — The Copy, 25c
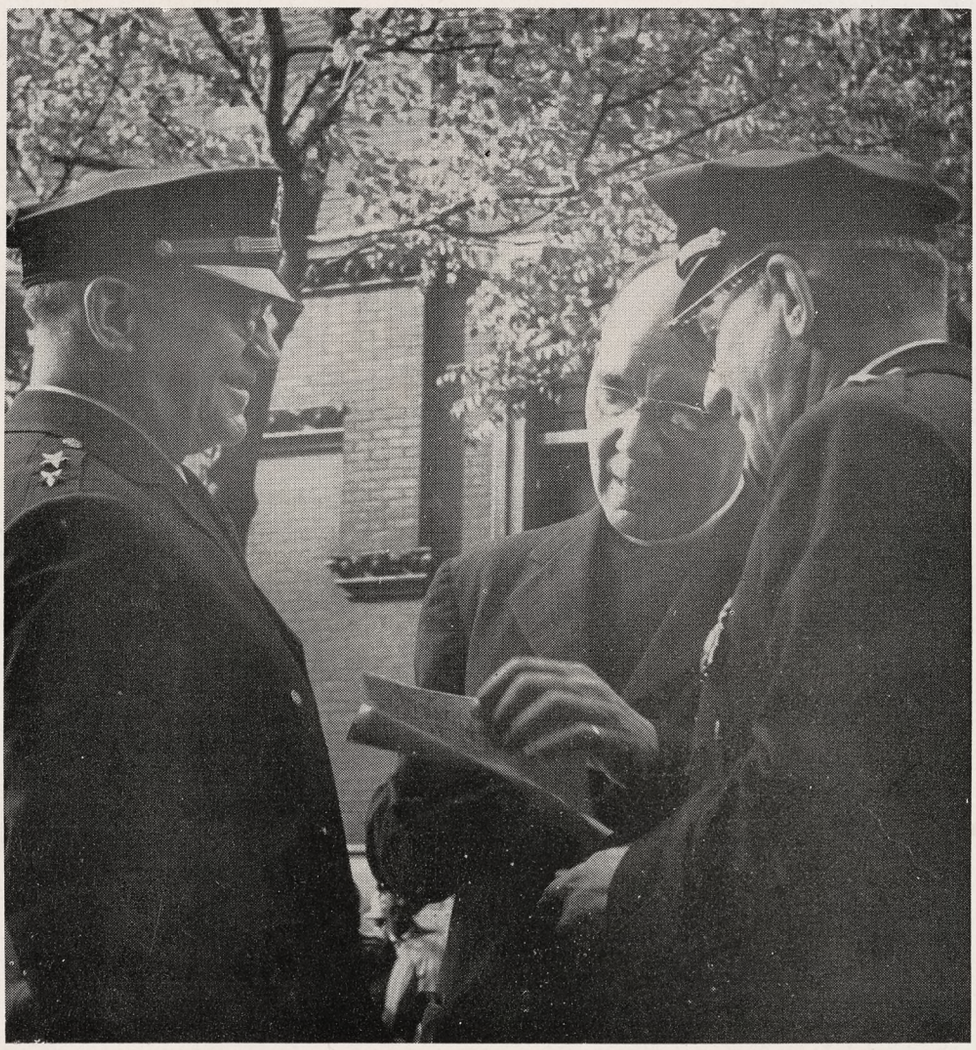
5 copies, $1



This, the Society's latest brochure, answers this question forthrightly, with special reference to the field of Church History. It answers the question, "Has scholarship any practical value?" It gives a partial answer, with facts and figures, to the question recently asked us, "Where can I find out the number of Catholic converts to Anglicanism?" Mr. Ervin's section, "The Value of Scholarship to the Law," shows how scholarship has stimulated reforms in the administration of justice.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Religion as Part of Education Urged at Conference

The Philadelphia Council of Churches Takes a Similar Position

★ Religion must become a part of general education, insisted Bishop Angus Dun of Washington, and Mrs. Douglas Horton of New York, who is vice-president of the Federal Council of Churches. They were two of the headliners at the national conference on religion in education, meeting at Atlantic City and attended by the representatives of 165 private schools. (See editorial page eight).

Bishop Dun said that private schools should teach their students a religion around which they may rally to forestall the development of some other faith, such as Communism, Fascism, materialism or naturalism. All human beings, he said, need a center of allegiance or devotion, and in the world of today, "patriotism is not enough. We must be taught religion, of God's works, love and fellowship."

Declaring that an educated man is not necessarily a religious man, he added that "the most serious crimes can be committed by educated men." The bishop said that religion can be used to explain the sciences and to direct the energies and knowledge of educated men into paths of endeavor which would aid mankind.

Mrs. Horton said that schools "need to recognize the reality of religious experience as a part of cultural and personal life. Any school, however secular (including the public school), which purports to introduce a child to the culture of American society, owes it to that child to include in his description of the world in which he lives, the fact of religion and specifically of the dominant religious tradition of America—our Jewish-Christian heritage.

"Schools need to identify the Church as the institution responsible for maintaining the religious heritage, and they need to help the child understand the diversity of ecclesiastical tongues. Schools can create an atmosphere within which children can recognize religion as a normal, desirable concern of educated people.

"We owe it to children to tell them of the richness of their religious heritage, to demonstrate our own commitments to that heritage, to associate their idealisms with the dynamic of religious faith which has moved mountains and men throughout the ages. But we do well not to drive them, but rather to win them to an interest in these matters."

Fifty of the educators, comprising one group, issued a report in which they pledged themselves to "work to increase intelligent commitment to God in the schools."

"As we survey the first 50 years of the 20th century," the group's statement said, "we realize that we have not come to grips with the basic problems of materialism and secularism. We ourselves have become more and more the victims of a paralyzing culture which has penetrated even the strongholds of the school and the Church.

"To see the world and our task in proper perspective to God's purpose and to find the power that will free us from this paralysis, we must be strong in our knowledge of God and thorough in our commitment to him.

"There have been signs of more readiness to understand the basic ideas beneath varying expressions of belief and a greater agreement on these ideas. Hence as we enter the second half of the twentieth century we intend to work to increase intelligent commitment to God and accomplishment of his will in the schools. Our simple and profound objective will be to rethink, replan and restate the religious program for independent school education."

Philadelphia Statement

A similar position on education and religion was taken by the Council of Churches of Philadelphia, in a statement issued October 19th.

While endorsing separation of Church and state, the committee stressed that "we do not hold to a separation of religion and education."

"Rather," the statement said, "we believe that these two are inseparably related and that any attempt to separate them does violence to both." It added:

"We believe that education is weakened and its usefulness impaired to the extent that it is separated from the disciplines and insights of religious faith. The Christian faith underlies the history and philosophy of American life and of its public education. Were we to depart from this foundation, all our democratic institutions would be imperiled."

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

NEW EMPHASIS IN MICHIGAN

★ The diocese of Michigan, although well on its way to 120 years of existence in time, has young ideas when it comes to the promotion of the Church's program, as evidenced by the following report, which was made by the Rev. Howard V. Harper, of Jackson, chairman of the department of promotion, at the October 18 meeting of the executive council:

"What has been taking place under the guidance of Bishop Emrich and the department of promotion this year goes far beyond the old concept of Church promotion. In the past, promotion has been thought of as a way of getting people to underwrite a budget. Promotion has been related entirely to finance.

"What has happened this year is that the diocese has had the courage to stop selling a program and to begin teaching giving as a religious matter and a means of grace. The emphasis has been moved from getting to giving. That can be, and I believe it is, a reformation of universal and eternal significance, within the Church. It is the beginning of a change of attitude. One result of this inner change in the heart of the diocese will be a new concept of the department of promotion—its function and scope. Its purpose becomes educational instead of financial. The activities of the diocese must still be shown and explained to the people, but from now on, instead of using the Church's list of activities for two weeks in the fall as an incentive for money raising, we shall be free to use it all year long as material for deepening the knowledge and increasing the participation of our people in the Church's work. So the department of promotion becomes the continuing voice of all other departments, telling their story the year around. So far as I know, Michigan is the first diocese that has come to this point.

"We are prepared to make a temporary experiment in this larger concept of promotion. We have established, on a temporary basis, a full time office with Mr. John Chapin as secretary, and our next step, beginning now, will be to put the highly talented people in our department to work telling, by tested professional methods, the story of all diocesan operations."

Innovations in the department's fall program have been business methods, clinics, film strips, a moving picture, and a brochure and other material on tithing, all produced by professional advertising experts most of whom are members of the Church.

ST. LUKE'S CHAPEL HAS NEW ORATORY

★ A new oratory was dedicated in the chapel of St. Luke's Hospital, New York, October 18. Chaplains officiated and the choir was composed of 72 nurses from the hospital's training school.

CONTROVERSY OVER UN FLAG

★ Flag of the UN nations, including the Russian, were carried in procession at a UN service held at the Church of the Advocate, Philadelphia. The service, conducted by Bishop Remington, was sponsored jointly by the council of churches and the world affairs council of the city.

However the UN flag itself caused a controversy elsewhere in the city. The council of churches sponsored a UN television service at the First Baptist Church, but the UN flag was not a part of it since, according to the secretary of the council, the Rev. William Powell, "There is some touchiness, and even antagonism, over the flag because of the Russian representation."

RECTOR CONCERNED OVER CHOICES OF YOUTH

★ Choice of Betty Grable and Hopalong Cassidy among heroes of boys and girls in a recent nationwide poll disturbed the Rev. Frederick H. Belden, rector of St. Paul's, North Kingstown, R. I. He was particularly disturbed because "less than two percent listed Jesus in the poll." "Isn't it a shame," he declared in a sermon on October 22, "that we are not giving our youngsters the kind of insight into the character of Jesus so that they want to claim him and other Christ-inspired persons as heroes too."

A THEOLOGY FOR PREACHING

★ Canon Theodore O. Wedel of the College of Preachers, Washington, gave four lectures on a theology for preaching at Seabury-Western Seminary, Evanston, on October 30-November 2. It is the second in the series of annual George Craig Stewart memorial lectures. They were open to the public.

VIVISECTION BACKED BY CLERGYMEN

★ The Rev. Don Frank Fenn, rector of St. Michael and All Angels, and the Rev. Richard H. Baker of the Redeemer, who is bishop coadjutor-elect of North Carolina, joined with other Baltimore clergymen in opposing a proposed amendment to the city charter which would forbid the vivisection of stray dogs in medical research. All of the ministers took the position, well stated by Rabbi Morris Lieberman who said: "Religion teaches that the human personality is the highest value of civilization. In our Bible we read that God created man in his own image and likeness and gave him domination over all the earth. Therefore the use of animals for the preservation and protection of human life is in highest agreement with the teaching of the Bible. Human life, then, is more valuable than animal life."

CANTERBURY TRUSTEES ISSUE STATEMENT

★ The trustees of Canterbury College met October 17 with Bishop Kirchhoffer of Indianapolis presiding as president and with 13 of the 17 members present. A statement was issued announcing that the institution would continue as a Church-centered, coeducational liberal arts college. The president to succeed the Rev. D. R. MacLaury, who recently resigned, will be an Episcopalian, and a chaplain also will be secured. The acting president is Dean F. G. Neel, with an advisory committee consisting of members of the faculty and the board of trustees.

NEW CHURCH IN DETROIT

★ The cornerstone for the new St. Martin's, Detroit, was laid by Bishop Emrich on October 14. The congregation was established in 1928 and has worshipped in a small, poorly equipped building which the department of missions bought from the board of education of the city. The new building will provide adequate facilities for the rapidly growing congregation and school. The Rev. James H. Morris is the minister.

AUXILIARY MEETS AT TAMPA

★ The Auxiliary of the province of Sewanee met for two days in October in Tampa, with delegates from all the fifteen dioceses attending. There were addresses by Bishop Barth of Tennessee, Bishop Jones of Louisiana and Bishop Henry of Western North Carolina. Mrs. John A. Morson presided as president. The newly elected president is Mrs. E. G. Peeples of Oxford, N. C.

MISSION CONDUCTED BY BISHOP HINES

★ Bishop Hines of Texas conducted a mission for three days in October at St. John's, Thibodaux, La., with many from nearby parishes attending. There was a daily celebration; instruction for women in the afternoon; evening service with sermon and a question period. During the mission he confirmed a number of people, including three former Roman Catholics. He also spoke at the assemblies of the high school and the Nicholls Junior College when he challenged the students to the spiritual values that accrue to those who have a life destination and a plane of living set higher than animal existence. The same challenge was given at a luncheon meeting of one of the service clubs. It was through the efforts of the Rev. George F. Wharton, rector of this historic parish, that Bishop Hines was induced to conduct the mission.

BISHOP BARTON IN TEXAS

★ Bishop Lane W. Barton of Eastern Oregon, chairman of the advisory board of The Witness, was a speaker at parish meetings in the diocese of Texas, which extended over a ten day period in late October. He spoke on the need for supporting the program of the National Council.

Women Put Questions To Mr. Malik

BY
ANDREW M. VAN DYKE
Secretary, Episcopal League
For Social Action

★ The Witness statement on the peaceful settlement of the Korean hostilities is still being used. A group in the Chelsea section of New York, called the women's committee for peace, printed the statement, and at the bottom of the page had a ballot where one could agree or disagree with the statement. They took a poll of the sentiment of the community with 360 persons voting in favor of The Witness appeal, and 38 against.

In order that these sentiments might be made known, the committee wrote to the members of the Security Council of the U.N. asking for appointments so they could apprise them of the judgment of people in the Chelsea area. None were able to meet with the women except the delegate of the Soviet Union, Mr. Jacob Malik. He agreed to have them come to USSR headquarters, in New York. Representing the committee were Mrs. Jeanette Miller, Miss Joyce Cooper, Mrs. Annabel Howard, Miss Charlotte Leslie and Mrs. Barbara Mogulescu, accompanied by the writer as executive secretary of the Episcopal League for Social Action and member of The Witness editorial board.

Previous to the date of the interview, the women had written to Mr. Malik asking three questions on which they hoped he would comment. The group talked with the Soviet representative for an hour and a half, receiving answers to all queries, in addition to the original ones. In response to the question of whether or not he thought it possible even now to bring a peaceful settlement in Korea replied vigorously in the affirmative. Concerning the admission of the Chinese People's Republic into the U.N. Mr. Malik stated that he felt that failure to do this was frustrating to a great extent the ability of the Security Council to work for peace. He spoke at some length on the subject of general disarmament, enumerating the many occasions that the Soviet Union had made proposals that this be done. His government has suggested several times that the nations agree in the U.N. to an immediate disarmament of one-third of their strength, and that there be rigid inspection by the U.N. to see that the agreements are carried out. Later there should be another reduction of a third, and over a period of time further steps in the direction of complete world disarmament. He reiterated the position of his government on atomic energy, saying that it was in agreement that the United Nations should strictly supervise and continuously inspect atomic power projects in all countries, but that the point of difference in this matter was that the Soviet Union could not accept proposals for international ownership of atomic facilities.

Mr. Malik repeatedly spoke of the deep desire of the people in the Soviet Union for peace. In the last war, his country had over ten million military casualties, which meant that there is no family in the nation that did not lose a father or a brother. He stressed that his people have no simple theoretical knowledge of the horribleness of war. They have all experienced it. They do not want any more wars, they want peace.

The Soviet delegate is hopeful that solutions to the many world problems can be worked out by the representatives of the large nations around a conference table. He insisted that much had been accomplished before through this method, and was sure that it can be continued.

CHARLES P. TAFT IS HONORED

★ Charles P. Taft, Episcopalian of Cincinnati and former president of the Federal Council of Churches, received the Bishop Chase metal award of Kenyon College at the dedication ceremonies of the restored Old Kenyon held the weekend of October 21.

RABBITS HELP SUPPORT A MISSION

★ What rabbits have to do with religion is conclusively pointed out by the Rev. Andrew H. Scott, vicar, St. Matthew's Mission, Baldwin Park, Cal. He raises 'em, feeds 'em to his parishioners at a buck—no pun intended—a serving, and thus gets money to keep his mission going.

So far three rabbit dinners have netted the mission $530 for improvements, the bunnies keep multiplying, and he's tossing another October 7.

Mr. Scott, once a star soccer player on the Scotch international team, which is that country's version of making an

All-American football team here, has ideas.

Not long ago he gave $10 to each of 32 parishioners and told them to "go out and multiply." One woman gave a dinner in her home and multiplied the money to $48; Mrs. Scott made blouses and netted a tidy sum; others sold doughnuts, made bassinets.

One parishioner, the late James Rose, given $10, took the crack about multiplying literally and working with the men's club of the mission, started raising rabbits. In February, he and the club held the first dinner. Shortly before Rose died he told the vicar: "This multiplying has to go on. You see that it does."

Mr. Scott did. He already had received two rabbits from Rose, and now he has 250, representing six breeds.

In addition to the rabbits, the multiplying dollars, $320 strong, have come back with $130 additional. That makes the total net profit on the $10 multiplying project about $630.

Mr. Scott, native of Scotland, which may explain his canny operations, served in the last war with the medical corps of the Canadian army. His last charge was at Merced, California. He came to St. Matthew's April 15, 1949.

His wife boosts the family income by selling insurance, and his son, MacGregor, 4, helps feed the rabbits.

BISHOP NASH ON PREACHING

★ Bishop Norman Nash of Massachusetts had things to say on preaching at a conference on the subject, sponsored by Boston University. "Preaching at its best is prophecy — the proclamation, 'Thus saith the Lord.' In our day of peril and world fear we hear voices of doom claiming to be the word of the Lord. They are surely nearer to it than smooth utterances of self-confidence or proud predictions of national invincibility or ecclesiastical infallibility. The so-called 'popular preacher,' whose people assure him weekly that they have 'enjoyed your sermon,' have not listened before speaking. But the prophet of doom has forgotten that God's world is not governed by fate but by the loving power of the living God."

Other speakers were Canon Charles E. Raven of the Church of England; Prof. Edwin Mims of Vanderbilt University; Prof. Charles C. Noble of Syracuse University, and Paul Macy of Chicago who gave the Charles Henry Brent lectures on Church unity.

SCHOOL FOR SPASTICS IN LOS ANGELES

★ An all-San Fernando Valley project, said to be the first of its kind in the west—a special Church school for spastics and other handicapped children—was organized by the congregation of St. Mark's, Van Nuys, Calif., Sept. 25th. The Church school is set up along the lines established by the Dutch Reformed Church in New York and the founder of that school, Mrs. Leonard K. Rodgers, long interested in the education and care of such children, will be in charge of the work in Van Nuys. Working with her will be the Rev. Gilbert Prince, rector of St. Mark's, physicians, nurses and others interested in the spiritual and physical welfare of the children.

According to Mr. Prince, the school will be open to "handicapped children of all races, creeds, nationalities and colors."

First step in the establishment of the school was on October 1, when Mrs. Rodgers addressed clergy of all churches, the general public, and the entire congregation of St. Mark's. Prominent physicians and nurses were special guests.

"The school is ideally suited for such an endeavor," Mr. Prince declared. "Classes will be held in the parish hall, where there are no steps and easy entry. We plan to have a nurse and physician in attendance at all classes."

SYNOD MEETS AT LARAMIE

★ The synod of the northwest province met at Laramie, Wyoming, October 24-26, with Bishop Gordon V. Smith of Iowa the preacher at the opening service. Others taking part in the service were Bishop Brinker of Nebraska, president of the province; Bishop Hunter of Wyoming and Dean Otis Jackson of St. Matthew's Cathedral where the service was held.

DEAN OTIS G. JACKSON

The Rev. George A. Wieland, head of the home department of the National Council, was the headliner at the banquet, speaking on the program of the Council.

FEDERAL COUNCIL BACKS TRUMAN PLAN

★ Bishop Scarlett of Missouri presided at a meeting of the Federal Council's department of international justice and goodwill, meeting in New York, October 26, attended by 75 of the 160 members. A letter was sent to President Truman, over the bishop's signature, urging acceptance of international agreements for the effective reduction and regulation of armaments including atomic weapons.

Religion in Schools

SOMETIMES it is necessary to remember that the majority has rights too! We have long championed the rights of minorities, but in one area of our common life we are threatened today by minority rule.

We are referring to the question of religion in the public schools of the nation. It was only a few years ago that a single atheist was successful in winning a Supreme Court decision prohibiting the teaching of the Bible in public schools, even when such teaching is entirely elective and out of school hours.

This year two private citizens in New Jersey have tried unsuccessfully to have the reading of a few verses of the Old Testament without comment, and the saying of the Lord's Prayer in class rooms of the public schools of that state outlawed. It was contended that this custom established by New Jersey statutes, 47 and 80 years old respectively, was a violation of the traditional separation of Church and state.

Again and again this subject comes up and the first article of the federal constitution is consistently misinterpreted. When the founding fathers ruled against the establishment of any religion, they had in mind the setting up of any one Church as the official, national Church over against all the others. They had in mind the established Church in England and similar establishments in colonial America. This they did not want, and this was their meaning in the constitution. They certainly never intended that the education of the children of this country should completely exclude religion. They had no thought of legislating religion out of public education, if for no other reason than that the public school system was scarcely in existence at the time.

We rejoice in the decision of the New Jersey Supreme Court handed down last month. The reading of five or more verses from the Old Testament without comment and the saying of the Lord's Prayer in a school room would certainly seem to be innocuous enough. We might even feel it was granting all too insignificant a place in the daily curriculum to the spiritual tradition of western civilization. But at the very least it is a recognition of the supernatural, and, as Justice Case wrote, "Great results follow from elements which to human perception are small." He also went on to say that while the constitution stands for a separation between Church and state is does not follow that the state is to be stripped of all religious sentiment. The judge pointed to the motto on our coins, the manner of taking oaths, the President's annual Thanksgiving day proclamation, and the laws against blasphemy as evidence that the American people are and have always been "theistic."

We can hardly claim that a great victory has been won for religion. But we can be glad that a symbol at least is still to be permitted in the public schools of one state. And we can take heart in the fact that one court in the land has come out with a more correct interpretation of the Constitution on this thorny subject of the separation of Church and state. And finally let it be remembered, as we have suggested, that the majority also has rights in this country! We are glad to note that heads of schools agree (see page three).

"QUOTES"

WHEN more than sixty per cent of a nation has rejected God, that nation is in a fair way to become apostate, and when a whole nation becomes an aggregation of self-seeking indivdiuals, it will lose its power, whether that power be commercial, political or moral. We will be justly despised by the nations which are ill when our policies demand that we be clothed in purple and fine linen and that we fare sumptuously every day.

For Whom the Bell Tolls

THE Liberty Bell gives a pleasant sound to all Americans who recall its role in their country's original fight for freedom. As it is being rung today by those who have obtained its possession the sound is somewhat ominous. Freedom is not a simple idea. Freedom for what, and freedom from what, are natural questions which arise as soon as thinking people use the word. How free can we be physically or economically? Are we free to eat or not to eat in the same degree that we are free to believe or not to believe? Freedom is only a means to an end, and that end may be that while the strong get stronger the weak are at liberty to suffer. Christianity says that only the service of God gives perfect freedom, not the business of accumulating wealth.

If the cold war is basically a struggle between the "haves" and the "have nots," which we believe it is, we do not see that the Christian religion is called upon to declare a holy war for either side. For this reason we resent the fact that the letterhead of the National Council's department of promotion should be used to recruit Episcopalians for what is actually an economic cause. At best, it is a negative reason for espousing Christianity, and at worst, it is a blatant exploitation of the religious sentiments of our people.

This applies also to the current propaganda for the every member canvass which seems to build its whole case for supporting the Church's enterprise on the objective of stopping Communism. How are we going to stop Communism? By subversive activities, through Radio Free Europe, for example, within the countries that are now under its sway? In other words, we are being asked to support a tactic against Communist countries for which we condemn them for trying to do to us. This certainly will not work to the advancement of the Church's missionaries in these lands. Yet we can already hear our self-righteous condemnation of these same countries when they exclude our missionaries as agents of a foreign power. It hardly seems Christian to provide freedom for a few Americans to become richer by putting our fellow citizens of the Kingdom in a false position.

As a matter of fact, we suspect this whole business of the Crusade for Freedom of being reactionary and dangerous to the real freedom of the American people. We base this upon the names of those who are its sponsors. Amongst the few, who are at best sentimental liberals, we find those who have been pro-fascist, America firsters, militarists, labor-baiting journalists, apostles of the N.A.M., spiritual mobilization, all those who, in a word, have fought for years for their own advantage against the domestic rights of the American people, and having conquered there, are now turning their attention to the challenge which confronts them on the world front. We have no brief for Communist doctrines of freedom but we have less for those who have suddenly seized the People's Liberty Bell to exploit for their own ends. It sounds too much like ghosts tolling a dirge that would lure the few that are still alive into the dubious freedom of an already over-crowded graveyard.

The Episcopal Church — What's Wrong?

BY
HYATT HOWE WAGGONER
Professor at Kansas City University

IF there is any truth in the ideas I have been exploring—and I cannot and do not claim more than a partial validity for them—then what ought we Episcopalians to do? Speaking as a layman, and as one furthermore who has more knowledge of theology, past and present, than the Church's present national program, I have the following suggestions to make. I can claim no novelty for them. Indeed, some of them are already a part of the Church's present plans. But if they are as important as I believe, they can bear repetition and emphasis here.

First of all we should make every effort to reach out and bring in new classes of people. Our Church has been too long the protector of the easy consciences of the urban well-to-do. We must reach the "lower classes" of the cities, the workers, organized labor, and that even less "respectable" group, unorganized labor. By and large only the Romans have any strength here, and what a scandal that is! What a condemnation of the Protestant Churches that they should end by being a bulwark of the status quo, the modern counterpart of that very priestly establishment that contrived to get Jesus crucified as a dangerous character.

And we must extend and greatly strengthen our efforts to bring into the Church those who live in rural areas and small towns. It is a commonplace that here we are shockingly weak. Yet there is more hope for a revival of true Christian faith among these groups than there is in our already "strong" (financially and numerically strong, that is) large-city typical parishes. Roanridge is a start here, and an encouraging one, but it is far from enough.

The Well Educated

BUT there is another class which is even more important for the future of the Church: I mean the very well educated. Anyone who knows our colleges today from the inside, as I do, knows that the relation of Christianity to the colleges may be suggested by a general law which may be worded something like this: the better the college academically, the rarer it is to find a professing Christian on the faculty. As one travels up the scale of fame and merit among the colleges, one comes finally to a place where this law is reversed: there are probably more Christians in proportion to the total faculty at the two or three best institutions in the country than there are at the second-best and third-best and fourth-best places; but the law holds good for the overwhelming majority of the nearly a thousand institutions of higher learning in the land.

I do not need to talk about the effect which this fact has on those students who come to college with some Christian faith. I should say, judging from the urban and large state universities in which I have taught, that considerably less than half of the students come to college with any meaningful faith whatever, even of the vaguest kind; and that during their college years most of those lose whatever they came with. Episcopalians cannot afford to remain complacent about this. Here is another class we must do all we can to bring into the Church—the students, and especially the best students in the best colleges and universities, for they are the ones who in a few years will be our intellectual leaders, shaping, it may be, a world even more hostile to Christianity than the present one.

The sort of thing that is now being done on the campus of Ohio State University and at a few other institutions is what I mean. It must be done everywhere. But even that will not be enough. We must work to get Christians on the faculties, which means primarily working with the best graduate students, for they are the ones who go on into faculty positions. Eventually we may thus, with God's help, create a new climate of opinion, a new intellectual culture which will not stigmatize Christianity as the refuge of the sick, the weak, and the ignorant. We may—I do not say that we can, for though we can influence we cannot control the future. We must do what we can to create a Christian culture in which those who share in that culture most fully need not be ashamed or embarrassed or defensive about being Christians. And that means that the Church must do everything in its power to bring in our most highly educated class. Be ye wise as serpents: we must fight a secularist culture with its own weapons, not losing or weakening the faith but strengthening it with learning.

We are in a better position to do something here than any of the other Protestant Churches, insofar as we are Protestant; and I personally think most of us protest too much. Has anyone ever heard of any well-known intellectuals in our century who have become converted to Christianity from unbelief and have become, say, Baptists or Congregationalists? But I could name a dozen at least who have become either Anglican or Roman Catholic. I mean no disrespect to Baptists or Congregationalists when I say this; they have great histories. But it is simply a fact that intellectual life has gone out of the extreme Protestant groups; and the first to recognize this, of course, are those very intellectuals that we need for leadership in the Church.

Three new classes, then, must be brought into the Church, not only for their good but—from the point of view I am developing here—even more for the Church's good. They are, first, labor, the poor, and the ignorant; second, rural and small town people, who tend to coincide with the first class in income and education; and third, the most highly educated, especially that group of which the average American is so suspicious, the intellectuals.

Seminaries

AND the second thing I think we should do while we are reaching out to bring in new classes is to strengthen the theological schools. Now I confess to knowing nothing about our theological schools from personal experience with them; I have no inside information here at all. But we cannot help judging them by their products. It is a tragic fact that all too many of the clergy are neither very intelligent nor very well educated. It may well be that this is not the fault of the theological schools. They are probably not getting enough of the right kind of students. Teachers have to work with what they get. No amount of excellent teaching will turn a naturally dull student into a brilliant preacher or a good theologian. Do the best students in our colleges go into divinity school, or is the situation not rather like that in our teachers' colleges and departments of education? The famous Carnegie survey made years ago in Pennsylvania, which measured the quality of the students preparing to be teachers in the public schools in comparison with other students, revealed the shocking fact, proved over and over again since and a matter of common knowledge to college faculties, that public school teaching as a career tends to attract only the mediocre and the poor students. This is understandable, of course: public school teaching does not pay well, and it has not as yet been able to inspire the sense of being a calling, a mission, something so creative and wholly congenial that its attractive features outweigh its lack of material rewards, even in a materialistic culture. It is this sense of calling that has kept a goodly percentage of the best students coming into college teaching.

But if college teaching can continue to attract many of the best students, even in our money culture and without paying salaries proportionate to the required training and the responsibility, then the Church can do so too—if it will. Here obviously the responsibility rests largely on the congregations. We must get our sons to want to go into the ministry. If we get large enough numbers to want to do so, the theological schools will be able to select those best qualified. But meanwhile the theological schools must see to it that so far as possible they get faculties that can attract and hold our best young minds. Which means that the faculties must have both knowledge and faith, must be both Christians and scholars. There is no room in our schools for the kind of theologian I met some time ago who, when questioned about his personal belief after desultory conversation at a cocktail party had revealed an apparent unbelief on his part, replied that he was of course a skeptical liberal whose interest in the sociology of the urban Church was a purely scholarly interest. But if the theological schools are to improve their faculties at the same time that they are getting better students, we shall have to support them better.

Theological Revival

I HAVE only one more suggestion to make about what we should do. I fear this will be as offensive to some as my remarks on the weaknesses of the typical congregation must have been, but I shall make it anyway. It is that we must have, and the clergy should do everything in their power to make possible, a theological revival. I could write at length on the process whereby the Protestant Churches have gradually come to the ridiculous and deadly notion that theology is not important in religion. I have just been talking with some of my English majors in college about the process as we see it at work in Matthew Arnold, who wanted to solve the science vs. religion problem of his day by keeping religious sentiment by dropping the dogma. And though most of my students have grown up taking for granted the rightness of Arnold's solution, they were able, after all the consequences had been explored, to see that both the historical and the theoretical consequences of dropping dogma from religion is that in the next generation you drop religion. Theology is the attempt to be intelligent about our faith; and we cannot afford to be unintelligent—or to be merely sentimental.

Now of course, for many complex reasons which I have not time to go into here, the only possible theological revival in our day must be a revival of orthodoxy. The revival that is already under way has in fact taken that direction, and it could take no other. This is where the chorus of protest begins, for there is a very strong body of opinion in the Church which holds that the new theology is not only mistaken but somehow sinister.

But what is the essential thing about the new theology? It is that the new theologians are attempting to recapture, after several centuries of loss and weakening, the spirit and meaning of historic, central, biblical Christianity. That is what the new theology is, a return to the roots, a revival, a rebirth, as everyone who really knows it knows. And if that is what it is, can Episcopalians afford to remain ignorant of it? Can the clergy afford not to read—and at times to discuss in sermons—Niebuhr and Barth and Maritain, and, on a more popular level, C. S. Lewis and Dorothy Sayers and Chad Walsh, to name only a few? Now I do not agree completely with all these writers, or they with each other for that matter. Barth seems to me, as he does to Niebuhr, to stress the first great commandment so much as to weaken, in practice, the second; and Lewis sometimes impresses me as too nearly a literalist; and Dorothy Sayers has perhaps dropped the heritage of the Reformation a little too abruptly. But in the essentials they all agree: we must get back to the fundamentals of our faith, think out just how and why we differ with the secular relativists and pragmatists and materialists and positivists and followers of all the other secular isms of our time, and discover all over again what it means to be a Christian.

Now the hopeful thing about this for us Episcopalians is that in this movement back to the roots, we do not have to discover something we have never had, as some of the more recently formed sects must do if they are ever to become fully Christian. All we have to do is to rediscover something that we already have. This is, as I say, very fortunate. And it is one of the chief reasons why, as an adult convert to Christianity, I am an Episcopalian. But it is likely also to be difficult. We must rediscover, for instance, that the essentials of our faith are all in the Bible and the Prayer Book, not in the popular magazines that are the true bibles today for the great middle class. My guess is—and it is merely a guess, for there are no reliable figures on the subject—that the overwhelming majority of Episcopalians very seldom read the Bible. From how many pulpits has the Church's fine, and official, new guide to a reading of the Bible, "The Holy Scriptures," even been mentioned, not to say strongly recommended, as it ought to be? And the Prayer Book we repeat mechanically without—often admittedly without—meaning it.

Back to Tradition

THE theological revival means for us, in short, the appropriation of a not quite dead tradition, not the creating of a new tradition. As far as the essentials of the faith are concerned, nothing whatever new is needed. The faith has been revealed. If we do not believe that we are not in any meaningful sense Christians. Of course each age must reappropriate the faith, reinterpret it in words it can understand, come to terms with it in the light of its own knowledge. But it must do so without losing the essentials. Each age must rediscover, not water down or refashion. That is the task of theology, and it is what the new theology has so magnificently done. Those who find themselves out of sympathy in the main, not on details here and there, with the majority of the new theologians are really, though they would be the first to deny it, out of sympathy with revealed and historic Christianity. The word heresy again today has some meaning, as it did not have outside of Romanism fifty years ago.

The most popular heresy today, extreme Pelagianism, or belief in the innate natural goodness of man, is actually an example of the way the world has taken over the Church. For it is a reflection of the 18th and 19th century false religions of nature and evolutionism, of secular romantic optimism and the religion of automatic progress, of scientism and pragmatism. It is of course the most popular heresy with the "best people" in many of the "most successful" churches, for it is a very unpleasant experience fully to face the fact that one is not worthy, is indeed a sinner even if one has not committed murder, to admit when one thinks of gross and obvious sinners, "There, but for the grace of God, go I." But if things are really all right with us, if we are "naturally good," if it is only a criminal class that sins, then of course Christ's sacrifice on the cross must have been only a gruesome mistake; and the Incarnation must seem pointless and unnecessary; and Christianity itself is only a rather bad joke: we should all give it up and become scientific humanists. Unless we recognize the need to repent, we shall not repent; and unless we repent and become new men, we shall not enter into Christ's kingdom. The easy Christianity that is preached from many Episcopal pulpits is an effective barrier to the accomplishment of the very work for which Christ came.

The history of thought for the past two hundred years might all be written, I think, from a point of view which would start from an analysis of the effects of pride. We have been taught that it is positively wicked not to believe that man is naturally good, that he is doing very well on his own, that he doesn't need any help to create, pretty soon now, a heaven on earth. So that he doesn't need any supernatural heaven, because there isn't any anyway, and the society of the future will be heavenly, and besides a "pie in the sky" heaven is an immoral notion believed in by slaves and weaklings—and by Jesus of Nazareth, who didn't have the advantages of our modern knowledge. It ought to be obvious that one cannot hold such notions and be a Christian in any real or meaningful or historic sense of the word, but to a very great many it is not. Well, the new theology makes this, and a good many other things, clear. That is why I say that widespread appropriation of this new theology—which will in turn mean a reappropriation of the Bible and the Prayer Book—is necessary if the thousands of merely nominal Christians in the Episcopal Church are to be made into, or given the chance to become, real Christians.

Opportunity Ahead

IN the long view the Church may be entering its period of greatest opportunity as well as a great test, just because Christianity is no longer either compulsory or fashionable. There is nothing—nothing which the world values—to be gained from being a Christian today, so that we may expect a vigorous winnowing in the next fifty or a hundred years. "Many are called, few chosen" has not been a popular text in the last several centuries, but there may just possibly be something in it. Those who call themselves Christians in the next century may well be fewer, at least in proportion to the total population, than today; but they are apt to rediscover that old-fashioned and now not very popular theologian, St. Paul, who made no apologies when he said, "Be ye not conformed to the world."

Come in, as Dorothy Sayers has written, all the way in, or go out. Dilution is the basic trouble with the Church today—dilution in faith, in doctrine, in membership. We need more clergy who are not afraid to offend the generous donors or to fly in the face of the climate of opinion or to run counter to the secular religion and who will say to us: if you cherish your easy conscience and are resolved to protect it, go out. If you cannot accept the dogmas of the natural sinfulness of man, call it radical imperfection if you will, the Incarnation, the Atonement, and the Resurrection, then you are not a Christian in the historic, and Episcopal, sense: go out. The result for the Church if many were to follow this advice? A certain loss of revenue, no doubt—and an increase of purpose, effectiveness, and power. The Church might even become—imagine it!—a redemptive society. It doesn't, as many have recently said, take very many Communists to wreck a state, or very many Christians radically to alter the tone of a society—but they must be Christians.

Only to the extent to which we can come to take the words of the general confession seriously, with the most utter and absolute and literal seriousness, is there, I think, hope that we may set right those weaknesses in the Church that I have been suggesting. We must know and feel the terrible truth of the words we say so easily and thoughtlessly, "We have erred, and strayed from Thy ways like lost sheep." And there is painfully little health in us. But if we do know and feel this, if we do really repent, we shall discern reasons for hope. And the chief of these reasons is that, though the ways of Providence be dark to us, we believe that we are not alone in our effort to keep Christ's Church true to its divine nature and its divine mission.

THE LIVING LITURGY —

Stewardship and the Canvass

BY
MASSEY H. SHEPHERD Jr.

FOR all that is in the heaven and in the earth is thine. These words of the Communion Offertory Sentence should be the parson's text on the Sunday when the laymen start out on their annual Every Member Canvass. Perhaps we should say that it will be his text for several Sundays before the Canvass. For these devoted laymen will have been primed for the job by much official and semi-official literature on the Canvass which will mislead not a few of them into thinking that a parishioner who makes a pledge for the support of the Church's work at home and abroad thereby fulfills his obligation of Christian stewardship. This mistaken notion is, alas, very widespread in the Church. The truth is that what we give of our means into the small pockets of our Sunday envelopes is a very minor part indeed of God's claim upon us to be stewards of His bounty. Christian stewardship involves the totality of our lives and everything we possess. God does not demand or seek part of our money but all of it; not part of our concerns but all of them. It is a very sorry thing that we have so persistently done year after year—getting the idea of stewardship mixed up with the Every Member Canvass.

As usual, the Prayer Book does not leave us without any guidance on this subject, and specifically with respect to what the Offertory of the Communion means. In the section of Family Prayer there is a collect "For Faithfulness in the Use of this World's Goods" (p. 599). This prayer makes it very plain that inasmuch as God has "given us all that we possess" we are bound to "honour" Him "with our substance . . . remembering the account which we must one day give." I take it that if the Prayer Book meant by that statement that we should honor God with a part of our substance—a tithe, a pledge, or whatever you wish to call it—it would have said so. "All that is in the heaven and in the earth is thine." Again, on p. 44 of the Prayer Book there is another collect "For Every Man in his Work." Nothing is said here about our work for the Church or of the work which we pay the Church to do for us. Whatever our work day after day may be, it is a "calling" of God for service "to the benefit of our fellow men, for the sake of him who came among us as one that serveth." There is something very inclusive about this, and it is rather shattering to the complacency with which we have separated the sacred from the secular as though God made any such distinctions. We can be certain that our Almighty Father is just as concerned about the way we vote, the way our national resources are spent, the way our political and economic influence is spread, the way we use our leisure, the way we propagandize the "American way of life," the idle word, the snap judgment, the closed mind and the closed purse to human suffering and need, as ever He is about the orthodoxy of our Sunday prayers or how we keep up with our Church pledges.

And another thing—we are playing fast and loose with the gospel when we use the fear of Communism as a motive in getting people to give to the Church's work. The appeal of Communism today to large masses of people is due to their belief, however mistaken, that it will give them readier relief from the economic injustices which they have suffered too long from the corrupt and reactionary governments that the Western powers, the so-called Christian nations, support. The tragedy in Korea should be a warning to us. Though the Episcopal Church has no missionary work in Korea, we are nonetheless involved in God's judgment upon our people for the situation which we have helped to create by our policies there. It is part of our Christian stewardship to lend support to whatever agencies are working for reforms, whatever their political affiliations, so that the masses of men have a just share in the wealth of God's provident bounty. If this should mean conflict with the immediate and expedient foreign policies of our own government we as Christians should not be afraid to face it and its consequences. If our missionary work can only be carried on because it is protected by corrupt governments who fight Communism we had better abandon the missionary enterprise. In the final reckoning of our stewardship we shall be judged by our efforts as citizens of the Kingdom of heaven "to do justice and love mercy" however much we may stuff our envelopes on Sunday mornings. "Thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as head above all."

Attending a Liturgical Day

BY

GORDON C. GRAHAM

THE principle that the Christian liturgy is something done, rather than something talked or talked about, could not be better stated than by the sort of demonstration of the service itself which was given on Columbus day in St. George's Church, New York, under the joint sponsorship of this parish and of St. Ignatius, New York. It was, also, a strong gesture of the essential unity of the Episcopal Church, for which the respective rectors, the Rev. Edward O. Miller and the Rev. Wilfred F. Penney are to be congratulated. It is to be hoped that this sort of thing will be repeated and duplicated in other places because all of us need both to learn and live by the liturgy of our Church. When the Holy Eucharist is properly presented it is neither high nor low. The best way to describe what was done at St. George's is to say that it was functional, that is, it followed a direct mode of action by which it effectively fulfilled its true purpose. The emphasis was on the practical rather than the pretty, on the use to the exclusion of the useless. Dignity and simplicity, not fussiness or plain dullness, were the notes of the technique that was followed.

Functional liturgics must first be predicated on a clear notion of the meaning of the service, and this the special preacher at St. George's, Dom Gregory Dix, of the Anglican Order of St. Benedict at Nashdom in England, did with scholarly success, both by his sermon in the morning and the demonstration of the early Christian liturgy which he conducted in the afternoon. The purpose of the Eucharist is to continue the process of creating the Church. It is the practical means of mediating the new covenant between God and his people of a special social relationship in which the Church as the new society is the middle term between God and men, and men with each other. Through one Bread they are all one Body.

The demonstration, acted out in modern dress, of the early Christian liturgy gave the essential background that is necessary to understand the real meaning of our present-day rite. It was a very practical exercise in unity. They came in informally and took their places—bishop, priests, deacons, and people, all with their part to do. As Dom Dix put it, "The Eucharist is something you could not do without; and it could not be done without you." Each brought his own bread and wine, placing it upon the table. After which they all stood around while the bishop sang the prayer of consecration. Then the bread was broken for communion and each received and then took some home for communion between services. It was all very simple and direct, and gave the impression of secrecy and risk that would be found in an underground movement. The feeling that they were building a new society in this rite was brought out by the fact that as each brought his own bread and wine which represented him, so he received back that which somebody else had brought, thus being united to others in one body through the one bread.

ple's participation and of the balance between the offertory and the communion. The ministers at the altar, bishop, deacon and subdeacon, stood behind facing the people. (This can be done at St. George's as the altar is in the middle of the sanctuary with the rail running all around; the choir is off to the sides.) There were other bishops, clergy, acolytes, the students of the General Seminary as choristers, and plenty of people, all seeing everything that was going on and taking part in the service. There were just two candles on the altar, and two on the credence table. At the offertory people from the congregation brought up the bread and wine and there was a general communion of the people. The epistle and gospel were sung to the congregation from the pulpits. Eucharistic vestments, of long and dignified design, were worn. Even incense was used, simply and with restraint. Yet nothing was done ostentatiously or self-consciously but with its functional aspect uppermost. The main points were the ministers and assistants being all around the altar, the congregational singing (the responses were unaccompanied—which is why!), the offertory procession, and the general communion.

A Liturgical day is important because it shows what can and should be done by practical demonstration. By this means all of us can be taught where we fall away from the essential marks of the Christian liturgy. Evangelicals were shown that a simple service does not consist in having the fewest taking part and doing the least. Anglo-Catholics could learn how to be functional in their ceremonial, and to have more congregational participation. It was convincingly demonstrated that High Mass without communions is really not High Mass. All Churchmen can do more to emphasize the offertory and so counterbalance the idea that the liturgy is just a communion service.

There are a few criticisms that can be made of a venture which has such possibilities for lifting the liturgical standards of the whole Church. The faults seemed typical of our American culture. Acolytes should not wear red. It is neither functional nor primitive. Moreover, there should be fewer servers and only one master of ceremonies is necessary for practical purposes. The music was, as usual, too hurried to lend much dignity. The weakest point of the good things that were done was the offertory. It still appeared to be mostly a financial dealing, which probably in our American way we cannot get away from. Yet, if we followed our Prayer Book we would first take up the money and "bring it to the priest who shall humbly present and place it upon the holy table." "And the priest shall then offer, and shall place upon the holy table the bread and wine." (p. 73). This is surely the proper order with the climax at the offering of the bread and wine. If the Kyrie was made ninefold why could not the Gloria in Excelsis be either moved up after it, or simply dropped? We shall never get across the climactic position of communion as leading right out into the world until we cut out all the anti-climax (including the solemn extinguishing of the candles) that drags out this service.

The final criticism is in the form of a question. What about the social meaning that is so clear in the proper offering of the divine liturgy? It is a dangerous mockery to encourage this sort of thing unless we are trying to face its social implications.

You Say It

BY

GEORGE I. HILLER

Rector of Trinity Church, Miami

FACED continually with a large element of indifferent people, we are forced to the conclusion that there is not a regular way to deal with them. Preaching, no matter how effective, can only occasionally score in that large group. They are not in Church. The printed word has perhaps a little more chance because it may be distributed like seed, and accidentally fall on good ground. At the best, it is not efficient. Then there is the pastoral call. Its batting average for efficiency is also pretty low in dealing with this group. They are hard to find, their activities are generally great elsewhere. They are hard to talk to, because as a rule they very pleasantly receive a clergyman with a smiling confession, "I am a back-slider, you see I"—(then follows one of about forty standard excuses—you hear an original one once a year perhaps).

What the preacher, the writer, or the caller could tell these people about themselves would perhaps be rather strenuous. They would resent it, and yet often it would be the simple truth. He might say, for instance, "you have been through a conflict in yourself, between your sense of dependence upon, and gratitude toward God, and your innate laziness, and the latter won."

Or, he might say, "you ceased to pray in private, you gradually failed to feel the call to acknowledge God publicly, and so you have arrived at a place where you have no God at all."

Or, your recreation, (boat, golf, or what have you) will not answer even a little when and if the anguished cry of your heart should ever be, "My God why has thou forsaken me?" Without some practice, some effort, some tuning in, can you reasonably expect an answer? In fact, is it not fair to say you could not understand?

Or, "no intelligent person lines up with the group of indifferent, non-worshippers unless he has definitely answered in the negative, the question—Is religion worth while? Because, if he thinks it is (and he is intelligent) he knows that no worthwhile thing in life is attainable or retainable except by effort and vigilance."

Or, "You say you tried. How much did you try? Did you really learn as you would have to do in anything else worth while? How much time, how much sacrifice did you make? How much did it cost you? That is what you got out of it. Unless, in absolute honesty and sincerity, you tried, are you being fair with yourself?"

Now perhaps the preacher, the writer, or the caller cannot say those things to a great company of indifferent people. They are true, but they would be resented. You, however, as a churchman, have just as much responsibility. It is your task to witness for Christ, you are "a soldier until your life's end." There are some people to whom you can say those things without hurrying that end.

Sadsack Religion

BY

CORWIN ROACH

Dean of Bexley Hall

Do not look dismal.—Mt. 6:16

BUT so many Christians do. Instead of looking pious they look merely pained. The reason, Jesus tells us, is that their penitence is for propaganda purposes, that they may be seen of men. They are play-actors but they overplay their part and the performance falls flat. Such Dismal Desmonds remind you of one of the soldier caricatures that has come out of the war. Sadsack is the name of this particular ineffective Gloomy Gus.

There have been many similar Sadsacks in the history of Christianity however, men who measured their Christian virtue by the length of their countenance. That does not mean that the true Christian is a blithe and carefree spirit. There is needed today, as never before, a spirit of real and genuine contrition upon the part of individual Christians and Church groups. We need to repent the sins which made possible two wars in this generation and which are speedily preparing the scene for a third world war. Such sorrow should be written on the soul and not on the shirt-sleeves. It is too deep and poignant to be put on display in a dismal look. Our face must reflect our faith. If we are really sorry for the past we can take courage for the future.

Happy Paupers

By PHILIP H. STEINMETZ

Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

POVERTY depends partly upon how much you have. But it also depends upon what others have. In Ashfield a carton of cigarettes does not rate as wealth but in Berlin it does. Poverty depends even more upon the inner attitude of the person. Some people feel poor however much they have because they keep their eyes on what they lack and feed their hunger for it. Others feel rich however little they have because they continually remember their possessions and rejoice over them.

Now there is a poverty which is next to real happiness. It is the poverty of those who know how poor they are in spirit because they continually compare what they have of love, patience, willingness to forgive, complete honesty and such with God's wealth in these categories. "Happy are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Such people have already entered the area ruled by God, the kingdom, and know something of real happiness.

Unfortunately there are too few such happy paupers in the U. S. A. Radio, movies and magazines all keep us thinking about possessions and physical pleasures and make us desire more and more of both. So we are drawn into increasing unhappiness as we frantically chase happiness.

Worship, Bible reading and listening to sermons tend to make us aware of our poverty of spirit and to lead us into the acceptance of the kingdom which God is offering.

Ponder your poverty a while and see whether it is fraught with such joy that you belong among the happy paupers.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

ST. STEPHEN'S SCHOOL NOW OPEN

★ St. Stephen's, the new co-educational preparatory school of the diocese of Texas, opened in Austin in September with an enrollment of fifty and a faculty of fifteen. The headmaster is the Rev. William Brewster, formerly head of St. Mark's School. The dean is Robert M. Kimball, formerly the head of a boys school in New Hampshire. The dean of girls is Marjorie Sallie, formerly of Ashley Hall in South Carolina. The teachers are George Brengle, formerly of Bolles Academy, Florida; Mrs. Elizabeth Brewster, a graduate of the Boston School of Fine Arts; the Rev. John Cummings, who teaches courses in history and religion; Harland M. Irvin Jr., a graduate of the University of Texas; Alice B. McGuire, the head of the library; J. Stuart Page directs physical education for boys and Lillian Scott for girls, as well as teaching science and English; Dean Towner, a graduate of Cornell, teaches Latin and Greek; Harriette M. Williams of Bryn Mawr teaches French, Spanish and German; Ike D. Fowler of the University of Texas is general manager; Dr. Horace E. Cromer Jr., is physician; Lena Wood is dietitian.

BISHOP HINES WRITES ON CHARITY

★ John E. Hines, coadjutor of Texas, writes a little piece in the monthly magazine of the diocese about support for the Church and charity giving generally. He points out that a recent article in a mass circulation monthly reported a family with a $10,000 annual income, plus an additional sum from an inheritance, who has just built a $30,000 home, that has $52 as the charity item in their budget. The head of the household ushers each Sunday in an Episcopal Church. Another family operates on a $450 monthly budget, with 25c a week their charity item. Writes the bishop: "The Achilles heel of Christendom is its niggardliness. Their heart is in themselves. So is their treasure."

YOUNG PEOPLE IN MEXICO

★ Young people of the Church in Mexico are an active lot. A recent report says that large numbers assist at services; aid the clergy; provide music; teach in schools; act as rural missioners. They give a sizeable offering to be used by Bishop Salinas at his discretion; they arranged for a service on the world day of prayer. Their most recent project is raising funds for a printing press "in order that the gospel may be spread not only through the missionaries but also by publicity." Still another activity is correspondence with young people of the U. S., England, Cuba, Panama and elsewhere "to enlarge horizons and that we may improve, to the greater glory of God."

TRINITY COLLEGE GETS LARGE GIFT

★ The Old Dominion Foundation, established by Paul Mellon, has given Trinity College $650,000 to preserve the priceless collections of the Watkinson Library, it was announced today by President G. Keith Funston at the formal opening convocation of the 128th year of the college. College trustees will add $400,000 from other gifts to construct a new library to house the combined Trinity and Watkinson collections, President Funston said.

Fabulously rich in book treasures, the Watkinson Library was established in 1857 by David Watkinson who had been one of the founders of Trinity in 1823. The library is now housed in downtown Hartford in quarters which have been closed to the public by fire department orders. In recent years, financial difficulties have prevented it from keeping abreast of modern library practices. Consequently, the condition of its 130,000 books is deteriorating and the information that they contain is largely inaccessible because of the lack of adequate shelving and cataloguing.

Trinity in 1949 offered to restore the books to usefulness if the Watkinson Library would merge with the Trinity Library. The offer was approved by the Watkinson trustees, the Connecticut legislature, and the superior court. In a gift announced a year ago as anonymous Mr. Mellon promised the college $300,000 to make possible the project. A new gift increases the total to $650,000.

DIOCESE OF GEORGIA HAS DISTRICTS

★ Acting upon the recommendation of diocesan convention, the department of missions of Georgia has subdivided the diocese into six districts, and at the fall clergy conference at Christ Church, Dublin, Georgia, Bishop Barnwell appointed the deans.

The clergy discussed titles quite thoroughly, and concluded that districts with deans best describe the purposes. Diocesan Women's Auxiliary, the diocesan laymen's organization, and the young people had agreed in advance to subdivide their diocesan work on the same lines as those determined by the department of missions.

Deans appointed are: the Rev. T. P. Ball, Savannah; the Rev. Charles F. Schilling, Augusta; the Rev. Johnson H. Pace Jr., Dublin; the Rev. Wm. S. Brace, Waycross; the Rev. John L. Jenkins, Moultrie, for the Thomasville District; and the Rev. Wm. C. Baxter, Americus, for the Albany District. Deans are ex officio members of the Department of Missions, of which the Rev. Charles F. Schilling is chairman.

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

The Oxford American Prayer Book Commentary. By Massey Hamilton Shepherd, Jr. Oxford University Press. $10.00.

A generation ago, there was a wonderful little commentary on the Book of Common Prayer, known as Barry's "Teacher's Prayer Book." An edition was published in this country, adapting it to the 1892 B. C. P., and many of us grew up on that book. It combined sound historical information with rich devotional interpretation, especially in the Psalms—though naturally the interpretation of the Psalter was somewhat conservative. One great advantage in it lay in the fact that the whole Prayer Book was printed, from the standard edition, and the Commentary appeared on the facing pages.

One might suppose at first glance that Dr. Shepherd's Commentary is a revision of Barry, but it is not. The work is entirely new, and although it is printed on facing pages opposite a chancel size Prayer Book (minus the Psalter), the book is entirely new and up to date, and contains a vast amount of information which could not possibly have been found in the older work. Liturgical research has made great progress during the past two generations, and no one is better equipped to present this material than Dr. Shepherd. At the same time, he is no hidebound antiquarian—see his many articles on liturgics in The Witness, The Anglican Theological Review, and other journals—see especially his article on Prayer Book Revision in the October 12th issue of this magazine.

Together with the new "Hymnal 1940 Companion," churchmen now have two commentaries on their chief devotional books which we hope will be used everywhere throughout the Episcopal Church. If the rector cannot afford these books, the Vestry should see that copies of this book are in the public or parish library, and accessible to everyone interested in the Prayer Book, or in liturgical worship, or, more generally, in the Episcopal Church. In fact, one could easily draw up a list of 8 or 10 books which every parish should make accessible, either in a parish library or, preferably, in the public library, accessible not only to the members of the parish, but to the people of the town. In such a list of books on the Prayer Book Dr. Shepherd's commentary should be the first—F. C. G.

Enduring Satisfaction. By William P. McEwen. Philosophical Library. $4.75.

Recognizing the current crisis in personal life, the author, who teaches philosophy at Hofstra College, seeks to provide a philosophy of spiritual growth out of the materials of old-fashioned liberalism, of which he claims to be an "unrepentant" representative. Though he states an intention to maintain an objective attitude toward the doctrines of particular religions (including his own), the book is shot through with the presuppositions of a relativistic, man-centered (but religious) orientation. The book would be useful as a representation of this position, were is not so lacking in clarity. Whether or not the title Enduring Satisfaction, is a sound description of the author's philosophy, the book itself requires more endurance than it provides satisfaction.

NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

CHURCH PEACE MISSION LAUNCHES MEETINGS

World peace should be achieved by non-military means was the theme of speakers at a two-day conference, Oct. 24-25, in St. Louis which launched a series of meetings by the Church Peace Mission. Sponsored by 15 religious pacifist groups, the mission is out to persuade people to withhold support from any future war. A. J. Muste of New York said: "If we make peace our future goal and in the meantime continue the modern armament race, we never will reach that goal." He also said that the way to deal with Communism is to be concerned with the conditions that are responsible for it, "economic distress and social disorganization which war creates."

The Rev. Albert Day of Baltimore, chairman of the mission, rejected the argument that "an armament program is a sort of insurance policy" against national disaster. Its defenders, he said, "forget that an insurance policy only pays off after the fire has destroyed one's property. If war comes it will destroy the world and our insurance policy will go up with it. A nation obsessed with security is also a nation obsessed with fear, and fear never leads to peace."

ADVENTISTS PRAY FOR PEACE

Delegates attending the annual fall conference of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church in Grand Rapids set aside business matters on United Nations Day, Oct. 24, for day-long prayers for justice and world peace. Elder Allan Anderson of Washington, speaker at one of the four successive services, said that "real Christianity is a demonstration of life and shows belief in the brotherhood of all mankind."

SHARE-THE-WEALTH DEFENDED BY KAGAWA

Toyohiko Kagawa, Japanese evangelist, defending his share-the-wealth program, told reporters that it was based on New Testament teaching. He had been attacked as a socialist by a pastor in Stillwater, Okla., who distributed leaflets accusing the lecturer of "opposing the American way of life" and of speaking of the capitalistic system as "nothing but a system of exploitation." Kagawa said that wealth is being divided among farmers in his country in a socialistic fashion but added: "Socialism we might call it in Japan. What do you call it here? New Deal, isn't that the word for it?"

OVERSEAS NEWS

GERMAN CHURCHMEN PROTEST REARMAMENT

Widespread repercussions in church and political circles have followed the publication of an open letter to Dr. Konrad Adenauer, chancellor of the Western German Republic, from the Brethren Council of the Confessional Church denouncing alleged remilitarization plans in the western zone. The letter demanded new elections for the Lower House "in which the German people can decide for itself whether or not it wants to be rearmed."

Drafted at a meeting of the Confessional Church in Darmstadt and signed by 37 western German pastors, including Pastor Martin Niemoeller, president of the Evangelical Church in Hessen and Nassau, the letter declared that "according to reliable information, former generals of the German army have already begun to set up a German troop unit, and armament industries have received corresponding orders."

In an accompanying personal letter to Dr. Adenauer, Pastor Niemoeller stated that "the assertion is increasingly being made that there exist agreements between the federal chancellor and John J. McCloy, U. S. high commissioner in Germany, providing for an early reestablishment of quite a number of German divisions as a German contribution for a western European armed force designed to serve 'defense.'"

GERMANS REFUSE TO RING BELLS

Religious leaders in western Germany and West Berlin refused to ring their church bells in connection with the U. S. freedom bell project. The only apparent exception was in the R. C. diocese of Fulda. The leaders declared that church bells are intended for religious occasions and should not be used in connection with "political demonstrations" (see editorial, page eight).

CHINESE CHRISTIANS ISSUE MANIFESTO

Up to October 19, 1527 Chinese Christians from various denominations had signed a manifesto warning against imperialism in Chinese Church life. Among the signers is Dean T. C. Chao of Yenching University, one of the five presidents of the World Council of Churches, and Dr. Francis Wei, Episcopalian, who is president of Central China University. The manifesto is strong in condemning American policy on the Far East, and warns against the Churches being used by the US to carry forward its aims. It calls for wholehearted support of the program of the People's Government.

EDWIN J. ROGERS
Layman of Hartford, Conn.

In these troubled times we are apt to forget that Jesus was the Prince of Peace. To him war would be abhorrent except in self-defense. In World War II we fought a war of self-defense made necessary by the attack at Pearl Harbor. In the present Korean War, which has not been declared by Congress, we seem to have injected ourselves into an internal, civil war with whose causes we are not yet fully acquainted. The recent speech of President Truman indicates that we have embarked upon a long war with the announced purpose of defending capitalism wherever it is threatened by the growth of socialism and communism. This ambitious undertaking will cost us dearly in men and money and may end in atomic destruction. Is it not the duty of the Church today to seek a reconciliation between the capitalistic and the socialistic nations? This would seem to be the only way of averting an atomic holocaust in which all that we hold dear would be destroyed.

HAROLD H. KELLEY
Associate, St. Mark's, Berkeley, Cal.

In the October 12th issue of The Witness, Dr. Grant's excellent review of "Jesus, Son of Man," Duncan, may unwittingly give the impression that foreign periodicals are in themselves illegal in Britain. What he intended, surely, was that restrictions on the export of sterling prevent the sending out of money by British subjects, not only for periodicals but for practically anything else.

Magazines are greatly wanted there, and Witness readers can greatly help their friends abroad, either by gift subscriptions to that or other American periodicals, paid for in this country, or by mailing their magazines regularly after the reading of them is done. Magazines of about the size of The Witness can be wrapped and mailed for about 5c, and heavy magazines for 10c and up.

The whole vexatious problem is that of Britishers having to keep their own money working inside their islands in order to protect its value in our dollars.

LARS R. BACHE-WIIG
Rector, Holy Sacrament, Upper Darby

Thanks to Professor Waggoner for his "very unpleasant reading") (October 19, 1950). I agree with him wholeheartedly. He has clearly set forth the effect of an unwritten policy of long standing with the clergy. That policy goes something like this: "Give them what they want, tell them what they want to hear and turn the other cheek to their childish rebukes. Never say anything about sin in a way that will imply they are guilty so as not to offend. At all cost keep peace in the Church!"

Budgets, confirmation classes and numbers applied to any category of our work are important only after the devil has been exorcised and driven out. This must be done regardless of where he may be found!

It has taken many years to make itself clearly apparent but now we know the truth. The relationship between priest and parishioner has completely broken down except for a tiny remnant. Here is where we need our emphasis because people in any class have become what they have been taught to be—they cannot be anything else!

I am looking forward to next week's "very unpleasant reading."

IMPORTANT CONTRIBUTIONS to Episcopal Church Literature

THE OXFORD AMERICAN PRAYER BOOK COMMENTARY

by the Rev. Massey H. Shepherd, Jr., of Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge.

". . . an historical, liturgical, exegetical and theological commentary, in non-technical language, upon the greatest classic of devotion in the English tongue."

A page-by-page exposition of the Book of Common Prayer, ably presented for the use of ministers, church school teachers and students. The historical origins of all services are traced . . . the sources of formularies identified. Changes from the original 1549 Book are noted, as are the main differences between Books used by the various branches of the Anglican Communion.

This is a book for today and today's needs . . . embracing modern findings and concepts in the light of positive religious values. Every minister, church school teacher, and student needs it. 1100 pages. $10.00.

A PRIMER OF CHRISTIANITY (3 vol. and a supplement)

A long-needed series of books for laymen. A brief, basic, and systematic course on the real essentials of religious knowledge providing the information every Christian should have in order to build a richer life.

Volume 1: The Beginning of the Gospel, by T. W. Manson, D.D., Professor of Biblical Criticism and Exegesis, Univ. of Manchester. 124 pp., $1.50.

Volume 2: The Furtherance of the Gospel, by R. W. Moore, Headmaster of Harrow School. 184 pp., $1.75.

Volume 3: The Truth of the Gospel, by the Rev. George B. Caird, Ph.D., Professor of Old Testament, McGill University. November 2, 182 pp., $1.75.

Supplementary Volume: The Gospel and Modern Thought, by the Rev. Alan Richardson, D.D., Canon of Durham Cathedral. 216 pp., $2.00.

THE HISTORIC FAITH AND A CHANGING WORLD

by the Rev. W. Norman Pittenger, S.T.D. A timely warning against American complacency in Christian assumptions . . . a brave fine stand for God's gospel "straight." Modern religious "thought" is discussed and fitted to modern life. A thoroughly inspiring book by an eminent Christian author. Every layman needs this volume. 196 pp., $2.50.

ENTHUSIASM by the Rt. Rev. Msgr. R. A. Knox, Ph.D., Honorary Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford.

A scholarly and extremely fascinating book on the historical aspects of "enthusiasm." The volume undoubtedly will be considered the greatest of Msgr. Knox's many fine contributions to Christian literature. 656 pp., $6.00.

THE BIBLE FROM WITHIN

by A. G. Hebert, D.D. The real meaning of the Bible, what the Biblical authors were trying to say to the men of their day. A fresh, new approach. 208 pp., $2.25.

ASKING THEM QUESTIONS

Third series. More answers to perplexing modern problems of Christian living, by noted leaders in various fields. Wonderful for young folk . . . written for all. 194 pp., $2.00.

WINNINGTON-INGRAM, by S. C. Carpenter, Dean of Exeter. A keen, sympathetic biography of the late Bishop of London . . . a "most lovable man" whose life was dedicated to the spread of happiness! Delightful reading. 355 pp., $3.50.

Bishop Suffragan of Michigan Advises for Disaster

Tells What May Be Expected in the Event Of Air Raid With Everything Lost

BY RUSSELL S. HUBBARD
The Suffragan Bishop of Michigan

★ The average parish priest will go through a long ministry and never be confronted with disaster affecting many of his flock at once. He becomes accustomed to helping his people in the face of death to find death is a ministering angel of life, in the time of illness to help them to practice recollection and the consecration of pain. Occasionally, a priest is called upon to be a tower of strength in a community where hundreds are afflicted at once.

What is occasional and infrequent in the life of the parish priest may be expected in the event of an air raid. People are killed or seriously hurt by hundreds. Bombs, conflagration or flood hit and wipe out the homes and property of half the parish —all in a moment. The parish church is gone; perhaps it has been reconditioned by the savings of the people, or there is a mortgage upon the new building; now it is gone, and there remains only the debt to pay.

In such situations the parish priest stands there numb, afflicted in the suffering of his people, if not in his own family. In the face of such situations the numbness that settles on a man is like a dark cloud through which he would fain see the light. And the light does not shine—until the Red Cross steps in to help the people rebuild their homes. Many a community has learned to be grateful for the disaster assistance that the Red Cross provides. But the aid given by the Red Cross, magnificent as it is, is deficient in two respects, from the point of view of the priest; it does not rebuild community buildings, nor give any aid thereto; it has nothing to do with the souls of the people. It does give hope of securing physical shelter, medical aid and food. The numbness of the soul is still there. The sudden poverty and uncertainty about the future that seemed so secure oppresses the soul.

What can the priest do?

First and immediately, he must be physically on the spot. This means, if married, he should have made some arrangement, previous to the disaster, for the care of his own family. His job is with his people. If the children are to be evacuated, one of the parishioners, not he, must do it, and the family must understand the reason why. This all takes preparations.

At the time that the disaster hits, the first act of the priest must be in terms of recollection. It is a temptation to help his people physically dig-out, or to work with the medical forces of the city to care for the immediate medical needs of the people. The priest stands with an unique function to perform. This function is desperately needed in time of disaster: to bring to those who suffer, mentally, if not physically, the realization that God is; that God cares, that after the Cross there is the Resurrection; that the faithful have hope in Christ of eternal life.

Sacramentally, this needs to be implemented. This may mean that arrangements must be made in a field, or in some building still standing for a celebration of the Holy Communion.

It will mean going among the sick and the dying, making the sign of the Cross on the forehead, and saying the prayers. There will almost certainly be some people who in emergency want to be baptized.

If the people have lost Bibles and Prayer Books, these should be given to them immediately. The American Bible Society has proved its willingness to help in such situations. They have a large stock on hand in many branch depositories, which they will sell at wholesale prices, or give if necessary.

Prayer Books in any quantity can be a problem, for depositories of such are not accessible in most dioceses. Publishers will cooperate if the situation is made clear—which may take some effort. For this reason, a long distance call to one of the house officers is usually the best way to secure service. It may be necessary to take Prayer Books from the pews of the church; for the book in the hands of the people who want to use it is more valuable than resting idly in the pew of the church. In this case, it may be advisable to caution them to bring the Prayer Book to the church when they come on Sunday.

And the binding is important

PAULL SARGENT RETIRES AS RECTOR

★ St. Bartholomew's, New York, was packed to overflowing on October 29th when the Rev. G. Paull T. Sargent preached his last sermon there as rector. "To the many friends and members of St. Bartholomew's parish," he declared, "I shall ever be grateful for all they have meant to me during the past years. In the days ahead I shall hold them continually in my heart and prayers."

G. PAULL SARGENT

He served the parish as rector for seventeen years, coming from the cathedral at Garden City, L. I. Previously he had been rector of Grace Church, Grand Rapids, Michigan.

ANGLICAN CONGRESS IN MINNEAPOLIS

★ Minneapolis has been named as the site of a world-wide congress of the Anglican communion to be held in August, 1953. The announcement was made jointly by the Presiding Bishop and Bishop Walter Gray of Connecticut, chairman of the committee of General Convention on arrangements for the congress. About 1,000 bishops, clergy and laity from 325 dioceses throughout the world are expected to attend.

The announced purpose of the congress is "to witness to our common faith and to confer on matters of common interest." It will differ from the Lambeth conference in that clergy and laity, as well as bishops, will attend.

The fact that the World Council of Churches will hold its second assembly in Evanston, Ill., at the same time will make it possible for many delegates to attend both.

PREACHING MISSION IN WASHINGTON

★ Bishop Angus Dun of Washington and Ambassador Norman J. O. Makin of Australia shared the program with the Rev. Robert J. McCracken of New York at an inter-denominational preaching mission that opened in Washington October 29th. There were more than 10,000 people jammed into the city's largest auditorium, with about 3,000 turned away. The New York preacher declared that "there is an appalling ignorance among us as to our elementary doctrines. We shall have to cease flitting from text to text in the Bible, according to casual interest or idle fancy. We shall have to preach constantly on central themes.'"

He also called for Protestant unity, saying "some way must be found to unify our shattered forces. By comparison to the major interests at stake—the Christian interpretation of life against a mechanistic interpretation, against an ideology as atheistic and materialistic as Communism—our denominational differences are insignificant."

As part of the preaching mission program, evening services are being held in nineteen churches in the Washington area, with churches of each neighborhood joining. In addition eleven Bible lectures are being delivered, together with noonday services in downtown churches.

PROVINCE OF SEWANEE HAS SYNOD

★ St. Andrew's, Tampa, Fla., was host to the twenty-third synod of the fourth province, meeting in October. The provincial Auxiliary met concurrently. Financial support for the Episcopal Hour, a south-wide radio program, was voted for the next two years. Synod resolved to stress the campaign for funds for the University of the South, especially the School of Theology.

The Rev. T. O. Wedel, warden of the College of Preachers, Washington, was preacher at the synod service. His subject was Christian Education. The next day the Rev. J. W. Kennedy spoke to synod on ecumenical relations. A motion to ask the House of Bishops to appoint a Suffragan Bishop for the armed forces was tabled.

Part of the meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was devoted to group discussion. Considerable attention was given to reports of missionary work in the South and overseas.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES

★ St. Luke's Hospital, New York, is to construct a new $3,000,000 building. The basement will be hewn from bedrock to provide a "safe" shelter for the staff and facilities for emergency casualties in the event of aerial attack.

Word is also received from one of the largest New York banks that "we are duplicating all our important records on microfilm and are storing these records away from the New York area. We have been informed by experts that our vaults will resist almost any conceivable bomb damage. But etc., etc., etc."

JOHN FOSTER DULLES IS OPTIMISTIC

★ John Foster Dulles, U. S. delegate to the UN, was the headliner at the meeting of the Federal Council's department of international justice and good will, presided over by Bishop Scarlett of Missouri, and attended by about 300 of the Protestant and Eastern Orthodox Churches. He stated that the UN resolution calling for united action for peace "reflects the thinking of our Christian people" and marks "a great moral advance."

"For the first time," he said, "there is a decision to subject force to law as represented by the judgment of the world community as to what is right. This is historic. It is made possible by the fact that there exists a world-wide judgment of what is right and wrong.

BISHOP SCARLETT

"That judgment," he added, "is primarily a reflection of religious beliefs. Were it not for that foundation, provided by the great religions, it would be impossible to build a structure of world order such as the United Nations is attempting to create."

He prefaced his address by saying that he now had a "more optimistic view than six months ago that peace is much more secure now than it was then." There is "less likelihood of war now," he said, due to the victory of UN forces in Korea.

Dulles said that many church people fail to appreciate the nature of the differences that divide the great powers, and the difficulty of making concessions that would resolve these differences. He pointed out that American efforts for peace are based on the conception of "a durable and acceptable world order that is tolerable of differences," while the Soviet Union is striving for a world order based on conformity to the Communist pattern. The tension existing in the world today, he added, is due to these two basic philosophies of world order. He said they cannot be resolved by talks between nations.

"I'm afraid that the tensions will exist for some time," he said, "until the Soviet Union learns that a policy of violence and coercion does not pay." The results of the conflict in Korea, he said, "may be the beginning of wisdom for them."

ST. TIMOTHY'S HAS NEW CHURCH

★ A congregation which overflowed the new building witnessed the dedication of St. Timothy's, Detroit, on October 25. Bishop Emrich officiated and preached the sermon, in which he spoke of the meaning of existence, and illustrated by means of the symbolism of the Church. The Bishop was assisted in the service by the Rev. John A. Scantlebury, rector of the parish; the Rev. Canon Gordon Matthews, executive secretary of the diocese; the Rev. Charles W. May, missionary-in-charge of St. Augustine's Church, Detroit; and the Rev. J. Clemens Kolb, rector of Christ Church, Grosse Pointe.

The architecture of St. Timothy's has attracted wide interest locally. Designed by Earl Confer, the building blends the contemporary with the traditional. Points of special interest in the exterior construction are the stained glass rose window over the altar, the fleche at the intersection of the nave and transepts, the prominent tower with its cross, and the portico extending from the vestibule to the street.

The interior is colorfully decorated and has open timbered trusses with acoustically plastered panels between the timbers. The trim woodwork and church furnishings are grayed blond oak and the windows are of leaded cathedral glass. The basement contains a well-equipped kitchen, nursery and kindergarten rooms, a choir room, a large fellowship room and the forced warm-air furnace heating plant.

St. Timothy's had its beginning as a small mission in 1928. By constant growth it outgrew its church facilities. The present new building will enable the parish to meet the constantly growing opportunities for service in its community.

JOHN HEUSS VISITS HONOLULU

★ Director John Heuss of the department of education of the National Council arrived in Honolulu on November 4 and will remain there until the 18th, explaining the basic elements of the new program and the new curriculum. He will lead a three-day conference for the clergy; will address the boys and teachers of Iolani School; and will address school superintendents on Oahu, Maui, Hawaii and Kauai.

CLERGY CONFERENCE IN EAST CAROLINA

★ A most helpful clergy conference was conducted in the diocese of East Carolina in October by the Bishop Block of California, the Rev. Moultrie Guerry, the rector of St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, and Bishop Wright of East Carolina. The conference and retreat was held in St. James Church, Wilmington, N. C., and was pronounced by all who attended as the finest clergy conference they had ever witnessed.

NEW ENGLAND HOLDS SYNOD

★ Bishop Appleton Lawrence of Western Massachusetts was elected president of the first Province at the meeting of Synod held at the Cathedral of St. John in Providence, Rhode Island, October 24th and 25th. He succeeds Bishop Frederick G. Budlong, who will retire as Bishop of Connecticut on January 15, 1951.

The synod operated by committees to review the operation of the eight fields of provincial activity and brought in specific recommendations for the future of the work which led to the adoption of a budget for 1951 of $16,336. Significant increases included in this budget are to enable increased activity in the field of rural work, with the aid of the Rev. Roger Barney of Concord, N. H. as field secretary, and for the support of Concord Conference. Special recommendations were made to the various commissions. The college work commission was pointed toward the problems of state teachers colleges, graduate and nursing schools, faculty, and the growing program of home parish responsibility by the Woman's Auxiliary. Various organizations of the synod were directed toward the need for increased interest in support of Lenox School. Recommendations were sent to the National Council through Bishop Nash, provincial Representative, conveying local reaction to National Council activity.

Mr. Tracy B. Lord of Bridgeport, Conn., was named chairman of a committee to study the report of the committee on structure of the General Convention and to report to the 1951 synod.

BISHOP BLAIR ROBERTS AT ST. JAMES

★ Bishop Blair Roberts of South Dakota has been preaching and speaking throughout the east on the national program of the Church. On October 29th he was at St. James', New York.

SEMINARY SUNDAY JANUARY 28

★ The Presiding Bishop has designated January 28 as theological education Sunday, asking that there be "addresses in every church upon the importance of the work of our theological seminaries, and furthermore, that in every parish there will be an opportunity for the people of the Church to give financial support to the seminaries."

HENRY HUNTER has been senior warden of St. John's, Wayne, Michigan, since its founding. He recently resigned after thirty years of service

CHURCH UNION PLAN PROPOSED

★ A conference on Church unity was created at a meeting at Seabury House, Greenwich, Conn., about a year ago, with official delegates present from the Methodist, Disciples, Evangelical and Reformed, African M. E. Zion, Colored Methodist, Presbyterian (north), Presbyterian (south), Community and United Churches. The Episcopal Church was represented by observers.

The body released a plan for unity on October 30th, calling for reconciliation of the congregational, episcopal and presbyterian forms of Church government within a single Protestant Church.

Methodist Bishop Ivan Lee Holt of St. Louis, Mo., chairman of the conference, said the plan envisages a United Church of Christ in which bishops will have a place and presbyteries will have constitutional responsibilities, but without denying self-government to local congregations.

The tentative plan calls for the grouping of congregations into presbyteries, and of presbyteries into conferences headed by elective bishops. A national general council would take over the functions of the general convention, assembly, synod, conference or council of the uniting denominations.

Local churches, however, would probably retain a large degree of autonomy in most matters.

"Today," Bishop Holt said, "Christians confront a world situation which demands that the Churches shall make common sense. In our own and many other sections of the world, secularism, atheism, and religious indifferentism are strongly entrenched and militant.

"These evil forces," he continued, "stand sharply over against the Christian Church with its eternal gospel of redemption. They cannot be effectively resisted and overcome by separate Churches, but only by the personal and corporate witness and the concerted action of Christians united."

Bishop Holt stressed that the Conference's objective is organic union and not the cooperative movement which finds expression in the National Council of Churches to be constituted in Cleveland, Nov. 28-Dec. 1.

ACADEMIC FREEDOM STATEMENT

★ Professors at the Church Divinity School of the Pacific joined with other theologians of the major seminaries in California in issuing a statement relating to the loyalty oath imposed by the regents upon faculty members of the University of California. The statement, signed by twenty-four, including Professors Randolph C. Miller, Russell B. Staines and Charles F. Winston of C.D.S.P., is as follows: "Being mindful of the tradition of our Church in defense of the liberties of the human mind and spirit, and counting it a shame to stand by in silence while a great university, which is neighbor to us, is stripped of its liberties, we, the undersigned, professors at the several Protestant theological seminaries in the State of California, do hereby affirm our sympathy with the members of the faculty of the University of California who have been unjustly expelled for failure to sign the loyalty oath, and do repudiate the action of the regents in so expelling them.

"We can understand a desire to exclude from the faculty any person who is hostile to the academic ideals of a democracy. But we cannot understand the expulsion, in the name of patriotism, of faculty members who are officially cleared of subversive intent, and whose record as loyal Americans is beyond reproach.

"We appreciate the desire of the regents to devise a mechanism which shall keep off the faculty all persons who are traitors to the ideals of liberty and of truth which are essential to the academic profession in any free land. But we regard as contradictory, ridiculous, and intolerable the punishment for recalcitrance of faculty members who refuse to comply with a device which does not clearly exclude traitors, but which does obviously exclude many loyal persons.

"Therefore, we commend Governor Warren and President Sproul for their courageous stand on this issue, and we commend all those regents who stood with them; and we invite the regents of the University of California to correct immediately a grave injustice against loyal citizens on the faculty, against the university itself, and against freedom and democracy everywhere."

BOYNTON ELECTION CONFIRMED

★ The election of Bishop Boynton of Puerto Rico as suffragan bishop of New York has been confirmed, so that his status has now been changed in the House of Bishops. The Presiding Bishop has asked him to serve as bishop-in-charge of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, under the jurisdiction of the Presiding Bishop, until a successor has been elected and consecrated.

SAN ANTONIO COUNCIL HAS DINNER

★ Bishop Hunter of Wyoming was presented with a certificate as a past president of the San Antonio council of churches at a dinner held October 23. The council now comprises 80 member churches representing 22 denominations. There were 13 received into the fellowship at the dinner, including eight churches that serve the Negro community.

Some of the highlights of the year's work included a radio ministry of 687 radio and 82 television programs; a full time chaplain for a veterans' housing project; part time prison chaplaincy; work in four other institutions. Voters guides were issued; a teaching mission was sponsored; films and other audio-visual aids were loaned.

The council is now exploring the possibility of a fulltime department of social welfare.

SEVENTH PROVINCE PLANS RALLY

★ Youth of the province of the Southwest are having a rally over the Thanksgiving weekend, with Bishop Salinas of Mexico as the headliner. Other speakers will be Lindley Hartwell, chairman of the youth commission of the church; Marie-Jeanne deHaller, assistant secretary of the World Student Christian Federation; Rex Pennington, born in South Africa and now teaching in Oklahoma City; Raymond Carne, movie actor, who has tentatively accepted to attend the banquet and dance. The conference will be held at the Redeemer, Okmulgee, Okla., whose rector, the Rev. G. C. Stutzer, is chairman of the youth department.

BISHOP GILBERT BIDS FAREWELL

★ Bishop Gilbert bid farewell to the diocese of New York with his sermon at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on October 28th, heard by a congregation of about 2,000, including 200 clergymen. His retirement came twenty years after his consecration as suffragan bishop and brought to an end forty-five years of active service in the ministry, all of which was in the diocese of New York.

He offered his "heartfelt gratitude for all the kindness and good will, the generous cooperation and support that I have received during these twenty years as I have tried to discharge the duties of the office that was committed to me. My task has not been easy. People are not always aware of the many anxious burdens the bishop of this diocese must carry. But there are compensations. To be permitted to serve the people as a father in God, to be a friend and pastor of the clergy and try to uphold them in their work and help them with their problems, to encourage worthy young men to enter the ministry of the Church—these are but some of the often unrecognized functions of a bishop which carry their own reward."

He asked that "whole-hearted support and confidence" be given his successor, Bishop Horace W. B. Donegan, who is now the diocesan and who will be formally installed as such at a service at the Cathedral on November 18.

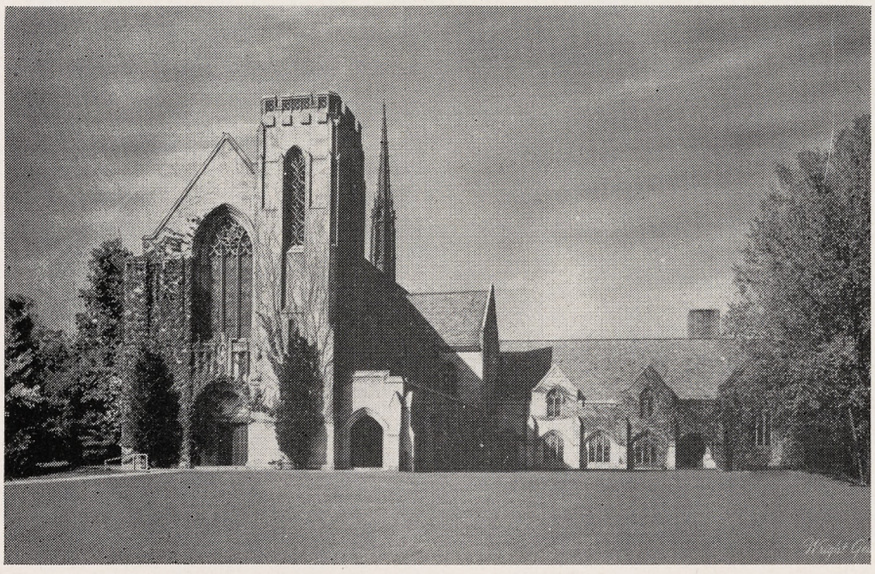
A considerable number of bishops from other dioceses attended the service: Bishops Washburn and Ludlow of Newark; Bishop Higley of Central New York; Bishop Littell, retired of Honolulu; Bishop Bentley, vice-president of the National Council.

The dinner in honor of Bishop Gilbert was held at the Commodore, October 30, with approximately 1,000 persons attending. Bishop Donegan presided and the speakers were the Rev. Theodore F. Savage of the Protestant Council, of which Bishop Gilbert is president; the Rev. Louis W. Pitt, rector of Grace Church and dean of the Manhattan convocation, and G. Forrest Butterworth, chancellor of the diocese.

COMMISSION STUDIES CLERGY SALARIES

★ The General Convention joint commission to study clergy pensions held its first meeting in Chicago in October. This group was also instructed by the Convention "to study the question of clerical salaries, including the advisability of recommending the establishment by canon of the principle of a minimum salary for the clergy of the Church."

Bishop Goodwin of Virginia was elected chairman, Clifford C. Cowin of Ohio, vice-chairman, and Ernest W. Greene of Washington, secretary.



A great deal of material pertinent to the matters referred to the commission had been made available to the members in advance of the meeting, and it was, therefore, possible to cover a great deal of ground in the sessions.

Robert Worthington, executive vice-president of the Church Pension Fund, was present at the meeting at the request of the members of the commission, and was most helpful in the discussions of pensions and related matters.

A subcommittee, consisting of Bishop Goodwin, Bishop Hunter of Wyoming, and Bishop Mallett of Northern Indiana, was appointed to study the question of the possibility of establishing the principle of a minimum salary for the clergy.

A subcommittee, consisting of William H. Damour of Quincy, chairman, Frank E. Punderson of Western Massachusetts, and Messrs. Cowin and Greene, was appointed to study questions related to pensions and possible means of group action looking toward opportunities for clergymen to provide supplemental financial security upon a voluntary basis.

The next meeting of the Commission will be held in El Paso, Texas, just ahead of the meeting of the House of Bishops. It will begin on the afternoon of January 7, 1951, at which time it is expected that the subcommittees will be able to make progress reports and certain other information requested by the commission will be available for study.

Priests and Prophets

THESE are difficult, perplexing and challenging times for all thinking people, be they Christian, Jewish or agnostic. But it is, we may fairly assume, peculiarly difficult for Christians because they are committed to the task of obeying and following in the steps of their Master who is rightly described as the Prince of Peace. For the whole concept of peace is today discounted, ignored or suspect in the popular thinking of every country in the world. In America it is even considered "subversive" by the makers of government policy.

For the priests of the Christian Church the dilemma of today is especially hard. They have, every one of them, a two-fold mission—the priestly and the prophetic. By the very terms of their ordination they cannot escape the obligation of prosecuting both these missions continuously. They must minister the sacraments of the Christian fellowship to individuals, give devoted pastoral care to every soul committed to their charge and they must, at the same time, be faithful to declare the revealed will of God as it applies to all the affairs and problems of the world in which we live. None of the clergy are measuring up to this tremendous and pressing responsibility. The very best of us have the feeling that we are especially called either to the priestly mission or to the prophetic function and as a consequence we neglect the thinking and the actions that are hardest for us to manage.

We venture to guess that the clergy whose natural instinct is for the priestly missions are today in the toughest spot. They know that it is their duty to bear witness to the will of God for the world at a time when such testimony is everywhere unpopular and suspect. If they bring themselves, in spite of fears which may beset them, to give such testimony, they will be looked upon with suspicion by the eminent and influential of their community and, in all probability, lose a large proportion of their congregation. They will, in short, lose, as priests, access to the very souls who most need their priestly ministry. It's a very real and an extremely painful, soul-searching dilemma. Some will try to solve it by speaking out frankly, constantly and explicitly about un-Christian policies and actions of government, industry, science or politics, at the same time, try to get it across to their people how very really they love them as fellow-sinners and would-be Christians. Others will state their personal position in these weighty matters frankly once for all and then keep silence on such subjects and devote themselves intensively to carrying on their pastoral and priestly work. These brethren of ours need our constant intercessions that God the Holy Spirit will guide them to brave and wise decisions.

But the prophets among our clergy—those men whose temperament, knowledge and experience have made them feel that the prophetic office is their chief vocation—are facing most insidious temptations to forget the reality of their priesthood and its obligations laid upon them in ordination. They are terribly concerned that the leaders of men and nations have turned their backs upon the Prince of Peace and are putting their trust in armed might and the power of hatred to force the peoples of the world to behave themselves. They see themselves, these militant, prophetic clergy, as Jeremiahs and John Baptists and look, some of them, to the political and economic arena to do their most effective fighting for righteousness. It is becoming dangerously easy for them to turn their backs upon their altars and all the altar stands for and even to use their pulpits as rostrums for the analysis of economic and political ideas which, once adopted and put to work, might save this miserable and naughty world. To these our brethren we would say, Go into politics, by all means, if you feel that there you can preach the will of God for his world most effectively, but go as Jeremiah went,

"QUOTES"

WHAT is meanness? It would seem to have been derived etymologically from the word "me," and to describe the spiritual conviction of those who gave a selfish interpretation to the first commandment which might be paraphrased to read: "I will not have any other God but me," and in this sense they worship the Lord their God with all their heart and soul and mind, and because their God is a very little God, they come out of the game of life with a very little heart and a very little mind and a very little soul. For no man who worships himself can ever grow to be any bigger than himself. Now many a man who thinks he is a Christian is really ignoring Christ in this world with a vague sort of hope that Christ will reward him in the next. I am sure that Christ will reward him just as he deserves.

as John Baptist went, as Chrysostom and Francis went, as ambassadors of God in Christ to a confused and fearful world, deluded by the accomplishments of science and the productive marvels of industry, so that the truth that God has declared his will for the world of men and that his Holy Spirit is present here and now to enforce that will is ignored and even scoffed at. In the chancellories of nations, as in the ancient city of Ephesus, they "have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." Our politically-minded clergy, whom we need greatly in these days of fear and confusion, will do well to keep constantly in their hearts the formula of the great Hebrew prophets: "Thus saith the Lord," when they are tempted to think and say "Thus saith Karl Marx" or "thus saith Franklin Roosevelt" or "thus saith Premier Nehru" or "thus saith Herbert Hoover" when they properly excoriate the policies of war breeding politicians and try to point the way to a righteous peace or to economic security or to democratic freedoms.

Few of our clergy, as such, are economists or industrialists or statesmen. They are Christian priests who—only at their soul's peril can forget or minimize—the basic Christian truth that God is in his world, not in one, but in varied real and effective modes, moral, spiritual, sacramental. The supreme truth of the "Real Presence" is realized first at the altar, but equally must it be claimed and proved (as Studdert-Kennedy long ago so eloquently pointed out) in today's feverish battles of Armageddon. We suggest then, in all humility and with "mea culpa" on our lips, that our prophetic clergy try to put first things first and seek their so-needed strength and light in continual fervent prayer and in living simply and trustfully the sacramental life as God has ordained for them and "as this Church hath received the same."

The Crisis of Faith

BY CHARLES MALIK

"WHEN the Son of man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?"

This tremendous questioning of Jesus Christ points to the ultimate crisis of faith. For if at the end of the world, when history will have consummated itself, when man will have exhausted his possibilities, when culture and civilization will have yielded all their secrets and borne all their fruits if then at the end of time, when one may at least hope that man will have learned something, it is still questionable whether there will be faith on earth, how hopeless the situation must be "between the times" when history still has something to say!

This then is our natural lot: to be faithless. No matter how faithful we might be, we can only —like the man of old—cry out with tears, "Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief." And frankly, unless he himself came to our help from outside, we should soon lapse back into utter faithlessness.

It is not my intention to discuss this racial faithlessness of ours, although every other form of unbelief is ultimately grounded in it. I have deemed it necessary, however, to call attention to this human condition so as to be able from the outset to place in its right perspective the great crisis of faith through which we are passing today.

THE present phenomena of lack of faith are legion. People are nauseatingly superficial: there is no depth in them. It is inconceivable that the stout men of faith of the past, meeting the typical modern man, with all his cleverness and chatter, will not turn away their face in disgust.

Even the best thinkers cut a sorry figure. They are not lonely enough, they do not walk on those high, cold, icy precipices of which Nietzsche spoke. They are so superficial, so confused, so unconvincing, so unconvinced themselves, so comfortable and happy. The hand of the Lord is not on them.

But for the grace of God flowing through the Church and but for certain glimpses of light reflected by the universities, the humble folk are without authentic guidance. But it is of such humble folk that the kingdom of heaven is composed.

People trust machines and external things: they do not trust ideas. They seek action and results: they do not seek a state of mind. They are impatient with reasoned convictions. In place of the spirit of truth, a spirit at harmony with itself because it rests on ideas and principles, they seek sensation and excitement. They hug material things. They hug them as ends in themselves. They have faith in them. That material things are symbols of something higher, that they are sacraments of the world of the spirit, all this is strange to our modern world.

The present world does not point beyond itself. Its mind is not elsewhere. Its mind is on itself.

There is nothing above, nothing beyond, nothing in whose secret presence we are judged. Whatever you can do and get away with it, go ahead and do it. If you are unseen, you are simply unseen. And there is no invisible law, no unseen judge who will surely reward or punish you in secret, whether or not you are seen of the eyes of men.

The whole dimension of the invisible, the transcendent, the awesome, the behind and the beyond and the above, the ground and the condition, the original and the remote, the presence, this whole dimension is practically lost. We seem to live in a flat world of our immediate senses and our pathetic fears. And joy is gone, the wonderful joy of fearing only God and putting the world where it belongs.

We cannot then say that ours is an age of faith. On the contrary, we must affirm that there is a terrible crisis of faith in the world today. I believe the deepest view of our present tribulation is to say that faith, real creative faith, "The substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen," has to an alarming extent departed from the earth.

And yet it is my belief that man cannot live without faith. If you give him the whole world but deny him access by faith to the unseen, to the hoped-for, he will become profoundly unhappy. Of all the tasks facing western civilization today, the greatest, the most important is how to bring faith back to the hearts of men.

Three mighty tasks challenge the western world today.

The first is the task of building up an adequate defense for the free world. The non-Communist world will be without excuse whatsoever if it does not act on the certainty that where Communism could strike and could get away with it, it would strike. Either the west is aware of its mortal danger and is prepared to take adequate measures to meet it, or it slumbers, in which case it is already overcome.

The formation of the North Atlantic community is a tremendous event. If the western European and north American nations are given the time to integrate themselves into a closely-knit military, political, economic, and cultural community they will constitute, by reason of the enormous spiritual and material resources at their command, a core of strength and health wholly impregnable to Communist assault.

No matter how much certain sections of the west have suffered, I think it is fair to say that the west as a whole has been living in a fool's paradise. Its estimate of the nature and magnitude of the peril and of the exertions it must take to meet it has been almost childishly inadequate. It seems therefore that any concentration on building up the military defense these days is justifiable.

Why Communism Spreads

THE second major challenge of the awakened west is to stand, energetically and consistently, for those economic and political conditions whose absence has been precisely the cause of the spread of Communism and of the other corrosives of western civilization.

This means promoting real democracy, at home and abroad, where the people can freely and actively determine their own government. A situation in which the west preaches and practices democracy at home, while at the same time allying itself with autocratic reactionary regimes abroad, where there is no freedom or participation of the people in their own government, is at once unhappy and unstable.

It means further that the west must share the material goods of the earth with the rest of the world in greater liberality. It is impossible for western civilization to defend itself against Communism so long as between Moscow and Washington there are teeming billions of human beings who have never known anything except poverty, privation and the ever-present menace of starvation, and to whom Moscow means, truly or falsely, that an end will be put to their eternal misery. It is impossible for western civilization to defend itself against the onslaught of Communism so long as the standard of living in the United States is ten to a hundred times higher than what it is throughout Asia, and so long as the United States and the rest of the west do nothing effective about it. In my opinion, the present financial implications of Point Four must be multiplied literally a hundred times before anywhere near the preliminary conditions for counteracting the Communist challenge on the material plane can be fulfilled. This is no sentimental act of philanthropy; this is a genuine feeling of human solidarity in a magically contracted world. Also from the point of view of security and prosperity, it will pay in the long run abundant dividends. There is no getting away from the fundamental spiritual maxim: to retain the enjoyment of your liberties and goods, you must liberally share them with others. In that way alone can you penetrate and overcome that penumbra of neutrality which seems to be encasing the Soviet world.

Ultimate Values

UNLESS a civilization is sure of its ultimate values, its military, economic and political defenses will sooner or later be weighed and found utterly wanting. Civilizations have perished not so much because they have been materially weak, as because they lost their soul and ceased to have a fighting faith in themselves as bearers of light and being to the entire world. In fact they crumbled materially and politically only because they had initially weakened spiritually. And conversely, a handful of helpless people gathering together at first as the scum of the earth, wearing a perfectly ridiculous aspect, but having been granted a vision of the truth, no matter how imperfect, and rising to the simplicity of faith, faith in the truth as they saw it and in themselves as bearers of the truth, have again and again conquered empires and transformed the face of the earth.

The absolute necessity for military, political and economic preparedness at the present time cannot be overemphasized. But precisely because the needs in these fields are so incontestably overpowering, there is a grave danger that the great requirements of the spirit will be unduly lost sight of.

The greatest task of the western world at the present moment is, concurrently with its military, economic and political preparedness, to articulate adequately what it ultimately stands for. The basic values of western civilization must be brought out and proclaimed in all clarity, conviction, and boldness.

It is not true that men fight best in self-preservation. This may be true of animals, but certainly it is not true of men. Men are primarily moved by ideas. Grant them a certain vision of the truth, and they will rise to pinnacles of heroism utterly unattainable by those who live and die only to preserve themselves. Men live by faith. Grant them a fighting faith whereby they are sure that the values they believe in are supreme, and they will move mountains.

Communism provides a fighting faith, namely impersonal, dialectical materialism. But the western world has a fighting faith that is infinitely deeper and truer than this primitive faith of Communism. Only this western faith must be rediscovered, reactivated and reaffirmed. The greatest service that can be done to western society today is to reawaken it to the positive faith of its fathers.

The west, with the Atlantic community as the central core, is the integral heir of the Graeco-Roman - Hebrew - Christian - Mediterranean-European humane tradition. For four thousand years profound and sustained interaction between diverse peoples and cultures resulted in this wonderful synthesis. There is no similar cumulative richness of spirit, no comparable internal conscious reflection, anywhere else in the world. Communism has cut itself away from, and rebelled against this tradition and all in the name of "material progress"; and it is this act of self-separation and rebellion that is going to mean its undoing in the end. Once this residue of faith is reactivated and proclaimed, once the deposit of the ages is known and loved and believed in, then western man will realize what is at stake in the great spiritual contest of the moment, and there will be no limit to the level of joyful sacrifice and quiet self-confidence to which he will rise.

The Western Faith

I SHALL, therefore, suggest in barest outline what I believe to be the elements of the western faith, the basic findings of the last four thousand years, findings which mankind can overlook or rebel against only at its supreme peril: (1) There is an objective truth to be sought and found, a truth about nature, man, society, history and the final things. (2) There is thus a natural law and order to which we must submit if we are to be happy. (3) There is an hierarchy of being, an order of values, a higher and a lower in the scale of things. Good consists in rejoicing in and obeyiny this order; evil, in trying to subvert it. (4) Human reason, thoroughly disciplined in the cumulative positive tradition, is perfectly adequate, by free and critical inquiry, to discover this truth, this law and this hierarchy. (5) Man is free to be or not to be in the truth. He is free to rebel against nature. But as surely as the night follows the day, if he rebels, he will have to pay a heavy price by way of suffering and death, even unto the third and fourth generations. (6) Our freedom of thought, conscience and decision is something absolutely sacred. It is by this freedom that we share in the perpetual act of creation. Take this freedom away from man, and he is immediately dehumanized. (7) The other person is never a means only, but always also an end. Therefore his humanity must be respected. (8) The human person does not exist for the sake of society and the state: on the contrary, society and the state exist for the sake of the human person. (9) History is not all in vain; we do not start all over again. There is a real, positive heritage accumulating itself for thousands of years. This heritage of truth and being is the most precious thing in the world. (10) There is a God. He is a living person. He created heaven and earth and has authentically revealed himself in history. His essence is love, and therefore he both suffers and has suffered for our sins, and always forgives. (11) The intellectual and spiritual principles in man are supreme over any other principle. Thus our primary duty is to seek the kingdom of God and his righteousness. The material is derivative from the spiritual. (12) Man—you and I in the first person—is destined to eternal life. Our present life is a mockery and a hopeless unintelligibility without reference to the next.

Soul of the West

THIS body of doctrine is the soul of the west. It is what has made the west to be itself. It is a permanent acquisition of the human spirit. I believe heaven and earth will perish, but this deposit of truth and certainty will never pass away. This is the fighting faith of the west, this is the standard under which alone the west can be true to itself. And if a life-or-death struggle is forced upon western civilization, this is the ensign of truth in whose name alone it can fight and conquer.

People must realize the ultimate things that are in the balance. For what is ultimately in the balance is not this or that government, not this or that economic system, not this or that person who happens to be in power today, not the home and the hearth and the children, but the dearest persuasions and certainties of the last four thousand years. What is under ruthless attack is nothing short of reason, order, nature, truth, freedom, human dignity, history, God, love, and the higher things. It is these matters, without which there would never be light and culture in Europe and America today, that are systematically undermined, ridiculed, denied, conspired against. There is a determined attempt to see that they are eradicated from the surface of the earth. When people take in the concrete significance of their beleaguered heritage, it is impossible for them to remain any more in doubt; they will rise to the highest pitch of certainty and resolve.

The tragedy of the present moment is that many people have lost faith in one or another article of this priceless intellectual and spiritual heritage of the west. They worship alien gods. The present crisis is fundamentally one of faith, faith in the abiding values which have been culled from the sweat and tears of the ages. And therefore the battle is as much against this widespread loss of faith within the western world itself, as against the foreign enemies. In fact there would be today no foreign enemies at all if faith in the spirit and the mind had not weakened. The fundamental battle is against cynicism, uprootedness, self-estrangement and despair.

The question is not merely to defend your values. You can never defend what you do not initially believe in. And if you truly apprehend what these things that I have set forth above concretely meant and continue to mean in your civilization, you will never be satisfied merely with "defending" them. You will want then to share them with others. Whatever may be true or not true in military matters, in things spiritual, it is certain that offense is the best and in fact, the only defense. For mere defense is in reality halfheartedness and unbelief. Just as the Communists believe that they are not secure until the world is made safe for Communism, so the free world must believe that it is not secure until the whole world is made safe for reason, truth, human dignity and freedom.

The reaffirmation of the soul of western civilization cannot be only something intellectual. It is true the mind must first see these things very clearly and become completely convinced of them. The intellectual articulation of the supreme values at stake today—an articulation at once lucid, responsible, grounded, authentic, convinced and therefore convincing — is one of the primary necessities of the world situation. Western thinkers, poets and saints can do no greater service to themselves and to their own civilization than to combine in a mighty endeavor to elucidate and articulate the core of truth in their common heritage.

But we cannot stop there. The crying need for us temporal creatures is for objectification. A union between men of thought and prayer, and men of action, must therefore be consummated, to the end that the integral truth of the west be made a living reality. There is no institution that does not stand in need of reconsideration and rejuvenation once the vision of the truth dawns upon the minds of men.

Stupendous Task

THE task is not easy. Never has a generation faced a more stupendous one. I assure you it is useless for us to try to do it in our own power. It cannot be done. The Lord must oversee and inspire. For this is his world "and without him was not anything made that was made."

Consequently, if we love him above everything we know or desire; if our sins, which are many and which will continue to be many, are not permitted to interfere in this love; if at the feet of his cross we are able to shed tears of joy; if the cross which he graciously assigns to us is borne with gladness; if when we are on the brink we call on him and he surely comes to our aid despite our sin; if we bless his holy name in the morning and in the evening and when we taste hell; if we see his face in the eyes of the humble and the lowly of the world; if we know his grace and the power of his word; if we crave for the unity of his Church more than for anything else; if we pray and watch for his second coming; and if after being deceived by money and position and possessions and achievements and culture and friendship, and above all, after we are thoroughly deceived by ourselves, we turn to him in complete, unwavering trust, accepting everything, expecting nothing; then I believe he will surely have compassion on us and come to the rescue of his inheritance.

The Shape of the Liturgy

BY

GORDON C. GRAHAM

THIS is the very descriptive title of a recent book by the eminent English liturgiologist, Dom Gregory Dix, in which is traced the historical development of the eucharistic rite from the last supper to the present day. There is to be found in all liturgies a typical pattern common to various Christian traditions—the offering of bread and wine, the prayer of consecration, the breaking of the bread for distribution, and the receiving of communion itself. This is preceded by a lengthy preparation consisting of prayers and lessons. The whole service in its ancient form is well outlined by Dom Dix as follows:

"— every stage of the rite is accompanied by a good deal of publicity and movement. The gospel is chanted from the ambo, with a preliminary procession with lights and incense; the offertory occupies all the clergy and all the people, each taking their own part in a great co-ordinated action; the eucharistic prayer had anciently been chanted aloud by the pontiff in the midst of his clergy and people all listening attentively with bent heads; the fraction had been a preparation by all the clergy for the eucharistic feeding of the multitude, while the acolytes came up to receive the 'fermentum' to carry away to absent members of the one body; the communion had been the huge corporate communion of a whole population."

According to the historical evidence the shape of the liturgy is in four acts proper, with a preparation at the beginning and, as came to be added later, a thanksgiving and dismissal at the end. The liturgy really begins at the offertory and has its climax at the communion. What is called "the fraction" is really part of the communion because the bread is broken into pieces for distribution to the people, and according to ancient custom, for sending around to other churches particles of the consecrated host (fermentum) to symbolize the unity of both the sacrament and the Church as being all "one bread and one body." In accordance with our Prayer Book usage it is therefore justifiable for practical purpose to consider the central part of the communion service as offertory, consecration and communion. Between the offertory and the communion comes the consecration which is the instrumental link between them.

This description of the shape of the liturgy does not minimize the first and last acts—the preparation and the dismissal. Actually, it gives them their true meaning and importance, once the place of the offertory and communion have been duly established. The preparation is getting ready for the offertory and the dismissal is carrying out the results of the communion. The balanced shape of the liturgy means that it is not just a communion service where we come only to get something but it requires that in order to receive we first have to give.

The shape of the liturgy has sociological significance. How valuable is our offertory? Upon this question depends the judgment we make of ourselves and of our society. If our offertory is to be at all worthy of being dedicated to God much will depend upon its preparation. This carries us back long before the service begins to the economic and social sources of the bread of the world and an awareness not only of what has been good but what has been bad in its preparation. What is going to be the result of our communion? Upon this question depends the reality of our social action. If our communion has made all things new, then by the goodness of our fruits shall we surely be known in redeeming the world that lies outside.

Good News In The Midst of Bad

BY

CORWIN ROACH

Dean of Bexley Hall

He has anointed me to preach good news.—Lk. 4:18

ON a recent morning seven out of the eight front-page columns of a metropolitan newspaper were taken up with news of war, crime, and tragedy of one sort or other. The news that morning was 87% bad. Why do the papers publish so much that is depressing and harrowing? The same question, however, might be asked about the Bible. The Bible is bad news. Our Lord, himself, points out that the scriptures of his day began and ended with a murder. "From the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zachariah." The New Testament is no better. Its first pages are stained with the blood of innocent children and it concludes with the story of a man who tradition tells us was condemned to the living death of the salt mines, John, the prisoner on Patmos.

Yet this ancient book, so full of the history of man's misdeeds, dares to call itself not bad news but good. In spite of its background of battle, murder and sudden death, this most realistic of books is at the same time the most optimistic. It proclaims the good news of God's love in the midst of the bad news of human hate. It was in the Bible of his fathers that our Lord found the text for his first sermon and the description of his life work. Preaching good news in the face of life's misery and evil, that was his ideal. It should be ours as well.

Death and Life In November

BY

WILLIAM PAUL BARNDS

THE changing seasons of the year are a kind of parable of the life of man. In late autumn the leaves on the trees are either fallen or dried, and they rustle harshly in the wind presaging winter's approach. The sere corn stands in shocks in the fields, while here and there a gay pumpkin adds color to a scene that is mostly somber grey and brown. It is appropriate that All Saints tide should come in November, and that the day on which all of God's saints are remembered should inaugurate this month which has been called the month of the dead.

It is well for us to think of death, not morbidly but soberly and in the fear of God. It is just as unhealthy spiritually to refuse to think of death as it is to think overmuch about it. Certain it is that all of us will die, as our fathers have. The present world situation and the swift and terrible weapons of death render more imperative our reflection upon death. Our modern age might do well to read such a classic as "Holy Dying" by Jeremy Taylor. A thoughtful private reading of the burial office in the Prayer Book is a good devotional exercise.

One of the glories of the Church's thought of death is that it is associated with progress and victory. The thought of death is important and sobering but the concept of the life of the world to come opens up great vistas upon which our faith may feed. We are reminded of our loved ones going from strength to strength in the life of perfect service in God's kingdom. Paradise suggests many delights to the devout imagination, while in the long future in God's providences the final joys of heaven itself beckon. Our Saviour Christ has gone before us, and has taken away the sting of death. November's rustling leaves, biting winds and somber colors call us to consider death, while All Saints tide with its hallowed memories, poignant charms, and blessed hopes invites us to meditate upon the life of the world to come.

Why Are You An Episcopalian?

BY

GEORGE I. HILLER

Rector of Trinity Church, Miami

IT is a good question, but I must, of course, answer in the first person. I am an Episcopalian because I was born in a Church family, soon afterwards baptized, and grew up in the Church. When I reached "years of discretion" I was confirmed of my own choice because I had learned that the Church had continued through nineteen centuries in unbroken line of teaching and ministry. I was impressed as a youth with love of freedom and liked the positive teaching of the Church as compared with negative teaching of Christianity around me.

I early learned to find an assurance of forgiveness and an inspiration to try again after each of my failures, when I took that experience in prayer to Christ, particularly in the holy communion. I learned to depend upon the holy communion for spiritual food and strength and that dependence became a habit; without it, I should often have been plunged deeper into despair.

When at college age, science and materialistic teaching seemed to utterly destroy or deny those simple things which I had learned as a child and accepted literally. I searched for a substitute or a compromise and failed to find one that was adequate. In this state of mind the Church's positive teaching and the theory that revelation was progressive and that the Old Testament was the written history of that progress which God had made in revealing himself and his word to mankind, came to my rescue. I began to see that there was no conflict between science and religion, but that each had its own immutable laws, and that the language and simile with which one generation expressed a spiritual truth, might be unscientific, even preposterous in another age, without in any way invalidating the spiritual truth.

THE greatest factor and aid in finding the way through the maze, for me at least, was the Prayer Book. When I began to adjust my thinking with the Bible I found conflicting expressions and many more contradictory interpretations; but when I accepted the Church's teaching set forth at a minimum in the Prayer Book and builded from that, I found the way easier. When I turned to individual leaders of social and religious thought, I found that invariably I could travel along enthusiastically with them for a time only to find myself in an alley in which I could not turn around. I found my relation to the Church cemented by the fact that therein I was not bound to individual opinion but had a collective premise as a foundation.

I instinctively liked beauty and order; and the reverence of a ritual that was not fussy or ornate gave me the poise of mind which stimulated adoration and worship. I have always appreciated that help. I have been rather glad that at college age I did not particularly expect from the Church, fellowship or sociability, because I might have been disappointed; but reverence, worship and authority I did need—and found.

In short, my answer is, that I was an Episcopalian because my parents brought me to baptism and trained me in the Church; and when I reached the questioning age, the Church alone of all the leadership that I found, was modern enough to serve my needs. I think it is safe to say that my interpretation and thought on many things would not be the fundamentalist ideas that were my parents, but the basic truth and power of Christianity as taught by the Prayer Book was the anchor and is the reason why I am an Episcopalian today.

Where Are the Nine?

BY

PHILIP H. STEINMETZ

Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

ACCORDING to our Lord's experience with the lepers (St. Luke 17:11-19) nine-tenths of the time we take God's gifts for granted. That is about our percentage of church attendance. Day after day God sustains us in life. Nine times out of ten we take no notice and make no return in worship or thanks or service.

Why? We are busy in many good occupations. We are sleeping, talking, riding in an auto, preparing meals, repairing gadgets, reading the Sunday paper.

These good things are often enemies of our best. Our worldly wealth and comfort keeps us from the source of real life, inner consciousness of God.

Of course church attendance is not the only way of giving thanks nor does our presence prove that we are really grateful. We may come for what we get in listening rather than for what we give in devotion.

It is not our place to judge what others are doing. Judgment belongs to God. But it is well for us to examine ourselves and discover how fully we are showing our appreciation for what comes to us.

One of the lepers and that one a Samaritan (foreigner) returned to give thanks. It is fortunate that the selfishness of man is not 100%. As you frown upon the other nine, turn your glance upon that 90% of your own life which has yet to be offered to him who made you and all that is.

OFFICIAL ACTION

THE COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of New Brunswick, N. J. last week started a campaign to make Christmas, and other religious festivals, less commercial. About a year ago an editorial in The Witness told the story of a Churchwoman's gift designed to that end. She made a gift to her rector to use at his discretion. She then sent notes to those she had remembered with gifts in other years, telling them she had made this thank offering for their friendship.

This story, together with the results of the gift told by Bishop Hines of Texas, is now in a leaflet.

We suggest that rectors enclose this leaflet in parish bulletins sometime during Advent, giving parishioners an opportunity to make a similar gift, thus furthering the effort to

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

Hunt for Heaven. By Elsie Oakes Barber. Macmillan. $3.00.

A novel about a pastor who left Chicago after the Haymarket riots, and set out to establish a utopia in the hills of Pennsylvania. The utopia was about to be destroyed by a spy who, instead, fell in love with the pastor's daughter. A good picture of social idealism in the late 19th century.—F.C.G.

Five Centuries of Religion. By G. G. Coulton. Vol. IV. The Last Days of Medieval Monachism. New York: Cambridge Univ. Press. $9.

The late Professor Coulton was one of the most indefatigable students of the medieval world, one of the most prolific historians of that period, one of the doughtiest defenders of the Protestant interpretation of modern history, that we are ever likely to see. His great work, now concluded, was to have been in five volumes—a detailed study of monasticism from the days of St. Benedict to the end of the middle ages, a history of "religion" in the technical sense, and deeply significant for the general history of religion in that age inasmuch as monasticism was its very heart. The first volume appeared in 1923, and dealt with "St. Bernard, His Predecessors and Successors" (1000-1200 A.D.). It was a broadly sympathetic interpretation of the monastic outlook and aim, and shed a flood of light upon the whole medieval scene. The next volume (1927) was entitled, "The Friars and the Dead Weight of Tradition (1200-1400 A.D.)." In this volume one saw the rocket begin its downward curve —the parabola had passed its apex, and the corruption of a noble and once magnificent institution had now set in. The third volume, "Getting and Spending" (1935) dealt with the economic aspects of later monasticism, and in general with the whole state of affairs which Protestant historians have discussed—the "economic causes of the Reformation." It is clear that countless good men and women longed and prayed for reform, but no one knew how to bring it about; and the ecclesiastical authorities were too much interested in maintaining the status quo—for obvious reasons. The church was like the impotent man in the gospel, who knew he needed healing but lacked the strength to approach the waters when the angel's healing touch had stirred them. Vol. IV was to have documented the final conclusions of the whole series, but Dr. Coulton died in March 1947, and so what he had written out as Vol. V now becomes Vol. IV, and the work is ended.

It is inconceivable that anyone should ever again argue that the church needed no reformation in the late middle ages; or that it was at its zenith in the 13th century, after which the whole long period has been one of slow decline, aided and accelerated by Protestantism. Coulton makes us see what the world was really like, back in those dim days long ago. Like some other religious and religious movements, the medieval church closed its eyes to reality—i.e., to the actual world all about it, though its wide-eyed gaze was fixed steadily (at least it tried to get men to fix their gaze steadily) upon heaven, God and his angels, and "things above." Our inheritance of that attitude has been a baneful one, in all churches since the sixteenth century—as much in Protestantism as in Roman Catholicism. The world, in fact, has not yet recovered from the injury done it in the name of "religion" in those dreary centuries. Capitalism has taken the place of monasticism, industrialism has supplanted petty agrarianism, and great modern nations have succeeded the innumerable small states of medieval Europe; but the ethics of the modern world is still tainted by the manichaeism which lived at the heart of medieval monasticism. For example, the spoiled and sexless modern man or woman who "sacrifices" family responsibilities for the sake of business success is no product of capitalism, really, but of surviving medievalism: they justify their greed and selfishness by a superficial appeal to the ethics of renunciation of the wicked flesh—often with psychopathic consequences, to themselves or others. That is only one example, and it shows how involved and complicated the judgment must be which would appraise the medieval world, with its professional "religion," at its true worth in the total story of human society.

Coulton's great work is not only a mine of facts; it is a book to ponder and meditate upon, for we have not finished with the middle ages yet, not by a long way; and if Christianity is ever to achieve for this world what God meant it to achieve, the Reformation has got to go much further than it has gone thus far, both in conserving the true values of the middle ages and also in repudiating its errors. The Catholic Church was never a completely realized ideal—not in the thirteenth century, not in the sixth, not in the first, and certainly it is not realized today, in the twentieth; its true consummation and perfection lies off in the uncharted future, when, under God, it will begin to work not solely for the salvation of the individual but for the true "healing of the nations."—F.C.G.

Nicholas Berdyaev. By George Seaver. Harper. $2.00.

Dr. Seaver has written a reliable and brief sketch of the thought of the great Russian philosopher, whose death was such a loss to the movement for re-thinking Christian faith for the Orthodox and Russian world. The influence of Berdyaev has also been considerable amongst westerners and this volume will show us why. Obviously the author has engaged in some "editorializing," so that we know what he feels about certain of Berdyaev's ideas; that, of course, does not destroy the value of the study.

Anyone who feels, like the reviewer, that Berdyaev is interesting, stimulating, suggestive, but hardly a great constructive thinker, will be likely to value this—and the several other—attempts now being made to interpret him to English and American thought. One can only hope, however, that we do not see here the beginnings of a "Berdyaev fad," for there are places where the distinguished Russian was positively perverse and obtuse. Nevertheless, he is well worth reading; this little book will introduce him to any who may wish to grapple with his thought.—W. Norman Pittenger

The Cliff's Edge: Songs of a Psychotic. By Eithne Tabor. Sheed and Ward. $2.00.

The writer of this book is a patient in a mental hospital; the poems are some of them written in lucid moments, others (she tells us) "outside of conscious awareness." They are interesting, occasionally remarkably good. One fancies that they may be, as the publisher notes, of help to others in mental distress.—W. Norman Pittenger

Right Here, Right Now. By Margaret T. Applegarth. Harper. $2.75.

This volume contains 28 complete worship services to be used by church workers who teach, speak, preach or lead services for young people. The services require the taking of various parts by story tellers, leaders, narrators, and such characters as prophets, and off-stage "voices."—F.C.G.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

INTERNATIONAL STUDY ABOUT WORK

★ Prof. Sherman E. Johnson of the Episcopal Theological School, Prof. C. A. Simpson of General and Ellis Van Riper, vice-president of the Transport Workers Union (CIO) were Episcopalians on a commission that met in New York October 30 to start a three year study on the meaning of work. It is to be an international project. The undertaking is sponsored by the World Council of Churches.

CHAD WALSH EDITS NEW JOURNAL

★ The Rev. Prof. Chad Walsh, a contributing editor of The Witness, is now the editor, along with Robert H. Glauber, of the Beloit Poetry Journal, a quarterly. Their announcement states that there are myriads of little magazines featuring articles and essays about poetry, whereas the aim of the new journal is "to get hold of the best contemporary poetry and publish it." The office of the journal is Beloit, Wisconsin, and the subscription price is $1 a year or $2.50 for three years.

GERMANS OPPOSE REARMING

★ The fraternal council of the Evangelical Church in Germany has rejected the idea of rearmament in Germany, and has called for a whole-hearted program of social welfare, according to a World Council of Churches news dispatch which has been received by the National Council.

The fraternal council refers to the "earnest declarations" made by the Evangelical Church in Germany again and again during the last few years "that the compulsory division of Germany represents a permanent and acute menace to peace, and that there is no hope of any great change in this situation."

The declaration continues: "We cannot approve of the remilitarization of Germany, either of the west or of the east; and this undoubtedly expresses the conviction and the will of the overwhelming majority of the whole German people."

The fraternal council requests "the powers in whose hands lie the decisions concerning war and peace to listen to the petition of a disarmed people not to burden our conscience once again with the desire for military service, but to seize every opportunity of cooperating in the pursuit and maintenance of peace."

Fear, said the council's declaration, is the real enemy, which leads people to strive for security, "although no security can remove the cause of this fear."

HOUSE OF BISHOPS AGENDA

★ A tentative agenda for the meeting of the House of Bishops in El Paso, Texas, January 9-12, includes the election of a bishop for Puerto Rico; consideration of pastoral care of men and women in the armed forces; and a memorial in regard to Okinawa.

In addition, there will be a report of the "committee of nine," on divergent traditions in teaching and practice; a report from the committee on procedure under marriage legislation; a number of petitions and memorials; consideration of the strategy of the Church in meeting current problems; a report of the committee on artificial insemination; and consideration of the Anglican Congress.

Sessions of the House will be held in St. Clement's Church.

CHURCH SCHOOLS SHOW GAINS

★ The International Council of Religious Education has been gathering statistics on growth of Church membership and growth of enrollment in Church schools. The Episcopal Church is among the eight communions showing the largest gains in Church school enrollment during the year 1949. Total enrollment was 546,064, which includes 489,423 pupils and 56,641 teachers, both overseas and in the United States. The 1947 total was 475,328, showing a gain of 70,736. It is believed that the College of Preachers training courses and regional training courses under the auspices of the National Council's department of Christian education are reflected in these figures of growth.

BROTHERHOOD SPONSORS COMMUNION SERVICE

★ The annual corporate communion for men and boys, sponsored by the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, will be held this year on December 3. It is always a big affair in the diocese of Long Island, with William Leggo, president, having announced that special literature and offering envelopes are now available. The offerings this year will go to aid men of the diocese studying for the ministry.

NEW PARISH HOUSE IN PHOENIX

★ St. Paul's, a mission in Phoenix, Arizona, has acquired property and will soon break ground for the first unit of a parish hall. The Rev. Donald B. Robinson is the vicar.

ADVICE FOR DISASTER—

in many such situations. Families that have lost everything but the clothes on their backs have no ties with the past that can be reconstructed. A new house is not like the old one; it does not have the familiar appearance; one cannot be 'at home' in it right away. The Bible or Prayer Book in a binding like the old one that was lost can be perhaps the only tie with the past, the only thing that is familiar that can be replaced. People have been known to stroke such a book just to regain a sense of the continuance of life, an echo of that which was destroyed.

Gifts for the children, some toy with which the children may play, is important. A parent in a disaster-stricken community remarked, "The hardest thing to meet is the attitude of my two children. When our house went, of course they lost all their toys and playthings. They are not old enough to understand it. They just have nothing to do or with which to play. They seem so forsaken." When the toys come, everyone cheers up.

Because of the factors mentioned above, it is necessary to do some preparation. Clearly indicated would be a vestry meeting at which this would be the subject of discussion. The vestrymen should be given to understand what they can do as laymen in terms of baptism in time of emergency. The priest himself may be killed; a layman may have to step forward to act as a layreader. Such a lay reader or the warden should be advised that one of his first responsibilities will be to communicate with the bishop so that the Holy Communion may be celebrated. It is clearly a matter where, as in all things, the planning of the Church must be more than the thinking of the priest.

NEWS OF CHURCHES OVERSEAS

ANGLICAN REPORT ON GAMBLING DRAWS CRITICISM

An Anglican commission's mild report on gambling has aroused criticism in some religious circles here, particularly in the Free Churches. The report, issued by the social and industrial commission of the Church Assembly, concluded that gambling was permissible as an "amusement" and that "the existence of a gambling trade is in principle justifiable."

While critics of the report recognized that many English church members are not prepared to make an unqualified condemnation of gambling, they pointed to the commission's own statement that such activity "now endangers the welfare of society." This alone, they said, should have been reason for condemning gambling more strongly.

The report, which requires the approval of the Church Assembly before it becomes an official Church of England statement, said that men and women may gamble "without necessarily committing sin." It warned, however, that this does not mean "that all forms of gambling are permissible, or that all gamblers gamble innocently."

STUDY AMERICAN STYLE FOR GERMAN CHURCH PAPERS

How far American newspaper style can be followed in German religious journals was discussed by 40 German university students attending a journalism course at the Evangelical Academy. The students came from universities in all zones of Germany. Discussion of American press style followed an address by Focko Leupsen, editor-in-chief of the German Evangelical Church press service, who commended the work of religious editors on United States dailies, which he observed during a recent visit to America.

INTERNATIONAL CHURCH MUSIC CONGRESS

In 14 choral, chamber music, orchestral concerts and operas, the works of 53 composers were performed during a four-day international congress of church music at Cologne, Germany. Composers from Austria, Belgium, France, Luxembourg, Germany, Holland and Switzerland were represented. Outstanding feature of the congress was the Cologne Opera Company's performance of "Christopher Columbus," the libretto of which was written by the French Catholic poet, Paul Claudel, and the music by the contemporary French composer Darius Milhaud.

ARCHBISHOP OPPOSES CONTROVERSY ON AIR

The Archbishop of York opposes a proposal made by a committee of the British Council of Churches that religious broadcasts be made more controversial. He said that there is plenty of opportunity to express differences between the Churches without having them go out over the air where they might be misunderstood.

NEW ROMAN SEMINARY IN PRAGUE

Government officials attended ceremonies in Prague for the opening of a new Roman Catholic seminary. The R. C. Church was represented by Auxiliary Bishop Antonin Eltschkner and Theophis Ppatrny, vicar general of the archdiocese. The new dean, Vojtech Sanda, in his address urged students to "bear in mind that all material support for the institution comes from the working people."

NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

FUND TO AID PEACE IS APPROVED BY QUAKERS

A proposal to set up a new fund toward eliminating "hunger, poverty, and disease" was approved by the five years meeting of Friends, meeting at Richmond, Ind. The proposal was made by Clarence Pickett, for many years head of the Friends Service Committee, who told the delegates that they should match war-tax increases with voluntary contributions to a new fund to relieve social ills wherever they exist.

Other efforts to build peace, said a statement issued by the meeting, should aim at universal disarmament and the strengthening of the conciliation and peace-making functions of the UN.

Calling for dedication to the abolition of war, the statement declared that "we cannot share in the reliance upon force or threat of force which leads to a menacing arms race, to conscription, and universal military or manpower service."

"The growing regimentation, diversion of resources, limitation on freedom of conscience and of initiative," the statement continued, "indicate a dangerous drift toward a garrison state.

"We declare our sympathy with all those who for conscience's sake have entered their protest against conscription, preparation for war, and war. We offer them our prayers, encouragement and moral support as they meet the consequences of their actions."

FOUNDATION TO GIVE CHURCH AWARDS

Churches of all denominations in Oregon communities under 2,500 population will be eligible to compete for cash awards for improvements made during the first six months of next year in buildings, grounds or program. Awards will be made by the Sears Roebuck foundation in cooperation with the state's council of churches. Awards are $200, $100 and $50 each for three classifications; open country areas, communities up to 1,000 up to 2,500.

PRESBYTERIANS WANT THEIR CHURCHES SELF-SUPPORTING

Congregations with too few active, contributing members to pay an adequate salary to their ministers should merge with another nearby Presbyterian, or with a church of another Protestant denomination. This was the recommendation of the N. J. synod of the Presbyterian Church meeting at Atlantic City. It was also recommended that members who have not attended or contributed to the support of their church for two years be placed on a suspended list. Also the synod recommended that the minimum salary of the minister be increased from $2400 to $3000, plus a house, pension fund premium, expenses for supplies and equipment and the operation of an auto.

EVANGELISM DRIVE IN JAPAN

H. H. McConnell, field secretary of the department of evangelism of the Federal Council of Churches, will leave for Japan in December to direct a program of visitation evangelism, January 15-March 1. He has been invited by the national Christian council of Japan. Meanwhile Toyohiko Kagawa, speaking in Washington, said that Christianization of his country is proceeding at a much slower rate than most Americans realize. He put the present figure at 500,000 Christians in a population of 83 million.

ASSUMPTION DOGMA IS EXPLAINED

The welfare conference of the R. C. Church has issued a bulletin to secular papers explaining the dogma of the assumption of the Virgin which was proclaimed by the Pope on November 1. It says that the dogma is not new but is one held widely by the faithful for many generations. Meaning that after her death Mary was restored to life by God and taken into heaven bodily, the statement says: "the belief in the assumption is an excellent illustration of the weight which the Catholic Church puts on oral tradition, because the belief in the assumption is grounded on this source of Church teaching, more than on scripture."

THERE IS ONLY

ONE

OXFORD INDIA PAPER

Nearly a century ago Oxford University Press introduced a book paper of such extraordinary qualities that it was later awarded the Grand Prix at both the Paris and Brussels expositions.

This paper, known to generations of booklovers as Oxford India Paper, is famous throughout the world for its remarkable strength, thinness and opacity. A Prayer Book printed on this superfine paper is just one-third as thick as one using ordinary book paper!

The secret of Oxford India Paper is as secure today as when first discovered. No one person even at the Oxford mill in Wolvercote knows the entire formula.

Imitations are produced occasionally, with claims that they are just as fine as Oxford India Paper. Yet even a superficial comparison always reveals the overwhelming superiority of the superthin, superfine, superopaque Oxford product that reduces volume weight and thickness by two thirds.

There is now as ever, only the one paper of Oxford India quality . . . the beautiful superthin paper in de luxe editions of Oxford Prayer Books and Hymnals. Demand it when you select your book!

BACKFIRE

Readers are encouraged to comment on editorials, articles and news. Since space is limited we ask that letters be brief. We reserve the right to abstract and to print only those we consider important

MRS. HENRY HILL PIERCE
Churchwoman of New York

Shortly after the selective service act of 1940 was passed the National Council authorized setting up a register for conscientious objectors in the department of Christian social relations. This was helpful to Episcopalians who were conscientious objectors in proving to their draft boards that their convictions were based on "religious training or belief" as required by the law.

A recent inquiry on the part of the chairman for the Episcopal Pacifist Fellowship has brought the enclosed reply from the Rev. Almon R. Pepper, director of the department.

"Your letter was read to the department, and I reported that the register for conscientious objectors was still active and that several new registrants had been received recently. The department authorized me to make the above facts known to you and to say that the Episcopal Pacifist Fellowship should give any publicity to these facts that it wished.

"I believe that you know that whenever we receive any inquiry about the register or the position of our Church we make the facts available and also, refer the inquirer or registrant to the Fellowship. If the Fellowship has a small leaflet or a letter they would wish sent with our answers, we shall be happy to include them with our letter."

A. T. B. HAINES
In Charge of St. George's, Derby, N. Y.

Mr. Gilman's letter (Oct. 26) calls for an answer. My personal acquaintance with Anglo-Catholics, clerical and lay, over a period of forty years and in many dioceses and countries, supports the contention of Chad Walsh. Their very slogan "It is the Mass that matters"—as distinct from specific forms of it, shows that their emphasis is placed on the service of our Lord's own institution and what it means to the faithful. The excellent series "The Episcopal Church — What is wrong?" shows that churchmen other than Anglo-Catholics also mistake externals for the inner reality. There will always be such in any group, but they are not in a majority as a rule. It is the fact that, by and large, when English churches are lamenting small attendance, the Anglo-Catholic parishes are holding their own, and more! The same is true in the West Indies. This speaks for itself. Morning Prayer has its function, but it is not to displace the eucharist as the central act of worship, nor can it produce the same results! Further, what we do in Church affects what we do in our lives and both count. To eliminate the former and exalt the latter as Mr. Gilman does, is precisely what the non-churchgoers and the pagans do—with sad results!

Incidentally, permit me to congratulate you on these very fine articles of Chad Walsh and Hyatt Howe Waggoner. They are spurs to jolt us out of the rust of complacency and to face facts as they are. Give us more!

W. E. C. VOLLICK
Clergyman of Church in Canada

Your correspondent, Mrs. J. R. Long (October 5) says: "I am still hoping and praying that our Church will begin praying for our enemies. I can find no prayer for that in our Prayer Book."

May I suggest that such a prayer may be found in the Litany, where—on page 57 in the American Book—the petition is: "That it may please thee to forgive our enemies, persecutors, and slanderers, and to turn their hearts." I would call special attention to the last five words of the petition.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Christian Council of China Backs New Government

First Meeting At Which No Foreign Church Representative Was Present

BY RELIGIOUS NEWS SERVICE

★ Endorsement of a proclamation for the "reformation" of the Chinese Christian Churches was voted at closing sessions of the 14th annual meeting of the National Christian Council of China, meeting in Shanghai the first week in November. The Council represents most of the Protestant bodies in the country.

Approval of the proclamation, entitled "Channels for efforts of Chinese Christians in new China's reconstruction" came after a week of intensive discussion centering around future policies and needs of the Chinese Churches.

The proclamation is the outcome of a conference of Christian leaders with Premier Chou En Lai and other government officials last July.

It declares that, under the government's leadership, Chinese Christian Churches and institutions "must unalterably oppose imperialism, feudalism and bureaucratic capitalism, and strive to help build up an independent, democratic, peaceful, united, prosperous and strong China."

In endorsing the proclamation the Council declared that while welcoming friendly cooperation from abroad, the Chinese Churches and Christian institutions must be on guard against "imperialistic intrigues and entanglements."

The Council urged the Chinese Churches to put into effect soon a program of "self-government, self-support, and self-propagation."

A resolution was adopted by the delegates pledging full support to the government's program of land reform and to its winter relief campaign for poverty-stricken refugees.

The meeting here marked the first annual gathering of the National Christian Council since the Communist ascendancy in China, and was attended by 138 delegates from various parts of the country. It was said to be the first meeting at which no foreign church representatives were present.

LICHTENBERGER ELECTED IN MISSOURI

THE Rev. Arthur C. Lichtenberger, professor of pastoral theology at the General Theological Seminary and editor of The Witness for a number of years, was elected bishop coadjutor of Missouri at a special convention held at Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, on November 1. Election was on the third ballot. Lichtenberger's name was placed in nomination by the Rev. A. Malcolm MacMillan, rector of the Church of the Ascension, St. Louis. The other candidates were the Rev. Gardiner M. Day, rector of Christ Church, Cambridge, Mass., nominated by Dean Sidney E. Sweet of Christ Church Cathedral, and the Rev. J. Frank Sant, rector of the Church of St. Michael and St. George, St. Louis, nominated by the Rev. William H. Laird, rector of St. Peter's Church, Ladue.

The convention opened with a report of a committee to consider possible candidates presented by Dean Sweet. The committee had circularized the members of the convention with biographies of various possible men in advance of the session. On the first ballot, Mr. Day had a considerable lead in the clerical order, and a slight lead in the lay. On the second vallot, Mr. Lichtenberger was elected by the lay, but failed by one vote in the clerical order. After the third ballot, the convention voted to make the election unanimous.

A celebration of the Holy Communion preceded the session of Convention. Bishop Scarlett celebrated, assisted by Dean Sweet, the Rev. G. Ernest Lynch of Trinity Church, Hannibal, and the Rev. S. George Parrigin of Holy Cross Church, Poplar Bluff. The convention recessed for a dinner after the first ballot. During the periods when the ballots were being counted, the convention was addressed by the Rev. Roger Blanchard, national secretary for college work.

GRANT PREACHES IN STADIUM

★ The Rev. Frederick C. Grant, professor at Union Seminary and Dean of graduate studies, Witness book editor, preached in the baseball stadium in Mobile, Alabama, on November 5th. It was a united service of the Protestant churches of the city. Dr. Grant spoke on "our Protestant heritage" and the sermon was broadcast by two radio stations.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

BISHOP VOEGELI VISITS MICHIGAN

★ Visiting a dozen parishes, a luncheon club or two, and several guild and other meetings, and speaking before hundreds of Churchpeople in Detroit and vicinity, Bishop Charles A. Voegeli of Haiti spent a busy two weeks in the diocese of Michigan during the latter part of October. He also found time to officiate at several services. Bishop Voegeli's visit included preaching engagements in Wyandotte, Monroe, and Wayne as well as Detroit and Grosse Pointe. He met with groups of young people, clergy, laymen and women, carrying the story of his interesting field wherever he went.

Between Michigan and Haiti there is an almost-forgotten affinity, so far as the mission in Haiti is concerned. In 1855 a young Negro, James Theodore Holly, was ordained deacon by Bishop Samuel S. McCoskry, first Bishop of the diocese in old St. Paul's Church, Detroit. Holly was destined to plant the Episcopal Church in Haiti before the close of the Civil War, and ultimately, in 1874, he was appointed the first bishop of that district. During his stay in Michigan, Bishop Voegeli visited St. Matthew's Church, Detroit, of which Bishop Holly was a member when he entered the ministry.

250,000 VISITORS FOR INSTITUTE

★ The Seamen's Church Institute, which serves the port of Philadelphia, received 250,000 visitors and gave lodging to 72,-969 seamen from all over the world during the past year.

Other statistics reported were: an attendance of nearly 10,000 at weekly entertainments; 5,900 at chapel services; 3,050 interviews; 380 bedside visits; 11 funerals, with most of the interments in plots provided by the Institute; $445,000 converted into travelers' checks for 952 men on 92 ships; $39,200 deposited for safe-keeping; 14,-200 books and 64,000 magazines distributed on shipboard.

The Rev. Percy R. Stockman was reelected superintendent and chaplain of the Institute for the 30th year.

STATE FLAGS IN PARIS

★ At the morning service on November 5th, the Hon. David K. E. Bruce, American Ambassador to France, and an Episcopalian, presented to Dean Sturgis L. Riddle of the American Pro-Cathedral Church of the Holy Trinity, Paris, four new state flags to hang in the clerestory of the Cathedral. The Arizona flag was given by George F. Brewer of Phoenix, formerly of the E.C.A. in France, in memory of his wife, Harriet Brewer; the Louisiana flag by Baroness Carl von Seidlitz, in memory of her father, Herman Frasch; the Nebraska flag by Mrs. Gilbert Hitchcock in memory of her husband, Senator Gilbert Hitchcock; and the Nevada flag by Mrs. Jeanne Marie Scott of New York in memory of her father, George Isham Scott.

W. B. GIVEN MADE CHAIRMAN

★ Mr. William B. Given Jr. of New York, chairman of the board of the American Brake Shoe Company, has been elected chairman of the executive committee of the Episcopal Church Foundation, according to an announcement made today by the Presiding Bishop, chairman of the board of the foundation. Mr. Given's function as chairman will involve direct responsibility for leadership of the effort to obtain gifts and bequests.

Mr. Given is a trustee and member of the standing committee of the General Seminary and a vestryman of Trinity Church. He is a director of the New York chapter of the Red Cross and chairman of the committee of university development of Yale.

Mr. Given's son, the Rev. Davis Given, is assistant to the superintendent of the Good Shepherd mission at Fort Defiance, Arizona.

SWEDISH PREACHER AT BERKELEY

★ The Rev. Gunnar Rosendal of Osby, Sweden, delivered the annual Mary Fitch Page lecture in the Berkeley Divinity School chapel on November 1st on the topic "Theology in the Swedish Church Today." Dr. Rosendal spoke of the change from the prevalent liberalism of his student days thirty years ago brought about by the revival of systematic, exegetical, and ecclesiological theology, and liturgical studies. In closing he quoted from Bishop Nygren's pastoral letter on his enthronement as Bishop of Lund which in the spirit of sound liturgical revival called for due attention to both preaching and worship, the pulpit and the altar. As a visitor from another historic Episcopal Church, Dr. Rosendal asked for our friendship and prayers for his Church in its mission to the secularized modern world.

Later in the evening Dr. Rosendal spoke at the meeting of the Orthodox and Anglican Fellowship at Dwight Hall, Yale University.

AID IS SOUGHT FOR REFUGEES

★ The Episcopal Church was represented by Bishop Larned, in charge of our churches in Europe, at a conference held at Geneva to consider aid for 12,000,000 refugee Christians. The 70 European and American Church leaders attending were told that it was among the most strategic needs of European Churches for 1951. The conference was sponsored by the World Council of Churches.

"The desperate plight of some 12,000,000 'orphaned' refugee Christians is the key spiritual, social and economic problem facing the Churches of western Europe," a statement issued by the conference declared. "Churches which are in a position to help must continue to place the tragic predicament of all homeless people in the forefront of their concern for western Europe."

Another urgent need, the conference agreed, was aid to Orthodox and Protestant minority Churches in Eastern European countries, particularly in Eastern Germany. Members of the conference declared that non-Orthodox Churches should "welcome the opportunity of helping Orthodox Churches and communities."

The conference expressed particular concern over the situation of minority Churches in Roman Catholic or secularized environments, declaring that they should receive "every possible aid, especially in the area of evangelism."

Other emergency needs, according to the conference, are increased aid for Christian youth programs, and for health, scholarship and leadership exchange programs now being carried on by the department of inter-Church aid.

European delegates at the conference included representatives of the Church of England, the Evangelical Church in Germany, the Lutheran Church in France, the French Reformed Church, the German Methodist Church, the Evangelical Church in Austria, the Church of Scotland, the Swedish Lutheran Church, the Swiss Old Catholic Church, the Orthodox Church in Greece, and the Serbian Orthodox Church. Representatives were also present from the Italian reconstruction committee, the Netherlands inter-Church aid committee, and the Swiss inter-Church aid committee.

Other American Churches, besides the Episcopal, to have delegates were the Presbyterians, both south and north, Brethren, Disciples, Evangelican and Reformed, Lutheran, Baptist, Quakers.

JERSEY CITY PARISH TO BE STUDIED

★ The work of an Episcopal church in a blighted downtown area of Jersey City is one of five church projects in the U. S. selected for study by a committee of the World Council of Churches. They are studying "the evangelization of modern man in mass society."

Others to be studied is a Lutheran church in the stockyards district of South St. Paul, Minn.; the East Harlem Protestant Church of New York; the Presbyterian church in the coal fields of Westport, Va.; a Baptist mission project in Detroit.

The purpose of the study is to discover places where special techniques are being used successfully to reach industrial populations.

HARRY B. TAYLOR STAYS IN CHINA

★ Contrary to earlier rumors which said that Harry B. Taylor, M.D., director of St. James Hospital, Anking, China, was expecting to leave, Dr. Taylor writes from Anking: "I am a year past retiring age and we are slated to be leaving for home but as we have been unable to find doctors to do the major surgery, we feel we should not leave until provision can be made for this important part of the hospital work. No one else in the city can do major surgery." (Population 100,000 or more.) "We go along as usual. The hospital is crowded. Lots of surgery, so much that it is hard to get operations done with our depleted staff."

News that Dr. Taylor might be leaving got around the city; whereupon several movements, official and unofficial, were started to get him to stay. He was even assured that in the event of war he would not be interned, but allowed to work as usual.

The hospital grew out of work started by Edmund Lee Woodward in 1899. Dr. Taylor, succeeding Dr. Woodward, has been there since 1905, surviving the revolution of 1911, the uprisings of the 1920's, two world wars, and also the recent political turnover, during which the hospital was overcrowded with wounded soldiers, its work much appreciated by the new authorities.

PREACHING MISSION IN BUFFALO

★ In cooperation with the united evangelistic campaign of the council of churches of Buffalo and Erie County, noonday preaching services were held at St. Paul's Cathedral, Buffalo, November 6-10. All the services were broadcast by transcription at 5 each afternoon. The preachers were Dean McNairy; the Rev. Harold R. Albert, Lutheran of Columbus, O.; President Joseph R. Sizoo of New Brunswick Theological Seminary; Dean-emeritus Rockwell H. Potter of Hartford Theological School; the Rev. Clovis G. Chappell of Jackson, Miss.

LOS ANGELES ORGANISTS FORM GUILD

★ Forty-eight organists and choirmasters of the diocese of Los Angeles signed the constitution of what is believed to be the first organists and choirmasters guild organized in any diocese in this country, at the meeting of the diocesan commission on church music held at St. Paul's Cathedral.

These 48 signers will be the founders of the new group which, it is hoped, will include representatives from every parish and mission in the diocese, according to the Rev. George W. Barnes, chairman of the commission.

The purposes of the guild, as outlined in the constitution, are threefold: 1. To assist the advancement of church music in the Episcopal Church traditions; 2. To sponsor convocation choir festivals and choral singing; 3. To provide members with opportunities to meet and discuss means and methods of developing Church music in the diocese, and to provide musical help for smaller parishes and missions.

The first activity of the guild will be the development and sponsoring of Spring choir festivals in each area of the diocese in 1951, and to organize a large all-diocese choral presentation in 1952.

The 1951 spring festivals will be under the direction of the chairmen for each area: Charles H. Marsh, organist at St. James of the Sea, LaJolla, for the San Diego area; Miss Ruth Kelsey of Trinity Church, Santa Barbara, for the Santa Barbara area; Wilbur Showaltor of Trinity, Redlands, for the San Bernardino area, and Don Coats, organist at St. Paul's Cathedral, for the Greater Los Angeles area, which includes Long Beach.

The election of officers of the guild will be held at the meeting to be held on the Saturday following the diocesan convention in January. The guild will meet twice a year, the first regular meeting to be held in April at All Saints', Pasadena, where a demonstration of adult and children's choirs will be presented. Area chairmen will hold two meetings in their areas each year. A series of meetings for organists and clergy will be held between now and early Lent to prepare for the spring music festivals in each area.

OPEN FOR REST AND PREYER

★ A cloak room in Trinity, Tulsa, Okla., has the following sign on the wall: "Please do not leave hats and coats here unless attendant is on duty. Thieves sometimes come into the church to prey."

BISHOP ATWILL TO RESIGN

★ Bishop Atwill of North Dakota has announced to the district that he will present his resignation at the meeting of the House of Bishops, meeting in El Paso, Texas, in January. "I will ask that my resignation be made effective on February 1st," he writes, "which will complete fourteen years of most happy association with as genuinely kind, patient and friendly people as any man could wish to have as his fellow workers."

NEW PLEDGE TO CROSS

★ A new pledge to the cross of Christ is being used at Church school services in St. James' Cathedral, Fresno, California, immediately preceding the customary salute to the American flag, and was written by Dean James M. Malloch. The text of the pledge is: "I pledge allegiance to the Cross, and to the Church for which it stands, one Church universal, with faith and hope and love for all."

CHURCH WOMEN MEET IN CINCINNATI

★ Representatives of eleven foreign countries met with about 3,000 American women, representing seventy denominations, at the biennial assembly of the United Council of Church Women. The sessions opened in Cincinnati on November 13 and run through the 16th.

Asia is represented by India, Korea and Japan. Germany is represented by four delegates and other countries with representatives are Africa, China, Thailand, Brazil, Algiers, Cuba and Canada.

The assembly is interracial as well as international, in line with the policy of the organization whose board includes Negroes, American Indians and Orientals. Its constitution forbids meetings in any city where members would be segregated or suffer discrimination.

Meetings are being held on race relations, education, employment, housing, health, evangelism, family relations, labor-management relations.

LAYMEN RAISE FUND FOR SEWANEE

★ A group of determined Episcopal laymen and Sewanee alumni and friends in Memphis are raising funds for the badly needed construction of Gailor memorial dining hall at the University of the South. At last report $32,000 had been raised in Memphis alone, to add to approximately $100,000 available in the university's general building fund. Approximately $400,000 will be needed to complete the building. The structure will replace Magnolia Dining Hall, which, built in 1873, is the oldest building now in use by the university.

LEWIS FRANKLIN THE SPEAKER

★ Lewis B. Franklin, former treasurer of the National Council, was the headliner at the 75th anniversary meeting of the Auxiliary of Long Island, meeting on November 9, at St. Ann's, Brooklyn. Bishop DeWolfe was the preacher at the service in the morning.

PROTESTANT COUNCIL OFFERS FILM

★ The premiere of the new film, "Again Pioneers," took place November 6th in New York. It is produced by the Protestant Council of which Bishop Gilbert, retired Bishop of New York, is the president. A thoroughly professional job, the film deals with the problems of the half of our population which has changed residence since 1940, as well as with the problems of migratory workers.

The late Bishop of Durham, in his Autobiography, tried to discover why the dramatization of the Gospel is so repugnant. "The almost grotesque remoteness from normal procedure offended the intelligence," he writes, "the devil was ridiculous, and the angels impossible—while the Central Figure in the melodramatic setting ceased to be Divine. The feet-washing was almost comical. The stern simplicity of the Gospels was replaced by the laboured verboseness of pseudo-archaic verse."

In selecting as a subject a crisis of current importance in an American community and treating it from the Christian point of view, the Protestant Council has avoided all these objections to "religious drama" and has produced an excellent film an hour long which would appeal particularly to high school and to parent groups.

NEW PARISH HOUSE AT KINGSPORT

★ The $45,000 addition to the parish house of St. Paul's, Kingsport, Tenn., is now complete, and provides the needed facilities for a rapidly growing parish.

RICHARDS WITHDRAWS IN ALBANY

★ The Rev. David E. Richards has withdrawn as suffragan-elect of Albany because of a technicality in connection with the election on May 16th. The director of public relations of the diocese, the Rev. Dudley J. Stroup, said that there had been some question whether all the requirements of the canons had been met in the election since Mr. Richards is but twenty-nine. Bishop Barry has announced that Richards has been appointed archdeacon and that a new election for the office of suffragan will be held next spring.

MATRICULATION AT GENERAL

★ Seventy-seven new students signed the pledge in the matriculation book on November 1st, promising to be loyal to the life and work of the General Theological Seminary. The pledge was made after a celebration of the holy eucharest in the chapel of the Good Shepherd. These seventy-seven new men, added to the students who were matriculated earlier, brings the total number of students to two hundred. The sermon was preached by the Bishop Harold Edward Wynn of Ely, England, on the eve of All Saints'.

LLEWELLYN E. WILLIAMS, formerly of St. Paul, Minn., is now vicar of St. Martin's, Watts, California

COMMUNITY CENTER IN DETROIT

★ A new community center was opened last month at St. Thomas', Detroit, directed by the new rector, the Rev. Sydney S. Byrne. It is open to everyone in the area, as an endeavor to meet the social needs of people of all ages. The first phase of the program is a recreational program of crafts, games, dancing for boys and girls. Director of this is Mrs. Marie Bernatowicz, district supervisor of the department of parks and recreation. Further group activities are to be announced as plans are developed and community needs become known.

RELIGIOUS WEEK AT COLLEGE

★ The annual religious emphasis week was held at North Carolina State College, November 5-9th, planned and directed by the YMCA and the college religious groups, including the Canterbury Club of the Episcopal Church. Addresses on Christian faith were given in seminars, class rooms and assemblies, and in the evening discussion groups were held in the dormitories and fraternity houses.

HARMONY HOUR IN BUFFALO

★ Something new in the way of a parish activity started November 13 at St. Paul's Cathedral, Buffalo, when people who like to sing gathered for a harmony hour. It is a means of recruiting for the adult choir, composed entirely of volunteers.

MEXICAN CLERGYMAN HAS DIFFICULTIES

★ Jose J. Vega, former Roman Catholic priest and founder and pastor of an Episcopal church in Mexico City, is one of the most recent Protestant ministers to feel the heavy hand of Rome in Mexico. The story is told in the December issue of the Converted Catholic Magazine. Vega was re-educated for the Episcopal ministry at Virginia Seminary following his break with Rome. As an R. C. he had been director of the seminary of his order and rector of an important church in Toluca, Mexico. Returning to Mexico to work among his people, he chose one of the poorest sections of Mexico City as the field of his labors — a section without church or school.

Though the two Roman churches nearest to this community had never taken any interest in it, they came to life when they heard of Vega's work, and set their parishioners to distributing denunciatory leaflets through his district. From their pulpits they attacked and slandered him. Meanwhile his little church outgrew the homes in which the members had been gathering. A chapel was erected, and it, too, was soon crowded to overflowing.

The hierarchy — by now including Msgr. Luis M. Martinez, archbishop of Mexico — stepped up its attacks, resorting to defamation, threats, and physical violence. The Episcopal Church was represented as the agent of "foreigners interested in establishing a big division in our country." Those who attended the church were threatened with excommunication.

Meanwhile pressure was being put on the state department, and early this year Mr. Vega received a letter from the Mexican state department ordering cessation of services in the new church.

Fortunately, the school established by Vega, and which is now a flourishing institution, was not closed. Recognizing its precarious position, Vega has recently requested official permission and protection for this work. The national committee of evangelical defense has petitioned the state department for the reopening of the church. To date no action upon either matter has been taken.

Michael Scott
Spokesman for a Voiceless People

THOUSANDS of peasant tribesmen of South-West Africa will have a spokesman again this year in the General Assembly of the United Nations. He is Michael Scott, clergyman of the Church of England, who has devoted his life to a ministry among the destitute people of many races. Since 1946 he has been concerned about the repression of the native population of South-West Africa. For nearly 30 years they have been governed under the mandate granted the Union of South Africa by the old League of Nations. Denied by the Union of South Africa the right to speak for themselves, and refused permission to send one of their own people to the UN, the tribes asked Scott to present their case before that body in 1949. He appeared at Lake Success last year, and after many delays was permitted to speak. The story which he told in his mild gentle way, was a dramatic, moving and shocking one. As he arose the Union of South Africa representation left the hall.

His preliminary remarks included statements from the chiefs of the Herero, the Nama, and the Berg-Damera people, three relatively small tribes in South-West Africa. He told how they had sold their cattle and sent their chiefs on a journey of many miles in order to give the money to Michael Scott so that he could make the trip to Lake Success. He related the history of the tribes of South-West Africa since before the first World War, a story that must be known if one is to comprehend the full irony of today's situation.

In the early part of the twentieth century, a German preacher travelled around South-West Africa in a wagon, preaching the gospel to the natives, and, incidentally, surveying the land. When his surveys were completed, he sent for German troops, who surrounded the tribes, laid the groundwork for an influx of traders and settlers, and took possession of more and more of the land, until 1906, when the tribes revolted. The German commander, General von Trothe, ordered them to surrender and when defied by the people, quickly and ruthlessly overcame the tribes. Then von Trothe decreed the first genocide of modern times.

Scott stated: "Thus was enunciated as policy a doctrine of racial superiority in Africa in the name of what all the African people had been led to believe was a Christian civilization. The Berg-Damera people had been greatly reduced; the Namas had been halved, and the Hereros cut down from 80,000 to 15,000 men, women and children." All three tribes were driven from their territories.

During the first World War, the tribes fought on the side of the British, with the British promise that their lands would be restored. The promise was not kept. The land was given back to the Germans who had settled there, but some survivors of the genocide crept back to their own territory. Their return was greeted with acts of terrorism, peace-time bombing, which never made the headlines, and the banishment of the natives to dry, unfertile areas. The Union government kept the natives in these "police" zones until they had dug wells, built dams and raised cattle—then they shifted them to other arid, "sick ness" belts, giving the restored land to white settlers.

In 1946, the Union of South Africa proposed to the UN that the South-West African territory be incorporated into the Union. The United National Membership Council rejected the proposal and then, for the four years since, has requested the Union government to submit a trusteeship agreement for South-West Africa. Each time this request has been refused. For the past three years the UN has made repeated requests that the Union government report on how it was administering its trust. There has been no reply to these requests.

In 1948, the Union government passed the

WHEN such poor men and women as are clearly in the right, and have no one to help them, show us the reason why they have no money, it would be greatly to the honor of God for you to undertake their cause, from the impulse of charity, like St. Ives, who in his time was the lawyer of the poor. Consider that the deed of pity, and ministering to the poor with those faculties which God has given you, is very pleasing to God, and salvation to your soul.

South-West Africa act, abolishing the mandate and incorporating South-West Africa into the Union. The Malan government stated that in doing this it was following the wish of the South-West Africans. Scott stated that the plebiscite was a fraud, that the non-European nine-tenths of the population had been denied any representation at all and that all right of petition had been disallowed. The non-Europeans, numbering 9 out of the 12 millions resident in South Africa, have never been consulted on the increasing restrictive legislation that affects them. The African people of South-West Africa, numbering over 300,000, are living in a state of virtual slavery to the white population. The mines and works act of 1926 denied Africans the right to become skilled workers. The pass laws require every African male to produce from 1 to 12 passes, and failure to show them can result in arrest, fine and imprisonment. The group areas act divides the country into racial areas, an arrangement in which the white population will continue to benefit from the labor of African, Colored and Indian workers, and for these there is no promise of available land.

The UN committee, after hearing Scott, decided to ask the International Court of Justice at the Hague for advice as to the legal status of South-West Africa. The International Court of Justice, meeting this summer, issued an advisory opinion largely upholding the revelations of Scott. In its opinion, the court established the following:

1. The Union of South Africa has obligations to the UN in respect to South-West Africa.

2. There is an obligation upon South Africa as well as upon the UN to ensure the submission of reports to the UN and the right of petition from the peoples of South-West Africa to the UN.

3. Although there is no legal obligation on the Union of South Africa to submit a trusteeship agreement under the Trusteeship Council, provision must be made for continuation of the terms of the mandate through the UN. The protection of the indigenous inhabitants who are not able to "stand by themselves in the strenuous conditions of the modern world" must be ensured.

4. The social and economic advancement of the indigenous inhabitants must be promoted and their protection ensured against forced labor and other abuses specified in the mandate.

5. Any future dispute regarding the administration of South-West Africa must be referred to the International Court of Justice.

As late as September of this year, Scott's return to Lake Success to speak for the South-West Africans was in doubt. When he applied for a visa he was told by the London U. S. consulate that he must get a reindorsement from the South African government. This was quite impossible for the Union of South Africa has since Michael Scott's appearance before the United Nations in 1949, refused him permission to reenter South Africa. However, at the protestations of concerned individuals and organizations, he was able to secure a transit visa, and he will attend sessions of the General Assembly as an observer and as a consultant for the International League for the Rights of Man. The League is a non-governmental organization with consultative status with the United Nations.

Scott was born in 1906, the son of an English country parson. He was educated at King's College, Taunton, and intended to go on to Cambridge University, but ill health made this impossible. At the age of 19 he made his first visit to Africa, working there for a year in a missionary leper colony. In 1930 he returned to England and was ordained at Chichester in 1932. He went to India in 1935, returning at the outbreak of war to England, where he joined the R.A.F. as an aircraftsman. He was soon invalided out of the service and returned to South Africa in 1943, where the years since have seen one of the most significant ministries of our time.

Arthur Lichtenberger

CONGRATULATIONS to the diocese of Missouri! Our news columns reports the election of Arthur Lichtenberger as its Bishop coadjutor and such an announcement merits a congratulatory word. Not because Dr. Lichtenberger was our editor for a number of years and is now a contributing editor of The Witness are we rejoicing in this election. We are naturally proud of that fact but we rejoice because a man of his stature has been elevated to the episcopate. We take heart in the Church for having made such a choice. Those who know him well as a parish priest, as the dean of a cathedral in an industrial city, as a seminary professor, as a preacher, as an editor, as a Christian and Churchman of remarkable soundness and sanity, possessed of that wholeness of wisdom, integrity and outlook which is part, at least, of the meaning of catholic—cannot but believe that Missouri has chosen very well.

We would add that the Rev. Gardiner M. Day, who led on the first ballot, would likewise have made an excellent bishop, particularly in this diocese which is predominantly evangelical in churchmanship. It is possible of course that Lichtenberger will decline in order to stay at the General where he is doing such a fine work. In that event another convention might very well elect the Cambridge rector.

Further Adventures of Mr. Entwhistle

BY
THOMAS V. BARRETT

THE NEW CURATE

SAID the Rev. Samuel Entwhistle, stuffing the last sport shirt into a bureau drawer: "Well, it was a wonderful vacation, Isabel. I feel like a new man. And with the new curate arriving next week I'm confident we'll have a wonderful year."

"I hope so," said Mrs. Entwhistle, with a last regretful look at the pile of summer dresses she was packing away. "But you mustn't forget what Father Wise told you. 'A curate is a thing with answers to questions nobody asks, and questions whose answers God only knows.' Remember the curate Dean Jelloway had. He was always getting sued for breach of promise."

"My dear, not always. Only once. Besides, I'm sure young Doolus is—well-balanced—and—has his feet on the ground. We must do everything we can to make him happy here. After all, it's his first taste of the ministry."

The Rev. De Lancey Doolus—"Dee-Dee" for short, arrived on schedule to take up his work at the Church of the Tribulation. Dee Dee was a handsome youth, with wavy brown hair, a pale cheek and El Greco eyes.

"I hope we can go at this work together," Mr. Entwhistle told him with a brotherly pat on the shoulder. "Because of our tradition the people will think of you at first as The New Curate. But I prefer to think of you as my assistant. There is a great deal to be done, and I'm sure you'll win a place for yourself in the hearts of the people. If there's anything at all I can do, just tell me."

"Well," Mr. Doolus responded, giving Mr. Entwhistle what Mrs. Entwhistle later began to refer to as the "see how I grovel here below" look, "I'm afraid my apartment is a little inadequate. I mean it's pleasant—but too small for much entertaining. Of course I can get along with it for a while."

"Yes," Mr. Entwhistle said, nodding absently and thinking of the de luxe three-room suite the parish had procured for Mr. Doolus. "Of course—apartments are hard to find these days—perhaps after you get married—I mean—when you do—if you're still here—" he stopped in confusion.

"Yes—well, if there's nothing else, it will do all right." Dee Dee nodded with a tinge of condescension.

"Now, about the Church school," Mr. Entwhistle said, picking himself up out of the dust. "It's been going along fairly well but we should have more pupils, and I think the school needs some reorganization."

"I imagine it does," Dee Dee said. "I've been looking at the materials you use, interdenominational stuff, quite hopeless. In fact, the whole set-up is pretty much out of date."

"Yes," Samuel agreed, half-heartedly.

"And the acolytes," Dee Dee went on. "We should have a St. Ambrosia Guild."

"Over my dead body," Samuel said, screwing his courage to the sticking place. "I mean we tried that . . ." he made a face.

"Well, of course, you're the rector," Dee Dee said with a raised brow which plainly indicated his scorn for a vestry so deficient in judgment.

"I hope also you can build up the Young Peoples' organization," Mr. Entwhistle said hopefully.

For the first month Mr. Entwhistle was delighted with his assistant. Dee Dee made seventeen calls a day, sent out a pastoral letter to the shut-ins, and the Church school was launched with a full crew of teachers, twenty-two new pupils, and a whole closet full of new curriculum.

It was in October that a bubble of discontent rose lazily to the surface of the ecclesiastical lake.

"I do think your new curate is splendid," said Mrs. Gosnell in her throaty baritone. "So handsome, and he has such a keen interest in community affairs. But I understand the Young People's Society is made up entirely of girls this year. Of course that's fine, but I do think something ought to be done to arouse the boys to civic needs."

Mr. Entwhistle visited the Young People on the following Sunday evening.

"Just thought I'd drop in," said Samuel apologetically.

"So nice of you, rector," Dee Dee assured him. "I was going to read them some of Dorothy Parker—and perhaps a little Eliot."

"George Eliot?" Samuel gasped.

"Oh, no." Dee Dee laughed quietly. "T. S. of course."

Samuel listened with awe to the reading, discovered two fifteen-year-old men in the back of the room and left with the sighs of thirty-five teen-aged ladies ringing in his ears.

"I don't know where he got all the women,"

Samuel said to Isabel that night as he was taking off his shoes, "but believe me, he got them. And furthermore, they're all squids."

"What?" Isabel asked out of the forest of bobby pins.

"Squids," Samuel retorted.

"I never," Isabel said, in the midst of operations, "heard you refer to my fellow sisters as squids."

"I mean they're duds," Samuel said vehemently. "Lovelorn bobby-soxers — that nobody would invite to a Halloween party with masks."

"My, Samuel," exclaimed Mrs. Entwhistle, her eyes a'twinkle, "I didn't think you noticed. Anyhow, duds or not," she added "they must need saving."

"No doubt," groaned Samuel—"and Dee Dee is saving them with T. S. Eliot. Might as well read Gulliver's Travels to the kindergarten."

The next week Dee Dee preached his first sermon in the Church of the Tribulation. He made a very imposing figure in the pulpit. Isabel called it his "Rise crowned with light, Imperial Salem rise" look.

"What was he talking about?" Mrs. Entwhistle asked Samuel at dinner time.

"I don't quite know," Samuel answered, scowling.

"It must have been terribly orthodox," Isabel said with awe.

Samuel saw Dee Dee the next morning, and risked a compliment.

"Your sermon had—er—very good—structure," Samuel said.

The Rev. Mr. Doolus raised his eyebrows in gratitude.

Samuel grew bolder. After all it was his duty as rector to train his assistant.

"I think perhaps it was a bit too—theoretical," he ventured.

Dee Dee raised his eyebrows again. "I feel it is most important to preach theology," he answered. Samuel was about to ask "was that theology?," changed his mind and fiddled with a pencil.

"Yes—quite—but it seemed to me a little too technical. Those theological terms you used."

"We must give the people the whole of the apostolic doctrine. I do not think we can compromise the faith."

"No—no indeed," agreed Samuel, slightly nettled by Dee Dee's olympian calm. "But it doesn't seem to me the doctrine has to be stated in such a rigid manner. I mean to say, it's a bit like the skeleton of a fish, without the fish. Not very digestible."

"It's the way we were taught to preach in the seminary," Dee Dee retorted with composure.

"Oh," said Samuel.

He abandoned hope of changing the pulpit strategy of his assistant. Whenever it was Dee Dee's turn to preach, the faith once delivered to the saints was delivered to the saints of the Tribulation. They bore up masterfully.

"After all," said Old Ben, at vestry meeting, "he's right young. He ain't no preacher yet—sounds like a fellow that's swallowed a cross-word puzzle. But give him time."

"I rather enjoy him," said B. U. "At least he stays away from politics."

As the weeks wore on Samuel noticed that Dee Dee wasn't handing in his lists of pastoral calls.

"I hope you're still calling on people," he said amiably, as he discovered Dee Dee in his office knee deep in some kind of card filing system.

"Oh, no," Dee Dee said. "Didn't I tell you? I decided that indiscriminate calling gets us nowhere. People are never home, and most of them aren't interested in being vital Christians and doing something about it. I'm working now on the principle of the cell."

"You mean—" Samuel asked, astonished, "You're—becoming monastic?"

"Indeed now," Dee Dee smirked. "The cell group, you know—small groups of vital and informed Christians. Gathering together for prayer and study. That's the future strength of the Church—to build up cells."

"Oh," Samuel answered.

"I have them meet in my apartment for tea. Every other week. Of course I'm visiting the hospital patients."

"Are they organized in cells now, too?" Samuel asked, expecting the worst.

"Oh no—most of them are not vitally interested in anything except their health."

"Curious—" Samuel murmured. "What are all these little cards you're working on?"

"I'm setting up a filing system for my sermons, with cross references. They showed us how in the seminary."

Samuel was prompted to say, "It's a pity they didn't give you more that was worth filing," but changed it to. "I see—" and left Dee Dee at his important chore.

Mr. Entwhistle was a bit irritable that night at dinner, when Isabel remarked on the fine impression Dee Dee had made at the Y.W.C.A. cell group on group dynamics.

"He's been in his office all afternoon making an impression on a swivel chair—working out a filing system for his sermons—all four of them," Samuel growled.

"I told you curates were not an unmixed blessing," reminded Isabel.

"I know," Samuel said accusingly. "But you didn't tell me in time."

He thought deeply for a moment. "How do you suppose he'll be when he's ordained priest?"

"You won't be able to say your service is your own," Isabel warned him.

Dee Dee was ordained priest in January. By February he had introduced certain changes in the parish tradition in the matter of the Holy Communion.

"Why were you facing the gas station during the prayer of humble access?" Samuel asked, having slid into the rear pew during a service one week-day morning.

"I was facing the ecclesiastical west," Dee Dee said proudly. "It's a very primitive tradition that ought to be recovered. It's the custom of the primitive Church of the southern Andalusians."

"Shades of Eustace," moaned Samuel to himself.

By March, Dee Dee fell in love with a girl in the altar guild who had a fine figure, and a record of incompetence in her high school studies. Samuel reasoned with Dee Dee in the name of the Church, the people, and the Continental Congress to be cautious in choosing a wife. Dee Dee was adamant. "She has a marvelous intuition and sensitivity," he maintained; and gave up The Young People's Fellowship. "They're not really vitally interested," he told Samuel. "Besides I think it's better for everyone to run their own activities."

In April Dee Dee came to see Mr. Entwhistle, looking particularly pale.

"I think I may be going to have a nervous breakdown," he said, with what Isabel called his "I'll labor night and day to be a pilgrim" look. "Do you think I should see an analyst?"

"What?" Samuel hollered, on the verge of tears.

"I mean I'm afraid I may get neurotic. You see, Sybil and I have broken our engagement. It's cut me up quite a lot."

"Who's Sybil?" asked Samuel, "that altar guild person? When did you get engaged?

"Last month. But last night she told me she's decided to marry Bert Oglethorpe." Dee Dee drew himself up heroically. "Bert works at Kroger's. The fish department."

"I think it may be all for the best," Samuel said soothingly. "Why don't you throw yourself into your work. Perhaps your grief will be—er—assuaged."

"I shall," Dee Dee said. "If it doesn't help—perhaps then I could see an analyst."

"I ought to see one myself," Samuel growled, after Dee Dee had closed the door.

For two weeks Dee Dee made considerable progress in his pastoral work. Then the reports ceased again.

"That boy," Samuel said to Isabel. "He's off again. Mooning over his card catalogue."

"Haven't you heard?" Isabel asked sweetly. "He has a new girl."

"Oh, good Lord," Samuel prayed. "Who?"

"Mrs. Vivaldi."

"Mrs.!"

"She's divorced. Very attractive. The poetic type. She's only twelve years older than Dee Dee."

Samuel bowed himself in his chair in silence.

During May he had daily consultations with Dee Dee, but apparently to no avail. The first of July brought news that Mrs. Vivaldi was moving to Los Angeles. Dee Dee paraded up and down the parish house corridors for three days with what Isabel called his "O God our help in ages past" look. But on the fourth day he began to plan for his vacation in the White Mountains. Samuel realized another crisis was past, but he had decided the time was later than Dee Dee thought. He wrote some eloquent letters.

"My dear," he told his understanding wife. "You win. There are some problems a rector has with him always—like the poor—and like Lord Nelson. But some can be overcome. And I think I've overcome Dee Dee. The bishop of Southwestern Utah needs a man. In fact he is much impressed by Dee Dee's qualifications. A few years in the mission field may make a man of him, and it will allow me to get back to my parish. Since November I've had but one pastoral case. Dee Dee Delancey Doolus!"

"It's very curious," Isabel said, putting the ham on the table, "why you can't find a curate that's pre-cooked."

Common Idolatries

BY

E. A. CALLANAN JR.

Lay Vicar of St. James' Church, New Castle, Indiana

A MINISTER is always trying to convey to his congregation a picture of a vision which he sees, however dimly and imperfectly. Many of his listeners are shocked and disturbed by this picture—to the point of being driven to seek escapes and hiding places from the minister's message; while others, catching a glimpse of something which fulfills a longing within them, are drawn to pursue the vision for themselves—sailing right past the minister's own imperfect picture to a clearer picture of their own.

To the first group a minister may appear to be a harsh, meddling radical; while to the second he may seem almost mediocre in his presentation of this tremendous message and vision.

What is this vision? It is the gospel, or "good news"; and this good news is that God not only exists, but that he is actively concerned for the welfare of mankind. God so loves us that he gave his only Son to die for us. Such love demands our response—though it is not forced upon us. We must, to call ourselves Christians, reply to his initiative action with the devotion of our lives.

However, we cannot follow God merely by wishing to do so. We must allow God to give us the strength. Does this sound somewhat absurd? —that God seeks man's devotion, and then is forced to supply the power for him to be devoted? We might even ask, "doesn't that make of man a mere puppet of God and not a worshipper?"

The answer lies in another fact of our human nature: besides being incapable of loving God without his help, we have a God-given ability to reject God and go our own way if we want to. This we inevitably seem to do. Our way, in this sense, is the way of complete reliance upon our own resources—or what we falsely call our resources, for we know that God created these. So, as we go our own way, instead of God's, it is as though we were trying to be self-sufficient centers, in short—gods, ourselves; thus perverting these God-given resources by turning them to our individual, private ends.

Therefore, to give up this pretense at "playing God," and to place our reliance upon God's strength, is far from a puppet-like action, it takes a strenuous denial of those aims and goals of ours, and a dying to our "selves" to live in God. For, when God asks for our worship, he is not merely asking us to direct our powers to what we think is his work. Far from it. God requires something far more radical, and far more humiliating: He demands that we throw away all self-possessiveness, all attempts to control our lives, all attempts to manipulate his resources as though they were our own, and to cast ourselves empty and lifeless at his feet. Truly a humiliating and painful prospect!

But it is then, and only then, that God can and will use us as his tools. Then, and only then are we useful for his purpose exclusively. Still more essentially, then, and only then will we be given real strength—strength that cannot be overcome nor denied, since it comes from God, and is used for God.

False Gods

THE world at large does not recognize the leadership of God. One element of this group believes in a god which is a projection of its own dreams and desires. This god is thought of by its followers more as principle than a person. And it can only dimly influence, if at all, the affairs of men in this world. It is up to man, by his own efforts, this religion believes, to work out his own problems, his own salvation. Mankind must, as the saying goes, stand on his own two feet. There is nothing humiliating about this religion. It is very dignified. There is no cross, no shame, and no divine love. God cannot be called upon, because he is not allowed to "interfere with nature," say the proponents of this kind of religion.

Another element in the non-Christian world appears to be just the opposite of this first group. They rely heavily upon what they call their god. But, in reality, these are like the other, for they, like the others, are calling religion what is merely a projection of their own selves and their own desires for the world. This element sees God as a magician, who turns their luck, cures every ill, safeguards their financial future, and so on. This god is a performing genie, who, when the proper bottle is rubbed in the proper way, is forced to appear to do the bidding of its master. Such a god is, of course, a mockery; whose cultus is superstition, magic, and hollow selfishness.

It is surprising how widespread these two idolatries have become in these days of threat and insecurity. Oddly enough, we find both of them being followed by people who otherwise are members of Christian Churches— of all denominations. Still more oddly, we can find examples of people who manage, somewhat illogically perhaps, to combine both of them into one supreme private idolatry.

Let us take the case of Warden Jones. Warden Jones describes his church as "a good thing for the community," somewhat in the same way he would describe a real-estate improvement. He might also go on to say that his church represents "a good bulwark against the communist menace," very much like he would characterize the FBI. In both of these phrases, Warden Jones' church, and hence his god, becomes means for ends which Warden Jones thinks are valuable—meaning, of course, valuable to him. This is the magical, or performing genie type of cult.

But Jones would go even further; he would tell you, if you pressed him, that he, himself, doesn't take this religion business too seriously. "It's all very well to talk about supernatural powers," we can hear him say, "but when it comes to the concrete issues of life, you can't expect God to be handing out things that you are supposed to be working for." Warden Jones has learned to stand on his own two feet. He considers asking God for help as maudlin nonsense. Indeed, the thought of God tampering with Warden Jones' world would be regarded as a serious outrage—worthy of a Congressional investigation! Thus Jones combines conveniently the magical and the laisse faire type of gods into a protective system for his own selfish ends.

Now, those who share one or the other, (or, perhaps, both), of Warden Jones' religions are in really bad shape when it comes to facing the important issues which Christianity is built upon. How, for instance, would such people go about forming a church following their assumptions about religion? They would be forced to have in this so-called church of theirs only people who agreed essentially with their personal aims in life, their platform. Obviously their platform cannot be greater or better than they are themselves; and so, sooner or later, various elements will begin to demand more attention for this or that pet project, as this kind of a church goes on. Ultimately, of course, there are going to be as many pet projects as there are people. Result: chaos; or, to use a Biblical phrase: Hell. Complete selfishness has to lead to complete division, and complete division, where man is utterly separated from his fellow man, (and, naturally, from God), means Hell.

The purpose of presenting this positive and negative picture of the Christian community and its problems, is that we must carefully and prayerfully remind ourselves that our purpose . . . our end . . . our goal is the worship and service of God Almighty—on his terms, and with reliance upon his strength only.

The Living Liturgy

MASSEY H. SHEPHERD JR.

Morning Prayer: An Outline

RECENTLY my friend Roger Blanchard of the College Work Division of our National Council asked me to write a brief introduction to Morning Prayer, to be included in the new edition of Venite Adoremus. This is a publication of representative offices of worship of the various Christian churches, issued by the World Student Christian Federation. I am passing it along to Witness readers, who might find it of some use as an outline for teaching the content and rationale of this Prayer Book office to lay groups. Incidentally, it might contain some supplementary suggestions for use with the excellent film strip on Morning Prayer put forth over a year ago by the Evangelical Education Society. Here it is:

The Office of Daily Morning Prayer has been one of the most distinctive and popular services of the Book of Common Prayer since the first edition of 1549. It was constructed out of materials from three offices of the medieval Breviary —Matins (or Nocturns), Lauds, and Prime—and conformed to the basic structure of these services: psalmody, Scripture reading with canticles of praise, and prayers. The 1552 Prayer Book added a penitential introduction, and the 1662 Book appended the prayers and thanksgivings after the Collect for Grace. In fundamental substance, however, the Office represents the daily praise and supplication of the liturgy of Christendom for over a thousand years.

The most notable characteristic of the service is its Biblical content. Even those portions not directly taken from the Scriptures, such as the hymn Te Deum, the Creed, and the prayers, are replete with quotations from and allusions to passages of both the Old and the New Testaments. By means of a fixed table of psalms and lessons for Morning Prayer (and its companion service of Evening Prayer), it is so arranged that in the course of a year almost the entire Bible is read. Special attention is given to the appropriateness of the appointed lessons to the seasons and festivals of the Christian Year. Thus the whole record of God's mighty acts for man's redemption as they are set forth in Scripture, from the Creation of the world to the Final Advent of our Lord at the end of time, are systematically recalled to the edification of the congregation and set within a framework of daily praise and adoration.

Although the service is essentially Biblical, it is also representative of the various ages of the Church's life of corporate prayer since New Testament times. The Creed, a profession of faith stemming from the second century, is a daily renewal of our baptismal vows. The Gloria Patri and the Te Deum are the finest flowers of Christian hymnody from the age of the great fourth and fifth century fathers who formulated the ecumenical standards of the Church's faith. The invariable Collects for Peace and Grace recall the Dark Ages of barbarian invasion and settlement in Western Europe when the Church's sole defense lay in the protection of Almighty God. The variable antiphons used with the psalm Venite are a reminder of the rich splendor of medieval worship, so elaborate in its poetic symbolism drawn from the Christian Year and the lives of the saints. The General Confession breathes the Scriptural piety of the Protestant Reformers, the Prayer for All Conditions of Men reflects the force of Christian missions and the problems of Christian unity in the modern era, while the alternative prayer for the President is a twentieth century composition peculiarly relevant to the political crises of our own present day and age.

There is a fine balance in the Office of the various elements which make up a complete liturgy of corporate worship: penitence and confession of sin, praise and thanksgiving, revelation of God's will and purpose, and petition and intercession for all our human needs, both material and spiritual. For this reason the service has not only fulfilled its original intent of being a daily offering of worship, whether in public assembly or private devotion; but in many Anglican parishes it serves the people as the principal means of corporate worship on Sundays when the Holy Communion is not celebrated as the main service. On such occasions the Office is customarily supplemented with hymns, a sermon, and an offering, with a concluding Blessing.

A Thanksgiving List

BY

WILLIAM P. BARNDS

Rector of St. Matthew's, Lincoln

SOON Thanksgiving will be here and for Christians it should be more than just a day to see a football game, go on a trip, or eat turkey. The words "think" and "thank" are related, and thanksgiving should be a time when we really stop to think and thinking, we are led to be thankful. God is the author of all good gifts, and to him we offer our thanks. This day is therefore a religious day, as well as one for social pleasure. Family dinners, parties, sports events should not keep us from God's house on Thanksgiving.

The Rev. H. Kano, a Japanese clergyman, who ministers to the Japanese in Nebraska, recently put forth a list of God's gifts in alphabetical order. For example, under A he lists "America," "analytical geometry," and "apples." Under B he puts "Bishop Brinker," "books" and "baseball." Under R he has "ricecake"; and T "truth" and "turkey."

Why not follow this example, as a devotional exercise, this Thanksgiving? Make up your own list, and after each letter of the alphabet, write down some thing for which you are thankful, beginning with that letter. This will take a little thought, but thinking and thanking are kin to each other, and when we think we are apt to be thankful and when we are thankful we are apt to be thoughtful. On my list, for example, are "Aeschylus," "Baptism," "Children," "Dante," "Eternal life," "Fun." So get out your paper and pencil, and start on your own list. You will enjoy making it!

PHILIP H. STEINMETZ

Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

DR. BURNETT has a hen which has brooded some duck eggs and now patiently looks out for the thriving ducklings. These youngsters are no blood relation to her, yet she treats them as her own. No matter what strange conduct they manifest, she continues to watch over them.

There is a message here for us. God treats us with concern for our best whatever our conduct. There is not anger but sorrow when we fail to trust him.

"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered the children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not."

Think of God brooding over the world today as men move about seeking safety in hoarded food, stock-piled munitions, trained killers, without confidence in his power or realization of his concern for them. Can he make us turn and find our true security in his care? Can we who have been marked with the cross find the way to show the power of that cross to turn death into victory?

Think of God brooding, and then turn in under the shadow of his wings. Spend time each day reaching for the warmth of his love in prayer and taking to him the wounds and fears in your heart and you will find rest and strength for his service.

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

St. Ambrose on the Sacraments and On the Mysteries. Translated by T. Thompson. Macmillan. $2.50.

This translation first appeared in 1919, as one of the S. P. C. K. Series, and the original was described as by "an unknown author." Continued study has convinced the editor, Dr. Srawley, that the work on the Sacraments is an authentic treatise by St. Ambrose. The works are interesting examples of patristic exegesis, and also contain many interesting sidelights on the manner of celebrating and administering the church's sacraments in the days of the Bishop of Milan.—F.C.G.

British Humanitarianism. Essays honoring Frank J. Klingberg. Ed. by Samuel C. McCulloch. Philadelphia. Church Hist. Soc. $4.00.

The character of Frank J. Klingberg, an outstanding layman of the Church and a consecrated teacher, shines through the essays of this work written by former graduate students of the Department of History of the University of California at Los Angeles. It is noteworthy that after thirty-three years at that University, the graduate historians who have passed under his influence in the department which he was largely instrumental in building, have produced in his honor a book concerned with Christianity, and primarily with Christian Missions. During the past ten years Dr. Klingberg has been a frequent contributor to the Historical Magazine of the Episcopal Church and has made a real contribution to the early history of the American Church in his Anglican Humanitarianism in Colonial New York, published in 1940 by the Church Historical Society.

Aside from the factual value of the volume, its greatest interest lies in the question which it raises, "Is humanitarianism the other side of humanism, or is it a necessary resultant of missionary activity?" The question is not definitely answered for the influence of James Mill and Jeremy Bentham is noted alongside the positive contributions of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. As is to be expected in a historical volume of this sort, the length of the essay often limits the author to a recital of facts without sufficient interpretation of the facts. The articles concerning the work of the S. P. G. are the most interesting to the average church reader, while the essay on Thomas Bradbury Chandler, the leader of the Tractist Controversies in New York, is probably the best review of the life and activities of the 18th century New Jersey clergyman which is to be found.—Sydney Temple.

A Primer of Christianity. I, The Beginning of the Gospel, by T. W. Manson. Oxford University Press. $1.50. II, The Furtherance of the Gospel, by R. W. Moore. $1.75. III, The Truth of the Gospel, by G. B. Caird. $1.75.

This excellent little trilogy is meant for beginners. The first volume contains a good introductory chapter, and then a fresh translation of the Gospel of Mark, with brief introductory notes, section by section, and some additional material from the other gospels. Volume II is a magnificent history of the Christian Church in 160 pages! Volume III is a survey of Christian doctrine from a modern critical point of view, liberal in outlook (see page 100, on the Virgin Birth), and social in its outlook (see the last chapter).—F.C.G.

An Ideal Christmas Gift for Your Family ---

THE CHRISTIAN YEAR AND CHURCH KALENDAR
1951

75th Year of Publication

Here is the Kalendar which serves you in a very special way. It is both informative and inspiring since it contains many of the important aspects of correct ritual. On the many occasions when you wish to verify your liturgical correctness as to ritual or date this Kalendar is your source. We suggest two copies, one for the home and the other for the Church so that you will be certain to have one handy when a question arises. This is the most complete and useful Kalendar published since it contains material not available in any one other publication.

The type is clear and easily read, the arrangement is practical and attractive, while the binding and red cord for hanging permits a convenient change from week to week. Between the red and gold covers you will find:

CHURCH CALENDAR
CHURCH COLORS
SAINTS' DAYS
ALTAR LINEN
SUGGESTED HYMNS
CHURCH HOLY DAYS
CHURCH DICTIONARY
ALTAR SOCIETY NOTES
SUGGESTIONS FOR SERVERS
MORNING AND EVENING LECTIONARY
RULES FOR SACRISTANS
VESTMENTS, THEIR COLOR, CARE AND USE
DUTIES OF WARDENS AND VESTRYMEN

BETTER VALUE THAN EVER

In order that this Kalendar could have wider distribution and therefore be a greater help to more people, we have reduced the price to $1.00 from $1.50. It has the same contents carefully revised but on a slightly smaller page giving all the above information in a very clear and attractive form.

Order from your bookseller or direct from the publishers.

$1.00 each —— $1.10 postpaid

NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

PRESBYTERIAN PROGRAM FOR PUERTO RICANS

Plans for economic, educational and social service aid to Puerto Ricans in New York, were announced by Presbyterian Labor Temple. The Rev. Richard E. Evans, minister, said the program is "designed to help these new neighbors of ours secure adequate employment, find decent housing, and obtain an effective command of the English language.

"Now is the time," he said, "we must express in concrete and specific ways our strong faith in the fine qualities of our good neighbors from Puerto Rico, who have come to us recently in such great numbers, and who need our understanding and good will as they face the difficult task of adjusting themselves to new surroundings."

Mr. Evans said he did not "condone in the least" recent acts of terrorism by Puerto Rican nationalists, but added, "we must be very sure that we do not make the great majority of these fine people from Puerto Rico the victims of our resentment over the acts of a few desperate men."

Among the projects to be inaugurated immediately are a nursery school for children of working mothers, classes in English for children and adults, an employment agency, a housing bureau, and recreational activities for young people.

CHRISTIAN LAWYERS MEET CLERGY

Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson and Associate Justice Tom Clark were among Washington lawyers to attend a luncheon for lawyers who are professed Christians, held in connection with the Protestant preaching mission. There were about 1,000 present to hear Methodist Ralph W. Sockman of New York tell them that "the pulpit is not adequate for a world like ours. We simply have got to get the laity as an effective witness." Lawyers, he told them, can serve the Christian cause by "endeavoring to bring our old moral commandments up to our new social trends. The ten commandments and the sermon on the mount are eternally true but their application must be projected into our complex living in order to sting the consciousness of men awake."

FIRST NEGRO ADDRESSES N. C. DISCIPLES

For the first time in the 106-year history of the North Carolina state convention of Disciples, a Negro addressed the group at its annual sessions. He was the Rev. C. L. Parks, director of the Goldsboro Christian Institute, Goldsboro, N. C. Mr. Parks told the convention that, while foreign missions are important, more missionary work should be done in this country as well. He said there was no need "to go to Japan or the Belgian Congo to find people who need to be helped. Those people can be found right here in eastern North Carolina."

During the sessions, the delegates adopted a resolution expressing opposition to the establishment of diplomatic relations with the Vatican through either an official U. S. ambassador or a Presidential representative.

BISHOP OXNAM WANTS DECLARATION

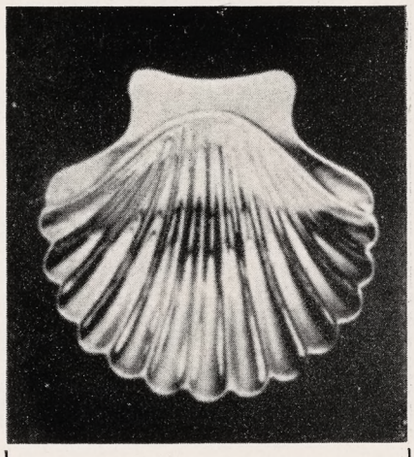
Bishop Oxnam, Methodist, told 5,000 attending a Reformation day rally in Trenton, N. J., that religious tension throughout the world would end if the Pope saw to it that others have the religious freedom that Roman Catholics ask for themselves. He called for the end of "political, social and religious disabilities suffered by Protestants in Spain, Italy, Latin American countries" and elsewhere. He also assailed efforts to obtain public funds for parochial schools.

INDIANAPOLIS WANTS NATIONAL COUNCIL

Indianapolis has put in a bid to be the "capital" of American Protestantism by inviting the National Council of Churches, to come into being official at Cleveland, Nov. 28-Dec. 3, to make its headquarters there. Other cities expected to make bids are New York, Cleveland, Chicago, St. Louis, Columbus.

HUNDRED MILLION FOR CHURCHES

More than $100,000,000 in construction work will be under way for churches of the Southern Baptists before the end of this year, according to W. A. Hareel, secretary of the denomination's department of architecture. In an address in Fort Worth, Texas, he called attention to the trend toward functional building, with the elimination of trim and ornamentation traditional in churches.



RELIEF SHIPMENTS DROP DRASTICALLY

The Brethren service center at New Windos, Md., reports that the amount of relief materials contributed by churches for relief overseas had dropped to less than 5% of the post-war peak volume. Officials stress the need for a new interdenominational appeal since there is still great need in Europe.

CHURCHES MAP SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS

Representatives of a score of Protestant denominations met in Cincinnati over the week-end of October 29 to plan the next steps in the uniform lesson series, sponsored by the International Council of Religious Education. Outlines worked out by the committee are developed by committees of some 80 denominations and made to conform as completed lessons to the particular denominational viewpoints.

NEWS OF CHURCHES OVERSEAS

NEW INTERPRETATIONS OF THE BIBLE

Officials in Czechoslovakia are reported to be reinterpreting parts of the Bible in order to lessen the resistance to the government's collectivist and cooperative farm programs. One official, a Catholic, told a group of farmers and miners that their "opinion on the property of agricultural land is not at all Christian, but is entirely pagan," adding that "property rights, according to Christian moral laws should not be absolute rights. Property must serve the welfare of the collective and the individual. Private property, according to Catholic laws, can be expropriated if it helps the common welfare.—The cooperative system is basically a Christian theory because it prompts and teaches Christian love of neighbor. You will therefore serve your own religion and God if you help the government in building the collective farms, the collective cow sheds, the collective pig sties, and so on."

HROMADKA CONDEMNS POLICY IN ASIA

The Rev. Joseph Hromadka, noted Protestant of Prague, has written to the president of the UN Security Council charging that U. S. policy in Asia is "compromising the cause of Christianity." Local papers quote him as declaring that he has heard "again and again about the irrepressible opposition of Asian nations to the colonial exploitation and political subordination imposed by western civilized nations calling themselves Christians." On the matter of Korea he wrote: "I don't know all the details of the events which happened since the end of June, but I cannot understand why the Security Council should have succumbed to the American demand for police action against North Korea without the consent and cooperation of Korea's neighbors."

Hromadka, once a professor at Princeton, was an outstanding leader at the Amsterdam assembly of the World Council of Churches.

ASSUMPTION DOGMA DENOUNCED

Leaders of Protestant Churches in England and Europe generally have made sharp verbal and written attacks against the Pope's proclamation of the assumption dogma of the Virgin Mary. Anglicans, Orthodox, Lutherans, Dutch Reformed, all echo the statement of Lutheran Bishop Gerhard May of Vienna, who declared that "for the sake of biblical truth and for the sake of our loyalty to it, we have to say a clear 'No' to this."

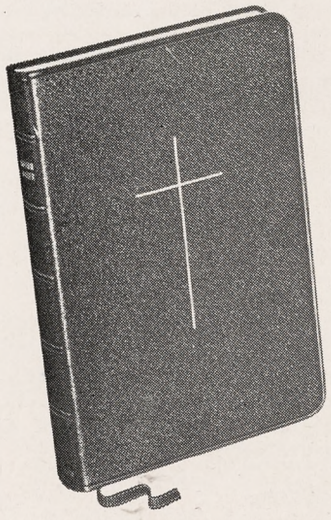
HEBREW CHRISTIANS IN ISRAEL

A Hebrew Christian settlement is being established near Tel Aviv, the funds being provided by the U. S. Southern Baptists. An advance group, consisting mainly of Jews converted to Christianity, have arrived, led by Rev. R. L. Lindsay, representative of the foreign mission board.

URGES NATIONS SURRENDER PARTS OF SOVEREIGNTY

Nations commit no moral wrong by surrendering part of their sovereign power in the cause of peace, Archdeacon H. O. Gibbs-Smith of London, asserted in a sermon at St. Paul's Cathedral. Speaking at a United Nations service, the archdeacon said, "the best patriots in our country today are those who would support the surrender of some measure of national sovereignty in order to deliver their beloved country from the nightmare possibility of a third world war."

The price we may have to pay for a fundamental international settlement and a durable peace, he said, could not be too high unless it be the sacrifice of a primary Christian principle.



GERMAN CHURCHMEN CONSIDER REMILITARIZATION

Leaders of Evangelical churches in both eastern and western Germany are meeting tomorrow, Nov. 17, to discuss the rearming of the country. A number, including Pastor Niemoeller, have vigorously denounced remilitarization, stating that former Nazi generals are being put back in power.

ANGLO-CATHOLICS MEET WITH UNITAS

Three representatives of the Anglo-Catholic of England conferred in Rome with officials of Unitas, a Jesuit sponsored movement organized in 1946 to promote unity of all Christians. Two of the Britishers were later received in special audience by the Pope, who imparted his apostolic blessing.

BACKFIRE

Readers are encouraged to comment on editorials, articles and news. Since space is limited we ask that letters be brief. We reserve the right to abstract and to print only those we consider important

ROBERT N. STRETCH
Chaplain at U. S. Naval Academy

I have just been reading, with the usual interest and enjoyment, the latest issue of The Witness. I must question one of your statements.

In the otherwise excellent editorial, "Religion in Schools," you state, "When the founding fathers ruled against the establishment of any religion, they had in mind the setting up of any one Church as the official, national Church over against all the others." Has the writer read R. Freeman Butts' book, "The American Tradition in Religion and Education?" It seems to me that his chapter 2, what "Establishment of Religion" meant in Colonial America, establishes pretty clearly that Madison and his associates in the preparing of the first amendment had in mind preventing "multiple establishment" such as then existed in many of the colonies and new states, i.e., the support out of tax funds of churches, no matter how many.

This point seems to me important. I have heard of no serious attempts to create an established Church in the United States at the present time, but there are very serious attempts to secure tax money for the support of religious schools, hospitals, orphanages, etc. That seems to be a very live and vital issue, whatever side one may take on it.

CHARLES M. BRANDON
Rector, St. John's, Porterville, Cal.

Your editorial "For Whom the Bell Tolls" in the 2 November issue contains the very reasons why I did not wax even warm over the Crusade for Freedom and why I did not sign the scroll. More power to you and continue to put first things first.

RAYMOND K. RIEBS
Rector of St. Paul's, Dayton, O.

A man named Robert Westfall has been working on clergy of the Church from Florida to California. He has a wife and a year old baby boy. His story is that as an ex-convict he is attempting to go straight but that he has had unfortunate experiences with the police who have picked him up on various pretexts, given him a going-over and then ordered him out of town. He is unable to tell the truth, and yet has a most convincing air about him. I have had word from various clergy that they have given him substantial sums of money only to have him disappear and turn up some place else with the same story. Be on your lookout for him. When I last heard of him he was in California.

ALEXANDER F. GILMAN
Layman of Chicago

Mr. H. J. Mainwaring (Witness, Sept. 28) is reading into the Book of Common Prayer some things that are not there. It is true that the creed does say "I believe in the holy Catholic Church" or "One Catholic and Apostolic Church," but that is not saying that the Protestant Episcopal Church is that Church any more than that the Roman Catholic Church is that Church. The holy Catholic Church is an ideal to which all Christians hope one day to attain.

We are Protestant because we have been ex-communicated by the Church of Rome and it does not make a bit of difference what we think about it. I am proud that the Protestant Episcopal Church is honest enough to proclaim to all the world that it has divorced itself from some of the evils of Rome (commonly called Catholic) and that it isn't pussy-footing around pretending to be something it is not.

A BISHOP OF THE GREAT PLAINS

Publication No. 29
Handsomely printed, and illustrated, clothbound
$3.00

BY GEORGE ALLEN BEECHER

Bishop of Western Nebraska

1910 - 1943

BISHOP BEECHER is one of Nebraska's "First Citizens." His entire ministry of 51 years was spent within the boundaries of the State of Nebraska—a unique record. He was the pastor to a generation whose manner of life is largely unknown to the present generation, but ruggedly interesting. He was the friend of many people, some famous such as Buffalo Bill and Willa Cather, but all interesting. The West of the pioneer comes alive again.

EPISCOPAL GIANTS

(A REVIEW)

"Bishop George Allen Beecher of Western Nebraska was one of the episcopal giants of the generation just behind us (he retired in 1943; was consecrated in 1910). His story is told autobiographically in A Bishop of the Great Plains (Church Historical Society, Philadelphia, 1950. $3.) Here is a man who is pleasingly unconscious of his greatness. Not all great bishops and other ecclesiastics are so, judging from their autobiographies. Bishop Beecher was a missionary of apostolic stature, and a delightful person as well. There is a frank, wide-open humor in him that well befits a bishop of the wide-open spaces. Churchmen of Nebraska will greatly relish this book; but I hope it will find a wide non-Nebraskan reading public as well.

Your reviewer, himself a Westerner, found himself musing throughout the book: if the Episcopal Church in the West had more men of the Beecher type in its ministry, it would not be doomed to the perpetual role of ecclesiastical weak sister in this area. Ours has been—and is—too exclusively a metropolitan and Eastern Church, and there is no real excuse for it. I am naive enough to imagine that I know the sovereign cure: more Beechers.

Another episcopal giant, of a very different diocese and with a very different but perhaps equally difficult row to hoe, was Arthur Foley Winnington-Ingram, Bishop of London 1901-1939. His story is admirably told by S. C. Carpenter in Winnington-Ingram (Oxford Press, 1950. $3.50). I have spoken of differences between Western Nebraska and London as dioceses. These are of course obvious. But Winnington-Ingram and Beecher, as apostolic men, went about their episcopal tasks in essentially the same manner, as evangelists. Both men had the common touch; both had a passion for souls, both were true fathers in God to those of this fold and ambassadors of Christ to those not of this fold. Neither was prelatical or pontifical in manner; each was every inch a bishop of the Church of God.

In reading either of these books one can readily see why its subject was loved and revered. Both are richly worth reading."

—Dr. Carroll Simcox in THE LIVING CHURCH.

Dr. Hewitt B. Vinnedge, in PARSONS, a Magazine for the Clergy of the Episcopal Church, writes:
"One hopes that this autobiography will be widely read throughout the Church. It brings back the power and glory of a missionary-mindedness that has greatly dimmed in the American Church. Here is Bishop Beecher's own account of the romantic days of his priesthood in the Great Plains, done in his own inimitable manner of the story-teller . . ."

STORY OF THE WEEK

Saint Mark's, San Antonio, Has Centennial Celebration

The Present Parish Program Demonstrates Future Will Live Up to Past

★ During her history Saint Mark's Church, San Antonio, has contributed nineteen clergy from the ranks of her laymen to the life of the Episcopal Church in this country and fifteen of them are still in the active ministry.

Of her rectors, seven of them have become bishops in the Church and include the late Philip Cook, formerly Bishop of Delaware; the late W. Bertrand Stevens, former Bishop of Los Angeles; the Rt. Rev. S. Arthur Huston, retired Bishop of Olympia; the Rt. Rev. Arthur R. McKinstry, present Bishop of Delaware; the Rt. Rev. Everett Holland Jones, Bishop of West Texas; the Rt. Rev. Thomas H. Wright, Bishop of East Carolina; and the Rt. Rev. J. Wilson Hunter, present Bishop of the Missionary District of Wyoming. The Rt. Rev. Harry T. Moore, retired Bishop of Dallas, is a former assistant at Saint Mark's and the Rt. Rev Frank Juhan, Bishop of Florida, grew up in Saint Mark's. This makes a contribution of nine bishops from Saint Mark's to the life of the national Church.

We think that Bishop Everett Jones is the only bishop in the Church to have the distinction of having been baptized, confirmed, ordained, married, and consecrated a bishop and having served as rector in the same parish. Saint Mark's has been his church home since the beginning of his religious life and he is today the Bishop of the diocese of which this parish is a member.

In other ways, too, Saint Mark's Church has left its mark on the life of the Church. During the time of World War II an extremely active Episcopal Club for armed forces personnel was maintained at Saint Mark's day and night and over seventy thousand Sunday dinners were served to military personnel in the Parish House. This club, under the direction of a full time manager, met the social and religious needs of thousands of Episcopal armed forces personnel who were away from home and made the Church a very real part of their lives during the war years. Because of the fact that Saint Mark's is located in San Antonio, the largest military installation in the United States, people from all over the country passed through her doors Sunday after Sunday and came to know Saint Mark's as a tie with the church of their respective homes and came to love it deeply.

St. Mark's Has Strong Program Of Christian Education

★ The rector, wardens and vestry of Saint Mark's Church, San Antonio, are keenly aware of the need for a stronger program in the Episcopal Church for the Christian education of both young and old and are doing everything they can to see that the religious education program of their parish is strengthened.

During this past summer a group of experts consisting of a specialist in child guidance, a professor of journalism, several professional school teachers, parents and clergy assembled once a week at Saint Mark's to go through all of the courses recommended by the interim curriculum guide of the department of Christian education of the National Council.

Various persons took the materials home after each week's discussion and brought them back the following week with their evaluation and after the entire process had been finished, the new interim curriculum, set up with what the board thought was the best materials suggested for each grade, was put completely into use in the Saint Mark's Church School.

Teachers of each individual grade and department met throughout the month of August and early September in small groups to consider the new material which would be used by their particular grades this year and were instructed in its use and were acquainted with what the curriculum committee hoped to accomplish through the presentation of the course.

Last year an extensive course was carried out for young parents in an attempt to give them answers to the questions about religion that young children frequently ask and which baffle parents. Over eighty parents attended this course and a request came for a new course to be given this year. This course is under the leadership of Dr. James MacKay, a well-known expert in child guidance and child psychology. He interprets to the parents the religious needs of the children and how they can hope to meet them at home.

Knowing the important part that parents play in the religious education of children, monthly meetings were scheduled last year with the parents of certain groups in order to make them more familiar with the materials taught their children and to get them to use the home aids in extending what their children might learn through the course.

In order to make it possible for parents of small children to attend classes and to attend church, an air-conditioned nursery, with a trained nurse in charge, was instituted at Saint Mark's two years ago and has been an extremely successful project. It is the intention of Saint Mark's Church to provide facilities for the care and nurture of every child from two months to ripe old age. Regular monthly mailings are sent to parents of small children too young to attend church school with materials by which they may train themselves to train their children in religious ways. Our organized grades extend from the two year old tots through junior, senior high school and on through the adult Bible class which meets every Sunday throughout the year under the able leadership of Mrs. A. J. Robinson, head of the department of journalism at Trinity University in San Antonio.

A new program has been instituted this year whereby the entire sixth grade, consisting of about forty pupils, is meeting each Sunday in the Bethlehem Chapel for a service which is explained as it goes along and a half-hour of confirmation instructions. All of the services of the Prayer Book will be thus treated and the young people will receive an entire year of confirmation instruction under the clergy of the church in this way.

This wide program of Christian education, coordinated with the youth activities and the athletic program, have brought an enrollment of well over eight hundred pupils and teachers to Saint Mark's Church School.

St. Mark's Has Many Activities For The Young People

★ Saint Mark's Church has planned its youth activities in order to meet the needs of as many young people as possible. It tries to take care of some activity for young people in every age group and for both the sexes. For the Children's Chapel, where services are held each Sunday for children in grades one through five, a children's choir is completely organized with its own director and its own crucifers, flag bearers and servers. They have their own rehearsals and their own vestments and completely handle the service in the Children's Chapel every Sunday morning under the able direction of Mr. Tom Gish, superintendent of the Church School and for many years an outstanding lay reader in the diocese of West Texas.

There is also a Junior Altar Guild made up of thirty-four members of this elementary Church School group who are responsible for the preparation of the altar and arrangement of flowers for the Sunday services in the Chapel. This group is sponsored and operated by an advisory board of mothers for the group and is under the lead-

STUDENT CENTER DEDICATED

★ Canterbury House, student center at the University of Florida, was dedicated on November 16th, with church people of both the Florida dioceses joining for the ceremony. Bishop Juhan of Florida was the celebrant, assisted by Bishop Louttit of South Florida, and Bishop West, coadjutor of the northern diocese.

ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL EXPANDS

★ When the Rev. William Augustus Muhlenberg set aside $30 from the offering in the Church of the Holy Communion, N. Y., on St. Luke's Day, October 18, 1846, as the beginning of a St. Luke's Hospital which he envisioned, someone inquired scornfully: "Pray, when do you expect to build your hospital?"

"Never, if I do not make a beginning," Muhlenberg replied. His vision and courage launched forth 100 years of service to sick people in New York. This has included distinguished service to our armed forces in three wars and pioneer work in the establishment of its nursing school.

A similar act of faith—faith in the future and faith in their friends—was expressed last week by the board of managers of this institution. St. Luke's Hospital, this year celebrating the centennial of its founding, is about to embark upon a building program which will include civilian defense facilities, as well as additional hospital space. Excavation work is to begin at an early date into the bedrock which lies a few feet beneath the surface of the lot to the west of the present hospital. The three million dollars contributed for building purposes which the board has in hand will only be sufficient for the basement and two stories. They believe, however, that they will be able to finish the contemplated ten-story structure through the generous support of friends.

SCHOLARSHIP OFFERED BY BARD COLLEGE

★ A scholarship for students planning to prepare for the ministry of the Episcopal Church will be offered by Bard College this coming year, President James H. Case Jr., has announced. Given by the Bard-St. Stephen's alumni association, the new award is named in honor of Bishop George F. Seymour, the first head of the college.

Seymour, a graduate of Columbia College in 1850, was a leading churchman during the latter part of the 19th century. He received his first cure at Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y., on the estate of John Bard, where he organized a church and tutored students for the seminary. As a direct outcome of his activities he was instrumental in founding St. Stephen's (now Bard) College in 1860 and became its first warden. He later was professor of ecclesiastical history and dean at General Seminary. In 1877 he was elected Bishop of Springfield (Illinois) where he served until his death in 1906.

BISHOP HINES LEADS QUIET MORNING

★ Bishop Hines, coadjutor of Texas, is to lead a quiet morning for the altar guild of Christ Church Cathedral, Houston, November 30.

CHARLES LAUGHTON AIDS CHURCH

★ Charles Laughton of movie fame visited Haddon Heights, N. J. on November 14 on behalf of St. Mary's Church. His only props were an armful of books, but for two hours he kept the crowd entertained as he dramatized passages from the Bible, excerpts from movies, and other sources. Money raised by the event, held in a theatre seating 1,500, is to be used for improvements being made at the church.

NOTABLE GROUP attended the dinner that marked the centennial of St. Mark's. At the speakers table, left to right: Rev. Samuel O. Capers, rector of Christ Church; Mrs. F. M. Gillespie; Bishop Hunter of Wyoming; Mrs. Arthur McKinstry; Bishop Huston, retired of Olympia; Mrs. W. Bertrand Stevens, widow of the late Bishop of Los Angeles; Bishop Jones of West Texas; Rev. Harold C. Gosnell, rector of St. Mark's; Mrs. Huston; Bishop Wright of East Carolina; Mrs. Jones; Bishop McKinstry of Delaware. All the Bishops are former rectors of St. Mark's ership of Mrs. Archie S. Brown Jr. A number of these young girls report to the Parish House each Saturday morning to do their work and are doing a beautiful job.

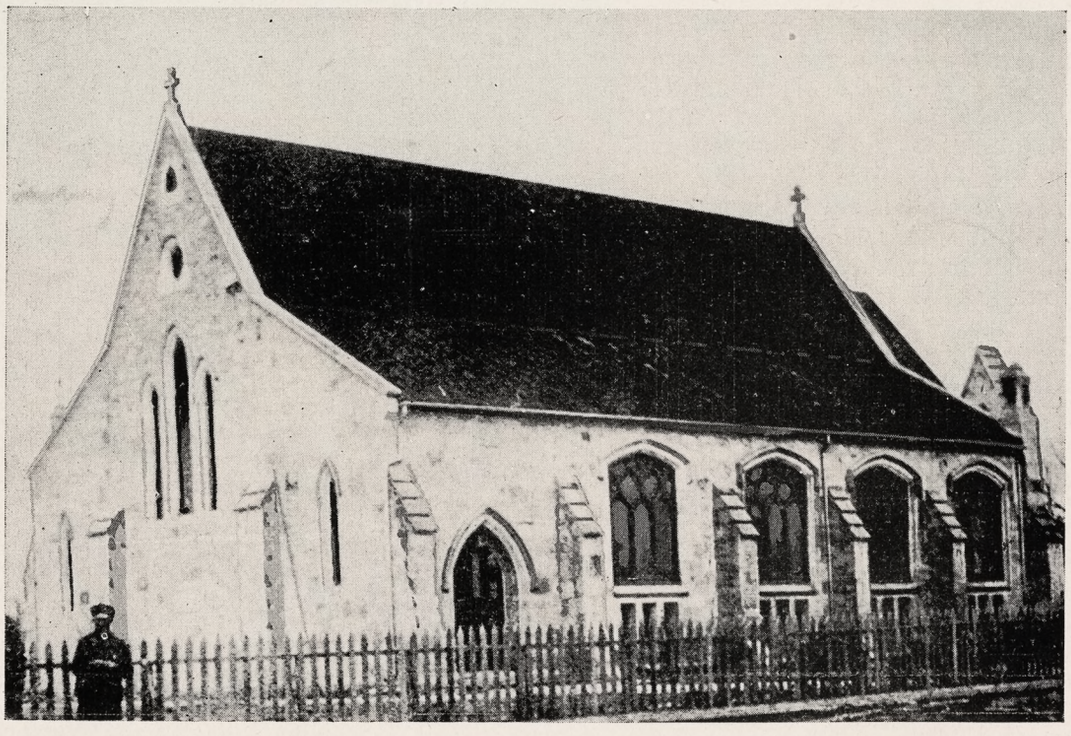
The Girls' Service Guild, which is composed of Junior and Senior High School girls, do a similar work for the Kindergarten altars and also help throughout the year with such things as preparation for Church School parties at Christmas, Thanksgiving and Easter, and in any other special events which happen during the course of the Church School year. This group operates under its own officers and Miss Elaine Aniol is the president of it.

There are approximately fifty boys in the Bishop's Service Guild which is the acolytes group at Saint Mark's. These boys are regularly scheduled for all the services and operate with their own officers and adult sponsor. They provide the crucifers, flag bearers, acolytes and servers for all the services of the church and have a regular monthly breakfast meeting and augment this with several dinner meetings during the year at which time they have instruction for the newer members and refresher courses for the older members. Mr. Billy Clegg is the lay sponsor and Rev. Adolph Wm. Kahl, assistant rector at Saint Mark's, is the clergy sponsor.



There are four organized youth groups operating regularly every Sunday in the parish. The youngest of these is the Junior High School group of boys and girls who meet every Sunday afternoon for a regular program and for recreation and refreshments. They are supervised by Miss Dorothy Schemmer, the parish director of Christian Education, and have their own officers.

The Young People of Saint Mark's is the Senior High School youth group of the parish and have been an extremely active group over a period of years. During the regular season they have been following "Plan," the suggested program put out by the Church's Youth Division, and have been having a serious program of study and discussion concerning the meaning and teachings of the Church and its program. This is followed with a supper and with a period of recreation.

Every Sunday evening at five o'clock the Young People of Saint Mark's and the Junior High School group join together for a service of Evening Prayer in the Bethlehem Chapel at which members of both groups participate in the reading of the service. The Senior High group is under the sponsorship of the rector of the parish.

The Canterbury Club for the four colleges and universities of the city, Trinity University, Incarnate Word College, Saint Mary's University and San Antonio Junior College, meets every Sunday evening at Saint Mark's under the leadership of the Rev. Mack Morris, curate at Saint Mark's and chaplain of the Canterbury Club for the city. This is a city-wide project in which all of the parishes of the city cooperate and has been a fine experiment. This group of college students have been doing a fine job of discussion of fundamentals of the faith of the Church and have had several outstanding speakers and lecturers come to their group to help them in their forum type of program.

made up of young people nineteen to thirty years of age, is an extremely active group at Saint Mark's and meets every Sunday during the year for a program and business meeting which is followed by a supper and an evening of recreation. Most of these young people are employed in San Antonio or are from the military installations here and it has proven to be a great means for young people away from home to meet other young people and to establish many pleasant social and religious ties. This group has enlarged rapidly in the last few months as the military installations in San Antonio have been bringing in more and more personnel. Episcopal boys from all over the country come to this group every Sunday night and make their church home at Saint Mark's as a result of it.

In addition to these organized youth groups the parish operates a well developed and well coordinated athletic program in its full sized gymnasium under the direction of Mr. Wilbert Richarz, athletic director of the parish. There are basketball teams for midgets, juniors, seniors and adults and these teams meet regularly for practice at the gymnasium and play in the San Antonio Sunday School Athletic Association League and last year the Senior Team was the winner of the district championship. Saint Mark's basketball teams have been famous through two generations.

There is also a volleyball team for girls which practices and plays every week and a general recreational program for boys of different ages on Sunday morning.

The general philosophy of young people's work at Saint Mark's is that opportunities might be given to every child of every age to develop their physical, social and moral values under the leadership and guidance of the Church and to extend to all young people of all ages the knowledge that the church is there for their pleasure and for their guidance.

BISHOP HORACE DONEGAN INSTALLED

★ Bishop Horace W. B. Donegan was formally installed as the Bishop of New York on November 18th at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. The service was attended by civic and religious dignitaries. One of the picturesque pieces of symbolism was when Bishop Gilbert, who retired as diocesan on October 28, invested his successor with the pastoral staff, symbol of his office. The Presiding Bishop then pronounced Bishop Donegan to be rightly admitted to the honors, dignities and rights of the bishopric of New York. The canons of the cathedral escorted the new diocesan to the cathedra, or official seat, after which he delivered the sermon.

ANSON STOKES COMES TO NEW YORK

★ The Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes Jr. was instituted as rector of St. Bartholomew's, New York, November 12 by Bishop Donegan, becoming the eighth rector of one of the largest parishes of the Church. Others taking part in the service were Edward R. Finch, senior warden, who presented him with the keys to the church, and the Rev. Charles P. Deems and the Rev. Irving S. Pollard, assistant ministers of the parish. Mr. Stokes was formerly the dean of St. Andrew's Cathedral, Honolulu, and is forty-five.

OHIO CONVENTION ON SCHOOLS

★ The annual Church school convention of the diocese of Ohio was held November 8 at St. Paul's Church, Cleveland Heights. More than 250 teachers and clergy from all parts of northern Ohio attended the meeting which also featured special exhibits of visual aids and other materials.

Featured speakers at the meeting were the Rev. Walter Williams of the division of leadership training of the National Council and the Rev. David R. Hunter, executive secretary of Christian education for the diocese of Massachusetts. Also on the program were Bishop Nelson M. Burroughs, Coadjutor of Ohio; the Rev. Walter Tunks, rector of St. Paul's, Akron; and the Rev. Maxfield Dowell, chairman of Ohio's department of Christian education. Arrangements for the convention were made by the children's commission of which the Rev. Stuart G. Cole is chairman.

OLD BELL of St. Mark's is cast from cannon used to defend the Alamo

The Rev. Walter Williams told that the Episcopal Church is preparing a parish education program that will adequately meet current problems of divorce, broken homes and juvenile delinquency. Describing the new curriculum as a realistic approach to every parishioner from the "crib to the casket," Mr. Williams said that the Episcopal Church was intent on "making Christian education an integrating force in the whole of parish life." In a brief summary of the curriculum, he said that it encompassed the "total education of the parish" with particular emphasis on using the force of religion as a catalyst in creating happier children, parents, adults, and homes.

Outlining the increased goals being set for teachers in Church schools, Mr. Hunter said that it was the teachers' prime concern to make their teaching take place in a medium of doing. The teacher, he said, has the "colossal task of developing Christian education as an experience for the children in Church schools."

Mr. Tunks was the preacher at the convention's worship service. Pointing out that teachers and clergy alike must appreciate that "real teaching involves an expenditure of self," he maintained that those who put the teaching curriculum into effect will themselves need a personal experience of God and renewal of their faith daily before they can impress it on the parish members. The best way to explain the entire curriculum, he concluded, is to live it.

Speaking at the dinner, Mr. Dowell announced that Ohio's department of Christian education will be host to a provincial conference on the new curriculum for clergy at Gambier, Ohio, next fall and that arrangements have been made with the National Council's department of Christian education to provide early in 1951 special teams of leaders in various parts of the diocese to assist clergy and lay leaders in facing the problems of the total education program of the Church.

MICHIGAN TO ADD TO FUND

★ Bishop Emrich of Michigan announced this week a change in diocesan policy with regard to one of the funds of the diocese. He has stated that beginning immediately, one-tenth of every visitation offering will be added to the Episcopal endowment fund. This is a fund in the diocese raised many years ago, the income of which is devoted to the support of the episcopate. Few additions have been made to it in recent years, and the income of the fund is not large enough by any means to support the episcopate in the diocese. The addition of 10% of the annual visitation offerings will enhance the value of the fund considerably in due course.

PARABLE OF TALENTS

★ In May the Rev. John C. Runkle, rector of Grace Church, Wilmington, Delaware, handed 135 dollar-bills to members of the parish, after which he read them the parable of the talents. To date they have returned over $1.400.

LAYMEN OF JERSEY HAVE MEETING

★ Chancellor Robert T. McCracken of the diocese of Pennsylvania was the speaker at the first annual meeting of the laymen's league of the diocese of New Jersey. It was held November 18th at Christ Church, Bordentown. He described work done by laymen in his own diocese.

Thanksgiving

WHAT are we thankful for this year? As you try to answer that question, remember there is a story in the New Testament about one man whose thanksgiving was odious in the sight of God. This man was the Pharisee in Jesus' parable who thanked God he was not as other men. And we have an idea that this is an especially common temptation at thanksgiving time. We Americans shall be told that we are better fed and better housed, more comfortable and prosperous, than any other people in the world. We shall be thanking God in the printed and spoken word on that account.

But should such a condition really be an occasion of Christian thanksgiving? Is it moral to be thankful that you are not as other men in this or any other respect? In truth, the knowledge that other people are hungry and in want while we live in luxury should trouble our consciences, and make us feel concerned and even penitent. There is something wrong in a world where one nation eats several times more per capita than the people of any other nation. Such a situation can not but be wrong before God, and one that raises serious questions at home and abroad. Americans have been generous, but have we been generous enough? Have we really done enough to raise living standards in Europe and Asia, we who have a corner on the wealth of nations? Perhaps some of the extra billions for military defense might better be spent improving the lot of mankind in backward places all over the world. Not only would such an investment make life more livable for millions, but would also remove the dreadful conditions that cause men to embrace Communism.

At the international students seminar held in Tokyo this last summer, an Indonesian youth spoke up and said, "For my people freedom without food is nonsense." A young Chinese asked an American delegate, "Just what do you mean by freedom? The freedom to go hungry and run naked? China has enjoyed those freedoms for centuries and she's weary of them." The word comes from an American missionary in Japan, "While we have been offering the glittering freedoms of speech and religion and opportunity, new voices have been proposing a more tangible trinity: food, shelter and clothing."

Never again can we say that this or anything else that might happen in Asia is none of our business—not on a globe as magically contracted as ours in this mid-twentieth century.

As the Psalmist said once and for all, it is a good thing to give thanks, and truly it is. Thanksgiving is an acknowledgment of our utter dependence on God. In the last analysis all the blessings of this life are given to us, and perhaps gratitude is one of the starting places of religion. We might well be thankful in America, but certainly for something more than our standard of living. And surely not in any smug feeling that we are not as other people, but rather with a realistic and humble sense of our great obligation and opportunity.

"QUOTES"

WE bless thee for our creation, preservation, and all the blessings of this life; but above all, for thine inestimable love in the redemption of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ; for the means of grace, and for the hope of glory. And, we beseech thee, give us that due sense of all thy mercies, that our hearts may be unfeignedly thankful; and that we show forth thy praise, not only with our lips, but in our lives, by giving up our selves to thy service, and by walking before thee in holiness and righteousness all our days; through Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom, with thee and the Holy Ghost, be all honor and glory, world without end. Amen.

—General Thanksgiving

A Great Parish

ST. MARK'S CHURCH, San Antonio, is one of the truly great parishes in the country. For a century now it has effectively ministered to one of the most enterprising cities in the country. In doing so it has played a notable part in the national Church in missionary giving, in the number of sons who have entered the ministry, and in the extraordinary number of rectors who have been elevated to the episcopate.

From time to time The Witness presents in its pages the story of outstanding churches, those ministering in towns and rural areas as well as in cities; churches with comparatively few communicants, as well as those with many.

In this number we salute St. Mark's, San Antonio, with its hundred years of notable achievement and its present accomplishments which make for such a promising future.

Saint Mark's Church: San Antonio

1850 — Centenniel — 1950

BY HARRIET BROWN MOORE

Trinity Mission	1850-1858
Saint Mark's Church	1858-1874
The Cathedral of Saint Mark	1874-1888
Saint Mark's Church	1888-1950

ST. MARK'S CHURCH, San Antonio, "A Parish with Personality," with seven rectors elected to the Episcopate, celebrated in May, 1950, the completion of one hundred years of service in San Antonio. The grounds on which the church stands were a part of the Mission San Antonio de Valero, now known as the Alamo and were granted by the Spanish crown to two converted Indians in deed of patent dated 1793. In 1858 St. Mark's Church became owner through gifts of interested Episcopalians.

However the year 1850 was the date of the first mission of the Episcopal Church in San Antonio, founded by the Rev. J. S. Fish, chaplain in the U. S. army. It was called Trinity Mission. The little congregation moved many times. The name of the Rev. Charles Rottenstein appears just following Chaplain Fish and preceding that of the Rev. Lucius Jones who re-organized the scattered group and became the first rector of St. Mark's Church. A memorial window bearing the date 1863 reminds the congregation of its first rector.

THE PARISH HOUSE OF ST. MARK'S

The corner stone of the present building was laid on December 22, 1859 by Bishop Alexander Gregg of the diocese of Texas. One of the early builders was General Robert E. Lee, then Lt. Col., stationed in San Antonio. His is the first name listed as a life member in the first missionary society with a gift of fifty dollars. A tablet to his memory was placed in the grounds in 1935 by the Daughters of the Confederacy.

The walls of the church were about one-half up when the War Between the States halted progress. The congregation continued to wander but finally settled in Wolfe Hall, one of the buildings of St. Mary's Hall. The Rev. E. A. Wagner, then rector, has left in a most interesting document an account of how the Dorcas Society earned "monies in specie" for the expenses of the church.

The arrival of the Rev. Walter R. Richardson in 1868 was, in the light of later history, a great event. He came with a great vision and began at once to translate vision into action. After the war under his leadership rapid progress was made and Easter, March 28, 1875 saw the opening of the completed church. The architect was one of the most famous of that day, Richard Upjohn, who was also the architect of Trinity Church, New York. It was six years afterwards that the building, furnished and free from debt, was consecrated on St. Mark's Day, April 25, 1881.

The parish was received into the Diocese of Texas April 16, 1858. In 1874 its allegiance was to the Missionary District of Western Texas, created by the General Convention of that date with the Rt. Rev. R. W. B. Elliott as bishop. It became the Cathedral Church and the Rev. Walter R. Richardson became dean, a title he kept until his death although Bishop James Steptoe Johnston, who succeeded Bishop Elliott, reduced it to the status of parish again.

Noted Rectors

THE rectors have given to the community, to the diocese as well as to the parish very special and individual service. What they have done by their leadership has woven the tapestry, with its various colors, into a "parish with personality."

The architect's drawing of the new and enlarged St. Mark's shows the realization of the dreams of generations of faithful and earnest Christians whose lives and work have gone into its making

Dean Richardson, through his thirty-eight years as rector and two as emeritus, spent days in visiting in the homes of his people and endeared himself to people of San Antonio in a very personal way. His devotion is still manifest in many of the congregation.

The Rev. J. Lindsay Patton, coming from Japan to San Antonio, aroused an interest in missions in the Orient and some missionaries included the St. Mark's in their itinerary. Classes in English for Japanese were sponsored at the church.

The Rev. Philip Cook, later Bishop of Delaware and Assistant Presiding Bishop of the Church, organized the parish on a business basis, began a parish register, introduced a budget system and offering envelopes, all new ventures. His chief emphasis was, however, on the Sunday School and this led him to accomplish the building of the first parish house, at that time one of the finest in the country.

The Rev. W. Bertrand Stevens, late Bishop of Los Angeles, gave attention to specific needs—new pews, new organ, new electroliers and a new rectory. War work, however, characterized his rectorship and he wore the uniform of the Red Cross and under his leadership St. Mark's conducted an unexcelled program of activities for the men in service and at least two entered the ministry because of contacts made then.

The Rev. S. Arthur Huston, now retired Bishop of Olympia, emphasized the social gospel and was a fearless spokesman for the working man.

The Rev. Rolfe P. Crum has left as a monument to his ministry the very fine parish house and educational building now in use.

The Rev. Arthur R. McKinstry, now Bishop of Delaware, gave great attention to civic problems of health and crime and his work is still bearing fruit.

The Rev. Everett H. Jones, St. Mark's own son, baptized, confirmed, ordained, married, and consecrated a bishop in the church, now the beloved bishop of the diocese of West Texas, was responsible for opening a mission in the Highlands, now St. Stephen's Church, and for organizing St. Mark's Community House for Latin-Americans, now a diocesan project, the Church and House of the Good Samaritan.

The Rev. Thomas H. Wright, now Bishop of East Carolina, had only a brief rectorship but served in community and diocese and organized zone-visiting among the parishioners.

The Rev. J. Wilson Hunter, now Bishop of Wyoming, also had a brief rectorship. His constant emphasis was on Church attendance and parish fellowship. He was president of the San Antonio Council of Churches. The Day Care Center was started at this time.

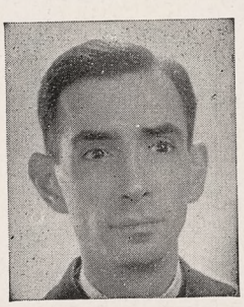
The Rev. Harold C. Gosnell, the present rector of the parish, has been busy with carrying out to completion the plans for the enlarging, repairing and beautifying the church and grounds. A narthex was built with a tower housing memorial chimes and a cloister now connects the church with the parish house. A new chapel, Bethlehem, is now about completed and will be used for weekday services and prayer and meditation. In all, more than $200,000 of new building and renovation has been done. Mr. Gosnell was responsible for the celebration of St. Mark's centennial when five bishops, former rectors, returned for the event. It should be recorded also that the Rt. Rev. Harry T. Moore, retired Bishop of Dallas and the Rt. Rev. Frank Juhan, Bishop of Florida, were once a part of St. Mark's; the former as assistant and the latter as a choir boy.



The story of St. Mark's congregation for one hundred years can only be expressed in words and pictures; but these are the symbols of its inner life. The real fruit of these hundred years is in the countless hearts and minds of people scattered far and wide, whose inner life has been molded here by worship and personal fellowship and now finds expression in God's service in various far flung communities. The "things seen—temporal" are here expressed in picture and in word; the "things unseen—eternal" we can only spiritually discern.

The Living Liturgy ---

He Hath Exalted The Humble and Meek

BY
MASSEY H. SHEPHERD JR.

RECENTLY we have all read in the papers and news magazines about the new dogma proclaimed by Pope Pius about the Assumption of St. Mary, body and soul into heaven. Our Roman Catholic brethren are now henceforth required to believe this as an article of faith comparable to their belief in the Holy Trinity and the Incarnation, or else suffer the penalty of excommunication and eternal damnation. Undoubtedly many persons have been edified by this new addition to the faith once delivered; others have been puzzled, and still others have been irritated or angered. Many others remain indifferent, or even go so far as to say that it makes no great difference if anyone wishes to believe this, so long as it brings forth in them the fruit of good living.

In the long run, however, it does make a great deal of difference whether the Christian Faith is something rooted in facts or in the imagination of pious people, whether Christianity is a religion grounded in history or in myth. The greatest single danger that the Christian Faith has ever had to face occurred in the second century, A. D., when the Gnostic heresies attempted to substitute their fictional mythologies for the testimony of the apostolic preaching as to "that which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the word of life" (I John 1:1). By their own admission, Roman Catholic authorities and scholars confess that there is not the slightest evidence in the New Testament or in the writings of the Church Fathers of the first five centuries for belief in the Assumption of the Virgin Mary either as a fact of history or as a doctrine of faith. It is merely a tradition which first emerges in legendary literature of the sixth century, and then for the first time appears in the liturgical observance of the churches East and West. Now one should think that any reasonable person could see that a belief resting upon so slender a historical foundation cannot be erected into an article of faith necessary to eternal salvation, without serious compromise with the authentic gospel of Christ.

On this point certainly the sixteenth century Reformers, who gave us our Prayer Book, wrought with a sure and certain hand. They removed from the liturgy all the observances associated with St. Mary that had no authentic historical record such as the Feasts of her Conception, Nativity and Assumption. They kept only those with a basis in the New Testament: the Annunciation and the Presentation of our Lord in the Temple (though curiously they omitted the Visitation on July 2), and, of course, the cycle of feasts concerning the Nativity of Christ. As a matter of fact, all these feasts retained are essentially festivals of our Lord, not of St. Mary; and it may be regretted that no festival was left devoted as such entirely to St. Mary herself. But we remember her at every Evensong when we sing Magnificat; and when the Beatitudes of the Gospel are read on All Saints' Day we recall that she represents, above all, those humble and meek folks, the poor, the peacemakers, the pure in heart, from whose number came those first witnesses of God's fulfillment of His promises to Abraham and the fathers of old.

Actually the oldest Roman festival of St. Mary was the Octave of Christmas, when the propers for the day were devoted to her memory, and the papal Mass was held in the great Pantheon, which the Roman Church had taken over and dedicated to her and to all the martyrs. But the later adoption of the Feast of the Circumcision came to displace this original festival of the Virgin. It might be worthy of our consideration to restore this original association of the day, since the Circumcision festival is not one of great spiritual benefit. There is a fine Collect which we could use—not the ancient one, but one composed by the Rev. Dr. William Bright, many of whose prayers found a place in our last Prayer Book revision. Its thought is based upon a saying of our Lord which occurs in different forms and contexts in the Gospels: Mark 3:35, Matthew 12:50, Luke 11:27, and John 15:14. It reads: "O Christ our God Incarnate, whose Virgin Mother was blessed in bearing Thee, but still more blessed in keeping Thy word; grant us, who honour the exaltation of her lowliness, to follow the example of her devotion to Thy will; Who livest, etc." Such a Collect truly gives the Scriptural teaching concerning our Lord's mother with all due honor to her as the first among the saints.

ST. MARK'S CHURCH has undergone many changes during its long history, both exterior and interior. This picture shows the interior as it is today

Dear or Valuable

BY

CORWIN C. ROACH

Dean of Bexley Hall

A slave who was dear to him—Lk. 7:2

THE margin reads "or valuable." There is a world of difference in the two expressions although they represent the same Greek original. The centurion could look upon his slave as a piece of property or a person. He took the second attitude. The sick servant was dear rather than valuable. He was a friend to be healed and not merely property to be saved. The centurion had made a great step forward in human relations, an advance we have not always equalled. Slavery has been abolished but the owner-user attitude has not. In industry we still think in terms of hands. Half our present labor difficulty is probably to be traced to the depersonalization brought about by big business. Yet are we not guilty of this same exploitative, utilitarian outlook in our personal relations? Do we cherish our friends or do we "cultivate" them as if they were a particularly promising piece of ground from which we expected to reap a bountiful harvest? Even in the Church it is so easy to see people as statistics rather than as souls. The centurion transformed a slave into a human being but often we are guilty of doing just the opposite, of dehumanizing people into mere prospects or useful contacts. Men are ends not means. We are to regard them as dear rather than as merely valuable.

In Defense of Platitudes

BY

WILLIAM P. BARNDS

Rector of St. Matthew's, Lincoln

PROBABLY many of us have had the experience of being disturbed about something and having someone give us advice or attempted comfort in the form of a platitude such as "It's always darkest before dawn" or "Don't let it get you down." Perchance we have felt a bit resentful of the advice because there was nothing original or new about it. We have been like Naaman who when told to wash in the Jordan and be recovered of his leprosy, considered the proposed remedy too simple, and undramatic.

Yet there is much to be said on behalf of sayings which might appear platitudinous and trite. They have usually grown up in experience and have been tested by it. They are apt to contain much practical wisdom and at least some modicum of truth. It is true that they become worn through use, like a thin dime, so that they may make little real impressions on us, but many a time what we need is but to take to heart some ancient truth contained in a well-used saying and let it come alive for us in our need. It may well save the day for us. The Book of Proverbs is full of helpful seasoned advice which fits human needs generally.

Occasionally we are even apt to become so accustomed to great Christian emphases that they make little impression on us, yet they contain the truth we all so desperately need. It is said that St. John when an old man in his preaching, as in his first Epistle, emphasized love, and would say repeatedly "Love one another." Someone, probably thinking it was the repetitiousness of an old man, gently remonstrated with him for saying the same thing so much. The saint replied "When you have done that, you have done all."

Let the old familiar words of maxims, proverbs, and dynamic Christian truths come alive for you, for they have the power to guide and bless.

Give and Take

BY

PHILIP H. STEINMETZ

Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

OF course there is more joy in giving than in accepting. But much of the time we are on the receiving end. Suppose we think a bit about that role.

Take for example the matter of taking help from your neighbor. Our pride balks at becoming indebted to anyone. But we rightly accept great gifts from our neighbor's ancestors and with gratitude too. Think of the work they did from which we benefit when they made the town roads, town hall, church buildings, cleared fields. We are foolish to be too proud to accept help. Everyone needs help and takes it whether realizing it or not. There is no shame in it provided we make good use of what is given and are quick to be of service when our turn comes to give.

Our knowledge of God is a gift. We could not and our ancestors did not seek and find him. He came to them and us in a series of events we call the Incarnation; the birth, ministry, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

It may seem hard to take this gift of God himself. We may prefer to think that the man Jesus gained knowledge by self-discipline and sacrifice as did prophets. But we are driven by the facts to realize that no man ever spake as he did and to accept him as Lord and God and so find life and joy.

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

Youth Programs for Special Occasions. By Ruth Schroeder. Abingdon-Cokesbury. $2.50.

This is a useful book for all who are in search of materials for catching the imagination of the young in the immemorial themes of the Christian faith. Each of the thirty-five programs included in the book shows an understanding of the art of worship in modern form, where the pattern shifts according to the emphasis desired. Churches accustomed to liturgical worship may find it difficult to adopt these varied patterns, but it is plain to see that they will be welcomed by the young because of their simplicity. There are programs set up for special seasons of the year, for special purposes, such as missions, for outdoor presentations, and for candlelight occasions. The book may serve as suggestive background for use in released-time schools, where pictorial material overcomes the handicaps of discipline and distractions. The author assumes more than one difficult task in the writing of this volume. At various times she is playwright, liturgist, preacher, teacher and counselor. If she does not succeed in being skilled in all these departments, nevertheless the book fulfills its mission, and anyone looking for material for youth programs will be rewarded in reading these 244 pages.—James A. Paul.

The Christian Perspective. Edward T. Ramsdell. Abingdon - Cokesbury. $2.50.

Dr. Ramsdell is Professor of Systematic Theology at the School of Religion, Vanderbilt University. His new book is a careful study of the major Christian dogmas, from the "perspective" which as the title indicates he believes to be essentially Christian. That point of view is involved in "the acceptance of Jesus Christ as the crucial fact"—quite literally so, for the Incarnation and the Cross can never be separated. To see everything in terms of Christ, and of Christ crucified, provides a perspective which makes it possible to bring the paradoxes of experience into a unity in grace. One may find sections of this book which are not entirely satisfactory to a given reader; the cumulative effect is splendid, for Dr. Ramsdell plainly has the root of the matter in him. The pastor, as well as the professor, will find this a stimulating and inspiring volume. It ought to be widely read.—W. Norman Pittenger.

Pilgrims of the Night. By Edward E. Swanstrom. Sheed and Ward. $2.50.

An account of the work of the Roman Catholic Church among the displaced persons and families in Europe. There are many touching stories of the experience of individuals—all true.

Kingdom of This World. The Challenge of Communism. By M. V. C. Jeffreys. Morehouse-Gorham. $1.80.

While he was professor of education at Durham University Mr. Jeffreys wrote, in Education: Christian or Pagan, what may be the only available treatise on pedagogy based on a frankly neo-orthodox theology. That slim book (University of London Press) is highly important and insufficiently known.

He has now responded to the Lambeth insistence that Church people should bend their minds to understand Communism and not simply lend their voices to denounce it.

Mr. Jeffreys is not as fully at ease here as he was in the field of his

1951

75th Year of Publication

Here is the Kalendar which serves you in a very special way. It is both informative and inspiring since it contains many of the important aspects of correct ritual. On the many occasions when you wish to verify your liturgical correctness as to ritual or date this Kalendar is your source. We suggest two copies, one for the home and the other for the Church so that you will be certain to have one handy when a question arises. This is the most complete and useful Kalendar published since it contains material not available in any one other publication.

The type is clear and easily read, the arrangement is practical and attractive, while the binding and red cord for hanging permits a convenient change from week to week. Between the red and gold covers you will find:

CHURCH CALENDAR
CHURCH COLORS
SAINTS' DAYS
ALTAR LINEN
SUGGESTED HYMNS
CHURCH HOLY DAYS
CHURCH DICTIONARY
ALTAR SOCIETY NOTES
SUGGESTIONS FOR SERVERS
MORNING AND EVENING LECTIONARY
RULES FOR SACRISTANS
VESTMENTS, THEIR COLOR, CARE AND USE
DUTIES OF WARDENS AND VESTRYMEN

BETTER VALUE THAN EVER

In order that this Kalendar could have wider distribution and therefore be a greater help to more people, we have reduced the price to $1.00 from $1.50. It has the same contents carefully revised but on a slightly smaller page giving all the above information in a very clear and attractive form.

specialty, but his book is painstakingly fair, essentially accurate, and well-suited to its purpose of popular education.

—Alexander Miller

Jesus in the Jewish Tradition. By Morris Goldstein. Macmillan. $4.

This is a very thorough study of the subject, and belongs with the great works by Travers Herford, Hermann Strack, and others who have made a thorough study of the sources. It is still a question whether or not some of the so-called references to our Lord in the Talmud really refer to him. Jeshu ha Notsri may mean "Jesus of Nazareth," or may not; we cannot be sure. It is a field of research which still provides matter for debate. The present book will help many persons to see the sources in a new light, and will help to clear up some of the prejudice, both anti-Jewish and anti-Christian, which has resulted from one-sided interpretations of ancient and obscure allusions. It is interesting that Dr. Goldstein concludes that our Lord's teaching and rules of conduct were in the main "in accord with the accepted teachings of the time" (page 232). It was on the Messianic question that the split came.—F.C.G.

The Dartmouth Bible. By Chamberlin and Feldman. Houghton Mifflin Co. $7.50.

An excellent book of selections from the Bible, so complete that it might really be called an abridged Bible, with good up-to-date notes. There is even a good selection from the Apocrypha (over 100 pages). The only serious defect in the book, it seems to me, is the combination of the Gospels into one consecutive narrative. The book is designed for college students, and one may say that those who are reading the New Testament for the first time will probably get more from the Gospels if they are combined in this fashion; but I seriously question it. If we are to study the Gospels historically, the real and inescapable distinction between them must be clearly recognized.

Of course, a book designed for college use cannot be too dogmatic in its critical views, but I have the feeling that the editors have gone a little too far in stating alternative views. One wonders what their real convictions are.—F.C.G.

The New Testament Doctrine of Christ. By A. E. J. Rawlinson. Longmans Green. 17/6.

Bishop Rawlinson's great book on New Testament Christology was first published in 1926, but has been out of print for some time. Presumably it was among the many titles "bombed out" in 1940, when the Nazis almost obliterated the publishing district in London. It is good to welcome back this great book into circulation, and it will no doubt be used by theological students throughout the English speaking world.

The Mary Book. Assembled by F. J. Sheed. Sheed and Ward. $4.00.

A beautiful anthology, inspired by the new Roman Catholic dogma of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary. The authors are modern, for the most part, and the book has fine illustrations.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

UNITY COMMISSION HAS MEETING

★ The Episcopal Church will be represented by three observers at the conference of seven other denominations in Cincinnati Jan. 23-24, when proposed plans for a "United Church of Christ" will be discussed. The Episcopal Church is not one of the conferring bodies, but has been asked to send observers to this meeting as it did to the original session of the seven negotiating Churches, which met a year ago at Seabury House. Bishop Keeler of Minnesota, Dean Alden D. Kelley of the Seabury-Western Seminary, and President Gordon Keith Chalmers of Kenyon College, were appointed to represent the Episcopal Church at the meeting of the joint commission on approaches to unity which held its second meeting of the triennium at Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, Nov. 8 and 9.

Other developments at the session of the commission were the decision to work in cooperation with the joint commission on ecumenical relations and the National Council department of Christian education in the production of an adult study course on the need for and basis of Christian reunion. Preliminary discussions have already taken place between Dean Kelley, representing the unity commission, and the Rev. John Heuss of the National Council. Bishop Gibson, suffragan of Virginia, and Prof. Alexander C. Zabriskie of Virginia Seminary were appointed to represent the commission in the preparation of the study material.

There was discussion of the Forward Movement "Brief"—"The Unity of God's People," which had been prepared last spring at the request of the commission. Some 33,000 copies are still available, and the commission urged wider use in the parishes of the Church. The commission has several additional publications in the process of preparation.

Announcement was made that Bishop Hart of Pennsylvania has been appointed to the commission to take the place of Bishop Washburn of Newark, who resigned. The next meeting will be at Kenyon College late in January.

CORNERSTONE LAID FOR CHURCH

★ The cornerstone for a new building for St. Philip's, Rochester, Michigan, was laid November 12. The 21-year-old mission has been worshipping in a dwelling converted into a place of worship. The Rev. Edgar A. Lucas is in charge.

The New St. Mark's

AS MODERN AS TOMORROW

The basic interior architectural appearance of St. Mark's Church has not been altered with the installation of a Westinghouse year around air conditioning system. Invisible and silent, this system brings year 'round comfort to the congregation.

NEWS OF CHURCHES OVERSEAS

SOUTH INDIA HAS NEW BISHOP

Rev. A. J. Appasamy was consecrated bishop of the new Coimbatore diocese of the Church of South India on October 10th. The new diocese adds about 30,000 to the Church, 23,000 of them Congregationalists and the rest Anglicans and Methodists.

BISHOP BERGGRAV RESIGNS

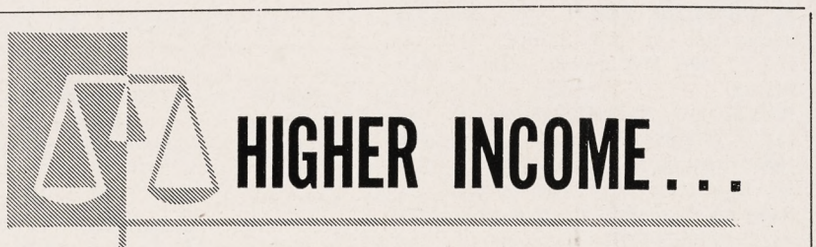
Bishop Eivind Berggrav of Oslo and Primate of the state Church of Norway (Lutheran) has resigned for health reasons. He is one of the six presidents of the World Council of Churches and came into worldwide prominence for his resistance to the Nazis.

INDONESIA ANNOUNCES POLICY ON RELIGION

A reversal of the "colonial type" of religious policy is the aim of the newly-created ministry of religious affairs in the Indonesian Republic. Efforts will be made to achieve unity among the various religious faiths, but the spokesman said that the government will not practice discrimination. According to latest figures, 90% of the population are Mohammedans, 4% are Christians (approximately two million Protestants and 737,000 Roman Catholics); the rest are Buddists or followers of Confusius.

ARCHBISHOP VISITS NASSAU

Archbishop Alan John Knight of British Guiana visited Nassau this month, the first time in history that an Anglican archbishop of the West Indies province has visited there. He was met at the airport by Bishop Spence Burton, the only American occupying a see of the Church of England. He directed a clergy retreat and preached in a number of churches.



HUNGARIAN CLERGYMEN REFUSED VISAS

Lutheran Bishop Laszlo Dezsery, Reformed Bishop John Peter and the Rev. Richard Horvath, R.C. monk, were among 17 Hungarian delegates who were refused visas by British authorities to attend the peace congress which opened last week in Sheffield, England. Bishop Peter told the press: "this malevolence has offended Hungarian Churches courageously taking up the cause of peace."

CZECH PRIESTS BACK CONGRESS

Full support of the Sheffield peace congress was voiced in a resolution adopted by a committee of R.C. priests, meeting in Prague to promote the movement of "Patriotic Priests". Among those on the committee were Bishop Antonin Eltschner, Vicar General Theophil Opatnry and Vicar General Ladislav Hronek of Hradec Kralove. One of the announced purposes of the group is to convene a conference of Christian Churches in Czechoslovakia.

HIGHER INCOME...

the ONLY ANSWER to HIGHER LIVING COSTS

There's little that most of us can do about the rising cost of living. But fortunately, there is something many of us can do to keep income geared to general business trends. You'll be surprised at how simple it can be to increase the income from your investments. Generous yields, which may be from 2 to 3 times what your savings are now bringing, are now available in sound, marketable securities paying substantial dividends every three months. We'll be glad to show you how this might be done in your case.

J. HENRY MASON
Layman of Chicago

I know I express the thoughts of many in saying how happy I am to find the Living Liturgy by Prof. Shepherd again in The Witness. He is one of the great scholars of our Church, and one with that too rare gift of writing so that the laity can understand.

Incidentally I would like to enter several Christmas subscriptions for friends, knowing they will benefit from the reading as I do. Will you tell me if you have special Christmas gift rates?

ANSWER: All gift subscriptions received before Christmas will be entered so that the recipient will receive the Christmas number. We will also send Christian Christmas cards announcing the gifts. Single gift subscriptions are $4 for a year; however, if four or more are sent they will be entered at $2.50 each. Address The Witness, Tunkhannock, Pa.

WILLIAM W. HORSTICK
The Bishop of Eau Claire

The present training program for men and women of the armed forces will bring members of the Episcopal Church, and those with no religious preferences, to Camp McCoy here in the diocese of Eau Claire. Camp McCoy lies midway, within a few miles, between Sparta and Tomah, and is approximately 40 miles from the city of La Crosse Wisconsin. This gives us an opportunity to be of real service to those who will receive training at Camp McCoy.

In St. John's Mission, Sparta, St. Mary's Mission, Tomah and in Christ Church Parish, La Crosse, we are under way with a program of worship, service and hospitality which we hope will bring the "Church at home" to those who are away from the home parish.

We would like to have the assistance of the parish clergy by having them send the names of men and women whom they know to be at Camp McCoy to the Rev. Alan McDaniel, vicar of St. John's Church, 322 North ater Street, Sparta, Wisconsin. I have appointed Fr. McDaniel to be the "Diocesan Chaplain" to Camp McCoy and the director of St. John's hospitality house.

The Rev. A. R. P. Heyes is the vicar of St. Mary's, Tomah and the Rev. Robert D. Vinter is the rector of Christ Church, La Crosse.

I know that in all three of these places a warm welcome will be extended to the men and women in training at Camp McCoy and I earnestly solicit the help of the home parish clergy.

LEONARD A. CHAPIN
Layman of Hartford, Conn.

It is sometimes difficult for our Church leaders to recollect that Jesus Christ was a workingman: the Carpenter of Nazareth. He was not an employer, a banker or a merchant. He was not even a clergyman. In my opinion the Church should take a greater interest in the welfare of labor. The Catholic Church has been most active in this respect, through the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists, which dominates many unions. The Protestants must interest themselves in the labor unions and in the efforts of workers to improve their economic conditions. In so doing the Protestant Churches will become a greater influence in our country and will also aid the well being of the working class. They will also be carrying out the will of Jesus Christ.

RICHARD U. SMITH
Rector at Hanford, Calif.

THANK you very much for the editorial on "Religion in Schools" (Witness, Nov. 2) and for the report of the Atlantic City meeting on this subject. I have been working toward this end throughout the eleven years of my ministry in Michigan and San Joaquin. I intend to stress it the rest of my life.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Syracuse Citizens Foundation Has Religious Series

Demonstrates That Average Businessman Wants to Learn About Beliefs

BY
FREDERICK H. SONTAG

★ The social justice teachings of the three major faiths were explained to Syracuse citizens in a series of three religious social justice forums sponsored by the Syracuse Citizens Foundation recently.

For some time, certain members of the Citizens Foundation had been attempting to "explain the position of business and the American economic system" to the clergy of this area, but this effort had not met with much success. At one of the Foundation's religious cooperation committee meetings, Rabbi Benjamin Friedman of the Temple Society of Concord, Syracuse, and a senior member of the Citizens Foundation, suggested that before the members spent any more time and effort in explaining their views to the clergy, it would be a sound idea to have the social justice viewpoint of the three major faiths explained to the Foundation members, their wives, their clergymen and guests. In this way, Rabbi Friedman said, the members of the Citizens Foundation, a group of 134 influential Syracuse citizens active in business, medicine, law, teaching, etc., would be better able to thoroughly understand and appreciate the viewpoint of other groups.

The Foundation religious cooperation committee which is composed of clergymen and laymen of the three major religious faiths, approved this project, and it is interesting to note that the other two clergymen on this committee requested the privilege of seconding Rabbi Friedman's proposal. The Rev. Arthur W. Mielke, Presbyterian pastor represented the Protestant communions while the Rev. Robert E. Dillon, chancellor of the Roman Catholic diocese of Syracuse, represented the Roman Catholic churches of this area.

The three clergymen assumed responsibility for obtaining a nationally prominent speaker to represent their viewpoint. The Rev. Richard M. McKeon, director of the school of industrial relations at Lemoyne College, Syracuse, presented the Roman Catholic position, after which the Rev. Marshall L. Scott, dean of the Presbyterian institute for industrial relations, New York, explained the Protestant views, and Rabbi S. Andhil Fineberg, director of community relations of the American Jewish committee concluded the series by outlining Jewish thought on social justice questions.

Inquiries to prominent Church organizations revealed that never before have a group of businessmen hired a hall and invited citizens to come to listen to a presentation of religious social justice viewpoints knowing full well that many views presented might be considerably different than those held by the Citizens Foundation membership, the sponsor of the series.

However, Rabbi Benjamin Friedman pointed out to the committee that it would be wise for the first three meetings not to invite the public at large, but instead, keep the audience from getting too large and unwieldy by inviting Syracuse thought-leaders to the series. In this way, the committee hoped to assure itself of a sincerely interested audience even though it would be somewhat smaller than if the meeting was an open series. Many people thought that if 100 persons attended this series, the Foundation would be doing well. When the Citizens Foundation assigned to me the responsibility of coordinator for the forums, I sincerely believed that this number could easily be doubled if we distributed invitations on this series widely to both clerical and lay members of the three major faiths in this community. We had printed 355 tickets and had to have two additional printings of 225 tickets each to fill the demand of persons who wished to attend as a result of limited promotion through local church groups and civic organizations. The first night, in spite of bad weather, approximately 300 persons attended the Roman Catholic presentation. At the second forum, when the weather was good but when the night conflicted with the newly elected Democratic City administration, approximately 225 persons heard the Protestant viewpoint. The Jewish viewpoint was presented before 250.

The Syracuse Post Standard and Herald Journal assigned reporters and photographers to each meeting, and the public at large was able to share to some extent in the three presentations. Local news broadcasts on our three radio stations, especially WFBL (CBS), featured brief summaries of the talks, and I was able to move 200 words over the Associated Press wire on each of the forums with approximately 400 words being sent on each forum to religious news services.

Television Station WHEN thought the series of such civic importance that they devoted an entire news interview period in which Rabbi S. Andhil Fineberg explained the purpose of the series.

Public relations-wise, this series has been a constructive influence in presenting the religious social justice viewpoint to civic leaders of this community and also in showing this community that business leaders, given the proper leadership and atmosphere, are willing to listen to religious social justice teachings.

Each talk lasted 30 minutes and was followed by a question period of equal length. This question period gave the audience the opportunity to clear up many of the misunderstandings which existed in their minds on the teachings of religious faiths other than that to which the questioner belonged. It is interesting to note that an analysis of attendance figures revealed that the great majority of persons who attended the forums, not only attended the meeting at which their own religious viewpoints were explained but also the other two.

★ A chalice and paten, gift of the people of Trinity parish, Los Angeles, will go to Okinawa with the Rev. William C. Heffner, left, one the Church's first missionaries to that island. It will commemorate Joel Ells Jr., a young man of the parish who was preparing for the ministry and who was killed during the invasion of Okinawa. The Rev. W. Don Brown, rector of Trinity, is at the right. The Rev. Mr. Heffner preached at Trinity recently and the gift was a spontaneous inspiration of the congregation,

ST. MARK'S, Palatka, Fla., has an active group of Girl Scouts. Here they prepare the outdoor fireplace for a roast

LOS ANGELES SURVEYS INSTITUTIONS

★ The Rev. Arnold Purdie of the social service department of the National Council is now in Los Angeles making a survey of nine institutions of the diocese. He is being assisted by Miss Charlotte Gluck of the national office. Closer integration of the work of the institutions is the object of the survey according to Bishop Campbell, chairman of the committee.

BISHOP McKINSTRY VISITS MARYLAND

★ Bishop McKinstry of Delaware was the preacher at the presentation of the United Thank Offering for the diocese of Maryland, the service being held at St. Thomas Church, Baltimore. Bishop Powell was the celebrant.

LOUISIANA LAYMEN LEAD MEETINGS

★ During this month and last every parish and mission in Louisiana, seventy-two in all, held a meeting where the program of the Church was presented by one of the specially trained laymen of the diocese.

ACHESON SPEAKS ON POLICY

★ Secretary of State Dean Acheson, son of the late Bishop of Connecticut, told a group of religious leaders, meeting under the auspices of the national conference of Christians and Jews, that the foreign policy of the U. S. must have a moral purpose. He said that it was not a part of U. S. policy to export our form of government but that "we must have the humility to understand that democracy, as we know it, is not the only form a free society may take. But what we do believe to be universal in democracy is its conception of man's proper relationship to his fellow man, the essential worth of the individual, the freedom that is so essential to his growth, and the conception that men shall be brothers unto each other. This is the nub of it—the minimum upon which all who would call themselves democratic must agree."

OWN HEADQUARTERS FOR FLORIDA

★ The diocese of Florida has been in existence for 112 years but it never had its own headquarters. For many years offices have been in the community house of St. John's Church, Jacksonville. Now that plans are well under way to make that church the cathedral, the diocese has purchased a building from the parish which is now being remodeled to provide offices for the two bishops, their secretaries, members of the cathedral staff, a chapter room, a library, a chapel.

EPISCOPAL STUDENTS TO MEET

★ Student delegates from all dioceses and missionary districts will meet at Bloomfield Hills, Mich., December 27-January 1, to set up a national Episcopal student movement, which will unify the present program of Canterbury Clubs in the various colleges and universities throughout the country. Two delegates from each diocese and missionary district will be elected by a representative conference of Canterbury groups within each diocese and district. The meeting will adopt an aim, a basis, a purpose and a constitution for the new movement.

Speakers will be Bishop Stephen C. Neill, assistant to the Archbishop of Canterbury; Bishop Norman B. Nash, of Massachusetts; the Rev. Jesse McL. Trotter, president of the Church Society for College Work, and the Rev. Robert N. Rodenmayer, chairman of the national commission for college work.

MEXICAN YOUTH MEETS

★ In the Mexican Episcopal Church the young people's group, Luis Querido Rodrigues, president, recently held its second regional institute for nine days, in Cuernavaca, with twenty-four students and six clergy as teachers. The young people came from congregations in the states of Morelos, Hidalgo, Mexico and Michoacan, and the Federal District.

Their purpose was "to learn something of what a faithful churchman should know; how to tell others; and how to aid the Church's work so that the Church may develop in Mexico." They had classes in the New Testament, the history of Christian thought, Christian symbolism, history of the Church of England and the American Episcopal Church and their missionary work, Christian education, pastoral theology and homiletics, and plenty of recreation.

In the church, the Holy Communion was celebrated three times, a daily morning service was led by the clergy, and an evening service was taken by the lay readers in turn. Also part of the program was an experimental Sunday school with the children of the Cuernavaca congregation.

In order to leave their borrowed quarters in the best possible condition, the young people cleaned every square foot of the parish house and church.

After the institute closed, they held a short meeting to criticize and value it in order that the next one may be even better. They plan to hold the next in January, 1951, and hope to have twice as many attending, divided into two groups, newcomers and repeaters.

CONTROVERSY OVER P. R. CONSTITUTION

★ There is such a controversy over the clause on religion in the proposed new constitution of Puerto Rico that Bishop Charles Boynton, Episcopal Bishop, and now suffragan of New York, and President A. M. Mergal of the Association of Evangelical Churches are to confer with two Roman Catholic bishops on the Island.

Congress recently voted to permit the holding of a referendum in Puerto Rico on June 4, 1951 to determine whether the population wants to draft its own constitution.

EDITORIALS

Christmas Suggestion

THE WITNESS, like most magazines in the religious field, has to depend largely on its readers to help with circulation. Secular newspapers and magazines are so well sustained by advertising that they are able to plow back all that they get in circulation revenue in promotion. With Church journals subscription money has to be used for printing costs, so that there is very little indeed for circulation promotion.

In other years we have mailed to all our subscribers a folder similar to the one that is printed on the back page of this issue. This too is an expensive proposition. This year therefore we are taking this means of urging readers to send us Christmas gift subscriptions. And in doing so we are passing on to you what is saved by the direct mailing of former years. That is, whereas last year you paid $3 each for three or more gift subscriptions, this year we will be glad to enter four for ten dollars, and each subscription over the four for $2.50. Single gift subscriptions, or less than four, remain $4 each.

We will continue to offer readers each week all of the important news of the Episcopal Church and a page of news of Other Churches as well as one of news of Churches Overseas. Dr. Grant will continue to give you his fine book reviews, and the other features that our readers inform us, through questionnaires and letters, that they appreciate will appear regularly. Our newly acquired Contributing Editors, Chad Walsh and Hyatt Waggoner, have promised more stimulating articles for the coming year. Professor Massey Shepherd has returned with his Living Liturgy which is so popular with all our readers. In other words we will continue to offer instructive, stimulating and entertaining articles on the life, work and thought of the Church.

So we solicite your support. In doing so we believe we are making it possible for you to give friends a gift that they will appreciate every week. And it is a convenient gift for you to make since all you need to do is to use the back page of this issue. The subscription will be entered for the Christmas number, and we will send cards to your friends announcing the gifts as coming from you.

One further suggestion: the Rev. Harold H. Kelley of Berkeley, California, wrote recently in Backfire that people in England could not subscribe to American papers since they are not allowed to send money out of the country. He suggested sending to some friend there your copy of The Witness after you have read it, explaining that it can be sent for five cent postage. But our Christmas offer comes to the same sum—$2.50 for the year. So let us send the magazine direct and avoid the delay and the trouble. If you do not have a friend in England, we can supply the names and addresses of a considerable number.

We also have the names of missionaries and others who cannot afford The Witness so that we will be glad to enter their subscriptions as a gift from you. Hospitals, libraries, clubs, homes for the elderly will also welcome the magazine in case you care to add them to your list.

Whatever you are able to do will be greatly appreciated, certainly by us, and we believe by all to whom gifts are made.

Please use the back page, with any additional names on a separate sheet of paper. And many thanks.

"QUOTES"

IF it is not beneath the Cross of Jesus that nations will lay down their arms, it may be by revolution among the armies and rebellion among the workers. If we cannot secure the ending of war by the blood of the Cross, other blood may flow which will not cleanse but only cry out for blood the more. But it may heed a crucified Church to bring a crucified Christ before the eyes of the world.

About Reporting

NOW and again we are charged with leaving out certain facts when writing news. The accusations at times have stated that we had a malicious motive for so doing, because the omitted material did not agree with our point of view. Our veracity has even been challenged, and we have been called "dishonest." We do not think that these things can justly be said of us, and we would be uncharitable if we used the same epithets against the news-reporters of our contemporaries who are sometimes guilty of omissions. But we would like to call attention to two recent incidents.

The magazine "Forth," official organ of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in its October issue had a news story on the Toronto meeting of the central committee of the World Council of Churches. In it there is a paragraph about the statement adopted on the Korean situation and world order. It says simply this, "The statement commends the United Nations for prompt police action, condemns the use of atomic and bacteriological weapons and obliteration bombing, and denounces the Stockholm Appeal as a strategy of propaganda rather than a genuine peace proposal." We are mystified that Forth, and also one of the diocesan magazines in its report, omits any mention of the fact that the statement also included the call to governments to "press individually and through the United Nations for a just settlement by negotiation and conciliation" of the Korean hostilities. Maybe there was a motive in this, or maybe, to be charitable, it was an error.

The Living Church had a bylined story of the address of the Archbishop of Canterbury to convocation. There is no mention of the Archbishop statement that Christians in China believe that they had been "liberated" by the Communist armies and they "acknowledge that the present regime is morally and socially preferable to the corruption and inefficiency and exploitations of the regime it replaced." The New York Herald Tribune thought this to be so important a part of the Archbishop's address that it used it in its headline over the whole story, and on page one. But our contemporary, and another C of E newspaper, The Record, reporting the same, neglected it completely. We do not say there was any motive behind this. We only suggest that it is seemingly difficult for news reports to have a complete, and thus, true account of every event.

The Bishop As Leader

BY

HOWARD R. BRINKER

The Bishop of Nebraska

BISHOP H. H. HENSON in his "Retrospect of an Unimportant Life" recently said "The bishop is not rightly regarded as a merely diocesan official, but should conceive of himself as a great national officer." So foreign and distasteful is this conception of the Anglican episcopate to modern Episcopalians that we rejoice in the fact that it died an unregretted and unmourned death before the middle of the last century. Prelacy, especially, in an Erastian garb, has no place in a democratic country nor in a democratic Church. On the other hand, neither is the bishop just a "cog" in the diocesan machine whose chief duty is to dissolve tensions in a parliamentary system. Nor is he a "glorified executive secretary" charged with the responsibility of keeping the bureaucracy on even keel—and growing! And although he is a constitutional officer by no means is he a "rubber stamp" functioning as an impersonal automaton in a restricted and moribund Church.

When we gather to consecrate a bishop it is not to set apart a man for any of the above offices but to ordain and consecrate an Apostle—a witness to the people—a leader. This leadership—and a leadership it most certainly is—has many qualities of mind and heart, but it rests chiefly upon three essential qualifications:

Converted Leader

IT is a converted leadership. The essence of Christianity is not just belief in Jesus Christ, nor adoration of his person, nor even imitation of his holy character and his spotless life; but identification with him. Surely if this is true, a bishop must be a changed, a converted man, not a worldling but a bond slave of Jesus Christ. In a word he is a man who has had an experience of God in Christ and as a result of this experience he has the resurrection outlook on life and a new scale of values. This religious experience is the foundation stone upon which a successful episcopate is built. While both the New Testament as well as the writings of later disciples have innumerable references to conversions and stories of twice born men and women, there is no typical or classical religious experience whose form and pattern are common to all. As William James says there are varieties of religious experience. Some, like Peter who went out into the night and wept bitterly, find God through their emotions or feelings; others, like Thomas, who would not believe until he saw with his own eyes, find God through their reason; and others, like Luke, who gave us the parable of the Good Samaritan and the parables of the Lost, find God through service. Regardless of how, when or where it comes the reality of our churchmanship and the sincerity of our purpose are motivated by an abiding religious experience of God in Christ.

The great need of conversion of both clergy and laity in our Church today was stressed by the preacher, Bishop Stewart of blessed memory, at my own consecration ten years ago as follows: "Most of us—especially of this household of the Episcopal Church, need to learn this. We are frozen with respectability, starched with smugness, like Narcissus gazing at his own reflection in the pool, we admire ourselves enormously, but most of us are unconverted. We haven't what St. Paul and all truly converted people have—light and heat. And we have not because we will not surrender our lives to the kingship of Christ. All our activities reveal our weakness here. A majority of our so-called Church people are indistinguishable from their friends in paganry. They hang upon the fringe of our parishes; their conduct is the characteristic behaviour of worldlings. They come to Church occasionally, not as penitents, but as patrons; not to adore, but to audit the service; scratch their belief and you find not the faith, but a farrago of sentimentality, superstitions and skepticisms. They do not pray, nor fast, nor give alms. And the salt of the faithful is thinned out by having to sieve through this saltlessness, and the light of the remnant is dimmed by having to shine through their opacity."

Our own Presiding Bishop mentioned the same need of a vital religious experience at the time of his installation when he said many Church people had been so inoculated with weak religion that the real thing could not take hold!

Missionary Leader

IT is a Missionary Leadership. We consecrate a bishop in the Church of God, not only a bishop of a diocese. No bishop has authority from Christ to operate in his own locality only, and this is equally true of a priest or of a deacon. The Prayer Book says a "bishop in the Church of God," a "priest in the Church of God" and a "deacon in the Church of God." The service is Catholic and universal, not diocesan or parochial. The new bishop will find out all too soon perhaps that his responsibilities in the Church of God are quite as great as are his responsibilities as the Bishop of a diocese. The authority conferred by the laying on of hands in ordination is the authority of the divine commission in St. Matthew 28:18-20—"All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you always even unto the end of the world. Amen." Regardless of what our particular doctrine of apostolic succession might be, we all agree that it originates in the missionary command of Christ. The very word Apostle means just two key words of the apostolic ministry: Sent and Send. "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you." John 20:21. The bishop, if missionary minded, shares with his brethren the responsibilities of missions at home and overseas, not only because the world is his field but because the very nature of his office makes it necessary. He could be perhaps a "swami" in a Hindu sect or a leader of some esoteric society or cult, and not believe in missions, but he cannot be an apostolic bishop in the Catholic Church and not thirst for the souls for whom Christ died.

Nothing will hold him back nor discourage him in his missionary zeal; nothing daunts him; "Neither journey oft, nor perils of robbers, nor perils of his own countrymen, nor perils by the heathen, nor perils in the city; nor perils in the wilderness, nor perils of the sea, nor perils among false brethren. In weariness and painfulness, in watchings oft, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness, besides all that cometh to him daily, the care of all the churches." Here is the picture of a real bishop and our ideal. In this passage—2 Cor. 11:23 to the end, St. Paul gives a picture of his episcopate during the early years of the Christian Church. It is helpful to compare ours with his or our anniversary days!

A certain Greek professor tells us about a visit of St. Paul to the office of the young Greek physician, Dr. Lucas, in Antioch. "Your name?"—"Paulus."—"And what seems to be the matter?"—"I have a thorn in the flesh"—"And I am caught up into heaven and see things unutterable." "Better take a holiday, Paulus—how about a sea voyage—and why not forget religion for a while?" "I cannot be disobedient to the heavenly vision, Dr. Lucas." "I know I can do all things through Christ who strengthened me." Result—Dr. Lucas sells his office, gives up his practice in Antioch and goes with St. Paul and becomes St. Luke, the beloved physician, author of the third Gospel and the Book of Acts!

In the Mamertine prison in Rome is a spring. Here Paul baptized jailer after jailer whom he won to Christ. All were fish in his net, mavericks within the widening circle of his long rope.

It has always amused and comforted me as I face each annual every member canvass that the lovely spiritual passage at the close of I Corinthians 15, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" is followed at once by "Now concerning the collection for the saints—upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay up by him in store as God hath prospered him that there be no gatherings when I come."

Corporate Leader

IT is a corporate leadership. When Christ left this earth and ascended up on high on the first Ascension day he left neither an organization with rules nor a book with directives. But he did leave a Koinonia Pneumatos — a "Fellowship of the Spirit," which he called his body and we call his Church. We Episcopalians need to revive this idea of the Church as a fellowship of the spirit, and I believe the bishop has the greatest responsibility and the best opportunity to do it. There have been many attempts outside the Church to revive it from Montanism in the 2nd century to Bushmanism in the 20th; but the work and office of the Holy Spirit should not be neglected until it has to be restored by leaders outside the fellowship. The annual visitation of the bishop can be not only a formal canonical thing concerned with statistics and registers and even a confirmation class, but a spiritual renewal and an awakening of the spirit for the whole congregation. When the bishop visits a parish the clergy and congregation have a right not only to be inspected but inspired! In a very special way the bishop "stirs up the grace of God" as he makes the rounds of his diocese and leaves behind him greater courage to go forward and real enthusiasm for the kingdom. I am sure that as far as promoting the kingdom is concerned more is accomplished at a fellowship meal preceding or following a service than any other thing a bishop might do. This undoubtedly is the idea back of the "Coffee Hour" another 20th century expression of the primitive agape, now becoming so popular throughout the Church. We Episcopalians need to warm up and learn to be friendly for the growth of the kingdom is contingent, not upon our personal theory of apostolic succession, or any other doctrine, but upon our "Philadelphia," our capacity for brotherly love. This is not only the touchstone of true Christianity but the only basis of Christian morals as well. In the New Testament a moral offense is not an offense against the moral code but against the Holy Spirit—a corporate gift—the fellowship. Hence we read of "quenching the spirit" and "grieving the spirit." I understand the word "ecclesiastical" means "brotherly" but I am afraid we have departed far from its original intention, as a Church. Yet upon this brotherliness and friendliness depends our relationship with God. "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

Never will we make the indifferent different or bring the stayaway back to the worship of God every Sunday in his church, and make our churches going and growing concerns with no "nominal churchmen" on their lists until we have revived the Koinonia Pneumatos—the fellowship of the spirit idea of the Church again. Canons, precepts, duties, even commandments, are of none effect—only the spirit compels.

Most Episcopalians are like the disciples at Ephesus who, when asked by St. Paul if they had received the Holy Ghost since they believed, replied: "We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost!" Certainly too few of us act as though we knew he was a corporate gift and know only in the experience of the Koinonia. And because of this ignorance our Church is held back and cursed by the two archheresies of modern times (1) individualism—a social isolationism which says we have no need of our fellowmen, and (2) Pelagianism—a spiritual isolationism which says we do not need God's grace or his holy spirit. Both of these heresies are best stated and summed up in Kipling's "If" and their Christian opposite is found in St. Paul's Christian ideal in Phil. 4:13 "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me."

At the most solemn moment in the Service of Consecration we hear the words "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a bishop in the Church of God" x x x and "stir up the grace of God which is given thee" it is manifestly evident to us all, and especially to the bishop-elect, that Christ intends a bishop to be a spirit bearing witness and an Apostle within the Koinonia Pneumatos.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

CLERGYMEN DISCUSS WAR AND PEACE

★ A symposium on the Christian attitude toward war was held November 12th at St. George's, New York, led by Bishop Lawrence of Western Massachusetts, Prof. Albert T. Mollegen of the Virginia Seminary and the Rev. Leland Henry, director of social service of the diocese of New York. Each spoke twice, once at the service at eleven, and once at the meeting in the parish house following a luncheon.

The clergymen each took one of the three positions of Christians on war as defined by the World Council of Churches at Amsterdam which was attended by 2,000 representatives of 148 Protestant and Orthodox denominations of forty-three countries in August of 1948. Mollegen was first with the position, from the Amsterdam conference, that "There are those who hold that, even though entering war may be a Christian's duty in particular circumstances, modern warfare with its mass destruction can never be an act of justice."

Henry presented the Amsterdam conference position that "in the absence of impartial supranational institutions, there are those who hold that military action is the ultimate sanction of the rule of law and that citizens must be distinctly taught that it is their duty to defend the law by force if necessary."

Bishop Lawrence presented the Amsterdam conference position that "others, again, refuse military service of all kinds, convinced that an absolute witness against war and for peace is for them the will of God and they desire that the Church should speak to the same effect."

Mollegen said that the "consequence of America having assumed responsibility and obligation as a member of the United Nations" requires action. "The Protestant man, at least, must act, well knowing he is not God," Mollegen said. "He must take the risk of acting . . . The only possible course for the Christian is to do everything possible to avert war itself.

Mollegen proposed "such a preponderance of mass power" in the non-Communist world "that it will not be threatened." He described as "agonizing" the decision that must be made about entering a war.

Henry led off his presentation with an assertion that the first part of his Amsterdam conference position—"In the absence of impartial supranational institutions . . ."—does not obtain, because the United Nations has established international law.

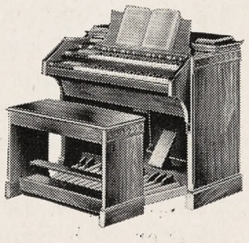
Henry said, under such circumstances (violation of international law by aggression), "The point at issue is should the Church distinctly teach that it is a Christian's duty to take part in the defense of international law?"

"The official response of the Church has been a prompt and unequivocal 'yes'," Henry said. "It is a hard choice we face . . . either a world of law, sustained when necessary by force of arms, or an utterly lawless world where one aggression after another will lead eventually to the extinguishing of all the heritage of the free world.

"It is not that we like war but that we love freedom and . . . freedom has never been achieved or maintained except as free men have been willing to die in its defense."

Bishop Lawrence read from a pastoral letter published by the Protestant Episcopal House of Bishops in 1939 to explain his position: "We believe that war will never achieve peace, but only sow the seeds for further war. We believe that the only sure foundations for peace are mutual understanding, sympathy, fairness, generosity and good will between nations in a world of peace among men of good will."

"I still believe in the basic goodness of this world," Bishop Lawrence said. "Doing nothing is sometimes the best thing to do in a crisis," he said, describing such a position as "an oasis of sanity."



The bishop said that "physical force can be used for good and for bad. In war, an army acts as judge, jury and prosecutor, and acts en masse. It only expresses the rule of might, not right."

"We need to accept pacifists

THE YOUNG PEOPLE CONDUCT SERVICE

★ The observance of Youth Sunday in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Sapulpa, Okla., had several quite tangible results; first, an offering of $25.95; next, a beautiful and inspiring service conducted entirely by young people, the rector sitting in the congregation; and finally, the organization of a young people's group immediately after the service.

The vicar, the Rev. Ralph E. Macy, explained that the parish has had little youth work in recent years, and the Youth Sunday program was done without having any organized group. Mr. Macy suggested to a number of young people that it was their service . . . and they took over from there. "Having it put completely on their shoulders made it a success."

The parish has a communicant strength of 152, and the youth Sunday congregation numbered 85. Said Mr. Macy, "The young people have shown what they can do and as a result of this they have the support of the adults and can count on any help needed from them. The new young people's group will meet weekly, and as groups in this area are small, we plan to meet often with neighboring groups to keep up enthusiasm and interest."

CIRCLE OF PRAYER FOR PEACE

★ The rector of St. David's, Baltimore, is sponsoring a prayer circle of those who will join in a noonday petition that mankind may be spared a global war.

CONDITIONAL GIFT TO SEWANEE

★ The University of the South, Sewanee, Tennessee, has been offered $100,000 by an anonymous layman providing that before the close of 1951 additional gifts of a million are received for new buildings.

BEXLEY CONFERENCE ON MINISTRY

★ Bexley Hall entertained 45 young men from six dioceses November 10-12 for a conference on the ministry. Leaders were the Rev. Robert W. Fay of Columbus, the Rev. Francis B. Sayre Jr. of Cleveland, the Rev. Charles H. Long Jr., former missionary in China, Dean Corwin C. Roach and Student Donald Priestley, president of the Bexley students.

ROYAL OAK GREETS MICHIGAN YOUTH

★ Youth offering was presented by young people of Michigan at a service held November 12 at St. John's, Royal Oak, with about 300 present, representing nine of the eleven convocations of the diocese.

"QUITE A STEP"

THAT IS WHAT A RECENT GRADUATE OF ONE OF OUR SEMINARIES SAID ABOUT THE OFFERING IN HIS PARISH FOR THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION.

His letter read:

"It doesn't look like much, I know, but . . . this represents quite a step for us here, as this is the first time that such an offering has ever been asked or made . . . I hope that this will be just the first of many checks that we can send you."

HAS YOUR PARISH TAKEN THIS IMPORTANT STEP: AN OFFERING IN 1950 FOR THE SUPPORT OF OUR SEMINARIES? THERE IS STILL TIME!

RELIGIOUS THERAPY IS DISCUSSED

★ Advanced findings in the clinical approach to religious therapy in the treatment and cure of the mentally ill were explained by the Rev. Miles Renear, chaplain at the Norwalk state hospital, at a meeting of the board of the Los Angeles city mission society. Spiritual therapy today has a recognized place in treatment of mental cases and alcoholism, according to Mr. Renear. Properly applied, he says, it can, in some cases, be credited with helping to effect cures. Special training, however, he pointed out is needed for this type of clinical work, so that the chaplain has an understanding of the medical problem and can coordinate his work with the medical treatment gauged to each individual case.

Mr. Renear, a graduate of Brown University and Episcopal Theological School, specialized in clinical therapy at the Massachusetts General Hospital, Boston, where, as an interne, he worked with the medical staff through the wards to become thoroughly familiar with the medical aspects of the cases he proposed to treat spiritually. He has been chaplain at Norwalk for two years.

In order to expand the facilities for special clinical training in spiritual therapy here, Canon Richard Lief, executive director of the society, was instructed to investigate the work being done in this field at Bellevue Hospital, New York, and the Episcopal Hospital, Philadelphia.

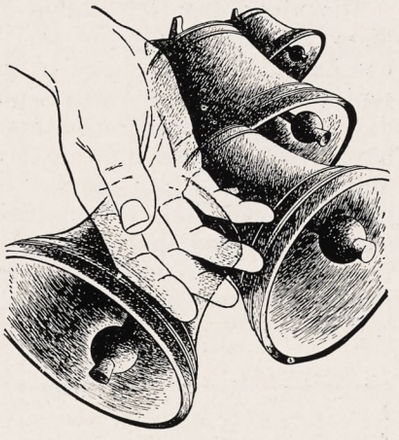
BUSINESSMAN QUITS TO STUDY FOR MINISTRY

★ J. Philip Bartlett, 41-year-old Los Angeles businessman, is studying for the ministry because he got tired of the "mad scramble for the almighty dollar." He has sold his business, the thriving Farm Machine Co. of San Diego.

"It was not a decision I made overnight as a result of any emotional experience," he explained. "I decided that the eternal pressure of the business world was not worth it. I was forced to follow certain ethics which were not Christian. They were not ethics that would put a man in jail, but modern business is cutthroat and dog-eat-dog for the small businessman who is trying to survive."

After a year at the University of Southern California here, Mr. Bartlett plans to take the regular seminary course at the Church Divinity School of the Pacific in Berkeley. Then he hopes to be assigned to a church in the diocese of Los Angeles.

CONFERENCE ON THE MINISTRY



★ Some fifty college men from eight states will attend a conference on the ministry at Seabury-Western, Dec. 27 through the 29th. It is being held to explain the importance and work of the ministry, and to give an objective presentation of the ministry of the Episcopal Church, Dean Alden Kelley of the seminary and conference adviser, said in announcing the event.

A series of talks on "The Church and the world today," "The meaning of vocation and ministry," "Seminary preparation for the ministry," "The minister as pastor and as preacher," and "The devotional and spiritual leadership of the minister," will be the highlights. An "elective session" for the conferees will include discussion of the ministry in specialized roles, such as the missionary, urban, and rural fields, teaching, and college work.

WOMEN HIT ABUSES OF CONGRESSMEN

Mrs. Theodore Wedel, wife of the Canon of Washington Cathedral, was warmly applauded by the 2,000 delegates attending the biennial assembly of the United Council of Church Women, for introducing a resolution hitting certain Congressmen. It stated that they abused "certain privileges granted to enhance the democratic process," and called upon them to discipline themselves in the use of the privileges of Congressional immunity and unlimited debate so that their intended useful purpose, rather than partisan politics, would be served.

Other resolutions passed at the assembly, meeting in Cincinnati urged equal educational facilities for all American children; pledged the Council to work against discrimination; demanded protection for conscientious objectors. A resolution to reaffirm previous action opposing permanent military conscription was tabled.

CARILLONIC BELLS

Like the beckoning of a gentle spirit

In most neighborhoods there are many good people who need a special reminding, a friendly persuasion that reaches into their hearts and brings them to church. "Carillonic Bells," sending their inspiring message, provide exactly that persuasion. And the people who respond come to the church whose "voice" speaks to them.

Any church can afford "Carillonic Bells"—a tower isn't required. This electronic carillon, made only by Schulmerich is remarkable for its beauty of tone and crystal clarity. More than 1,500 tower installations attest its superiority. Write for descriptive literature.

NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

URGE REPEAL OF THE McCARRAN BILL

Repeal of the McCarran anti-subversive act was urged by the United Synagogue of America, meeting in Washington, Nov. 17, because "many of its provisions flagrantly depart from American democratic principles and long-established practice." The national meeting was attended by representatives of 400 conservative Jewish congregations.

The Women's League of the United Synagogue of America, at its biennial convention held in Minneapolis, also called for the repeal of this act and also for the abolition of the House committee on un-American activities. The women also opposed any further move in the U. N. to reverse its original policy with regard to Franco Spain, which in 1946 barred Spain from membership.

CATHOLICS ASK WORLD ECONOMIC REFORMS

Economic reform of the world is necessary to prevent Communism, according to a report which was adopted at the annual meeting of the Catholic Association of International Peace, meeting Nov. 16 in Washington. The report declared that in the Far East the USSR and native Communists are exploiting the conflict between the dying imperialism of colonial empires and the legitimate emerging aspirations for self-government among Asiatic peoples. "United States policy," said the report, "should defend the right of dependent people of the Far East in their efforts toward self-government and should also guard against the dangers of economic domination of dependent territories by American financial and industrial interests."

GAMBLING PROPOSALS DEFEATED

Religious forces were successful in defeating a number of proposals to legalize gambling in the Nov. 7 elections. States where such proposals went under were California, Arizona, Montana, Massachusetts, South Carolina, Georgia.

FUNDAMENTALISTS MOVE AGAINST COUNCIL

The American Council of Christian Churches, fundamentalists, and chief attacker of the Federal Council moved into Cleveland Nov. 21, the week before the opening of the convention which will bring into being the National Council of Churches, a merger of interdenominational agencies, including the Federal Council. Topics being dealt with by various speakers are "Methodism adrift," "History of unbelief in the Presbyterian Church," "Revolution by Consent." Purpose, apparently, is to steal the headlines, as on other occasions, and to discredit the new National Council.

STOCK MARKET METHODS IN CAMPAIGN

Every night last week dozens of Methodist laymen of the Buffalo, N. Y. area went calling to "sell" non-church people on the idea of joining the church. Then they returned to their own church and reported, where the figures were tabulated and sent by phone to the "clearing house" located in the Plymouth Methodist Church, where they were chalked up on the "big board." A telephone hookup brought reports each morning from nine other cities and an area-wide summary by Methodist Bishop Earl Ledden of Syracuse. The result of the six-day effort, a part of the united evangelistic advance, was the addition of 11,837 members.

QUAKERS AGAIN ADDRESS OFFICIALS ON PEACE

Government leaders were urged to renew efforts to secure peace through conciliation and mediation in a letter from the Philadelphia Friends.

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

Commentary on Romans. By Anders Nygren. Muhlenberg Press. $5.00.

Bishop Nygren is the leader of a theological movement in the Swedish Church. He is the Bishop of Lund, and the movement is called the Lund Movement. It is a genuinely Lutheran movement, free from the overwhelming influence of "Reformed" theology, which seems to dominate the Continent.

This excellent commentary is in form like Dr. Barth's, a running exposition, rather than a word by word philological exegesis of the old-fashioned kind. Americans will be interested in the fact that the book might almost be called an expansion of the key verse, 1:17, "He who through faith is righteous shall live"—exactly the translation given us in the new Revised Standard Version (1946). This is, of course, very different from the traditional rendering, "The just shall live by faith," and it casts a flood of light upon the whole area of St. Paul's personal faith, religious convictions, and articulated theology.—F.C.G.

Christian Belief. By Alec R. Vidler. Scribner. $2.25.

Every now and then someone asks for a good book on doctrine which the ordinary person can understand. Here it is. It is not only readable and understandable, but interesting—something one hadn't really expected! Alec Vidler is a genuine Anglican Liberal, loyal to the Christian faith "as this Church hath received the same," but scholarly (and a real scholar, not afraid to follow the gleam, rather than a mere cataloguer of other person's views) and at the same time vital and alive to the finger tips. He is well known over here, having delivered the Hale Lectures at Seabury-Western a year or two ago (on F. D. Maurice's theology), and we all know that he is interested not only in Christianity as a religion and Anglicanism as a creed and the Church as an institution, but in the Christian faith as a profoundly transforming force in human society. The social implications of "Christian belief" are, from his point of view, of major importance. The little book will be extremely valuable not only for private reading but also for study by groups. There is only one chapter that will raise questions, the one on the church; but the people it will rouse to question are the ones who need most to take seriously what it says. This religion of ours (if the New Testament is any criterion) is after all the Christian religion, not a kind of "churchianity," not centered in a religious institution whose preservation and maintenance is the chief concern of its members.—F.C.G.

The Moffatt Bible Concordance. By James Moffatt. Harper. $6.00.

The many thousands of readers of Dr. Moffatt's translation of the Bible will be glad to know that there is now available a Concordance of his translation. It is like Harper's Concordance of the Bible, in that it is a selected work, rather than exhaustive. For most persons this is a decided advantage—and it keeps the price down. There is a quality about Dr. Moffatt's translations that is just as distinctive as the quality of the King James—a literary beauty that has done much to reawaken the modern world to the rich values, literary and spiritual, that are to be found in holy scripture.—F.C.G.

Mission to the Poorest. By Jacques Loew. Sheed and Ward. $3.00.

An interesting book on the work of a Dominican in Marseilles, emphasizing the necessity for Christians to practice works of mercy, with special concern for the little and the poor of the earth.—F.C.G.

Friends of God. By Costen J. Harrell. Abingdon-Cokesbury. $1.25.

Second edition of a beautiful little book of meditations—43 of them, each concluding with a prayer.

STORY OF THE WEEK

National Council of Churches Organized in Cleveland

Presiding Bishop of the Episcopal Church Unanimously Elected President

★ On Wednesday, November 29th, in Cleveland, Ohio, the years-long dream of a single cooperative agency of the Churches for its work at home and abroad was brought to fruition with the creation of the National Council of Churches of Christ in the United States of America. Twenty-nine Churches, four of them Eastern Orthodox, took the final action necessary to assure the beginning of corporate life of the new organization on January 1, 1951. At that time the varied programs and activities of the following agencies will be carried forward by this single agency: the Federal Council of Churches, Foreign Missions Conference, Home Missions Council, International Council of Religious Education, Missionary Education Movement, National Protestant Council on Higher Education, United Council of Church Women, United Stewardship Council, Church World Service, Protestant Radio Commission, and the Protestant Film Commission.

This great moment in the history of American Churches was particularly noteworthy for Episcopalians since our Presiding Bishop, Henry Knox Sherrill, was elected by acclamation as the first president of this organization, embracing more than 150,000 local churches with a membership in excess of 31,000,000.

The Council was constituted at the first business session of the four-day convention, held in the city's auditorium. On the main floor, behind placards denoting their Church affiliation, were the delegations—men and women, clergy and laity—all officially representing their Churches. Nearby was a section for the secular and religious press and for consultants. The rest of the main floor seated alternates, while in the balcony that rims the hall, were several thousand visiting delegates from all parts of the United States and Canada.

Presiding was the Rev. Franklin Clark Fry, president of the United Lutheran Church, eloquently testifying to the fact that, for the first time in the history of American Lutheranism, it comes into full membership in the cooperative Church movement. At his signal a delegate from each of the twenty-nine Churches, together with representatives of the merging agencies and cooperating groups, state councils and Church women, joined in a procession.

On the stage, as the roll of Churches was called, delegates signed official documents as the final act of constituting the Council. At the conclusion these representatives, in unison, dedicated the Council "to the glory of God and the service of mankind." Then followed, with representatives of the merging agencies taking part, the consecration of the new agency to the tasks carried on for many years in separate ways. The doxology, a prayer and a hymn concluded the service.

This act of constituting the Council was but one of many highlights of the convention. It opened with a service of thanksgiving on Tuesday the 28th, when the preacher was the Rev. Ralph W. Sockman, Methodist of New York. There were also public meetings on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, with Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, an Episcopalian, the speaker on the 29th and the Rev. W. A. Visser 't Hooft, general secretary of the World Council of Churches, the speaker on the 30th.

Also while divisions, departments and other units of the Council were holding business meetings, visiting delegates had an opportunity to listen to a notable array of speakers on various subjects.

At the general session, the afternoon of December 1, there were addresses on the "Christian witness in the National Life," with Episcopalian Charles P. Taft presiding and with another Episcopalian, Francis B. Sayre, U. S. delegate to the UN's trusteeship council one of the speakers.

The concluding session that evening which was a service of dedication, at which Bishop Sherrill was formally installed as president along with other officers, as well as the general board of the Council. The sermon was by the Rev. Eugene C. Blake, Presbyterian of Pasadena, California, on "The Cost of Discipleship" and the closing message, "This Nation under God" was given by Bishop Sherrill.

In a statement to the press, released prior to his election to the presidency, Bishop Sherrill said:

"In a day of world crisis and disorder, when men's hearts are failing them for fear, it is a cause of hope that the National Council is established. It is a proclamation that God as revealed in Jesus Christ lives and reigns, that the primary issues of today are spiritual and that no part of the wide range of life is alien to the application of the gospel. The Council marks a new and great determination that the American way will be increasingly the Christian way, for such is our heritage. The final answer will be given not simply by new constitution and organization but in the sacrificial lives, in the spiritual power of the clergy and people of the constituting Churches. The Cleveland convention signifies a great first step. Together the Churches can move forward to the goal—a Christian America in a Christian world."

BISHOP GILBERT SPEAKS IN CLEVELAND

★ Bishop Charles K. Gilbert, retired of New York, was one of the speakers at the dinner held in Cleveland on November 27 that marked the end of the Federal Council of Churches. The final biennial meeting opened the morning of the 27th when reports were presented on the ways the Council has served the Churches during the 42 years of its existence. This program is now to be carried on by the newly created National Council of Churches, brought into existence by the uniting of eleven interdenominational agencies.

That afternoon Bishop Angus Dun of Washington presented a report as chairman of the commission on the use of the atomic bomb and other weapons of mass destruction. Another Episcopalian to speak was Mr. Charles H. Tuttle, distinguished lawyer of New York, who made recommendations concerning the new legal status of the Federal Council. Besides Bishop Gilbert who spoke on the contributions of the Council in the field of social relations, speakers at the dinner were Prof. E. G. Homrighausen of Princeton; Episcopalian Otis Rice; the Rev. Ralph Sockman; Prof. Justin W. Nixon of Colgate-Rochester Divinity School; the Rev. Hugh C. Burr of Rochester, N. Y.; Dr. Channing H. Tobias, director of the Phelps-Stokes Fund, who spoke on the work of the Council in race relations, and John Foster Dulles who spoke on international relations.

RECTOR INJURED BY FALL

★ The Rev. C. Bertram Runnalls, rector of Calvary, Syracuse, N. Y., recently broke two ribs when he fell while descending the chancel steps. He was removed to a hospital in an ambulance but returned home after two days.

BEVERLEY D. TUCKER, Bishop of Ohio, was host to Episcopalians attending the National Council Convention

RELIGIOUS FILMS RELEASED

★ Two new 16mm religious sound films have been released by United World's religious film division. Produced by the J. Arthur Rank religious film organization, they are "David Livingstone" and "David the Shepherd Boy." The first, a 15 minute film, tells the documentary story of Livingstone's medical and missionary work in Africa; describes his battle against the slave trade, his heroic treks through the jungle, his illness and rumored death and his rescue by journalist Henry M. Stanley. The second film is of 22 minutes duration and pictures David's anointment by the prophet Samuel, his friendship with Jonathan and his battle with Goliath.

DISCUSS WORK FOR NEGROES

★ Church leaders from the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th provinces met at St. Luke's, Houston, Texas, for three days in November to discuss the work of the Church with Negroes. Leaders were Bishop Everett Jones of West Texas who spoke on the challenge to the Church of underprivileged and neglected areas; the Rev. Tollie L. Caution, head of Negro work for the National Council; the Rev. Gray Blandy, instructor at the University of Texas, who spoke on the Church's work at educational institutions for Negroes.

NON-MILITARY USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

★ Prof. A. C. Menius Jr. of North Carolina State College told the men of Christ Church, Raleigh, about the non-military use of atomic energy at a dinner on November 20th. He is assisting in the construction of a nuclear reactor at the college, the first to be authorized at any educational institution in the country.

Church Leaders in China Urge Recognition of Peking

★ At the annual meeting of the Episcopal League for Social Action, held in New York early this year, a resolution was passed urging the United States to recognize the People's Government of China. The executive committee of the League later presented a document to the department of social relations of the National Council giving reasons why it was of the opinion that the National Council of the Church should likewise urge the U. S. government to recognize the Peking regime. A committee of the Council is said to be studying the matter at the moment.

Meanwhile, through the efforts of Bishop Norman Nash of Massachusetts, the League has letters from two distinguished Anglicans now in China. The Rev. Francis Wei, president of Huachung University, wrote Bishop Nash as follows in a letter dated October 27, 1950:

"Your letter of October 13, 1950, was forwarded to me by Bishop Bentley of the National Council at 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City. You asked me to express my judgment on the matter of the United States government recognizing the Chinese government in Peking. To my mind there is no alternative, and the reasons are as follows:

"In the first place, the People's government in Peking is practically in control of the whole of China except Thibet and Formosa, which two regions may be liberated sooner or later. As far as population goes, the government is in control of 95% of the Chinese people.

"In the second place, I understand it is the policy of your government not to interfere in internal politics. Your government has already recognized the Eastern European nations, the governments of which are very similar to ours in nature, and there is no reason why China should be discriminated against.

"Thirdly, China has one-fourth of the world's population. For the maintenance of world peace it seems necessary for your government to recognize our government, so as to cooperate for that purpose.

"Fourthly, there seems to be a certain amount of misunderstanding between your government and ours, and it will be only after recognition that the two governments can come together, with diplomatic relations properly established, to remove if possible all the misunderstandings and suspicions.

"Lastly, ever since I have been able to understand politics and watch the actions of the governments in China, I have not known any government of my country which has done so much for the people in economic reconstruction, in maintenance of a sound currency, in stabilizing prices, in keeping peace and order, and in taking effective steps to establish democratic local government, so as to have really a National Government that represents the best interests of the whole nation. We have to remember that China is making a radical change in its economic policy from free economy to planned economy, which is not an easy change to make. In the meanwhile some people who have invested in lines of business not really conducive to the welfare of the people will have to suffer, but that is the price we have to pay in order to have an economic policy most adaptable to the interests of the Chinese nation. The war of liberation is not yet finished, and therefore taxes have to be heavy, but we hope they will be reduced when the war is entirely over and when industries have developed to a certain extent. Before this political change the people in China suffered without hope, but now they are willing to bear hardship for a better day to come.

"For the above reasons I would submit that the sooner the United States government recognizes the Chinese government in Peking the better. This is, of course, my personal opinion, but many of my colleagues in Huachung University share it, as far as I understand their feelings."

The second comes from Bishop Ronald Owen Hall of Hong Kong and South China, dated 20th, Oct., 1950:

"Re: your letter. A. I feel very strongly on this matter of recognition for two reasons:— (1) There is no question that the People's government are the real rulers of China: and there is no chance at all of our old friends of Taiwan being able to re-establish themselves. (2) The tendency today to criticize the type of government in another country, eg. British Labour— American capital, etc., needs I think the corrective given by such an act of recognition to a country whose type of government is clearly not what America would like it to be. (I think, though I don't know the facts well enough, that this means similar recognition should be extended to Spain. Except that she helped our enemies, whereas China helped our allies in the war and this may possibly weigh against Spain and for China).

"B. Our Ernie Bevin said it, when he said better admit her to United Nations than leave her to fight her way in.

"C. Britain has in fact gained a great deal from recognition. We suffer only from the charge of hypocrisy because we still support U. S. A. in some matters. U. S. A. won't gain as much as Britain because of Taiwan and Japan. China is terrified of a reconstructed Japan allied with U. S. A. They could at any moment blockade her coast completely.

"D. I would rather you did this on principle of international law, and non-interference in a country's ideology, or economy, than on the ground of making things easier for the Church in China, though no question it would be the greatest help especially to our beloved Robin Chen."

W. A. VISSER 't HOOFT, general secretary of World Council, speaks at mass meeting at Cleveland Convention

BISHOP ARMSTRONG IS MARRIED

★ Mrs. Thomas J. Bray Jr. and Bishop J. Gillespie Armstrong, suffragan of Pennsylvania, were married November 24 in St. John's Chapel, Manchester, Vermont. The marriage was solemnized by Bishop Oliver J. Hart of Pennsylvania.

Mrs. Armstrong, formerly Louise McKelvey of Youngstown, Ohio, lived for some time in Sewickley, Pennsylvania, and recently has been making her home at Dorset, Vermont. She was attended by her daughter, Mrs. Richard Ketchum, and was given in marriage by her son-in-law, Richard Ketchum.

CANON MORTLOCK VISITS BUFFALO

★ Canon C. D. Mortlock of Chichester Cathedral, England, spoke on Christian art and architecture on November 27 at the Albright Art Gallery, Buffalo. He presented the same address the following day at the Church of the Ascension, the meeting being for the clergy, though others attended.

MEN DO IT IN DENVER

★ It is the men this time and not the women. At St. Thomas Church, Denver, they are selling Christmas trees, wreaths and other greens each day and evening until Christmas. The money goes into the church treasury.

ISSUE REPORT ON BOMB

★ The United States would be justified in using atomic weapons if such weapons, or others of parallel destructiveness, are first used against this country or its allies. The view was presented by Bishop Angus Dun in Cleveland on behalf of a commission of the Federal Council composed of sixteen clergymen and laymen.

"We believe," the report said, "that American military strength, which must include atomic weapons as long as any other nation may possess them, is an essential factor in the possibility of preventing war and tyranny."

The commission said that it had reached its decision with "troubled spirits," but added that "any other conclusion would leave our own people and the people of other nations open to continuing devastating attack and to probable defeat."

The Rev. Robert L. Calhoun of Yale Divinity School and Prof. Georgia Harkness of the Pacific School of Religion presented minority reports. Prof. Calhoun said that the majority report might be defended on political and cultural grounds but added: "It can scarcely be regarded as distinctively Christian." Miss Harkness declared that under modern war conditions a restrained use of atomic weapons is "largely inapplicable." She also took exception to the commission's attitude toward pacifism which she described as "less simple and more responsible" than the sixteen-page report suggested.

BISHOP PAGE VISITS DETROIT

★ Bishop Herman Page of Northern Michigan preached at a number of parishes in metropolitan Detroit, November 5-12. He has visited the diocese on numerous occasions as a speaker and to assist Bishop Emrich and Bishop Hubbard with confirmations.

BISHOP WELLES VISITS ROANRIDGE

★ Bishop Edward Welles of West Missouri was the preacher at a union service of the three churches which are directed by the staff of the National Town-Country Institute at Roanridge. The service was held at Union Chapel, Parkville, with the congregations of Tiffany Springs and Farley Community Church joining. The music was furnished by the music majors of Park College.

LICHTENBERGER ACCEPTS

★ The Rev. Arthur Lichtenberger, professor at General Seminary, has accepted election as bishop coadjutor of Missouri. Subject to canonical consents, he will be consecrated at Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, in April.

ACHESON SUPPORTED ON POLICY

★ Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, addressed the National Council of Churches in a radio address from his Washington office, instead of coming to Cleveland. He called for help by the Churches to mobilize the nation's best resources of wisdom and faith in meeting the new situation in Korea.

Five of the outstanding leaders at the convention approved the statement, including the new president, Presiding Bishop Henry K. Sherrill, who told the press on November 30 that it "should have the united support of the American people." He was particularly impressed by Mr. Acheson's emphasis on the willingness of the U. S. to negotiate differences with other powers.

WESTERN NEW YORK HAS DIOCESAN HOUSE

★ The diocese of Western New York has a new diocesan house in Buffalo, the gift of Mrs. Kent S. McKinley. The plan is to move to the new headquarters in mid-summer.

BISHOP STERRETT of Bethlehem represented the Episcopal Church at the service which opened the convention of the National Council of Churches

NEW GUILD HALL COMPLETED

★ The remodeled guild hall on the close of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, was completed last week. The first floor provides a laymen's clubroom, a choir superior's room, laundry, workshop and garage for ten cars. The second floor provides robing rooms for clergy and choir.

Remodeling is now to start on the diocesan house to make two floors for offices and two for apartments.

BALL AND CHAIN GANG

★ St. Martin's, Omaha, Nebraska, has something new in the way of an organization—at least the name is unique—The Ball and Chain Gang. It is composed of married couples of the parish and meets once a month for a supper and program. Its project this month is a Christmas party for the children.

CANTERBURY CLUBS MEET AT HOBART

★ The Canterbury Club of Hobart and William Smith Colleges was host to the Canterbury Club of the diocese of Rochester on Friday and Saturday, Nov. 17-18. Theme of the conference was Church history and was based on the National Council's book "Chapters in Church History."

Principal speaker was Prof. Virginia Harrington of Barnard College. On Friday evening there was a meeting of the executive council of the diocesan club of which Roderic H. Pierce, Buckingham, Pa., president of the Canterbury Club of Hobart and William Smith, is chairman.

The holy eucharist was celebrated Saturday morning, Nov. 18th, and following breakfast the first of the discussion groups was held. A reception for the various officers and visiting clubs followed the afternoon session.

SERIES OF BROADCASTS FROM BUFFALO

★ Bishop Scaife of Western New York arranged a series of twenty-six broadcasts over WEBR, the first one being December 1, and continuing on Friday evenings from 9:30 to 10:30. National Council transcriptions are being used, with a three-minute local announcement at the close.

AMERICAN CHURCH UNION SPONSORS SERVICE

★ A service of solemn evensong and benediction was held at the Resurrection, New York, recently to observe the 166th anniversary of the bestowal of the American episcopate. It was under the auspices of the New York branch of the American Church Union. Bishop DeWolfe of Long Island was the preacher. Following the service the Rev. Albert J. duBois, executive director of the Union, conducted an organizational meeting.

POLICE DEPARTMENT TO THE RESCUE

★ The church school of St. Luke's, Mountain Brook, Alabama, has increased to such an extent that the local police department came to the rescue by permitting a class of about forty to be held at their headquarters. The enrollment is now about 175, making it one of the largest in the diocese.

BISHOP WHITTEMORE HITS TV ADS

★ Television advertising which exploits childhood emotions was condemned by Bishop Whittemore of Western Michigan. His protest was directed chiefly at a full-page ad captioned, "There are some things a son or a daughter won't tell you." The ad stated that the absence of a set in a home with children was "unthinkable" and detrimental to their "morale."

At the same time executives of 90 conference boards of education of the Methodist Church, meeting in Nashville, described the advertisement as "a new low in exploiting children." (See article on subject in this number.)

★ "Frozen with fear and hysteria, we are beginning to use totalitarian forms ourselves." Thus Judge Dorothy Kenyon summarized her talk on the United Nations at a supper meeting of the St. George's, New York, church business and professional women's group. Capping the above statement with a quotation from an Irish poet, namely, "Man becomes the image of the thing he hates," Miss Kenyon insisted that the success or failure of the UN lies in the hands of us, the people.

The tests, stated the Judge, by which we may measure up to what we preach are the following: First, political rights; second, equality—in the fields of race, religion, etc.; third, and this she emphasized as being the most important of all today, freedom of thought. In this connection, stressed the speaker, education means to learn to think, and to express our thoughts, without intimidation of any sort. The U.S. is renowned for its ideas and freedom of ideas; these represent a basic American type of greatness.

CHARLES P. TAFT, Episcopalian of Cincinnati, presided at the final general session of the National Council Convention on December 1

VILLAFANE NOMINATED FOR PUERTO RICO

★ A news dispatch from Puerto Rico on November 27th states that the Rev. Aristides Villafane, recently installed as dean of the cathedral at San Juan, has been nominated to succeed Bishop Boynton as bishop of the Island. It was contained in a story about a conference to be held with Roman Catholic bishops over the proposed new constitution for the country (Witness, Nov. 30). Bishop Boynton was named for the meeting but is likely not to participate since he takes up his new duties as suffragan of New York on January 1. The news story then stated that Dean Villafane would probably be elected bishop when the House of Bishops meets in El Paso on January 9th.

CONFERENCE ON RELIGION

★ President Gordon Keith Chalmers of Kenyon College was the visiting consultant for the faculty program at the conference on religion held November 19-22 at Western Reserve University, Cleveland. During the week religious leaders addressed classes in their fields of major interest. They were also available for personal conferences.

PROCESSIONAL CROSS FOR CATHEDRAL

★ A new processional cross has been presented to the Cathedral of St. John the Divine by the laymen's club of the cathedral in memory of the late Bishop Manning. It has been given the name "The cross of New York" because it will be carried only before the bishop of the diocese when he is in procession. It was designed and executed by Louis F. Glasier and contains 230 ounces of sterling silver, 30 ounces of gold and has 291 jewels. The man-hours in making it were 1,500, which included the labor of the designer, silversmith, goldsmith and jeweler.

It was carried for the first time on Thanksgiving when Bishop Donegan was the preacher.

ADDINSELL HEADS FUND DRIVE

★ Harry M. Addinsell, chairman of the board of the First Boston Corporation, has accepted the chairmanship of a New York committee which will seek gifts and bequests for the Episcopal Church Foundation. He is a director of the Foundation and a member of the National Council.

MEN'S CLUB DINNER IN PARIS

★ The largest post-war dinner meeting of the men's club of the American Pro-cathedral Church of the Holy Trinity, Paris, France, was held November 8 at the Students and Artists Center. General Henry Parkman, head of the E. C. A. mission, was elected president. Other officers: Col. Robert A. Solborg and Mr. Gerald Mayer, motion picture executive, vice-presidents; Mr. Isaac N. P. Stokes, head counselor of the E. C. A. and brother of the new rector of St. Bartholomew's, New York, secretary; Mr. Clement Brown, officer of an airline, treasurer. The Rev. Sturgis Riddle is the dean of the cathedral.

EDITORIALS

Come the Promised Time

IN his column in the New York Herald Tribune recently, Joseph Alsop made this prediction: "We have perhaps three or four years to enjoy ourselves, if we go on with business as usual, politics as usual, and self-delusion, as usual. The joy-ride, one hopes, will be very agreeable. But at the end will come a big bang, or more likely a small self-pitying whisper. And our world, the free world of the West, will then come to an end."

We should resent these words not because they may not be true, but because the facts which prompted Mr. Alsop to write them are such that all of us in some measure stand condemned, by the fact that such a fate can even be spoken of in a world which for the first time has the resources and energy, not only for survival, but abundant life.

For the first time in the history of mankind, men have within their grasp this potential to feed, clothe and house themselves satisfactorily. No longer need they be hungry, ill-housed, scantily clad. Through improved agricultural methods, through mass distribution and communications systems, through modern scientific improvements and the harnessing of atomic energy for constructive purposes, no one in the world need any longer suffer from these age-old insufficiencies.

But also, men have in their grasp the power to destroy this reality—by holding on to and resorting to politics as usual, self-delusion as usual—and war as usual, that last resort of men and nations who have failed, and are afraid to acknowledge failure and keep on trying.

The first half of the 20th century has brought death to some thirty million people of the earth through the direct act of war and death to countless millions of others who have suffered indirectly because of war through disease, pestilence and exposure. And now we are preparing for another war which will involve most of the earth's people.

Let us not stop to think of the fearful destruction and waste of the wealth and physical resources of the earth, which brings still further suffering and impoverishment. Let us think only of the bright future we shall never know if the machines of mass murder are to be unleashed in what may well be a final war. The proposition of our own day is peace and our common enemy is the war which will deny that peace to us and generations to come.

Bertrand Russell, speaking at Columbia recently, said, "The near future must either be much better or much worse than the past. The human race could, here and now, begin a rapid approach to a vastly better world, given one single condition, the removal of mutual distrust between East and West. We must prevent an explosion somehow, trusting that the time gained may bring wisdom."

He also said that the better or worse future will be decided by the whim of a few individuals. What a frightening and almost hopeless thought! Yet how sickeningly true it may turn out to be if the people of the world do not unite their hearts and voices and demand that the decisions which will determine the future of us all shall not be forced either through threat or fear of war. And if we are told that there are some things worse than war, let us be quick to reply "yes, and war brings every one of them."

Peace to be sure doesn't mean just the absence of war, but the presence of justice. It is justice which is concerned with the production of goods, their distribution, ownership and control—and all men living together in unity. Justice and hence peace, does not come in an instant, but by degrees. And it is useless to talk of justice in the abstract; we must see it in operation. In order to have a chance to get on with our chief business of obtaining justice, we need at least the absence of war and war preparations.

We plead with those who will hear to avoid the

"QUOTES"

PEACE is not just the absence of war. The peace the world wants must be free from fear—the fear of invasion, the fear of subversion, the fear of the knock on the door at midnight. The peace the world wants must be free from want, a peace in which neighbors help each other and together build a better life. The peace the world wants must be a moral peace, so that the spirit of man may be free, and the barriers between the hearts and minds of men may drop away and leave men free to unite in brotherhood.

—DEAN ACHESON
Secretary of State

final catastrophic failure of war. We plead not for appeasement born of fear, but for honest and open conference and negotiation, long persisted in until understanding comes and a common desire shared to choose life and not death for all peoples.

In particular, at this moment in history, nine representatives from Communist China have arrived in this country to talk. Here words from an editorial in the New York Times will best serve to express our own feelings as the crucial moment arrives. "They will be here, on the basis of announcements to date, to accuse the United States of aggression. But foolish and arrogant words do not in themselves justify war. There is room on this earth for inconsistent social and economic systems to survive, maintain mutually helpful relations and prosper. None but mad men can see in existing circumstances any reason for the slaughter of millions and the destruction of civilization."

To this proposition we would give assent, lending our support to any undertaking, springing from whatever source, which would serve notice on the few who have our fate in their hands that we will not accept war as the best solution of any of the problems that plague the nations. Let us reason together, even when we and they are most unreasonable. Let negotiations continue for years if necessary; any time is short compared to the endlessness of death. Let new men, fresh to the task be brought in if the first ones tire or exhaust their usefulness. Let not the effort be discontinued by reason of fatigue or difficulty. The stakes are too great to permit any such outcome. The proportion is peace, not only for us in our time, but for all men through all time. And the time to start is always now.

We must never believe that any action we may take or any word we may speak, however small, is useless. We should never be beguiled into thinking we are too small to matter. God has a way of choosing and using the weak things of this world to confound the things that are mighty. The future belongs to us and millions like us in every land under the sun, if we have the courage to demand that "war as usual" shall be banished from the earth.

The Subversiveness of the Bill of Rights

BY
RANDOLPH CRUMP MILLER
Professor at Church Divinity School of the Pacific

I HAVE entitled this article "The Subversiveness of the Bill of Rights," because I am not sure today we live in the kind of country which our forefathers envisaged in the Bill of Rights. I am afraid that we have lost faith in the people, which was basic to the thinking of our founders. At the same time, we assume that men are naturally good, which also was doubted by our more realistic founders.

I suppose this is controversial, but this is no emotional appeal. It is simply an attempt to read the signs of the times from a Christian and realistic viewpoint.

Let us begin with a quotation from a Negro American, who prefaced a stirring speech against Communism with these words: "I know that life in these United States can be mighty tough for people who are a little different from the majority —in their skin, color, or the way they worship God, or the way they spell their names."

This is a good introduction to the Bill of Rights, which begins with: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of their grievances."

This and the other articles gave a freedom which was genuine although circumscribed. It did not mean, for example, that in the name of religion a man could break other laws, such as in the practice of polygamy among the Mormons. Freedom of the press was limited by the Sedition Act of 1798, and we still recognize the importance of wartime censorship. But on the whole, we have maintained a high level of freedom of speech, press, and opinion because we have believed in a democracy based upon the will of the people. There has been a faith that the truth will prevail in free and open discussion, and that it cannot be discovered by any other means.

The security of the people against unlawful entry and search, trial by jury, and that wonderful phrase, "nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," made it clear that a man is assumed to be innocent until proved guilty.

This, as I see it, is the essence of American democracy, where the rulers are subject to free elections, and the rule of the majority is the law of the land, but where minority rights are always protected.

A New Menace

IN our great land, however, a new menace has arisen. It is frankly materialistic, totalitarian, and opposed to freedom as we understand it. This force of Communism is dangerous to both the American way of life and to Christianity. We should combat it.

But let us see what happens. Instead of approaching this problem in terms of rational action, we allow our emotions to take over. And when these emotions are based on fear and distrust, we begin to lose faith in ourselves, and then our reactions are not those of people who have faith in democratic processes and the free search for truth. We try to regiment ourselves in the very areas where freedom is basic to our way of life. We begin to think of the Bill of Rights as subversive, and we put controls on religion, freedom of speech, the press, and the right of assembly.

In the light of the present climate of opinion, do you recall what Thomas Jefferson said about his University of Virginia? "This institution," he said, "will be based on the illimitable freedom of the human mind. For here we are not afraid to follow the truth wherever it may lead or to tolerate any error, so long as reason is left free to combat it." When we have come to the conclusion that Communism seems to destroy both freedom and truth, then it is our duty to combat it, and I doubt if Communists should be tolerated in any position of public trust.

Let us look at loyalty for a moment. I can do no better than quote from the president of the University of Wisconsin, Edwin Broun Fred: "Loyalty is an enthusiasm, not an obligation. It is a way of life, not a motto . . . Sound loyalty cannot be prescribed like a college course. It must be earned. Valid loyalty cannot be ordered around, like a draftee on a parade ground. It must be desired . . . If ever American peacetime loyalty becomes identified with blind allegiance to the status quo, or with keeping our mouths shut, we are lost, as individuals and as a nation."

This means that when we insist on supplementary oaths, we are denying our faith in the pledge of allegiance to our country which is basic to Christian citizenship. It means that any group can insist on a new oath, and thus the rights guaranteed in the Bill of Rights are jeopardized. It is walking into the trap set by the Communists.

They feared Communism, and rightly, in Germany, too. So they had an oath, which went like this: "I swear: I will keep faith to Volk and Vaterland, honor the constitution and laws, and fulfill my official duties conscientiously, so help me God." That oath is simpler than many required in our country today. No one could reasonably refuse to sign it. But in eight months, instead of the constitution, the following was substituted: "Adolf Hitler, Fuhrer des deutschen Reiches and Volkes." It was an oath of loyalty to a person as leader. The people were done right then, for in the name of Hitler anything could be demanded, including any relationship to Jews. It is not the first oath, but the second, which springs the Communist trap, for by then we have cancelled our civil liberties and are no longer a strong democracy.

It is possible that this is a wrong analysis, and that the sanity of our people will not let this happen. But nation after nation has been saying, "It can't happen here," and it did. Czechoslovakia was a democratic nation modeled after ours, but it fell quickly and easily.

The second trouble with the oath is that it does not catch Communists. It is part of Communist ethics to sign any oath. All the oath did at the University of California was to eliminate loyal Americans who disbelieved in the oath for various reasons. The faculty lost its academic freedom, and no Communists were found. Thus, the oath is not of value for its avowed purpose, and brings with it a denial of the bill of rights and jeopardizes a man's right to "life, liberty, and property without due process of law." Governor Warren made this clear when he said: "We are discharging these people not because they are Communists, not because they are suspected of being Communists, but because they are recalcitrant and won't conform to the orders of this board of regents."

Deny Our Heritage

THE issue of Communism has become an emotional problem, not only at the University of California, but throughout the nation. And in the name of our great and glorious tradition of political and academic freedom, we curtail our freedom without catching Communists. The Bill of Rights is treated as subversive, and we undo the great work of our founding fathers.

This is what worries me. There is nothing in the oath to which I wouldn't gladly assent, but it is the principle of the oath which bothers me. For the oath puts a halter on freedom of speech, and becomes a form of thought control; and this makes us all the more susceptible to Communist or other non-democratic forces.

Freedom Needed

CHRISTIANITY says that "you will know the truth and the truth will make you free." It is exactly because of the lack of freedom of thought, of free research and free speech, that we oppose Communism. They have sacrificed the freedom that makes truth possible.

The striving for peace does not come from a straight-jacket, but from a dynamic unity based on mutual trust. The psalmist writes that "Jerusalem is built as a city that is at unity in itself."

Yet one minister was asked for his resignation for speaking against loyalty oaths. We are in an epidemic of emotional reactions, not realizing that each oath carries us beyond the point of mutual trust in each other, to a new form of American Fascism.

Phillips Brooks

WE have forgotten what Christian citizenship really means. Many years ago, as The Witness recently had in "Quotes," Phillips Brooks summarized it for us:

"I plead with you for all that makes strong citizens. First, clear convictions, deep, careful, patient study of the government under which we live, until you not merely believe it is the best in the world, but know why you believe.

"And then a clear conscience, as much ashamed of public as of private sin, as ready to hate and rehate and vote down corruption in the state, in your own party, as you would be in your own store or church; as ready to bring the one as the other to the judgment of the living God.

"And then unselfishness, an earnest and exalted sense that you are for the land, and not alone the land for you.

"And then activity: the readiness to wake and watch and do a citizen's work, untiringly, counting it as base not to vote at an election, not to work against a bad official, or to work for a good one, as it would have been to shirk a battle or a war.

"Such a strong citizenship let there be among us; such knightly doing of our duties on the fields of peace."

Wendell Phillips writes that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." "God grants liberty," said Daniel Webster, "only to those who love it, and are always ready to guard and defend it." So we pray, "Defend our liberties, and fashion into one united people the multitudes brought hither out of many kindreds and tongues."

TV or Not TV, That Is the Question

BY
WILLIAM B. SPOFFORD JR.

FOR the past month, so-called experts in child behavior, such as Angelo Patri, have been dulcetly warning me over the radio that my sons are becoming social misfits and pariahs and, secretly, are building up a healthy hatred for me because, so far, we haven't bought a television set.

Since television is obviously here to stay — and since, for the past three weeks, our eldest hasn't reported in for supper until 6:15 p.m. at which time Howdy-Doody or Ollie the Dragon has disappeared from the screen of the neighbor's Capehart—we've been meditating on the experts' "huckstering" advice. Where, exactly, do we stand in respect to this new mechanism which, in one year, did more dollars worth of business than the automobile in its first decade or the radio in its first five years?

The question should be important to Church people because our religion says that healthy family life is the essence of our faith. Is this thing a threat, a boon or simply an amoral invention which our scientific age has thrown our way so that we are forced to make another difficult decision?

Culling some of the literature and research studies on the matter brings forth these points:

Psychologists say that television has an impact which is from three to twenty times as powerful as radio's—which means that the recipient of the impact can get shocked, propagandized or educated three to twenty times more effectively. When you consider the abundance of programs each week in which human beings are graphically stabbed with ice picks, multilated with axes or left to droop on the floor with glasses, smelling suspiciously of almonds (which any "whodunit" fan knows is indicative of strychnine poisoning), just outside the range of their limp hands, the impact seems to have predominantly a "shock" value. Or, as James Miller in The Nation states, in discussing the fifteen vaudeville acts presented weekly: "Even parents who themselves enjoy the scantily clad leg and the off-color gag may reasonably object to their children's intellectual appetites being formed in the atmosphere of the old Palace."

Some educators hint that their charges' grades, this year, are from 25 to 50 per cent lower than last year and attribute the difference largely to television. In those homes in the rapidly-expanding TV belt, the children are, apparently, gluing themselves to the set before, during and after supper until such time as frantic parents can cajole or threaten them into going to bed.

Prof. Dallas W. Smythe, of the University of Illinois' institute of communications, states that primary and secondary schools will have to revise their curricula if children of today are to grow up into reasoning adults. He fears that children may become, as adults, incapable of making decisions for themselves unless the schools orient their pupils toward the real world we inhabit—a real world which is being made misty by the "never-never" land of TV. He also suggests that the schools will have to compensate for the lack of active play in the lives of children whose time free from school is spent in passive TV viewing rather than in outdoor recreation, pursuing a hobby or reading. He hints that the child of the future may be, predominantly, a gigantic optic nerve rather than a muscular quadruped that we now know.

Dr. Edward C. McDonagh, doing some research on TV's effect on the family, presents these facts and sees these social changes:

1. More large families than small ones own television.
2. The families stay home more than before.
3. More visitors are entertained in the home.
4. Fewer sport activities are participated in.
5. Members of the family read less.
6. There is less pleasure driving.
7. The family attends fewer motion pictures.
8. The family is changing into an audience group rather than a social group.

All of which conjures up a picture of family units, each member of which is as pale as the reptiles in the stygian gloom of the Mammoth Cave, sitting quietly, munching popcorn, before the semi-divine figure of Milton Berle. It is pretty difficult to make a fruitful pastoral visit in such an environment.

This thing, apparently, has an insidious psychological effect. At least, whether consciously or unconsciously I know not, during world series week, a heavy percentage of my pastoral calls were in those homes which enabled me to sit calmly on the sofa and watch the Yankees pummel the Phillies into submission. And once, when Tim, the eldest, happened to make one of these visits with me, and sought to ask me a question, I said: "Wait a minute—the Phillies have two men on and nobody out." Of course, I didn't look at him when I said it—I was watching the screen!

The Dogma of the Assumption

BY
WALTER LOWRIE
Formerly Rector at Rome, Italy

THE proclamation of the dogma of the Assumption is dolorous to us because it separates the Church of Rome more than ever from the rest of Christendom and erects one more obstacle to reunion. But the hope of union with Rome has never been so bright that we have cause to sorrow greatly at this new rebuff. And Rome has for a long time past been so thoroughly committed to the principle of the Greater Vehicle that the adoption of this new dogma can cause us no surprise. We cannot even be surprised if before long the Pope decrees that all divine grace comes through the Virgin Mary—as is indicated by the feelers which have been advanced to test public opinion.

The Greater Vehicle (Mahayana) is the term used to describe the prevailing schools of Buddhism which boast of being able to assimilate religious notions of the most various sort (including even Christian elements) which find no support in their Scriptures or in the early traditions. An article of mine which is about to appear in the "Anglican Theological Review" calls attention to the Mahayana tendency in the Church of Rome, without taking into account this latest instance of it.

The Church of Rome, as I have said, is so thoroughly committed to the principle of the Greater Vehicle that we hear no voice of protest against the proclamation of this new dogma, although it is far more ominous than the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, which not long ago provoked serious defections. Yet the dogma of the Immaculate Conception was comparatively innocuous, since it affirms no more than most Americans claim for themselves—that they are born without the taint of original sin.

The proclamation of the dogma of the Assumption will be felt as a galling burden by many men of light and leading who already have cause enough to groan under "the Roman obedience." For "the Assumption of our Lady" is in a category totally different from the Ascension of our Lord. Jesus "was crucified, dead and buried." This is a fundamental declaration of the Creed. After that he descended into the abode of departed spirits. That "he rose again from the dead" is an amazing declaration, since "Christ was the first fruits of them that slept." Nothing like it had occurred before in the history of mankind. It is not so amazing that he "ascended into heaven," after appearing occasionally by the space of forty days in a body so etherial that it could pass through closed doors—and could disappear as suddenly as it had appeared until the day when it was seen no more, and the disciples believed that Christ had "ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty, from whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead." Yet ten days later, on the Day of Pentecost, he was "seen" ("seen by more than five hundred brethren at once," said St. Paul), but seen only as Spirit. On the other hand, the Assumption of the Virgin is an instance of levitation (a word of unholy associations), and the implication is (St. Paul's solemn declaration to the contrary notwithstanding) that flesh and blood can inherit the kingdom of God.

Extremes Meet

BUT Mahayana Buddhism is not the only analogy which illuminates the tendency of Catholicism in the Church of Rome. Extremes meet, and in some of the extremest Calvinistic sects we find an analogy which is equally close. I have in mind the Scottish Covenanters and the so-called United Presbyterians in America. Why they were called "United" was explained to me by one of their ministers when he said that "two parties united to form three sects—taking into account the dissident remnants." The chief peculiarity of these divisive sects (which like the lowest animals propagate only by scision) is the conviction that every individual Church has the duty of enlarging its "witness" continually by prescribing more and more dogmas as the condition of communion. In this way they legislate themselves out of existence. The bigger the "testimony," the smaller the Church. In this respect the Church of Rome seems to allign itself with these excentric sects, in opposition not only to the vague liberalism which would reduce to the vanishing point the area of prescribed dogma, but also to the conservatism of the Orthodox Churches, which cling to the ecumenical creeds of the fourth and fifth centuries, and would have neither more nor less.

I do not mean to imply that the Church of Rome is in danger of legislating itself out of existence—so long as it decrees only what the people want. Mahayana Buddism was strengthened in China by the adoption of the godess of mercy, Kuan-yin, an innovation derived from the Nestorian cult of the Virgin Mary. The people of China and Japan wanted it! And it appears now that a great many people in the Church of Rome want a full-scale godess of mercy, seated, as the pictures represent, on the left hand of God the Father Almighty. I do not recall precisely how many hundreds of bishops, archbishops and cardinals are said to have acclaimed the dogma of the Assumption inside the walls of the Vatican. I remember that the number was impressive. It seemed to be a unanimous acclaim. And it is said that outside, crowding the Piazza di San Pietro, seventy-five thousand people cheered for it, hurrahed for it. The popularity of this doctrine is proved by the immense popularity of the festival, during which one cannot travel with comfort in some parts of Europe. In Germany the traveller learns to dread the name Maria Himmelfahrt. In Italy this festival is called appropriately by a pagan name, Ferie agosto, i.e., sports in honor of Augustus. How could the Pontifex Maximus resist the popular pressure to make this find belief a dogma?

It is to be expected that the formulation of "bigger and better" creeds will proceed now with an accelerated tempo, since the process of production has been vastly simplified by the elimination of the Ecumenical Council. The so-called Vatical Council may well be the last. Its effect as a council was to put an end to all councils. For when it decreed the infallibility of the Pope, it was plausibly reported of Pius IX that he said wittily, "L'Eglise c'est moi." If this was not said, it was cleverly invented (ben trovato, as the Italians say). The dogma of Papal Infallibility looks like a stream-lined tool for the limitless production of dogmas. All may go well so long as the demand exceeds the supply; but overproduction will surely lead to inflation.

Askers

BY

PHILIP H. STEINMETZ
Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

ASKERS are channels. They are the open way through which anything may flow and without which very little does flow. In the flow of love from God to people there have to be askers or there is no channel and much that might happen doesn't.

Often the asker does not know the person who benefits from the request. But the response is none the less forthcoming and effective. For instance, church canvassers do not know the people in Africa or China who benefit from Christian missions but their asking maintains the work.

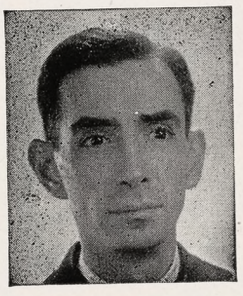
These truths lie back of what we call "intercession" in the Christian Church. God needs us to ask for help for people and causes, to serve as channels of grace, even though we do not know or see the ultimate receivers.

Are you willing to serve as an asker? It means giving some time each day to simple, direct, asking prayers to God for people and causes. It is work which can be done at home, in bed, by old folks or children. It is open to many who cannot do the active manual work of meals and meetings, or who do not get to public services of worship.



Askers are channels. Will you open one for God's use in reaching needs in the world today?

The Living Liturgy --- A Semantic Note

BY

MASSEY H. SHEPHERD JR.

IN our generation of competitive propaganda and journalese the fine distinction in the meaning of words are rapidly becoming a lost province of knowledge. Especially is this true of the etymological or original meanings attached to words. Liturgical language is a particular victim of this tendency, for it carries along in current usage many archaic words and phrases which have lost their primary connotation. Moveover, the liturgy, like the Bible, is a translated literature and contains many terms for which the English language provides no exact equivalent of the Greek or Latin originals. Most of the clergy have had to explain at one time or another the real meaning of such words as "charity" or "comfortable" or "expedient" as we find them used in our liturgy. We all know that the word "remembrance" is utterly inadequate as a translation of the Greek "anamnesis," but we are hard put to it to find anything better in its place. The great religious word "sacrifice," which literally means to "make sacred," has become so cheapened in popular usage that storekeepers will use it to describe a bargain counter of goods.

There is an Offertory Sentence in our Holy Communion rite which furnishes a good illustration of the problem: "To do good, and to distribute, forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." My attention was first drawn to this sentence by Dr. Walter Lowrie, who has pointed to the superior translation of the King James Version, which reads "communicate" for "distribute." (See his comments in The Lord's Supper and the Liturgy, Longmans, 1943, pp. 128-29). Our Offertory Sentences, like our Psalter, come from the version of the Great Bible of 1539; and they were not changed by the 1662 revisers of the Prayer Book, as were the Epistles and Gospels, to conform to the King James or Authorized Version of 1611. It is interesting to note that the Scottish Prayer Book since 1637 has adopted the King James translation, and so also did Bishop Seabury's Communion Office, which he published for use in Connecticut in 1786: "To do good, and to communicate, forget not, etc."

The word "distribute" is, as Dr. Lowrie says, a "heartless word." It does not carry the idea of sharing in fellowship and mutual love. A man may distribute of his possessions and wealth from compulsion or a sense of duty or even from a motive of enlightened self-interest, but not necessarily from a desire to promote communion with his fellows. To distribute is to scatter abroad. It is to treat individuals as separate objects of benefits. It suggests the secularistic viewpoint of share-the-wealth panaceas. On the other hand, the word "communicate" when used in the context of the Communion Offertory can also lead to misunderstanding—another example of the way we tend to reduce the richness of meaning in words. To many people it would suggest only the idea of making their communion, i.e., receiving the Sacrament. I notice that the Revised Standard Version translates: "Do not neglect to do good and to share what you have." This is banal, but it is nearer to the original meaning.

We have to study the whole context of the passage in Hebrews 13:15-16. The author of the epistle is speaking of the two facets of Christian sacrifice: worship and charity. The Eucharist is both the means of our offering of thanksgiving and of our fellowship with one another in mutual sharing. It is the same picture given us in the Book of Acts (2:42) of the corporate life and worship of the apostolic company in those first days after Pentecost: "And they continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers." The word "fellowship" in this passage is exactly the same word in the original Greek as our Offertory Sentence word for "distribute" or "communicate." For a Christian to communicate means not merely to share in the gifts of Christ's presence in the sacramental elements, but to share also with other men in the gifts of God's material creation. The Eucharist is itself rooted in a principle of share-the-wealth. But it goes beyond a mere distribution to the neediest according to their need. It is a real communication, the establishment of fellowship in the basic elements of existence, both material and spiritual. Through the Eucharist we are pledged to the work of reconciliation, not only between ourselves and our holy God but between ourselves and all of God's earthly creatures. Unless the Offertory gifts are presented with both these intentions they cannot be sacrifices with which "God is well pleased."

You Can Slip

BY

WILLIAM P. BARNDS

Rector of St. Matthew's, Lincoln

IT is not unusual to meet an inactive church person who will tell you that he used to be active in church. Perhaps he sang in a boys' choir or was an acolyte. Sometimes it is a woman who was active in some parish, even to the extent of teaching a Church school class or working on the altar guild. Yet now these people hardly ever attend church and seem to have slight concern with the Christian religion.

One wonders how this can be. It is hard to see how a person who has ever really once known and felt the grace of God, and the wonder of the Christian faith, and the power of Christ can ever completely lose his interest in religion. Sometimes we are tempted to question how real the conviction was in the first place. And yet it is possible, apparently, for a really faithful church person to lose interest. It may be because of some unhappy experience, or maybe because of some disillusionment, or some strong temptation unresisted, or because of weariness, or maybe because of breaking the habit of church attendance. There are many possible reasons.

In any case it should make us stop and think. We may say that it can't happen to us—that we know we will always be faithful, come what may. Such over-confidence is dangerous. We need continually to depend on God's help, and to keep close to the church by regular attendance. Of great importance is a truly religious attitude in which we seek first the welfare of the church, and the glory of God, instead of our own selfish notions. We, too, can slip. The scriptural warning is always timely: Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

OFFICIAL ACTION

THE COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of New Brunswick, N. J. recently started a campaign to make Christmas, and other religious festivals, less commercial. About a year ago an editorial in The Witness told the story of a Churchwoman's gift designed to that end. She made a gift to her rector to use at his discretion. She then sent notes to those she had remembered with gifts in other years, telling them she had made this thank offering for their friendship.

This story, together with the results of the gift told by Bishop Hines of Texas, is now in a leaflet.

We suggest that rectors enclose this leaflet in parish bulletins sometime during Advent, giving parishioners an opportunity to make a similar gift, thus furthering the effort to

No. 32. BRITISH HUMANITARIANISM: ESSAYS HONORING FRANK J. KLINGBERG, edited by Samuel C. McCulloch.

"These ten essays by ten professional historians, former doctoral students of Professor Klingberg, illuminate the work of the Anglican Church, through the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (commonly called the S.P.G.), as the motivating power in the growth of British humanitarianism. This volume is a striking corrective of that school of historians which ignores religion and the Church in their historiography."—Dr. Walter H. Stowe. $4.00

No. 29. A BISHOP OF THE GREAT PLAINS, by George Allen Beecher.

"Bishop George Allen Beecher of Western Nebraska was one of the episcopal giants of the generation just behind us (he retired in 1943; was consecrated in 1910) . . . Here is a man who is pleasingly unconscious of his greatness. Not all great bishops and other ecclesiastics are so, judging from their autobiographies. Bishop Beecher was a missionary of apostolic stature, and was a delightful person as well. There is a frank, wide-open humor in him that well befits a bishop of the wide-open spaces. Churchmen of Nebraska will greatly relish this book; but I hope it will find a wide non-Nebraska reading public as well . . ."—Dr. Carroll Simcox in The Living Church. $3.00

No. 28. THE PROVINCE OF THE PACIFIC, by Louis Childs Sanford.

"This is an accurate account of the development of the Episcopal Church in the West by the one best qualified to write in terms of the province, of which he was president for many years. Following a brilliant essay ["Provinces: Ancient and Modern"] by Bishop Parsons, there is the story of the way in which the Church in the West was organized . . . Because of the large geographical area and the circumstances of Church life in the West, the Province of the Pacific has had a significant influence . . . and has attempted to increase the prestige of the provincial system . . ."—Dr. Randolph Crump Miller in "The Churchman." $3.00

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

Church and State in England. By Cyril Garbett. Macmillan. $3.00.

The Archbishop of York has written a wonderfully fine exposition of the meaning of the Church of England, in its long historical setting, and in its significance for personal religious living. In this volume, he deals with the basic question of the relations between church and state in England, with the Royal Supremacy which succeeded the Papal Supremacy, and finally, the Supremacy of Parliament which succeeded that of the King. Chapter V deals with church and state in the 20th century, and the actual problems facing the Church of England today. These questions are dealt with in the remaining chapters of the book, The Establishment, Disestablishment or Reform? Church Reform in the Past, The Appointment of Bishops, The Revision of the Prayer Book, The Revision of Canon Law, The Reform of the Church Courts, The Reform of the Parochial System, The Churchman as Citizen, Epilogue: For What Purpose?

The book is the most interesting and penetrating study of the Church of England to appear since Dean Inge's book of about 20 years ago.

A Life of Jesus. By Edgar J. Goodspeed. Harper, $3.00.

Every book Professor Goodspeed writes is interesting, well written, and illuminating. What surprises us about this one is its conservatism. He takes the Gospel of Mark almost as it stands, with no attention to the past thirty years of "tradition criticism," and with the same "social gospel" presuppositions that were current thirty and forty years ago. There is almost no recognition of the very pronounced theological character of the Gospel of Mark. In fact the book might have been written long ago, in the great days of the Burton-Goodspeed-Mathews triumvirate at the University of Chicago. That is its virtue—and its limitation.

The Legacy of Maimonides. By Ben Zion Bokser. Philosophical Library. $3.75.

A "popular" book on one of the greatest minds in Jewish history. Maimonides was great as an exegete, as a philosopher, as a moralist, and as a spiritual guide.

Render to God. By J. Spencer Kennard Jr. Oxford. $3.00.

This is an immensely learned little book, the product of many years of research, and setting forth conclusions which all students in the New Testament must take seriously. Dr. Kennard holds that our Lord did encourage non-payment of the Roman tribute, that he did look upon himself as the Messiah (in the political sense), and that he did threaten the security of the Roman occupation in Palestine. The book is well-illustrated with photographs of coins and of the wonderful Tiberius cameo at Vienna.

How to Read and Enjoy the Psalms. By Maurice Clarke. Wilcox and Follett. $1.25.

An elementary guide, full of illustrative material, and leading to the intermeaning of the Psalter.

East and West. By Mary Burt Messer. Philosophical Library. $3.00.

A Christian Scientist's reply to the Communist Manifesto—an interesting and curious work.

All Reviews are by Dr. Grant unless otherwise indicated.

An Ideal Christmas Gift for Your Family —

THE HYMNAL 1940 (Musical Edition)

THE HYMNAL 1940 COMPANION

boxed attractively in combination

Published in 1949, the "COMPANION" contains stories of the hymns and those who wrote them and set them to music. Here in one volume is the historic background of each of the hymns in THE HYMNAL 1940, the official hymnal of the Episcopal Church, to help you and your family gain knowledge of these hymns and to "sing with greater understanding."

" . . . To read the biographies (of authors and composers) stirs the mind to recall the history of the Christian Church . . . Here is a remarkable book . . . "—The Virginia Pilot

GEORGE MacMURRAY

INTERESTING FEMALE FIGURES:—Any male this side of 90, like the late Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, is interested in female figures. Those who argue "ad nauseum" against the ladies on vestries, or as delegates to diocesan conventions, not to mention the General Convention, should ponder these figures.

Women today hold 70 per cent of all national wealth; 80 per cent of life insurance benefits; 65 per cent of all savings accounts; 48 per cent of all railroad stocks; 44 per cent of all real estate titles; 54 per cent of the preferred stock in 39 leading corporations—and purchase 85 per cent of all merchandise sold. — North Carolina Churchman

A VOTE OF CONFIDENCE:—The Living Church writing on the every member canvass states that at canvass time the churchman has an opportunity to vote for or against the Church. Our contemporary's premise may not be absolutely true, but both parishes and dioceses which are falling behind in their obligation might well give serious thought to these words.

An adequate pledge on the black side of the envelope is the best possible vote of confidence in your parish; an adequate pledge on the red side is a vote of confidence in your diocese and the general Church. An inadequate pledge, or none at all, on either or both sides, is in effect a vote of "no confidence" in this annual Church-wide plebiscite.

NOT WOMEN'S WORK ONLY:—In popular thinking the religious training of children in the home rests with mother. This we know is not true. It is good to see this myth challenged in cold type. The Canadian Churchman makes father's responsibility clear. It is the privilege and I believe the responsibility of the father in the Christian home to establish the practice of family worship. It should be possible for every father, at the beginning or the end of each day, to gather his family about him for a brief period during which the Bible is read and prayers are offered.

ADEQUATELY STATED:—Since the Pope proclaimed the assumption of the Virgin Mary as "required belief" there has been much written. Even the secular press did a bit. "Life" gave it a big play. Interesting to us as PE's is the tribute given by the Presbyterians to the statement of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York. "The United Presbyterian" says that the announcement of the Archbishops states the cause for Protestantism completely, comprehensively, and accurately that comment is unnecessary.

Just in case you missed the Archbishops' announcements we quote: "The Church of England renders honor and reverence to the Mother of our Lord Jesus Christ. But there is not the smallest evidence in the scripture or in the teachings of the early Church of belief in the doctrine of her bodily assumption. We profoundly regret that the Roman Catholic Church has chosen by this act to increase dogmatic differences in Christendom and has thereby gravely injured the growth of understanding between Christians."

A RELIGIOUS DAILY:—In Kansas City, Missouri, an eight page Roman Catholic daily, The Sun Herald, began publication early in October. One of its first editorials made suggestions as to how the quarter-of-a-billion dollar Ford Foundation might spend some of its money. Among the suggestions were immediate study and speedy answers to these: how to get our surplus food to starving people all over the world; where to find new homes for millions of people in Italy, Japan and other over-populated countries; how to reach the Russian people themselves and what to tell them when we do establish contact.

TRANSITION:—The Federal Council Bulletin after 33 years of service will cease publication with the December issue. A new publication will replace it under the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U. S. A. The name for the new magazine has not been chosen.

NEWS OF CHURCHES OVERSEAS

INTERCOMMUNION REPORT BEWILDERS BRITISH

A report on proposals for intercommunion between the Church of England and the Free Churches has caused bewilderment in England. Based on four years of study by a joint commission, the report runs counter to principles tenaciously held by one or more groups. Acceptance of the episcopate appears to be the stumbling block to Protestant leaders. Yet the strong Anglo-Catholic group inside the Church of England are uncompromising on the issue.

GERMAN SYNOD HITS REARMAMENT

A resolution denouncing German rearmament and urging Christians to "continue their efforts toward peace in faith" was adopted by the synod of the Evangelical Church in the Rhineland, meeting at Velbert, Nov. 24. It declared that rearmament would hinder Germans "in fulfilling necessary social tasks, promote the resurgence of nationalistic trends, and turn eastern and western Germany into two hostile camps, with the danger of leading to war."

TITO NEGOTIATING WITH VATICAN

Negotiations have been initiated in Rome by Marshal Tito for an agreement between the Vatican and Yugoslavia, according to the Rome reporter of the Christian Science Monitor. Terms provide for the prompt release of Archbishop Stepinac and other imprisoned priests, the restoration of religious instruction in the public schools, permission for R. C. papers to resume publication, government grants for building R. C. schools, and the reestablishmet of direct contact between Yugoslav bishops and the Vatican. In return the Vatican is to discontinue "h o s t i l e propaganda" against Yugoslavia, and the clergy are to cooperate in social and economic programs.

Later, one of the two Yugoslav priests who was said to be in Rome to carry forward the negotiations, the Rev. Joseph Maric, professor at Zagreb University in Croatia denied that he was there for such a purpose.

ANGLICAN ASSEMBLY MEETS IN LONDON

The assembly of the Church of England met Nov. 14 in its restored legislative home, the circular hall in Church House, Westminster, bombed during the war. The original hall, opened in 1940, received a direct bomb hit that same year. During the war the assembly met elsewhere since the government used most of Church House as a meeting place for parliament.

CANADIAN CHURCHES URGE REFORMS

The Canadian Council of Churches, meeting the last week of November at Toronto, expressed concern over "the increasing consumption of alcoholic beverages"; urged that sex education be made available to youth under proper auspices; urged members to combat the flood of "obnoxious pornographic books" in the country's bookstores. Attention was also called to widespread gambling, with the resolution stating that "there is no room or place for gambling rackets in Canada, whether domestic or imported."

VIDA D. SCUDDER
Churchwoman of Wellesley, Mass.

Alas, that in refusing visas to many wishing to attend the Sheffield Conference on Peace, the British government, which I have always regarded as our best (secular) hope, should have adopted the chief method of the nation they suspect and oppose. Such poisonous contagion is the device of our adversary, the Devil. I am very pleased to have sponsored the Sheffield meeting.

HYATT HOWE WAGGONER
Prof. at Kansas City University

Thanks for the splendid statement, "Common Idolatries" by E. A. Callanan Jr. (Nov. 16). This seems to me the sort of thing we need to be told, and told, and told again. If we are not being told it from very many pulpits, must we not conclude that the Warden Joneses described by Mr. Callanan are actually in the majority in many parishes? And if that is so, what are we to conclude about the way the Church is fulfilling its mission?

REGINALD G. ROBSON
Rector, Christ Church, Las Vegas, Nev.

For the protection of the clergy, I wish to make a correction in the letter of the Rev. Raymond K. Kiebs to The Witness (Nov. 16), regarding one Robert Westfall. The story of this man did include a wife and child. But I have, I hope, rescued the alleged wife and child and have them in a Christian environment. Westfall escaped us in his two and one-half day stay in Las Vegas, but not before marrying some woman during that time, who took steps to have the marriage annulled but she, too vanished. So the man may be now on his own or with a wife. Anyway I join with the Rev. Ray Riebs in warning all the clergy to beware of this man. He is a very smooth individual besides being an alcoholic.

R. LOUISE TRAVOUS
Churchwoman of Edwardsville, Ill.

The Rev. Philip H. Steinmetz writes in your issue of November 23: "Our knowledge of God is a gift. We could not and our ancestors did not seek and find him. He came to us in a series of events we call the Incarnation..." Certainly our knowledge of God is a gift. A gift from the Jews, after a long and difficult seeking. Going back far enough, even to Noah, we might find our ancestors among them. Any faith that has held firmly to the one God, with few divisions among them, for years that mount into the thousands, requiring no go-between as intercessor nor for clearer understanding, should have full, unquestioned credit for the greatest discovery man has ever made. Up to this point Mr. Steinmetz's "Give and Take" is excellent, a new thought soundly and persuasively presented.

ELDRED JOHNSTON
Rector of St. Mark's, Dayton, Ohio

In reading St. John's Gospel the other day I was struck as never before with the significance of our Lord's statement to the Samaritan woman: "Salvation is from the Jews." It seems one of the strangest twists of history how this people which should never lose our respect for having furnished the matrix of our religion has in many Christian countries become the subject of ridicule and discrimination. Also consider that in the recent official acceptance of the dogma of the "Assumption," the Roman Church has elevated a Jewess to a position far above that of any Christian woman in history.

Layman of Moorhead, Minn.

I sure enjoy The Witness, your editorial policy and stand on present day problems of national and international importance. It takes courage in these times.

Council Requests Missionaries To Withdraw From China

December 5-7 Meeting Receives Reports From Various Department Heads

BY
ANDREW M. VAN DYKE

★ The reports of Bishop Bentley and Bishop Mitchell for the overseas department brought the most discussion at the meeting of the National Council at Seabury House on December 6-7. Members had listened the previous night to Mr. Gillson, former treasurer for the Church in China, tell of the condition of missionaries there. The Council concurred in the action that Bishop Bentley had taken, in writing the twenty-three American missionaries still in China that they should return unless they were requested by their bishops to remain. This was done because of reports that their presence imperilled Chinese churchmen since the government of China now considers all Americans as spies. Bishop Bentley explained that previously the policy had been to leave the decision to the individual missionary whether to stay or come home, but he thought this new statement would remove any embarrassment that anyone was "running out."

Okinawa

A thoroughgoing report was made on the mission to Okinawa. Bishop Bentley told of how the area committee for Okinawa of the Foreign Missions Conference had requested that the two priests appointed by the Council for this work go as representatives of the Conference, losing their denominational identity, and that the role of the Episcopal Church would be to contribute to their salaries to the Conference, which would in turn pay them. Bishop Nash kept at the question of why at General Convention it was said that our Church would have the northern part of Okinawa, and the Methodists the south. Bishop Mitchell said that the overseas department had never heard of it before General Convention, and "It was just in the air and landed in San Francisco." Explanation was made that it was the Okinawa area committee that had given the impression that such was to be the case to the director of the overseas department, who in turn had passed it on to the committee on program and budget. It was further explained that the two appointees to the field were now in Honolulu completing their instruction in the Japanese language, and that the House of Bishops in January would be asked to put Okinawa under the jurisdiction of one of the bishops in the Pacific area. That being done, that bishop and the missionaries would survey Okinawa and set up a mission. Bishop Hobson said that if he were an Okinawan he could be confused by this. He thought that such a person might wonder whether he was being asked to belong to a Church which was across the sea, or to belong to Jesus Christ. He pleaded that there should be a unity of those who are trying to carry the gospel to people, and even though division into areas might make for comity, it would not make the sense of the unity of the gospel. Mrs. Harper Sibley said that she thought that twenty-two groups of Christians in Okinawa had asked for a mission which would stem from one source. The answer to that was that it had been true originally, but that this group solidarity was broken. Bishop Whittemore approved the present plan, but suggested that when new fields are to be opened the matter should be thrashed out by the Council before General Convention. The Presiding Bishop ended the discussion by saying that since there were 500,000 Okinawans, and only two Methodist and one Baptist missionaries there, he felt our mission would not make for competition.

The overseas department also asked that the retirement age for women workers be raised from 63 to 65 in order to conform with social security regulations. In addition they joined with the home department in receiving approval that appointments for one year could be made for women workers in the field after age 65 until 67, and for men workers after 68 until 72 by the directors of the departments after consultation with the bishops involved, without consent of the Council.

Ecumenical Movement

Two speakers from outside the Council were presented, the Rev. W. A. Visser 't Hooft and Mr. William B. Givens. The former was introduced by Presiding Bishop Sherrill as the "mainspring of the whole World Council of Churches Movement." In his talk he expressed gratitude to the Episcopal Church because forty years ago the initiative for

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

WILLIAM MERRILL IS HONORED

★ A luncheon held at the Hotel New Yorker, New York, brought together members of the clergy and laity of the Protestant, Roman Catholic and Jewish faiths, and representatives of several Eastern religions, to pay tribute to the Rev. Dr. William P. Merrill and Dr. Harry N. Holmes. The occasion was the annual meeting of the World Alliance for International Friendship Through Religion, and 100 members and friends of the organization were present.

Dr. Merrill, formerly president of The Church Peace Union for 30 years, voiced his appreciation of those who were now keeping alive the basic ideals of both the parent organization and its branch, the World Alliance. He called in his address for increased mutual appreciation among the followers of all faiths; a true spirit of cooperation, he believed, would be the natural outcome of concerted interfaith work toward a definite goal, such as world peace.

Dr. William Pierson Merrill, formerly president of The Church Peace Union for 30 years, recently honored at the annual meeting of the World Alliance

Dr. Holmes, who as field secretary of the World Alliance for many years helped to extend its work to all countries, urged that we unremittingly continue our efforts to mobilize the spiritual and moral forces of religion to remove the scourge of war. That mandate is timeless and eternal. "Whatever happens in the life of the World Alliance," Dr. Holmes said, "it must never lose that mandate. It is God's will that men abolish war and live in peace. The work toward that objective must go on no matter what the world climate is at any given moment. The fullest glory of achievement is found not in the beginning of an enterprise but in carrying on persistently toward the end. We must never forget that to the man of religion nothing is impossible that ought to be."

The luncheon, followed by a business meeting of the American Council at which Dr. Walter D. Head gave his annual report and officers were elected for the coming year, was of particular significance in that it linked this mid-century with the past. Both Dr. Merrill and Dr. Arthur J. Brown, present at this gathering, are charter members of The Church Peace Union board of trustees and helped to organize the World Alliance in 1914. The span of years had convinced both veteran members that our efforts to establish international peace by stimulating brotherhood and mutual religious understanding throughout the world is of greater importance today than ever before.

A PLEASURE TO FAST

★ The bulletin of the diocese of West Missouri encouraged people to fast by printing a picture of a lobster under the list of fasting days. Most people, presumably, are willing to forego hamburger for a broiled live lobster.

★ On United Nations Sunday a side altar was set apart at the Church of the Ascension, New York, as a United Nations Shrine. The cover picture shows Rector Roscoe T. Foust, Witness editor, and Dr. Henry A. Atkinson, general secretary of the Church Peace Union, with the U.N. flag, which is on a standard on the Epistle side of the altar. The Church flag is on the Gospel side. Forming an arch down the aisle, on the pillars and the walls, are the sixty flags of the present members of the United Nations. Most of them were given as memorials by members of the parish. Dr. Foust says that "most people seem to like the idea and it dramatizes the one-world idea very effectively."

Dr. Atkinson was the preacher at the dedication service, speaking extemporaneously, but the article which appears elsewhere in this number is the substance of his address.

SHERMAN JOHNSON TO PACIFIC

★The Rev. Sherman Johnson has accepted election as dean of the Church Divinity School of the Pacific effective July 1, 1951 it has been announced by Bishop Robert B. Gooden of the board of trustees. He will succeed Bishop Henry H. Shires, suffragan of California. Since 1940, Johnson has been professor of the history and interpretation of the New Testament at the Episcopal Theological School, and before that taught at Seabury-Western and Nashotah.

The Church Divinity School of the Pacific, now overcrowded and forced to deny admittance to qualified students, is ready for a great period of expansion. For fifteen years under Dean

Shires, new buildings were built or purchased, and now there is immediate need for additional buildings and faculty members. The school is fully accredited by the American Association of Theological Schools and has a faculty of nationally known writers and teachers.

COLLEGE STUDENTS HAVE MEETING

★ The diocese of New York held its first intercollegiate conference of Canterbury Clubs at Seabury House in November. Meeting for dinner, the forty-one delegates and campus chaplains, representing Barnard College, Bennett Junior College, Columbia University, Hunter College, New Paltz State Teachers College, New York University, Sarah Lawrence College, and Vassar College, were welcomed by the Rev. Norman Spicer, diocesan chaplain to college students. In the keynote address, the Rev. James A. Pike, chaplain of Columbia University, considered the place of the Canterbury Club on the campus. He emphasized the need for Episcopal students to establish a witness to their faith on the campus, to be willing and able to share their faith with students of other denominations, to work as actively in interfaith organizations as in their own groups, and to encourage a strong stand among all the Christian groups on the campus. Pike cited the catholicism, liberalism, evangelism, and open-mindedness of the Episcopal Church as an aid to its communicants on the campus in reaffirming their own faith and as a means of reaching students not committed to a faith. "We cannot keep separate and we cannot provide an incubator for ourselves; rather we must use our faith as the center which we can bring to others and bring others into."

Mrs. Reinhold Niebuhr, professor of religion at Barnard College, led the service of preparation for Holy Communion.

On Saturday morning, a presentation by Miss Mary Elizabeth Ockenden of the division of college work of the National Council, of the ideas behind the National Episcopal students convention to be held at Cranbrook, Michigan, during the Christmas holidays, was followed by a lively discussion of the proposed constitution for the national Episcopal student movement, led by a panel of leaders including Mr. Spicer, Mrs. Niebuhr, Miss Ockenden, the Rev. Owen Thomas, chaplain at Sarah Lawrence, and Miss Katharine Duffield, provincial secretary for college work.

College work clergymen present besides Chaplains Spicer, Pike and Thomas, were the Rev. Messers William J. Chase, Darby W. Betts, Paul Moore, Robert E. Terwilliger, and J. Marshall Wilson. Miss Adelaide Simpson attended as faculty adviser to the Hunter College Canterbury Club.

CHURCH SCHOOL IS DAMAGED

★ St. John Baptist School, Mendham, N. J., suffered considerable damage in the severe storm of November 25th. About twenty trees were uprooted, but the worst damage was the loss of many tiles from the roof, which will cost about $3,000 to replace. The staff have done considerable work in straightening the trees that were not too far gone, by means of block and tackle and wiring them to stakes. The total damage is estimated at $5,000.

INSTALLATION OF BISHOP GRAY

★ Bishop Walter Gray will be installed as the eighth bishop of Connecticut at Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, January 30th. Following this service, and a reception, a special convention will be held to elect a suffragan bishop.

National Council . . .

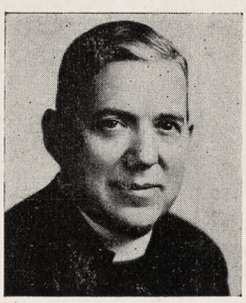
the Faith and Order meetings came from it, and to this the World Council owes its birth. In addition, the role played in aid to other Churches in recent years has been great, and this has added much to the ecumenical movement. The Episcopal Church, he said, has not earmarked its funds for Church World Service to the point of immobilization of these monies as have many other Churches. The World Council of Churches when inaugurated at Amsterdam had to spend so much time on organization that it did not say very well what it was all about. In the statement from the meeting at Toronto last summer entitled "The Church, the Churches and the World Council of Churches," the matter was clarified. In this is shown that there is no preconceived idea of Church unity, or that membership in the World Council means that the members accept all others as being "true and full" churches, yet the World Council has the essential of Christian Unity foremost—it is not a cooperative endeavor like the National Council of Churches. It is a beginning and not an end, for the end envisaged is that "all may be one." The speaker went on to say that the Churches had hoped that they would have time after the war to achieve a degree of unity free from political tensions. Such has not been the case. But he emphasized that in the World Council, western and eastern Christians have been brought together, and we must pray that it continues. Too many in the west want to write off eastern Churches. But in the eastern Churches, in spite of or because of pressures, there is a real revival that cannot be pointed out any place in the west, he continued. The Church has not died out in Russia, contrary to Marxist theory. There is little importance to be given to what happens on the top level in Church and government, it is what really is going on in local churches that matters.

Church Foundation

Mr. Givens spoke of the Episcopal Church Foundation, of which he is chairman of the executive committee. They are endeavoring to build an organization that will have lists of those who might be able to give large amounts of money. Then they will be able to make donations to the work of the Church. Bishop Sherrill said that the projects which should be supported would be determined by the wishes of donors, and by exposing the committee to the wide interests and needs of the Church, and then letting them made their decision. He expressed the hope that the Foundation would soon make a gift so that it could be shown that it was functioning.



Religious Education

The Rev. John Reuss reported for the department of Christian Education. He expressed the appreciation for the department for the long and splendid service of Bishop Dun as its chairman, and announced that because of Bishop Dun's retirement from the Council, Bishop Nash had been elected as new chairman. The latest adult study course on the hymns of the Church will be ready the first of January. The third in the series of the Church's teaching, "The Faith of the Church," has been approved in manuscript by twenty-five theologians, and without difference of opinion on its major content. This revealed, he said, that this work is a unifying act, as well as educational, in the Church.

The leadership training division, Heuss stated, will by June have had about 2000 priests, one-half the House of Bishops, and all diocesan directors of religious education, at the College of Preachers for its training. There are also plans for bringing in parish directors, and in late May, June and July conferences will be held across the nation for men and women on the department's program. Beginning about January 15th a team with a station wagon and truck will set up workshops in the diocese of Louisiana, and then proceed to other dioceses for stays of from two to five weeks in each. In a year eight to ten dioceses should be visited, and if the program works another team will be activated in 1952.

Promotion Department

Bishop Hobson, in reporting for the promotion department, told of material being prepared for laymen to enable them to speak on fund raising for the Seminaries. He said that film prepared and in process would be self-liquidating; also that the person who was to underwrite "Great Scenes from Great Plays" was now in government service and had withdrawn his offer. There was also discussion of establishing an official publishing house, with a committee appointed to study the matter further.

Mr. Robert Jordon, executive head of the department, was in a penitent mood in speaking on the laymen's training program. On the diocesan level, he said, there has been general approval but in parishes many lay speakers have not been successful. On the 6th a number of laymen and instructors met to discuss the mistakes that had been made and to seek corrections for next year. Canvass material for the fall of 1951 will be prepared in the spring to allow ample time for training conferences.

Social Action

Bishop Keeler presented a document for the department of Christian social relations on the difficulties that the department has in taking positions on political and legislative action. It recommended that the Council study its proposals for developing a total policy on social action, and be ready at the February meeting to discuss and vote on them. The proposals suggested that resolutions in this area presented by individuals, groups, or initiated by the department should be sent before Council meeting to all members, together with adequate information concerning them, and that time be allotted on the agenda for discussion. When the Council has acted on a matter, it shall also direct the manner in which its action shall be implemented.

The Rev. John Higgins read the portion of the message of the National Council of Churches dealing with "The Present Crisis," and the department received approval of the Council to commend the whole message. Almon Pepper explained how the department would present to the House of Bishops, meeting in January, the urban work of the Church with its paper on "The Church's Mission in Urban and Industrial Areas," and the World Council's pamphlet on "Evangelization of Modern Man in Mass Society."

Bishop Hart reported for the armed forces division, stressing that Church people in camp areas need to recognize their responsibilities to the men in the service. The much-debated matter of a suffragan bishop for the armed forces came up but the matter was shelved pending action by the House of Bishops next month.

The Rev. Roger Blanchard, head of college work, told of successful conference and of plans for a conference over the holidays to launch a national student movement.

The Presiding Bishop received an ovation for his election as president of the newly formed National Council of Churches, with Bishop Sterrett of Bethlehem, one of the delegates at the Cleveland conference giving a complete and humorously slanted description of the meeting.

On the closing day a formula was introduced and approved whereby heads of departments and other executives at 281 will receive salary increases. The 5% cost-of-living increase of a year or so ago was eliminated. Instead clergy at headquarters were voted a house allowance not to exceed one-sixth of their salary; lay executives are to have an increase of one-sixth of their salary. Staff workers at 281 were not included at this time since they had previously been voted increases, which of course still stand.

DOM GREGORY DIX IN WASHINGTON

★ More than 500 persons heard Dom Gregory Dix, prior of Nashdom Abbey, England, discuss the development of the liturgy at a conference held at the Ascension and Saint Agnes, Washington, D. C., sponsored by the Washington - Richmond branch of the American Church Union. In addition to two addresses by Dom Gregory there was a business meeting at which the Rev. Albert J. Dubose, executive director of the Union, spoke on the program of the organization.

Dr. Henry A. Atkinson, Dr. Walter D. Head, and Mr. Robert Norton, leaders in the Lakeland Institute held at Florida Southern College. MICHIGAN LAYREADERS HAVE MEETING

★ Forty layreaders of Michigan met on November 28th at St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, to discuss their work with Bishop Hubbard. The diocese owes much to a considerable group of laymen who have given generously of their time and ability to work in struggling missions at the appointment of the bishops. Parish clergy have also leaned heavily upon them for assistance in various ways.

It was felt by those attending the conference that a better understanding of the faith is needed, as well as the technical knowledge necessary to conduct services. To this end a course is soon to be offered on the Bible and another on the conduct of public worship.

The present world situation, with the prospect that many clergy will enter the service as chaplains, was given as an added reason for adequate training for laymen who may be called to mission stations.

CANADA WINDOW DEDICATED

★ A Canada window was dedicated at Washington Cathedral, November 28th. It is in the north transept where also are windows dedicated to England and to several Latin American countries. Highlighting the service was an address by Hume Wrong, Canadian ambassador to the United States.

BROWNELL HALL REMAINS AS CHURCH SCHOOL

★ Action has been taken by the trustees of Brownell Hall, Omaha, Nebraska, whereby the school will continue "in accordance with the doctrine, discipline and worship" of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The purpose of the action, as explained by Bishop Brinker of Nebraska, "was to tie into organic relationship this institution with the diocese and to settle for all time the question as to whether or not it is a Church school. It has occurred to me that this action of the trustees of Brownell Hall, as well as the action of the cathedral chapter, which is the holding corporation of the diocese, might be noteworthy and help to stop the trend toward our Church related institutions going over to state and community agencies."

CONFERENCE ON PENSIONS

★ Pension boards of twenty-two Churches and two Church-related agencies paid benefits of $21,190,840 during the past year, it was reported at the annual meeting of boards held December 1 in New York. The Methodist board paid out about $8,000,000; Presbyterian, $2,250,000; Episcopal about $1,500,000.

PORTLAND LEADERS ASK PEACE PRAYERS

★ Religious leaders of Portland, Oregon, called upon their people to pray that another world war may be averted. They urged prayers in houses of worship and homes for guidance to the men who must decide what steps to take; for individual faith in the ultimate triumph of good over evil, and for calm and not hysteria in these crucial days.

Bishop Dagwell, in a public statement, said:

"Confronted with the prospect of a war of such proportions as the world has never seen, we need to do what people have always done when other helpers fail and comforts flee—turn to God. We need to pray earnestly for the heads of governments of all nations; that they be sensitive to the grave responsibility they bear to the people of the world. We need to pray for the United Nations, that they may act with wisdom and not with fear or with anger. We must refrain from futile criticism of our duly constituted leaders. This is a time for national harmony. Pray, in the hope that God will overrule the selfish wills of men in the interest of the universal good of all mankind."

UNUSUAL ORDINATION IN ST. LOUIS

★ An ordination to the priesthood in which both the ordinand and the entire congregation were deaf was held at Christ Church Cathedral, St. Louis, on December 3rd when Bishop Scarlett ordained the Rev. Silas J. Hirte, in charge of St. Thomas' Mission to the deaf. Because of the unusual nature of the service, where the ordinand was the only clergyman present able to use the sign language with facility, the sermon was omitted. Instead an interpretation of the service was given by Arthur Steidemann Jr., lay assistant at Emmanuel, Webster Groves, who hears himself but knows the sign language since he is the son of the late Arthur O. Steidemann, for many years in charge of the mission.

CHURCHES HONOR SYNAGOGUE

★ Christ Church and Gloria Dei were among fourteen of the oldest churches in Philadelphia to join in the celebration of the 150th anniversary of Temple Rodeph Shalom, the city's second oldest synagogue. All of the fourteen were founded between 1677 and 1796.

STUDENTS MEET AT IOWA CITY

★ Episcopal students in Iowa colleges and universities met at Trinity, Iowa City, December 1-2. The leader was Helen Turnbull, director of Windham House, New York, who led discussions on personal religion and how to further the Church program on campuses.

MATRICULATION HELD AT PHILADELPHIA

★ Thirty-three new students signed the matriculation book and were received by the dean at the annual matriculation service at the Philadelphia Divinity School, held November 30. The total enrollment is ninety-six, of which twenty-nine are taking graduate courses.

Idle Words

WHEN our Lord uttered his striking warning to the Pharisees: "Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment"—he declared a psychological and moral principle of human life which has too seldom been recognized and has even more rarely been acted upon. Had it been clearly understood by the leaders of the world's thought and action, there would be less loose talk in the councils of nations and in theological circles where doctrines are set forth and interpreted.

The key word in our Lord's statement is "idle." It is idle words—and not any other kind—which we shall have to give account of in a future judgment. For "idle words" are words uttered without real thought, under stress of emotion, without knowledge or from failure to think at all. Emotion, good or bad, is the one source out of which come idle words. Words are spoken, but no immediate resulting action proceeds from them. Modern slang defines them as "hot air." Idle words have, to be sure, effects, but the effects are deferred and are not under the control of the hasty speaker. For example, one says, in a passion of anger, "I hate you; I'll kill you" and then cools off and does nothing of the sort. But the effects of this idle word are real enough; a friendship is ruined, a character is hardened and embittered. In the high emotion of falling in love, one declares, "I love you; I adore you; I'll spend my life making you happy," but a new family is wrecked and divorce comes because the word of love was ill-considered, idle, vain. And how few there are of us who are not guilty of parroting words without thought or clear understanding—words like "Communist," "Fascist," "Atheist," the sort of loose talk that alienates individuals and breaks the fellowship of groups or nations or races? Many participants in public worship glibly recite creed and prayers without conscious thought or any important knowledge of the worship's significance. Their words are indeed idle. In all such instances—and a host of others like them—judgment is deferred, is beyond the control of the glib or hasty speaker. The "day of judgment" of which our Lord tells us may arrive tomorrow or next week or in a more distant future. It may not even be recognized by the user of idle words as a judgment, but its effect—on character, on fellowship—will be inevitable and relentless. The effects of idle words on the spiritual level are like the results of piling up debts on the economic level; the obligation presses on the debtor until the court steps in and gives judgment, with interest.

What about words that are not "idle"—words that clearly express deliberate thinking; curses that you definitely intend to make effective, blessings that you mean to make real in someone's life, religious forms which are the channels of your deep convictions? Words such as these are self-executing; their results flow directly from the personality and will of the speaker. With the man who thinks before he speaks, it becomes a matter of "pay as you go" to avoid the piling up of debts that are beyond his power to handle. Wise folk such as these will resist with all their might the temptation to speak hastily from passion or cleverly from pride and will shun, as a deadly trap, the use of popular cliches as a substitute for sober, objective thought based upon information that is true and precise. We have heard many times the most appalling statements from well-meaning persons, on religious, economic and political subjects, which were based upon popular notions or systematic propaganda and were essentially gross distortions of the truth. And the reason invariably given for such idle words was that there was no way of securing sound, unbiased information on the subject in question. A poor excuse indeed, it has seemed to us, for it is still possible today, in spite of an emotion-laden atmosphere and the continuous spate of propaganda, for the sincere lover of truth to dig up for himself facts that are undistorted and reliable. Or, if not, he should at least have the grace to hold his peace. "I don't know" can never be a logically justified prelude to "therefore I guess." Idle words are still idle words, however sincere their utterer may be.

WE have too many men of science, too few men of God. We have grasped the mystery of the atom and rejected the Sermon on the Mount . . . The world has achieved brilliance without wisdom, power without conscience. Ours is a world of nuclear giants and ethical infants. We know more about war than we know about peace, more about killing than we know about living.

Christian disciples, above all others, have an unescapable obligation today, in a world seething with emotions of which fear is the dominant one, to seek for facts, to think soberly and fearlessly and to speak only words which shall express the substance of such thinking. Perhaps there is no prayer more vitally important for us to make our own than the Veni Creator. And there is certainly no spiritual fact upon which we can more profitably meditate than the truth of the presence of the Incarnate God with us as the "Light that lighteth every man."

Our Lord has other parables and admonitions for us which are concerned with the psychological and moral problems of the idle word. "Deal with thine adversary quickly while thou art in the way with him" is one of them. See that your words are such as can produce immediate and beneficent action under the control of your will. Beware the idle word whose delayed reaction no one can either determine or foresee. And the Epistle of St. James also seems pretty clearly concerned with the same subject—in his chapter on the tongue. "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able to bridle the whole body." And so, if any parish-priest is looking for a stimulating and fruitful text, we submit this as a singularly good one: "Every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment."

Religion, The United Nations, And the Prevention of War

BY

HENRY A. ATKINSON

General Secretary of the Church Peace Union and World Alliance for International Friendship Through Religion

WAR is and has been throughout the ages the chief enemy of mankind. Archaeologists and historians agree that of some thirty major world cultures beginning with the Sumerians only eight or nine are now in existence, all the others having been destroyed by war. Other factors have contributed to their destruction, such as geological and climatic changes; earthquakes; desiccation through failing springs, lakes, wells and rivers; abuse of the soil; and erosion caused by floods, but as Arnold Toynbee says, "Militarism has been by far the commonest cause of the breakdown of civilizations."

War is the black line crossing every page of the 6000 years' story of man's life on this earth. In his efforts to improve living conditions, develop new and better means of providing food, clothing and dwelling places, and to establish security against hunger and cold, he has been ever hampered by war and the threat of war. Weapons and military tactics, together with combinations of groups and tribes and nations against each other, have added to the ferocity of combat. With every passing cycle wars have become more savage and the arms more terrible. No sooner has a war been finished, then another begins. The Greek legend pictured war as a giant sowing dragon's teeth, which sprang up behind him into rows of armed soldiers. In the business of making war the deadliness of weapons may be marked by comparing the club of our primitive ancestors to gun-powder, cannons, high explosives, the mechanized instruments of death on the earth, on the sea and in the air, culminating in the deadly atomic and hydrogen bombs of today. No wonder Toynbee and other historians believe that our civilization is now in a period of dire disaster, which may be followed by a collapse "ending the last cycle in all civilizations."

We have made great advances in the use of our intelligence as applied to conditions of living, building of cities, and creating a new and grander culture. However, with all our intelligence it seems that we have not been smart enough to save ourselves from recurring disaster. A noted historian, I believe it was, said: "The only thing history teaches us is that it teaches us nothing!"

Throughout the ages innumerable efforts have been made to end war. Isaiah tells of a tripartite pact of friendship made between Egypt, Assyria and Israel, and says: "In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, a blessing in the midst of the earth; for that Jehovah of hosts hath blessed them, saying, 'Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance.'"

Coalitions and combinations of fighting forces have been tried many times. A pact which strangely resembled the Briand-Kellogg Pact was arranged between Egypt and her neighbors about eight hundred years before our era, in which they agreed that they would not fight with each other and would settle their disputes only by peaceful means. A religious peace conference was called together in India by Asoka two hundred years before Christ. The Holy Alliance was established at the end of the Napoleonic wars. The League of Nations followed World War I. And, now, we have the United Nations.

That every attempt to destroy war has failed was due to selfishness, arrogance and a love of power. Nationalism has become a real menace in our modern world. Love of country springs from a noble instinct. There is hardly a person who is not proud of his own native land, and when that land is threatened it is not difficult to arouse the people in its defense. The world has become so small, however, that there is no longer a place for an over-emphasis upon national patriotism. The sovereignty of the individual nations is limited because the conditions in neighboring nations affect also the whole group of nations. Therefore, in order to end war we must establish in the world a community where each nation will have its place, and its rights guaranteed by the entire community.

Although we are now living in the midst of fear of what will happen to us individually, to our nation, and to our civilization, we have fortunately in the United Nations an organization which represents the best and most comprehensive plan ever before devised for abolishing war and creating peace. With the development of democracy we have come to see that any plan must take into consideration the people of all the countries. The advance toward this goal may be measured by the words used in earlier international agreements as compared to the preamble to the Covenant of the United Nations. For instance, the Holy Alliance began its statement: "In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, We the rulers." The preamble to the League of Nations read, "We, the high contracting parties in the name of our people." On the other hand, the United Nations in 1945 adopted a Charter, which began: "We the peoples of the United Nations determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind . . . and have resolved to combine our efforts to accomplish these aims."

"We the peoples" represents the greatest advance that has been made. The United Nations has the right principle. It is all-inclusive, and recognized that the responsibility for the security of one is the responsibility of all. It does not leave it there, for the charter agreed to and signed by sixty nations envisages a new world community. This idea of the community, however, must be carried out in detail. Through cooperation, and mutual regard for each other and the rights of others, we have established law and order in our cities and towns. New York, for instance, has a police force which is designed for one purpose and one purpose only, that is to maintain law and order within the community. We give the police weapons necessary to maintain the peace. They are the agents of the community and must be supported by every individual in the community. There can be no neutrality as between the police and the law breaker. Because we all accept the responsibility to support the police, it is not often that he has to use his club or pistol.

Control Force

WE agree to support the police, but we do not allow the police to decide our policies or our politics. The world community must have a world police force, but this force must be under the control of the Security Council and the General Assembly of the United Nations. Aggression in the world community against one state is aggression against all. The intervention of the United Nations in Korea is not a war in the old-fashioned sense of the word, for the Security Council had branded the aggression there a danger to world peace and called for volunteers from the member nations to stop it. As there is no recognized international police force at present, the Security Council had to depend on volunteers from the nations. All, except five or six nations, agreed and most of them are helping the United Nations and its armed forces.

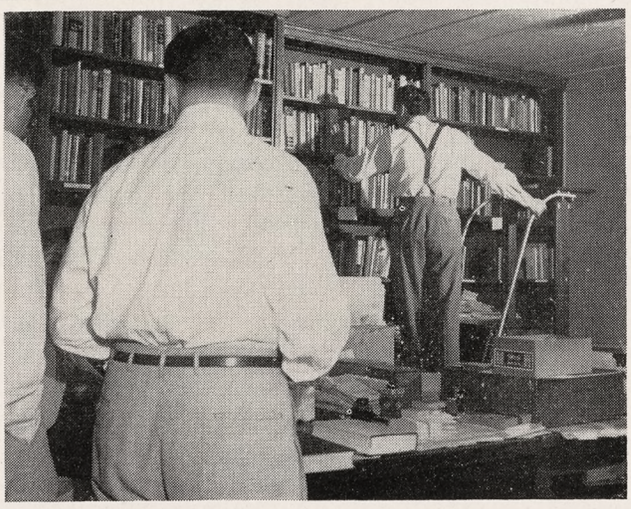
The task ahead is to complete the establishment of a real world community. The basis of this community will depend upon security for all its citizens. In the Charter of the United Nations provision is made for the establishment of a permanent police force. This force should be organized and made effective as soon as possible. But security, while given priority, must not become the only objective. There are other vital things that need to be done.

First of all, in point of importance, it is necessary to secure for the people in all countries the right to decide by a free ballot the governments they want and who shall be their administrators.

Secondly, the churches should constantly preach the basic privileges of their faith, and be especially on guard against any unfair limit on the freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, freedom of speech, and freedom of religion. These are essential to progress and these are the issues that come closest to us, and to the people in all countries.



We boast of our advances in science and are proud of what we have done. Yet, outside of our own countries in the West there are millions of people who are hungry. Two-thirds of the people of the world go to bed hungry every night. Point Four, as it is called, has been taken up by the United Nations, and good progress is being made by furnishing technical assistance to enable the people in less-favored areas to improve their conditions and standards of living.

Deadly Fear

TODAY the whole world is living under deadly fear. Malign forces are at work. The threat of war and its consequences are ever-present. There are subversive elements attacking the very basis of our democratic way of life. It is not merely a contest between East and West, nor is it between communism and democracy. The danger comes from the forces that make a facade of communism and have designs that are as dangerous as anything the world has even before faced. We can meet this challenge if we will, but we must have more faith in our democracy and more confidence in our way of life.

The only alternative to war is conference. As long as we feel that it is never too late to talk things over, we will be comparatively safe. The second great thing we need in building up the world community is the right spirit. We could never have a successful local community unless the majority of the people were impressed by the fervor and faith in spiritual affairs that come through religion. Our prayer should be: "Create within me a clean heart and a right spirit."

Recently, before a meeting in support of the United Nations, Senator Austin made a most moving appeal. After outlining the difficulties and suggesting a way out, he told the story of Solomon who could have had from the hand of God any gift he desired. He asked not for power, nor for fame, nor for recognition, nor for riches, but for wisdom; and God gave him not only wisdom but added an "understanding spirit." All religious-minded people should be responsive to every call for help in carrying out the details of the program that is before the United Nations. But, beyond all else, our greatest contribution will be to cleanse our hearts of prejudice, and pray that our souls may be filled with a spirit of understanding. If we are willing to make the effort and pay the price we can develop the kind of a world in which we may live at peace with our neighbors, and develop our civilization—instead of ruining our chances for the future and condemning to destruction the civilization that has been built up through these modern years.

The Idealist In This Troubled World

IT is startling today to recall the incredible optimism which ushered in the 20th century. Marvin brilliantly reviewed man's progress during the 19th century and left the unmistakable implication that that progress was only a feeble beginning of what was yet to come. His little book was entitled "The Century of Hope." It was widely read and cherished by ministers all over the country. It was published on the eve of World War I! David Cairns lent the weight of his authoritative theological name to the judgment that war, as an international experience, was now happily no longer a prospective menace, though small policing actions might still be necessary, though less and less frequently; that disarmament at last was an established and dependable reality. That book came out in 1913!

These are merely two slight examples of the prevailing mood of the time. Hope was in the air and we liked it. However, instead of invigorating us and making us capable of greater endeavors, it soothed us into a gross complacency. We might have known better for had not Tennyson wound up the Victorian era (Maud): "I embrace the purposes of God and the doom assigned." That was a sly suggestion that contemporary man was coming to suspect that to do the will of God might interfere increasingly with the more earthly pleasures of life. Carlyle, too, was certain that the age was at once "destitute of faith and terrified of scepticism." But these were seismographic personalities, as poets always are, and felt the ominous rumblings which the rest of us apparently could not feel.

Today we are confronted by the upsurge of the dark forces of life in a manner utterly to dismay us. These dark forces have found for themselves channels for expression, productive outlets for their malign impulses, and on a world-wide scale. The idealist, living in the midst of our spiritual chaos, is bewildered, confused, chagrined.

Mistaken Optimism

OBVIOUSLY, we made the guilty assumption that Christian ideals would somehow get themselves fulfilled without any particular personal inconvenience and also without any special personal effort. In America, particularly, we continued under the impulse of Emerson's optimism and assumed that "all things work together for good." We neglected St. Paul's following phrase, namely "to them that love God, to them that are called according to his purpose." We also neglected, very guiltily, Emerson's assumption, namely, that it is inherent in man to do the will of God; that every institution of our common life, political, social, economic and religious, had and would have as its only intention the fulfillment of God's purpose. His essay, "Self Reliance," we took to heart and ignored his essay, "The Over-Soul"—or read it with less than critical judgment.

The scope of our chagrin is measured by the menacing threat of the complacent pessimism under which we live. Freedom, an ideal, we now see in jeopardy; justice, another ideal, is proving very difficult of fulfillment. We know that justice without freedom is impossible; that freedom without justice cannot last.

For the moment we are putting our trust in force, but very nervously. When force becomes the order of the day, morals are sure to seem increasingly less relevant. Thucydides' aphorism is still true: "War is a savage teacher which brings men's characters down to a level with their fortunes." Moreover, Lincoln's gloomy apprehension haunts us: "It has always been a grave question whether any government not too strong for the liberties of its people will be strong enough to maintain its existence in grave emergencies."

Finally, low views of human nature are rampant today. Whether sponsored by the politician for his sinister purposes, or by the psychologist in the name of science, or by the theologian in revolt against our previous optimism makes no difference. Low views of human nature are the inevitable prelude to tyranny. To lift one's voice against such views seems like trying to stop a hurricane with an oration.

Leaders Are Needed

THE idealist remains and must remain undismayed. Of his guilty optimism he can repent. Indeed, what else has he been doing all these recent years? His nervous trust in force he can meet with the assurance that in this kind of world there are no national solutions for national problems, only international solutions. To this end we have the United Nations now, a vital, live and dependable force. Low views of human nature he resists in the name of Pascal's insight: man is born an angel though he acts the brute. This, too, only means that sooner or later man will discover again that that which is morally shameful cannot be politically or economically expedient. After all, Thomas Hobbes sponsored low views of human nature with the support of his gigantic intellect; but John Locke beat him, and Anglo-Saxon civilization, as a result, took a turn for the better. 1695 is one of the great dates in Anglo-Saxon history. As a direct result of John Locke's influence, England decided that people can be trusted and abolished the censorship that year. We have an experience in American history that has its own peculiar value today. A young man went to the House of Representatives eight months after we had entered on the Mexican War. James K. Polk, the President of the United States, had said that American blood had been shed on American soil and, under the inflammatory impulse of that phrase, the country went to war. This young man had hardly gotten his seat warm in the House of Representatives when he rose to challenge the President to indicate the spot where American blood had been shed on American soil. His friends were stricken with alarm. That challenge would end his political career. Actually, it did end his political career. Moreover, the same man entered a contest with America's greatest orator for a seat in the Senate. He made his campaign on the slogan, "Douglas says he doesn't care whether slavery is voted up or voted down. I say I do care." He was again defeated. Nevertheless, as the American destiny unfolded, there came a time when that man was chosen to run for the presidency. Again his campaign was conducted on the assumption that good morals make good practical politics. This time he won for, of course, that man was Abraham Lincoln. Today, the idealist laments not so much the coming of the totalitarian monster but the fact that the Lincolns have not come. He assures himself, however, that inasmuch as there came a Lincoln once, there will come one again.

Wisdom Born of Hope

PEACE is an ideal in search of a technique. An adequate technique will emerge when an adequate zeal for the ideal prevails. It is the idealist's privilege to insist on that. All our scepticisms, and anxieties, and despairs will be absorbed in the blue flame of our ardor for the ideal. Moral enthusiasm, not rational argument, is the answer to the cynic. The wisdom born of hope and lofty views of man will yet prove more supple to deal with the daunting realities of time than the "realism" of the cynic with his sinister views of human nature. Wherefore, with Luther: "See that thou depart not from the faith that God sweareth to do a great work by thee."

Our Protestant Heritage

BY
FREDERICK C. GRANT
Professor at Union Theological Seminary and Witness Book Editor

THE history of the religion of the Bible is one of repeated reformation, cleansing, revival. It is a great illusion to suppose that it existed in one continuous static condition—it had its ups and downs, and suffered repeated turmoil, both in the Old Testament and the New. The cleansing of the temple took place more than once—in the Old Testament and in the New. Only a pure, clean sanctuary, was a fit abode for God. And so it is no serious criticism to say that the Reformation in the 16th century "disturbed the peace of the Church," or even that it "divided the Church:". perhaps the Church needed to be disturbed; perhaps, in the providence of God, and for a time, it needed to be divided.

The term "Protestant" is now over 420 years old, and dates from the Diet of Spires (Speyer) in 1529, when the evangelical German princes "protested" against the attempted suppression of the Reformation, and appealed to the emperor to call a general council (since the Pope would not do so). It was a good protest. Soon the movement spread over the North and West of Europe, and even into the South. Printing aided it. The absence of rigid state boundaries aided it. Humanism aided it. Economic tendencies aided it. The hour had struck, and it was time that the Church was reformed and cleansed of various abuses that had grown up through long centuries of neglect. And it was a critical hour: the closing years of the fifteenth century had looked like the coming of doom for Europe. The Christians in Western Europe were being crowded into the North and West, as the vast pincers of Islam closed ever more firmly upon them. The Turks were storming the very gates of Vienna. And then in God's providence, the great turn in the tide took place. Columbus discovered the new world. The forces of Islam were driven back. A new age of discovery, of commercial and intellectual expansion had begun.

Various Theories

VARIOUS theories have been advanced to explain the Reformation. One is Hilaire Belloc's theory: the northern European nations were the last and latest peoples in Europe to accept Christianity, and they had not been thoroughly Christianized in the brief period from the 12th to the 16th centuries. Hence when the time of strain and tension came, they revolted from the Catholic Church with its system of order and beauty.

As Hilaire Belloc insists, in his book "How the Reformation Happened," the mediaeval world, which the Reformation shattered, was the creation of the Catholic Church—which had been leavening Western society for fifteen hundred years. For ten centuries it had been—or, at least, it claimed to be—the dominant authority in Western Europe. The Reformation he defines as "an attack on that institution," and Protestantism, its fruit, was in reality a negative product of that institution—the Catholic Church. But surely it is impossible to define or even to describe the Reformation, which is one of the greatest world movements in all history, as merely an attack upon the Catholic Church. It was much more than that. Belloc's view is too institutional—and too superficial.

Another—a similar, but favorable—view is that of Lewis Farnell: he was a historian of Greek religion, but like many a historian, he cast his glance farther afield, and he looked upon all history as one continuous sweeping movement. The Reformation he viewed as conditioned by the social attitudes of the Germans, the Dutch, the Scandinavians, the English, and the Scotch. These Northern European peoples were always more democratic, more secular, more individualistic than the Southern. Women had a large place in Teutonic religion. Married priests were to be found, long before the Reformation, in the North. Thus the Reformation was only the reassertion of this native religious outlook and character.

Another view is that of R. H. Tawney, as set forth, or at least implied, in his book, "Religion and the Rise of Capitalism:" the religious Reformation was only the front and counterpart of the economic revolution by which the middle classes asserted their freedom. It was a necessary stage in the economic and political history of Modern Europe.

And there are still other theories, polemical, political, social, philosophical, or religious. Some even view the whole history of Christianity as a sequence of first the submergence and then the reemergence of the spirit of the Gospel: the Church, like the human race, "fell" soon after its origin, and remained in this fallen state for hundreds of years until rescued and restored by Luther—the first man after Saint Paul, or perhaps after Saint Augustine, really to understand our religion.

Every Protestant of course looks back upon the Reformation from a specific point of view—his own or that of the Church to which he belongs. An Anglican recognizes that the Reformation was inevitable; but it was a Reform that was called for, not a total destruction of the Church and a fresh reconstruction from the foundation. Indulgences were wrong; the exaggerated doctrines of Purgatory were wrong; Papal claims to jurisdiction in civil courts were wrong—and so on; but these errors could be pruned away and the Church survive. Indeed, the Church would thrive the better for the removal of these parasitic growths. To another Christian, say to one reared in the Anabaptist tradition, the Church is less precious, and the gospel is all that matters, with a tremendous emphasis on individual liberty in every direction, political, social, religious. In between these two extremes are many varied types of Protestantism.

Perhaps they all would agree in (a) the central affirmation of salvation (i.e. justification) by faith only, apart from works of the Law; in (b) the immediate responsibility of the individual to God, not via the Church or the priesthood; in (c) the open Bible, to be read and interpreted—as far as possible—in its natural, literal sense; in (d) the democracy of the Christian Church, expressing its mind in universal councils—not in papal pronouncements or in those of small groups of bishops or cardinals, valuable as such pronouncements may sometimes be.

Great Achievements

THE Protestant Reformation has achieved great things thus far: but it has never been a 100 per cent success. Within thirty years (1520-50) it had been halted in Germany—and Catholic (i.e., Roman Catholic) reform (the so-called "Counter-Reformation") was under way—a reform within Rome which would have been impossible without Luther! The identification of the Protestant movement with political radicalism, with the consequent Peasants' War, and resulting in Luther's antagonism toward the peasantry—this was one of the great tragedies of all history. What was intended for a reform of the Church became a revolt against the Church; and what began as a revolt against ecclesiastical abuses became a revolution against law and order and the political organization of European society. Worst of all, the reforming movement failed to transform the remaining one-half or two-thirds of Christendom —which therefore became hardened and crystallized into uniformity and authoritarianism, and has so continued to this day. The old free Catholicism of the early centuries has long since disappeared; modern Romanism is not an example of it.

Now all this makes it each for reactionaries in every age to say, "Protestantism is dangerous —only Catholicism is a sure and safe refuge from the dangers of Communism, political or social anarchy, nihilism, and red revolution." This argument is heard repeatedly, and very widely, at the present day. And this in turn may help to account for the recent enormous advance of the Roman Catholic Church in numbers—not only in the United States, but generally—119 million in 30 years, according to the Vatican radio, i.e. since the end of World War I. This is almost four million a year. Roman propagandists are not slow to assert that Rome is the only strong bulwark against Communism. Give us another World War, say between Communist Russia and the West, and the figures may be even higher! What is often overlooked is (a) that both Romanism and Communism are fundamentally totalitarian. Mussolini said in his Memoirs that he modeled Fascism on the Roman Church; Hitler in turn—also a Roman Catholic—modeled Nazism on Italian Fascism; (b) that both systems encourage high numbers, i.e. over-population—regardless of resources for education or welfare or even livelihood; both Hitler and Mussolini paid bonuses to families of 15; and Italy still has 200,000 more people every year than she can feed; and (c) that Communism is the natural economy of scarcity, while Roman Catholicism makes the patient endurance of poverty a virtue. Instead of Roman Catholicism being our best defense against Communism, the truth is, the Roman Church plays directly into the hands of Communism. It is a fact that deserves study—no Protestant country has yet fallen into Communist clutches. There is a proverb in southern Europe, "You can either eat well, or sleep well"—you can either be ruthless and take what you want in this world and have plenty of everything; but you will not sleep well. Your conscience will not let you. Or you can be content with little and not overstep the boundaries set by custom, law, or religion; and though hungry, you can sleep well with a clear conscience. But this proverb does not sum up exhaustively the total situation; and we Protestants believe—and have always believed—that an economy of abundance is a natural corollary of religion, and that it is essential, if the individual is to have the necessary freedom to achieve those differences in character and ability which mark him off from the average or the mass.

School Question

So influential has the Roman Church become that it can now begin to lay claim to state aid for its schools. We reject this plea, and in doing so it should be pointed out that the school question—i.e., the opposition to the proposed subsidy of Roman Catholic schools from public funds—is one that has been brought upon itself by the Roman Catholic Church. It began with the famous Illinois case, fifty or more years ago, when the Roman Catholics successfully protested against the reading of the Bible in the public schools. Certain Protestant teachers were reading passages to their pupils, each morning, from the King James Version: and this, the Roman Catholics maintained, was sectarianism — the King James Bible was a sectarian book!

Any religion or Church or sect which scorns all others, and refuses to cooperate, and attempts to undermine public education in its own interest, cannot expect warm support from other groups when it attempts to lay hands upon public funds for use in its own educational program, or for the support of its own ecclesiastical propaganda. All this needs to be said, even though we sympathize deeply with individual Catholics, anxious to insure the religious education of their children, and firmly and properly maintaining the natural and necessary connection between secular studies and sacred. We are the more determined to exercise caution in that we have been warned in so many words that as soon as the Roman Catholic Church attains a 51 percent majority in this country, it will begin to take over our political institutions. Our relations with other nations and our internal affairs will then be guided by the principles of Roman Catholic political ethics. Our entire social, political, educational, and legal economy will be governed by the same principles that obtain in other "Catholic" countries—as in Spain and Venezuela. Protestants will then be only an unhappy minority—as they are in more than one "Latin" country at the present day.

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

Solomon Maimon: An Autobiography. Schocken Books. $1.50.

This is a new edition of one of the most unforgettable autobiographies ever written—I read it first nearly forty years ago, and have just re-read it. Maimon was a Polish Jew born in 1753. Precocious, he was reading the Talmud at the age of seven. Becoming a rabbi, he was married by his father at the age of eleven to a desirable girl, and at fourteen became the father of a son. Oppressed by the ignorance and superstition of eastern Poland, he wandered westward, learned German, became the friend of the Mendelssohns in Berlin, and wrote books on mathematics, theology, and philosophy. The book is a fascinating source book for Polish and German Judaism in the 18th century.

The Kingdom and the Power. By Paul S. Minear. Westminster. $4.50.

This is an exposition of the New Testament Gospel, in the form of lectures to summer conferences. The point of view is strongly Kierkegaardian, but at the same time the author is abreast of modern New Testament science. In consequence, this combination brings out of the gospel "things new and old," and some that most readers do not suspect are there. This is one more book to prove that the "simple old-fashioned gospel" was far from simple, and much more old-fashioned than you would suppose—as old fashioned as the first century, and profoundly attached to Old Testament and ancient Jewish concepts.

Bright is the Shaken Torch. By Arthur A. Cowan. Scribners. $3.00.

A volume of sermons in the "Scholar as Preacher" Series—a series already famous for the excellence of its earlier volumes. Dr. Cowan is a pastor in Edinburgh, and his sermons are in the great tradition of A. J. Gossip and J. S. Stewart.

The Secret of Life. By Roy A. Burkhart. Harper. $1.25.

One of the great defects in our schizophrenic modern civilization is that multitudes of people, having drifted away from religion, find life almost meaningless. Here is a book that addresses itself to them, and even suggests methods of individual and group research and training. Here is one of the most important—and most promising—areas of present-day pastoral and missionary work, and the book has much to tell us.

The Gospel in Slow Motion. By Ronald Knox. Sheed and Ward. $2.50.

It has been wisely observed that every translation is a commentary, and there are no translations of Scripture of which this is more true than those of Msgr. Ronald Knox. In this present work we see his brilliant exegetical imagination "in slow motion" as he spells out a number of scriptural passages in a series of sermonettes.

One can't quite imagine them being preached: the "laugh-a-minute" atmosphere, the frequent tone of condescension and occasional superficiality must, I suppose, be judged in the light of the fact that they were delivered to convent girls.

Those familiar with Knox's earlier books in this series (The Mass in Slow Motion, The Creed in Slow Motion) will find the title of this volume misleading. The previous volumes dealt systematically with the Eucharist and the Creeds, respectively: this does not similarly deal with The Gospel, though of course material from the Gospels (as well as the Epistles and lives of the Saints) are used in what is a disconnected series of homilies. And, as the Gospel material, it is amazing how naive fundamentalism and sophisticated exegesis (and often eisegesis) are intermingled throughout.—James A. Pike

Is Christianity Unique? A comparative Study of Religions. By Nicol Macnicol. Macmillan. 75 cents.

The Viewpoints Series, of which this little book is No. 11, is an attempt to present the Christian point of view on a number of contemporary issues of thought and life. Prominent among those issues is that of the relation of Christianity to other religions. Is Christianity unique among the world's religions? Has it any justification for sending Missionaries to the Orient to convert the adherents of the ancient religions to faith in Christ? Has it any answer to the heart-hunger of those in the West who seek satisfaction in modern cults? Dr. Macnicol has lived long years in India, and has exceptional knowledge of the literature and the practical life of many Oriental religions. In this book he sets forth plainly and clearly the reasons for believing that Christianity is unique, and that it has the message of salvation so strangely missed by the ancient and the Oriental religions, and even more sadly missing in the modern man-made substitutes for religion in the West.—Arthur Jeffery

Start Where You Are. By Arnold H. Lowe. Harper. $2.00.

Twenty-three sermons—without texts and lacking sermonic form, but emphasizing the reality of the religious life. Too often preachers give the impression that religion involves attaining a distant and somewhat unreal base before beginning further operations. If you can attain that base, all will be easy, but the difficulty lies in capturing that new base! Dr. Lowe's emphasis is upon starting the religious life right where you are—a point which Phillips Brooks made in one of his most famous sermons.

Create Your Own Tomorrow. By Margaret Blair Johnstone. Doubleday. $2.50.

This book dealt with problems of personal and family life from the point of view of an enlightened faith which takes seriously the modern sciences of psychology and sociology, and contains a great deal of sound pastoral advice. Margaret Johnstone is a graduate of Chicago Theological Seminary, and is a minister in Wadhams, N. Y. She has a husband and two children, and when she writes about the problems human beings face, she writes intelligently. I must say that I think this book, without intending to be anything of the sort, is one of the best arguments I have ever seen for the ordination of women!

Cosmo Gordon Lang. By J. G. Lockhart. Macmillan. $5.00.

An absorbing biography of a great man who "became Archbishop of York too early and Archbishop of Canterbury too late," for Lockhart believes that Lang's ability and initiative were sacrificed to being a loyal lieutenant. To an American, used to newspaper vituperation, the fury of anonymous letters attacking him in any crisis is appalling, especially on the abdication of the Duke of Windsor—and the double broadcasts. The enormous amount of spade work he did toward reunion with the Orthodox, Uniat, Swedish and Protestant churches is of especial interest now as the ecumenical movement grows.

Through Christ Our Lord. By Georgia Harkness. Abingdon-Cokesbury, $1.25.

A devotional study of the sayings of our Lord, arranged systematically to cover five months, and interpreted practically, with reference to the problems of men and women in the world today.

Strong Son of God. By Dwight E. Stevenson. Christian Board of Publication, 2700 Pine Blvd., St. Louis 3, Mo.

A volume in the Bethany Course, dealing with the life of our Lord.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

CHURCHMEN ADDRESS PREMIER ATTLEE

★ A number of Episcopalians wired Premier Attlee at the White House on December 4th to tell him that they approved his reported objectives in his talks with President Truman. They include, according to the press, settlement in Korea without a war with China; negotiations with Russia in a four-power meeting; establishment of a UN military commission in Korea; leaving the decision on the use of atomic weapons to a large group of nations.

The telegram, released by the Rev. Andrew M. Van Dyke, executive secretary of the Episcopal League for Social Action, was signed by the Rev. Roscoe T. Foust of New York; the Rev. Kenneth R. Forbes of Philadelphia; the Rev. George H. MacMurray of Brooklyn; the Rev. Allen F. Kremer of Philadelphia; the Rev. Joseph Titus of Jamaica, N. Y.; Miss Mary van Kleeck of Woodstock, N. Y. and Mr. Arthur Fawcett of Annapolis, Maryland.

MAJOR DIVISIONS OF COUNCIL

★ The new National Council of Churches, with Presiding Bishop Henry K. Sherrill as president, will have the Rev. Samuel McCrea Cavert for general secretary, the same position he has held for twenty-nine years for the Federal Council of Churches. He is a Presbyterian. The associate secretary is the Rev. Roy G. Ross, Disciple.

There are four major divisions: foreign missions; home missions; Christian life and work; Christian education, with an executive secretary and an associate secretary heading each division. There are no Episcopalians among the executives though there are some presumably among the 145 persons named as staff personnel.

THE ARTICLES BY DR. GRANT

★ The Protestant Churches of Mobile, Alabama, took over the baseball stadium in November to celebrate Reformation Sunday. The address, which was broadcast, was by the Rev. Frederick C. Grant, professor at Union Seminary and book editor of The Witness. His address on "Our Protestant Heritage" will appear in three parts.

BISHOP IN CHARGE ON UTAH

★ Bishop Lewis of Nevada has been appointed in charge of the district of Utah, following the death of Bishop Clark, announced in The Witness last week.

The New
SOCIAL SECURITY ACT OF 1950

The revised provisions of the Federal Social Security Act are of great importance to everyone who:

(1) Has been covered under the 1937 provisions, or
(2) Will be eligible to participate for the first time on Jan. 1, 1951.

NEWS OF OTHER CHURCHES

SHIPWRECKED SCHOONER BUILDS CHURCH

The little fishing village of Charleston, Oregon, has a new church. Six years ago a schooner was shipwrecked carrying a load of lumber. Salvage efforts failed and the ship and cargo were abandoned. John Porter had been holding services in a school and he saw in the situation a chance to start a church. It took the people of the village about a year to get the timber across the sand spit to the bay. From there they were rafted and towed to the village. Soon a structure was completed, fit at least for services. Four years ago Charles Lyman took over the pastorate. He works on a night shift in a factory. Daytime, when not sleeping, he attends to his people, including working each Wednesday with men and women of the church on the parsonage and completing the church building.

LUTHERAN YOUTH PLAN DRIVE

A summer youth caravan program aimed at increasing the membership of the Luther League, young people's society of the United Lutheran Church, is planned for this coming summer. Taking part will be young people between 18 and 24 who aim to add from 30,000 to 80,000 members. A spokesman for the group said last week that many young people have come to look upon the atom bomb as a challenge or a death warrant and are "eager for information regarding a Christian faith and methods of practicing Christianity in their lives."

CHURCH'S RELATIONSHIP TO ECONOMIC LIFE

The role of the Church in the world's economic life was probed at a special conference in Chicago, sponsored by the Church Federation, with Senator Paul Douglas; Auto-Workers' president, Walter Reuther, and Noel Sargent, secretary of the N. A. M. as speakers. The members of the conference considered the following questions: What application of the Christian gospel can and should be made in the economic realm? What, if any, Christian principles relate to such current questions as inflation, monopolies, power group controls, taxation, labor-management relations, European recovery program? Does the Christian ethic deal with discrimination, whether of minority or pressure groups or others?

METHODISTS URGE DISARMAMENT

Leaders of all nations were urged by the commission on world peace of the Methodist Church to "explore the possibilities of large scale disarmament through the United Nations." In addition the commission deplored the enactment of the McCarran anti-subversive act because "it undermines basic human rights." On the matter of China the commission declared "we believe it is possible without approving the Communist regime in China to recognize it as the de facto government of that country. The refusal to recognize this government is an evasion of existing fact and can only be conducive to further tension rather than peace."

EXPLOITATION OF CROSS OPPOSED BY MINISTERS

Ministers in the Emporia and Independence districts of Kansas are opposed to the so-called "Chanute plan" calling for a mass display of the cross as a "symbol of Christian defiance" to Communism. They supported Methodist Judd Jones of Chanute who termed the plan a "vicious, unethical exploitation of the cross."

GETTING READY FOR OLD AGE

A Congregational Church in Los Angeles has organized a "creative maturity group" to develop new interests and hobbies among middle-aged people and thus prepare them to enjoy their later years. Classes are in memory training, music appreciation, nature study, reed work, furniture repair, child psychology, religious education, creative writing.

DISCIPLES TRANSFER CHINA PROPERTY

The Disciples have taken steps to transfer their property in China to Chinese co-religionists. The work of the denomination in China goes back about 65 years and at the present time there are 19 churches with a total membership of 3,765. No figures are given as to the value of the property being transferred.

PARENTS NEED INFORMATION FOR CHILDREN

Parents of children in Sunday schools need more information on the Church's teachings on social questions, a group of teachers told Presbyterian officials meeting at Atlantic City.

The officers were specifically urged to let parents know where the Church stands on economic justice, race relations, gambling.

THE PRESS

Edited by
GEORGE MacMURRAY

AN AIR CONDITIONED JUNGLE:— Toyohiko Kagawa writing in Presbyterian Life, stresses the need for redemptive love. He states—"without this love society can be no better than an air conditioned jungle, because without it the people who compose society are no more than sophisticated beasts."

Using his own personal experience he shows the occasional need for force but points out its limitations. It is a family illustration and it certainly applies to the family of nations.

As a father and a grandfather, I have observed that although force may be required to prevent a child from climbing out a third-story window or from beating a smaller child, force can never make a child good. That is, you cannot by force form in a child the kind of character that will make him spend his life doing things that benefit, rather than harm, his fellow men. In the same way, society may find it advisable to use force to prevent a criminal from murdering innocent people; the family of nations may employ a police army to deter aggressors. But force must never be the main thing; a community founded on force—a "police state" it is called today—can never achieve genuine civilization because it cannot develop the kind of people that will live together in voluntary productiveness and peace.

Neither force nor food, then—nor the combination of both—is enough.

For man has also a soul, which needs love.

JOHN WESLEY—REVISED: — Simeon Stylites, the fictitious letter-to-the-editor writer in The Christian Century, had some fun with John Wesley recently. John Wesley engendered some reading called "Rules for a Preacher's Conduct." Included in the rules were these: "never be unemployed" and "never be triflingly employed." Mr. Stylites suggests that the "never" be changed to "frequently." So Wesley revised would read: "be frequently unemployed and be frequently triflingly employed." After all a person who is too busy to loaf is too busy.

Ponder Simeon's words. For the soul is squeezed to death by the vise—spell it "vice" and you will still be correct—of unremitting employment. Rudyard Kipling has much evil laid up against him. In the poem "If" (no longer, thank heaven, a form of parlor entertainment) he wrote:

If you can fill the unforgiving minute
With sixty seconds' worth of distance run . . .
You'll be a man—or something. That is not true. If you are always running sixty seconds' worth every minute you will soon be a tiresome machine, with all imagination, all sense of wonder and poetry, dead. All truly creative power, which is nourished in leisure, will be gone, and only a busy body will be left.

With all of which we agree. After all preachers take themselves too seriously anyway.

ECHOES OF TWO WAUGHS:—We appreciate a good headline or caption when we see one. We take our birettas off to The Commonweal for this one. It is the caption on a review of Evelyn Waugh's new book 'Helena' for the book echoes the comic Waugh and the devout Waugh. The pun may be the lowest form of humor but it catches the reader's eye.

BACKFIRE

Readers are encouraged to comment on editorials, articles and news. Since space is limited we ask that letters be brief. We reserve the right to abstract and to print only those we consider important

JOHN COLE McKIM
Clergyman of Peekskill, N. Y.

I am in agreement with what Professor Shepherd has to say (Witness, Nov. 23) about the latest "dogma" of the Bishop of Rome. There is, however, a rather puzzling statement to the effect that the "sixteenth century Reformers . . . removed from the liturgy . . . the feasts of (the) Conception, Nativity and . . . Visitation on July 2."

These feasts are retained in the calendar of the English Prayer Book as "black letter days," though no proper collects, etc., are provided for them.

On the other hand, the American book, which does not print the black letter days in its calendar, does provide a service (p 238) which was framed with a view to its being used on such days.

The conception, nativity and death of the Blessed Virgin are properly implied by scriptural statements that she existed as a human being upwards of 1900 years ago!

MRS. E. L. McKINSEY
Laywoman of Grant Jct., Michigan

In answer to Mrs. Long (Oct. 5th) who wrote that she could find no prayer in our Prayer Book for our enemies, for many years I have been using the prayer for missions on p. 38 with that thought in mind. "Them that are far off" certainly includes our enemies, and we pray that they may seek after God and find him.

H. J. MAINWARING
Layman of Wollaston, Mass.

Surely Leonard A. Chapman, denying that our Lord was "even a clergyman," overlooks the fact that Jesus is our great high priest, from whom the Catholic priesthood of our Church is derived in fact and in authority. He is "a priest forever, after the order of Melchizadek." (Psalm Cx. 4)

Jesus was by right a priest, "and being anointed to that office, performed every function, by way of oblation, intercession, and benediction." (Pearson). "For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that this man (Jesus) have somewhat also to offer." (Hebrews VIII 4). As hymn 89 (At the Lamb's high feast we sing) puts it, Our Lord is "Christ the victim, Christ the priest."

Because he was (and is) a priest, he taught in the synagogues and in the fields and elsewhere. We are told extremely little about his being "a workingman" but a great deal about his priestly work. Surely he was "ordained" to this task, and through his Churchly priesthood he still ministers to his people.

HELEN D. THOMPSON
Churchwoman of Colorado Springs

The article "The Crisis of Faith" by Charles Malik (Nov. 9) is so fine that I wish you might reprint it in pamphlet form. Would that be a possibility?

ANSWER: Yes, if a sufficient number indicate they want it. Price would probably be about 5c, depending on the number ordered. Let's hear from others. Write to The Witness, Tunkhannock, Pa.

M. E. ROE
Layman of San Saba, Texas

I greatly enjoy The Witness and feel that the recent issues have contained an unusual number of very helpful and thought-provoking articles, as well as ones of deep spiritual value.

MR. C. G. CHURCHILL
Layman of New York

The Witness is to be congratulated for the issue of Dec. 7. The full report of the meeting for the organization of the National Council of Churches was excellent, together with the pictures of outstanding leaders.

I am also grateful to you for the letters from Dr. Francis Wei and Bishop Hall of China.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Town and Country Division Offers Unique Training

Gives an Understanding of Need of Rural People for Christian Leadership

★ Throughout the United States 209 seminarians and women in training for professional Church work spent ten weeks or more in special training and supervised field work in small town and open country areas. To present the missionary challenge of rural communities to the men and women in seminaries today and to provide them with a greater understanding of the need of rural people for Christian leadership is the goal of the student rural field service program of the National Council's Division of Town and Country.

Most of these students served under the close supervision of the local clergyman while others worked in communities which had been without a regular ministry for years. The latter, in addition to serving the immediate needs of the people, had also to build a strong lay leadership to act in the place of a clergyman for the future.

Rural Sociology

Courses in rural sociology and community study provided the information necessary to go into a community and to gain a quick knowledge of it in order to see the greatest need for the most strategic and effective work of the student during the summer months. A vacation Church school has proved to be one of the most effective means of reawakening the interest of parents and children in the Church. To this end many hours of study, supervised leading of games, handicrafts, teaching and worship are completed before the seminarian begins his actual field work. A greater understanding of rural people and rural life is made possible through special lectures on agriculture, soil conservation and cattle raising. Resources available to the rural clergyman such as the county bookmobile, the county agent and home demonstration agent; the county nurse; and the cooperative movement are introduced. The joys, problems and challenge of the pastoral ministry are emphasized. Tours to successful and thriving rural parishes and missions give the students an opportunity to observe a small parish in operation.

Seminars

The National Town-Country Church Institute, Roanridge, Parkville, Missouri; the Southern Rural Church Institute, Valle Crucis, North Carolina; the Intercultural Rural Church Institute, Fort Defiance, Arizona —all provide three weeks of intensive seminars, lectures and study in rural Church methods each summer. The New England Rural Church Institute and the Texas Rural Church Institute each provide ten days course of training. This introductory orientation is followed by seven to ten weeks of practical experience in a local congregation under the supervision of the vicar or priest-in-charge. In some instances more mature men attend the training sessions at Roanridge and then go to serve in towns in which there is little or no direct supervision but in which there is opportunity for constant communication with the bishop or archdeacon. At the end of the summer each student writes a complete summary of his work and of the field in which he worked. A detailed report of the student's work is sent to his seminary.

A Few Examples

The emphasis of the summer program is placed on training of the seminarian, with the majority of students serving and learning in the several institute programs. The Student Rural Field Service program is not a method of filling a gap in the long list of vacancies in rural mission clergy lists. The benefits to the local congregations depend largely on the student who works with them. In many instances they are great and many. For instance, a Church Divinity School of the Pacific student, Malcom Riker of the diocese of Texas, worked in a small community in Idaho last summer. As a result he prepared 11 persons for baptism and 7 for confirmation. He averaged 30 pastoral calls a week, proving to himself, as well as to the Church, that constant calling is a basic need in every mission or parish. An Episcopal Theological School middler, Edgar Romig, served in another small Idaho town and was instrumental in helping the congregation begin a building fund for a badly needed parish house. In Montana two Episcopal Theological School students, Herman Page and John Hannahs, a Church Army cadet, Alex Patience, and Seabury-Western Theological seminarian Horace Varian conducted services and vacation Church schools in seven small communities. In Utah several students worked in close cooperation with the Rev. Robert Nicholas in small mining communities.

The benefit to the student is summed up in the following excerpts taken from 1950 student summer reports.

"My summer in the rural areas of a western state was worth far more than a year in the seminary in giving me more insight into the work of the Church in the mission fields and convinced me that this type of work is what I like and want to do when I finish my seminary training. The summer's work has helped me to understand what is important and what isn't from the flock of experiences and information which are poured on one in seminary. I only hope it benefited the diocese half as much as it did me."

"I got a different but very true picture of the Church in my work this last summer. I've been working with the Church four years in one capacity or another, but this is the greatest and most invigorating experience I have had yet. I would highly recommend this field to any student but especially to one who is in doubt about the ministry. After working here one should know whether one wants it or not and just how badly. By this I mean that here you meet every type of situation. You have to be forceful, patient, humble all at the same time. If you are used to the frustrating hustle and bustle of the East, you will have to forget it or else your ministry to those people will be ineffective because they will not be hurried."

"The work this summer was a wonderful opportunity to test my vocation. The result of the experience has been to strengthen it."

The Minister's Homestead At Roanridge

BY
JOHN H. PHILBRICK

★ The federal census of 1950 has confirmed the increasingly apparent fact that one of the most pronounced shifts in population and changes in family and community living is the growing settlement of people in suburban areas. A small plot of land enables them to supplement their cash incomes from city employment by producing vegetables and raising a few animals. Happily the Church's recent increased and renewed interest in the productive homestead way of life is abreast of this shift of living conditions.

The productive homestead is defined as "a plot of land on which the family lives and works —the direct source of some of the family's food, shelter and clothing." The practice of homesteading at the present time has a wider application than is evidenced by published statistics. A large number of clergy of all denominations now find homesteading a means to a more effective ministry.

The Roanridge Rural Training Foundation is establishing a demonstration homestead as a part of its training for men and women who intend to do Church work in rural areas in the rural-urban fringes of our great cities. A small garden has already been in production for one season with abundant supply of fresh vegetables for summer use. Our great need is for funds for buildings and supplies.

The purpose of the demonstration homestead is to introduce the student to practical methods in the operation of a productive homestead as a means of supplementing their income; of enriching their family life; and of relating their daily lives to those of the people with whom they work and live.

The glebe lands assigned to clergy of the Church of England long ago were the forerunners of the homestead for clergy. Modern machinery makes it possible for the small homestead unit to function with a new efficiency. The minister may pursue part-time agricultural operations quite easily in the backyard of his rectory with no neglect of his parochial and pastoral duties. Homesteading as a method takes its place as a tool along with surveys, map-making, recreational activities, visual aids and the other facilities available to the modern ministry.

The rural clergyman who is raising enough vegetables for his own family in his own garden has a bond in common with his farmer neighbors who raise their own vegetables. Part of his work is like their work. He has a deeper understanding of their problems. He learns to speak their language and he is able to talk intelligently about the things that concern them most. "He doesn't preach dry sermons in wet weather." This principle applies equally well to the "fringe area" commuters living outside a big city as it does in the open country parish.

Likewise, when the minister plants a garden or sets out fruit trees or sets a hen on a clutch of eggs, his people feel that he is likely to remain with them for awhile. He himself has a feeling of permanence, of belonging to the soil as well as to the people and the community. Some of the human rewards of the ministry come only after a life-time of service: young people's work, marriages, baptisms, helping family units to grow. But the clergyman whose life belongs to the soil, the community and the church families has an opportunity to bridge the gaps between the denominations especially as he and his family identify themselves with 4-H Clubs, the Grange, the farm bureau, cooperatives or any other small local group which people organize to supply their own social needs in the community.

With emphasis on the importance of the family unit, the homestead presents an ideal environment for many kinds of companionship and sharing of work, recreational and educational experiences of the family as a whole. There are fields in which to walk, ponds in which to fish and opportunities for a variety of work in the changing seasons of the year. Within the homestead itself are educational facilities more practically directed than many schoolrooms: building houses for farm animals, fencing, mechanical work on farm tools, where children may learn some of the principles of planning, measuring, purchasing, as well as actual construction. Planning the garden, planting, tending, harvesting, cooking, are climaxed in the joy of eating home-grown foods—with a subsequent health bonus. Children growing up with a garden and with animals gain complete familiarity with the facts of life and of death and the resurrection each succeeding spring.

The rural clergyman does not have to have either a large tract of land or as many different enterprises as the farmer in order to identify himself with the occupations of his neighbors and to be able to speak their language. It has been the experience of many ministers that the minimum recommendation would be a vegetable garden which may be very small and still provide much food for the family. Another practical addition is a small flock of hens to supply eggs and poultry at only a fraction of the cost of these foods on the market. If the clergyman wants to provide his own milk supply, either a pair of milk goats or a family cow will be adequate.

The question most frequently asked about homesteading is "How much time does it take?" It is almost impossible to measure the time involved because of the seasonal character of many jobs. Also, the minister and his neighbor can exchange a day's work—an excellent time to talk about various religious topics as they come up naturally in the course of the work. Routine work such as feeding the hens, collecting the eggs, or milking does not take much more time than would be spent going to the grocery store. Also, the time spent caring for homestead chores may be considered both educational and recreational. Time spent learning manual skills which identify a man with his parishioners is as valuable as time spent studying psychology. Some men can compose better sermons while keeping their hands busy on a project.

The minister with a homestead is able to help himself economically by raising some of his own food, clothing or shelter. He is in a position to save money although he is not commercially in the business of farming. The townsfolk respect his energy and his enterprise. Those who may think that preaching is not working respond when they see that their spiritual leader is also able to do manual labor. People are also happy that the minister with a homestead has a security apart from his cash salary as an offset to depression or war scarcity. If the minister's wife is skillful with home baking or dressmaking, she is furthering the philosophy of the homestead and stretching her allowance as well as building a bond of common interest between herself and the women of the community.

When the minister is in a position to develop a productive home, no matter how simply, he comes into a partnership with the Creator and learns and teaches anew that "God saw everything that he had made and behold, it was good."

The considerable number of men and women who have already experienced the impact of the productive homestead on both a local church body and the community recognize what a powerful psychological effect it has upon the people themselves. They will literally beat a pathway to the door of the homestead to discuss hens and gardens and compost making as well as the things of the spirit. This impact is one of the tools which the modern minister may utilize to teach people in an overmechanized age some truths about integrity of human life and man's relationship to the good earth.

CHURCH LEADERS TUSSLE WITH NEW NEEDS

★ The urgent need for additional clergy is vividly seen in population and Church statistics in the states composing the dioceses and districts of the province of the Pacific. Total population in these states, according to preliminary report of the 1950 federal census, is 16,673,696, an increase of 5,355,743 during the past ten years. This is an increase of 37.5 per cent for this area as a whole, the total population in 1940 being 11,317,953. The state of California, with a growth of 53.3 per cent, records the greatest percentage of increase of any state in the Union. Nevada records an increase of 45.2 per cent; Oregon, 39.6 per cent; Washington, 37 per cent; Idaho being lowest in the province with 12.1 per cent.

Church statistics for the closest corresponding period, 1940-1949, show increase in communicants from 169,526 in 1940 to 247,667 in 1949, an increase of 142,041, or 45.6 per cent. These figures do not include Alaska, Hawaii and the Philippines.

Number of active clergy have increased during this period from 358 to 441, a gain of 83 men for a growth of 26 per cent. This gain of 83 active clergy needs to be viewed in relation to the increase of more than five million persons among whom the Church has the opportunity and responsibility to serve. In the seven missionary districts of the province, 90 active clergy (including the bishops) serve 253 parishes and organized missions. Places listed as unorganized missions and preaching stations would bring the average in missionary districts to more than three places served per man.

TREASURER DILL REPORTS

★ Russell E. Dill, treasurer of the National Council, has released the following financial statement for December:

"It is reported that industrial profits for the first nine months of this year shattered all previous records, that personal income soared to a new high annual rate, and that employment and wages were the highest in United States history.

"This improvement has been reflected in the dollar payments on expectations for the first eleven months of 1950 which have broken all records. However, 18.03% of the 1950 expectations still remains to be paid before the close of the year.

"In view of the business record of 1950 and the loyalty of its members, the Church looks forward with confidence."

CHRISTMAS IN FRESNO

★ Roman Catholic and Protestant leaders in Fresno, Calif., joined forces in urging householders to decorate their homes for Christmas. Awards were given to those having the best displays of the Nativity or historical scenes.

CONFIRMATION AT YOUNG CHURCH

★ Bishop Phillips of Southwestern Virginia confirmed the first class at St. James, youngest church in the diocese, located at Williamson, near Roanoke. There were fourteen adults and four young people. The rector is the Rev. J. Manly Cobb.

RURAL WORK MATERIAL ANNOUNCED

★ "Rural Prospect" by Rev. Mark Rich is the basic study book prepared for adults of all cooperating denominations of the Missionary Education Movement as the home missionary study program for 1950-51. The theme is "The Church and the Community" which is interpreted as the rural community and the Church. "Rural Prospect" is an authoritative factual resource book for adults on the new opportunity for Christianity in rural America. Other special study material on the work of the Church throughout the United States in rural areas have been prepared for young people and children.

To supplement this study each diocese and district has designated a specific domestic missionary enterprise as its special project for study and giving.

During Lent children of our Church schools will use the two units especially prepared by the National Council's department of Christian education with the emphasis on six typically rural situations in the work of the Episcopal Church today: Church school by mail; Southern highlanders, a trailer chapel, rural daily vacation Bible schools, the small town church, and an Indian mission. For primary and kindergarten children the unit is called "Down Country Roads" and is written by Miss Gloria Jameson, diocesan adviser in Christian education of Montana. "Children of the Land" is the title of the unit for older children.

St. Michael's Mission in Ethete, Wyoming, an Episcopal mission to the Arapahoe Indians, is the object of the Birthday Thank Offering for 1950-51. Special study materials, birthday cards and picture folder describing this work are available through the National Council.

Materials further describing the work of the Division of Town and Country and publications of the National Council and other sources for use in rural churches are as follows:

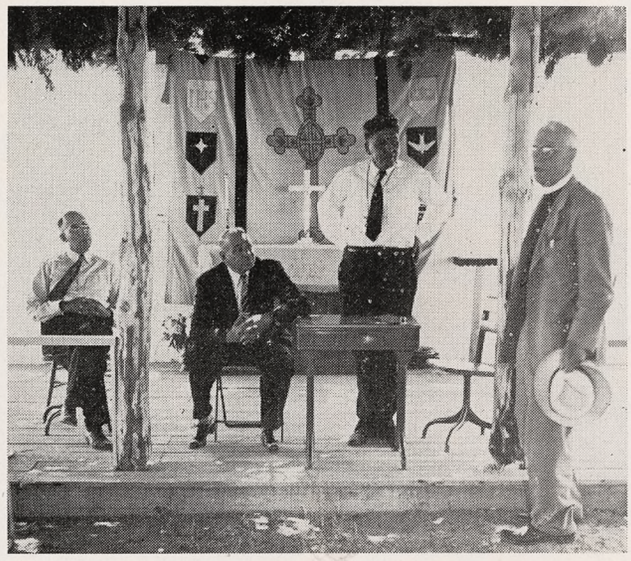
PRAYER GROUP IN THE OZARKS

★ Designed to deepen the spiritual life of isolated and shut-in persons, the Prayer Group of the Greater Congregation in the Ozarks is a valuable addition to the devotional activity of Church people in Northwest Arkansas. Under the leadership of the Rev. Robert B. Hall, priest-in-charge of the Ozark field in the diocese of Arkansas, members of the Prayer Group join in intercessory prayer three times daily.

Coming to the Ozark field as a deacon in 1949, Mr. Hall was faced with the problem of ministering to isolated people scattered over more than 3,000 square miles of Ozark mountain country. Two pastoral calls a year seemed to be the most a crowded schedule would permit; and, the distances being so great, many of the Episcopalians in the area could get to church only once a year. Immediate and continuous contact was established with these isolated folk through Home Prayers, described elsewhere in this issue. Many people who had moved into the Ozarks and because of sickness or distance could not attend services missed their former active life in Church affairs.

The Prayer Group has filled this need in great measure. Although deprived of physical attendance at church functions, members of the group through their prayers aid materially in advancing the cause of Christ in the area. Weekly lists are sent out by Mr. Hall. Episcopalians in seven Arkansas counties are united at 8:00, 12:00 and 7:00 o'clock each day as they share in the work of the Prayer Group. Through Home Prayers and by correspondence the needs of the members are made known to Mr. Hall and the next list carries prayer suggestions to meet these needs. In the weekly envelope bearing Home Prayers and the Prayer Group list goes the Sunday bulletin from one of the three Ozark mission churches which are strung out at 45-mile intervals across the field. Since no one but Prayer Groups members see the lists, matters too personal to be mentioned in public services are often the subject of requests for intercessions. Drunkenness, domestic difficulties, and certain illnesses are some of the things troubling people who ask the Prayer Group to pray for them. Since the majority of the so-called Greater Congregation are not personally acquainted with the supplicant, many shy persons have put in requests for prayers. The power of group prayer of this type has been undeniably demonstrated to the members in their endeavor.



SEMINARIES GIVE COURSES ON RURAL WORK

★ Indicative of the renewed interest of the Church in serving the people of small towns and open country is the fact that courses in rural Church methods and rural community life are being given in six of the Episcopal seminaries. The other four seminaries provide seminar sessions and special lectures not listed as catalogue courses, or the subject matter is covered in courses on pastoral theology.

Fully accredited courses in rural Church work are given at Seabury-Western and Nashotah by the Rev. E. Dargan Butt. The Rev. W. Francis Allison of Montrose, Pa., will teach a rural course at Philadelphia Divinity School next spring. The Rev. John R. Stalker has been the instructor in rural Church work at Bexley Hall for several years. The Rev. Thomas A. Tripp, director of the Town and Country Work of the Congregational Christian Church, succeeded Edmund Brunner at General Seminary. At the Church Divinity School of the Pacific Dr. Corell Julian of the Pacific School of Religion teaches the course. The Rev. Clifford L. Samuelson of the National Council's Division of Town and Country gives supplementary lectures in several of these courses.

ROXBURY RECTOR IS HONORED

★ The Rev. David L. Ferguson was honored at a reception, along with Mrs. Ferguson, at St. Cyprian's, Roxbury, Mass., on December 7th, the occasion of his 30th anniversary as rector. Bishop Nash was present for confirmation at the evening service on the 3rd when a class of 33 persons were presented.

EDITORIALS

Judge of Men and Nations

"CHRISTMAS has gone to the dogs! Comic-books instead of carols; sales competition all December instead of Advent preparation for a religious holy day." That is the sort of comment one hears from old-fashioned Churchmen, musing on the good old days. And it is, of course, a true and sad picture, a description of what is inevitable, rather than surprising, in a world that has long been measuring all values by standards of money and force.

Is there anything that we, who regret such a perversion of the holy season, can do about it? We can say, as many devout Christians are saying: "we will not be swept away by all this; we will keep our minds on the Christ-child and the Christmas story." But it is not enough to attempt this. In the first place, it can't be done, outside a monastery or other ivory tower, for we are an intimate part of this mad, seething world. In the second place, it is not essentially Christian to try to do it. What we Christians try with all our might to do, by thought and by action, is to relate the supreme fact of Christmas to the miserable and chaotic world in which we live. For the Incarnation —that actual coming of the eternal into a world of time and space—is an enduring and therefore a contemporary fact, not an isolated miracle in the Palestine of long ago. When the Word was made flesh in Bethlehem, a new and revolutionary life-force entered into humanity to stay, not to visit. History sets down some of the tremendous results of this Advent—child-murder and suicide, as institutions, eradicated from the life of a decaying empire; hospitals and asylums established to make the unfit fit; a political and economic tyranny replaced by the authority of a militant Christian family; innumerable personal transformations in character and insight, from Apostolic days on through the centuries; renewals over and over again in the Church herself, when power had corrupted and riches weakened. Hildebrand, Francis, Langton, Wesley, Pusey and Keble are names that mark some of these epochs of renewal.

We are living in a period of history that is both skeptical and revolutionary. Moral and social principles which have long been familiar axioms are being challenged and Christian disciples especially will be well-advised to heed St. Paul's exhortation: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." Believing then, as we do, in the continuing presence of "the Light that lighteth every man coming into the world," we shall celebrate Christmas most worthily and most fruitfully by keeping that intimate personal relation to the Incarnate Word which he is offering us in the blessed fellowship of his holy family, where every problem, every tragedy, every hope may be joined, like little dirt-laden streams, to the cleansing torrent of his abundant life, by serene and persistent prayer and by the offering up of all the changes and chances of this mortal life at every eucharist for the Lord Christ to cleanse and make over according to the pattern of his will and his love.

And then—as fast as the awareness dawns of what his will is for us personally and for our families, our neighborhood, our nation — to go out about our duties and among our friends and acquaintances and enemies and bear witness bravely, uncompromisingly, to the vision that was shown us in the mount, where the Master was transfigured from a vague figure of idealism and good works into the captain of our salvation, a person of searching light and inexorable love that demands whole-souled devotion and witnessing to his will in a world that has always rejected him.

Yes, Christmas is a homely, a winsome, an appealing festival, but it must have at its heart, for every Christian, a stern and relentless challenge to follow and company with, at whatever great cost to us, the Christ-child who is this day and all days the judge of men and nations and peoples.

The Nourishing Strength Of Fellowship

BY MAXWELL BROWN
President, Rural Workers' Fellowship

AMONG the differences found between Church work in urban areas and rural areas is the feeling of isolation the Church worker in town or country places endures. I use the word "endures" purposely, for often a rural Church worker laboring in a field many miles from the other Episcopal workers finds that the greatest mental handicap with which he struggles daily is the sense of loneliness. This does not come about so much from lack of work to be done, for there is always more to do than time allows. But it comes about through the lack of having close contact with other Church workers who meet the same problems, have the same frustrations, and enjoy the same victories and rewards of the work. Human nature is gregarious. We need to share our victories and our defeats with others. Clergy in urban areas, if they desire, can meet together easily in a regular monthly meeting. They can spiritually grow together in a retreat. They can join together in mutual promotion of causes. They are more apt to see each other for an informal chat. In all these meetings there is a strengthening bond of fellowship. The urban worker constantly feels he belongs to a large, vital, Christian society. To a worker in rural or small town areas the Church too often becomes an isolated, struggling segment of humanity. True, there are many reasons why he ought not to feel this way, but on the other hand nothing causes a sense of depression so easily as loneliness.

The Fellowship

WHEN the Rural Workers' Fellowship was founded in 1924 one of the prime reasons for establishing the organization was to promote a sense of fellowship and spiritual oneness between the workers in small towns and open country places. The thought prevailed that if they could not get together for regular meetings, at least there were two bonds that could bring them together. One, a spiritual bond in prayer; the other, the United States mails. Since 1924 the Rural Workers' Fellowship has added a great deal more to its purposes and programs, yet this first cause is still an important part of our united efforts today.

While the R. W. F. does not sponsor or promote any special rural project or schools and conducts no experiment to test certain theories, yet it is an organization that plays a very definite part in building up the quality of town and country work. Through its meetings and publications it has inspired men to develop their own ideas for the expansion or betterment of rural work. The use of lay reader's guide, the lay reader's sermon service, the processional service for the observance of Rogation Day, harvest festivals, the Lord's acre program have developed at least in part from the stimulation and encouragement of the R. W. F. The relationship between the Fellowship and the various branches of National Council as well as provincial and diocesan departments of town and country is a relationship of closeness and interest and mutual help. In no way does our organization conflict with any executive branch established by the Church to promote town and country work. We have no paid officers. All our directors and officers are men and women in the field who give of their services freely and gladly. Our entire program is based upon the three objectives listed in our by-laws:

1. To promote the interest of the whole Church in developing an effective ministry to town and country areas;
2. To increase fellowship among rural workers and those interested in rural community life; and
3. To aid the National Council in its program and its service to rural workers.

Critics Answered

SOMETIMES we who are associated with the R. W. F. hear the criticism that the Fellowship does not "do anything." By this we assume we are criticized for having no budget to support rural clergy or to promote a conference for their training or to sponsor the rural cause at "281." These things are not done by us, nor will they. There have been established proper Church channels for this type of rural work promotion. It is not our purpose to duplicate them.

Others have criticized the R. W. F. for being an overlapping, conflicting organization, not needed because we have a strong Division of Town and Country Work. Again, this is a misconception of the purpose of the R. W. F. We neither overlap nor conflict with any official department in our Church. Our purpose, to state it again, is (1) to promote interest in the opportunities for the spread of the Kingdom in towns and in open country, (2) to increase fellowship among those laboring in this field, and (3) to aid the National Council (and all provinces and dioceses) in service to the town and country field.

How do our 414 members (membership dues currently paid!) do this?

Our pattern can be broken down into four areas:

1. Educational
2. Developing a sense of belonging . . . of fellowship, through the exchange of ideas and news
3. Developing the spiritual bond
4. Co-operation with all existing executive branches of our Church.

To expand the picture, the educational process is carried on through publications. The Fellowship has a quarterly journal called "Crossroads." It endeavors through the journal to contribute to the thinking of all interested in the town and country work of the Church through educational articles of interest to both Church worker and laity. The R. W. F. also published an informal News Letter in which are gathered together the chattier bits of news and program activities of our members. This is mimeographed and mailed out three or four times a year. The educational part of our work is also implemented through our affiliation with the interdenominational Christian Rural Fellowship and the Town and Country Church published by the committee on town and country of the National Council of Churches. Through this group we obtain at reduced prices their various publications which are sent to our members. All in all there are seven publications coming to our members, varying from three to ten issues per year.

United in Prayer

JUST as important as our educational program, and in fact in many ways even more important, is the joining together of our members in daily prayer. The R. W. F. publishes a prayer cycle three times a year, in which each member is listed on a particular day. Throughout this hemisphere every member remembers in his private devotions these companions who labor in the town and country field. This spiritual bond does much to eliminate the feeling of loneliness among the isolated rural workers. To know that we pray for and are being remembered in prayer by others does lighten any heaviness caused by mental or physical weariness.

Another way in which the Fellowship helps promote effective work in town and country is through the awarding annually of the Rural Fellowship Award. This certificate and citation is given to not more than five persons annually who have made outstanding contributions to the work of the Church in town and country. Nominations for candidates to receive the reward are made by members each spring to the board of directors of the R. W. F. The board is careful in its selection and has high criterion for the awarding of this merited prize. Whenever possible the actual award, if the recipient is not present to receive the award at the annual meeting of the Fellowship, is presented at a public gathering in his or her diocese. The awards in 1950 were made to the Rev. Richard Price, Montana; the Rt. Rev. Malcolm E. Peabody, Central New York; Wilber A. Cochel, West Missouri; the Rev. William Christian, Fond du Lac; and the Rev. Canon Ernest B. Smith, Olympia.

Membership in the organization is not limited to residents of rural areas. There are many urban members who have a keen interest in promoting the Church in town and country. Indeed, with American cities pushing out into suburbs and surrounding small towns, the R. W. F. is making a contribution to the thinking of both rural and urban people as the Church meets this new move of American mobility. This is one of the reasons we changed the title of our quarterly from the former name "The Rural Messenger" to the present "Crossroads," endeavoring thereby to bring the idea of the Cross to all roads of American life . . . rural, urban, and the great growing segment in between.

Someone once described the R. W. F. as being a very necessary part of the life of the Church. It is like the blood in the arteries and veins of the body. This is very true. The body (the various departments in the Church busy with promoting work in the town and country and suburban fields) is nourished by the blood stream of spiritual fellowship. The latter reaches down into the cells of the body to nourish it with prayer and fellowship and by educational and stimulating articles. The body does the work of promoting, growing, acting, expanding. It is the natural outlet of the energies of the cells of the body. Both need each other. One to do the work, its directing, its promoting. The other to be the medium of individual and united expression of town-country workers, the sustaining force of prayer and fellowship. The description is apt, for it is the spiritual and mental nourishing of those who work in town and country areas that contributes heavily to the growth of our entire Church.

The Parish Minister Extends His Reach

BY
ALLEN W. CLARK
Rector of Calvary Church, Danvers, Mass.

ONE of the essential aims of the rural work of the Church as defined by various conferences and rural Church leaders is "to provide a pastoral ministry to people in rural areas." The problem confronting the faithful rural pastor is how he can overcome the factors of vast distances, poor roads, shortage of time and need for economy in travel costs.

The alert and enterprising minister is forever reaching out for new ways of ministering to his people. One such way, only now becoming widely known, is the ministry-by-mail knows as "Home Prayers." This is a worship service (with prayers, a Bible reading, and a 500-word sermon) attractively printed on a single sheet, published each week from the first Sunday in October until the first Sunday in July. The service always closes with the words, "Faithfully yours," with space left for the minister to sign his name. Thus Home Prayers comes to each parishioner as a personal, pastoral call-by-mail from the minister they know and trust.

Home Prayers are used for "shut-ins" with equal effectiveness in both country and city areas. But this ministry-by-mail has other uses of special value in the rural ministry. For the country parson has a flock scattered widely out along the dirt roads, and he cannot call on these lonely people as often as he desires. He can, however, with a very small expenditure of time, call on them regularly and conduct a worship service for them by mail! If he is a good pastor, he will—at least once a month—write a personal postscript at the bottom of the page, perhaps asking a question about the health of some member of the family and enclosing a return postal for the answer. This costs an extra cent and is well worth it. He will find people saying, "I always look at the bottom of the page first to see if you have written something to me." Many rural clergy have several churches and use Home Prayers to supplement the regular service at places where they can only hold service once a month or so.

Today some 300 parish clergy and dioceses are using nearly 8,000 copies of Home Prayers each week, ministering to Christian people who want to attend church, but who are prevented by illness, isolation, Sunday work, small babies and many another genuine reason.

With a growing number of young people in the armed services ministers are beginning again, as they did in World War II, to keep in touch with those on their parish service list by sending Home Prayers to them. It is sometimes surprising to find how deeply these young men and women appreciate this worship service from home, often with a personal postscript from their own minister. In World War II Home Prayers were used on ships in the navy, in fox holes, in the jungle, and wherever else enlisted men and officers found themselves.

The sermon is simple, direct, and often written in the parable style, with a vivid story to do the preaching. For more than two decades these sermons have been read by back-country people with little education, by college professors, wage-earning folk and executives in industry—by a wide variety of folk, each finding help because the manner of teaching is that used by the Master in the New Testament.

Simply Financed

THE finances of Home Prayers are refreshingly simple. This ministry-by-mail is not a commercial venture, its sole purpose being to serve as a practical instrument in the Kingdom of God. Therefore, there is no set subscription rate, and no bills are ever sent out. The minister who decides to try out Home Prayers in his field simply writes to the Rev. Allen W. Clark at 44 Cherry Street, Danvers, Mass. and orders ten copies or a hundred, or whatever number he needs. Shortly afterward his copies begin to arrive. Several times a year "the plate is passed" inviting contributions. The actual publication cost is two cents a copy, and most users figure their contributions on that basis. The common practice is for each user to make two contributions a year, each covering their gift for half the season of 40 weeks. A minister using 25 copies a week, therefore, would be apt to make two contributions of $10 each. Some, however, cannot afford to send the full amount, and there are times when a user cannot conveniently make any gift at all. His copies continue to arrive, regardless of contributions. And the Home Prayers budget has always balanced, over 22 years, on this voluntary Christian basis.

Financing in Parishes

THE financing of Home Prayers by each parish is done in various ways. The increasing practice is for the parish to make an appropriation out of its budget. Often the clergyman finances the cost for a time out of his discretionary fund until Home Prayers have become recognized and appreciated sufficiently for the parish to pay the cost. Often, especially where Home Prayers are sent out with a really personal touch by the minister, the people receiving Home Prayers take care of the entire cost, or part of it, being invited to contribute directly to their own minister.

Home Prayers are a practical and open channel for the love of God to reach out steadily through a busy pastor who wants to feed all of his people dependably. It provides a simple and flexible instrument for touching the lives of people he can only see occasionally; thus making them know that they are never forgotten by their minister.

If you wish to try out this simple and proven ministry-by-mail, just write to the Rev. Allen W. Clark, who is the author of Home Prayers, at 44 Cherry Street, Danvers, Massachusetts. He will welcome you into the growing company of ministers who have found the U. S. mails as effective for the Christian faith as Sears Roebuck proved it to be for the selling of merchandise.

Church Institute Building Nearing Completion

THE National Town-Country Church Institute building at Roanridge, Parkville, Missouri, will be ready for housing seminary students and women trainees by June of 1951 according to an announcement just released by the Rev. Clifford L. Samuelson, executive secretary of the Division of Town and Country of the National Council. The cornerstone of the new building was laid by Bishop Sherrill last April. The Rev. Norman L. Foote is resident director of this program for student training for the rural ministry.

The two and one-half story structure is of multiple-use design, adapting its facilities both to a year-round program of Church and community activities and as a base for rural Church training of seminarians and women in Church training during the summer period. The ground floor of the building provides a chapel for sixty persons; school rooms; dining room with seating capacity for forty persons; kitchen and laundry. The main floor has student rooms; dormitory wing; business office; class-rooms and an apartment for the director and his family. The top floor has three separate one-room apartments for staff and married student living quarters. The steeple mounted with a cross provides a dignity and churchly character to the structure. The design and lumber of the central unit was formerly an historic farm house.

At the present time the building has progressed to the stage of plastering and finishing the main floor and top floor apartments. The ground floor is completed to the stage of being ready for plastering and finishing. Mr. Foote and his wife and four children are living in the student dining-room and kitchen section of the building under the somewhat primitive conditions of rough concrete block atmosphere. The presence of the Rev. Mr. Foote on the premises enables him, together with Mr. W. A. Cochel of Roanridge, to provide careful oversight to the total construction which is especially necessary due to the fact that the building has not been let on a contract but has progressed on a work-as-funds-are-available basis. This close supervision by Mr. Foote and Mr. Cochel has accounted for many economies in costs. Indications at this stage are that the total construction costs will not exceed $85,000. The evaluation of the completed structure has been placed at $140,000. To date construction costs amount to $65,000. This money has come from grants from the National Council and the executive board of the Woman's Auxiliary supplementing the original fund for the building from the Birthday Thank Offering for 1948-49. Local individuals have also made contributions to the building fund. Until such time as funds are in hand for their completion, the chapel, dining hall and kitchen and the basement class rooms will be used in their unfinished stage of rough concrete block. The cost of completing and furnishing the chapel unit is estimated at $7500; the dining hall and kitchen will require $6000; and the Church school rooms $5000. There are no available current National Council sources for these items, according to the Rev. Mr. Samuelson, and the completion of these parts of the building will depend on gifts from interested individuals, "specials" from diocesan Woman's Auxiliaries, or subsequent grants from the national Church which may be available at some future date.

During the five years since its establishment, the National Town-Country Church Institute has enrolled more than 200 seminarians and women Church trainees in its field related training program designed to improve the ministry provided by the Church to town and country people. The Institute program has been made possible by the generous and cooperative provision of the facilities of Park College, Parkville, Missouri. Various phases of the Institute training work will continue to be at Park College, including the three week intensive indoctrination course at the beginning of each summer at which time enrollment far exceeds the capacities of the new institute building.

For the first time in five years of year-round work in the local community and Church development phases of the Institute program, the Institute has its full complement of staff members. These include the Rev. Norman L. Foote, director; the Rev. John Philbrick, associate in homestead development; the Rev. William B. Spofford Jr., associate in research and community studies; Miss Letitia Croom, associate in Christian education; and Mrs. Helen Philbrick, secretarial work. Each of the clergy also has charge of a local rural congregation. During the current year each of the clergy is on the faculty of Park College teaching the social studies courses. This staff is supplemented during the summer training period by other professionally qualified persons to assist in the field training and supervision and student counseling.

The Rural Chuch Alive

BY

ROBERT C. JONES

Captain in Church Army

THE life of a rural church is just as vigorous and effective as it is related directly to the life and land of the area.

The value of a farm program for Calvary Church, Hillman, Michigan, is evident. Here was another neglected church, run down, without leadership, and rapidly losing hope. It was exerting little influence in the community, yet there was a great potential manpower that could be developed. The Church had existed because of the faithful labors of a group of women while the men stood idly by. How to use them was the problem. Whatever they were asked to do had to be worthy of their efforts and in terms of work they knew how to do. A Church farm program patterned on the Lord's acre movement was inaugurated. The response was tremendous. Soon every man of the congregation was at work. Some raised pigs, others cut and baled hay, still others plowed and worked and finally planted 14 acres in wheat and vetch. The total farm income for 1949 was approximately $1,200 with the wheat and vetch still to be harvested this fall. The success of the program has resulted in a permanent farm committee who at present are seeking land that could be purchased and farmed regularly by the men of the Church.

The Church has taken on new meaning and importance for these men. Worship is no longer something alien to their daily work. Their toil, as it were, has been sanctioned because it is dedicated to God, and they now share actively in the support of his work. The Church has gained favorable publicity and considerable respect in the eyes of the people in the area, for here is the church at work. It has not interfered with the regular weekly giving but rather stimulated it. The church for many years previous to 1946 had existed with an annual budget of approximately $150. The total income in 1949 was nearly $5,000. Such an increase is not due to the farm program alone, but it is one of the factors which has helped to create a growing church.

Men have always loved and preserved sacrificially that which they have created with their hands and especially is this true when that which is created is good and has both purpose and meaning.

Service of the R.W.F.

BY

CLIFFORD L. SAMUELSON
Executive Secretary, Division of Town and Country Work, National Council

"IS your knowledge of the rural Church and rural people theoretical or actual?" was the direct question put to me by a charming woman from Texas shortly after I assumed my work as the officer of National Council responsible for developing a national program for rural work. I dared to reply that I hoped my theoretical study of rural community life was properly balanced by a number of years of first-hand experience and direct observation of town and country life and the work of the rural ministry. During the past ten years that I have been in national Church work, time and again as points have been suggested regarding rural work I have put them through the sieve of "is this theoretical or actual?"

It has been in large part the close association I have had with members of the Rural Workers' Fellowship, both individually and as an organization, that there has been developed in the Episcopal Church a rural program with clearly defined goals, policies, organization and budget which is based not on speculation and theory but rooted in the actual work of the local rural minister and the task and opportunity of the local church in the local community.

CLIFFORD L. SAMUELSON gets a report from Edgar Romig, student at Episcopal Theological School, on his work last summer in Idaho. More than 200 students were enrolled in the Student Rural Field Service program, operated through national and regional institutes under the auspices of the National Council's Division of Town and Country

The continuing soundness of a national program for town and country work will in large measure depend on the continual growth in the Church of a group of men and women who actually are in the local work of the Church. The Rural Workers' Fellowship with the dedication of its members to the achievement of its threefold goal is just such a strength and security in the life of the Church.

At the Sign of the Stable

BY

THOMAS V. BARRETT

ACCORDING to the astrologers, the stars exert a powerful influence upon us. Judging by the newsstands, there must be a host of people who are interested in astrological formulae, and who take up star-gazing as seriously as insurance salesmen take up golf. We call this a superstitious business. Yet we are all star-gazers, after a fashion. It is the way of man to go looking for a star.

The child is taught in his first faltering years to make a wish. "Star-light, star-bright, first star I've seen tonight." The adolescent yearning is given voice in "Stardust," "Hitch your wagon to a star," and a dozen other planetary songs. The novelist wishing for a symbol to express hope for the earth names a book, "Stars Fell on Alabama." The poet weaving a thread of song says, "Choose something like a star, To stay our minds on and be staid." We are all star-gazers, warmed by a hope that somewhere we can find a star to guide us through a troubled world.

When you read the paper these days you'd think a Russian man must be an extraordinary creature. But that really isn't true. A Russian is not much more mysterious than you or I. He is in the same frying pan, by and large; he lives, eats, sleeps, makes love, grieves, sickens and dies. Like you. Like me. He is a man looking for a star.

Better Things to Come

YOU'D think to read the papers about the madcap escapades of Mrs. Vanderhyphen Jones who has been divorced four times, and spends her days between the beauty parlor and the Heron Club, that she must be a fantastic sort of creature. But behind the headlines she is a person like us, in a different degree of bewilderment, monotony, fear—looking for a star. Behind every headline are the same people looking for stars. And at least once a year all of us look to the same star. It is drawn upon ten thousand Christmas cards, and lighted in ten thousand windows. A star of better things to come; symbol of hope that war may have an end, and all men's lives be fashioned in a nobler design. It is the way of man to go looking for a star.

Yet if there is only a star here and there to guide us we might feel much like the poet, who with a friend (such a convinced star-gazer that "he burned his house down for the fire insurance and bought a telescope with what is came to") looked through a telescope one night, and then remarked:

"We've looked and looked, but after all where are we?
Do we know any better where we are,
And how it stands between the night, tonight
And a man with a smoky lantern chimney,
How different from the way it ever stood?"

It is man's way to go looking for a star, but do we know any better where we are? Do things stand different from the way they ever stood?

I imagine that if everything were left up to us things would always stand about the same way. There would always be man standing on the mysterious earth, his sweat drying in the sun, his tears starting in the rain, his laughter riding down the wind, his blood running in the snow—man groping toward the inscrutable, godless stars. I imagine that's the way it would be if it were not for God.

"As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways and my thoughts than your thoughts . . ." It is to our great benefit that God is not an astrologer. He is not even a star-gazer. Behind the headline of human events there is not only man looking for a star, there is God.

"Thus do men always deep in hope and grief,
Turn, like astrologers, another leaf,
Forgetful of the time God turned a table.
For it was night, and while from near and far
Men searched with rebel eyes to find a star,
God found, with more simplicity, a stable."

That comes to us as something of a surprise. So it came to men in an ancient time also. The truth of the matter is that you are not born under the sign of a star as the astrologer would have you believe. You are born under the sign of a stable. Star-gazers overlook that. So does every other religion in the world. So does Communism; and capitalism. So does the CIO and the NAM and most everyone else in almost every present day institution. They go wandering around in manifold activities looking for stars, and overlooking the fabulous event bound up in the story of how God went looking for a stable. And found one.

It seems to me this is Christianity's distinguishing hallmark. Every religion is astrological and has something to say about stars. Christianity has something to say about stables; especially because it has something to say about one particular stable. Every religion is a story about man looking for a star. Christianity is a story of God finding a stable. "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways . . ."

This comes with so much surprise men do not quite believe it. When John was preaching repentance in the wilderness to make ready for the coming of a mighty king, a carpenter was standing quietly in the congregation. While men cried out to the stars for peace to shine down, God was speaking to them in a manger back of an inn. The word of man went forth in hope and fear to the high heavens, and the word of God became incarnate upon the earth.

Sign of a Stable

DO we know any better where we are? Do things stand different from the way they ever stood —between the night and a man with a smoky lantern? As different as light and darkness. As different as death and life.

The tragedy of our time is that people have been following the wrong stars, and expected both too much and too little of the earth. We lust after success, and strain after power, and grasp after things which, for better or for worse, earth does not have to give. People thresh about in frustration seeing only monotony, pain, grief and futility in human life. They follow this star and that with romantic hope, and then break in pieces when the hope does not come true. They should have looked to the stable. They might have then learned that love is born, and grows, and suffers, and rejoices in the most humble places of the earth. They might have learned that man is here to work, and to search for stars, and to endure the everlasting, toilsome, and painful existence; to sweat and cry and laugh and bleed, and grow old and die; and through it all to love with a fierce and tender love, knowing how much love was given to the world when God found that stable.

It is Christmas-time now. A good time to remember our salvation did not come flying through the heavens like a comet. It was not a shooting star that heralded the good tidings. It was manifested in an event less spectacular and much more fruitful. It was when God stepped into the world very quietly to show that a refugee family, a stable boy, a handful of shepherds, and a few scholars—all of them star-gazers—could find all hope and all life in a stable where a child was born in pain and cried in the night.

So men might have searched the stars forever and never known any better where they were, nor how it stood with them, had not God searched and found the stable. Now we do know that our place of transfiguration is never far off. Light breaks in upon us, as it always has, and always will, through a child, a family, a small dark town; in every dingy, commonplace, tender, half-forgotten earthy thing. That is God's way. It comes as quite a surprise to us star-gazers. But it has surprised angels and startled them into song, and put shepherds and wise men upon the way of gladness. It is when men come to learn they are born under the sign of a stable that life becomes a rejoicing, even though it may lead them to the sign of the cross.

Nominations Please

THE WITNESS, in one of the January numbers, presents an Honor Roll of men and women of the Episcopal Church who have over the years, or by a single heroic action, advanced the cause of Christ and his Church. In past years the lists have presented names of people widely known, but equally to be honored, people who have served faithfully unheralded.

We seek nominations for the 1950 Honor Roll from our readers. Present the name of some man or woman, together with your citation. All those so nominated will be carefully considered by The Witness board of editors, with the Honor Roll presented in a January number.

Nominations should be sent to The Witness, Tunkhannock, Pa., and must be in our hands not later than Tuesday, January 2nd.

The New

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT OF 1950

The revised provisions of the Federal Social Security Act are of great importance to everyone who:

(1) Has been covered under the 1937 provisions, or
(2) Will be eligible to participate for the first time on Jan. 1, 1951.

DEDICATE NEW CHURCH AT CORPUS CHRISTI

★ Bishop Jones dedicated the new Church of the Good Shepherd, Corpus Christi, Texas, on November 26th, before a congregation of over a thousand persons, some of whom were unable to get in the church and stood outdoors. The whole week was one of celebration, with the following speaking at special services: Bishop Quin, Bishop Hines, Bishop Mason, and two former rectors, the Rev. William Munds of Greenville, Delaware and the Rev. Benjamin Minifie of Orange, N. J.

CHRISTMAS PARADE IN ROCKFORD

★ With thirty colorful floats depicting the Nativity, more than 75,000 spectators lined the streets of Rockford, Illinois, braving chill winds to witness the second annual Christmas parade. The procession moved over an eight-mile route. It was sponsored jointly by Protestant and Roman Catholic churches and by the Chamber of Commerce. It was entirely free of any commercialism.

SCHOOL OF RELIGION IN BURLINGTON

★ The men's club of St. Paul's, Burlington, Vermont, sponsored a school of religion which opened November 29th and continued through the 20th. At the first three sessions there were lectures by the Rev. John B. Midworth on "This is what we believe"; the Rev. Carl Sayers on "This is why we believe"; and the Rev. Carroll E. Simcox, rector at Manchester Center, on "This is what it means today." The lecturer on the 20th was the Rev. James A. Pike, chaplain at Columbia University. His subject being "This is our Church."

NATIONAL COUNCIL BUDGET

★ The National Council of Churches, which recently came into existence, will operate during 1951, its first year, on a budget of $4,435,326. The figure was approved by the 100-member general board at a session following the convention in Cleveland.

THE CLUE TO CHRISTIAN EDUCATION

A Constructive Contribution to the Theory and Practice of Christian Education by Randolph Crump Miller Dr. Miller answers the question of how we have failed to use the central beliefs of the Christian tradition in the religious education of our children. ". . . exceedingly valuable in giving religious education a new and necessary direction in our time." — DEAN J. M. MALLOCH $2.75

THE KINGDOM WITHOUT END

A Prophetic Interpretation of History and Civilization

by Robert Elliot Fitch An original and incisive book combining a basic Christian faith with a searching scepticism of secular illusions. "I shall be calling it to the attention of my pastors and other friends because of its keen insight and vigorous searching analyses of our society." — BISHOP JAMES C. BAKER $2.75

BASIC CHRISTIAN ETHICS

by Paul Ramsey "One of the most thoughtful and comprehensive presentations of the subject which we have had in many years." — REINHOLD NIEBUHR. ". . . my first choice as the theological book of the year." — BISHOP GERALD KENNEDY, Christian Advocate $3.75

THE PRAISES OF ISRAEL

Studies Literary and Religious in the Psalms by John Paterson "This is a book which will provide the preacher with fruitful 'leads' for a hundred sermons. It is also a book which will bring rewarding insights to anyone who reads it for his own personal inspiration." — Religious Book Club Bulletin $2.75

PSYCHOTHERAPY AND A CHRISTIAN VIEW OF MAN

by David E. Roberts ". . . ought to be in the hands of every parson, teacher, theological student, vestryman, and intelligent layman throughout the church." — The Witness $3.00

A treasure for the church member . . .

THE GOSPEL IN HYMNS

by Albert E. Bailey "For all who love the great hymns of the Church, this book is a glorious treasure . . . the most complete and the most fascinating story of hymns and their authors through the ages." — Religious Book Club Bulletin Profusely illustrated $6.00

ROSCOE FOUST TALKS TO PEACE GROUP

★ The Rev. Roscoe T. Foust, rector of the Ascension, New York and Witness editor, addressed an organization meeting of the New Jersey Committee for Peaceful Alternatives in Princeton, N. J., December 9th. Foust has been extremely active in the Greenwich Village group of the organization. He spoke, he said, as a realist, who had been chaplain at West Point for five years, and as the father of two boys now in the air force. He characterized the committee as persons who had not nor would not surrender to fear nor despair. For human beings, he asserted, war is the normal activity, and peace is an abnormal state. He cited figures which showed that from 1496 B. C. until 1861 A. D., humanity has had 3130 years of war and only 223 of peace. Since the dawn of history there have been over 8000 peace treaties negotiated and signed, and the average duration of each has been but two years. Yet, the speaker maintained, it is not necessary for man to live on a level of endeavoring to exterminate his fellowman, but to rise, by the power of God, where he may build world-wide fellowship. An organized effort of lovers of peace is necessary to meet the crisis of the times.

Other clergymen who spoke briefly at the meeting included the Rev. John Mackay, president of Princeton Theological Seminary (Presbyterian), the Rev. Prof. Hoffman of New Brunswick Seminary (Reformed), the Rev. Mr. Sharkey of Moorestown, N. J. (Lutheran), and the Rev. Andrew Van Dyke, executive secretary of the Episcopal League for Social Action. After discussion of program, an executive committee was empowered to draw the final conclusions and effect an organization.

OHIO RECTOR IS HONORED

★ The Rev. David M. Talbot, rector of Trinity Church, Coshocton, Ohio, was recently awarded the title of Rural Minister of the Year as the representative of the Episcopal Church. Sixteen Ohio pastors received this award in the program to honor ministers who have been making an outstanding contribution to better living in rural areas.

The project is sponsored by the Ohio Council of Churches, Oberlin School of Theology, Ohio Farm Bureau Federation and Farm Bureau Insurance Companies and the Ohio Farmer.

Mr. Talbot received the award on the basis of the fine work he has done in his community, participating in many community activities including the County Ministerial Association, the Cancer Fund, CROP, and the Youth Center.

OHIO SCHOOL OFFERING AIDS PARISH

★ The Church schools of the diocese of Ohio are devoting their Advent offering to furnish the new school rooms at Trinity, Alliance. Each year Bishop Tucker designates a special project for the offering.

THE MARY BOOK

Assembled by F. J. Sheed
12 illustrations, 4 in full color
This is the most complete book on Our Lady we have seen: everything is here—the doctrines about her (including, of course, the doctrine of her Assumption) her life, the devotions to her, her effect on history. That Catholics will want it goes without saying, but they are not, we hope, the only people interested in the Mother of Christ. 411 pages. $4.00.

THE BREAKING OF BREAD

by John Coventry, S.J.
A short history of the Mass—how it has developed, which parts of a modern Mass are the most recent additions, etc., and a commentary on the daily Mass prayers now in use. The value of the book is enormously increased by 64 really superb photographs of a priest saying Mass, many of them taken from close up beside the altar, hence showing actions which, in the ordinary way, the congregation cannot see. $3.00.

VESSEL OF CLAY

by Leo Trese
$2.00
The author wrote this account of a day in his own life as a parish priest chiefly for his fellow priests. Its popularity with the clergy of other denominations has surprised both the author and us—though it is true enough that there are many daily problems common to all Christian pastors. In the current issue of the 12-page paper we publish every two months or so—Sheed & Ward's OWN TRUMPET—we have reproduced comments on the book by Protestant clergymen and reviewers. If you would like to see this and the other reviews and extracts from books in the TRUMPET, send a note to Testina MacGill. It comes free and postpaid.

NEWS OF CHURCHES OVERSEAS

ARCHBISHOP FISHER IN NEW ZEALAND

Archbishop Geoffrey Fisher of Canterbury is in New Zealand to attend the centenary celebration of the Anglican province of Canterbury. He told reporters in Wellington that the rearming of the U.S. and Europe was "a purely defensive measure" which he approved "provided the purpose is to do everything to preserve peace." Answering a question about the state of the Church in England, he said that it "is increasingly alive and is an important factor in Britain's recovery and national welfare, especially among the middle and lower classes who have borne the brunt of the nation's postwar difficulties."

He is on three-month tour of Australasia with one month spent in New Zealand.

UNITED CHURCH REPORTS SUBSTANTIAL GAINS

The United Church in Canada has increased 205,657 during its 25 years of existence, according to a report issued in Toronto. Present membership is given as 806,179. When Methodists, Congregationalists and Presbyterians merged into the United Church the total membership was 600,522. The report also states that there are 1,916,908 persons "under pastoral care", a gain of 655,130 in the 25 years.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY TO AID CHINA

The Church Missionary Society of England is to continue to aid missionaries in China. There are about 50 missionaries in China proper and 20 in Hong Kong working under its auspices. Help is to be given through financial support and "preparation of the right men and women to go to China when permitted by the government and requested by the Church." On financial support the resolution states that it involves "'trusting the Church with such resources as we are able to send and they can receive."

NIEMOELLER MAY TAKE PARISH

Martin Niemoeller, head of the foreign affairs office of the Evangelical Church in Germany, has been under severe criticism for opposing the rearming of Germany. Replying to his critics, Niemoeller declared that "the Church has the task of being the nation's conscience and a great clasp linking the East and the West. The attempt to press arms into our hands is a disaster of the greatest extent to prevent which I will venture anything. I stand under the pressure of conscience and will speak as long as there is time." He told Church leaders that they should think over whether or not he should continue to hold office, and indicated that if attacks continue against him he might look for a parish in eastern Germany.

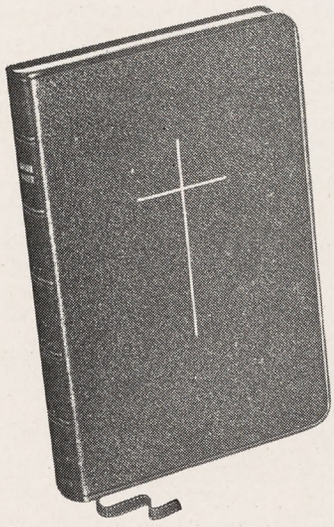
PROTESTANT CHURCH IN JORDAN

The Arab Evangelical Episcopalian Church, major native Protestant group, in Palestine, has built its first church in Amman, capital of the Hashemite Kingdom of the Jordan. The church is attended mostly by Palestinian Arab refugees of the Protestant faith who have settled in and around the capital.

ANGLICANS URGE PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT IN EAST

Hope for "a just and peaceful settlement" of the Far East conflict was voiced in London by the Church Missionary Society in a letter to Prime Minister Attlee, just before he left for his conference with President Truman.

CHURCH UNION ADVANCES IN NEW ZEALAND



Church union was a key topic at the annual conference of the Methodist Church of New Zealand and the general assembly of the Presbyterians, held in Wellington the last week of November. These Churches, together with the Congregationalists, voted favorably on a proposed basis for union about three years ago, but the majorities were not considered sufficient to allow the movement to proceed.

ARCHBISHOP OF YORK URGES ARMING

Archbishop Garbett of York told his diocesan conference that European nations should build up armaments so that it will be "too dangerous for Russia to embark on a major war." He also said that the cold war not being waged "may presently change to a hot war and if a hot war should break upon an unprepared Europe it would be engulfed in an age darker than that from which Christendom only slowly emerged some centuries ago."

THE NEW BOOKS

FREDERICK C. GRANT, Book Editor

An Outline of New Testament Ethics. By Lindsay Dewar. Westminster. $3.00.

If this brief outline provokes debate, it will not be solely because the Christian ethic is under direct attack from without. For example, with reference to Mark 10:6-9, Canon Dewar argues that "divorce should not be permitted to anybody at all" because indissoluble monogamy is "part of the natural law." At the same time he asserts that the Christian ethic is "entirely beyond the power of man to perform" without the supernatural gift of the Holy Spirit. Just how this "ethic of the Holy Spirit" can be made a universal law of life for the world, before that world is converted to Christian faith, is only one of the problems the readers is left to ponder. It is to be hoped the average reader will not be deterred by the liberal use of Greek terms which are seldom left untranslated.—Oscar J. F. Seitz

Philip Mercer Rhinelander. By Henry Bradford Washburn. Morehouse-Gorham. $2.50.

An all too brief life of an eminent bishop by an equally eminent dean. The volume gives particular emphasis to Bishop Rhinelander's wide influence through his personal friendships and to his unusual fitness to be the first warden of the College of Preachers.

Start Where You Are. By Arnold H. Lowe. Harper. $2.00.

There is no point in reading this book unless you think this is good theology: "Faith gives us the assurance that God is available, that he can be used as a man uses a well. Not words, not creeds, not progress, not things—but God, and after God, Christ." This is the level of the book. —A. C. L.

Living the Creed. By Carroll E. Simcox. New York: Morehouse-Gorham, Inc. $2.75.

This is a beautifully written book, whose purpose is to bring its readers into the "interior of the creed" by showing them what it feels like, what it means at bottom, to be a Christian who professes the Apostles' Creed and wishes to live in terms of it. It will be useful to the clergy who seek to help their laity in this most important of all matters; and even if some of us dislike particular sections—as the reviewer happens to dislike one or two of the chapters because he feels that important issues have either been evaded, or solved (and in the author's own direction) far too readily—we can profit by a reading of this book. Not least important, it is full of sermon suggestions and replete with literary allusions, both of which will have their particular interest to parish priests. —W. Norman Pittenger

Charles Freer Andrews: A Narrative. By Benarsidas Chaturvedi and Marjorie Sykes. Harper. $3.75.

No one who had the privilege of meeting the late C. F. Andrews, however briefly, will ever forget the impression made by that extraordinary man. In appearance, in dress, in habits of life and mind and speech, he resembled the Eastern guru possibly more than any Westerner of our day, yet remained Christian to the core. His wide travels, his unique intimacy with Ghandi, Tagore, and many others, his vital role in many crucial events afford material for a chronicle of his times seen through his life, of which his biographers have taken full advantage with conscientious scholarship and restrained devotion.—Henry P. Van Dusen.

There is Music in the Street. By Franziska Raabe Parkinson. Philosophical Library. $3.00.

A volume of prose poetry written from the point of view of nature mysticism.

All Reviews are by Dr. Grant unless otherwise indicated.

STORY OF THE WEEK

Bishop Pardue Works Closely With Organized Labor

Impressed With Possibilities That Church Has to Offer Working People

BY GEORGE B. DAVIDSON

★ Several years ago the CIO reached a very critical point in its brief history. In its earlier days it was frequently linked up with Communism. Because of several long and costly strikes they lost the confidence both of management and labor. Frequently they were associated with high pressure and violence, and many wondered if there was any value in the movement.

The fault, however, was not entirely with the union. Some men lost their jobs for union activity. There were instances when men who were elected president of their local union were asked to resign from their church because some prominent industrialist belonged to the same church.

Despite all of this the CIO became a real force. Their numbers steadily increased, and people soon realized that the trouble was frequently traced to poor leaders. Could the CIO get rid of them? That was the question which decided their future.

There were several local leaders who were trying to overthrow their leaders because they were giving the union a bad name, but they had little cooperation from the press and public men. On the whole the clergy were either hostile or were being expedient until they saw what would happen next.

One notable exception to this was a relatively young clergyman, the Very Rev. Austin Pardue, Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral in Buffalo. He saw that there were enough good men in the organization to hurdle these obstacles if only they were given enough encouragement and the right type of leadership. Having faith in them Dean Pardue bravely and courageously spoke on behalf of the CIO.

A lawyer, and a high executive from a large corporation called on Dean Pardue and warned him that he was treading on very dangerous ground, and strongly advised him to cease and desist. Despite the warning Dean Pardue continued to be friendly to the movement and to speak on their behalf.

A few years later Dean Pardue came to Pittsburgh, one of the strongholds of organized labor, to be the bishop of that diocese. Again he made news by his friendship to the union leaders. At the reception dinner Bishop Pardue especially requested that leaders of the CIO, AF of L and the United Mine Workers be invited.

Gradually the CIO changed until it was the exact opposite of what it was at the start. Poor leaders were dropped in favor of good ones, high pressure was replaced by peaceful arbitration, and slowly and gradually they were gaining the confidence of political and industrial leaders. They became probably the most powerful force in the land. Mayors, governors, senators, and even presidents were openly courting their favor and good will.

Throughout all of this phenomenal growth the CIO leaders never forgot the timely help they received from Bishop Pardue in those critical years. At their international convention at the Auditorium in Atlantic City, where about 2300 delegates had come from United States and Canada, President Philip Murray spoke first pointing out that this is the most peaceful convention they have had inasmuch as there were no Communists present.

Bishop Pardue was then introduced as the second speaker, and for forty minutes he gripped their attention. In his address he compared the present leadership with past leaders like Ignatius Loyola and John Wesley, each of whom led the people at a very critical time and died leaving their followers in a much better condition than they found them.

This was something new for the CIO, to have an Episcopal bishop address their annual convention. Several priests and bishops of the Roman Catholic Church have addressed them in the past, and in a few instances have proved very influential and powerful. Even though many leaders are Roman Catholic they welcomed the presence of Bishop Pardue as one who had been a genuine friend in the past. Bishop Pardue has addressed regional meetings of the CIO both before and after this convention, and has always been received most enthusiastically. His address at Atlantic City was a climax to a series of appreciations.

Other speakers at the convention at Atlantic City were Vice President Barkley, Secretary of

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

Labor Maurice Tobin, and UAW President Walter Ruether.

Even though Bishop Pardue first became famous for his friendship with labor a few years ago in Buffalo his associations with them have much deeper roots. In his parish days at Hibbing, Minnesota and at Gethsemane Church, Minneapolis, the bishop was always in close touch with the working men, and was always able to see their viewpoint.

Now he is the bishop of the most highly industrial area in the world. Almost every church has some working men on the Vestry, and in some cases the entire Vestry is made up of men who belong to the CIO or United Mine Workers. In many churches the district has changed so that the only hope for expansion lies in reaching the working men. In this field Bishop Pardue has been eminently successful. Some old missions which a few years ago were considered dead have been revived and revitalized, and new missions are starting.

Bishop Pardue is greatly impressed with the possibilities that the Episcopal Church has to offer to the working men. His experience in Pittsburgh in almost seven years has convinced him that we have a real opportunity, especially among those who are dissatisfied with Rome. In one church alone over eighty have been received in the last three years, most of them have come from Rome. He feels that the Episcopal Church is now on the threshold of a new era in our relationship to the working men.

EPISCOPAL BISHOP ORDAINS A. POPE

★ A. Pope was presented by a Deacon to a Bishop of the Episcopal Church for ordination to the priesthood. A. Pope is curate at Grace Church, Lawrence, Mass., where the Rev. W. Harold Deacon is rector. The other principal in the story was Bishop Hall of New Hampshire.

STRIKE AVERTED AFTER PRAYER

★ Union and management representatives and federal mediators prayed together at St. Mark's, Toledo, Ohio, for divine guidance in settling a threatened strike of gas company employees. The strike would have imperilled service to 93,000 domestic and commercial consumers. The Rev. James McElroy, rector, who was chairman of a mediation committee, indicated that accord came quickly after the issue, involving higher pay, had been brought to the attention of the public in such an unusual way. The union leaders had asked for $2 a day increase and settled for half.

In his sermon at the service McElroy briefly traced the history of the labor movement in the United States and of the labor, management, consumer committee in Toledo, which he said was created to "bring some sense of moral values and justice into a situation which threatened to break apart the economic order because of strife and hatred. I call upon you here to join in the prayers of my parish because I have faith that God can help us and I am certain that if we put our trust in him, he will move our hearts and wills to find an answer."

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION IN THE PARISH

★ The Rev. Victor Hoag, director of religious education in the diocese of New Jersey, is to teach a course on "Christian education in the parish: practical problems" at the Philadelphia Divinity School. The first lecture will be February 7, and the course is open to all clergy and qualified lay people who wish to specialize in the field.

PEACEFUL ALTERNATIVES STATE PRINCIPLES

★ The New York Committee for Peaceful Alternatives has issued principles as the basis for establishment of alternatives to war: Settlement of international differences by UN negotiation and mediation; a five power meeting as proposed by the UN; outlawing of atomic and other weapons of mass destruction; general disarmament of conventional military establishments and weapons; admission of the new government of China to the UN; immediate truce in the UN-Korea-China crisis.

Mrs. Frederick B. Fisher, widow of a Methodist Bishop who served many years in China, is the chairman pro-tem of the group. A large number of religious leaders serve on the executive committee, including the Rev. Roscoe T. Foust, rector of the Ascension and Witness editor.

HOLY TRINITY A PARISH

★ Holy Trinity, New York, has been incorporated as an independent parish, thus severing a fifty-year relationship as a part of St. James parish. The rector is the Rev. James A. Paul who has been the vicar since 1940. The church was started as a mission in 1890 and the following year was incorporated as a mission of St. James. Due to the generosity of Miss Serena Rhinelander, Holy Trinity has a fine plant which is admirably equipped to house the varied activities of the parish.

The achieving of independence by a mission church is a rare event in New York City. The last time was in 1852 when the Church of the Incarnation, a chapel of Grace Church, became a parish. St. George's, once a chapel of Trinity Church, gained its independence in 1811.

SEMINARIES EXEMPT ON G I BILL

★ Impending cut-off date for GI educational benefits will not affect theological seminaries, the Veterans Administration has revealed. Unless Congress amends the present law, veterans cannot begin any new courses of study after July 25, 1951. This means that the forthcoming semester is the last date at which veterans can register in most institutions and receive government benefits under the GI bill of rights. However, entrance into a theological seminary after July 25, 1951, will be considered "normal progress of training" for those undergraduate students who declare their intention of studying in a graduate school of theology before they have completed their work on the B. A. degree. Thus, they will be able to enter a seminary for the first time and receive GI benefits regardless of the cut-off date for new studies.

Two requirements must be met, however, the VA said. The student must declare his intention of studying theology before he is graduated, and he must enter upon his training forthwith at the end of his summer vacation. Thus, a student graduating next June must enter a seminary in the fall to be eligible for GI benefits.

Independent theological seminaries were the only class of educational institutions in which more veterans were enrolled this academic year than last.

SOCIAL SECURITY COVERAGE

★ The 296 lay employees of the National Council have voted almost unanimously for coverage under the social security act. The amended law allows coverage for workers of religious, non-profit, tax-exempt organizations providing two-thirds of the employees voted for it, together with the affirmative choice of the employer, in this case voted at the October meeting of the National Council. There are 172 lay employees at the Church Missions House in New York, with the remaining workers serving overseas, in colleges and institutions.

Withholding will start January 1st for all who have given consent. It is expected that about 95% will consent by the time all the returns are in.

BISHOP BUDLONG IS HONORED

★ A service of thanksgiving for the achievements wrought in Connecticut during the episcopate of Bishop Budlong was held at Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, December 10th. Clergy, visiting bishops and many prominent lay people attended. The sermon was by the retired bishop of New Hampshire, Bishop John Dallas. It was pointed out that since Bishop Budlong became diocesan in 1934, ten churches have been consecrated, 71 rectors instituted, 67 ordained to the priesthood, about 32,000 persons confirmed, and 1,400 received from the Roman Church.

BISHOP SHERRILL SETS DAY OF PRAYER

★ A call for special prayers on December 31 "for a peace which is the fruit of righteousness" has been issued by Bishop Henry K. Sherrill, acting in his new position as president of the National Council of Churches. He wrote: "As we begin a new year of great portent and the second half of the 20th century, let us beseech God to give to all nations unity, peace and concord. The supreme lesson of our day is our need of God, his wisdom, his mercy, and his guidance of men and of nations. As never before, we should pray daily to God for all mankind, for those who have at home and abroad the responsibilities of governmental decisions, for the United Nations, for the establishment of a peace of justice, and, purged of self-righteousness and worldly fears and anxieties, the rededication of ourselves and of our nation to the will of God."

NATIONAL STUDENT MOVEMENT

★ Episcopal students from all parts of the country are meeting this weekend at Cranbrook, Michigan, to initiate a national student movement. The purpose, according to Scott N. Jones, Ripon College, who is chairman, is to provide college students with an integrated and forward-moving organization to encourage worship, study, evangelism and ecumenism. Among those addressing the convention are Bishop Nash of Massachusetts, the Rev. Jesse M. Trotter of Virginia Seminary, the Rev. Samuel Shoemaker of New York, the Rev. Robert N. Rodenmayer of Northampton, Mass., the Rev. Thomas V. Barrett, chaplain at Kenyon College, and the Rev. James A. Pike, chaplain at Columbia.

HOUSE OF BISHOPS AGENDA

★ The tentative agenda of the meeting of the House of Bishops in El Paso, Texas, January 9-12, includes election of a bishop of Puerto Rico; consideration of pastoral care for those in the armed services; the new missionary work in Okinawa; report from the committee on procedure under marriage legislation; strategy of the Church in dealing with social questions; report of a committee on artificial insemination; the Anglican Congress, which will meet in Minneapolis in August, 1953, which is expected to bring together about 1,000 bishops, other clergy and laymen from 325 dioceses throughout the world.

MIXED MARRIAGE ANNULLED

★ Judge James R. Kirkland, vestryman of an Episcopal Church in Washington, D. C., annulled the marriage of a Baptist husband and a Roman Catholic wife because of the former's insistence on the use of contraceptives. The judge ruled that the marriage was contracted under fraud.

Ministers and Work

"LET a man so account of us as the ministers of Christ and stewards of the mysteries of God." As some of the clergy approach this sentence of St. Paul's, it causes deep searchings of the mind and heart. Some are not sure that much of what ministers are doing is exactly in harmony with the apostle's idea of the ministry. We are uncomfortable that in many cases as much as one-half of the total parish budget is spent for the parson's salary.

St. Paul insisted upon ministering, and at the same time earning his own living so that he would not be a burden on the faithful. It might be a good idea to consider a modification of the general practice of our "ministry." Is ours a full-time job? Is it necessary for the clergy to do all that falls under the head of administering a parish? Some clergy spend an unconscionable amount of time on things that have little or nothing to do with manifesting the will of God to those in their charge. These items include such administrative details as mimeographing a parish bulletin announcing with breathless anticipation next week's card party and meeting solemnly with the altar guild to discuss flowers. In another area there are parish calls made which have no other purpose than that of kind of a bargaining agreement—"if you call on me, I'll be in church next Sunday." Then there is the instruction and sermons which are made on the basis that even those who profess to be members of the Church must incessantly be reminded that it is their duty to worship together. It is a scolding of those who call themselves Christian, rather than the prophetic ministry which should convey a deeper knowledge of the glory and majesty of God.

The clergy may in part be responsible for much of the futile wasting of time and energy. Oftentimes without realizing it they have taken on some administrative job that could have been done better by a layman, and once busy with it, it comes to appear that no one else would be capable of doing it. Some ministers have so exalted the pastoral office that they come to think that they alone in the parish family are qualified to make calls on the sick, the afflicted, the prisoners. Of course, everyone is not gifted in this work, but we have a tendency to develop a psychology in the Church that freezes out the laity from any activity except those that will raise money. Although the Prayer Book services give us an almost unparalleled opportunity to enlist complete participation in worship, we are apt to give so little thought to preparation and conduct of it, that there is almost a denial of the peoples' part in it, and it becomes for them another "spectator" event in which the clergyman has the only role.

There is a possibility that some of this situation could be mended and even cured if we pondered the "apostolic ministry," and looked at some of the renewals of it in this day, both in our own country, and particularly in parts of western Europe. There are dozens of movements going on where parish life is being reinvigorated, and the gospel truly preached and followed. One characteristic of these is that the clergy are living among their people, supporting themselves by work in factory or field, and ministering to them in the unique function as priests in the off-hours. For a fuller insight of this practice, two books by Claire Hughet Bishop should be read—"France Alive" and "All Things Common." What this does in creating a sense of parish life is inspirational beyond the telling. The priest becomes one with fellow-workers in many sectors of life and the worship of the community has more relevance.

There are parishes where it might be quite impossible for any such plan to be brought about, though oftentimes when the very busy rector strictly analyzes his work he discovers that the really important things that he does as priest, prophet and pastor do not constitute full-time

"QUOTES"

It has been my experience in my relationship with union organizations and labor leaders in the United States that I have yet to find any vestige of anti-religious feeling. The unions have at all times welcomed me as a religious leader and have encouraged me to preach a sound faith in Jesus Christ.

—AUSTIN PARDUE
Bishop of Pittsburgh

We live in this world through the grace of God. His teachings are our religion, brought to us through our churches. Churches and labor unions should work hand-in-hand because of their common concern for the family life—the unit of all nations. What our churches do for the spiritual life of the family, our labor unions are trying to do in the work-a-day world because the sole reason for the existence of labor unions is to bring to the family life those better things in life which God in His infinite wisdom has decreed they should have.

—PHILIP MURRAY
President, Congress of Industrial Organizations work. But it is safe to say that a vast majority of those parishes and missions which struggle with a financial burden month after month would not only be relieved of that predicament, but would begin to have a much more healthy life if the rector or priest in charge went to work in a secular job as well. Such a plan would be a vast wrench from traditional thinking about Anglican clergy, but revolutionary times cannot be met adequately without drastic change. And we must repeat, there are overtones of not only mechanical but also spiritual "apostolic succession" in such a procedure.

Religion Speaks to Labor

EDITED BY

Lucy Randolph Mason and John G. Ramsay

We recognize the right of labor to organize and to engage in collective bargaining to the end that labor may have a fair and living wage, such as will provide not only for the necessities of life, but for recreation, pleasure and culture.—Southern Baptist Convention

We reaffirm the right of labor to organize into unions or to affiliate with national labor bodies. —Northern Baptist Convention

Methodist Church

We stand for the right of employees and employers alike to organize for collective bargaining and social action; protection of both in the exercise of their right; the obligation of both to work for the public good.—The General Conference of the Methodist Church

Collective bargaining, in its . . . mature phase, is democracy applied to industrial relations. It is representative government and reasoned compromise taking the place of authoritarian rule by force in the economic sphere. In its highest form it is the Christian ideal of brotherhood translated into the machinery of daily life. It was proclaimed by the prophet, Isaiah, when he said: "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord."—General Board of Christian Education of the Methodist Church

Presbyterian Churches

Labor unions have been instrumental in achieving a higher standard of living and in improving working conditions. They have helped to obtain safety and health measures against occupational risk; to achieve a larger degree of protection against child labor; to relieve the disabled, the sick, the unemployed; and to gain a more equitable share in the value of what they produce. These and other gains which labor unions have done much to win have reached far beyond their own membership and have benefited those who have not shared in the activity.—Board of Christian Education, Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.

The right of labor to organize and to bargain collectively with employers is clearly an inalienable right in a democracy and has so been recognized by our Government.—Synod of Tennessee, Presbyterian Church of U. S.

Roman Catholic Church

In the first place employers and workmen may themselves effect much in the matter which we treat—(saving the workers from being ground down with excessive labor). The most important of all are workmen's associations . . . but it is greatly desired that they should multiply and become more effective. The experience of his own weakness urges man to call on help from without. We read in the pages of Holy Writ: "It is better that two should be together than one . . . If one falls he shall be supported by the other. Woe to him that is alone, for when he falleth he hath none to lift him up." And further: "A brother that is helped by a brother is like a strong city." —Leo XIII

What is to be thought of the action of those Catholic industrialists who even to this day have shown themselves hostile to a labor movement that we ourselves recommended.—Pius XI

Episcopal Church

We are convinced that the organization of labor is essential to the wellbeing of the working people. It is based upon a sense of the inestimable value of the individual man.

Jewish Synagogue

The same rights of organizations which rest with employers rest also with those whom they employ. Modern life has permitted wealth to consolidate itself through organization into corporations. Workers have the same inalienable right to organize according to their own plan for their common good and to bargain collectively with their employers through such honorable means as they may choose.

We believe . . . that democratic participation of workers in the councils of management will not only increase efficiency as the knowledge and experience of workers will be available to management, but it will also prevent many of the tragedies, such as irregularity of employment, and speed up, which are the consequences of the operation of industry from the viewpoint of management alone.—Central Conference of American Rabbis

Congregational-Christian Churches

We stand for the replacement of the autocratic organization of industry by one of collective effort of organized workers and organized employers.

United Lutheran Church

It is the right of every man to organize with his fellow workers for collective bargaining through representatives of his own free choice. It is the duty of both management and labor to accept and support conciliation and arbitration in industrial disputes . . .—Board of Social Mission and Executive Board of the United Lutheran Church in America

Disciples of Christ

Be It Resolved by the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ:

That it is our conviction that workers should have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist in forming labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing and to engage in such activities as are within the limits of Constitutional rights for the purpose of bargaining with employers and other mutual aid protection.

That we call upon the members of Christian churches in communities where labor tensions exist to exert every effort to uphold the Constitutional rights of assembly, of speech, and of the press, and to lend their efforts to providing a place and leadership for fair and open discussion.

Evangelical and Reformed Church

In order that the Christian principles of respect for personality, establishment of brotherhood, and obedience to the revealed will of God may find more adequate expression in the economic order, we commit ourselves to work for . . . the recognition of the right of employers and workers to organize for collective bargaining, as a step toward the democratic control of industry for the good of society.

Church of the Brethren

Laborers are always to be regarded as persons and never as a commodity. Industry was made for man, and not man for industry.

Employees as well as employers have the right to organize themselves into a union for wage negotiations and collective bargaining.—Brethren Service Commission, Church of the Brethren

The Federal Council of Churches

Whereas, the churches, in the statement of "The Social Ideals" have stood for "The right of employes and employers alike to organize for collective bargaining," . . . Resolved: that the Federal Council record its conviction that not only has labor a right to organize, but also that it is socially desirable that it do so because of the need for collective action in the maintenance of standards of living . . .

Church of God

We have not been able to discover any church among the Holiness, Pentecostal, and Church of God groups that forbids its members to join unions.

Quotations from a letter written October 20, 1949 by Rev. Lawrence E. Brooks, executive secretary of the Church of God of Anderson, Indiana, indicate a friendly attitude towards the purposes of organized labor. This is one of the largest of the Churches of God.

"The general sentiment in our church group is in favor of the fundamental purposes of organized labor. It should be clearly understood that this statement which I am giving you is my own interpretation of the Church's attitude and has not been decided upon by the action of any of our Assemblies.

"The matter of labor unions has never been made an issue in our church group and I am quite sure that it never shall be since we leave all such questions to the individual to decide. We think that there are certain areas where the individual must be left to decide on such questions for himself without affecting his standing so far as his relationship with the Church is concerned."—Church of God, of Anderson, Indiana

Pentecostal Holiness Church

This Church especially omits labor unions in its ban against membership in certain organizations. In the "Discipline of the Pentecostal Holiness Church," 1945, page 46, under section VI, general rules, sections 2 and 3, is the following:

"All our members are forbidden to hold membership in or have fellowship with oathbound secret societies, social clubs, and corrupt partisan politics, etc.

"The preceding paragraph is not intended to prohibit consistent association with a legal effort on the part of labor, to prevent oppression and injustice from capitalism."

The last paragraph emphasizes the need for unions and permits members to join them for their economic benefit.

Religion and Labor Unions

BY LUCY RANDOLPH MASON

ON a beautiful Sunday afternoon, some miles from a South Carolina textile town, about 400 men and women with their families gathered in a lovely little vale to hear about the benefits the Textile Workers Union of America, CIO, could bring. Folding chairs seated the audience. The mayor, for whom the textile workers had voted, was present.

This was the third meeting in two weeks—in that interval 600 people had signed union cards. Since then the union has petitioned the National Labor Relations Board to hold an election.

We speakers felt the inspiration of the gathering and put our best into the appeal to build a strong, democratic union that would not only bring union folk a better way of life, but economic and social benefits to the whole community. CIO's John Ramsay's opening and closing prayers were a challenge to the people to give their best to their union, seeking God's help in this great task.

That meeting was a reminder of the enthusiasm of union meetings 13 years ago when the CIO made its first appeal to southern textile workers. A feeling of optimism is running through union people in the South—and with reason. In the six weeks from October 1 to November 17, CIO unions have won 37 National Labor Board elections, in a territory spreading from Virginia to Texas. In addition many election petitions have been filed with the Board.

As Lorne Nelles, one of the directors of the CIO organizing committee, said: "Things are looking up. There is ample proof that people desire organization and will get it—if only employers would give them their rights under the law." Mr. Nelles knows, for he is constantly visiting union centers.

Tens of thousands of workers in the South's leading industries are already in unions, or are endeavoring to build them. In CIO ranks they come from textiles, clothing, steel, aluminum, rubber, oil, meat packing, automobile parts and assembly, chemicals (note the great CIO union at Oak Ridge), wood-working, furniture, and very important the new telephone union, Communications Workers of America, now representing 44,500 employees in the South. Nationally this union represents 325,000 people.

Among other industries in which are found varying degrees of union strength are paper, stone and allied products, ship building, wholesale and retail employment, insurance agents, newspaper reporters, and a number of miscellaneous occupations.

Customers Heard From

SOMETIMES the demands of customers in other regions result in union agreements. The head of a large clothing manufacturing company, with several plants in the South, had for many years bitterly fought the union. Recently he called the union leaders into his office and said that though he had fought the union a long time, he now needed it. He said he was getting letters from his trade saying that people want union made clothes, and unless he could put the union label in his products orders will stop — so, please organize.

While the organized plants in the textile industry are a minority in the South, they have been the trail blazers in raising wages and otherwise improving conditions in the industry throughout the region. The beneficial effect of the Textile Union is clearly seen in the following figures, which contrast wages during the war period (but before the stepped up CIO drive began in the South in 1946) with present pay.

In July 1945 union agreements in the cotton-rayon industry brought a minumum wage of 55 cents an hour, with average hourly pay of 66½ cents. Today the minimum pay provided through contracts is $1.01½, while the average hourly pay is $1.12. Wages in the textile industry still lag far below those in other industries, but they represent a great increase over former years.

The large mills in the unorganized part of the industry in the South usually adopt the minimum wage set by management-union agreements, but proudly boast that they give pay raise voluntarily. Of course their real purpose is to persuade their employes they can get higher pay without being in a union. They fail to add that these raises can readily be taken away without a union to defend them.

There is a tremendous upsurge of unionization in the wood working industry. Once thought to be unorganizable, the White and Negro workers in this vast industry are crowding into their union.

An allied industry, furniture making, is on an organization boom in many southern states. On a recent long drive to union centers, in north-eastern Tennessee, south-western Virginia, and North Carolina it seemed to me that a furniture plant popped up in every village. Often there would be four or five plants in one town.

No Discrimination

AMONG the many excellent by-products of unions is the increasing goodwill and understanding between White and Colored workers. CIO insistance that both races be organized in the same locals has brought about a fine working relationship. Regretably many employers use the race issue to hinder unionization. The Union helps build first class citizens who more and more participate in civic matters.

Religion has an important part in this whole picture. Most union meetings are opened and closed with prayer. Many textile locals elect a chaplain from among their members. Through the South under John Ramsey's driving influence, religion and labor fellowships meet in many cities, bringing together church and union people, Negro and White. These fellowships are equally helpful to ministers and union leaders, as they come to know and trust each other.

Tall, genial John V. Riffe, seasoned union leader, now director of the CIO organizing committee, got his first union education in a coal mine. Later he was a steel worker. His associates in this region are Lorne Nelles, Philip Clowes and John G. Ramsay. Nelles and Riffe are Baptists, Clowes and Ramsay Presbyterians. John Ramsay is also director of CIO community relations. All of these men are steel workers and long time friends. All played important parts in organizing the vast Bethlehem Steel domain. All were close friends of the late Van A. Bittner, and all are devoted to the service of their fellow men through the union movement.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Miss Mason, CIO's southern public relations representative, comes from a long line of Church people. George Mason, author of the Virginia Bill of Rights, which later went into the U. S. Constitution, was a staunch Episcopalian and equally staunch advocate of separation of Church and state and for religious liberty. Her father was the Rev. Landon Randolph Mason, for many years the rector of Grace Church, Richmond, Va. Her mother's father was the Rev. John Cary Ambler, who started out a lawyer but became an Episcopalian minister and for many years ministered to the people in the mountains of W. Va. Miss Mason, herself a devout Churchwoman, recently said in an address: "Had I been born a man I would have been a minister too, but have never regretted being a woman and to the best of my ability making my life a ministry."

Talking It Over

BY

W. B. SPOFFORD SR.

A clergyman friend over Philadelphia way is fed up with us after many years so "when my subscription runs out let it lapse." He thinks we have been way off in urging peace. He says too: "I'm fed up with all this chatter about the 'rights' of union labor. When men die for a few paltry dollars a month I have an unexpressable opinion of anyone who is jacking up wages on behalf of the 'enslaved' workers who can enjoy safety and security in spite of the iniquitous Taft-Hartley law."

After reading his blast I turned to the New York Herald-Tribune, chiefly to find out whether Red Smith figured the recent Red-Sox-White-Sox deal would hurt the 1951 chances of the Yankees. He has nothing to say, so I have to figure that one out myself. But it did seem to me that various reports and comments in this one issue of a conservative metropolitan newspaper came up with the answers for my clerical friend. In the business section was this news: "Cash dividends which thirty leading oil companies have paid or will pay in 1950 aggregate some $683,000,000, an all-time peak, an increase of 21.1 percent over the $564,000,000 disbursed by the same companies in 1949, according to an estimate being released today by the petroleum department of Chase National Bank. The bank's survey indicates that the combined net profits of the thirty oil companies this year will be approximately $1,666,000,000, of which 41 percent would be paid in dividends and the balance retained in the business."

AP and Lawrence

ON another page was a piece by David Lawrence cracking at Premier Attlee and the British generally for their "shortsighted" policy in seeking to avoid a "large-scale war in the Far East." Mr. Lawrence wrote that "the American people do not want war anywhere. They are not interested in protecting investments anywhere over and above human life."

However, in the same edition of the same paper was a news story dated Hong Kong, sent out by the Associated Press. "This British crown colony", the news despatch said, "has virtually stopped functioning economically as the result of the American ban on critical exports which might find their way into the hands of the Communists. It is perhaps ironic that American bankers should be so seriously hit by their own governments's action to stop movement of strategic goods into Communist China. However, some American banking sources here predict that the United States will be forced to relax the order. They say the 'billion-dollar-lobby' of American banking, shipping, and insurance interests is bound to make itself heard in Washington quickly."

All of which adds up, it seems to me, to the fact that Mr. Lawrence is not correct. The American people, as he states, "do not want war anywhere. They are not interested in protecting investments anywhere over and above human life." But it is clear that the American people have, these days, little or nothing to say about such matters. Policies are determined by 'billion-dollar-lobby', representing financial and industrial giants that mean to keep on paying fabulous dividends, even if it means death to millions.

So when my parson friend weeps about "one of my parish boys who was wounded in Korea" I beg him to ask himself the question "why"? And if there are no newspapers in his Philadelphia giving the answers, I'll be glad to send him very revealing clippings from the New York Herald-Tribune.

Or if he wants a Church source, I refer him to the December statement of Mr. Russell E. Dill, treasurer of the National Council of the Episcopal Church: "It is reported that industrial profits for the first nine months of this year shattered all previous records, that personal income soared to a new high annual rate, and that employment and wages were the highest in United States history." He goes on, naturally, to ask a larger share of the gravy for the Church.

Armaments, bombs, mobilization — with of course those mobilized having nothing to say about the matter — death in Korea and elsewhere. But don't get excited, profits have shattered all previous records. A bit more to workers, sure. But if they get too greedy we can take care of them readily enough under this total mobilization setup. Ain't it all swell? And so Christian! Stop your sub, friend, if you can't take it. For me, I'm going to keep on shouting until total mobilization puts us out of business, one way or another.

Jesus, Brave

BY

PHILIP H. STEINMETZ
Rector of the Ashfield Parishes

HE said to his friends: "Do not fear those who kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do . . . Fear him who, after he has killed, has power to cast into hell." (St. Luke 12:4-5)

He was fearless. He defied the powerful. He thwarted profiteers. He linked teaching with practice without compromise. He sparked a revolution openly. Of course those whose prejudice and profits were attacked reacted. They killed him.

But that was all they could do. When those who knew him and loved him found him to be still alive and spoke openly of seeing and hearing him, they could only threaten or kill them and spread the faith they sought to crush.

Jesus was brave. But we powerful Americans have nearly reversed his directions. We have given ourselves over to fear those we think aim to kill us, seeing them in every movement for change, while neglecting to fear him who can cast us into hell.

Who is that? Almighty God.

It is the fear of God and the force of his love to which we should be bowing—the fear of his judgment of our conduct, business and politics, the force of his love poured out for us while we care less for him in thought or money or time than we do for our cars, candy or cigarettes.

We follow a brave leader. Take the measure of his courage and beware whom you fear.

WE JOIN IN YOUR PRAYERS FOR WORLD PEACE AND SECURITY FOR ALL.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH NEWS

BISHOP DUN REPORT CRITICIZED

★ Religious leaders who are members of the Fellowship of Reconciliation took issue with the report of the commission on the use of the atom bomb, which was presented by Bishop Dun of Washington at the final meeting of the Federal Council of Churches. The group stated that "in repenting and seeking to atone for the original launching of atomic war rather than in continuing resort to it, the United States and the rest of the world would find true security."

Exception was taken to the Bishop Dun report on three counts: (1) It "fails to reckon with the extent to which the original production of atomic weapons by the United States and their use on Hiroshima and Nagasaki by a unilateral American decision contributed to the present tragic insecurity of the world." (2) Force cannot be regarded as undergirding justice when the nature of the force employed is such as to undermine justice and destroy social order. (3) The Dun report fails to give men and nations a "distinctive" Christian word that would renew their "faith in the weapons of the spirit, rather than sanction resort to ever more diabolical material weapons."

MELISH CASE BOOKLET

★ The congregation of Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, N. Y., has published a new booklet entitled "The Story of a Congregation: Why the Melish Case is a Living Issue." It describes the long and tenacious struggle of the congregation to restore it ministers, the Rev. John Howard Melish, rector, and his assistant, the Rev. William Melish. It also explains the decision underlying the forthcoming application for leave to review the case which will be made to the Supreme Court of the United States on January 2nd. It is expected too that the case will come before the House of Bishops when it meets in El Paso on January 9.

Copies of the booklet may be secured by writing Mrs. Ella P. Rose, treasurer of the Melish defense committee, 161 Henry Street, Brooklyn 2, N. Y.

CORNERSTONE LAID IN PHILADELPHIA

★ Bishop Hart of Pennsylvania laid the cornerstone of the new All Saints, Rhawnhurst, Philadelphia, December 3rd. The address was by Mayor Bernard Samuel, a member of the parish. The Grand Lodge of Masons of the state attended in a body. The present building is the first unit of three planned on the new site. The Rev. Arthur L. M. Worthey is rector.

PEACE PRAYER VIGIL IN CHICAGO

★ The Rev. Ashley Gerhard, rector of Christ Church, Winnetka, joined with a large number of Protestant ministers in conducting an 11-hour prayer vigil for peace, held at Chicago Temple. At half-hour intervals, from noon until 11 p. m., 22 ministers conducted the quiet, unbroken service as the congregation of office workers, business men, shoppers, students, asked God for peace.

PEACE PRAYER VIGIL IN TEXAS

★ Due chiefly to a movement started during the summer by Bishop Quin, hundreds of Church people in the diocese of Texas are now taking part in a prayer vigil for peace. Said the Bishop: "With the prayers of our people continuing, maybe this horrible carnage will soon be over."

CHURCH-LABOR RELATIONS

★ Labor leaders should encourage union members to identify themselves with churches, it was urged at the annual convention of the Texas State Industrial Union Council, (CIO), meeting in Austin, Texas, December 18th. The suggestion came from the Council's religion and labor committee. It also proposed that the Council encourage the formation of religion and labor fellowships.

In its report the committee declared that "mutual interests and responsibilities in furthering the social, economic and spiritual welfare of all the people are shared by Church and labor." Religion and labor organizations, it added, "have already brought about better relationships between various segments of organized labor, between races, and between labor and the Church."

The fundamental principles of religion and labor, the report said, "are identical in that they are founded upon the belief that all material things are created for the use of all mankind, and that all men are created equal and should enjoy the fruits of their labor."

ST. ANN'S IS NAMED DIOCESAN CHURCH

★ St. Ann's, Brooklyn, has been named the diocesan church by Bishop DeWolfe and Rector Melville Harcourt, who also becomes the bishop's vicar by virtue of his position as rector. The step is taken in order that affairs of the diocese pertaining particularly to Brooklyn may be conducted in the borough rather than from the diocesan center.

LEONARD A. CHAPIN

Layman of Hartford, Conn.

It was interesting to read in a recent issue of your magazine that the United Synagogue of America has demanded the repeal of the McCarran-Mundt- anti-subversive bill. This pernicious piece of legislation hits at the very fundamentals of our democracy. It destroys those rights of freedom of speech, press and assembly which have always been held as American and which we have always cherished. This bill has been declared unconstitutional by the Attorney General. It was vetoed by President Truman as a menace to American freedom.

Our Protestant Churches have always thrived best in a climate of freedom and democracy. This atmosphere has been destroyed by the McCarran-act. How can the Voice of America broadcast abroad the freedom of Americans when this freedom is being wiped out? We have just engaged in promoting a Crusade for Freedom while at the same time Congress has been passing the most fascistic piece of legislation in the country's history. It would seem as though the social action groups of our Protestant Churches should lend their voices to the effort to secure the repeal of this un-American law.

JOSEPH D. C. WILSON

Rector at Foley, Alabama

Referring to several letters in recent issues, it seems that the Form of Prayer to Be used in Families is unknown to many of our people. Page 590 The Intercession says "Pardon all those who have done or wish us evil and give them repentance and better minds"; and the Litany page 57 "That it may please thee to forgive our enemies, persecutors, and slanderers, and to turn their hearts; we beseech thee to hear us, good Lord."

THOMAS J. DIXON

Layman of Brooklyn, N. Y.

This past summer there was held in the Yankee Stadium, New York, a gathering of a religious sect called Jehovah's Witnesses, to the number of 70,000. Their purpose was to show their strength, hear addresses by their leaders and engage in prayer and song. Later the Roman Catholic Church, with an equally large number present, gathered in the same stadium to celebrate some Church calendar event.

For the Protestants of New York to meet in like manner, overcoming for one day in the summer their denominational differences, would greatly promote Church influence and, above all, stir the imagination of the young people who have been apathetic to church services. Unity and resourcefulness are gainful always. The great uplifting thrill of a lifetime would be to hear 100,000 Christian people singing, heavenward, that grand hymn, "Faith of our fathers, holy faith."

MRS. PAUL BRINK

Churchwoman of Palo Alto, Calif.

Being a woman, it was difficult for me to humble myself enough to confess that it is true about Eve. Women are the cause of the sins of the world because we are the mothers. We corrupt our children and we corrupt our husbands because we love the things of the flesh more than those of the spirit. We have raised the men whose greed and lust have conquered empires and caused all other such conditions that make war. We offer our sons to go forth to kill or be killed; to obey Caesar rather than God. We even praise the deeds they do.

After repenting for my share of the sins of the world, I joined the Episcopal Pacifist Fellowship. We believe war to be a hideous denial of God's will and put our faith in the way of redemptive love as set forth supremely in Jesus Christ.
